TANFIELD, a chapelry, in the parish of CHESTER-LE-STREET, union of LANCHESTER, Middle division of CHESTER ward, N. division of DURHAM, 7 miles (S. W.) from Gateshead; containing 3000 inhabitants. This chapelry, which includes the lordship of Beamish and the constabulary of Lintz-Green, is bounded on the north by the river Derwent, and comprises 6863 acres, of which 700, chiefly arable, are the property of the Marquess of Bute. The common, consisting of 1040 acres, was divided under an act of parliament, in 1800; the surface is irregularly broken into hills, and the soil generally poor and unproductive. The substratum is chiefly coal, and at Tanfield-Leigh, the marquess and his partners have a colliery of excellent steam coal, which was opened in 1829, to the depth of 60 fathoms; it is extensively wrought, and the produce sent to Gateshead and South Shields, where it is shipped. The South Tanfield colliery is the property of Messrs. James Reid and Company, of Newcastle; the coal is good, and is shipped from the north dock at Sunderland. Tanfield arch, a stately structure of stone, was erected by certain of the coal-owners, at an expense of £12,000, to replace an arch of wood previously constructed for facilitating the transit of their waggons across a ravine, and which had recently fallen; the present arch, which is 130 feet in span, rises from abutments 9 feet high to a height of 60 feet, forming a continuation of the level road. The village consists of houses irregularly built on the declivity of a hill sloping from the north, and near the river Houghwell, which discharges itself into the Tyne a little above Gateshead; the manufacture of paper is carried on, for which there are two mills. Tanfield originally constituted a prebend in the collegiate church of Chester-le-Street, of which the dean was bound to maintain a chaplain here; and at the Dissolution, some provision was made out of the small tithes for the support of a perpetual curate. The chapel, dedicated to St. Margaret, was rebuilt by subscription, in 1749, with the exception of part of the chancel, in which is an ancient piscina: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of Lord Ravensworth; net income, £140, with a glebe of two acres. The tithes, which are held by his lordship and others, have been commuted for £466. There are some small bequests for the education of children, and for distribution among the poor; and an excellent national school has been recently built, for the instruction of boys and girls.

TANFIELD, EAST, a township, in the parish of KIRKLINGTON, wapentake of HALLIKELD, N. riding of YORK, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Ripon; containing 38 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 1160 acres, chiefly the property of the Marquess of Ailesbury, and set out in farms. The tithes have been commuted for £228.

TANFIELD, WEST (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the wapentake of HALLIKELD, N. riding of YORK, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Ripon; containing 696 inhabitants. The village is pleasant, and well built. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 0. 5., and in the gift of the Marquess of Ailesbury: the tithes have been commuted for £415. 10.; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 63 acres. The church is an ancient structure, containing many curious old monuments, and attached to it is the chantry of Maud Marmion, founded in the time of Henry III., for a master, warden, and two brothers, to pray for the souls of Lord and Lady Marmion. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Eleven children are educated for £8 per annum left by Diana, Countess of Oxford, and a smaller annuity bequeathed by Catherine Allen, in 1769. On the bank of the Ure, which is here of considerable width and crossed by a bridge, are the remains of a castle.

TANGLEY (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of ANDOVER, hundred of PASTROW, Andover and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Andover; containing 281 inhabitants. A fair for sheep is held on April 15th. The living is annexed to the rectory of Faccombe: the tithes have been commuted for £329. 12., and the glebe comprises $1\frac{1}{2}$ acre. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

TANGMERE (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of WEST HAMPNETT, hundred of ALDWICK, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of SUSSEX, 3 miles (E. by N.) from Chichester; containing 225 inhabitants. It comprises 728a. 1r., of which about two-thirds are arable, and the remainder meadow. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 5., and in the gift of the Duke of Richmond: the tithes have been commuted for £274; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 17 acres. The church is in the early English style, with a spire, and contains a Norman font: in the churchyard is a venerable yew-tree, 20 feet in girth at the height of a yard from the ground.

TANKERSLEY (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of WORTLEY, wapentake of STAINCROSS, W. riding of YORK; containing, with the chapelry of Wortley, 1802 inhabitants, of whom 812 are in Tankersley township, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.) from Barnsley. The parish is bounded on the west by the river Don, and comprises about 8500 acres, of which 2500 are in the township of Tankersley, and chiefly the property of Earl Fitzwilliam, who is lord of the manor; the soil is generally fertile, and the lands are in good cultivation. The surface is beautifully diversified with hill and dale, and the scenery abounds with pleasing features, of which the most interesting are the ruins of the old Hall, consisting of a portion of one of the wings, situated in a spacious park richly wooded and well stocked with deer, and containing some of the most ancient and stately oak-timber in the country. On an eminence in the grounds, which are still preserved as an appendage to Wentworth, the principal seat of Earl Fitzwilliam, is a building in the Grecian style, commanding extensive prospects; and near it is the source of a rivulet which flows through the demesne. Iron-stone and coal are abundant in the parish and vicinity, and a considerable number of the population are employed in mines and collieries. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £26. 0. $2\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £474; patron, the Earl. The church is a handsome structure, with a square embattled tower, and contains some work in the early English style. The poor have an estate producing £29 per annum.

TANNINGTON (St. ETHELBERT), a parish, in the union and hundred of HOXNE, E. division of SUFFOLK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Framlingham; containing 252 inhabitants. It comprises 1602 acres, of which 88 are common or waste. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Brundish annexed, valued in the king's books at £12. 10. $2\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £196; patron and appropriator, the Bishop of Rochester. The vicarial tithes of Tannington have been commuted for £83. 10., and the appropriate for £320; and the bishop has a glebe of $4\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The rent of the town lands, £60 per annum, is applied to the repair of the church, and to the general purposes of the parish.

TANSHELF, a township, in the parish of PONTEFRAC, Upper division of York, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile (W. by S.) from Pontefract; containing 502 inhabitants. This township, which adjoins the end of the town of Pontefract, comprises about 275 acres, and consists chiefly of neat houses and villas, occupied by families connected with the borough, to which it forms a pleasing appendage.

TANSLEY, a hamlet, in the parish of CRICH, union of BAKEWELL, hundred of WIRKSWORTH, S. division of the county of DERBY, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (E.) from Matlock; containing 549 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

TANSOR (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of OUNDLE, hundred of WILLYBROOK, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Oundle; containing 303 inhabitants. This place, originally called Tandisover, and by Camden Tansover, formed part of the Roman division of Coritani, or Cortani; and at Cotterstock, on the opposite bank of the river Nene, which flows here, a fine Roman tessellated pavement has been discovered. The parish comprises 1414a. 1r. 27p.; the soil is in general light and gravelly. The village is pleasantly situated in the vicinity of the river, which, with its picturesque windings, ornaments the scenery through which it passes. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 12. 11.; net income, £283; patrons, the Dean and Chapter of Lincoln. The tithes were commuted for land in 1777; there is a glebe-house, and the glebe contains about 233 acres. The church is an interesting and well-built structure, with a plain tower, and comprising portions of the Norman style, mixed with the early and later English; in the middle and south aisles are twelve stalls, brought from the adjacent collegiate church at Fotheringhay, and which are most beautiful specimens of carved wood-work. There are also portions of screen-work, and several ancient monuments, among the latter of which is a brass mural tablet in the chancel, with an effigy of John Colt, rector, having the date 1440.

TANTOBY, a hamlet, in the chapelry of TANFIELD, parish of CHESTER-LE-STREET, union of LANCHESTER, Middle division of CHESTER ward, N. division of the county of DURHAM, 9 miles (S. W) from Gateshead.

The village is situated in an extensive coal district, and upon elevated ground on the southern acclivity of a hill, whence there is a fine prospect of the surrounding country. The Brandling Junction railway passes close to it.

TANWORTH (St. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish, in the union of SOLIHULL, Henley division of the hundred of BARLICHWAY, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 4 miles (N. W. by N.) from Henley-in-Arden; containing 1925 inhabitants. This parish, which is near the road and the canal from Birmingham to Stratford, comprises, with the liberty of Monks-Riding, 9400 acres, the property of several freeholders, of whom Edward Bolton King, Esq., is lord of the manor. There are 4668 acres of arable, and 3890 of pasture, and the remainder of the area is composed of wood and waste grounds; the soil on one side of the parish is chiefly clay, and the lands are under good cultivation Umberslade Hall, here, the seat of Mr. King, and formerly the residence of the Lords Archer, is a handsome mansion built in 1720 with stone from a quarry in the parish. The village is pleasantly situated; the manufacture of wick-yarn was once carried on to a considerable extent, but is now discontinued. A fair for cattle and sheep is held on the 23rd of April, and one at the end of September for hiring servants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of Viscount Holmesdale, who, with Mr. King, is impropiator: the vicarial tithes have been commuted for £500; there is an excellent vicarage-house, built by the incumbent, the Rev. Dr. Saunders, master of the Charter-House school, London, and the glebe comprises 40 acres. The church, originally a handsome structure in the decorated English style, has been greatly impaired by injudicious alterations made within the last 50 years. A church has been erected at Salters-Street, which see; and two schools for boys, and two for girls, are supported out of the proceeds of bequests producing £150 per annum, the remainder of which is distributed to the poor. There is a place of worship for Independents.

TAPLOW (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of ETON, hundred of BURNHAM, county of BUCKINGHAM, 1 mile (E. N. E.) from Maidenhead; containing 744 inhabitants. The parish is separated from the county of Berks by the river Thames, on which is an extensive paper-mill; and the Great Western railway passes within half a mile of the church. Cleifden, here, which was the residence of the Prince and Princess of Wales, during the infancy of their son, George III., formerly belonged to a member of the Hamilton family, who fought under the celebrated Duke of Marlborough, and who, on his return from the continent, indulged the fancy of figuring the battle of Blenheim, by plantations of trees, now in full vigour. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 18. 9., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £329. The church is a neat structure of brick, lately erected at some distance from the site of the old edifice, which was taken down, with the exception of part of the chancel, including the east window, and part of the west end of the nave, now forming a picturesque ruin. In the chancel of the former church were interred the remains of Sarah Milton, mother of the immortal poet, who resided here for some years.

TAPTON, a township, in the parish and union of CHESTERFIELD, hundred of SCARSDALE, N. division of the county of DERBY, 1½ mile (N. E. by E.) from Chesterfield; containing 178 inhabitants.

TARBOCK, a township, in the parish of HUYTON, union of PRESCOT, hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 7 miles (E. by S.) from Liverpool; containing 740 inhabitants. It comprises about 2245 acres, of which 2200 are arable and pasture, and 25 woodland; coal is abundant in the vicinity, and many of the inhabitants are employed in collieries.

TARDEBIGG (St. BARTHOLOMEW), a parish, in the union of BROMSGROVE, partly in the Alcester division of the hundred of BARLICHWAY, S. division of the county of WARWICK, but chiefly in the Upper division of the hundred of HALFSHIRE, Droitwich and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 3 miles (E. S. E.) from Bromsgrove; containing, with the chapelry of Redditch, and the townships of Tutnall with Cogley, Bentley-Pauncefoot, and Webheath, 4877 inhabitants. This parish, of which the name signifies "the big tower," or "tower on the hill," is on the road from Bromsgrove to Alcester, and comprises 10,832 acres, of a very fertile, but heavy clayey soil, of which 3000 acres are woodland, and the remainder arable and meadow in about equal portions. Hewell, the seat of the Hon. Robert Henry Clive, is situated here in a demesne highly embellished, in which is a lake of 30 acres; and Foxlydiate House, the property and residence of William Hemming, Esq., has neat pleasure-grounds and gardens attached. The Birmingham and Worcester canal and the Birmingham and Gloucester railway run through the parish. Fairs are held on the first Monday in August and the third Monday in September, for cattle.

The LIVING is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of Mr. and Lady Harriet Clive, to whom the impropriation also belongs: the great tithes have been commuted for £1254, and the vicarial for £600, with a glebe of 41½ acres, and a house. The church, rebuilt in 1776, is an elegant structure in the Grecian style, with a very beautiful spire, and contains a monument to Sir Thomas Cookes, Bart., a former proprietor, and founder of Worcester College, Oxford, and another by Chantrey to the late Earl of Plymouth, whose remains are interred in the family vault beneath: this edifice, and the chapel at Redditch, were built of excellent stone raised here. In the churchyard, from which a panoramic prospect is obtained, are schools, prettily situated, with residence for the master and mistress, rebuilt in 1843, at the expense of Lady Harriet Clive, and partly supported by her ladyship. At Tardebigg is the site of Bordesley Abbey, supposed to have been originally founded by Maud, daughter of Henry I., and of which the revenue was valued at the Dissolution at £392. 8. 6.; the site and remains were granted by Henry VIII. in exchange to Lord Windsor, one of the ancestors of the late Earl of Plymouth. The remains of an old chapel dedicated to St. Stephen, were discovered a few years ago, at Bentley-Pauncefoot, which seems to have been anciently a distinct chapelry.

TARLETON (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of ORMSKIRK, hundred of LEYLAND, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 8½ miles (N. by E.) from Ormskirk; containing 1877 inhabitants. This was formerly a chapelry in the parish of Croston, and comprises 5323 acres, of which 535 are common or waste. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the gift of the Rector of Cros-ton: a rent-charge of £3. 4. 9. is paid to the vicar of Betham, in lieu of tithes; another, of £7. 2. 3½., to certain impropiators; and a third, of £95, to the free grammar school, Kirkby-Lonsdale. The church was consecrated in 1719. A free school, erected in 1650, is endowed with £30 per annum.

TARNICAR, with UPPER RAWCLIFFE, a township, in the parish of St. MICHAEL, union of GARSTANG, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, N. division of the county palatine of LANCASTER, 4¼ miles (S. W.) from Garstang; containing 671 inhabitants.

TARPORLEY (St. HELEN), a market-town and parish, in the union of NANTWICH, First division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, S. division of the county of CHESTER; containing, with the townships of Eaton, Rushton, and Utkinton, 2546 inhabitants, of whom 1114 are in Tarporley township, 10½ miles (E. S. E.) from Chester, and 172 (N. W.) from London. This place, which is situated on the road from Chester to London, has a neat appearance, and consists of one long well-paved street, terminated at the southern extremity by the ancient manor-house. At the close of the 13th century, a grant of a market and fair was obtained by Hugh de Thorpley, proprietor of the manor; the market is on Thursday, and fairs are held on May 1st, the first Monday after August 24th, and December 11th. The town was governed by a mayor from 1297 to 1348, but now two constables only are appointed. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £20. 3. 4., and in the joint patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Chester, Lord Alvanley, and the Rev. Sir P. G. Egerton, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £700, and the glebe comprises 12 acres. The church is an ancient structure of red stone, containing some good monuments. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A school, situated in the churchyard, was endowed with £20 per annum by Lady Jane Done, who also left a small bequest for apprenticing children: by a subsequent augmentation, the master's salary is £55.

TARRABY, a township, in the parish of STANWIX, union of CARLISLE, ESKDALE ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND, 1¾ mile (N. N. E.) from Carlisle; containing 135 inhabitants.

TARRANT, CRAWFORD.—See CRAWFORD.

TARRANT-GUNVILLE (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of BLANDFORD, hundred of CRANBORNE, Blandford division of DORSET, 5 miles (N. N. E.) from Blandford-Forum; containing 518 inhabitants. The parish is situated about a mile from the great western road, and comprises by computation 3360*a. 1r. 30p.*, of which 1232 acres are arable, 372 meadow and pasture, 911 down and common, 722 coppice wood, and 70 shrubberies and plantations; the soil is in general light, resting for the most part on chalk. Many of the females are employed in the making of shirt-buttons. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £19. 7. 11.; net income, £448; patrons, the Master and Fellows of University College, Oxford. The church, which was consecrated in 1503, consists of a nave, aisles, and chancel, with an embattled tower crowned by pinnacles. Henry VIII. successively assigned the parish, with the advowson, as part of the dowry to his queens, Catherine Howard and Catharine Parr.

TARRANT-HINTON.—See HINTON.

TARRANT-KEYNSTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of BLANDFORD, hundred of PIMPERNE, Blandford division of DORSET, 3½ miles (S. E. by E.) from Blandford-Forum; containing 334 inhabitants. It comprises 1962 acres, of which 331 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 17. 8½., and in the gift of the Rev. John Austen: the tithes have been commuted for £383, and the glebe comprises 37 acres. The church stands on the western bank of the small river Tarrant, which falls into the Stour on the southern side of the parish.

TARRANT-LAUNCESTON, a parish, in the union of BLANDFORD, hundred of PIMPERNE, Blandford division of DORSET, 5¼ miles (N. E. by E.) from Blandford-Forum; containing 123 inhabitants. The parish comprises, with Tarrant-Monckton, 3818 acres, of which 119 are common or waste land. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Tarrant-Monckton.

TARRANT-MONCKTON.—See MONCKTON.

TARRANT-RAWSTON (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of BLANDFORD, hundred of PIMPERNE, Blandford division of DORSET, 4 miles (E. by N.) from Blandford-Forum; containing 64 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Tarrant, and comprises by admeasurement 696 acres. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 9. 2., and in the gift of Sir J. W. Smith, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £90, and the glebe comprises 33 acres.

TARRANT-RUSHTON (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of BLANDFORD, hundred of CRANBORNE, Wimborne division of DORSET, 3¾ miles (E.) from Blandford-Forum; containing 184 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1221 acres, of which 30 are common or waste; the soil is chalky. The village is situated in a valley, on the bank of the Tarrant rivulet. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 19. 2.; net income, £219; patron, the Rev. George E. Saunders. Here was formerly an hospital or chantry, dedicated to St. Leonard, and granted to the prior of Christchurch-Twynham in the 7th of Edward III.

TARRETBURN, a township, in the parish and union of BELLINGHAM, N. W. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 3 miles (N. W.) from Bellingham; containing 247 inhabitants. It extends between three and six miles north-west of Bellingham, along the east side of a burn, and includes the hamlets of Greenhaugh and Gatehouse; the houses are built chiefly in the deep and narrow glens formed by the lofty hills of this mountainous district.

TARRING-NEVILLE (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of NEWHAVEN, hundred of DANEHILL-HORSTED, rape of PEVENSEY, E. division of SUSSEX, 2½ miles (N.) from Newhaven; containing 81 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the west by the river Ouse, and comprises 896 acres, of which 373 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, united to that of Heighton in 1660, valued in the king's books at £7, and in the patronage of the Rev. Henry Wynch, incumbent: the tithes have been commuted for £223; the glebe contains 32 acres. The church is a neat structure in the early English style, with a remarkably large chancel.

TARRING, WEST (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the hundred of TARRING, rape of BRAMBER, W. division of SUSSEX, 1½ mile (N. W.) from Worthing; containing, with the hamlet of Salvington, 567 inhabitants. This was anciently a place of much importance, and appears to have had a church or monastery to the honour of St. Andrew, in the time of Offa, King of Mercia, some remains of which might be traced in a free chapel that continued here till the reign of Edward III. Henry VI. granted the inhabitants a market, long since discontinued. The living consists of a sinecure rectory valued in the king's books at £22. 13. 4., and a vicarage consolidated with the rectory of Patching, valued at £8. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, to whom belongs the rectory. The rectorial tithes have been commuted for £445, and the vicarial for £110. 15.; the rectorial glebe consists of $1\frac{1}{4}$ acre, and the vicarial of nearly an acre. The church is in the early English style, with later additions, and consists of a nave, side aisles, and chancel, with a lofty tower surmounted by a handsome octagonal spire. The ancient parsonage-house was formerly of much greater extent, and is thought to have been a manor-house or palace occasionally inhabited by Thomas à Becket, who is said to have brought from Italy the fig-tree from which the whole parish has been abundantly stocked. John Selden, the celebrated antiquary and historian, was born at Salvington in 1584, in a house which still remains.

TARRINGTON (St. James), a parish, in the union of LEDBURY, hundred of RADLOW, county of HEREFORD, 7 miles (W. N. W.) from Ledbury; containing 546 inhabitants, and comprising 2144 acres. The parish comprises some elevated ground, and is intersected by the road from Ledbury to Hereford. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 0. $2\frac{1}{2}$.: the great tithes have been commuted for £40, and the vicarial for £430, the former of which is paid for three years to E. T. Foley, Esq., patron of the benefice, and the rector of Stoke-Edith, alternately; the glebe contains $38\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church has been enlarged.

TARSET, WEST, a township, in the parish of THORNEYBURN, union of BELLINGHAM, N. W. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 4 miles (W. N. W.) from Bellingham; containing 173 inhabitants. It is bounded on the east by the rivulet of the same name, which shortly after joins the river Tyne. The tithes have been commuted for a rent-charge of £145, and there is a glebe of above 22 acres.

TARVIN (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of GREAT BOUGHTON, partly in the Lower division of the hundred of BROXTON, but chiefly in the Second division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, S. division of the county of CHESTER; containing 3585 inhabitants, of whom 1107 are in the township, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Chester. During the great civil war, Tarvin was a considerable military post, often taken and retaken by each party, till September 1644, when it fell into the power of the parliament, and so remained to the end of the war. The parish comprises by admeasurement 10,060 acres, and includes the townships of Ashton, Bruen-Stapleford, Burton, Clotton-Hoofield, Dudden, Foulk-Stapleford, Hockenhull-Stapleford, Horton with Peele, Kelsall, and Mouldsworth. The road from Chester to London, through Nantwich, and that from Chester to Manchester, meet in the village; and the canal from Chester to Nantwich, and the railway from Crewe to Chester, run just within the southern boundary of the parish. There are several quarries of white and red sandstone, the material of which is used for building and other purposes. About the middle of the 16th century, Sir John Savage, lord of the manor, procured a charter for a market and a fair, which have been long disused; but a cattle-fair is held in spring, and another in autumn. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £19. 11. $0\frac{1}{2}$.; patron, the Bishop of Lichfield; appropriators, the Dean and Chapter. The tithes have been commuted for £600; there is a vicarage-house, and the glebe contains $1\frac{1}{4}$ acre. The church is in the later English style, with a fine tower considerably enriched with sculpture, though now much mutilated. An additional church was erected in 1833; and there are places of worship for Wesleyans of the Old and New Connexion, and Primitive Methodists. A grammar school was founded in 1600, by John Pickering, who endowed it with £200, which were laid out in land now producing an income of £16, applied to a national school: a diocesan school has also been established. The celebrated calligrapher, John Thomason, who died in 1740, was master of the grammar school.

TASBURGH (St. Mary), a parish, in the union and hundred of DEPWADE, E. division of NORFOLK, 2 miles (N.) from Long Stratton; containing 527 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the London and Norwich road, by way of Bury and Ipswich, and comprises by admeasurement 881 acres, of which 637 are arable, and the remainder meadow and gardens; the surface is in some parts boldly undulated, and very fine views are obtained from the churchyard and its vicinity of an extensive range of beautifully-varied scenery. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8, and in the gift of J. Jermy, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £287, and the glebe contains about 3 acres, with a parsonage-house, a handsome residence, erected in 1840, by the Rev. Henry E. Preston. The church, which was recently damaged by lightning, is a very ancient edifice, with a circular tower, and stands on a lofty eminence, in the area of a square intrenchment containing 24 acres, an advantageous position for the defence of the river Taes, running hence to Caistor. Coins, fibulæ, and other relics of antiquity, have been found; and Gale considers this the Roman station Ad Taum.

TASLEY, a parish, in the union of BRIDGENORTH, hundred of STOTTESDEN, S. division of SALOP, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (N. W. by W.) from Bridgenorth; containing 83 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Bridgenorth to Shrewsbury, by way of Wenlock, and comprises 1027a. 2r. 34p., of which about 684 acres are arable, 333 pasture, and 10 acres woodland; the soil is in general a white loamy earth, and a sulphureous species of coal is obtained at the northern extremity of the parish. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., and in the gift of E. F. Acton, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £210, and the glebe comprises $8\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church was rebuilt in the year 1841, in the early English style of architecture.

TASTON, a hamlet, in the parish of SPELSBURY, union of CHIPPING-NORTON, hundred of CHADLINGTON, county of OXFORD; containing 185 inhabitants.

TATCHBURY, a tything, in the parish of ELING, union of NEW FOREST, hundred of REDBRIDGE, Romsey and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 50 inhabitants.

TATENHILL (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of BURTON-UPON-TRENT, N. division of the hundred of OFFLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Burton; containing, with the chapelries of Barton-under-Needwood and Wichnor, and the township of Dunstall, 2229 inhabitants, of whom 435 are in Tatenhill township. The Grand Trunk canal passes through the parish. The living is a rectory, annexed, with the prebend of Abdaston, to the deanery of Lichfield, and valued in the king's books at £26. 1. 8.: the tithes have been commuted for £1337, and the glebe comprises $123\frac{1}{2}$ acres.

TATHAM (St. JAMES), a parish, in the hundred of LONSDALE, south of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER; containing, with the chapelry of Tatham-Fell, 677 inhabitants, of whom 324 are in Tatham township, 11 miles (N. E. by E.) from Lancaster. The parish is situated on the river Wenning, and comprises by measurement 4000 acres; the soil is chiefly clay, and there are a few mines of coal in operation. A fair for cattle is held on March 12th, in the village of Lowgill. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 5.; net income, £195; patron, the Deviser of the late John Marsden, Esq. The church is a handsome structure, the steeple of which was built in 1722. There is a school endowed with an estate producing £26 a year. A Roman road passes through the parish.

TATHAM-FELL, a chapelry, in the parish of TATHAM, hundred of LONSDALE, south of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $12\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Lancaster. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £125; patron, the Rector of Tatham.

TATHWELL (St. VEDAST), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, Wold division of the hundred of LOUTH-ESKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Louth; containing 365 inhabitants, and comprising about 4350 acres. Tathwell Hall, erected by the Hanby family, from whom the estate passed, in the latter part of the seventeenth century, to the Chaplins, was rebuilt in 1841, by Charles Chaplin, Esq., the present lord of the manor and impropiator. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10, and in the gift of the Bishop of Lincoln, with a net income of £345: the church, for the most part rebuilt, contains monuments to the Hanby and Chaplin families. On Bully hill, in the parish, are six barrows, in a line running from east to west; and on another eminence, about half a mile from the barrows, are the remains of two ancient encampments.

TATSFIELD, or TATTESFIELD, a parish, in the union of GODSTONE, Second division of the hundred of TANDRIDGE, E. division of SURREY, 3 miles (N. W. by W.) from Westerham; containing 172 inhabitants, and comprising 1280a. 12p. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 0. 5.; net income, £150; patron, William L. Gower, Esq. The church, principally in the early English style, was almost entirely rebuilt in 1838, by subscription, and the south porch and tower, which are elegant specimens of that style, at the expense of the Rev. Thomas Streatfeild, the curate.

TATTENHALL (St. ALBAN), a parish, in the union of GREAT BOUGHTON, Lower division of the hundred of BROXTON, S. division of the county of CHESTER; containing, with the townships of Golborn-Bellow and Newton, 1119 inhabitants, of whom 904 are in Tattenhall township, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Tarporley. The township is intersected by the Chester and Crewe railway. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 17. 6.; net income, £277; patron, the Bishop of Chester. The church contains 100 free sittings, the Incorporated Society having granted £30 in aid of the expense. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. Dr. Paploe, rector, who died in 1781, gave money, vested in the purchase of £334 three per cents., for education; and a national school has been established.

TATTENHOE, a parish, in the union of WINSLOW, hundred of COTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.) from Fenny-Stratford; containing 15 inhabitants. The living is a donative curacy, held by institution as a rectory; net income, £50; patron and impropiator, W. S. Lowndes, Esq., whose tithes have been commuted for £474. 11. The church was rebuilt in 1540; but the parish containing only a few inhabitants, it fell into disuse, until the rector of Shenley claimed the tithes, in 1636, when it was consecrated anew.

TATTERFORD (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of WALSINGHAM, hundred of GALLOW, W. division of NORFOLK, 4 miles (W. by S.) from Fakenham; containing 59 inhabitants. It comprises 959a. 2r. 37p., of which 817 acres are arable, 131 pasture, and 11 woodland. The living is a discharged rectory, consolidated with that of Tattersett, and valued in the king's books at £6. 6. 8.: the tithes have been commuted for £204, and the glebe contains nearly 53 acres. The church is a small ancient structure, with a belfry rising from the western gable.

TATTERSETT (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of WALSINGHAM, hundred of GALLOW, W. division of NORFOLK, 6 miles (W.) from Fakenham; containing 160 inhabitants. It comprises 1759a. 3r. 22p., of which 1474 acres are arable, 164 meadow and pasture, 40 woodland, and 81 common. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Tatterford consolidated, valued in the king's books at £11. 1. 8., and in the gift of Sir Charles Chad, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £474. 11. The church is an ancient structure in the early and later English styles, with a square embattled tower; near it are some vestiges of an old church dedicated to All Saints.

TATTERSHALL (HOLY TRINITY), a market-town and parish, in the union of HORNCastle, S. division of the wapentake of GARTREE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 9 miles (S. S. W.) from Horncastle, and 125 (N.) from London; containing, with the township of Thorpe, 907 inhabitants. This place, anciently a Roman military station, as two encampments at Tattershall Park in its immediate neighbourhood indicate, was granted at the Conquest to Eudo, one of William's followers, whose descendants erected a castle about 1440, of which some remains are yet visible south-westward from the town. The fortress stood on a moor, and was surrounded by two fosses, which received the waters of the Bain, but the principal part was demolished during the parliamentary war. The north-west tower, a rectangular brick structure, 100 feet high, flanked by four embattled octangular turrets, was built by Sir Ralph Cromwell, treasurer of the exchequer, in the reign of Henry VI., and still remains; he likewise erected a lofty tower, with a spiral staircase leading to its summit, about four miles northward, as an appendage to the larger structure, but this is now in a very dilapidated state. The town, situated on the river Bain, near its junction with the Witham, is much decayed, and the trade is inconsiderable: a canal from the Witham to Horncastle passes through it. The market, originally granted by King John to Robert Fitz-Eudo, is on Thursday; there is a market for pigs on Friday, and fairs are held on May 15th and September 25th. Tattershall is within the jurisdiction of the Bolingbroke and Horncastle court of requests for debts not exceeding £5. The parish comprises by admeasurement 1600 acres. The living is a donative; net income, £110; patron and impropiator, Earl Fortescue: the tithes of the township of Thorpe were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1796. The church is on the eastern side and in the outer moat of the castle, and was made collegiate in the time of Henry VI., for seven chaplains (one of whom was master), six clerks, and six choristers: at the Dissolution its revenue was estimated at £348. 5. 11. The collegiate buildings have been taken down, and the church alone remains, a beautiful and venerable cruciform structure, consisting of a nave, transept, and choir, of which the last was once much admired for its magnificent painted windows, but since their removal to the chapel of Burleigh, the seat of the Marquess of Exeter, this part of the edifice has been allowed to fall into decay. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A national school, held in the south transept of the church, is partly supported by £20 per annum from the Gibson charity; and an almshouse, partitioned into ten separate apartments, originally established by the licence which raised the church into a college, still remains, and has a small endowment from the same fund. Ammonites and other fossils are found in a stratum of blue clay.

TATTINGSTONE (St. Mary), a parish, in the incorporation and hundred of SAMFORD, E. division of SUFFOLK, 6 miles (S. W. by S.) from Ipswich; containing 628 inhabitants, and consisting of 1637*a*. 39*p*. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the gift of the Rev. J. Garwood Bull: the tithes have been commuted for £402; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 38 acres. The Wesleyans have a place of worship; and a national school has been established. This is the head of a union comprising twenty-eight parishes, and containing a population of 11,818. A spot on the estate called the Place, in the parish, is remarkable for a very thick deposit of marine shells.

TATTON, a township, in the parish of ROSTHERN, union of ALTRINCHAM, hundred of BUCKLOW, N. division of the county of CHESTER, 2 miles (N.) from Nether Knutsford; containing 80 inhabitants.

TATWORTH, a tything, in the parish and union of CHARD, E. division of the hundred of KINGSBURY, W. division of SOMERSET, 1 $\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S.) from Chard; containing 383 inhabitants.

TAUNTON, a borough and market-town, and the head of a union, in the hundred of TAUNTON and TAUNTON-DEAN, W. division of SOMERSET, 11 miles (S. by W.) from Bridgwater, and 144 (W. by S.) from London; containing 12,066 inhabitants. This place, which was called by the Saxons Tantun, and subsequently Tawnton and Thoneton, from its situation on the river Thone or Tone, is of great antiquity; and the discovery of several urns containing Roman coins, in the neighbourhood, has led to the conjecture that it existed in the time of that people. But the earliest authentic accounts refer to the period of the heptarchy, when a castle was built here for a royal residence, by Ina, King of the West Saxons, about the year 700, in which he held his first great council. This castle was afterwards demolished by his queen Ethelburga, after expelling Eadbricht, King of the South Saxons, who had seized it. The town and manor are supposed to have been granted to the church of Winchester in the following reign; and another castle is said to have been built, on the site of the first, by the bishops of Winchester, in the time of William I., where they principally resided for some years; at which period Taunton had a mint, some of the coins bearing the Conqueror's effigy being still in existence. In the reign of Henry VII., in 1497, Perkin Warbeck seized the town and castle, which, however, he quickly abandoned on the approach of the king's troops. In 1645, it again participated in civil war, and became celebrated for the long siege it sustained, and the defence it made under Colonel (afterwards the renowned Admiral) Blake, who held it for the parliament against 10,000 royalist troops under Lord Goring, until relieved by Fairfax; on which memorable occasion a public thanksgiving was appointed by the commons, who voted £500 to the colonel, and £1000 to the men under his command; but the inhabitants incurred the displeasure of the king, who, on his restoration, suspended their charter, and ordered the walls to be razed to the ground. James, Duke of Monmouth, was proclaimed king on the Cornhill of Taunton, June 21st, 1685; and many of his followers, including some inhabitants of this place, were, after his defeat at Sedgemoor, inhumanly put to death, on the same spot, by the brutal Kirke, without form of trial, besides those who were condemned by the merciless Judge Jeffreys, at the "bloody assize" which he held here in the following September.

The town is situated in a central part of the singularly beautiful and luxuriant vale of Taunton-Dean, and is upwards of a mile in length: the principal streets, which terminate in the market-place, are spacious, well paved, and lighted with gas by a company established in 1821; and the houses, mostly built of brick, are generally commodious and handsome, and supplied with excellent water. Indeed, the respectability of the town, combined with the beauty of the surrounding country, has rendered it very attractive as a place of residence; and many recent improvements have been effected, amongst which are the erection of a neat crescent and terrace, and the removal of some old houses at East Gate, which has rendered the entrance from London more spacious. In 1833, an act was obtained for better regulating the market, cleansing the streets, and preventing nuisances; and in 1840 another was passed for the improvement of the place, and for amending the powers and provisions of the several acts for holding markets. The Parade, in the centre of the town, is a fine open triangular space, inclosed with iron posts and chains; and on the east side of it is a wide street, built by the late Sir Benjamin Hammet, which forms a handsome approach to the beautiful church of St. Mary. A substantial stone bridge of two arches crosses the Tone, and connects the town with the village of North-town, or Nurton; and several detached villas, commanding beautiful views, have been erected in the suburbs of Wilton, Staplegrove, West Monckton, and adjoining parishes. The Taunton and Somerset Institution, established in 1823, has a small but valuable library, and a museum, with a noble and spacious public reading and news room. The theatre, in Silver-street, is usually open two months in the year; and balls and concerts occasionally take place.

Taunton, formerly noted for its woollen manufacture, was one of the first towns into which that branch of TRADE was introduced, but it has long since given way to the silk trade, which was begun here in 1778; the chief articles manufactured are crapes, persians, sarsnets, and mixed goods, and the business furnishes employment to a great number of persons, principally females. Two patent-lace factories have also been established. The river Tone is navigable, but its course to Bridgwater being circuitous, and the navigation frequently interrupted, the Taunton and Bridgwater canal has been constructed, which has given increased activity to trade, considerable quantities of Welsh coal being brought to the town, and, in return, the produce of the Vale of Taunton being exported to Bristol and other parts of England. The Grand Western canal, forming a communication with the river Exe, terminates here; and the Bristol and Exeter railway passes by the town. The markets are on Wednesday and Saturday, of which the latter is the principal, and are well supplied with fish from both Channels, with every other kind of provisions, and with fruit in abundance. The old market-house, at the south end of the Parade, a lofty brick building supported on each side by an arcade, contains the guildhall, and a handsome assembly-room, in which is a full-length portrait of George III. in his robes, presented by the late Sir B. Hammet. On the west side of the Parade is a building of freestone, erected in 1821, in the lower part and rear of which, and on the northern side, are the markets for meat, fish, pork, poultry, and dairy produce; the upper being used as the library and reading-room of the institution before-mentioned. It is of the Ionic order, the entablature supported by four columns, and forms a great ornament to this part of the town. Upon the last Saturday in every month is what is called the great market, including the sale of live stock; and there is a fair on June 17th, and in the suburb Northtown one on July 7th, for horses and cattle.

The town was for several centuries under the jurisdiction of portreeves and bailiffs, chosen at the courts of the bishops of Winchester, as lords of the manor, which was formerly very extensive and valuable; the rental at the time of the Conquest appearing, from a document found amongst the court rolls, to have amounted to nearly £700 per annum. It was, however, divided by William, and portions of it distributed among his favourites. The manor continued in the possession of the see until the year 1822, when it was sold by Bishop Tomline to Thomas Southwood, Esq., and it is now the property of Robert Mattock, Esq., at whose annual courts, held in the castle, two portreeves, who collect the lord's rents, two bailiffs, two constables, and six tythingmen, are chosen. A charter was granted in 1627, by Charles I., which existed until the year 1792, when, in consequence of the corporation having suffered a majority of the members to die without filling up vacancies, it became forfeited; and the town is now under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, who hold a petty-session on Wednesdays and Saturdays at the guildhall. The bailiffs usually convene and preside at public meetings, and the constables have the distribution of most of the public charities. The borough is by prescription, and first sent members to parliament in the reign of Edward I., in 1295; the boundaries comprise an area of 742 acres, and the bailiffs are returning officers. The Lent assizes for the county are held in the castle, as are also the Michaelmas general quarter-sessions. A court for the recovery of debts under 40s. is holden for the manor and hundred, and a similar court for the borough, at the guildhall, alternately, every week. The castle, supposed to be a part of a stately edifice erected by William Giffard, Bishop of Winchester, in the reign of Henry I., was thoroughly repaired by Bishop Langton, towards the end of the 15th century; and in addition to other improvements, the present assize hall was built, by Bishop Horne, in 1577, since which period, various sums have been expended upon it. The building consists of a south front, with a gateway in the centre, over which are two escutcheons, one bearing the arms of Henry VII., with the motto Vive le roi Henri; the other the inscription Laus tibi Xte., and T. Langto Winto, 1495, both in Saxon characters: at the east end is a circular tower. The inner court-yard is an irregular quadrangle, the east side being the shorter, and on the north side are the county courts, grand jury-room, &c.; the access to it is through an open court, called Castle Green, formerly inclosed with two gates, but one only remains, over which is what was the porter's lodge, now occupied as a dwelling-house. The moat was filled up, and the drawbridge removed, in 1785. Closely adjoining the town is the house of correction, at Wilton, which was erected in 1754, and enlarged in 1815; and having again been improved, it was recently determined to make it the county gaol instead of that at Ilchester.

Taunton comprises the parishes of St. James and St. Mary Magdalene, the former containing 4047, and the latter 8019, inhabitants; but many houses extend into the adjoining parishes of Wilton and Bishop's-Hull. The living of St. James's is a perpetual curacy; net income, £254; patron, the Rev. Dr. Cottle; impropiator, Sir T. B. Lethbridge, Bart., whose tithes have been commuted for £420. The church, which was formerly the conventual church of the priory, has lately been considerably enlarged and improved, at a cost of more than £2000, through the exertions of Dr. Cottle, the late incumbent, and now vicar of St. Mary's, and is an elegant and commodious structure, containing 1400 sittings, upwards of 600 of which are free. The living of St. Mary Magdalene's is a vicarage, also in the gift of Dr. Cottle: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £380. There is an afternoon lecture on Thursday, endowed by Thomas Poyntington, who bequeathed property in 1732, now producing about £50 per annum, which sum is paid to the vicar agreeably with the will of the donor. The church, standing near the centre of the town, was originally a chapel to St. James, but was made parochial in 1308, under Walter Huselshaw, Bishop of Bath and Wells, and is a spacious and magnificent edifice in the decorated and later English styles, consisting of a chancel, nave, and four aisles. There is a quadrangular tower at the west end, an elegant structure in four compartments, containing thirteen windows, which, by the variety of their ornaments, add much to its lightness and beauty; it is 121 feet in height, exclusively of its pinnacles of 32 feet, which are richly adorned with carved work, and the top is crowned with most exquisitely delicate battlements. Another church has been erected in the early English style, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, and contains 1100 sittings; the stone is a beautiful white lias, and the structure is surmounted with a neat tower. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Unitarians, and Wesleyans; and the Roman Catholics have a handsome chapel, with a portico supported by two Ionic pillars, and also a convent of Franciscan nuns, who emigrated from Brussels during the French Revolution in the last century, and first settled at Winchester, until they became possessed of their present residence, a noble building at the east end of the town, near the entrance from London, originally intended for a public hospital.

The free grammar school was established in 1522, by Richard Fox, Bishop of Winchester, and endowed in 1554, by William Walbee, clerk, with property, comprising about 96 acres of land in eight different portions, now producing about £100 per annum. The premises include a large and ancient schoolroom, situated within the castle-gate; and under the same roof is a dwelling-house for the master, who keeps the building in repair and pays the taxes, and who is allowed to take private pupils. Some almshouses at East Gate, for ten women and seven men, were founded in 1635, by Robert Gray, Esq., a native of the town, and endowed by him with £2000, since augmented by benefactions. Other almshouses, on the north side of Hammet-street, were founded and endowed by Richard Huish, Esq., for thirteen men, one of whom is president, and reads prayers daily in a chapel attached to the building; the property produces about £350 per annum. Of the remaining charities, the principal is that arising from the Town Lands, consisting of property to which no claimant appeared after a plague had raged in Taunton, and which, with land and houses purchased under bequests of John Meredith and Margery Acland, produces about £360 per annum. The income from the Town Lands is distributed among the poor of the parish of St. Mary Magdalene; that from Meredith's bequest, in clothing; and that from Acland's, to widows. The Taunton and Somerset hospital was founded in 1809, in commemoration of George III. entering upon the fiftieth year of his reign, and was opened on the 25th of March, 1812. An eye infirmary, established in 1816, is supported by voluntary contributions; and there is a society for the relief of lying-in women. The poor law union comprises 38 parishes or places, all in the county of Somerset, except one, which is in Devon, the whole containing a population of 33,422. Taunton is the birthplace of Samuel Daniel, the poet, born in 1562; and of the Rev. Henry Grove, in 1683, an eminent dissenting minister, who, in addition to other works, contributed some excellent papers to the Spectator. Amongst the bishops of Winchester who made it their occasional residence, were Cardinals Beaufort and Wolsey.

TAVERHAM (St. EDMUND), a parish, in the union of St. FAITH, hundred of TAVERHAM, E. division of NORFOLK, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Norwich; containing 211 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the road from Norwich to Fakenham, comprises 2021a. 2r. 17p.; the scenery is exceedingly picturesque, and enlivened by the passage of the river Wensum. N. Micklethwaite, Esq., who is lord of the manor, and proprietor of almost the whole of the parish, resides in a beautiful mansion surrounded by 500 acres of fine woodland. The living is a rectory, formerly in mediocres, now united, each valued in the king's books at £4. 2. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £300; patrons, alternately, the Bishop of Norwich and Mr. Micklethwaite: the glebe contains 42 acres, and there is a small parsonage-house. The church is chiefly in the decorated style. In a plantation called Friars' Wood, are slight remains of a friary.

TAVISTOCK (St. EUSTACHIUS), a borough, market-town, and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of TAVISTOCK, Tavistock and S. divisions of the county of DEVON, 33 miles (W. by S.) from Exeter, and 204 (W. S. W.) from London; containing 6272 inhabitants. This place, which takes its name from its situation on the river Tavy, was anciently the residence of Orgar, Earl of Devonshire, whose daughter Elfrida, surreptitiously obtained in marriage by Athelwold, favourite of King Edgar (for whom he had been sent to negotiate), became, on the subsequent discovery of the treachery, the wife of that monarch. The town appears to have derived its origin from the erection of an abbey of Black monks, begun in 961, by Orgar, who, according to tradition, had been admonished in a dream to found a monastery here, which was completed in 981, by his son Ordulf, by whom it was endowed with ample possessions, and dedicated to St. Mary the Virgin and St. Rumon. After having been destroyed by the Danes, the monastery was restored by the contributions of the neighbouring families, of whom the De Eggecombes were munificent benefactors, and was rebuilt with greater magnificence. Henry I. granted to the abbots the entire jurisdiction of the hundred of Tavistock, and a weekly market and annual fairs, and invested them with other privileges; and in 1513 Henry VIII. conferred the right of a seat among the peers upon Abbot Banham, who also procured from Pope Leo X. an exemption from all episcopal and metropolitan jurisdiction. Soon after the introduction of printing into England, a press was established in the monastery, from which issued a code of the Stannary laws, and a translation of Boëthius by Walton, printed by Dan Thomas Rychard, one of the monks, of which perfect copies are still preserved in the library of Exeter College, Oxford. The monastery flourished till the year 1539, when it was surrendered to the king by the last abbot, John Peryn, on whom was settled a pension of £100 per annum for life; the revenue was £902. 5. 7.; and the site, with the borough and town, was assigned to Lord John Russell, ancestor of the Duke of Bedford. A school for the study of Saxon literature was established here at a very early period, under the patronage of the abbots, and continued till the time of the Reformation. While the plague raged at Exeter, in 1591, the summer assizes were held in this town, and thirteen criminals were executed on the Abbey green; and during its ravages in London, a market and a fair were held above Merivale bridge, about three miles distant from the town, the memorial of which is still preserved by three long rows of stones, which indicate the spot. After the defeat of the parliamentarians on Bradock Down, in 1643, the royalists were quartered here; and Charles I. visited the town on his route to Cornwall, subsequently to his unsuccessful attempt on Plymouth.

The town is pleasantly situated in a valley, through which the river Tavy rushes with tumultuous impetuosity over an uneven and rocky bed, and which combines some of the most beautiful and picturesque scenery in this justly admired county; it is irregularly built, partly in the vale and partly on the acclivities by which it is inclosed, and was first lighted with gas in the year 1832. The approaches are easy and commodious, that from Plymouth being remarkably fine, and those from the east of Cornwall, and from the roads over Dartmoor, having undergone considerable improvement, under the auspices of the late Duke of Bedford, in 1839. On the right of the entrance into the town from the Plymouth road, and opposite to the church, are various embattled and turreted buildings originally belonging to the abbey; a part has been converted into the Bedford hotel, which has an extensive façade in the ancient English style. There is a public library in a building over the grand archway of the old abbey, and adjoining it is an edifice in which the members of a literary and scientific institution deliver lectures once a fortnight during the winter months: the library was fitted up, and the building for the institution was erected, by the late Duke of Bedford, in lieu of a structure in the Grecian style, which, not harmonizing with the venerable remains of the abbey, his grace was anxious to remove. Over the Tavy are two ancient bridges within the town, and a third of modern construction about a quarter of a mile on the Plymouth road, near which is a bridge over the Tavistock canal. Races are held on Whitchurch Down.

The manufacture of serge and coarse woollen-cloths, which once formed the principal employment of the inhabitants, has been long on the decline; and the mining trade, once carried on to a large extent, has also materially diminished. An extensive iron-foundry is conducted in the town; and at a place called Crowndale, at the distance of a mile from it, is a tin-smelting establishment. The neighbourhood abounds with mineral productions, and in the section of a mining field between the rivers Tavy and Tamar, considerable quantities of porphyritic rock, in alternate layers, called Elvan, are found. From the mines near the town grey and ruby copper are produced; and in the mine called Wheal Friendship, native rich yellow, red, and crystallized pyrites are to be obtained in profusion. Lead abounds in the district, and there are also silver, tin, manganese, iron, and the loadstone. The Tavistock canal, constructed to form a junction with the Tamar at Morwell Ham quay, with which it is connected by an inclined plane 240 feet high, flows under a tunnel at Morwell Down one mile and three quarters in length, and was opened in June, 1817, at an expense of £68,000; the boats employed are chiefly of iron, and the principal articles conveyed are ore, coal, and lime. The market, which is noted for its ample supply of corn, is on Friday; the fairs were formerly on Jan. 17th, May 6th, Sept. 9th, Oct. 10th, and Dec. 14th, but are now held on the second Wednesday in each of those months; and there are great cattle-markets on the second Wednesday in March, July, August, and November.

Seal of the Court of the Lordship.

ber about 30, was in 1832 extended to the £10 householders of the parish (except the detached manor of Cudliptown), which has been constituted the new elective borough, comprising an area of 11,112 acres: the portreeve is returning officer. Among the most distinguished of its representatives have been John Pym, the great opposer of Charles I., and William, Lord Russell, who was beheaded in the reign of Charles II. An act was passed in 1840, for the more easy and speedy recovery of small debts.

The LIVING is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 17. 6.; net income, £298; patron and impropiator, the Duke of Bedford. The church is a neat, spacious, and ancient structure, with a lofty tower supported on arches, affording a thoroughfare underneath it for carriages, and contains some good monuments, especially those to Sir John Fitz and Sir John Glanville, the latter of whom was judge of the common pleas, and died in 1600. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, Wesleyans, and Unitarians. The grammar school is of very ancient though uncertain foundation, and during the existence of the monastery, was, under the auspices of the abbots, for many years pre-eminently distinguished: in 1552, John, Earl of Bedford, granted, for 200 years, the amount of dues claimed by him within the borough for its support; and, in 1649, Sir John Glanville, Knt., speaker of the house of commons, gave an estate at South Brentor, producing £25 per annum, for the better maintenance of a scholar at either of the universities. Since the expiration of the earl's gift, his successors have allowed the master a residence, school-house, and garden rent-free, and a stipend of £20: a handsome building was erected by the late duke, in 1838; and the school, which had fallen almost into disuse, has again begun to flourish. In 1674, Nicholas Watts bequeathed land and houses, the rent of which is £65. 18., for the benefit of poor persons, and a part to be appropriated to the assistance of a scholar of Tavistock at the university. The amounts of several benefactions called the Fordstreet charity, producing £120 per annum, were by act of parliament vested in the Duke of Bedford, for various purposes, in fulfilment of which an almshouse has been erected for fifteen persons, who receive each £3 per annum in quarterly payments; the balance is distributed chiefly among the indigent. The poor law union of Tavistock comprises 24 parishes or places, containing a population of 23,995. The principal remains of the ancient monastery are the gateway, the refectory (now used as a place of worship for Unitarians), traces of the boundary walls, and an entire gateway near the canal bridge, probably forming a private entrance to the gardens and orchard of the abbey; they are principally in the later English style, and being in many parts mantled with ivy, have an interesting and picturesque appearance. Within the parish are the remains of Old Morwell House, the hunting-seat of the abbots; and in the woods attached to the mansion is a precipitous cliff, from the summit of which is a fine view of the river Tamar winding through a valley of great beauty. Less than a mile from the town, in the parish of Whitchurch, is Holwell House, the ancient seat of the Glanville family, of which the last male representative of the elder branch, by whose father the property was alienated, died in 1830: the general appearance of the mansion, which is in good preservation, bears testimony to its original magnificence. Among the eminent natives of the place have been, Sir Francis Drake; Judge Glanville; his son, Sir John Glanville; and William Browne, author of Britannia's Pastorals, the Shepherd's Pipe, and other works. The town gives the inferior title of Marquess to the Duke of Bedford.

TAVY (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of TAVISTOCK, hundred of LIFTON, Tavistock and S. divisions of DEVON, 4 miles (N. E. by N.) from Tavistock; containing 1552 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Plymouth to Barnstaple, through Tavistock and Oakhampton, and comprises about 1143 acres, exclusively of the glebe and the waste land, including the whole of Blackdown. A lead and a copper mine are in operation, employing together about 627 hands. The river Tavy runs through the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 5. 7½., and in the gift of John Buller, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £207. 10., and there is a parsonage-house, with about 30 acres of glebe land, independently of a field of 8 acres, which has been rendered waste by mining operations. The church is partly in the later English style, and contains the staircase to an ancient rood-loft. There are two places of worship for Wesleyans. Tungstate of lime has been found among other geological curiosities.

TAVY (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of TAVISTOCK, partly in the hundred of LIFTON, but chiefly in that of ROBOROUGH, Tavistock and S. divisions of DEVON, 3½ miles (N. E.) from Tavistock; containing, with the hamlet of Willsworthy, 587 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £17. 1. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Exeter: the tithes have been commuted for £235, and the glebe contains 64 acres. The church contains a monument to the Rev. Mr. Pocock, a former rector, and, with the burial-ground, forms a strikingly picturesque feature in the scenery of the place. At Willsworthy was formerly a chantry chapel, which has been converted into a barn.

TAWNEY-STAPLEFORD.—See STAPLEFORD.

TAWSTOCK (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of BARNSTAPLE, hundred of FREMINGTON, Braunton and N. divisions of DEVON, 2 miles (S.) from Barnstaple; containing 1429 inhabitants. It comprises 5000 acres, including 400 common or waste land. The manor-house, which was garrisoned by Sir T. Fairfax, in Feb. 1646, was almost consumed by fire in 1787, but was rebuilt by the late Sir B. Wrey, Bart., except the ancient gateway, which still remains, bearing date 1574. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £69. 12. 1., and in the patronage of Sir B. Wrey, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £930, and there are 93 acres of glebe. The Independents and Roman Catholics have places of worship.

TAWSTOCK, SUFFOLK.—See TOSTOCK.

TAWTON, BISHOP'S (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of BARNSTAPLE, hundred of SOUTH MOLTON, Braunton and N. divisions of DEVON, 2 miles (S. by E.) from Barnstaple; containing 1827 inhabitants. On the division of the West Saxon sec of Sherborne, this was made the seat of the Devonshire diocese by Werstan, its first bishop, soon after his consecration in 905. He was succeeded by Putta, and afterwards by Eadulphus, who was installed at Crediton, to which place he removed the see, and who died in 931. Some remains of the episcopal palace are still discernible, and in the churchyard are the ruins of the deanery. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £21; net income, £440; patron and appropriator, the Dean of Exeter. The church is a neat ancient structure, with a handsome stone spire, and contains some monuments to the Chichester family.—See NEWPORT.

TAWTON, NORTH (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of OAKHAMPTON, hundred of NORTH TAWTON, South Molton and N. divisions of DEVON, 12 miles (W. by N.) from Crediton; containing 1728 inhabitants. This place was anciently called Cheping-Tawton, "a market-town on the Taw," which river runs through the parish. Its market charter was confirmed in the year 1270, but the market was discontinued about 1720; at the former period it was a borough-town, and it is still governed by a portreeve, elected annually at the manorial court. The parish comprises 3551 acres of fertile land, and 1088 of common or waste; the soil is a red gravelly earth; the surface is undulated, and ornamented by several well-watered meadows. Ashbridge, one of the most ancient demesnes in the county, comprises nearly 100 acres of woodland, containing a vast quantity of fine oak-trees. A quarry of good freestone is worked: here was once an extensive woollen manufacture, and there is still a mill employing 200 persons in spinning yarn, woven at Crediton and other places. Cattle-fairs are held on the third Tuesday in April, October 3rd, and December 18th. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £32. 4. 7.; net income, £751; patron and incumbent, the Rev. George Hole: there is a parsonage, with a glebe of 98 acres of good land. The Independents have a meeting-house. Chapels formerly existed at Crook-Burnell, Nichols-Nymet, and Bath-Barton, in the parish; of which places, the last is the birthplace of Henry de Bathe, who was in 1238 made one of the justices of the common pleas, and in 1240 one of the justices itinerant for many of the counties. Henry Tozer, expelled from Exeter College for his loyalty, in 1648, and who was author of Directions for a Devotional Life, which passed through ten editions, was also a native of the parish. In the neighbourhood, a small brook sometimes issues out of a large pit ten feet deep, called Bathe Pool, and continues running for several days together.

TAWTON, SOUTH (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of OAKHAMPTON, hundred of WONFORD, Crockernwell and S. divisions of DEVON, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Oakhampton; containing 1871 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10; net income, £150; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Canons of Windsor. There is a national school.

TAXALL (St. James), a parish, in the union and hundred of MACCLESFIELD, N. division of the county of CHESTER; containing, with the township of Whaley cum Yeardsley, 853 inhabitants, of whom 190 are in Taxall township, 4 miles (W.) from Chapel-en-le-Frith. The parish comprises 1667*a. Sr.* 10*p.* (Cheshire measure), of which about 1000 acres are plantations. There are several stone-quarries and coal-mines, some of which are not in operation, but the coal in Whaley is regularly worked, as well as the stone; the quarries produce slate and good building and flag stone. The village occupies a pleasing situation on the banks of the river Goyt, which separates it from Derbyshire, and near which, in a parallel direction, runs the Buxton and Manchester road; the Peak-Forest canal passes through the township of Whaley to Manchester, and is met at Whaley by a railroad to Cromford, near Derby. There are a small bleaching-mill in Taxall, and a wire-mill in Whaley, at each of which about 50 persons are employed. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 2. 6.; net income, £250; patron and incumbent, the Rev. J. Swain: there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains about 20 acres (Cheshire measure). The church was, with the exception of the tower, taken down and rebuilt on a larger scale, in 1825: against the north wall is a monument to Michael Heathcote, Esq., gentleman of the pantry to George II., and in the chancel are several memorials to the Shallcross family, who were patrons of the living in the early part of the last century, and resided at Shallcross Hall, in Derbyshire, which is on the east bank of the river, immediately opposite the church. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

TAYNTON (St. Lawrence), a parish, in the union of NEWENT, hundred of BOTLOE, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Newent; containing 634 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 6. 8.; net income, £321; patrons, the Dean and Chapter of Gloucester. The church was rebuilt during the usurpation of Cromwell, by an ordinance passed in January 1647. William Guilding bequeathed the interest of £100 for apprenticing children.

TAYNTON (St. John), a parish, in the union of WITNEY, hundred of CHADLINGTON, county of OXFORD, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. W.) from Burford; containing 381 inhabitants. It comprises about 2150 acres, a small portion of which stands detached in the forest of Wychwood; the soil is partly light, and partly a strong clay, and the river Windrush runs through the parish. There are considerable quarries of excellent freestone. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 9. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £56; patron and impropriator, Lord Dynevor: the tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1821. The church is an elegant edifice in the later English style, and contains an ancient font highly enriched.

TEALBY (All Saints), a parish, in the union of CAISTOR, S. division of the wapentake of WALSHEROFT; parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 4 miles (E. N. E.) from Market-Rasen; containing 996 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Market-Rasen to Binbrook, and comprises 2946 acres, of which about half are arable, and the remainder nearly equally divided between pasture and wood; the scenery is singularly beautiful, and the surface furnishes a striking contrast, both in appearance and in its geological character, to other parts of the county. The lands were inclosed in 1792, when the moor allotments contained 990 acres, and the wold, and old inclosures, 1956; the soil on the moors is light and sandy, and in other places, a rich sandy loam and stiff clay; the surface abounds in rocky eminences of sandstone, and there are numerous quarries of grey stone and chalk. Here, also, is situated the noble mansion, just completed, of the Rt. Hon. C. Tennyson D'Eyncourt, M.P., who is lord of the manor. The river Rase, which rises in the hills, runs through the village. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 16. 8.; net income, £120; patron, Mr. D'Eyncourt: the tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1792; the glebe consists of about 12 acres. The church contains portions of the early and decorated English styles, but the latter marks the general character of the structure. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

TEAN, a hamlet, in the parish of CHECKLEY, union of CHEADLE, S. division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, N. division of the county of STAFFORD, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Uttoxeter. A manufactory for tape, supposed to be the most extensive in Europe, was established at Upper Tean, in 1748, at which, and in adjoining bleaching-grounds, several hundred persons find employment. In the neighbourhood are several mansions and elegant villas. Fairs are held on Easter-Tuesday and November 10th. The Incorporated Society, in 1841, granted £200 towards building a church to contain 559 sittings; and there are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans.

TEATH, ST., a parish, in the union of CAMELFORD, hundred of TRIGG, E. division of CORNWALL, 3 miles (S. W. by W.) from Camelford; containing 1719 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the west by the Bristol Channel, and intersected by the great road running to the north; it comprises by computation 4842 acres, whereof 220 are common or waste, and there are two very large slate-quarries, of which that of Delabole is of great extent and value. Here is also a lead-mine, which was formerly much more worked than it is at present, and in the ore of which a great proportion of silver has been found. A fair is held on the first Tuesday in July. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12; patron, the Bishop of Exeter; impropriator, E. P. Lyon, Esq.: the great tithes have been commuted for £396, and the vicarial for £240; there is a vicarage-house, and the glebe contains 30 acres, of indifferent quality. The church was once collegiate for two prebendaries, or portionists. There are places of worship for Bryanites and Wesleyans. Remains of ancient British encampments are to be seen.

TEBAY, a township, in the parish of ORTON, EAST ward and union, county of WESTMORLAND, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Orton; containing 368 inhabitants. The township comprises 6832 acres, of which 4100 are common or waste; it is an extensive and mountainous, though generally fertile district, divided into High End and Low End, and contains an ancient village, situated at the junction of the Birbeck and Lune rivulets, on the road from Kendal to Kirkby-Stephen. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £91. 12. 3. A free grammar school was endowed in 1672, by Robert Adamson, with land producing about £40 per annum. Two large mounds in the vicinity, called Castle How, which command the pass by the river Lune, are Roman fortifications.

TEBWORTH, a hamlet, in the parish of CHALGRAVE, union of WOBURN, hundred of MANSHEAD, county of BEDFORD; containing 403 inhabitants.

TEDBURN (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of ST. THOMAS, hundred of WEST-WONFORD, Crockernwell and S. divisions of DEVON, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Crediton; containing 867 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Exeter to Oakhampton, and comprises 3612 acres, of which 351 are common or waste. A cattle-fair is held on the Monday before Michaelmas-day. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 6. 3., and in the gift of the Rev. Charles Burnc: the tithes have been commuted for £400, and the glebe comprises $38\frac{1}{2}$ acres. At Hackworthy, in the parish, was formerly a chapel of ease.

TEDDINGTON (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of KINGSTON, hundred of SPELTHORNE, county of MIDDLESEX, 11 miles (S. W. by W.) from London; containing 1199 inhabitants, and comprising 1052 acres by admeasurement. The village stands on the western bank of the Thames, on the road from London, through Isleworth, to Hampton Court. Bushy Park, the usual country residence of William IV. and his queen, Adelaide, before their accession to the throne, is partly in the parish. Here are the wax bleaching-grounds and candle manufactory of Messrs. Barclay, the largest and most complete establishment of the kind in the kingdom, where, during the summer months, nearly four acres of ground are covered with wax, of which about 200,000lb. are annually bleached, and in winter formed into candles by hand; and connected with this factory is a very extensive one of spermaceti, chiefly carried on in Leicester-square. The living is a donative curacy; net income, £91; patron and impropiator, the Earl of Bradford: the tithes were commuted for land in 1799. The church, which has been repewed, is principally in the later English style, and contains the remains of Sir Orlando Bridgeman, who died in 1674, and of Dr. Stephen Hall, clerk of the closet to the Princess of Wales, mother of George III., and 51 years minister of the parish, to which he was a most liberal benefactor. Her Majesty the Queen Dowager lately presented £100 towards the erection of a parsonage-house. Twelve girls are instructed for £20 a year, the rent of certain cottages and lands purchased with £40 left by Dorothy Bridgeman, in 1694, and a smaller sum from the parish funds. There is also a national school.

TEDDINGTON, a chapelry, in the parish of OVERBURY, union of TEWKESBURY, Middle division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, Pershore and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 5 miles (E. by N.) from Tewkesbury; containing 115 inhabitants, and comprising 738 acres. The chapel is dedicated to St. Nicholas.

TEDSTONE-DELAMERE (St. James), a parish, in the union of BROMYARD, hundred of BROXASH, county of HEREFORD, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Bromyard; containing 207 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1669 acres, the surface of which is hilly, and the soil clay. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4.; net income, £238; patrons, the Principal and Fellows of Brasenose College, Oxford. There is a petrifying spring which has long excited great curiosity.

TEDSTONE-WAFER, a parish, in the union of BROMYARD, hundred of BROXASH, county of HEREFORD, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Bromyard; containing 92 inhabitants. It comprises 800 acres: limestone abounds in the neighbourhood. The living is a rectory, united to that of Edvin-Loach, and valued in the king's books at £1. 10.: the tithes have been commuted for £80, and the glebe comprises 2 acres.

TEETON, a hamlet, in the parish of RAVENSTHORPE, union of BRIKWORTH, hundred of NEWBOTTLE-GROVE, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Northampton; containing 95 inhabitants, and consisting of 680 acres.

TEFFONT-EVIAS, a parish, in the union of TISBURY, hundred of DUNWORTH, Hindon and S. divisions of WILTS, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Wilton; containing 149 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 700 acres, of which the soil in some parts is a strong clay, and in others a rich loam suited to every kind of grain; the surface is hilly, and the scenery derives an imposing effect from the river Nadder, and another stream, beautifully clear, which rises in the chalk hills near the adjoining village of Teffont Magna, and forms a lake, covering two acres, in the grounds of the lord of the manor. There is a fine freestone quarry, besides very extensive excavations, from which the stone used in building Salisbury cathedral was taken. The manor-house, a handsome structure in the later English style, greatly enlarged and improved in the present century, was the birthplace of Henry, Earl of Marlborough, lord high treasurer and chancellor of England in the time of James II. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8; net income, £148; patron, J. T. Mayne, Esq.: there is a parsonage-house, with a glebe containing about 28 acres. The church has been rebuilt.

TEFFONT MAGNA, a parish, in the union of TISBURY, forming a distinct portion of the hundred of WARMINSTER, locally in that of DUNWORTH, Hindon and S. divisions of WILTS, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Hindon; containing 264 inhabitants. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Dinton.

TEIGH (Holy Trinity), a parish, in the union of OAKHAM, hundred of ALSTOE, county of RUTLAND, 5 miles (N.) from Oakham; containing 235 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 1400 acres, and produces a material resembling iron-stone, quarried for the roads: the Melton and Oakham canal passes through it. There is a strong petrifying spring, and fossil fish have been found in the blue rock. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 2. 11.; net income, £349; patron, the Earl of Harborough: there is a parsonage-house, with a glebe containing about 60 acres. The church is a small neat edifice.

TEIGNGRACE (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of NEWTON-ABBOT, hundred of TEIGNBRIDGE, Teignbridge and S. divisions of DEVON, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Newton-Bushell; containing 180 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the great western road from Exeter to Plymouth, and on the banks of the river Teign. The Stover canal and railway, constructed here by the Templer family, facilitate the exportation of potters'-clay found in the neighbourhood, and of granite from extensive quarries near High Tor, which belong to the Duke of Somerset. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 9. 4½, and in the gift of the Duke: the tithes have been commuted for £170, and the glebe comprises 40 acres. The church is a handsome edifice in the English style, surmounted by a spire, and furnished with an excellent organ; it was rebuilt in 1787, by J. and G. Templer, Esqrs., and the Rev. John Templer, brothers, and among other monuments of that family, it contains one to the memory of Charles, who perished in the wreck of the Halsewell East Indiaman, on the Dorsetshire coast, in 1786. About £20 per annum, derived from land, are applied partly to the support of persons tenating 5 almshouses lately built, and partly to the support of a parochial school.

TEIGNHOLT, a hamlet, in the parish of DREWS-TEIGNTON, union of OAKHAMPTON, hundred of WOLFORD, Crockernwell and S. divisions of DEVON; containing 181 inhabitants.

TEIGNMOUTH, a sea-port and market-town, comprising two parishes, called East and West, in the union of NEWTON-ABBOT, hundred of EXMINSTER, Teign-bridge and S. divisions of DEVON, 15 miles (S. by E.) from Exeter, and 187¾ (W. S. W.) from London; containing 4459 inhabitants, of whom 2883 are in West Teignmouth. This place, originally an insignificant village, is stated to have been the first landing-place of the Danes, in 787, on being sent to reconnoitre the British coast, and who, having slain the governor, were encouraged by this omen of success to pursue their warlike purpose throughout the island. The town has been twice destroyed by fire, first by a French pirate, in 1340, and subsequently, on July 26th, 1690, when the French, having effected a landing, proceeded to ransack the churches, and burnt 116 houses, with a number of ships and small craft lying within the harbour. In commemoration of this calamitous event, one of the streets still retains the appellation of French-street; and the original brief granted for the relief of the sufferers is now in the possession of the Jordan family. Alarmed at the threat of a similar attack, in 1744, the inhabitants obtained permission to erect a small fort on the beach of East Teignmouth, and petitioned the admiralty for the requisite supply of ordnance. In Camden's time the eastern town was called Teignmouth-Regis, and the other Teignmouth-Episcopi, the manor of the latter having belonged to the see of Exeter, until alienated by Bishop Vesey. The town is situated, as its name implies, on the navigable river Teign, at its influx into the sea, and occupies a gentle declivity at the foot of a chain of hills, by which it is sheltered on the north and west, the two parts being separated by a small rivulet called the Tame. East Teignmouth, which is the more modern, is almost entirely appropriated as a watering-place, in which respect it is considered equal, if not superior, in magnitude and fashionable repute to any on the Devonshire coast. Its situation is beautiful, and in the vicinity are prospects, particularly from Little Haldon, of great and deserved celebrity; the cliffs are of a reddish colour, and of considerable height, and at the southern side of the river's mouth is a singular elevation called the Ness. On the strand fronting the sea are carriage-drives, promenades, and an extensive lawn. The public rooms, recently built by subscription, form the centre of a crescent, and comprise spacious assembly-rooms, with apartments for refreshments, cards, and billiards; the façade of the building is decorated with an Ionic portico over a Doric colonnade. There are also a public library, and bathing establishments; and a regatta takes place about the month of August.

West Teignmouth is the port and principal seat of business; in which respect it had risen to some importance at an early period, having sent members to the great council for maritime affairs, and contributed seven ships, with 120 men, towards the expedition against Calais, in 1347. The town, with its quay and dock-yard, situated on the curve formed by the sudden expansion of the river, is irregularly built, but the principal streets are neatly paved, and lighted with gas. A post-road through it from Exeter to Torquay crosses a modern bridge over the Teign, said to be the longest in England, and which is constructed of wood and iron, with a draw-bridge at one end, for the passage of vessels, and was erected by subscription. There is a quay, formed in 1820, by G. Templer, Esq.; and, in a small dockyard here, sloops of war and vessels of upwards of 200 tons' burthen have been built. The harbour is safe and commodious, though somewhat difficult to enter, on account of a moveable bar, or sand bank, which shifts with the wind. In the middle of the last century, a large number of vessels, of from 50 to 200 tons' burthen each, were employed in the trade with Newfoundland, and some business of this description is still carried on; coal and culm are imported in large quantities, and the home fishery at present occupies a considerable number of the inhabitants. By means of a railroad and a canal, which latter joins the Teign at Newton-Abbot, and is navigable thence to the sea at Teignmouth, a communication has been effected between the granite-quarries at Haytor and the clay-pits of Bovey, which greatly facilitates the exports of granite and pipe and potters'-clay.

A grant of a market and a fair was obtained in the reign of Henry III., by the Dean and Chapter of Exeter, for East Teignmouth, where is a commodious market-house, which belongs to the Earl of Devon, lord of the manor. The market is on Saturday, principally for provisions; and fairs are held on the third Tuesday in January, the last Tuesday in February, and the last Tuesday in September. The government of West Teignmouth is vested in a portreeve, who is annually elected by a jury of twelve, sworn in at a court leet and baron held by Lord Clifford, the lord of the manor, at which court also a town-clerk, four constables, two bailiffs, and other officers, are appointed. In East Teignmouth, a reeve and two constables are elected by the court, and two constables by the parish. The parish of East Teignmouth comprises 530*a. 3r. 1p.*: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £127; patron, the Vicar of Dawlish; appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Exeter: the great tithes have been commuted for £50, and those of the perpetual curate for £90. The church, which is dedicated to St. Michael, was almost rebuilt in 1821. West Teignmouth is annexed ecclesiastically to Bishop's-Teignton: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £13, and the vicarial for £157. The church, which is dedicated to St. James, is a spacious modern octagonal structure, with a tower at the west side, and surmounted in the centre by a lantern. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic Methodists. Teignmouth confers the title of Baron on the family of Shore.

TEIGNTON, BISHOP'S (ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of NEWTON-ABBOT, hundred of EXMINSTER, Teignbridge and S. divisions of DEVON $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (W. by N.) from West Teignmouth; containing 992 inhabitants. This place appears to have taken its name from a sanctuary or asylum built here by Grandison, Bishop of Exeter, and which was invested with great privileges and immunities, and considered as sacred and inviolable. He also erected a house with a chapel, "pre-saging what might in future time ensue to the great estate of the clergy, that his successors might have a place to lean and lay their heads unto if haply their temporalities should be seized;" and the remains are still to be seen. The parish is bounded by the river Teign, and comprises about 4000 acres of corn and pasture land; the surface is hilly; the grounds are well cultivated throughout, and there are extensive quarries of limestone, affording compact blocks of various-coloured marble. The living is a discharged vicarage, with West Teignmouth annexed, and valued in the king's books at £25. 8. 10.; net income, £458; patron and incumbent, the Rev. John Comyns. The impropriate tithes of Bishop's-Teignton have been commuted for £496, and the vicarial for £215. 7., with a glebe of 8 acres. The church, which has been lately entirely renovated and repewed, is principally in the Norman style, with an enriched western doorway in excellent preservation; near it are the remains of an ancient chapel, and there was formerly a chapel at Venn, in the parish.

TEIGNTON, DREWS (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of OAKHAMPTON, hundred of WONFORD, Crockernwell and S. divisions of DEVON, 11 miles (E. S. E.) from Oakhampton; containing, with the hamlet of Teignholt, 1315 inhabitants. The name of this place is supposed to signify "the Druids' Town on the Teign," which river pursues its rapid course on the south, through scenery of the wildest description, and is crossed by Fingle bridge, in a romantic valley. The parish comprises 6937*a. 3r. 25p.*, and the great western road from Exeter to Falmouth runs within a short distance on the north: there are two quarries, the produce of which is chiefly applied to agricultural purposes; and a fair is held at Candlemas, and another in Trinity-week. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £40. 13. 4.; net income, £776; patrons, the Rev. W. Ponsford and G. Ponsford, Esq. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £614. 17.; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains $440\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church is an ancient and interesting structure, with a beautiful window of stained glass at the east end, and a fine Norman font. On the Shilston estate is a cromlech consisting of three supporting stones, each about six feet and a half high, with a covering stone, twelve feet long and nine feet across the widest part. Upon the bank of the Teign is one of the celebrated logan, or rocking, stones; and at Preston-Bury are the remains of an encampment.

TEIGNTON, KING'S (ST. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of NEWTON-ABBOT, hundred of TEIGNBRIDGE, Teignbridge and S. divisions of DEVON, 2 miles (N. E. by N.) from Newton-Bushell; containing 1498 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the navigable river Teign, and comprises 3278 acres, of which 538 are common or waste; in the neighbourhood are large beds of pipe and potters' clay, of very superior quality, and limestone is quarried. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Highweek annexed, valued in the king's books at £28. 13. 9.; patron and appropriator, the Prebendary of King's-Teignton in the Cathedral of Salisbury. The prebendal tithes have been commuted for £252. 10., with a glebe of 3 acres; and the vicarial for £311, with $12\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church, enlarged in 1824, contains a monument bearing a singular epitaph to the memory of the Rev. Richard Adlam, vicar in 1669. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans; and two schools are partly supported by the vicar. Theophilus Gale, a learned nonconformist divine, was born here in 1628.

TELLISFORD (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of FROME, hundred of WELLOW, E. division of SOMERSET, 5 miles (N. N. E.) from Frome; containing 150 inhabitants. The parish is separated from Wiltshire by the river Frome, here crossed by a bridge, and comprises 717*a. 2r.*, of which 278 acres are arable, 356 meadow and pasture, 45 park land, and 38 wood. About a third part of the village was destroyed by fire in 1785. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 1. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the incumbent, the Rev. C. W. Baker: the tithes have been commuted for £150, and there is a parsonage-house, with a glebe of 59 acres.

TELSCOMBE (ST. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of NEWHAVEN, hundred of HOLMSTROW, rape of LEWES, E. division of SUSSEX, 5 miles (S. by W.) from Lewes; containing 167 inhabitants. The road from Brighton to Newhaven passes through the parish, and the English Channel bounds it on the south; the village is in a secluded valley in the Downs, where also are the remains of an encampment, supposed to be Roman, from coins found in the vicinity. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 13. 4.; net income, £231; patron and incumbent, the Rev. J. Hutchins. The church is a small structure, principally in the Norman style; the north aisle is separated from the nave by three circular arches.

TEMPLE, a parish, in the union of BODMIN, hundred of TRIGG, E. division of CORNWALL, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Bodmin; containing 37 inhabitants. It comprises 843 acres, of which 204 are common or waste. The extensive moors between Bodmin and Launceston take their name from this parish, in which they are partly situated. The living is a donative, in the patronage of Sir B. Wrey, Bart.; net income, £21. The church is quite dilapidated.

TEMPLE-BREWER, an extra-parochial liberty, in the union of SLEAFORD, wapentake of FLAXWELL, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Sleaford; containing 94 inhabitants. A preceptory of the Knights Templars was founded here before 1185, and afterwards belonged to the Hospitallers, and had possessions, at the Dissolution, valued at £184. 6. 8. per annum.

TEMPLE-GRAFTON.—See GRAFTON, TEMPLE.—And other places having a similar distinguishing prefix will be found under the proper name.

TEMPLE-HALL, an extra-parochial liberty, in the hundred of SPARKENHOE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Market-Bosworth; containing, with Wellesborough, 76 inhabitants.

TEMPLE-NEWSOM, a township, in the parish of WHITKIRK, Lower division of the wapentake of SKYRACK, W. riding of YORK, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Leeds; containing 1428 inhabitants. This place derives the prefix to its name from the Knights Templars, who had a preceptory here, which, at the suppression of their order in 1311, was granted by Edward III. to Sir John D'Arcy, whose descendant, Thomas, Lord D'Arcy, was beheaded in the reign of Henry VIII. for joining the "Pilgrims of Grace." The forfeited manor was granted to the Earl of Lenox, father of Lord Darnley, the husband of Mary, Queen of Scots; and upon the death of the earl, came to his grandson, James the 1st, by whom it was given to the Duke of Richmond, who sold it to Sir Arthur Ingram. Sir Arthur erected the present mansion, the seat of H. C. Meynell Ingram, Esq., which is surrounded by an extensive and magnificent park, and ornamented with well laid out pleasure-grounds. A school is endowed with £10 per annum, and two others have an allowance of £5 annually from the Marquess of Hertford.

TEMPLETON (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of TIVERTON, hundred of WITHERIDGE, Col-lumpton and N. divisions of DEVON, 5 miles (W. by N.) from Tiverton; containing 275 inhabitants. This parish, which once belonged to the Knights Templars, and afterwards to the Hospitalers of St. John, is intersected by the old road from Tiverton to Witheridge, and comprises 1588 acres, of which 129 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 15.; net income, £162; patron, Sir W. T. Pole, Bart. There is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains about 70 acres.

TEMPSFORD (St. PETER), a parish, in the union and hundred of BIGGLESWADE, county of BEDFORD, 5 miles (S. by W.) from St. Neot's; containing 561 inhabitants. This place is of great antiquity, and was occupied by the Danes before 921, when they were expelled by the Saxons; but they returned in 1010, and reduced it to ashes. The great north road leading to St. Neot's runs through the parish, which comprises about 1984 acres. The village is situated on the river Ivel, which is navigable through the parish, and falls into the Ouse as it passes along the western boundary. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £24, and has a net income of £227; it is in the patronage of the Crown, and the tithes have been commuted for land, under an inclosure act. The church was given to the Prior and Convent of St. Neot's, by Robert de Carun, in 1129, upon his grandson Anselm taking the monastic habit there. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

TENBURY (St. MARY THE VIRGIN), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the Upper division of the hundred of DODDINGTREE, Hundred-House and W. divisions of the county of WORCESTER; containing, with the hamlets of Berrington, Sutton, and Tenbury-Foreign with Kyrewood, 1849 inhabitants, of which number 1177 are in the town, 22 miles (N. W. by W.) from Worcester, and 134 (N. W. by W.) from London. This place, originally called Temebury, derives its name from the Teme, which is here a considerable river, separating Worcestershire from Salop, and crossed at the northern entrance into the town by a bridge of six arches. The town consists of two streets, intersecting nearly at right angles, and partially paved; the houses in general are indifferently built, but some improvements have been effected, and a company for lighting the town with gas was established in 1841. Races are held in June, on a good course about a mile south. A mineral spring was discovered in July, 1839, by some workmen sinking a well on the premises of S. H. Godson, Esq., and appears likely to raise Tenbury to a high rank among British watering-places. The water, which sprang up suddenly from a bed of limestone lying under a massive stratum of old red sandstone, was found to be about 32 feet below the surface, and exhibited a bright sparkling appearance. Several analyses of its contents have been made, differing in some respects from each other, but all exhibiting chloride of sodium, and chloride of calcium (muriate of lime), as the principal ingredients. The proprietor has built a pump-room over the spring, which was opened on the 1st of June, 1840, and baths on the most improved principles have been erected, which have been visited by numerous families of respectability and distinction; a band attends on the promenade, and every attention is paid to the accommodation of visitors. Another well for mineral water has lately been sunk to the depth of 62 feet.

The surrounding country is rich and beautiful, and very productive of hops and apples; great quantities of cider and perry are made, forming a principal source of trade, and returning large profits to the farmers. From the years 1829 to 1835, the average number of acres of hops in cultivation was 330; the average quantity of hops grown is 63,115lb., and of duty paid £529. There are also a considerable malting trade and a tannery. A canal, commenced in 1794, and originally intended to extend from Leominster to the Severn near Stourport, but not carried through the whole distance, passes within half a mile of the town. The market granted by Henry III. in 1249 is on Tuesday; the building for the corn-market is an ancient structure, but the butter-cross is more recent. Fairs are held on the Tuesday before the 25th of March, on April 22nd, May 1st, Sept. 26th, and Dec. 3rd; petty-sessions take place once in two months, and a court leet and court baron are held. The parish comprises 5179*a. 2r. 9p.* The living is a vicarage, with Rochford annexed, valued in the king's books at £21, and endowed with a portion of the rectorial tithes; net income, £607; patron and incumbent, the Rev. George Hall; impropriators of the remainder of the rectorial tithes, R. Bagnall, Esq., and others. The church, erected in the 11th century, was rebuilt in 1777, the old structure having been swept away by a flood in November 1770; it is a spacious and neat edifice, and had formerly a chantry attached to it, which was valued at the period of the suppression at £5. 0. 6. per annum. The church belonged to the monastery of Lyra, in Normandy, till the year 1414, when Henry V. transferred its rights and revenues to the monastery of Sheen, in Surrey, with which it was connected till the Dissolution. There is a place of worship for Baptists. The poor law union of Tenbury comprises 19 parishes or places, 10 of which are in Worcestershire, 5 in Salop, and 4 in Hereford, the whole containing a population of 7066: the workhouse, situated in the town, was built in 1837, at a cost of £2000.

TENBURY-FOREIGN, a hamlet, in the parish of TENBURY, Upper division of the hundred of DODDINGTREE, Hundred-House and W. divisions of the county of WORCESTER; containing, with Kyewood, 279 inhabitants, and comprising 1522 acres, of which 69 are common or waste land.

TENDRING (St. EDMUND), a parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of TENDRING, N. division of ESSEX, 10 miles (E. by S.) from Colchester; containing 925 inhabitants. The parish is in the centre of the hundred, and comprises 2767*a. 2r. 33p.*, of which about 2619 acres are arable, 50 pasture, 78 woods and groves, and 20 waste; the surface is elevated, and the soil generally a rich loam resting upon gravel. A fair is held on the 14th of September. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16, and in the gift of Balliol College, Oxford: the tithes have been commuted for £840, and the glebe contains 108 acres. The church is an ancient edifice, with a belfry turret of wood, and contains some ancient and interesting monuments. The poor law union of Tendring comprises 32 parishes or places, containing a population of 26,251: the work-house, situated on the heath in the parish, was erected in 1838, for 400 paupers, at an expense of £6500, including the purchase of the site.

TENTERDEN (St. MILDRED), a market-town and parish, within the cinque port liberties, having separate jurisdiction, and the head of a union, locally in the hundred of TENTERDEN, Lower division of the lathe of SCRAY, W. division of KENT, 18 miles (S. E. by S.) from Maidstone, and 53 (S. E. by E.) from London; containing 3620 inhabitants. This town, of which the present name appears to be a corruption of Theinwarden, or the ward of Thanes, that is, the guard in the valley, was one of the first places where the woollen manufacture was established, in the reign of Edward III. It became a scene of opposition to the Church of Rome, at an early period prior to the Reformation, when, in the time of Archbishop Warham, 48 inhabitants of the town and its vicinity were publicly accused of heresy, and five of them condemned to be burned. The town stands upon a pleasant eminence, surrounded by some fine plantations of hops; the houses are well built, and of respectable appearance. The streets are paved, and lighted with gas, under the provisions of a general act, by which the place has been recently much improved; and the trade, consisting chiefly in supplying the adjacent grazing districts, of which it is the centre, has greatly increased. The town-hall was built in 1792, the former having been destroyed by fire. The market, principally for corn, is held on Friday; there is a fair for horses, cattle, and pedlery, on the first Monday in May; and a stock-market, established on the 28th of June, 1839, takes place on the Fridays before the first and third Tuesdays in each month. The inhabitants were incorporated, by the style of "The Bayliffe and Commonalty of the Town and Hundred of Tenterden," and the place annexed as a member to the port of Rye, by Henry VI.; but the corporation now consists of a mayor, four aldermen, and twelve councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76; the mayor and late mayor are justices of the peace, and the total number of magistrates is six. The recorder holds a court of quarter-sessions, with power to try for all offences not capital.

The LIVING is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £33. 12. 11.; net income, £177; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury. The church is spacious and handsome, with a lofty tower at the west end, to which a beacon was formerly attached. At Smallhythe, in the parish, is a chapel, erected about 1509, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, and licensed by faculty from Archbishop Warham; it is repaired and maintained out of lands in this parish and that of Wittersham, and the chaplain is appointed by the inhabitants. It appears that, at the time of its erection, the sea came up to Smallhythe, as power was then given to inter in the chapelyard the bodies of shipwrecked persons cast on shore. There are places of worship for Baptists, Wesleyans, and Unitarians. The free grammar school, founded at an early period by an ancestor of the late Sir Peter Hayman, was endowed in 1521, by William Marshall, with a rent-charge of £10, and, in 1702, by John Mantel, with the sum of £200, which was laid out in land; the income is £52, appropriated to a national school. Dr. Edward Curteis, in 1797, left property now producing £101 per annum, for the clothing and instruction of 10 girls, for the distribution of bread to the indigent, and other charitable uses. The poor law union of Tenterden comprises 11 parishes or places, and contains a population of 10,999. Hoole, the translator of Tasso, resided at Tenterden; and the place confers the title of Baron on the family of Abbot; Sir Charles, late lord chief justice of the court of king's bench, having been raised to the peerage by that title, on the 30th of April, 1827.

TENTERGATE, with SCRIVEN, a township, in the parish of KNARESBOROUGH, Lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, W. riding of YORK; containing 1435 inhabitants. The township comprises about 1598 acres, and Tentergate forms that part of the borough of Knareborough usually called Bond-End; it is chiefly the property of Sir Charles Slingsby, Bart.

TERLING (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union and hundred of WITHAM, N. division of ESSEX, 4½ miles (W.) from Witham; containing 921 inhabitants. The parish is situated at no great distance from the ancient Roman stations of Colchester, Maldon, and Pleshey; and on making a new road here, in 1824, about 300 gold and silver coins were dug up, subsequently to which a jar was discovered, containing two large rings and 30 small pieces of gold, with some silver coins of the twelve Roman emperors, in regular succession, from Constantius to Honorius, and as bright as if just taken from the mint. In 1269, the Bishop of Norwich had a palace and park here, which subsequently became the residence of Henry VIII.; the chapel attached to it possessed the privilege of sanctuary, and as such afforded shelter to the celebrated Hubert de Burgh, when under the indignation of Henry III. The parish comprises by admeasurement 3206 acres. A fair, chiefly for pleasure, is held on Whit-Monday. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10; and in the patronage of J. H. Strutt, Esq., of Terling Hall, the impropiator, whose tithes have been commuted for £101. 17. 8., and those of the vicar for £277. 17. 9. The church, a spacious edifice, with a tower of brick, replacing one of stone which had fallen down, has been elegantly restored by Mr. Strutt. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

TERRINGTON (St. CLEMENT), a parish, in the union of WISBECH, hundred of FREEBRIDGE-MARSHLAND, W. division of NORFOLK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Lynn; containing 1675 inhabitants. Though not noticed in Domesday book, this was an extensive place, and had considerable salt-works, in the time of the Saxons, as appears from a grant of Godric, brother to Ednoth, abbot of Ramsey, about 970. The parish is bounded on the north by the sea, and comprises 9395*a.* 19*p.*, of which 5459 acres are arable, 1970 meadow and pasture, 15 woodland, 830 common, and 800 salt-marsh. The village is spacious, and well built, and in the immediate vicinity are several handsome villas: Orange Lodge, near the village, was purchased in 1816 from Baron Feagle, a German refugee, who entertained the Prince of Orange here during the invasion of Holland by the French. Petty-sessions are held on the first and third Monday in every month. The living is a vicarage, with that of Terrington St. John annexed, valued jointly in the king's books at £23. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown: the rectory, with that of St. John's, is annexed to the Margaret Professorship at Cambridge, and the rectorial tithes have been commuted for £2402; the vicarial produce £660, and the glebe comprises 8 acres. The church is a handsome cruciform structure in the later English style, with a lofty square embattled tower at the north-west angle; the font is elaborately sculptured, and there are several interesting monuments. There was a chapel dedicated to St. James, washed away by the sea. The Wesleyans have a place of worship; and a national school is supported by subscription, and a small endowment. A dispensary and lying-in charity are maintained, and about 50 acres of land are let in small portions to the poor, at a nominal rent. The learned Walter Terrington, LL.D., and Dr. John Cotton, Archbishop of Armagh, were natives of this place; and the Rev. Edward Gonville, who, with Dr. Caius, founded Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge, Dr. John Pearson, Bishop of Chester, and the late Dr. Marsh, Bishop of Peterborough, were rectors of the parish.

TERRINGTON (St. JOHN), a parish, in the union of WISBECH, hundred of FREEBRIDGE-MARSHLAND, W. division of NORFOLK, 6 miles (W. S. W.) from Lynn; containing 682 inhabitants. It comprises 2396*a.* 2*r.*, of which 1581 acres are arable, 728 meadow and pasture, and the remainder homesteads, roads, and waste land. The living is a vicarage, united to that of Terrington St. Clement. The church is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower at the west end of the south aisle; in the churchyard is an ancient cross. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Land producing £80 per annum is appropriated to the repair of the church; and 16 acres, worth £40 a year, are allotted to the poor.

TERRINGTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of MALTON, wapentake of BULMER, N. riding of YORK; containing, with the township of GANTHORPE, 732 inhabitants, of whom 614 are in the township of Terrington with Wiginthorpe, 8 miles (W. by S.) from Malton. The parish comprises about 3630 acres, chiefly the property of the Earl of Carlisle, who is lord of the manor: the village is pleasantly situated about a mile and a half westward of Castle-Howard demesne. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £23. 18. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$; net income, £571; patron and incumbent, the Rev. C. Hall: the tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1772. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists; and a boys' and a girls' school have been erected by the Earl of Carlisle, and are chiefly supported by his lordship, Lord Morpeth, and the rector.

TERWICK, a parish, in the union of MIDHURST, hundred of DUMPFORD, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of SUSSEX, 5 miles (E.) from Petersfield; containing 108 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Midhurst to Petersfield, and bounded on the south by the river Rother, and comprises 715*a.* 1*r.* 13*p.*, of which about 454 acres are arable, 106 meadow and pasture, 50 wood, and 105 common. Sandstone is everywhere abundant. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 0. 5., and in the gift of the Trustees of the late Sir Charles Paget, Knt.: the tithes have been commuted for £173, and the glebe comprises 10 acres.

TESTERTON (St. REMIGIUS), a parish, in the union of WALSINGHAM, hundred of GALLOW, W. division of NORFOLK, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Fakenham; containing 23 inhabitants. The parish comprises 674*a.* 2*r.* 39*p.*, for more than two centuries the property of the family of Case, whose mansion, Testerton House, a handsome modern residence, is beautifully situated on the estate; about 511 acres are arable, and 163 meadow and pasture, with some woodland and ornamental plantations. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £5; net income, £13; patron, T. Wythe, Esq. The church is in ruins, with the exception of the tower, which forms a picturesque feature in the grounds of Testerton House.

TESTON (St. PETER AND St. PAUL), a parish, in the union of MAIDSTONE, hundred of TWYFORD, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, 4 miles (W. by S.) from Maidstone; containing 268 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 10.; net income, £233; patron and impropiator, Lord Barham. The tithes were commuted for land in 1805. The church, which was a remarkably small structure, has been repaired, considerably enlarged, and beautified, by subscription, towards which the vicar largely contributed; it stands on the bank of the Medway, over which is a fine bridge of seven arches.

TESTWOOD, a tything, in the parish of ELING, union of NEW-Forest, hundred of REDBRIDGE, Romsey.

and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 188 inhabitants.

TETBURY (St. MARY), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of LONGTREE, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 20 miles (S. by E.) from Gloucester, and 99 (W. by N.) from London; containing 2982 inhabitants. The town is pleasantly situated on an eminence at the southern verge of the county, bordering on Wiltshire, and near the source of the river Avon, over which is a long bridge or causeway, leading into the main road to Malmesbury; it consists principally of a long street, crossed at right angles by two shorter ones, with a spacious market-house near one of the intersections. An act was obtained, in 1817, for paving and lighting the town, the expense of which was defrayed out of funds in the hands of trustees appointed in 1814, under an act for inclosing waste grounds; and £1000 were also appropriated from the same source for the repair of the market-house. The poor are chiefly employed by woolstaplers, and the market was formerly noted for the sale of woollen-yarn, but the introduction of machinery has put an end to the trade. The market is on Wednesday; and fairs are held on Ash-Wednesday, July 22nd, and November 10th, for corn, cheese, horses, and cattle. A bailiff and a constable are elected annually at the court leet of the foffees of the manor; and petty-sessions for the town and hundred take place here, and at Horseley and Rodborough, alternately.

The parish comprises 4384*a.* 1*r.* 7*p.* The LIVING is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £36. 13. 4.; patrons, Trustees of Tetbury charity; appropriators, the Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford. The great tithes have been commuted for £240, and the vicarial for £800; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains about 50 acres. The church, having been undermined by a flood in 1770, was, with the exception of the tower, which is surmounted by a fine modern spire, rebuilt in 1781, in the early English style, at an expense of £6000. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyans. A grammar school was endowed by Sir William Romney, a native of Tetbury, and an alderman and sheriff of London in the reign of James I., who bequeathed a lease for years of the weights of wool and yarn, tolls, and other profits within the town, with the proceeds of which lands have been purchased. A school is partly supported by an endowment of £30 per annum, bequeathed by Elizabeth Hodges, in 1723, and partly by subscription; and there is a national school. The poor law union of Tetbury comprises 13 parishes or places, of which 11 are in the county of Gloucester, and 2 in Wilts; and the population amounts to 5891. In Maudlin meadow, which belongs to Magdalen College, Oxford, and is situated north of the town, is a petrifying spring, impregnated with calcareous earth. A castle is said to have been built here long before the invasion of Britain by the Romans; and ancient British coins and fragments of weapons have been found within the area of a camp in the vicinity; of which all traces are now obliterated.

TETCHWYCH, a hamlet, in the parish of LUDGERSHALL, union of AYLESBURY, hundred of ASHENDON, county of BUCKINGHAM, 10 miles (W. N. W.) from Aylesbury; containing, with the township of Ludgershall, 500 inhabitants.

TETCOTT (HOLY CROSS), a parish, in the union of HOLSWORTHY, hundred of BLACK TORRINGTON, Holsworthy and N. divisions of DEVON, 5 miles (S. by W.) from Holsworthy; containing 300 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Barnstaple, through Bideford, to Launceston, and comprises 2160 acres, of which 351 are common or waste; the river Tamar forms its western boundary, and the Bude canal passes within a mile and a half. Tetcott House, the beautiful seat of Sir William Molesworth, Bart., was destroyed by fire in May, 1841. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the gift of Sir W. Molesworth: the tithes have been commuted for £145; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 59 acres. The church contains some interesting monuments to the Arcott family.

TETFORD (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of HORNCastle, hundred of HILL, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 6½ miles (N. E. by E.) from Horncastle; containing 778 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 1750 acres: there are limestone quarries, the material of which is used for burning into lime, and for repairing the roads. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 0. 10., and in the patronage of Miss Harrison: the tithes were commuted for land in 1765; the glebe consists of 350 acres. The church contains sixty free sittings, the Incorporated Society having granted £40 in aid of the expense. The Wesleyans have a place of worship; and there is a national school, partly supported by the proceeds of a cottage and seven acres of land, left in 1714, by Edward Richardson.

TETNEY (St. PETER AND St. PAUL), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, wapentake of BRADLEY-HAVERSTOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 8 miles (S. S. E.) from Great Grimsby; containing 819 inhabitants. The parish comprises by admeasurement 5200 acres, and the Louth navigation runs through it. Weaving, formerly carried on to a considerable extent, is now nearly discontinued; and a fair, held in July, has degenerated from a mart for cattle and hardware into a mere festival. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 18. 4.; patron and appropriator, the Bishop of Lincoln. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1774; there are a parsonage-house, and a glebe of 140 acres, together valued at £300 per annum, and the vicar receives £12 a year from the lessees of the great tithes. The church is distinguished by a very fine tower. There are places of worship for Wesleyan and Primitive Methodists. Several pits of beautifully clear water here, called "blow-wells," contain excellent pike and eels; the water is continually running, and never freezes, and it is said that Sir Joseph Banks spent a fortnight in examining the wells, which have been found to extend to the depth of between twenty and thirty feet. Some remains are to be seen of an ancient monastery, the last tower of which was lately taken down.

TETSWORTH (St. GILES), a parish, in the union and hundred of THAME, county of OXFORD, 11½ miles (E. S. E.) from Oxford; containing 523 inhabitants. It comprises by admeasurement 1261 acres, of which 56 are arable, 1111 pasture, 49 common, and 45 waste, &c. The living is annexed, with those of Sydenham and Towersey, to the vicarage of Thame: a rent-charge of £210 is paid to the prebendary of Thame in lieu of tithes; another of £5. 8. to the rector of Wheatfield, and a third of £115 to the vicar of Thame. The church is an ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, separated by a Norman arch: above the south entrance is a circular moulding, under which are a pitted figure, having a crosier in the left hand, and the figure of a priest, with a book in the left hand, and the right hand pointing above to the paschal lamb, with a banner. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

TETTENHALL-REGIS (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of SEISDON, partly in the N. and partly in the S. division of the hundred of SEISDON, S. division of the county of STAFFORD, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. W.) from Wolverhampton; containing, with the prebends of Bovenhill, Pendeford, Pirton with Trescott, and Wrottesley, 3143 inhabitants, of whom 2207 are in the township of Tettenthal Regis and Clericorum. The parish comprises 7551a. 1r. 27p., of which the surface is undulated, and the scenery very picturesque: part of the population is engaged in the manufacture of locks of all descriptions, hinges, bolts, spectacle-frames, &c. There are several excellent residences here, the largest of which is Wrottesley Hall, the seat of Lord Wrottesley, surrounded with good land and wood. The village stands nearly in the centre of the parish, at the foot and on the declivities of a lofty eminence; the Worcestershire and Staffordshire canal passes through it, and is joined here by the Liverpool and Birmingham canal. The living is a perpetual curacy, with a net income of £196; patron and impropiator, Lord Wrottesley. The church, which was made collegiate before the Conquest for a dean and four prebendaries, is in the early, decorated, and later English styles, and was enlarged in 1825, and thoroughly repaired in 1841, at a cost of £1475; the eastern window contains an ancient painting on glass, representing the archangel trampling on a dragon; the font, curiously ornamented with sculpture, was restored in 1844. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also a national and infants' school.

TETTON, a township, in the parish of WARMINGTON, union of CONGLETON, hundred of NORTHWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 3 miles (W. N. W.) from Sandbach; containing 182 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £110. 12.

TETWORTH, with EVERTON, a parish, in the union of ST. NEOT'S, hundred of TOSLAND, county of HUNTINGDON, 3 miles (N. by W.) from Potton; containing, exclusively of Everton, which is in Biggleswade hundred, Bedfordshire, 235 inhabitants. The appropriate tithes have been commuted for £205, and the vicarial for £70.—See EVERTON.

TEVERSALL (St. CATHERINE), a parish, in the union of MANSFIELD, N. division of the hundred of BROXTOW and of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Mansfield; containing 423 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 2500 acres: coal and limestone abound, but neither is now worked. The village is situated on a lofty eminence, near the source of the river Meden. A few persons are employed in stocking-frame weaving. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 19. 2., and in the gift of the Earl of Carnarvon: the tithes have been commuted for £522. 8.; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains nearly 42 acres. The church is principally in the Norman style, and contains several old monuments of the Greenhalghe, Molyneux, and Babington families; there is a curious arch, said to be Saxon, over the chief entrance, marked with symbolical representations of religious subjects. South of the church are the extensive ruins of the ancient mansion-house, built by Gilbert Greenhalghe in the reign of Henry VII., and the remains of a hanging garden, on a very magnificent scale.

TEVERSHAM (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of CHESTERTON, hundred of FLENDISH, county of CAMBRIDGE, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Cambridge; containing 220 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Cambridge to Newmarket, and comprises by admeasurement 1187 acres. The living is a rectory, in the patronage of the Bishop of Ely, valued in the king's books at £19. 16. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £352. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1810; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 226 acres. Lady Joan Jermy bequeathed a cottage and 17 acres of land, for charitable uses, in lieu of the latter of which two parcels of land were set out at the inclosure of the parish, comprising respectively 21p. and 11a. 2p.; the house and land now produce about £30 per annum, applied to educating young children, and relieving the poor.

TEW, GREAT (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of CHIPPING-NORTON, hundred of WOOTTON, county of OXFORD, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Neat-Enstone; containing 459 inhabitants. A classical association attaches to this place as having been the residence of the illustrious Lucius, Viscount Falkland, who, before entering upon his stormy political career in the time of Charles I., here devoted himself to the study of literature and philosophy, in which he was deeply versed. His house was unreservedly open to all the eminent men of the university; and Sheldon, Hammond, Chillingworth, the poets Waller and Cowley, and, more especially, his friend Edward Hyde, afterwards Earl of Clarendon, were his constant guests. The parish comprises 2993 acres, of which rather more than half are arable; the greater part of the soil consists of the red loam common to the north of Oxfordshire, but to the south it partakes of stone brash; the scenery is richly diversified with fine timber trees, amongst which the village is beautifully secluded. Tew Park is now the residence of M. P. W. Boulton, Esq.

The LIVING is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4.; net income, £134; patron and impropiator, Mr. Boulton. The tithes were commuted for land in 1766. The church is a handsome building, chiefly in the decorated English style, with a good Norman doorway, and contains some brasses of the Raynsfords, to whom the manor formerly belonged; two recumbent stone effigies of a crusader and a lady, whose names are unknown; and an elegant monument by Chantry. Lord Falkland was buried here, according to the register, on the 23rd of September, 1643, three days after his untimely death on the field of Newbury; but there is no tablet to his memory, nor is it known in what part of the church his remains were deposited, secrecy, probably, having been desirable, lest, owing to the violence of the times, his body might be disturbed. T. E. Freeman, in 1781, gave an estate producing £31 per annum, for education; the school is on the national plan. A convent supposed to have been connected with that at Godstow, formerly stood adjacent to the church, and some traces thought to belong to it are still visible. Dr. Plot, in his work on Oxfordshire, speaks of a tessellated pavement ploughed up near the village; and more recently, in 1810, a complete Roman burial-vault was discovered at a farm called Beaconsfield, as well as a bath, with remains of pavement, urns, coins, &c. In 1827, also, a bath was found, with similar remains.

TEW, LITTLE, a parish, in the union of CHIPPING-NORTON, hundred of WOOTTON, county of OXFORD, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Neat-Enstone; containing 215 inhabitants. The living is annexed to that of Great Tew.

TEWIN (St. PETER), a parish, in the union, hundred, and county of HERTFORD, 3 miles (E. S. E.) from Welwyn; containing 522 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2412 acres, of which 20 are common or waste land. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14, and in the gift of Jesus' College, Cambridge: the tithes have been commuted for £460; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe consists of 40 acres. The church has a square embattled tower, with a low spire: in the churchyard is a curious tombstone to the memory of Lady Ann Grimstone, which attracts many visitors. There are some small charitable bequests.

TEWKESBURY (St. MARY), a borough, market-town, and parish, having separate jurisdiction, and the head of a union, locally in the Lower division of the hundred of TEWKESBURY, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 10 miles (N. N. E.) from Gloucester, and 103 (W. N. W.) from London; containing, with the township of Mythe, and that of Southwick with Park, 5862 inhabitants. This place, which is of great antiquity, is supposed to have derived its name from Theot, a Saxon recluse, who, during the latter period of the heptarchy, founded a hermitage here, where he lived in solitude and devotion, and after whom it was called Theotisberg, from which its present appellation is deduced. In 1715, a monastery was founded here by the two brothers Odo and Dodo, dukes of Mercia, and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary, which, after having experienced great injury during the Danish wars, became a cell to the abbey of Cranborne in Dorsetshire. After the Conquest, Robert Fitz-Hamon, who attended William in his expedition to Britain, enlarged the buildings of this monastery, and so amply augmented its possessions, that the monks of Cranborne removed, in 1101, to Tewkesbury, which they made the principal seat of their establishment; it was subsequently raised into an abbey of Benedictine monks, and continued to flourish till the Dissolution, at which time its revenue was estimated at £1598. 1. 3. The last decisive battle between the Yorkists and the Lancastrians took place within half a mile of this town, in 1471; on which memorable occasion, many of the principal nobility were slain on both sides, and not less than 3000 of the Lancastrian troops. Queen Margaret, who headed her own forces, was intrenched on the summit of an eminence, called the Home Ground, at the distance of a mile from the town, on the east side of the road to Gloucester; and the troops of Edward IV., who advanced against his opponents by way of Tredington, occupied the sloping ground to the south, called the Red Piece. The victory was decisive in favour of the Yorkists, the defeat of the Lancastrians having been ascribed to the treacherous inactivity of Lord Wenlock, one of their generals, whom the chief commander, the Duke of Somerset, struck dead on the field with his battle-axe. After their defeat, the Duke of Somerset, with about 20 other distinguished persons, took shelter in the church, from which they were dragged with violence, and immediately beheaded. At the commencement of the great civil war in the reign of Charles I., Tewkesbury was occupied by the parliamentarians, who were afterwards driven out, and the town was taken by the royalists, by whom it was again lost and retaken, till, in 1644, it was surprised and captured by Col. Massey, governor of Gloucester, for the parliamentarians, in whose possession it remained till the conclusion of the war.

The town is pleasantly situated in the northern part of the luxuriant vale of Gloucester, and on the eastern bank of the river Avon, near its confluence with the Severn; it is nearly surrounded by the small rivers Carron and Swilgate, both which fall into the Avon, and is handsome and well built, consisting of three principal streets, lighted with gas, and well paved; the houses are in general of brick, occasionally interspersed with ancient timber and brick buildings, and are amply supplied with water. Considerable improvements have recently taken place, among which may be noticed the ranges of building erected to the east of the High-street, on a tract of land called Oldbury, and the formation of a new street. An elegant cast-iron bridge, opening a direct communication between London and Hereford, was constructed in 1826, over the Severn, near the beautiful hamlet of Mythe, within half a mile of the town, at an expense of £36,000, subscribed to a great extent in shares of £100 each; it consists of one noble arch, 172 feet in span, with a light iron balustrade. Near the division of the Worcester and Pershore roads is an ancient bridge of several arches over the Avon, which was widened and improved in 1836, and from which a level causeway has been raised, extending to the iron bridge. A mechanics' institution was established in 1838, and is in a flourishing state.

About the beginning of the 15th century, this place seems to have carried on a considerable TRADE upon the Severn; and a petition was forwarded to the house of peers, in the 8th of Henry VI., stating that the inhabitants had been accustomed "to ship all manner of merchandise down the Severn to Bristol," and complaining of the disorderly conduct of the people of the forest of Dean, who are reported to have stopped and plundered their ships as they passed by the coasts near the forest. For the redress of these grievances an act was passed in the same year; and, in 1580, Queen Elizabeth made Tewkesbury an independent port, which grant, however, was afterwards revoked, on a petition from the inhabitants of Bristol. Tewkesbury formerly enjoyed a large trade in woollen-cloth, and was celebrated for the manufacture of mustard of superior quality, but the principal branch of trade at present is the stocking frame-work knitting. The manufacture of cotton-thread lace was established at Oldbury in 1825; a good trade is carried on in malt, and some in leather, and there is a factory for nails. An extensive distillery and a rectifying establishment were opened in 1770, of which the former has been abandoned, but the latter is still conducted on an advantageous scale. A very considerable carrying trade centres here, in connexion with the Avon and the Severn, and goods are conveyed by land and water to all parts of the kingdom: on the bank of the Avon are extensive corn-mills, formerly belonging to the abbey. There is a branch railway, 2 miles and 10 chains in length, from the centre of the High-street to the Birmingham and Gloucester railway at Ashchurch; and an extensive building has been erected as a depôt, with an elegant front towards the High-street. The market-days are Wednesday and Saturday, the former for corn, sheep, and pigs, and the latter for poultry and provisions. Fairs take place on the second Monday in March, the second Wednesday in April, May 14th, the first Wednesday after September 4th, and October 10th, for cattle, leather, and pedlery; statute-fairs are held on the Wednesday before, and the Wednesday after, Old Michaelmas-day; and there are great cattle-markets on the second Wednesday in June, August, and December. The market-house is a handsome building, with Doric columns and pilasters.

Tewkesbury, which is a BOROUGH by prescription, was first incorporated in 1574, by Queen Elizabeth, whose charter was confirmed by James I., in the third year of his reign; since which time, other charters were bestowed by various monarchs, ending with that of William III., in 1698. By the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76, however, the corporation now consists of a mayor, four aldermen, and twelve councillors; the number of magistrates is eight. There were formerly several trading companies incorporated under the charter, but the only one now in existence is that of the Cordwainers. The town first received the elective franchise in the 7th of James I., since which time it has continued to return two members to parliament: the right of election was extended in 1832, to the £10 householders of the entire parish; the mayor is returning officer. The recorder holds quarterly courts of session, for all offences within the borough not capital; a court of petty-sessions occurs every Friday, and also a court of record for the recovery of debts not exceeding £50; and a court leet takes place, the jurisdiction of which extends over all the parishes in the hundred of Tewkesbury. The town-hall is a handsome building, erected in 1788, by Sir William Codrington, Bart., at an expense of £1200; the lower part is appropriated to the use of the courts, and the upper contains a hall for the meetings of the corporation, and an assembly-room. The common gaol, house of correction, and penitentiary for the borough, was built in 1816, at the northern extremity of the High-street, at a cost of £3420, raised by a rate on the inhabitants, and has been since enlarged and improved; it has four wards for the classification of prisoners. The county magistrates hold a petty-session for the division every alternate Wednesday.

The LIVING is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £313. The church, situated at the south-western part of the town, and formerly the collegiate church of the ancient monastery, is a spacious and venerable cruciform structure, principally in the Norman style, with a noble and richly-ornamented tower rising from the centre. The nave and choir, of which the latter was repaired in 1796, at an expense of £2000, are separated from the aisles by a noble range of cylindrical columns and circular arches, highly enriched with mouldings and other ornaments peculiar to the Norman style. The nave is lighted by clerestory windows in the later style, inserted in the Norman arches of the triforium, and the chancel by an elegant range of windows in the decorated style, with rich tracery, and adorned with considerable portions of ancient stained glass; the windows of the aisles and transepts are in the decorated and later styles, and the large west window, in the later style, is inserted in a very lofty Norman arch of great depth, with shafts and mouldings richly ornamented. The roof is finely groined, and embellished, at the intersections of the ribs, with figures of angels playing on musical instruments; the east end of the choir is hexagonal, and contains several beautiful chantry chapels, in the decorated style; the Lady chapel and the cloisters have been destroyed, but the arches which led to them may be traced on the outside of the building, and on the north side are the remains of the chapter-house, now used for a school. The church contains a fine series of monuments, from the earliest period of the decorated, to the most recent period of the later, English style, among which are several to the early patrons of the abbey, and to those who fell in the battle of Tewkesbury. In a light and elegant chapel on the north side of the choir, erected by Abbot Parker, in 1397, is the tomb of Robert Fitz-Hamon, the founder, who was killed at Falaise, in Normandy, in 1107, and whose remains, after having been interred in the chapter-house, were removed into the church, in 1241. An altar-tomb, inclosed with arches surmounted by an embattled cornice, on which are the figures of a knight and his lady, is supposed to have been erected for Hugh le Despenser and his wife Elizabeth, daughter of William Montacute, Earl of Salisbury. Near this is a beautiful sepulchral chapel, built by Isabel, Countess of Warwick, for her first husband Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Worcester, who was killed at the siege of Meaux, in 1421; it is profusely ornamented, and the roof, which is richly embellished with tracery, was supported on six pillars of blue marble, of which only two are remaining. Another church was erected in 1837, of red brick, with stone dressings; and a third has recently been built in the Oldbury, at the cost of £4000. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyans; and a Roman Catholic chapel.

The free grammar school was founded in 1576, and endowed with £20 per annum, by Mr. Ferrers, and with lands purchased with money left by Sir Dudley Digges, and with some chief rents. The Blue-coat school is endowed with one-twelfth part of the rents of a farm in Kent, devised for charitable uses by Lady Capel, in 1721, and is further supported by subscription: the national school, under the superintendance of the same master, was established in 1813; and a building for its use, and for that of the Blue-coat school, was erected adjoining the churchyard, in 1817, at an expense of £1345. There are various charitable bequests for the poor; and the late Samuel Barnes;

Esq., erected an extensive structure in the Oldbury, as an almshouse for 24 parishioners, which he endowed with land for their support. Near the entrance into the town from Gloucester is the house of industry, a large brick building, for the poor law union of Tewkesbury, which comprises 23 parishes or places, 16 in the county of Gloucester, and 7 in that of Worcester, the whole containing a population of 14,957. Of the monastic buildings, with the exception of the church, there are few remains: the principal is the gateway of the monastery, which appears to have been erected in the 15th century, and is surmounted with an embattled parapet rising above the cornice, from which are projecting figures, and below it is a canopied niche between two square-headed windows. Roman coins have been frequently dug up in the vicinity, and, in 1828, several were found near the abbey church. One of the most beautiful and perfect specimens of the Ichthyosaurus, or fish lizard, was found on Brockridge Common, in August, 1841, and measures 6 feet 10 inches in length, containing an immense number of vertebræ. At Walton is a mineral spring, the water of which resembles that at Cheltenham. On the south-west side of the town is a tumulus, from which the descent to the Severn is precipitous and abrupt, and which, from a visit of George III., in 1788, has obtained the name of Royal Hill. Alan of Tewkesbury, a monk of the abbey, and the friend and biographer of Thomas à Becket; and Estcourt, the celebrated dramatist, who was contemporary with Steele and Addison, were natives of the town. Tewkesbury gave the title of Baron to George I., previously to his accession to the throne.

TEY, GREAT (ST. BARNABAS), a parish, in the union of LEXDEN and WINSTREE, Colchester division of the hundred of LEXDEN, N. division of ESSEX, 7 miles (S. E.) from Halstead; containing 733 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2478a. 3r. 3p., of which about 2222 acres are arable, 93 meadow and pasture, 123 wood, and 40 garden-ground; there is a great variety of soil, but the lands are in a high state of cultivation. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7, and in the gift of the Rev. R. S. Dixon, who is also patron and incumbent of the sinecure rectory, which is valued at £18: the rectorial tithes have been commuted for £547. 14., and the vicarial for £232; there is a parsonage-house, and the vicarial glebe comprises 18 acres, and the rectorial 7. The church is a very ancient edifice, originally cruciform, with a central tower supported on four arches, and side aisles separated from the nave by massive columns. In 1829, the tower was found to have pressed the pillars of the nave so much out of the perpendicular, that it became necessary to take down all the building to the west of it; since which divine service has been performed in the old chancel and transept, and a small erection has been raised on the site of the nave, forming the vestry-room and organ-gallery.

TEY, LITTLE (ST. JAMES), a parish, in the union of LEXDEN and WINSTREE, Witham division of the hundred of LEXDEN, N. division of ESSEX, 2½ miles (E. by N.) from Great Coggeshall; containing 59 inhabitants. The parish is one of the smallest in the county, comprising only 448 acres, of which the soil, though heavy, is fertile. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £4, and in the gift of the Bishop of London: the tithes have been commuted for £146, and the glebe comprises 20 acres. The church is a small ancient edifice, with a belfry turret of wood.

TEY, MARKS (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of LEXDEN and WINSTREE, Witham division of the hundred of LEXDEN, N. division of ESSEX, 5 miles (W.) from Colchester; containing 397 inhabitants. The parish takes the present adjunct to its name from the family of Marks, or Merks, to whom it anciently belonged, but is in some documents called Tey ad ulmos, from the number of elm-trees with which it formerly abounded, and for the growth of which the soil is peculiarly favourable. It comprises 1180a. 35p., of which 1157 acres are arable, 21 pasture, and about 2 wood. The living is a rectory not in charge, in the patronage of Balliol College, Oxford: the tithes have been commuted for £235, and there are 42½ acres of glebe. In the chancel of the church is a window containing the arms of Dr. Compton, Bishop of London, in painted glass.

TEYNHAM (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of FAVERSHAM, hundred of TEYNHAM, Upper division of the lathe of SCRAY, E. division of KENT, 3½ miles (E.) from Sittingbourne; containing 845 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the London and Dover road, and comprises 2439a. 33p., of which the soil in many places is rich and fertile, and marshy in the direction of the Swale, to which the boundaries extend. An accession has lately been made to the parish, by the embankment of the island of Fowley. Conyer creek, an inlet of the sea, is terminated by a quay, to which vessels of 250 tons' burthen come up and discharge their cargoes of coal, for the supply of the inhabitants, taking in the produce of the neighbourhood for the London and other markets. The district abounds with cherry-orchards, and there are a few plantations of hops. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10; net income, £179; patron and appropriator, the Archdeacon of Canterbury. The church is a handsome cruciform structure, principally in the early English style, and contains many brasses and other ancient memorials, with some fragments of old stained glass. Here are vestiges of a Roman encampment, and the ruins of a palace formerly belonging to the archbishops of Canterbury. Teynham confers the title of Baron on the family of Curzon.

THAKEHAM (ST. MARY), a parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of EAST EASWRITH, rape of BRAMBER, W. division of SUSSEX, 3 miles (N. N. E.) from Storrington; containing 620 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 2800 acres, chiefly arable land. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 9. 9½., and in the gift of the Duke of Norfolk: the tithes have been commuted for £700, and there are 27 acres of glebe. The church, which is partly in the early and partly in the later English style, is a cruciform structure, with a square embattled tower at the west end, and contains some interesting monuments to the Apsley and other families. The poor law union comprises fourteen parishes or places, and contains a population of 7578.

THAME (ST. MARY), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of THAME, county of OXFORD, 13 miles (E.) from Oxford, and 44½ (N. W.

by W.) from London; containing, with the hamlets of Priestend, North Weston, and Moreton, 3060 inhabitants, of whom 1177 are in New Thame township, 1134 in Old Thame, and 51 in the hamlet of Thame-Park. This town is evidently of Roman origin, and is first mentioned, as a place of some importance, at the commencement of the 10th century, when Wulfhere, King of Mercia, granted a charter, dated "in the vill called Thames;" and in the year 970, Osketyl, Archbishop of York, died here. It suffered much from the Danish invasions, particularly in 1010, during which period a fortification was erected. At the Conquest it belonged to the Bishop of Lincoln, and, till the reign of Edward VI., formed part of the extensive possessions of succeeding prelates, among the many benefits conferred by whom on the town was the diverting through it the road which previously passed on its side. In 1138, a monastery for Cistercian monks was established at Thame-Park, in honour of the Virgin Mary, the revenue of which, at the Dissolution, was valued at £256. 13. 7.; the site is occupied by the modern mansion of Lady Wenman. About the time of Edward IV., an hospital for destitute persons was founded and endowed with lands by Richard Quatremain, a member of an ancient family of high repute. In the civil war of the 16th century, Thame was the centre of military operations, and experienced much consequent distress; and during the late war with France it became one of the depôts for prisoners.

The town derives its name from its situation on a gentle declivity on the bank of the river Thame, which here separates the counties of Oxford and Bucks, and over which is a bridge of considerable length; it consists principally of one long and spacious street, with a convenient market-place in the centre, over which is the town-hall, a handsome and commodious building. The manufacture of lace is carried on, but the inhabitants are chiefly employed in husbandry. The market, which is of great antiquity, is on Tuesday, and is well supplied with corn and cattle; fairs are held on Easter-Tuesday, the Tuesday before Whit-Sunday, the first Tuesday in August, and a statute-fair on October 11th. The LIVING, anciently a prebend in the Cathedral of Lincoln, valued in the king's books at £82. 12. 3½., but impropriated and dissolved in 1547, is now a discharged vicarage, with those of Sydenham, Tetsworth, and Towersey annexed, valued in the king's books at £18; net income, £300; patron, the Rev. John Peers. The impropriation belongs to Lady Wenman: the tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1823. The church, built in 1138, is a large and handsome cruciform structure in the decorated English style, with an embattled tower rising from the intersection, supported on four massive pillars, and surmounted by an octagonal turret of nearly equal height. The interior, which, in 1839, was thoroughly restored and beautified, at an expense of £500, is divided by columns and pointed arches, and is entered by a stone porch with an elegant canopied niche, in which was formerly a statue of the tutelar saint. In the chancel is a tomb of white marble, to the memory of Lord Williams, with the recumbent effigies of himself and his lady, in the costume of the time of Elizabeth; and against the south wall is a curious brass, with a kneeling effigy of Sir John Clerke, of Weston, who, according to the legend, took prisoner Louis of Orleans, Duke of Longueville, in the reign of Henry VIII. The north transept is the burying-place of the Dormer family, and the south transept the sepulchral chapel of the Quatremains, and both contain handsome monuments. Lord Williams, in 1558, bequeathed estates for the foundation of a free grammar school, built by his executors in 1574, near the church, and the maintenance of a master and usher: Hampden, the patriot; Dr. Fell; Justice Sir George Croke; Pocock, the learned orientalist; King, Bishop of Chichester; Anthony à Wood, the antiquary; and the notorious John Wilkes, were educated in the establishment. A free school was instituted by bequests from the second earl of Abingdon and others, and the income amounts to £26 annually; several small annuities have been left for apprenticing boys, and other benefactions, amounting to £150 per annum, for the poor. The union of Thame comprises thirty-five parishes or places, of which twenty-seven are in the county of Oxford, and eight in Bucks, altogether containing a population of 15,413. A little to the north of the church are the remains of the prebendal house originally attached to the monastery at Thame-Park, and which, till 1837, consisted of nearly three sides of a quadrangle; but in that year, Mr. Charles Stone converted the remains into a mansion-house, retaining the original character and grandeur of the ancient edifice, and in 1840 restored the chapel, at the east end of which is a triple lancet window circumscribed by a circular arch. George Hetheridge, an eminent Hebraist and Grecian in the reign of Elizabeth, and regius professor of Greek at Corpus Christi College, Oxford; and Lord Chief Justice Holt, were natives of the town.

THAMES-DITTON.—See DITTON, THAMES.

THANINGTON (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of BRIDGE, partly within the boundary of the city of CANTERBURY, but chiefly in the hundred of WEST-GATE, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, E. division of KENT; containing, with the parish of Milton and ville of Staplegate, 512 inhabitants, of whom 389 are in the portion without the limits of the city. The ancient road called Stane-street passes through the parish; and in Wincheap-street, a suburb of Canterbury, extending into it, was the hospital of St. James, founded in the reign of John, by Archbishop Walter, for female lepers, and of which the revenue, at the Dissolution, was £46. 6. 3. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £98; patron, the Archbishop; impropriator, G. Gipps, Esq., whose tithes have been commuted for £610, and whose glebe comprises 3 acres. Some small remains of the hospital still exist.

THARSTON (St. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of DEPWADE, E. division of NORFOLK, 1½ mile (N. W.) from Long Stratton; containing 388 inhabitants. It comprises 1571a. 3r. 36p., of which 1234 acres are arable, 318 meadow and pasture, and 18 woodland. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 1. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Ely, the appropriator: the great tithes have been commuted for £420, and the vicarial for £120, and the glebe comprises 5½ acres. The church is an ancient structure in the early and later English styles.

THATCHAM (St. LUKE), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union of NEWBURY, partly in the hundred of FAIRCROSS, but chiefly in that of READING, county of BERKS, 3 miles (E.) from Newbury; containing, with the chapelries of Greenham and Midgham, 4250 inhabitants, of whom 2677 are in Thatcham township. This place appears, from the Norman survey, to have been once a town of some importance; and tradition has assigned to it the rank of a borough, but there is no proof that it ever sent representatives to parliament. A market on Sunday was confirmed by charter of Henry II., to the abbot or monks of Reading, then possessors of Thatcham, and was changed to Thursday in 1218, by Henry III., but it has long been discontinued: the remains of the butter-cross still exist. The parish comprises 10,925*a.* 1*r.* 32*p.*: the town is pleasantly situated near the navigable river Kennet, on the Bath road, and the inhabitants are well supplied with water. The Kennet and Avon canal passes a little to the southward; there is a paper-mill at Colthrop, which affords employment to 80 persons, and a statute-fair is held on the first Tuesday after October 12th. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £20; patron, J. Hanbury, Esq.; impropiators, various proprietors of land: the vicarial tithes have been commuted for £735, and the impropriate for £806. 1. 7. The church has some portions in the early, and some in the later, English style; at the south entrance is a fine Norman arch, and in the interior are an altar-tomb to the memory of William Danvers, chief justice of the court of common pleas, and a mural monument to Nicholas Fuller, Esq., barrister of Gray's Inn. At Greenham and Midgham are chapels of ease; and at Crookham, or Crokeham, was formerly another, of which there are no remains. The Independents have a place of worship. A free school was founded in 1707, by Lady Frances Winchcomb, who gave a rent-charge of £53, and it was opened about 1713, but continued only for a few years, in consequence of the attainder of Lord Bolingbroke, owner of the estate charged. In 1741, however, arrears were recovered, since which period the funds have continued to increase, the amount of stock being now upwards of £5000, exclusively of the rent-charge, which is regularly received; the school was re-opened in June, 1794, and is now united with a national school.

THAXTED (St. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of DUNMOW, N. division of ESSEX, 19 miles (N. N. W.) from Chelmsford; containing 2527 inhabitants. This parish, which is of considerable extent, lies on the Chelmer, near its source, and on the road from Chelmsford to Cambridge. The village, which is large and pleasantly situated on the banks of the river, and contains several well-built houses, was formerly a town of importance, and received a charter from Philip and Mary, vesting the government in a mayor, recorder, two bailiffs, and a council of 20 principal burgesses; but on a writ of quo warranto issued by James II., the corporation resigned their functions, and the market, which was on Thursday, was discontinued. The market was subsequently revived, but it never recovered its early celebrity: fairs are held on the 27th of May and 10th of August, the latter for cattle. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £24; net income, £450; patron and impropiator, Viscount Maynard, whose ancestor gave £2000 in augmentation of the vicarage. The church is a spacious embattled structure, strengthened by buttresses terminating in canopied niches, in the later English style, and having a tower and crocketed spire 183 feet high, the exact length of the church; the south porch is much enriched. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, and Independents. A free grammar school, founded by Thomas Yardley, is now merged into a national school; and near the church are almshouses for 16 persons, partly supported by donations from various charity funds. Some Roman coins, and a beautiful amphora, were discovered some years since.

THEAKSTONE, a township, in the parish of BURNESTON, union of BEDALE, wapentake of HALLIKELD, N. riding of YORK, 3¼ miles (S. E. by E.) from Bedale; containing 78 inhabitants. The township comprises 935*a.* 1*r.* 31*p.* The Hall is a handsome mansion, near which are several thriving plantations, and the Duke of Cleveland has property here called the Grange. The village is pleasantly situated near a small rivulet. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £63. 14. 6., and the impropriate for £46. 12.

THEALBY, a hamlet, in the parish of BURTON-UPON-STATHER, union of GLANDFORD-BRIGG, N. division of the wapentake of MANLEY, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN; containing 207 inhabitants.

THEALE, a parish, in the union of BRADFIELD, hundred of READING, county of BERKS, 4¼ miles (W. by S.) from Reading. This place was formerly a chapelry in the parish of Tilehurst, but has been separated from it by act of parliament, and made distinct. An elegant church, in the later English style, was erected in 1830, at the expense of Mrs. Sophia Sheppard; and under the provisions of the act, the living of Tilehurst will be divided, and a portion appropriated to this church, to be attached to the headship of Magdalen College, Oxford. The Rev. Thomas Sheppard, D.D., bequeathed £20 per annum for the establishment of a school, which is conducted on the national system.

THEALE, a chapelry, in the parish of WEDMORE, union of AXBRIDGE, hundred of BEMPSTONE, E. division of SOMERSET, 7 miles (S. S. E.) from Axbridge. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £100; patron and appropriator, the Dean of Wells.

THEARNE, a township, in the parish of ST. JOHN, union, and liberties of the borough, of BEVERLEY, E. riding of YORK, 3½ miles (S. E. by E.) from Beverley; containing 88 inhabitants. The township is situated on the road from Beverley to Hull, and comprises 805 acres, of which two-thirds are arable, and one-third meadow and pasture; the surface is low and level, and the soil a strong clay, and partly moorland. The river Hull passes on the east, and at Wawn ferry, the property of Richard Dickson, Esq., who is lord of the manor of Beverley Water Towns, is a landing-place for coal, lime, and gravel. Thearne Hall is the seat of Doctor Leighton. There was anciently a chantry chapel, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, which was dissolved pursuant to the statute of Edward VI. for the dissolution of colleges and chantries.

THEBERTON (St. PETER), a parish, in the union and hundred of BLYTHING, E. division of SUFFOLK, 4 miles (N. E. by E.) from Saxmundham; containing 580 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 1945 acres, chiefly of a light and mixed soil, but in some parts wet and heavy; the surface is generally flat. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £26. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £427, and there are 13½ acres of glebe. The church has a round tower and other ancient details of Norman character; a new gallery was erected in 1840.

THEDDINGWORTH (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of MARKET-HARBOROUGH, partly in the hundred of ROTHWELL, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, but chiefly in the hundred of GARTREE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Harborough; containing, with the hamlet of Hothorpe, 270 inhabitants, of whom 254 are in Theddingworth township. The parish is situated on the road from Harborough to Lutterworth, and the Grand Union canal passes through the district; the scenery is in many places remarkably varied and pleasing. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 15. 7.; net income, £137; patron, J. Cook, Esq.; impropiator, Earl Spencer. The church, which is old, and in bad repair, has a very handsome spire, and contains some monuments to members of the Bathurst family. There is a place of worship for Independents. An allotment of 25 acres of land, made under an inclosure act of 1715, is partly let out to cottagers, and partly given for depasturing cattle; the proceeds of the first portion, and a sum of £12. 12. per annum, arising from several bequests, are distributed among the poor.

THEDDLETHORPE (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, Marsh division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Alford; containing 326 inhabitants. It is situated on the sea-coast, and comprises 1684*a.* 3*p.* The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 5. $2\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £98; patron and impropiator, J. Alcock, Esq., whose tithes have been commuted for £400. The parish participates in the benefit of the school and land in the adjoining parish of St. Helen; and a few sums of small amount are distributed among the poor, and applied to the repair of the church.

THEDDLETHORPE (ST. HELEN), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, Marsh division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $9\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Alford; containing 347 inhabitants, and comprising 1758*a.* 2*r.* 32*p.*, on the sea-coast. The living is a rectory, with that of Mablethorpe St. Peter, united in 1745, valued in the king's books at £18. 10. $2\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £498; patron, Lord Willoughby de Eresby. There are $36\frac{1}{2}$ acres of glebe, with a house. The Wesleyans have a place of worship. A school-house was erected in 1810, the gift of Mr. Bonyer; and a few small rent-charges are distributed to the poor.

THELBRIDGE (ST. DAVID), a parish, in the union of CREDITON, hundred of WITHERIDGE, South Molton and N. divisions of DEVON, 2 miles (S. W. by W.) from Witheridge; containing 267 inhabitants. The parish is intersected by the road from Crediton to South Molton and Barnstaple. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 6. $5\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £198; patron, G. Tanner, Esq.: the glebe consists of about 130 acres, with a small house. The church is a very old edifice.

THELNETHAM (ST. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of THETFORD, hundred of BLACKBOURN, W. division of SUFFOLK, 6 miles (S. S. E.) from East Harling; containing 561 inhabitants. It is bounded on the north by the Lesser Ouse, which separates the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 18. 4.; net income, £508; patron, the Rev. E. H. Sawbridge. There is a glebe of about 22 acres, and a commodious house was erected in 1840, by the patron. The church is in the decorated style, with an embattled tower, and contains, in the south aisle, a handsome marble monument to the memory of Henry Bokenham, Esq., and his lady. An allotment of 28 acres of land, now let for £32. 12. per annum, was appropriated to parochial purposes, under an inclosure act, in 1821, together with another of about 40 acres, assigned for cutting turf.

THELVETON (ST. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of DEPWADE, hundred of DISS, E. division of NORFOLK, 3 miles (E. by N.) from Diss; containing 169 inhabitants. It is intersected by the road from London to Norwich, by way of Scole, and comprises 1200 acres, of which about one-third is pasture. The Hall is an ancient mansion, in the Elizabethan style. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £9, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £290, and there are $8\frac{1}{2}$ acres of glebe. The church is in the decorated style, and is situated in the grounds belonging to the Hall, attached to which is a neat Roman Catholic chapel.

THELWALL, a chapelry, in the parish and union of RUNCORN, hundred of BUCKLOW, N. division of the county of CHESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Warrington; containing 334 inhabitants. This was formerly a considerable town: the Duke of Bridgewater's canal passes in the vicinity, and the Mersey forms its northern boundary, on the south bank of which river are some gunpowder-mills. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £83; patron, T. A. Pickering, Esq.

THEMELTHORPE (ST. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of AYLISHAM, hundred of EYNSFORD, E. division of NORFOLK, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (E. by S.) from Foulsham; containing 94 inhabitants. It comprises 652*a.* 3*r.* 23*p.*, of which 386 acres are arable, 249 pasture and meadow, $2\frac{1}{2}$ woodland, and 10 gardens, &c. The living is a discharged rectory, annexed to that of Bintree, and valued in the king's books at £4. 2. $8\frac{1}{2}$.: the tithes have been commuted for £131, and the glebe comprises 19 acres. The church is chiefly in the early English style.

THENFORD (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of BRACKLEY, hundred of KING'S-SUTTON, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Banbury; containing 155 inhabitants. The parish is situated near the road from Banbury to Brackley, and comprises 882*a.* 8*p.*: lace-making is carried on to an considerable extent. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Crown, with a net income of £120: the tithes were commuted for land in 1776; there are about 60 acres. A school is supported by Mr. Severne; and the produce of about 11 acres of land, left by Mr. Tooley, is distributed among the poor. There is a mineral spring.

THEOBALD-STREET, a hamlet, in the parish of ALDENHAM, union of WATFORD, hundred of CASHIO, or liberty of ST. ALBAN'S, county of HERTFORD; containing 62 inhabitants.

THERFIELD (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of ROYSTON, hundred of ODSEY, county of HERTFORD, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Royston; containing 1224 inhabitants. The parish comprises 4761 acres, of which 456 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £50, and in the gift of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, London: the tithes have been commuted for £1100, and there is a parsonage-house, with a glebe containing 91 acres.

THETFORD, a chapelry, in the parish of STRETHAM, hundred of SOUTH WITCHFORD, union and ISLE of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Ely; containing 250 inhabitants. It comprises 1042 acres, of which 481 are common or waste land. The chapel is dedicated to St. George. A rent-charge of £124. 17. has been awarded as a commutation for the tithes.

Arms.

ford by the Saxons, evidently derives its name from the river Thet, that here unites its stream with the Lesser Ouse, which then passes through the town, separates the two counties, and is navigable hence to Lynn. The majority of antiquaries consider it to be the site of the celebrated Sitomagus of the Romans, who possessed it in 435, and it is known to have been the metropolis of East Anglia; on which account, and from its proximity to the North Sea, it was frequently, during the heptarchy, desolated by the Danes, who, having retained possession of the town for fifty years, totally destroyed it by fire in the ninth century. In 1004, it sustained a similar calamity from their king, Sweyn, who had invaded East Anglia; and in 1010 it became, for the third time, the scene of plunder and conflagration by these marauders, into whose hands it again fell, after a signal victory, which they had obtained over the Saxons. In the reign of Canute, Thetford began to recover from the effects of these repeated calamities, and in that of Edward the Confessor had nearly regained its former prosperity, containing not less than 944 burgesses, who enjoyed various privileges. In the time of the Conqueror (in 1070), the episcopal see of North Elmham was transferred hither, and was removed to Norwich, by Herbert de Losigna, in the year 1093; but Henry VIII. made it the seat of a bishop suffragan to Norwich, which it continued during his reign. From the time of Athelstan to that of John here was a mint, in which coins of Edmund and Canute were struck; and the ancient extent and importance of the town may be gathered from the fact that, in the reign of Edward III., it comprised twenty-four principal streets, five market-places, twenty churches, six hospitals, eight monasteries, and other religious and charitable foundations, of all which there are comparatively but few remains. Thetford has been honoured with the presence and temporary residence of several British sovereigns, particularly Henry I. and II., and Elizabeth, who rebuilt the ancient mansion of the earls of Warren, on its lapse to the crown, and occasionally resided in it, as did also James I. for the purpose of hunting; and it is still called the King's House.

The town, which has of late been much improved, comprises five principal streets, partly paved, and is connected with the few remaining houses on the Suffolk side by a handsome iron bridge over the Ouse, erected in 1829; the modern buildings are plain and neat, and the inhabitants are supplied with water from wells and springs. At the eastern end of the town is a chalybeate spring, where a fine suite of baths has been erected by subscription, and in the town are convenient lodgings, with every accommodation for visitors; the waters are similar to those at Tonbridge-Wells, and are in acknowledged repute. Races took place here at an early period, but from the tumults they occasioned in the former part of the 17th century, were suppressed by order of the privy council; they were, however, revived a few years since, and are held in June, upon the common, on the Suffolk side of the borough. Assemblies occasionally take place, and a subscription library is supported. In addition to a very extensive paper-mill, there are an iron-foundry, two agricultural-machine factories, good brewerics, several malting establishments, a flour-mill and a tan-yard; and the navigation of the river, in its course to Lynn, having been improved between this place and Brandon, a brisk business is carried on in corn, wool, coal, and other articles. The market is on Saturday; the market-house has been taken down and neat shambles erected, covered with cast iron, with a portico and palisades in front. Fairs are held on May 14th, August 2nd and 16th, for sheep, and September 25th, for cattle; and there is a wool-fair in the month of July.

Corporation Seal.

A charter of incorporation, granted by Elizabeth in 1573, was surrendered to the crown in the 34th of Charles II., and a very imperfect one obtained in its stead, which, in 1692, was annulled, and the original restored, by a decree in chancery. The mayor is chosen out of the corporation, which now consists of four aldermen and twelve councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76; the mayor, late mayor, and recorder are justices of the peace, and the total number of magistrates is nine. The borough sends two members to parliament: the right of election was extended in 1832, to the £10 householders of a new district; the mayor is returning officer. There has been a re-grant of a court of quarter-sessions for the borough, and petty-sessions are held by the corporation every Monday. The county assizes, which had been held here, in Lent, ever since 1176, were removed a few years since. The guildhall is a fine old building, erected at the expense of Sir Joseph Williamson, Knt., secretary of state to Charles II.; and the gaol is a plain edifice of flint and white brick, commodiously arranged: on these buildings many thousand pounds have been expended by the inhabitants.

Thetford comprises the parishes of St. Cuthbert, containing 1543; St. Peter, 1184; and St. Mary the Less, 1207 inhabitants; the livings of all which are in the patronage of the Duke of Norfolk. St. Cuthbert's is a discharged perpetual curacy, with the rectory of the Holy Trinity united; net income, £50. The church contains a nave, chancel, and south aisle, with an embattled tower. The living of St. Peter's is a discharged rectory, with that of St. Nicholas' united, valued in the king's books at £5. 1. 5½.; net income, £55. The church, commonly called "the black church," being constructed chiefly of flint, comprises a nave, chancel, and north aisle, with an embattled tower, which, with part of the body of the edifice, was rebuilt in 1789. The living of the parish of St. Mary the Less is a perpetual curacy, valued in the king's books at £1. 13. 6½.; net income, £83; impropiators, the Duke of Norfolk and others. The church, which stands in Suffolk, consists of a nave and chancel, with a square tower. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, Wesleyans, and Roman Catholics. A preacher-ship in St. Mary's church, a grammar school, and an hospital for two men and two women, were founded and endowed in 1610, under the will of Sir Richard Fulmerston, Knt., who died in 1566, having bequeathed property, the income arising from which now amounts to £555 per annum. Some boys and girls are apprenticed from a fund of £2000, vested in an estate now producing £290 per annum, left by Sir J. Williamson, in 1701. In 1818, Mr. P. Sterne bequeathed £1000, for the benefit of the poor; and about £70, derived from the inclosure of the common, are yearly distributed with several minor benefactions. The union of Thetford comprises 34 parishes or places, of which 19 are in Norfolk, and 15 in Suffolk; and contains a population of 17,542.

The relics of ANTIQUITY consist chiefly of the fragments of a nunnery established in the reign of Canute, by Urius, the first abbot of Bury St. Edmund's; some of the walls, buttresses, and windows, with a fine arch and cell, are still visible, the conventual church having been converted into a barn, and a farm-house built with the other ruinous portions. Of a priory founded on the brink of the river, in 1104, by Roger Bigot, for Cluniac monks, and which at the Dissolution was valued at £418. 16. 3., the gateway, constructed with freestone and black flint, and parts of the church, which was cruciform, alone remain. Of the monastery of St. Sepulchre, instituted in 1109, by the Earl of Warren, and further endowed by Henry II., the church has been converted into a barn; and the site of St. Augustine's friary, founded in 1387, by John of Gaunt, for mendicants of that order, still bears the name of Friars' Close. At the eastern extremity of the town are remains of an ancient Danish fortification, which consisted of a large keep and double rampart, erected on an artificial mount called Castle Hill, of which the height is 100 feet, and the circumference of the summit 81 feet, and of the base 984; the remains of the ramparts are 20 feet high, and the surrounding fosse 70 feet wide. It is somewhat singular that no trace of any steps, or path, by which military stores could be conveyed up the very steep ascent to the fortress, is visible. A mineral spring, the properties of which are similar to those of Tonbridge, was discovered here about 80 years since, by Matthew Manning, Esq., M.D., and at that time was much resorted to; it was afterwards shut up for many years, but in 1819 was re-opened, and the waters having been again analysed, were found to be very effectual in strengthening the stomach. A handsome pump-room was erected, to which hot and cold baths are attached, situated near the river side, and approached by pleasant sheltered walks, but for want of sufficient patronage at present closed. Thomas Martin, F.A.S., and author of the History of Thetford, was born here in 1696, and educated at the free school, of which his father was master. The notorious Thomas Paine, author of the Rights of Man, was also born here, and educated at the school.

THICKLEY, EAST, a township, in the parish of ST. ANDREW AUCKLAND, district of SHILDON, union of AUCKLAND, N. W. division of DARLINGTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM, 4¼ miles (S. E.) from Bishop-Auckland; containing 452 inhabitants. This place, according to the Boldon book, was severed from the manor of Redworth, and belonged for many generations to the Lilburn family, of whom was Col. Lilburn, a celebrated leader on the side of the parliament in the civil war. The township comprises about 260 acres: the Stockton and Darlington railway passes in the vicinity of the village.

THIMBLEBY (ST. MARGARET), a parish, in the union and soke of HORNCASTLE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 1½ mile (W. by N.) from Horncastle; containing 398 inhabitants. This parish, through which passes the road from Lincoln to Horncastle, is bounded on the west by the navigable river Witham, and comprises 2557a. 1r. 38p. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 10. 10.; net income, £441; patron, T. Hotchkin, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for land, and a parsonage-house was erected on the glebe in 1839. The church was built in 1744, partly by money raised from a brief, and partly by the sale of the materials of the old edifice. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Roman coins have been found; and many fossil shells, ammonites, &c., have been discovered in the blue clay upon the moor.

THIMBLEBY, a township, in the parish of OSMOTHERLEY, union of NORTH-ALLERTON, wapentake of ALLERTONSHIRE, N. riding of YORK, 5½ miles (E. N. E.) from North-Allerton; containing 172 inhabitants, many of whom are employed in the manufacture of worsted. It comprises about 1670 acres, including the hamlet of Foxton, which is situated in the fertile vale of the Codbeck stream: the village, which is secluded, lies under the western acclivities of the Hamilton hills, and about one mile south from Osmotherley.

THINGDON.—See FINEDON.

THINGWELL, a township, in the parish of WOODCHURCH, union, and Lower division of the hundred, of WIRRAL, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 5½ miles (N. by W.) from Great Neston; containing 76 inhabitants.

THIRKLEBY, a township, in the parish of KIRBYGRINDALYTH, union of MALTON, wapentake of BUCKROSE, E. riding of YORK, 10 miles (E. by S.) from Malton; containing 53 inhabitants. The lands, which are laid out in two farms, comprise about 1800 acres, the property of Sir Tatton Sykes, Bart.

THIRKLEBY (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of THIRSK, wapentake of BIRDFORTH, N. riding of YORK, 4 miles (S. E. by E.) from Thirsk; containing, with the hamlet of Osgoodby, 309 inhabitants. The parish contains the villages of Great and Little Thirkleby, separated from each other by a stream, and comprises about 1800 acres of land: in Osgoodby are several principal farm-houses. The Great North of England railway passes close by Sessay, which is distant southward about three miles. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6; net income, £200; patron and appropriator, the Archbishop of York. The glebe comprises between 30 and 40 acres, to which there is a house; and a modus of £1 is paid to the vicar for the tithes of Osgoodby. The church was rebuilt in the year 1722, by Sir Thomas Frankland, Bart.

THIRLBY, a township, in the parish of FELIX-KIRK, union of THIRSK, wapentake of BIRDFORTH, N. riding of YORK, 5 miles (E. N. E.) from Thirsk; containing 127 inhabitants. It comprises about 506 acres of land, and its scattered village lies in a secluded valley, about a mile south-east of Felix-Kirk.

THIRLWALL, a township, in the parish and union of HALTWHISTLE, W. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 4 miles (W. N. W.) from Haltwhistle; containing 394 inhabitants. It has its name from the Roman thralling or barrier wall running through it; to thirl, in the old Northumberland dialect, signifying to bind or enthrall. Its proprietors in remote times were called barons, and held under the kings of Scotland as lords of Tindale; the church of Hexham acquired lands here at an early period, and the Swinburnes had possessions within the manor in the time of Edward I., and, by marriage with the Thirlwalls, became possessed of the whole estate, which they afterwards sold to Henry, Earl of Carlisle. Mention of a castle first occurs in 1369. The township comprises 7765 acres of land on the eastern side of the river Irthing, which separates this county from Cumberland. Wardrew, an ancient mansion here, has been handsomely fitted up, to accommodate visitors who resort to the adjacent spas of Gilsland. On the western bank of the Tippal burn, which is here crossed by the great wall, are the ruins of the once strong castle, occupying the summit of a rocky knoll, and formerly one of the boundary forts between England and Scotland; the walls were nine feet thick, vaulted within, and defended by an outer wall of great strength. At the Gap, in the township, is a place of worship for Methodists.

THIRN, a township, in the parish of THORNTON-WATLASS, union of LEYBURN, wapentake of HANG-EAST, N. riding of YORK, 4 miles (S. W. by W.) from Bedale; containing 138 inhabitants, and comprising 613a. 3r. 14p. of land. The village is about a mile distant from that of Thornton-Watlass, and near the river Ure, which passes on the west.

THIRNE, a parish, in the EAST and WEST FLEGG incorporation, hundred of WEST FLEGG, E. division of NORFOLK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Acle; containing 177 inhabitants. The village is near the confluence of the Bure and Thirne rivers. The living is a rectory, annexed to Ashby and Oby, and valued in the king's books at £5. The church, which stands on an eminence, is partly in the decorated and partly in the later English style, and consists of a nave and chancel, with a square tower. At the inclosure, 18 acres were allotted to the poor, the proceeds of which, with £6 per annum from an unknown benefactor, are distributed in coal.

THIRNTOFT, a township, in the parish of AIN-DERBY-STEEPLE, union of NORTH-ALLERTON, wapentake of GILLING-EAST, N. riding of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from North-Allerton; containing 164 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 1153 acres of productive land. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £189, and there is a glebe of $3\frac{3}{4}$ acres.

THIRSK (St. MARY), a borough, market-town, and parish, and the head of a union, in the wapentake of BIRDFORTH, N. riding of YORK; containing, with the chapelries of Carlton-Miniott, Sand-Hutton, and Sowerby, 4599 inhabitants, of whom 3020 are in the borough, 23 miles (N. W. by N.) from York, and 223 (N. N. W.) from London. The name of this place is supposed to be derived from Tre Isk, two ancient British words signifying a town and river or brook. A strong and extensive castle was erected here about 979, by the ancient family of Mowbray, on which Roger de Mowbray, in the time of Henry II., having become a confederate of the King of Scotland, erected his standard against his lawful sovereign: upon the suppression of the revolt, this fortress, with many others, was entirely demolished by order of the king. In the reign of Henry VII., during a popular commotion, Henry Percy, Earl of Northumberland, and lieutenant of this county, is said to have been put to death here, beneath a very ancient elm-tree, which formerly grew on Elm Green. The town is situated on the road from York to Darlington, nearly in the centre of the vale of Mowbray, a tract of country remarkable for the fertility of its soil, and the picturesque beauty and richness of its scenery; it consists of the Old and the New towns, separated by a small stream called Cod beck, over which are two substantial stone bridges. A neat gravel-walk across the fields to the village of Sowerby commands a fine prospect of the surrounding country, terminated by the Hambleton hills, and is the favourite promenade of the inhabitants. At the south-western extremity of the town, the moat and rampart, together with some subterranean vaults, and the site of the court-yard of the castle, still exist. Within the precincts of this ancient fortress New Thirsk is situated, with its spacious market-place in the centre. The Old town, which alone is included in the borough, is on the north-east bank of the stream, and consists of a long range of cottages on each side of the road from York to Yarm and Stockton, and two squares surrounded by similar buildings, one called St. James's Green, where the cattle-fairs are held, the other formerly comprising an ancient chapel dedicated to St. James. A small quantity of coarse linen and sacking is manufactured. One of the stations on the Great Northern railway is situated about a mile from the town.

The market is on Monday, and is a large one for provisions, of which great quantities purchased here are carried for sale to Leeds and other places. Fairs are held on Shrove-Monday and April 4th and 5th, for cattle, sheep, leather, &c.; Easter-Monday and Whit-Monday, for woollen-cloth, toys, &c.; and August 4th and 5th, October 28th and 29th, and the first Tuesday after Dec. 11th, for cattle, sheep, and leather. The municipal regulations are vested in a bailiff, chosen by the burgage-holders, and sworn in before the steward of the lord of the manor, who holds a court leet at Michaelmas, for that and other purposes. Old Thirsk, a borough by prescription, first sent members to parliament in the 23rd of Edward I., but made no other return till the last parliament of Edward VI.; under the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, it now sends only one, elected by the £10 householders of an enlarged district comprising 8570 acres, and the bailiff is returning officer. The parish contains 3100*a.* 3*r.* 26*p.*, of which about 1818 acres are arable, 1153 pasture, and 61 woodland and common. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £137; patron and appropriator, the Archbishop of York. The church, situated at the northern extremity of the New town, is a spacious and handsome structure in the later English style, with a lofty embattled tower at the west end, and is supposed to have been constructed from the ruins of the castle. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyans. The poor law union of Thirsk comprises 40 parishes or places, and contains a population of 12,639.

THIRSTON, NORTHUMBERLAND.—See THRISTON.

THIRTLEBY, a township, in the parish of SWINE, union of SKIRLAUGH, Middle division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, E. riding of YORK, 6 miles (N. E.) from Hull; containing 58 inhabitants. The township comprises by computation 1010 acres, the property of various freeholders: the village is east of the road from Hull to Coniston. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £68. 18. 6.

THISTLETON, with GREENHALGH, a township, in the parish of KIRKHAM, union of the FYLDE, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 4½ miles (N. N. W.) from Kirkham; containing 371 inhabitants. The tithes of Thistleton have been commuted for £121. 13., of which £99 are payable to Christ-Church, Oxford, and £22. 1. 8. to the vicar.

THISTLETON (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of OAKHAM, hundred of ALSTOE, county of RUTLAND, 8 miles (N. N. E.) from Oakham; containing 161 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £3. 11. 0½.; net income, £118; patron, G. Fludyer, Esq. The Rev. Henry Foster, in 1692, bequeathed land producing upwards of £10 per annum, in support of a school, now conducted on the national system.

THIXENDALE, a township, in the parish of WHARRAM-PERCY, union of POKKLINGTON, wapentake of BUCKROSE, E. riding of YORK, 8¾ miles (S. S. E.) from Malton; containing 239 inhabitants. It comprises about 3160 acres of land, of which a large part is the property of Sir Tatton Sykes, Bart., who is lord of the manor. The village is scattered, at the junction of sixteen deep and narrow dales, from which the township is supposed to have derived its name; and is distant about two miles south-south-east of Wharram-Percy.

THOCKRINGTON, a parish, in the union of BELLINGHAM, N. E. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND; containing, with the townships of Little Bavington, Cary-Coats, and Sweethope, 193 inhabitants, of whom 42 are in Thockrington township, 10½ miles (N. by E.) from Hexham. This parish, which is bounded on the west by the Roman Watling-street, comprises 6814 acres, and in elevated situations commands extensive views over a fine and well-cultivated country. There are some freestone and limestone quarries, the produce of which is used for building and for making lime; a very excellent coal-mine is in operation, and here is also a rich lead-mine, but not at present worked. The small hamlet which is the head of the parish is said to have been once a good village, containing numerous farmers. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Rev. Sir Robert Affleck (the impropiator), with a net income of £48: the glebe is situated near East Woodburn, upon the banks of the Rede, and consists of 155 acres. The church is a very ancient edifice, standing on a lofty eminence. There is a place of worship for Primitive Methodists. A stone about 5½ feet long, and neatly chiselled at one end, supposed to have been used by the Romans, was found on the Watling-street, two feet below the surface, by some workmen, in 1839. About 100 yards to the south of the spot, Mr. Forster, M.P., met about twenty gentlemen on the 6th of October, 1715, and after leading them to some rising ground on the north side of the waterfalls, and being joined by the Earl of Derwentwater, with his servants and attendants all mounted and well armed, harangued them on the advantages of raising Prince James Stuart to the throne. W. G. Shafto, Esq., the proprietor of the Cary-Coats estate, who lately built the Hall in a splendid manner, and richly embellished the grounds, has caused the stone discovered on the Watling-street to be set up in the place where Mr. Forster addressed his followers.

THOLTHORP, a township, in the parish of ALNE, union of EASINGWOULD, wapentake of BULMER, N. riding of YORK, 4½ miles (S. W.) from Easingwould; containing 300 inhabitants. The township comprises by computation about 3000 acres: the village is situated on the small river Linton, and on the western side of the Forest of Galtres. The tithes were commuted for land and an annual money payment in 1800. A school was built by subscription in 1834.

THOMAS-CLOSE, a township, in the parish of HUTTON-IN-THE-FOREST, union of PENRITH, LEATH ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND, 8¾ miles (N. W. by N.) from Penrith; containing 99 inhabitants.

THOMAS, ST., THE APOSTLE, a parish, in the union, and adjoining the borough, of LAUNCESTON, N. division of the hundred of EAST, E. division of CORNWALL; containing, with the hamlet of St. Thomas Street, 1125 inhabitants, of whom 366 are in the hamlet of St. Thomas the Apostle. Building-stone is quarried, and manganese is partially worked. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £83; patrons, the Inhabitants. The great tithes of the parish of St. Clether were purchased for the curacy with Queen Anne's Bounty, and tithes upon certain fields and orchards in this parish also belong to it. The Launceston grammar school, and a national school for the parishes of Launceston, St. Thomas, and St. Stephen, are situated in the parish; and there is also a British and Foreign school. A priory was founded here by Bishop Warlewast, who, in 1126, removed to it an establishment of secular canons which had previously existed at St. Stephen's: upon the Dissolution its revenue was estimated at £354. 0. 11. At Kestelwood are vestiges of ancient earthworks.

THOMAS, ST., THE APOSTLE, a parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of WONFORD, Wonford and S. divisions of DEVON, ½ a mile (S. by W.) from Exeter; containing, with the chapelry of Oldridge, 4301 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the east by the river Exe, from which the Exeter canal passes to the southward. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11. 2. 8½., and in the patronage of James W.

Buller, Esq., with a net income of £237: all the tithes, which have been commuted for £700, belong to Mr. Buller, who pays a stipend to the incumbent. The church, erected in 1412, and enlarged in 1829, is in the later English style, and contains 1000 sittings, 250 of which are free. There is a chapel at Oldridge, built and endowed by J. Buller, Esq., and containing 50 sittings; and another has been just erected at the village of Exwick, to contain 180 sittings. The poor law union comprises 49 parishes or places, and contains a population of 47,105. A small priory of Black canons, a cell to that of Plympton, was founded in the time of Henry III., in honour of the Blessed Virgin, and stood partly in this parish, and partly in that of Alphington.

THOMLEY, a hamlet, in the parish of WATERPERRY, union of THAME, hundred of BULLINGDON, county of OXFORD; containing 13 inhabitants.

THOMPSON (St. MARTIN), a parish, in the union and hundred of WAYLAND, W. division of NORFOLK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Watton; containing 490 inhabitants, and comprising about 1946 acres. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £49; patron and improPRIATOR, H. D. Emsworth, Esq. The church is in the early and decorated English styles, with a lofty square embattled tower, and a south transept; on the south side of the chancel are three sedilia of stone, and a piscina of elegant design. Nineteen acres of land, producing £30 per annum, have been allotted to the poor. Sir Thomas de Shardelow, Knt., and his brother, about 1349, founded a chantry or college in honour of the Blessed Virgin and All Saints, for a master and five chaplains, whose revenue, at the Dissolution, was valued at £52. 15. 7.: the remains have been converted into a farm-house.

THOMPSON'S-WALL, with COULDSMOUTH, a township, in the parish of KIRK-NEWTON, union of GLENDALE, W. division of GLENDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Wooler; containing 38 inhabitants. It is situated on the south side of the Beaumont river, and about two miles and a half westward of Kirk-Newton.

THOMPSON (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of BLANDFORD, hundred of COOMBS-DITCH, Blandford division of DORSET, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Blandford-Forum; containing 48 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 8. 9., and in the gift of William John Bankes, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £84, and the glebe comprises about an acre. The church, a small brick edifice, circular at the east end, was wholly rebuilt and pewed by Archbishop Wake.

THONG, NETHER, a township, in the parish of ALMONDBURY, union of HUDDERSFIELD, Upper division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, W. riding of YORK, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Huddersfield; containing 1156 inhabitants. The township comprises about 875 acres, of which the soil is fertile, and in good cultivation; the village is pleasantly situated on an acclivity, and the inhabitants are chiefly employed in the woollen manufacture. A district church, dedicated to All Saints, was erected in 1830, at an expense of £2869, of which £2500 were granted by the Parliamentary Commissioners, and the remainder raised by subscription; it is a neat structure in the early English style, with a campanile turret, and contains 700 sittings, of which 320 are free. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Almondbury, with a net income of £150; impropriators, the Governors of Clitheroe school. A school is supported by subscription.

THONG, UPPER, a township, in the parish of ALMONDBURY, union of HUDDERSFIELD, Upper division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, W. riding of YORK, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Huddersfield; containing 2258 inhabitants. The township contains 3045*a. 1r. 10p.*, and includes part of the village of Holmfirth, which is chiefly in the parish of Kirk-Burton. The village of Upper Thong, seated on an eminence, is well built, containing many modern houses; and the inhabitants are chiefly employed in the manufacture of woollen goods. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans; and a school is supported by subscription.

THORALBY, a township, in the parish of AYSGARTH, wapentake of HANG-WEST, N. riding of YORK, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Middleham; containing 299 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 3000 acres of land, rising into lofty moorland fells; the village lies on the west side of Bishop's-dale. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £69, payable to Trinity College, Cambridge. The Wesleyans have a place of worship; and a national school has been recently erected at Cross-lanes.

THORESBY, NORTH (St. HELEN), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, wapentake of BRADLEY-HAVERSTOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 8 miles (N. by W.) from Louth; containing 623 inhabitants. The parish comprises by admeasurement 2485 acres, of which 480 are common or waste: the road from Louth to Grimsby runs along its western extremity, and the Louth canal passes about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the village, for a short distance through the eastern part of the parish. A pleasure-fair is held on Holy-Thursday. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £24. 10. 10., and in the gift of the incumbent, the Rev. H. Bassett: the tithes have been commuted for £441. 13., and the glebe contains 54*a. 3r. 37p.*, on which a parsonage-house has been recently built. The church is very ancient, with a chancel of more modern date. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists. Dr. Robert Mapletoft, in 1676, bequeathed 47 acres of land, producing £30 per annum, for the endowment of a free school; and £17, from Mrs. F. Smith's charity, are annually distributed among the poor.

THORESBY, SOUTH (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, Marsh division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 4 miles (W. by N.) from Alford; containing 138 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 906 acres; the substratum is chiefly limestone, quarried for burning into lime, and there are some pits of good gravel, in which are found the fossil remains of the nautilus. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 3. $6\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, with a net income of £214; the glebe comprises $22\frac{1}{2}$ acres, and there is a parsonage-house. The church is a neat structure of brick, rebuilt in 1738.

THORESTHORPE, a hamlet, in the parish of SALEBY, union of LOUTH, Wold division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (N. N. E.) from Alford; containing 53 inhabitants. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1803.

THORESWAY (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of CAISTOR, S. division of the wapentake of WALSHCROFT, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 5 miles (S. E.) from Caistor; containing 189 inhabitants. This place, which derives its name from Thor, a Scandinavian deity who presided over desolate parts, was formerly included in the duchy of Lancaster, and was given in 1644 by Charles I. to Sir John Colepeper, who was by that king created a baron, of Thoresway, as a reward for his services in the royal cause, and whose descendants continued to bear the title till 1725, when the fourth baron died without issue. A great portion of the parish was once a rabbit-warren, but this has been brought into an excellent state of cultivation by the application of bone manure, and the whole of Thoresway now comprises 2845 acres of good land, of which 2645 are arable, 130 pasture, and 70 plantation; the surface is hilly, and the village is situated in a picturesque valley of the wolds. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 10. 10., and in the gift of the Crown, with a net income of £493, derived from 686 acres of land assigned at the inclosure in lieu of tithes, and a glebe-house erected in 1840. The church is a small edifice, suited to the wants of the population.

THORGANBY (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of CAISTOR, S. division of the wapentake of WALSHCROFT, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Caistor; containing 116 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1400*a. 3r. 9p.*, of which four-fifths are arable, and the rest grass and plantations; the surface is undulated, and the scenery picturesque; the soil is chalky, producing barley, wheat, and oats, and limestone is procured for building purposes, and lime for manure. Thorganby Hall, formerly the seat of the Willoughbys, and lately the residence of Theophilus Harneis, Esq., is an ancient and handsome mansion of stone, situated in well-wooded grounds commanding fine prospects. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 0. 10., and in the gift of the Earl of Yarborough, who is lord of the manor and owner of the entire parish; the tithes have been commuted for £85. The church is a small structure, recently improved. Six skeletons, with swords and spears near them, of ancient character, were found in 1832.

THORGANBY (ST. ELEN), a parish, in the union of YORK, wapentake of OUSE and DERWENT, E. riding of YORK, $9\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from York; containing, with the township of West Cottingwith, 373 inhabitants. This place, which is of some antiquity, for a considerable period consisted only of three houses, of which one was the Benedictine priory of Thicket, founded by Roger Fitz-Roger in the reign of Richard I., and which continued to flourish till the Dissolution, when its revenue was returned at £23. 12. 2. The site, together with the conventual buildings and lands, was granted in the 33rd of Henry VIII. to John Aske, to whose family the patronage or foundership had descended from the Hayes; there are but few remains of the ancient buildings, and in 1822 a handsome mansion of brick, called Thicket Priory, was erected on the site, and is now the seat of the Rev. Joseph Dunnington Jefferson, who is lord of the manor and incumbent. The parish comprises 3039*a. 2r. 22p.*, of which about 2430 acres are arable, 557 meadow and pasture, and 52 woodland and plantations; the surface is generally flat, but the scenery, which is enriched with wood, is of pleasing character; the soil is partly clay, and partly a sandy loam, in good cultivation. The village is pleasantly situated near the river Derwent, which is navigable. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £50; patron and impropiator, the Rev. Mr. Jefferson. The church, an ancient structure in the Norman style, is in a very perfect state of repair. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A parochial school was founded in 1733, by Thomas Dunnington, Esq., who bequeathed a house and garden, with an endowment in money, which was augmented with £10. 10. per annum, by Robert Jefferson, Esq., for the instruction of eight additional children.

THORINGTON (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union and hundred of BLYTHING, E. division of SUFFOLK, 4 miles (S. E.) from Halesworth; containing 157 inhabitants. It comprises about 1286 acres, of which the surface is flat, and the soil runs through several varieties. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7, and in the gift of Lieut.-Colonel Bence, who has a seat here: the tithes have been commuted for £280, and the glebe contains 11 acres. The church has a round tower, and several Norman details.

THORLBY, with STIRTON, a township, in the parish of KILDWICK, union of SKIPTON, E. division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWXCROSS, W. riding of YORK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. W. by W.) from Skipton; containing 132 inhabitants. It is on the road from Skipton to Gargrave, and the village nearly adjoins that of Stirton.

THORLEY (ST. JAMES), a parish, in the union of BISHOP-STORTFORD, hundred of BRAUGHIN, county of HERTFORD, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Bishop-Stortford; containing 396 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 13. 4.; net income, £455; patron, the Bishop of London. The church has an embattled tower surmounted by a lofty spire, and a Norman doorway on the south.

THORLEY (ST. MARY), a parish, in the liberty of WEST MEDINA, Isle of Wight division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 1 mile (E. S. E.) from Yarmouth; containing 163 inhabitants. It comprises 1518 acres, of which 1014 are arable, 359 meadow and pasture, 50 down, and 78 wood. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 18. 9.; net income, £100; patron, the Rev. James Penfold. The church, which has a belfry over the porch, was erected by Amicia, Countess of Devon, who gave it to the priory of Christchurch, in Hampshire, by which establishment it was retained till the Dissolution.

THORMANBY (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of EASINGWOULD, wapentake of BULMER, N. riding of YORK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Easingwold; containing 138 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 900 acres, partly the property of Viscount Downe: the village is intersected by the road from Easingwold to Thirsk, and is about half a mile south-east of Birdforth. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 2. 11., and in the patronage of Viscount Downe, the incumbent, whose tithes have been commuted for a rent-charge of £246; there are $38\frac{1}{2}$ acres of glebe.

THORN (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of WELLINGTON, hundred of MILVERTON, W. division of SOMERSET, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Wellington; containing 136 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation 900 acres, of which the soil in some places rests upon limestone: the Western Canal from Taunton to Tiverton passes through. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £113; patron and appropriator, the Archdeacon of Taunton: the great tithes have been commuted for £108, and the small for £54. The church was built about the year 1570.

THORN-COFFIN (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of YEovil, hundred of TINTINHULL, W. division of SOMERSET, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Yeovil; containing 87 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 5. $2\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £200; patron, the Rev. Alfred Tooke.

THORN-GUMBALD, a chapelry, in the parish of PAUL, union of PATRINGTON, S. division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, E. riding of YORK, 2 miles (S. E.) from Hedon; containing 271 inhabitants. This place, called also Thorn cum Paul, comprises about 1450 acres, partly the property of Sir T. A. C. Constable, Bart., who is lord of the manor: the village, which is of neat appearance, lies on the main road from Hedon to Patrington. There is a small chapel of ease; and the Independents have a place of worship.

THORNABY, a district, in the parish of STAIN-TON, union of STOCKTON, W. division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, N. riding of YORK, $1\frac{2}{3}$ mile (S. S. E.) from Stockton; containing, with Stockton-south-of-the-Tees, 1485 inhabitants. This district, which forms part of the tract called Cleveland, is bounded on the north and west by the river Tees, and comprises about 1800 acres; the soil is generally a rich loam, resting on a substratum of clay, and is intersected by a dyke of whinstone which is continued across the river. Since the extension of the Stockton and Darlington railway, which passes through the township to Middlesbrough, this place has wonderfully increased in extent; and its population, which in 1831 was only 301, is now quintupled. In connexion with some potteries and a glass-bottle manufactory established here, a new town has almost arisen, which promises to become of no inconsiderable importance; on the river are wharfs belonging to these works, and the railway, which is carried across the Tees by a bridge, contributes greatly to the prosperity of the place. Near the Tees, also, are large ship-building yards; land has been let for the establishment of a foundry, and other works are in contemplation. The living, till 1844, a perpetual curacy united to Stainton, is now distinct, Thornaby having been ecclesiastically separated from that parish; it is in the gift of the Archbishop, and endowed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The church is ancient.

THORNAGE, a parish, in the union of ERPINGHAM, hundred of HOLT, W. division of NORFOLK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Holt; containing 325 inhabitants. It comprises 1266*a.* 1*r.* 39*p.*, of which 1035 acres are arable, 98 pasture and meadow, and 17 woodland and common. The living is a rectory, with that of Brinton annexed, valued in the king's books at £6. 18. 4., and in the gift of Lord Hastings: the tithes have been commuted for £321, and the glebe comprises nearly 37 acres, with a house. The church is chiefly in the early style, with a square embattled tower; the chancel contains an altar-tomb to Sir William Butt, who died in 1583. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

THORNBOROUGH (St. MARY), a parish, in the union, hundred, and county of BUCKINGHAM, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Buckingham; containing 762 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 17.; net income, £187; patron, Sir H. Verney, Bart.; impropiator of a portion of the great tithes, the Duke of Buckingham, the remainder having been given to the different proprietors on the inclosure of waste lands in 1804. The chancel of the church belongs to W. F. Lowndes Stone and John Clark, Esqrs., who keep it in repair. On opening an ancient barrow about twenty-five feet high, at Thornborough field, in November, 1839, various bronze ornaments were discovered near the base, on a layer of rough limestone.

THORNBOROUGH, a township, in the parish of CORBRIDGE, union of HEXHAM, E. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E.) from Hexham; containing 60 inhabitants. It is set out in farms, and is the property of Greenwich Hospital. Considerable quantities of limestone are quarried and burned; and a lead-mine anciently wrought was re-opened in 1801, but the speculation proving unsuccessful, was soon after abandoned. A little to the north-west of the village is an eminence called Camp hill, where was formerly a fortified station, and to the south of the hill was Sheldon lough, which was completely drained on the inclosure of the common.

THORNBROUGH, a township, in the parish of SOUTH KILVINGTON, union of THIRSK, wapentake of BIRDFORTH, N. riding of YORK, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Thirsk; containing 27 inhabitants. It comprises about 550 acres, set out in farms.

THORNBURY (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of HOLSWORTHY, hundred of BLACK TORRINGTON, Hols-worthy and N. divisions of DEVON, 4 miles (N. E. by E.) from Holsworthy; containing 524 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 2500 acres, of which 240 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 3. $11\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of Mrs. Spencer: the tithes have been commuted for £225, and the glebe contains 90 acres, to which there is a house. The church has a Norman door, and contains a memorial of an armed knight and his lady, with several monumental effigies of the Edgcumbe family. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

THORNBURY (St. MARY), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the Lower division of the hundred of THORNBURY, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 24 miles (S. W.) from Gloucester, and 124 (W. by N.) from London; containing, with the tything of Kington, and the chapelries of Falfield, Moorton, Oldbury, and Rangeworthy, 4706 inhabitants, of whom 1862 are in the town. This place, which is of considerable antiquity, is situated on the banks of a small rivulet, 2 miles east of the Severn, in the vale of Berkeley, and consists of three principal streets. The chief object worthy of notice is the remains of an old castle at the end of the town, begun by Edward, Duke of Buckingham, in 1511, but left in an unfinished state; the outer wall is still in good preservation, and over the arched gateway, which formed the main entrance, and is greatly admired, is an inscription in raised letters, recording the date of its erection : these ruins command a fine view of the river Severn, which flows on the western side of the parish, and the remote landscape of South Wales. Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn were sumptuously entertained here for ten days, in 1539. The clothing business formerly flourished, but has been long discontinued, and there is at present no particular branch of trade. The market is on Saturday; and fairs are held on Easter-Monday, August 15th, and the Monday before December 21st, for cattle and pigs. The corporation, now merely nominal, consists of a mayor and twelve aldermen, with a sergeant-at-mace and two constables. A court for the recovery of debts under 40s., for the hundred, occurs once in three weeks, on Thursday; and a court of record for pleas to any amount, for the honour of Gloucester, takes place every three weeks, on Tuesday. The parish comprises about 10,508 acres, of which 179 are common or waste land. The LIVING is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £25. 15. 10., and in the gift of the appropriators, the Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford: the great tithes have been commuted, for £450, and the vicarial for £621; the appropriate glebe contains $1\frac{1}{2}$ acre, and the vicarial 3, to which there is a parsonage-house. The church is a spacious and handsome cruciform structure, in the later English style, with a lofty tower ornamented by open-worked battlements and eight pinnacles; the north and south doors are of much earlier date. At Falfield and Oldbury are chapels of ease; and there are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyans. A free grammar school was established and endowed in 1648, by William Edwards, and its funds having been augmented, the income is now £57; another free school, instituted in 1729, by means of a bequest of £500 from John Atwells, and endowed with lands in 1789, possesses a revenue of £70 per annum. The poor law union of Thornbury comprises 21 parishes or places, and contains a population of 16,466.

THORNBURY, a parish, in the union of BROMYARD, hundred of BROXASH, county of HEREFORD, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Bromyard; containing, with the hamlet of Netherwood, 227 inhabitants, and consisting of 1437 acres, but with an extra-parochial place of a similar name, of 2029 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 6. 8.; net income, £183; patron, W. L. Childe, Esq. Wall Hill camp, in the parish, has a triple intrenchment, almost perfect, and is supposed to be a work of the ancient Britons under Caractacus. At Netherwood, Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex, who was beheaded in 1601, and Roger Mortimer, the last earl of March, were born.

THORNBY (St. HELEN), a parish, in the union of BRIXWORTH, hundred of GUILSBOROUGH, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Welford; containing 229 inhabitants. It comprises about 1200 acres, and is intersected by the road from London to Lutterworth. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13, and in the gift of the Trustees of the late Rev. N. Cotton: the tithes have been commuted for £329, and the glebe contains 48 acres, to which there is a house. The poor have the benefit of 24 acres of common land.

THORNCOMBE (St. MARY), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union, and forming a detached portion of the hundred, of AXMINSTER, Honiton and S. divisions of DEVON, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Axminster; containing 1425 inhabitants. At Ford, in this parish, an abbey was founded about the year 1141 for monks of the Cistercian order, by Adelia, daughter of Baldwin de Brioniis of Normandy, the remains of which lady were interred here. The institution soon became highly celebrated, and some of the greatest men of the time were connected with it; Baldwin, Archbishop of Canterbury, who flourished in 1184, was once a monk in it, and Devonus, or John of Devonshire, chaplain and confessor to King John, was abbot, and, about 1217, was buried in the church belonging to it. Dr. Thomas Chard, abbot, surrendered the establishment to Henry VIII., in 1539, when its income was estimated at £381. 10. $8\frac{1}{2}$. The remains are considerable, consisting partly of the entrance tower, the old abbey walls, and various other portions now used as a private mansion; the chapel has a groined roof in the early English style, and some arches of late Norman character, and the hall and cloisters afford specimens of the style prevailing in the 12th and 13th centuries. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £15. 18. 9., and in the gift of the impropiator, John Bragge, Esq.: the vicarial tithes have been commuted for £491. 13., and the glebe contains 48 acres. At Holditch, in the parish, was formerly a church, of which scarcely any remnant exists. There is a free school, founded by the Rev. Thomas Cooke, in 1734, with a small endowment. A fair is held on Easter-Tuesday.

THORNCOTE, with BROOKEND and HATCH, a hamlet, in the parish of NORTHILL, union of BIGGLESWADE, hundred of WIXAMTREE, county of BEDFORD, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Biggleswade; containing 214 inhabitants.

THORNDON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union and hundred of HARTISMERE, W. division of SUFFOLK, 3 miles (S. by W.) from Eye; containing 732 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 2651a. 3r. 3p., of which 51 acres are common or waste land. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £24. 11. $10\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the incumbent, the Rev. Thomas Howes: the tithes have been commuted for £705, and the glebe contains $79\frac{3}{4}$ acres, to which there is a house. The church, said to have been built by Robert de Uford, Earl of Suffolk, in 1358, is chiefly in the later English style, with an embattled tower on the south side. Dr. John Bale, Bishop of Ossory, was rector of the parish.

THORNE (St. NICHOLAS), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, 29 miles (S. by E.) from York, and 165 (N. by W.) from London; containing 3507 inhabitants. This place is situated on the Bawtry and Selby turnpike-road, upon the verge of the moors, and in Hatfield Chase, the inclosure of the latter of which tracts, comprehending 180,000 acres, was commenced in 1811, and completed in 1824. Henry, Prince of Wales, upon his visit to Yorkshire in 1609, was entertained by Roger Portington, Esq., of Tudworth, in the parish, with an aquatic stag-hunt of a novel and extraordinary kind; the party, amounting to about 100 persons, embarked in boats, and 500 stags, driven out of the woods and grounds where they had been collected on the previous evening, taking to the water, were pursued by the royal party to the lower part of the levels called Thorne Mere. King Charles I., during the civil war, is said to have twice passed the level of Hatfield Chase, and on the latter occasion, when travelling from York to Nottingham, he crossed the ferry at Whitgift, proceeded to Goole, and thence advanced along the great bank to Hatfield, where he refreshed himself at an alehouse. The fenny parts of Hatfield Chase, which is supposed to have been formerly a forest, from the number of fossil-trees discovered in it, were drained in the reign of Charles I., with great perseverance and skill, at an expense of £400,000, by Sir Cornelius Vermuyden, who had purchased the estate, in order to convert it into good arable and pasture land.

THORNE, which in Leland's time was only a small village, with a fort near it, the foundations of which are still visible, has become a neat and flourishing town; it is lighted with gas, and many of the houses are well built; the scenery throughout the neighbourhood, from the flatness of the ground and its numerous wide drains, resembles that of Flanders and the other Low Countries. The inhabitants carry on a considerable trade in grain, coal, and timber, and a small number of hands are employed in making sacking and ropes, and in weaving. On the east bank of the river Don, about a mile distant, is a quay, where all merchandise is shipped and landed; vessels for the coasting trade are built, and, being launched at spring tides, are sent down the river to Hull, to be rigged and otherwise completed. A canal from this river to the Trent, called the Stainforth and Keadby canal, by which the trade of the town is greatly promoted, was constructed in 1793; it is 13 miles in length, and joins the Don at Stainforth about three miles south-west of Thorne, reaching the Trent at Keadby. On the moor, large quantities of peat are obtained, and conveyed to the town and other places. The market, originally granted by Richard Cromwell, and renewed by Charles II., is on Wednesday; and fairs, chiefly for horses, cattle, and pedlery, are held on the Monday and Tuesday next after June 11th and October 11th.

The parish comprises 11,900*a*. 2*r*. 1*p*., of which about 5300 acres are arable, 2474 pasture, and 3976 barren peat lands; the Waste contains about 7000 acres, and is bounded by the canal on the south, from which it extends northward five miles. A portion of the peat moors in the district has been converted into very productive land, by the process of "warping." The LIVING is a perpetual curacy, with a net income of £100; the patronage and impropriation belong to Lady Coventry, whose tithes have been commuted for £1640. 15. The church, which was erected in the reign of Edward III., is principally in the later English style, with a square tower surmounted by pinnacles. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, Wesleyans, Primitive Methodists, and Unitarians. Two charity schools have been established, one of which was endowed with land by William Brook, in 1705, for the maintenance of a master, and the instruction of ten boys, and has an annual income of about £118. The other was founded in 1706, by Henry Travis, who bequeathed estates producing £338 per annum, for the endowment of schools at this place, Hatfield, and Wroot, in Lincolnshire; the master of the school here derives an income of £80. The poor law union of Thorne comprises thirteen places, the greater number of which are in Lincolnshire, and contains a population of 15,316: the workhouse was erected at a cost of £3000. Among the various botanical specimens growing on the Thorne moors, the Scheuchzeria palustris has been recently discovered, a plant of the rush tribe so exceedingly rare as to be found elsewhere only upon Lakeby Carr, near Boroughbridge; it was first discovered by Linnæus in Lapland, and on Thorne waste by Harrison, the Canadian botanist. The Rev. Abraham de la Pryme, F.R.S., a celebrated antiquary and historian, was for some time minister of Thorne, and died in 1704, at the early age of 34.

THORNE-FALCON (HOLY CROSS), a parish, in the union of TAUNTON, hundred of NORTH CURRY, W. division of SOMERSET, 3½ miles (E. by S.) from Taunton; containing 266 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 10., and in the gift of E. and J. Batten, Esqrs.: the tithes have been commuted for £140, and the glebe comprises 73 acres.

THORNER (ST. PETER), a parish, in the Lower division of the wapentake of SKYRACK, W. riding of YORK; containing, with the townships of Scarcroft and Shadwell, 1426 inhabitants, of which number 930 are in Thorner township, 7 miles (N. E.) from Leeds. The parish comprises 4400 acres, mostly the property of Edward Jowitt, Esq., and the Earl of Mexborough, who is lord of the manor; the soil is various, and the substratum abounds with limestone, of which great quantities are burnt into lime, and with flagstone and slates, which are also extensively quarried. The surface is boldly varied, and the scenery in some parts picturesque: Eltofts, the seat of Mr. Jowitt, is a handsome residence here. The village, situated on the Tadcaster road, consists of one long street, and some few of the inhabitants are employed in the weaving of bed-ticking, for the Knaresborough trade. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 3. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £143; impropriator, the Earl of Mexborough. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1777; the glebe comprises 60 acres. The church is in the later English style, with a square embattled tower; in the churchyard is the grave of John Philips, who lived to the advanced age of 118 years. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also a school erected by subscription in 1787, and endowed with 14 acres of waste land, the income arising from which is £15. 10. In the neighbourhood is a fine spring of water called Sykes's Well.

THORNES, an ecclesiastical district, in the parish and union of WAKEFIELD, Lower division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, W. riding of YORK, 1 mile (S. by W.) from Wakefield; containing 5930 inhabitants. The surface is boldly undulated, rising into hills of considerable eminence, of which Low Hill, or Law Hill, appears to have been once of some importance; its height is equal to that of Sandal Castle in the neighbourhood, and most probably it was crowned with a battery for protecting the pass of the river Calder, which bounds the chapelry. Several cannon-balls have been found at different times near this mound, which, perhaps, in ancient times, might have been raised for a signal station, communicating on the east with Castleford, and on the west with Almondbury. The village is pleasantly situated and neatly built, and the inhabitants are chiefly employed in the spinning of worsted, in the woollen manufacture, connected with which are several large dyeing establishments, and in malting. The church, dedicated to St. James, was erected in 1830, at an expense of £2038; it is a neat structure of the Doric order, with a cupola, and contains 570 sittings, of which 250 are free. The living is a perpetual curacy; patron, the Vicar of Wakefield; impropiator, the Heir of the late Sir J. Ramsden, Bart.; net income, £148. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1793; the glebe-house was erected in 1841, at an expense of £1500, the proceeds of royal bounty and private donations.—See ALVERTHORPE.

THORNEY (St. HELEN), a parish, in the union, and N. division of the wapentake, of NEWARK, S. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 14 miles (N. N. E.) from Newark; containing 342 inhabitants. This is the extreme parish in the tongue of land in Nottinghamshire which runs into Lincolnshire; it comprises, with the hamlets of Wiggesley and Broadholme, 3931*a. 8p.*; the soil of the higher grounds is clayey, but in the lower parts sandy and poor. The Fosse-Dyke canal, running from the Trent to the Witham, passes for a short distance along the northern boundary of the parish. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 7. 6., and in the gift of C. Neville, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £70, and the glebe contains about 112 acres. The church is ancient, and has a piscina in the southern wall of the chancel; the southern door is Norman, and the nave is separated from the aisle by Norman arches.

THORNEY, a hamlet, in the parish of KINGSBURY-EPISCOP, union of LANGPORT, E. division of the hundred of KINGSBURY, W. division of SOMERSET; containing 83 inhabitants.

THORNEY-ABBEY (St. BOTOLPH), a market-town and parish, in the hundred of WISBECH, ISLE of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, 7 miles (N. E. by E.) from Peterborough, and 86 (N.) from London; containing 2159 inhabitants. This place derived its original name of Ankeridge from a monastery for hermits, or anchorites, founded here in 662, by Saxulphus, abbot of Peterborough, who became its first prior. The edifice, however, was destroyed by the Danes, and the site lay waste until 972, when Ethelwold, Bishop of Winchester, established upon it a Benedictine abbey, in honour of the Virgin, which became so opulent that, at the Dissolution, its revenue was valued at £508. 12. 5.: of this abbey, which was a mitred one, the only remains are, portions of the parochial church, a gateway, and some fragments of the old walls. The town is situated on the road from Wisbech to Peterborough: a literary society was established in 1823, and possesses a good library. There is a canal navigation to the river Nene. The market, granted in 1638, is on Thursday; fairs are held on July 1st and September 21st, for horses and cattle, and on Whit-Monday is a pleasure-fair. Upwards of 3000 sheep are sent annually from the district to the London market. The petty-sessions are held here. The living is a donative, in the patronage of the Duke of Bedford, the impropiator; net income, £220. The church, originally the nave of the conventual church, and built about 1128, is partly in the Norman style, with portions in the later English: in the churchyard are several tombs of French refugees, of whom a colony settled here about the middle of the 16th century, having been employed by the Earl of Bedford in draining the fens. A school-house was erected by a member of the house of Russell; the present Duke of Bedford allows the master a salary of £20, and ten or twelve families are supported in almshouses by his grace.

THORNEY, WEST, a parish, in the union of WEST BOURNE, hundred of BOSHAM, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of SUSSEX, 7½ miles (W. by S.) from Chichester; containing 128 inhabitants. This place, called also Thorney Island, is situated nearly in the centre of the great estuary termed Chichester harbour, communicating with the small port of Emsworth by a causeway passable at low water for horses and carriages; it comprises about 1500 acres of arable, meadow, and pasture land, and the soil is rich, and highly favourable for the production of wheat. About a furlong to the south is Pilsey Island, comprising about 18 acres, within the parish, and which has for many years been the resort of almost every species of marine wild-fowl that frequents the English Channel. By an act in 1812, about 960 acres of open land were inclosed, of which one-fifth part of arable and one-eighth of pasture were allotted to the rector in lieu of tithes, besides the glebe, which amounts to about 48 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 8. 4.; net income, £330; patron, P. Lyne, Esq. The church is an ancient edifice, chiefly in the early English style, with a fine Norman tower at the west end; the chancel is separated from the nave by a screen and rood-loft, and the interior was wholly restored in 1839, chiefly at the expense of the Rev. P. Lyne, rector. On the exterior of the north wall are three large circular arches, now stopped up, evidently an aisle or chantry chapel, supposed to have belonged to a religious house near the church, the remains of which are now incorporated in a farm-house. Cædmon, a celebrated Saxon poet, was born here in 660.

THORNEYBURN, a parish, in the union of BELLINGHAM, N. W. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND; containing, with the township of West Tasset, 359 inhabitants, of whom 186 are in Thorneyburn township, 24 miles (N. W. by N.) from Hexham. This place, which is one of the five new parishes anciently forming part of the extensive parish of Simonburn, is a wild and mountainous district, extending from the North Tyne river to Redesdale, and bounded on the east by the Tasset burn. It comprises 20,133*a. 13p.*, of which about 518 acres are arable, and the remainder meadow and pasture, with the exception of 68 of woodland; the surface is hilly, the soil on the low grounds sandy, and coal is obtained. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 5., and in the gift of the Governors of Greenwich Hospital, who, in 1818, at the expense of £4000, erected the church, which is a neat structure, situated in a field formerly called Draper Croft: near it, a good rectory-house has also been built. The tithes have been commuted for £200, and the glebe contains 20 acres.

THORNFORD (St. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish, in the union and hundred of SHERBORNE, Sherborne division of DORSET, 3 miles (S. W.) from Sherborne; containing 394 inhabitants. The road from Sherborne to Evershot runs through the parish, which comprises about 1300 acres. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 17. 3.; net income, £200; patron and incumbent, the Rev. George Henry Templer: the glebe contains about 28 acres, to which there is a house. The church was anciently a chapel dependent on Sherborne abbey. The Wesleyans have a place of worship; and a national school is supported by subscription.

THORNGRAFTON, a township, in the parish and union of HALTWHISTLE, W. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 5 miles (E. by N.) from Haltwhistle; containing 272 inhabitants. The township is bounded on the south by the Tyne, on the west by Bardon burn, to Craig lough, and on the north by the Roman Wall; it comprises 2891 acres, of which 1710 are common or waste. The surface rises gradually from the Tyne; the soil is rather gravelly, and produces good barley and turnip crops; and the highlands, with five fine lakes in the vicinity, render the prospects in many places varied and beautiful. The common, which contained about 1500 acres, was inclosed pursuant to an act passed in 1793. A small land-sale colliery is in operation; and there are excellent limestone and free-stone quarries, from which latter large blocks were taken for the Newcastle and Carlisle railway, which runs at the distance of half a mile. Chesters-Holme, a beautiful cottage-ornée, situated at the western verge of the township, in a lovely and sequestered spot, on the Chinely burn, was built in 1832, by the Rev. Anthony Hedley, a friend of Sir Walter Scott's, and well known in the county as an antiquary and a scholar, and who lived here till his death in 1835. It stands on the margin of a stream dashing over a rocky bed, and at the foot of Barkham, a high and steep hill, covered with black heath, and which ranges west to east behind the long and straggling hamlet of Thorngraston. On the top of this hill is a very lofty pillar, whence there are extensive views of the vale of the Tyne, Ridley Hall, and the Roman Wall, which last is seen for several miles. In the township is House Steads, the site of the remarkable Roman station Borcovicus, adjacent to which passed the Wall; it is on the brow of a rocky eminence, on the western declivity of which are several terraces, one above another; the area of the fort, on the north side, is level, but on the south exhibits vast and confused heaps of ruins. In the neighbourhood are foundations of houses and traces of streets, squares, baths, &c., extending over several acres, and to the distance of two miles and a half; and on Chapel hill, a little to the south, are the remains of a temple of the Doric order, among which have been discovered altars, sepulchral inscriptions, and curiously-carved figures in relief. Near House Steads is a place of worship for Independents.

THORNHAM (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of HOLLINGBOURN, hundred of EYHORNE, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, 3 miles (N. E. by E.) from Maidstone; containing 535 inhabitants. A vein of white sand discovered here, though known by the name of Maidstone sand, is said to have caused the first improvement in the manufacture of glass in this country; it was first worked by experienced Italians, and soon became of infinite importance in the trade, and the pits are remarkable for their vast subterranean caverns, which are curiously arched. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 0. 10.; net income, £392; patron and incumbent, the Rev. J. McMahon Wilder; impropiator, Sir E. Dering, Bart.: a vicarage-house has been recently built. The church is principally in the decorated English style. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Ruins of a castle still exist on the brow of a hill forming part of the great range of chalk hills; the walls are more than thirteen feet high, and three feet thick, and inclose an area of a quarter of an acre including the keep mount. Urns and other vestiges of a Roman station have been found.

THORNHAM, a township, in the parish of MIDDLETON, union of OLDHAM, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Rochdale; containing 1456 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £73. 14.

THORNHAM (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of DOCKING, hundred of SMITHDON, W. division of NORFOLK, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Burnham-Westgate; containing 790 inhabitants, and comprising 2100 acres of land. The village is of considerable extent, on the road from Lynn to Wells, and about half a mile to the north is a staith, situated on a creek which empties itself into the sea, and is sufficiently large for ships of 100 tons. A good trade is carried on in corn, coal, timber, malt, and oil-cake; on the shore is an extensive tract of rich salt-marsh, formerly a forest, and large trees and horns of stags have been frequently found. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Holme-near-the-Sea annexed, valued in the king's books at £10; net income, £428; patron, and appropriator of Thornham, the Bishop of Norwich. The great tithes of Thornham have been commuted for £480, and the vicarial for £250; the vicar receives a modus of £20 out of the great tithes, and the glebe contains about 14 acres. The church is chiefly in the early and later English styles, and a beautifully-carved screen separates the nave from the chancel; the tower is in ruins. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. At the inclosure in 1794, 30 acres of land were allotted to the poor, who receive also the proceeds of 9 acres left by an unknown benefactor.

THORNHAM MAGNA (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of HARTISMERE, W. division of SUFFOLK, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Eye; containing 374 inhabitants. The road from London to Norwich, by way of Ipswich, runs through the eastern part of the parish. The living is a discharged rectory, with which that of Thornham Parva was consolidated in 1744, valued in the king's books at £7. 11. 3.; net income, £497; patron, Lord Henniker, who possesses the seat of Thornham Hall. The church is chiefly in the later English style, with an embattled tower. Here was formerly a chapel dedicated to St. Eadburga, and called St. Arborough's chapel, in which an anchorite resided; it appears to have been standing in the reign of Elizabeth.

THORNHAM PARVA, a parish, in the union and hundred of HARTISMERE, W. division of SUFFOLK, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Eye; containing 203 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, consolidated with that of Thornham Magna, and valued in the king's books at £4. 14. $4\frac{1}{2}$. The church is chiefly in the early English style, with a low tower, but the entrances are through Norman doorways.

THORNHAUGH (ST. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of STAMFORD, soke of PETERBOROUGH, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 1 mile (N.) from Wansford; containing 295 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the great north road from London to York, and within a mile of the river Nene; it comprises 1726*a.* 1*r.* 13*p.*, and stone is quarried for roads and buildings. The living is a rectory, with that of Wansford annexed, valued in the king's books at £17. 1. 3., and in the gift of the Duke of Bedford: the tithes have been commuted for £447, and the glebe contains 52 acres. The church exhibits portions in the various styles of English architecture. Sir William Russell, 4th son of Francis, 2nd earl of Bedford, resided, and was buried here in 1613; and the place confers the title of Baron on the Russell family.

THORNHILL, a township, in the parish of HOPE, union of CHAPEL-EN-LE-FRITH, hundred of HIGH PEAK, N. division of the county of DERBY, 6 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Tideswell; containing 144 inhabitants.

THORNHILL, a tything, in the parish of STALBRIDGE, union of STURMINSTER, hundred of BROWNSHALL, Sturminster division of DORSET, 2 miles (S.) from Stalbridge; containing 279 inhabitants.

THORNHILL (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of DEWSBURY, Lower division of the wapentake of AGBRIGG, W. riding of YORK; containing, with the chapelry of Flockton, and the townships of Shitlington and Lower Whitley, 7201 inhabitants, of whom 2816 are in Thornhill township, 3 miles (S. by E.) from Dewsbury. This place derived its name from the Thornhill family, for many generations proprietors of the manor, which by marriage was conveyed, in 1404, to the Savilles, from whom the estates, both in this county and in Nottinghamshire, descended to the second son of Sir George Saville's sister, which lady had been married to Richard, Earl of Scarborough, ancestor of the present owner. The parish comprises by admeasurement 7816 acres, of which 2486 are in the township, abounding with beautifully varied scenery; the district produces coal of excellent quality, and an extensive mine under his own estate is wrought by Joshua Ingham, Esq., affording constant employment to nearly 400 of the population. In a large park sloping towards the river Calder, and ornamented with ancient woods, are the remains of the castellated mansion of the Thornhill family, which was garrisoned by Sir George Saville for the king, and besieged and taken by the parliamentary forces, and subsequently demolished. The village is situated on the south side of the river Calder and the Calder and Hebble navigation, and was formerly a place of considerable importance, of which several indications are still discernible, and had a market and a fair, granted by a charter of Edward II. in 1320. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £40. 0. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$; net income, £988, with a good glebe-house and grounds; patron, the Earl of Scarborough. The church is an ancient and venerable structure, chiefly in the early English style, with a square embattled tower; on the south side of the chancel is a chapel containing numerous monuments to the Saville family, of which one, entirely of oak, has the effigies of Sir John Saville and his two wives. The churchyard was walled round, and neatly inclosed, in 1840, by the present rector. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans. The Rev. Charles Greenwood, in 1642, bequeathed £500, for the erection and endowment of a free school, of which the income is £20 per annum. There is also a school founded and endowed in 1712, by Richard Walker, Esq., with property producing £40 per annum; and the same benefactor left also a rent-charge of £4. 10. for a Sunday school. Richard Swallow, Esq., in 1688, bequeathed £100, and Mrs. Margaret Trapper, in 1698, £300, for the poor, which sums have been vested in land, now producing £120 per annum; and there are some other charitable bequests.

THORNHOLM, a township, in the parish of BURTON-AGNES, union of BRIDLINGTON, wapentake of DICKERING, E. riding of YORK, 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Bridlington; containing 88 inhabitants. The township comprises about 1360 acres of land, laid out in farms: the village is on the high road from Bridlington to Great Driffild. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £136, and the appropriate for £175. 13. 6., payable to the Archbishop of York.

THORNLEY, a township, in the parish of KELLOE, union of EASINGTON, S. division of EASINGTON ward, N. division of the county of DURHAM, 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Durham; containing 2730 inhabitants. This place was distinguished in the twelfth century as the retreat of William de St. Barbara, Bishop of Durham, who, during the usurpation of the see, on the death of Gilfrid Rufus, by William Cummin, chancellor of the king of Scotland, took refuge, with his retinue, in an ancient castle here, which appears to have been strongly fortified. The township comprises the two estates of Thornley Hall and Gore Hall, both of which have been the property of the Spearman family for more than 150 years. Thornley Hall, a spacious mansion supposed to occupy the site of the castle, is situated on a commanding eminence, and is now the residence of the agents of an extensive colliery commenced here in 1833, previously to which the population of the township did not exceed 60 persons. The coal is of very excellent quality, and is conveyed by railway to Hartlepool, whence it is shipped for the London market, under the appellation of "Hartlepool Wallsend." A church, in the early English style, was erected in 1842, by subscription, aided by a grant of £250 from her Majesty's Commissioners; it is a neat structure, and calculated to accommodate 474 persons. There are places of worship for Primitive Methodists and Wesleyans; and a school is supported by the proprietors of the colliery.

THORNLEY with WHEATLEY, a township, in the parish of CHIPPING, union of CLITHEROE, Lower division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 7 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.) from Clitheroe; containing 507 inhabitants. It comprises 3180*a.* 3*r.* 2*p.*; of which about 366 acres are arable, 2444 meadow and pasture, 70 wood and plantation, and 300 common, &c.

THORNSETT, a hamlet, in the district of NEWMILLS, parish of GLOSSOP, union of HAYFIELD, hundred of HIGH PEAK, N. division of the county of DERBY, 5 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Chapel-en-le-Frith; containing 764 inhabitants.

THORNTHWAITE, a chapelry, in the parish of CROSTHWAITE, union of COCKERMOUTH, ALLERDALE ward above Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, 4 miles (W. N. W.) from Keswick; containing 187 inhabitants. This village, in which the manufacture of woollen-cloth is carried on, commands most romantic views of Bassenthwaite lake and Skiddaw. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £59; patron, the Vicar of Crosthwaite. The chapel has been enlarged.

THORNTHWAITE, a chapelry, in the parish of HAMPSTHWAITE, union of PATELEY-BRIDGE, Lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, W. riding of YORK, 4 miles (S.) from Pateley-Bridge; containing, with the township of Padside, 281 inhabitants. The chapelry comprises about 3000 acres, of which a considerable portion is moorland; the surface is boldly undulated, and the scenery picturesque: the district contains coal of good quality, of which there are some mines in operation, and many of the inhabitants are employed in the spinning of flax, and in the manufacture of linen. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Hampsthwaite, with a net income of £109: the chapel, rebuilt in 1810, at an expense of £500, and beautified in 1842, contains 300 sittings, all of which are free. Francis Day, in 1748 and 1757, gave land producing £40 per annum, for teaching children.

THORNTON (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union, hundred, and county of BUCKINGHAM, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Buckingham; containing 101 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 16. 3., and in the patronage of Sir T. C. Sheppard, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £224. 5. 4., and there are 2 acres of glebe. William Bredon, who was celebrated for his skill in calculating nativities, and had a share in composing Sir Christopher Haydon's Judicial Astrology, died rector of the parish in 1638.

THORNTON (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of GREAT BOUGHTON, Second division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, S. division of the county of CHESTER; containing, with the townships of Dunham-on-the-Hill, Elton, Hapsford, and Wimbolds-Trafford, 914 inhabitants, of whom 165 are in the township of Thornton-in-the-Moors, 6 miles (N. N. E.) from Chester. The parish is situated on the banks of the river Mersey, and comprises between 4000 and 5000 acres; the surface is in general flat; the soil partakes of the nature of peat, and on the rising grounds is either a strong clay or marl. There is a packet daily by the river; and the Ellesmere and Chester canal, which passes about a mile from the western boundary of the parish, also affords facilities of conveyance. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £24. 7. 8½., and in the gift of Lord Berwick: the tithes have been commuted for £500, and there is a glebe-house, with about 60 acres of land. The church contains portions of several styles, and has a handsome tower. A national school is endowed with £15. 10. per annum.

THORNTON with ASTON, a hamlet, in the parish of HOPE, union of CHAPEL-EN-LE-FRITH, hundred of HIGH PEAK, N. division of the county of DERBY, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Tideswell; containing 111 inhabitants.

THORNTON, a tything, in the parish of MARNHULL, union of STURMINSTER, hundred of REDLANE, Sturminster division of DORSET, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Sturminster-Newton-Castle. This place, now almost depopulated, was formerly a distinct parish, but was united to Marnhull at the Reformation, when the church, dedicated in 1464 to St. Martin, was desecrated, and is now used as a stable.

THORNTON, a township, in the parish of NORHAM, union of BERWICK-UPON-TWEED, county of DURHAM, though locally to the northward, and for parliamentary purposes included in the N. division, of NORTHUMBERLAND, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Berwick; containing 178 inhabitants. This place was once the manor and residence of a family named Heron, but was frequently wasted during time of war. It is situated on the borders of Scotland, and on the south side of the road from Berwick to Cornhill, and comprises about 1398 acres, of which 1250 are arable, 140 pasture, and 8 wood; the surface is elevated table land, the soil loamy, and there are fine views of the Cheviot hills and of Scotland. In the township are three farms and a colliery belonging to Lord Crewe's trustees, and good freestone is wrought. A school is endowed by the trustees with £20 per annum, and the master has a house, and grass for a cow.

THORNTON, a township, in the parish of POULTON, union of the FYLDE, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. by E.) from Poulton; containing, with the town of Fleetwood (which see), 3847 inhabitants. A church was built in 1835; and there is a place of worship for Wesleyans. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for a rent-charge of £244. 2. 6., and one of £40 has been awarded to the perpetual curate. James Baines, in 1717, bequeathed land now producing an income of £40, for teaching children.

THORNTON, a township, in the parish of SEFTON, union and hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Liverpool; containing 326 inhabitants.

THORNTON (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of MARKET-BOSWORTH, hundred of SPARKENHOE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, 10 miles (N. by W.) from Leicester; containing, with the chapelries of Bagworth and Stanton-under-Bardon, 1375 inhabitants, of whom 491 are in Thornton township. The parish is situated on the ridge of a hill, and comprises 2000 acres: two coal-mines are in operation in Bagworth, along the valley on the confines of which runs the Swannington and Leicester railroad. About 50 persons are employed in stocking-weaving. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 10. 2., and in the gift of Viscount Maynard, who, with the Duke of Rutland, is impropiator: the ancient glebe consists of 2 acres, and there are 120 received in lieu of tithes in 1794, valued at £200 per annum. The south door of the church is a very curious and antique piece of workmanship, said to have been brought from Ulverscroft Priory, about 4 miles distant. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Baptists; and about £18 per annum, the produce of various benefactions, are distributed to the poor.

THORNTON (St. WILFRID), a parish, in the union of HORNCastle, S. division of the wapentake of GARTREE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. W.) from Horncastle; containing 236 inhabitants. It comprises about 1196 acres, of which 346 are meadow, 590 pasture, and 260 arable. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 12. 1.; patrons and appropriators, Dean and Chapter of Lichfield. The great tithes have been commuted for £145, and the vicarial for £168; the glebe contains $2\frac{3}{4}$ acres.

THORNTON (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of POCKLINGTON, partly in the Wilton-Beacon, but chiefly in the Holme-Beacon, division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of YORK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Pocklington; containing, with the townships of Melbourne and Storthwaite, 814 inhabitants, of whom 202 are in Thornton township. The parish comprises about 6615 acres, of which 2410 are in Thornton township, and chiefly the property of Colonel Wyndham, who is lord of the manor: the village is situated near the Pocklington canal, which passes on the south. The living is a discharged vicarage, with Allerthorpe annexed, valued in the king's books at £7. 5. 10.; net income, £210; patron and appropriator, the Dean of York. The church is a small ancient edifice with a bell turret.

THORNTON, with BAXBY, a township, in the parish of COXWOLD, union of EASINGWOLD, wapentake of BIRDFORTH, N. riding of YORK, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Easingwold; containing 78 inhabitants, of whom 50 are in Thornton. It comprises 1440a. 3r. 15p., of which about 350 acres are arable, and 1090 grass; the soil is generally fertile, with a substratum of limestone.

THORNTON, a chapelry, in the parish and union of BRADFORD, wapentake of MORLEY, W. riding of YORK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Bradford; containing 6788 inhabitants. The chapelry is situated on the south side of the valley of Bradford, and comprises by computation 4638 acres, of which 1148 are arable, 3444 pasture, and about 45 wood. The arable land is fertile, and in good cultivation, and the pasture chiefly high moor, let out in dairy-farms; the surface is undulated, and the lower grounds are watered by a rivulet that has its source in the township, and flows through the town of Bradford into the river Aire. The district abounds with coal, of which there are several mines in operation, and with freestone, of which there are not less than six different quarries; the scenery is pleasingly diversified, and enriched with wood. Thornton Hall, the property of the Horton family, an ancient quadrangular structure of great extent, and formerly of considerable importance, is now occupied as farm-buildings and cottages. Leventhorpe Hall, here, was once the seat of a distinguished family; and at Headley is an old mansion in the Elizabethan style, in former times the seat of a branch of the Midgleys. The village, which is large and irregularly built, is on the southern acclivities of the vale; and the township comprises also the village of School-Green, and the scattered hamlets of Clayton, Denholme, Thornton-Heights, and Leventhorpe. The population is chiefly employed in two large worsted-mills, and in the collieries and stone quarries.

The chapel, dedicated to St. James, a small structure chiefly in the later English style, was originally built in 1612, and has since been enlarged and frequently repaired: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £150; patron, the Vicar of Bradford. There are places of worship for Independents, Primitive Methodists, and Wesleyans. The free grammar school, originally established by subscription, was endowed by George Ellis and Samuel Sunderland, Esqrs., with a house and 18 acres of land called Wilcock Royd, and a house and 8 acres at Lester Dike, the former producing £20, and the latter £15. 15. per annum, and with a rent-charge of £3 by Thomas Sagar, in 1672; the endowment has been augmented by the trustees with nearly 9 acres, worth £8 per annum, and the school is open to all boys of the chapelry, of whom a few learn Latin. There is also a national school, supported by subscription. James Sagar, in 1665, bequeathed Randalwell Close, valued in 1821 at £8 per annum, but since exchanged for a farm at West Clayton, yielding £50 a year; he appropriated 20s. to the minister of Thornton, and the remainder for distribution among the most necessitous poor.

THORNTON (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of SKIPTON, E. division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, W. riding of YORK, 6 miles (W. S. W.) from Skipton; containing 2354 inhabitants. This place, in the reign of Edward I., belonged to Walter de Muncey, who obtained from that monarch the grant of a weekly market, and a fair on the festival of St. Thomas the Martyr and four following days, both of which have been long since discontinued. The parish includes the manors of Earby, Kelbrook, and Harden, and comprises 5338a. 3r. 26p., of which 152 acres are arable, 219 wood, and the remainder meadow and high moorland pasture; the property belongs to various persons, of whom the principal is Sir John Lister Kaye, Bart., lord of the several manors. The soil of the arable land is fertile, and the substratum is chiefly limestone, of good quality, which is quarried for building, and also for burning into lime; the surface is generally elevated, and in some parts diversified with hill and dale, and a rivulet abounding with trout flows through the lower grounds into the Aire. The village is neatly built, and the population partly employed in hand-loom weaving. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £19. 15. 2½.; net income, £500, with a house; patron, Sir J. L. Kaye: the tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1819. The church is an ancient structure, with some additions in the later English style. Almshouses for five women were founded in 1815, by Mrs. Rachel Smith, who endowed them with £2000 three per cent. consols., and placed them under the controul of the quarterly meeting of the Society of Friends for the county of Westmorland.—See EARBY and KELBROOK.

THORNTON, BISHOP, a chapelry, in the parish and liberty of RIPON, W. riding of YORK, 6 miles (S. W.) from Ripon; containing 610 inhabitants. The chapelry comprises about 3200 acres; the soil is generally fertile, the chief portion of the land in good cultivation, and the scenery pleasingly diversified. The chapel, dedicated to St. John, was rebuilt in 1825, at a cost of £1000, raised by subscription, and a grant from the Parliamentary Commissioners; it is a neat structure, with a handsome east window presented by Mrs. Lawrence, embellished with emblematical devices and armorial bearings in stained glass, and contains 400 sittings, of which 250 are free. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £85; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Ripon, whose tithes have been commuted for £57. 10., and the impropriate for £263. 18. 9. There are a Roman Catholic chapel, and a national school.

THORNTON-BRIDGE, a township, in the parish of BRAFFERTON, wapentake of HALLKELD, N. riding of YORK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Boroughbridge; containing 49 inhabitants. The village is situated on the west side of the river Swale.

THORNTON-CHILDER, a township, in the parish of EASTHAM, union, and Higher division of the hundred, of WIRRAL, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 5 miles (E.) from Great Neston; containing 361 inhabitants. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £58, and the vicarial for £55. 10.

THORNTON-CURTIS (ST. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of GLANDFORD-BRIGG, N. division of the wapentake of YARBOROUGH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 5 miles (S. E. by E.) from Barton-upon-Humber; containing, with the hamlet of Burnham, 393 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation 5000 acres, of which about 1400 are in Burnham: the village, which is scattered, is on the south side of the Humber, about a mile north of Wootton. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 18. 4.; net income, £123; patron and impropriator, C. Winn, Esq. The church has a curiously-carved font. A priory for Black canons in honour of the Blessed Virgin, was founded here in 1139, by William le Gros, Earl of Albemarle and Lord of Holderness, and at the Dissolution had a revenue of £730. 17. 2. Henry VIII., who had visited the abbey in 1541, applied the greater part of its possessions to the erection of a college in honour of the Holy and Undivided Trinity, for a dean and nineteen prebendaries, but this was dissolved in the 1st of Edward VI., when its site was granted to the Bishop of Lincoln. It occupied an extensive square area, encompassed by a deep fosse and strong ramparts, and the ruins are approached by a bridge flanked with embattled walls, and arches with loop-holes, supporting two round towers. The gate-house is yet perfect, and is preserved in its pristine state by the Earl of Yarborough, the owner; the ruins of the chapter-house are very fine, and various other portions of these once magnificent buildings are still standing, and exhibit good specimens of the decorated and later English styles. Opposite the entrance are four small mounds called Butts, supposed to be tumuli.

THORNTON-DALE (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in PICKERING lythe and union, N. riding of YORK, 3 miles (E. by S.) from Pickering; containing 886 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 6000 acres, of which a large tract is moorland, chiefly a rabbit-warren; of the remainder, about two-thirds are arable, and, with the exception of 200 acres of wood, the other third is meadow and pasture. The surface, on the base of the moorland, is flat; the soil is various, and the substratum contains good stone, which is quarried for building and for burning into lime. The village is pleasantly situated; the manufacture of coarse paper is carried on, and there is also a tanyard. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £20; net income, £396, with a good house, erected in 1842; patron, R. Hill, Esq. The church is an ancient structure, with a square embattled tower, and was thoroughly repaired in 1838. There are places of worship for dissenters. A free grammar school was founded in 1657, by Viscountess Lumley, who also erected and endowed twelve almshouses; the income of the charity is about £450 per annum, and from the same fund are likewise maintained similar establishments in London. Two other schools are partly supported by private charity.

THORNTON, EAST, a township, in the parish of HARTBURN, union, and W. division of the ward, of MORPETH, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 6 miles (W.) from Morpeth; containing 51 inhabitants. In the 9th of William III., the moor of East Thornton was found, upon a trial at law, to be within the parish of Hartburn, and tithes were decreed upon it. The township was a part of the Radcliffe estate forfeited by the Earl of Derwentwater, and afterwards came to Greenwich Hospital; but in 1831, the commissioners sold the lands, which comprise about 916 acres, to Isaac Cookson, Esq., who has since built an extensive house and offices here. The tithes have been commuted for £5, payable to the Vicar of Hartburn.

THORNTON-IN-LONSDALE (ST. OSWALD), a parish, in the union of SETTLE, wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, W. riding of YORK; containing, with Burton township, 993 inhabitants, of whom 364 are in the township of Thornton, 11½ miles (N. W.) from Settle. The parish abuts on the vale of Lune to the west, and comprises 8926 acres, of which 7402 are in Thornton township; a very considerable portion is high moorland, affording tolerable pasture, and the surface in some parts rises to a great elevation; the soil is generally a rich loam, alternated with clay, and the substratum in the northern part is limestone. Lead-mines were opened on Gray Gareth many years ago, but were not found sufficiently productive: slate is procured near Thornton Force, where the vertical slate rock may be seen crested by the limestone in a horizontal position. The population is partly employed in cotton mills in the neighbourhood; and at Burton are several potteries, where stone ware, and also coarse brown ware, are manufactured. The river Greta, a tributary of the Lune, passes on the south. The valley of Kingsdale, situated at the north-eastern side of the parish, abounds with romantic scenery; and near the village is Thornton Scar, a precipitous and rugged cliff, partly clothed with wood, rising to the height of 100 yards, and forming one side of a narrow ravine, through which a mountain stream, rushing with impetuous violence, forms in its descent several beautiful cascades. At a small distance from this is Thornton Force, a picturesque cataract of one unbroken sheet of water, four yards in breadth, falling from a height of thirty yards into a rocky pool. At the northern extremity of Kingsdale is the celebrated Yordas cave, beneath the mountain of Gray Gareth; this singular excavation is in a solid rock of black marble, and resembles the interior of a cathedral, with the bishop's throne on the right, and on the left another cluster of rock, called the Chapter-house, with petrifications hanging from the roof, resembling rich and elaborate groming; the discharge of a pistol produces a reverberation equal to that of a whole park of artillery. The village is pleasantly situated at the foot of the dale, on the road to Kendal, and about a mile from Ingleton. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £28. 13. 1½.; net income, £120; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Worcester. The church is an ancient structure in the Norman style, with later additions. There is a chapel of ease in the township of Burton. Ralph Redmayne, Esq., in 1702, founded a free school, and endowed it with £200, which sum having been vested in land, produces annually about £60.

THORNTON-LE-BEANS, a township, in the parish of NORTH OTTERINGTON, union of NORTH-ALLERTON, wapentake of ALLERTONSHIRE, N. riding of YORK, 3½ miles (S. E.) from North-Allerton; containing 266 inhabitants. This township comprises about 1640 acres of fertile and well cultivated land, and the village is neatly built, and pleasantly situated. A chapel of ease was founded in 1770, by Mrs. Heber, who bequeathed £63 for the education of poor boys. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a school in which several children are gratuitously taught by the master, who has four acres of land purchased with Mrs. Heber's bequest, is also supported by subscription. The township contains a sulphureous and a chalybeate spring, both of which are private property.

THORNTON-LE-FEN, a township, in the union of BOSTON, soke of HORNCastle, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Boston; containing 186 inhabitants. Here is a chapel, the living of which is a perpetual curacy; net income, £84; patrons, certain Trustees.

THORNTON-LE-MOOR (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of CAISTOR, N. division of the wapentake of WALSHCROFT, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Caistor; containing 102 inhabitants. The parish is in form an oblong square, crossed at right angles by the road from Market-Rasen to Glandford-Brigg, and comprises by computation 1452 acres: the river Ancholme passes on the west, and the Caistor canal on the north side. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 10. 10.; net income, £300; patron, the Bishop of Ely: there is a parsonage-house, with a glebe of 20 acres. The church, which is very ancient, has a Norman doorway.

THORNTON-LE-MOOR, a township, in the parish of NORTH OTTERINGTON, union of THIRSK, wapentake of BIRDFORTH, N. riding of YORK, 5 miles (N. W. by N.) from Thirsk; containing 343 inhabitants. The township comprises about 1010 acres; the soil is fertile, and the lands are under profitable cultivation. The village is pleasantly situated, and the houses, to most of which gardens are attached, are neatly built; some few of the inhabitants are employed in hand-loom weaving, but the population generally is agricultural. The Great North of England railway intersects the township. There is a place of worship for Primitive Methodists; and the remains of an ancient chapel have been converted into a school, which is supported by subscription. A spring, remarkable for the extreme coldness of the water, has been walled round and fenced by the proprietor of the land.

THORNTON-LE-STREET (ST. LEONARD), a parish, in the union of THIRSK, wapentake of ALLERTONSHIRE, N. riding of YORK, 3 miles (N. N. W.) from Thirsk; containing, with the township of North Kilvington, 224 inhabitants, of whom 161 are in Thornton township. This place takes the affix to its name from its situation on the ancient Roman road from York to Catterick. The parish comprises 2750 acres, of which 1540 are in the township of Thornton, and mostly the property of Sir Samuel Crompton, Bart.; the surface is generally level, with some few undulations, and the scenery is ornamented with numerous fine ash-trees in the hedge rows. There is rather more of meadow and pasture than of arable land; the soil is generally a moderately fertile clay. Woodend, the seat of Sir Samuel Crompton, is a spacious and handsome mansion in a well-wooded park on the west side of the village; and on the farm at which his agent resides, Sir Samuel has erected a steam-engine, which is applied to various useful purposes. The village is pleasantly situated on the west bank of the river Codbeck, and on the North-Allerton road; and the Great North of England railway intersects the parish. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4; net income, £60; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford. The church is an ancient structure, chiefly in the Norman style, with a tower of later date. A Sunday school is supported by subscription; and at Thornton-le-Moor, in the parish of North Otterington, is a school to which Sir Samuel Crompton is a liberal benefactor, and in which the children of this parish receive instruction on the week-days.

THORNTON-MAYOW, a township, in the parish of NESTON, union, and Higher division of the hundred, of WIRRAL, S. division of the county of CHESTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Great Neston; containing 208 inhabitants.

THORNTON-RUST, a township, in the parish of AYSGARTh, wapentake of HANG-WEST, N. riding of YORK, 10 miles (W.) from Middleham; containing 178 inhabitants. It comprises 1923 acres, of which 905 are common or waste, mostly moorland, extending southward; the village, which consists of one street of well-built houses, is pleasantly seated on a lofty acclivity, on the south side of Wensley-dale, and commands very fine views. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £29. 10., payable to Trinity College, Cambridge. A school was established and endowed in conjunction with a Calvinistic place of worship, in 1827.

THORNTON-STEWARD (ST. OSWALD), a parish, in the union of LEYBOURN, wapentake of HANG-WEST, N. riding of YORK, 6 miles (W.) from Bedale; containing 268 inhabitants. The parish comprises by admeasurement 2040 acres, about two-thirds of which are grass; the soil is chiefly of the grit stratum, porous and dry. The village is on the banks of the Ure, a little below its junction with the Cover, and at the outlet of the two beautiful valleys of Wensleydale and Coverdale. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £234; patron and appropriator, the Bishop of Chester. The great tithes have been commuted for £135, and the vicarial for £164; the appropriate glebe contains $8\frac{1}{4}$, and the vicarial 54 acres, and there is a parsonage-house attached to the benefice. The church is an old, simple building, with an open belfry. A small school, erected in 1815, at the expense of George Horn, Esq., has an endowment of £10 per annum. Some curious ancient coffins of massive stone were found a few years since.

THORNTON-UPON-CLAY, a township, in the parish of FOSTON, union of MALTON, wapentake of BULMER, N. riding of YORK, 11 miles (N. N. E.) from York; containing 217 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 1270 acres, chiefly in the hands of resident proprietors: the village is situated about a mile west of Foston. The tithes were commuted for land in 1777. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans, and also one for the Society of Friends with a burial-ground attached.

THORNTON-WATLASS (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of BEDALE, wapentake of HANG-EAST, N. riding of YORK; containing, with the townships of Clifton-upon-Ure, Rookwith, and Thirn, 471 inhabitants, of whom 203 are in the township of Thornton-Watlass, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Bedale. The parish comprises about 3882 acres, of which 1436*a. 1r. 27p.* are in Thornton-Watlass township, and are of a fertile soil: the village is neatly built round a pleasant green, and lies eastward of the river Ure. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 10. 10., with a net income of £475; patron, M. Milbank, Esq., who is lord of the manor. The church stands on a bold eminence, and is a neat structure with a tower. A school has a small endowment. About half a mile to the north of the village is a conical hill where are traces of a moat which anciently encompassed a castellated building.

THORNTON, WEST, a township, in the parish of HARTBURN, union, and W. division of the ward, of MORPETH, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Morpeth; containing 58 inhabitants. This township is supposed to occupy the site of a Roman station; and it is recorded that, till towards the commencement of the eighteenth century, vestiges of an ancient town intersected by a military road were plainly discernible. Between the lands of the township and the river Hart, is a farm of about 100 acres, which originally belonged to the Knights Templars, from whom the hamlet obtained the name of Temple-Thornton; and this property, on the suppression of the order, was, with their other estates in the county, consigned to John de Kingston. The township comprises 1047 acres, of which 147 are arable, 860 meadow and pasture, and 40 woodland and plantations. The village is situated on a high ridge, from which the grounds slope towards the river Hart, fronting the south; it had formerly a chapel. The tithes have been commuted for £46. 3., payable to the vicar of Hartburn.

THORNVILLE, a township, in the parish of WHIXLEY, Lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, W. riding of YORK, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Boroughbridge; containing 18 inhabitants. This township, which comprises about 200 acres of fertile land, is on the north bank of the river Nidd, and is the property of Mr. Thomas Proud, whose father purchased the estate from Colonel Thornton, of sporting celebrity: the mansion, a handsome structure of brick, is finely situated in a well-planted demesne.

THORNWOOD, a hamlet, in the parish of NORTH WEALD BASSETT, union of EPPING, hundred of HARLOW, S. division of the county of ESSEX, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Epping; containing 293 inhabitants.

THOROTON (St. ELENA), a parish, in the union, and N. division of the wapentake, of BINGHAM, S. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 8 miles (S. S. W.) from Newark; containing 152 inhabitants. The soil is in general a rich clay. The living is annexed, with that of Scarrington, to the vicarage of Orston: at the inclosure in 1796, the small tithes were commuted for 19a. 1r. 5p. of land. The church is a handsome structure, with a tower surmounted by a fine spire.

THORP-ACRE, a parish, in the union of LOUGHBOROUGH, hundred of WEST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (W. N. W.) from Loughborough; containing, with the chapelry of Dishley, 298 inhabitants. The living is a donative curacy, united to that of Dishley. The sum of £22 per annum, arising from land left by John Ransdale, in 1708, is applied in support of a girls' school of industry, and in clothing the poor.

THORP-ARCH (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the W. division of the AINSTY wapentake, W. riding of YORK,

$2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Wetherby; containing 326 inhabitants. This place derived the distinctive affix to its name from the family of the De Arches, who came over with the Conqueror from Normandy, and obtained large possessions in this part of the country. The parish, which is situated in the beautiful vale of the river Wharfe, comprises 1606a. 2r. 3p., chiefly the property of Randall Gossip, Esq., who is lord of the manor. Of the lands, 978 acres are arable, 500 meadow and pasture, 75 wood and plantations, and the remainder homesteads, roads, and waste; the soil is fertile. Thorp-Arch Hall, the seat of Mr. Gossip, is a handsome mansion, commanding richly-diversified prospects. The village is situated on the river, which here presents itself in many interesting points of view; the manufacture of the coarser kinds of paper is carried on, and there are two large flour-mills. The Roman road to Boroughbridge, called Rudgate, passes by the eastern boundary of the parish. The living is a discharged vicarage, endowed with the rectorial tithes, valued in the king's books at £3. 15. 5., and in the gift of the Rev. Charles Medhurst, of Ledstone Hall: the tithes have been commuted for £387. 9. 2. The church, an ancient structure, with the exception of the tower, in which is a highly-enriched Norman doorway, was rebuilt in 1756, in the later English style. A school was founded in 1738, by Lady Elizabeth Hastings, who endowed it with £15 per annum, and ten acres of land, and the money endowment has since been augmented to £43 per annum. On the site of the Rudgate road, but in an adjoining parish, is St. Helen's Well, connected with which was a chapel, long since destroyed, and near it a cross which has lately been removed.

THORP-AUDLING, a township, in the parish of BADSWORTH, Upper division of the hundred of OSGOLDCROSS, W. riding of YORK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Pontefract; containing 315 inhabitants. The township comprises about 1260 acres of land in good cultivation; the surface is varied, and the scenery of pleasing character. Rogerthorp Hall, the seat of Charles Oxley, Esq., is a handsome residence here.

THORP-BASSETT (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of MALTON, wapentake of BUCKROSE, E. riding of YORK, 5 miles (E. by N.) from Malton; containing 201 inhabitants. It comprises about 1750 acres of land, all situated in the manor of Rillington: the village is near the source of a rivulet, and a short distance south of the road from Malton to Sherburn. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12; patron, Earl Fitzwilliam; net income, £309. The church is an ancient structure, with a bell-gable. The Rev. James Graves, in 1804, bequeathed £200, the proceeds of which are applied in aid of the instruction of children.

THORP-STAPLETON, a township, in the parish of WHITKIRK, Lower division of the wapentake of SKYRACK, W. riding of YORK, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Leeds; containing 15 inhabitants. It is on the north side of the river Aire.

THORP-SUB-MONTEM, with BURNSALL, a township, in the parish of BURNSALL, union of SKIPTON, E. division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EW-CROSS, W. riding of YORK, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Skipton; containing 284 inhabitants, of whom 104 are in Thorp. The village, which is about a mile from that of Burnsall, is situated in a deep narrow glen under the mountain of Thornton Scar, abounding with wildly romantic scenery; in the glen is a cavern called Knave-Knoll Hole, supposed to have been the abode of banditti.

THORP-UNDERWOODS, a township, in the parish of LITTLE OUSEBURN, Lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, W. riding of YORK, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Boroughbridge; containing 182 inhabitants. This township, which is situated in the vale of the Ouse, comprises by computation 2200 acres of land in good cultivation, and the scenery abounds with picturesque beauty.

THORPE (St. LEONARD), a parish, in the hundred of WIRKSWORTH, S. division of the county of DERBY, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Ashbourn; containing 196 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 1. 6.; net income, £129; patron, the Dean of Lincoln. The church is partly in the Norman style. To the north of the village is a remarkable conical hill of limestone called Thorpe Cloud, 300 feet above the bed of the river Dove, which flows at its base.

THORPE (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of SPILSBY, E. division of the soke of BOLINGBROKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. W.) from Wainfleet; containing 557 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £20. 19. 4.; net income, £313; patron and impropriator, W. Hopkinson, Esq.

THORPE, a township, in the parish of TATTERSHALL, union of HORNCastle, S. division of the wapentake of GARTREE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN; containing 300 inhabitants.

THORPE (St. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of SOUTHWELL, S. division of the wapentake of NEWARK and of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 3 miles (S. W.) from Newark; containing 108 inhabitants. The parish is situated about half a mile east of the river Trent, and of the old Fosse road from Nottingham to Newark, and comprises by computation 698a. 2r.: building-stone is quarried. A few hands are employed in lace frame-working for the Nottingham houses. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8, and has a net income of £280; it is in the patronage of the Crown, and the glebe contains 40 acres. The church exhibits portions in the several styles of English architecture; the tower was formerly surmounted with a steeple. A fine tessellated pavement, coins, and many other Roman relics, have been discovered. On a small mound in a field adjoining the turnpike-road it is said that Henry VII. erected his standard, on the 6th of June, 1487, the day upon which he fought the battle of Stoke Field with the Earl of Lincoln.

THORPE, a parish, in the union of LOUGHBOROUGH, S. division of the wapentake of RUSHCLIFFE and of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Loughborough; containing 44 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 9. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$.; patron, Lord Rancliffe. The church has been destroyed.

THORPE, a hamlet, in the parish of ALDRINGHAM, union and hundred of BLYTHING, E. division of SUFFOLK, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Aldborough; containing 142 inhabitants. There was formerly a chapel, dedicated to St. Mary.

THORPE, a hamlet, in the parish of ASHFIELD, union of BOSMERE and CLAYDON, hundred of THREDLING, E. division of SUFFOLK, 2 miles (E. S. E.) from Debenham. The chapel, dedicated to St. Peter, was rebuilt by George Pitt, Esq., in 1739, but the tower, which is circular, must have belonged to a more ancient edifice; the chapelyard is extensive, but no interments have taken place.

THORPE (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of WINDSOR, Second division of the hundred of GODLEY, W. division of SURREY, 2 miles (S. W. by S.) from Staines; containing 532 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the river Thames, between the Great Western and the London and South-Western railways, from each of which it is about five miles distant. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown, with a net income of £141; impropriator, the Rev. H. Leigh Bennett, whose tithes have been commuted for £115, and those of the vicar for £70. There are 10 acres of glebe. The church is a very old edifice, with a tower of brick covered with ivy, and contains some ancient monuments, one with an inscription in brass.

THORPE, a township, in the parish and union of HOWDEN, wapentake of HOWDENSHERE, E. riding of YORK, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (N. by E.) from Howden; containing 50 inhabitants. It is a small township, comprising about 260 acres, set out in two farms, one of them on Walling fen.

THORPE, with WHITCLIFF, a township, in the parish and liberty of RIPON, W. riding of YORK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. by E.) from Ripon; containing 186 inhabitants. It comprises about 1300 acres, of which 909 are in the hamlet of Thorpe, where is a pleasant and well-built village; the lands are the property of several proprietors, some of whom have neat houses. The river Ure and the Ripon canal flow at a short distance in an eastern direction.

THORPE, near LEEDS.—See THORPE-ON-THE-HILL.

THORPE, an ecclesiastical district, in the union of ROTHERHAM, N. division of the wapentake of STRAF-FORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, 4 miles (N. W.) from Rotherham; containing about 2000 inhabitants. The district was formed from the parishes of Rotherham, Wath, and Ecclesfield, in 1841; the village is of considerable antiquity, and the inhabitants are chiefly employed in collieries, and in the making of nails, for which the place has been long celebrated. The substratum abounds with coal, of which there are five mines in full operation, and with freestone of good quality for building, which is extensively quarried. Grange Hall, the seat of the Earl of Effingham, is a handsome residence here. The church, called Trinity church, of which the first stone was laid in 1837, was consecrated in 1840, and is in the later English style, with a spire; it has 577 sittings, of which 187 are free, and was erected by Earl Fitzwilliam chiefly, and Lord Effingham, aided by subscription, at a cost of £1800. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of four Trustees; net income, £150, with a house. There are two places of worship for Wesleyans; a national school is supported by the poor, and there is a school in the village, the master of which has endowments from the Earl Fitzwilliam and others.

THORPE-ABBOTS (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of DEPWADE, hundred of EARSHAM, E. division of NORFOLK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Scole; containing 281 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises 1122*a.* 3*r.* 39*p.*, is bounded on the south by the river Waveney, that separates it from the county of Suffolk; and the road from Bury to Yarmouth passes through it. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6; net income, £305; patron, J. P. Reade, Esq. The glebe contains about 16 acres, and there is a good house erected in 1840, by the Rev. W. Wallace. The church is chiefly in the later style.

THORPE-ACHURCH (ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of OUNDLE, hundred of NAVISFORD, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Thrapstone; containing 218 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the right bank of the river Nene, and comprises 1495 acres. The living is a rectory, with the vicarage of Lilford annexed, valued in the king's books at £14. 16. 3.; net income, £420; patron, Lord Lilford, the impropiator of Lilford. The tithes were commuted for land in 1772, at which time an allotment, now let for £13. 10., was awarded for parochial purposes.

THORPE-ARNOLD (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of MELTON-MOWBRAY, hundred of FRAMLAND, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (E. N. E.) from Melton-Mowbray; containing 134 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Melton-Mowbray to Grantham, and consists of 1740 acres, of which about one-fifth is arable, and the remainder pasture; the soil in general is a cold clayey earth, but in some parts rich grazing land. The small river Eye and the Melton and Oakham canal run through the parish. The living is a vicarage, with the chapelry of Brentingby annexed, valued in the king's books at £6. 17. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the Duke of Rutland: the glebe comprises about 23 acres.

THORPE, BISHOP'S (ST. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of BLOFIELD, partly in the county of the city of NORWICH, but chiefly in the hundred of BLOFIELD, E. division of NORFOLK, 2 miles (E.) from Norwich; containing 2197 inhabitants, of whom 1156 are in the county of the city. The parish comprises 2592*a.* 2*r.* 11*p.*, of which 1520 acres are arable, 831 meadow, pasture, and common, 174 woodland, and 67 roads and waste. The village is beautifully situated on the western and southern acclivities of a hill at the base of which run the navigable rivers Wensum and Yare, which, uniting their streams within the parish, flow together to Yarmouth: the vicinity is ornamented with rich plantations, and interspersed with handsome villas occupied by opulent citizens of Norwich. The Norwich and Yarmouth railway passes through the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8, and in the gift of the Rev. A. Herring: the tithes have been commuted for £612, and the glebe comprises 26 acres. The church is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower, and contains some good monuments. There is a place of worship for dissenters; also a free school, founded in 1587, by subscription, and augmented with forty acres of land, by the Rev. Samuel Chapman, in 1700. About 61 acres of land were, on the inclosure, allotted to the poor for fuel; and there are some small bequests for distribution among them. On a hill above Bishopgate Bridge are remains of a chapel dedicated to St. Michael, which is also called Kett's Castle, from the rebels under that leader having encamped near it; there are likewise vestiges of a convent dedicated to St. Leonard, which occupied an area of eight acres, inclosed with stone walls of great thickness. The county lunatic asylum is situated in the parish.

THORPE-BRANTINGHAM, a township, in the parish of BRANTINGHAM, union of BEVERLEY, Hunsley-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of YORK, 3 miles (S. S. W.) from North Cave; containing 112 inhabitants, and comprising about 800 acres. The village is very small; and near it, situated on a bold eminence, is the handsome mansion of Thorpe-Brantingham House.

THORPE-BULMER, a township, in the parish of HART, union of STOCKTON, S. division of EASINGTON ward, N. division of the county of DURHAM, 3 miles (W. N. W.) from Hartlepool; containing 21 inhabitants. This township, which derives its adjunct from the family of Bulmer, one of whom, Sir John Bulmer, was attainted in the reign of Henry VIII., comprises by measurement 827 acres, of which 88 are woodland, 66 common or waste, and the remainder arable and pasture; the soil is of a clayey quality, and in some parts productive, and the scenery in general is very beautiful. Hesleton dene forms the northern boundary, where the banks are covered with hesles and forest trees. The three farms of Thorpe-Bulmer, Middle-Thorpe, and Crimdon are in the township, and the Hartlepool railway passes here, through an immense excavation called the Crimdon cut. The tithes have been commuted for £70, payable to the vicar of Hart.

THORPE-BY-IXWORTH (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of THINGOE, hundred of BLACKBOURN, W. division of SUFFOLK, $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile (N. W. by N.) from Ixworth; containing 142 inhabitants. The manor was part of the endowment of Ixworth priory, and at the Dissolution was granted, with the priory, to Richard and Elizabeth Codrington. The parish comprises by computation 1071 acres, of which the soil in some parts is wet and fenny, but the remainder of average quality for grain. The living is a donative; net income, £21; patron and impropiator, Sir C. M. Lamb, Bart.

THORPE-BY-WATER, a hamlet, in the parish of SEATON, union of UPPINGHAM, hundred of WRANDIKE, county of RUTLAND, 5 miles (S. E. by S.) from Uppingham; containing 84 inhabitants.

THORPE-CONSTANTINE (ST. CONSTANTINE), a parish, in the union of TAMWORTH, N. division of the hundred of OFFLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, 5 miles (N. E.) from Tamworth; containing 42 inhabitants. The parish comprises 953*a.* 1*r.* 4*p.*; the soil in some parts is a dark rich earth, and in others, a clayey mixture resting upon a bed of yellow sand. The road from Tamworth to Ashby-de-la-Zouch runs for about half a mile through the south-western extremity of the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 5. 5., and in the gift of W. Phillips Inge, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £230, and the glebe contains 100*a.* 3*r.* 8*p.* The church was rebuilt in 1778.

THORPE-IN-BALNE, a township, in the parish of BARNBY-UPON-DON, union of DONCASTER, S. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W.

riding of YORK, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Doncaster; containing 119 inhabitants. This township, which is on the west side of the Don, comprises by computation 1440 acres, in good cultivation; the village is small but neatly built, and is pleasantly situated on the bank of the river. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1810. Sundry small bequests are applied to instruction, and six children are taught at the expense of P. D. Cooke, Esq., of Ouston Park, in the neighbourhood. The remains of a chapel demolished several centuries ago have been converted into a barn.

THORPE-IN-THE-STREET, a township, in the parish of NUN-BURNHOLME, union of POCKLINGTON, Holme-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of YORK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Market-Weighton; containing 30 inhabitants.

THORPE-LE-SOKEN (St. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of TENDRING, N. division of ESSEX, 12 miles (E. S. E.) from Colchester; containing 1365 inhabitants. The three parishes of Thorpe, Kirby, and Walton, form a manor termed "the liberty of the Soken," having within its limits two or three reputed manors of smaller extent. It was given to the church of St. Paul, London, by King Athelstan, before 941, and belonged to the canons at the time of the Norman survey; the dean and chapter held it, with the three advowsons as their peculiars, until deprived of them by Henry VIII., and Mary, by letters-patent dated March 2nd, 1554, placed them under the visitation of the Bishop of London. Edward VI. granted the manors and advowsons, with all their privileges, to Sir Thomas D'Arcy, vice-chamberlain of his household, on his advancement to the barony, and they have since had various owners. The lord of the manor appoints a commissary, who has a court, proves wills, and grants marriage-licences, &c.; he also holds a court on St. Anne's-day, and chooses a coroner and other officers for the liberty. The parish comprises by admeasurement 3203 acres, of which 2574 are arable, 195 pasture, 32 woodland, and 402 salt-marsh and waste; the soil is in general fertile. A creek, or arm of the sea, runs up to Landermere, a small hamlet in the parish, where is a convenient wharf, at which vessels are laden with corn for the London market, and discharge their cargoes of coal, manure, &c. A customary market is held every Wednesday evening, and there are fairs on the Monday before Whitsuntide and September 29th. The petty-sessions for the division take place here on Monday, alternately with Mistley. The living is a discharged vicarage, consolidated with that of Walton and the vicarage of Kirby, and valued in the king's books at £16; impropiator, J. Martin Leake, Esq., of Thorpe Hall. The church, an ancient structure, was entirely repewed in 1827, when a gallery was erected; the chancel contains several monuments to the Leakes, and one to a member of the Wharton family, and there was formerly in the south aisle a sculptured figure of a warrior, with a lion at his feet, now preserved in the vestry-room. The Baptists have a place of worship. A number of French refugees settled and had a chapel here, but there are no remains.

THORPE-LE-WILLOWS, a township, in the parish of KILBURN, wapentake of BIRDFORTH, union of HELMSLEY, N. riding of YORK, 5 miles (S. by W.) of Helmsley; containing 19 inhabitants. The township comprises about 400 acres of land set out in three farms, and occupies a low situation near the confluence of two small rivulets. The appropriate tithes have been commuted for a rent-charge of £118. 17., payable to the Archbishop of York.

THORPE, LITTLE (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of DEPWADE, hundred of DISS, E. division of NORFOLK, 1 mile (E.) from Scole; containing 18 inhabitants, and comprising about 300 acres. The living is a rectory, annexed to that of Billingford, and valued in the king's books at £4: the great tithes belong to George Wilson, Esq. The church is in ruins.

THORPE-LUBENHAM, an extra-parochial place, in the union of MARKET-HARBOROUGH, hundred of ROTHWELL, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 2 miles (W. by S.) from Harborough; containing 11 inhabitants, and consisting of 367 acres.

THORPE-MALSOR (All Saints), a parish, in the union of KETTERING, hundred of ROTHWELL, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 2 miles (W. N. W.) from Kettering; containing 366 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 1000 acres: there are several quarries of red sandstone, the material of which is used for building. Thorpe-Malsor manor-house, a good building of the age of James I., and in the form of the letter H, is the seat of T. P. Maunsell, Esq., M.P. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 14. 2.; net income, £255; patron, Mr. Maunsell. The church is in the later English style, with a lofty and handsome spire, and contains memorials to the Maunsell family. Robert Talbot, an early English antiquary, was born here about the close of the fifteenth century.

THORPE-MANDEVILLE (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of BRACKLEY, hundred of KING'S-SUTTON, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 6 miles (N. E. by E.) from Banbury; containing 154 inhabitants. It comprises by admeasurement 900 acres: stone is quarried for the roads. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 2. 11.; net income, £281; patron, R. P. Humfrey, Esq. The tithes were partially commuted for land in 1773; the glebe contains about 175 acres. The church contains monuments to the Pargiter and Humfrey families.

THORPE, MARKET (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of ERPINGHAM, hundred of NORTH ERPINGHAM, E. division of NORFOLK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from North Walsham; containing 261 inhabitants. It comprises 1309*a.* 24*p.*, of which about 869 acres are arable, 157 pasture, and 256 woodland. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the donative mediety of Bradfield annexed, valued in the king's books at £5. 11. 3., and in the gift of the impropiator, Lord Suffield: the great tithes have been commuted for £155. 10., and the vicarial for £75; the glebe comprises 33 acres. The church, rebuilt at the expense of the first Lord Suffield, is an elegant structure of flint and freestone, having at each angle a turret, and each side being terminated by a gable, with a stone cross; the windows are adorned with modern stained glass.

THORPE-MORIEUX (St. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of COSFORD, W. division of SUFFOLK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Bildeston; containing 418 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £18. 14. $4\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £500; patron, the Rev. Thomas Harrison.

THORPE-NEXT-HADDISCOE (St. Matthias), a parish, in the union of LODDON and CLAVERING, hundred of CLAVERING, E. division of NORFOLK, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Beccles; containing 101 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £3. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown and Lord Calthorpe, alternately: the tithes have been commuted for £160, and the glebe contains nearly 15 acres. The church is partly in the early and partly in the later English style, and has a chancel of brick, lately erected, with a circular tower. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. The inhabitants are exempt from serving on juries, by a charter of Henry VI.

THORPE-ON-THE-HILL (All Saints), a parish, in the Lower division of the wapentake of BOOTHBY-GRAFFO, parts of KESTEVEN, union and county of LINCOLN, 6 miles (S. W.) from Lincoln; containing 342 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the Newark and Lincoln road, and comprises by measurement 1800 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 10.; net income, £247; patrons, the Dean and Chapter of Lincoln: the glebe contains 267 acres. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

THORPE-ON-THE-HILL, a township, in the parish of ROTHWELL, union of WAKEFIELD, Lower division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, W. riding of YORK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Leeds; containing 72 inhabitants. This place, which is now united with Lofthouse, was anciently the seat of the Swillingtons, and subsequently of the Gascoigne and Ingram families. The township comprises 521 acres; the soil is fertile, and the surrounding scenery pleasingly diversified. Benjamin Dealtry, Esq., is lord of the manor. Several Roman coins have been found, in the moulds in which they were formed.

THORPE-SALVIN (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of WORKSOP, S. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, 5 miles (W. by N.) from Worksop; containing 340 inhabitants. This place, which is situated at the junction of the counties of York, Derby, and Nottingham, was anciently the property of the Salvin family, and subsequently of the Sandfords, by whom the Hall was erected about the middle of the 16th century, which building, though now a ruin, displays evidences of its former importance. The parish comprises 2198a. 19p., chiefly the property of the Duke of Leeds; about 1572 acres are arable, 340 pasture, and 286 wood, and the soil is a rich earth, resting on limestone. The village, which is near the Chesterfield and Trent canal, is neatly built; there is a malting establishment; the making of bricks, for which clay of good quality is found in the parish, is carried on, and there are two corn-mills. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £63; patron and appropriator, the Chancellor of York Cathedral. The church was erected in the reign of Henry I., with the exception of the tower and north aisle, which are of later date; it retains much of its original character, and has a remarkably fine Norman porch; and in the interior are a noble arch, and a font of large dimensions, with sculptured representations of the seasons. A parochial school is supported by subscription.

THORPE-SATCHVILLE, a chapelry, in the parish of TWYFORD, union of MELTON-MOWBRAY, hundred of EAST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Melton-Mowbray; containing 153 inhabitants. The chapel is dedicated to St. Michael.

THORPE-TILNEY, a township, in the parish of TIMBERLAND, union of SLEAFORD, First division of the wapentake of LANGOE, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Sleaford; containing 126 inhabitants. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £327, and the vicarial for £93.

THORPE-UNDERWOOD, a hamlet, in the parish and hundred of ROTHWELL, union of KETTERING, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (W.) from Rothwell; containing 22 inhabitants, and consisting of 512 acres.

THORPE, WEST, a parish, in the wapentake of LAWRESS, parts of LINDSEY, union and county of LINCOLN, 7 miles (N. W. by N.) from Lincoln; containing 51 inhabitants, and comprising by admeasurement 857 acres. The living is a discharged vicarage, annexed to the rectory of Aisthorpe, and valued in the king's books at £5. 7. 6. There is no church.

THORPE-WILLOUGHBY, a township, in the parish of BRAYTON, union of SELBY, Lower division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, W. riding of YORK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Selby; containing 157 inhabitants. The township comprises by computation 430 acres, the property of the Hon. E. R. Petre, lord of the manor: the village is pleasantly situated on the road to Leeds.

THORPLAND, a parish, in the union of DOWNHAM, hundred of CLACKCLOSE, W. division of NORFOLK, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.) from Downham-Market; comprising about 440 acres. The living is a rectory, consolidated with those of Holme, South Runcton, and Wallington: the church, dedicated to St. Thomas, has long been in ruins.

THORPLAND, a hamlet, in the parish of FAKENHAM-LANCASTER, union of WALSINGHAM, hundred of GALLOW, W. division of NORFOLK, 2 miles (N.) from Fakenham. There was formerly a chapel.

THORRINGTON (St. Mary Magdalene), a parish, in the union and hundred of TENDRING, N. division of ESSEX, 7 miles (S. E. by E.) from Colchester; containing 531 inhabitants. It comprises 1930 acres of land, of which 37 are common or waste; the situation is low, and the soil light, and much intermixed with sand. The living is a rectory, united to that of Frating, and valued in the king's books at £16: the church is an ancient edifice, with a tower of flint and stone. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

THORVERTON (St. Thomas à Becket), a parish, in the union of TIVERTON, hundred of HAYRIDGE, Colmington and N. divisions of DEVON, 7 miles (W. S. W.) from Collumpton; containing 1445 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Exeter to Tiverton, and bounded on the east by the river Exe, and comprises by admeasurement 4000 acres: stone is quarried for building. Sheep-fairs are held in February and July. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £18. 12. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Exeter: the great tithes have been commuted for £530, and the vicarial for £446; there is a glebe of 27 acres, and a substantial parsonage-house has been recently built. The church, which is very handsome, is supposed to have been erected in the reign of King John. There is a place of worship for Baptists; also a school is endowed with £18 per annum. At East

Raddon was formerly a chapel dedicated to St. John the Baptist, the remains of which have been converted into a dwelling-house called "No Man's Chapel."

THOYDON-BOIS (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of EPPING, hundred of ONGAR, S. division of ESSEX, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Epping; containing 538 inhabitants. This parish, which is the least extensive of the three named Thoydon, is partly included in Epping Forest, and takes its distinguishing epithet from the abundance of woodlands within its boundaries. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the gift of R. W. H. Dare, Esq., with a net income of £68: the church is a small edifice, with a belfry tower of wood surmounted by a shingled spire.

THOYDON - GARNON, - or COOPER - SAIL (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of EPPING, hundred of ONGAR, S. division of ESSEX, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Epping; containing 1072 inhabitants. The parish takes the adjunct to its name from the family of Gernon, who were anciently its proprietors; it comprises 2910 acres, of which 100 are common or waste land. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £17, and in the patronage of the Abdy family: the tithes have been commuted for £634, and there is a glebe of 64 acres. The church is an ancient edifice, with a massive square tower, and contains some interesting monuments; on the steeple is an inscription commemorating the bounty of Sir John Crosbie, the founder of Crosbie Hall, London, who contributed largely towards its erection. Lady Ann Sydney Fitzwilliam, in 1602, bequeathed a small rent-charge towards the foundation of an almshouse for four widows; and in this parish is situated the Epping union workhouse. Baron Dimsdale, the celebrated inoculator for the small-pox, was born here.

THOYDON, MOUNT (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union and hundred of ONGAR, S. division of ESSEX, 4 miles (S. E.) from Epping; containing 217 inhabitants. It derives the adjunct to its name from its situation in the most elevated portion of the ancient district of Thoydon. The living is a rectory, annexed to that of Tawney-Stapleford, and valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8.: the tithes have been commuted for £301, and the glebe comprises $19\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church is a handsome edifice, containing many fine monuments to the family of Snyth, among which is one to the memory of Sir Thomas Smyth, chancellor of the garter, and principal secretary of state, in the reigns of Edward VI. and Elizabeth.

THRANDESTON (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the parliamentary borough of EYE, union and hundred of HARTISMERE, W. division of SUFFOLK, 3 miles (N. W.) from Eye; containing 373 inhabitants. A considerable fair is held on the 31st of July, chiefly for lambs and cattle. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8.; net income, £391; patron, Sir E. Kerrison, Bart. The parsonage-house has been much improved by the present incumbent, the Rev. Nathaniel D'Eye; the glebe contains about 13 acres. The church is chiefly in the later style, with a lofty embattled tower; the nave is lighted by clerestory windows, and separated from the chancel by a carved screen. There are some cottages and land, the rental of which, amounting to about £26, is applied to parochial purposes.

THRAPSTON, or THRAPSTONE (St. JAMES), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of NAVISFORD, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 21 miles (N. E. by E.) from Northampton, and 74 (N. N. W.) from London; containing 1131 inhabitants. This small town is delightfully situated in a rich and luxuriant valley, on the eastern bank of the river Nene, over which is a bridge of several arches, constructed partly of wood and partly of stone, in 1795, in lieu of an old stone structure swept away by an inundation in that year. The houses are neat and regularly built, and the inhabitants are well supplied with excellent water; the vicinity is adorned with numerous residences of the nobility and gentry; there are 24 villages within five miles of the town, and, from an adjacent eminence, 32 churches may be seen. The town appears to have been more extensive than it is at present, as several traces of buildings destroyed by fire are visible. The principal articles of manufacture are whips and bobbin-lace; a few persons are employed in patten-making; on the river are corn-mills and a paper-mill, and in the neighbourhood are two stone quarries, the material of which is used for the roads. Some trade is carried on in conveying grain, by means of the Nene, which was made navigable in 1737, to Northampton, Peterborough, Lynn, and other places; and in bringing back timber, coal, and other commodities. The market, on Tuesday, partly for corn and seed, is the largest hog-market in the county; and fairs are held on the first Tuesday in May, for cattle and sheep, and on August 5th, for the hiring of servants, and for cattle, and shoes and pedlery: on the first Tuesday after Old Michaelmas-day, is a very large fair for cattle. There is a resident magistrate; and subordinate officers are appointed at the manorial court, the court of the honour of Gloucester, and that for Navisford hundred, all of which are held here. The parish contains 1098 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 5. 5., and has a net income of £348; it is in the patronage of the Crown, and the glebe contains $227\frac{1}{2}$ acres, with a handsome house recently built. The church, which was extensively repaired in 1810, is a cruciform structure, with a western tower and spire, combining the early, decorated, and later English styles; in the chancel are three stone stalls, with rich mouldings and crocketed canopies, and in the churchyard is an ancient and very curious monument. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans. The poor law union comprises 26 parishes or places, 20 of which are in the county of Northampton, and 6 in that of Huntingdon, and contains a population of 12,041.

THREAPLAND, a township, in the parish of TORPENHOW, union of COCKERMOUTH, ALLERDALE ward below Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Cockermouth; containing, with Bothel, 455 inhabitants. The tithes were commuted for land in 1811.

THRECKINGHAM (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of SLEAFORD, wapentake of AVELAND, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, 2 miles (N. E. by N.) from Falkingham; containing, with the hamlet of Stow, 197 inhabitants. The road from Bridge-End, Spalding, and Boston, to Grantham, runs through the parish. A rough kind of stone is quarried for building and for the roads; and a fair is held in June for horses and general stock, and another in July for hardware and various fancy articles. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 8. 9.; net income, £144; patron and impropiator, Sir G. Heathcote, Bart. The tithes were commuted for land in 1768. The church has a lofty tower and spire, and exhibits a curious admixture of the Norman, early English, and decorated styles; in the chancel is an elegant stall; the font is circular, with early English panelling, and there are some old monuments and good screen-work. Vestiges of Roman roads can be traced in the neighbourhood; and remains of ancient barrows are to be seen, the memorials of a battle fought between the Danes and Saxons, in which three Danish kings in succession were killed on the first day's fight, but the Saxons were at last defeated, partly by a ruse de guerre, and partly by numerous reinforcements being received by the Danes.

THREE-FARMS, a township, in the parish of EC-CLESHALL, union of STONE, N. division of the hundred of PIREHILL and of the county of STAFFORD; containing 71 inhabitants.

THRELKELD, a chapelry, in the parish of GREY-STOCK, union of PENRITH, LEATH ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Keswick; containing 332 inhabitants. It comprises 2200 acres, one-third of which is poor pasture and woodland, and the remainder about equally divided between arable and meadow. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £53; patron, the Earl of Lonsdale. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, was rebuilt by subscription in 1776, at a cost of £270.

THRESHFIELD, a township, in the parish of LINTON, union of SKIPTON, E. division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, W. riding of YORK, 9 miles (N.) from Skipton; containing 221 inhabitants. The township, including the hamlet of Skythorne, comprises about 1990 acres, chiefly meadow and pasture; the soil is generally light, resting on a substratum of limestone. A school is endowed with £30 per annum.

THREXTON, a parish, in the union of SWAFFHAM, hundred of WAXLAND, W. division of NORFOLK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Watton; containing 19 inhabitants. It comprises 1059a. 2r. 39p., of which 840 acres are arable, 101 meadow and pasture, and 118 woodland; the surface is undulated, and the scenery pleasingly diversified. The living is a discharged rectory, annexed to the vicarage of Swaffham, and valued in the king's books at £7. 9. $4\frac{1}{2}$.: the tithes have been commuted for £171. The church has a low round steeple; the east end of the north aisle has been converted into a mausoleum. To the south of the church is a Roman encampment where several antiquities have been found.

THRIBERGH (St. LEONARD), a parish, in the union of ROTHERHAM, S. division of the wapentake of STRAF-FORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, 3 miles (N. E.) from Rotherham; containing, with part of the township of Dalton, 314 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1624a. 1r. 27p., of which about 800 acres are arable, 770 pasture, and about 30 woodland, all the property of John Fullerton, Esq., lord of the manor; the soil is fertile, and the scenery richly diversified. Thribergh Park, the seat of Mr. Fullerton, is a handsome mansion in the early English style of domestic architecture, finely situated in a well-wooded park, and commanding some interesting views. The village is on the road to Doncaster, and is small but neatly built. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 11. $5\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of Mr. Fullerton: the tithes have been commuted for £190; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe consists of $117\frac{3}{4}$ acres. The church is principally in the later English style, with a square embattled tower surmounted by a spire, and contains some remains of the ancient stained glass with which its windows were formerly embellished. Elizabeth Finch, in 1760, bequeathed money producing ten guineas a year, and the Rev. W. Hedges £9 annually, for teaching children. A new schoolroom has been erected by Mr. Fullerton, who pays for the instruction of a number of boys and girls.

THRIGBY (St. MARY), a parish, in the EAST and WEST FLEGG incorporation, hundred of EAST FLEGG, E. division of NORFOLK, 7 miles (N. W. by W.) from Yarmouth; containing 53 inhabitants. The parish comprises 575a. 3r. 2p., of which about 436 acres are arable, and the remainder meadow and marsh; the principal part belongs to Thomas Browne, Esq., who resides at the Hall, a neat mansion of white brick. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6, and in the gift of Mr. Browne: the tithes have been commuted for £210. 17., and the glebe comprises $4\frac{1}{2}$ acres.

THRIMBY with LITTLE STRICKLAND, a chapelry, in the parish of MORLAND, WEST ward and union, county of WESTMORLAND, 3 miles (N. by W.) from Shap; containing 200 inhabitants, of whom 66 are in the township of Thrimby. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £53; patron, the Vicar of Morland; appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Carlisle, whose tithes were commuted for land in 1830, and under the late act for a rent-charge of £20. 13. 10. There is a glebe of $25\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, was consecrated in 1814, having been rebuilt at Little Strickland, together with a school-house, by the Earl of Lonsdale. The school was founded in 1684, by Thomas Fletcher, Esq., who endowed it with a rent-charge of £10, for the teacher and incumbent.

THRINGSTONE, a chapelry, in the parish of WHITWICK, union of ASHBY-DE-LA-ZOUCH, hundred of WEST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E.) from Ashby; containing 1232 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Whitwick, with a net income of £120; impropiator, Sir G. Beaumont, Bart. The tithes were commuted for land in 1803, under an inclosure act. The chapel is dedicated to St. George. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a national school has been established.

THRILOW (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of ROYSTON, hundred of THRILOW, county of CAMBRIDGE, 6 miles (N. N. E.) from Royston; containing 477 inhabitants. A grand rendezvous of the army commanded by Fairfax and Cromwell, took place on Thriplow Heath, in July 1647; and instruments of warfare are frequently found. The parish comprises 2296 acres, of which 1609 are common or waste land: an inclosure act was passed in 1840, when about five acres were allotted for recreation. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the patronage of the Bishop of Ely, valued in the king's books at £4. 9. 2.: the great tithes belonging to Peter House, Cambridge, have been commuted for £617. 12., and the vicarial for £134. 11.; the impropriate glebe contains $55\frac{1}{2}$ acres, and the vicarial nearly one acre. The church is an ancient cruciform structure, and has several monuments to the family of Lucas. There is a place of worship for Independents.

THRISLINGTON, a township, in the parish of BISHOP'S-MIDDLEHAM, union of SEDGEFIELD, N. E. division of STOCKTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Durham; containing 24 inhabitants. This place, originally called Thurstanton, is bounded on the west by the North Skerne, which, rising in the marsh between Ferryhill and Thrislington, pursues its course two ways, to the north and the south. The produce of a colliery here, is shipped on the Tees. Thrislington Hall stands immediately on the east bank of the marsh; and on the west side are the reliques of the ancient "wood of Fery," now reduced to a straggling hazel copse, interspersed with a few remains of old forest timber, ash and elm. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £9. 13.

THRISTON, or THIRSTON, EAST and WEST, with SHOT-HAUGH, a township, in the parish of FELTON, union of ALNWICK, E. division of MORPETH ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $9\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Alnwick; containing 307 inhabitants, of whom 60 are in East, and 247 in West, Thriston. These places lie close to the river Coquet, on its south side, and the road between Morpeth and Alnwick runs near them; they comprise together about 2342 acres, of which the soil is loamy, and very productive. The Duke of Northumberland, A. R. Fenwick, Esq., of Netherton House, and Thomas Smith, Esq., are the proprietors. Thriston House, the seat of Mr. Smith, built in 1825, is a neat and commodious mansion.

THROAPHAM, a township, in the parish of LAUGHTON-EN-LE-MORTHEN, union of WORKSOP, S. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Tickhill; containing 69 inhabitants. The township comprises about 1100 acres of land in good cultivation, and consists chiefly of scattered hamlets, among which is that of Thorpe St. John, containing an ancient church that from time immemorial has been annexed to Laughton, with which parish it is identified. The tithes, including those of Thwaite, have been commuted for £200, of which £150 are payable to the prebendary of Laughton, and £50 to the vicar of the parish, and perpetual curate of St. John's.

THROCKING (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of BUNTINGFORD, hundred of EDWINSTREE, county of HERTFORD, 2 miles (W. N. W.) from Buntingford; containing 66 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the highest ground in the county, and comprises by computation between 900 and 1000 acres: the road from London to Cambridge runs along its eastern boundary. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8; net income, £252; patron and incumbent, the Rev. W. Adams. There is a small glebe, given by the late patron, with a good house lately erected. The church contains several monuments to the family of Elwes, who formerly had a mansion here; and one of the memorials, executed by Nollekens, is of very superior character.

THROCKLEY, a township, in the parish of NEWBURN; union and W. division of CASTLE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Newcastle; containing 160 inhabitants, and comprising by computation 735 acres. Throckley Fell, on the north side of the road between Newcastle and Hexham, was inclosed under an act obtained in 1816. A school is partly supported by an allowance of £5 per annum from Greenwich Hospital.

THROCKMORTON, a chapelry, in the parish of FLADBURY, union of PERSHORE, Middle division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, Pershore and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Pershore; containing 157 inhabitants, and comprising 1396 acres.

THROOP, a tything, in the parochial chapelry of HOLDENHURST, parish and union of CHRISTCHURCH, liberty of WESTOVER, Ringwood and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 96 inhabitants. It is on the southern bank of the Stour.

THROPPE, a township, in the parish of MITFORD, union, and W. division of the ward, of MORPETH, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 4 miles (W.) from Morpeth; containing 59 inhabitants. This place has been successively the property of the families of Bertram, Eure, Reveley, and Mitford, from which last family Henry Reveley Mitford, Esq., the present proprietor, is descended. The township comprises about 900 acres, of which 875 are arable, meadow, and pasture, and 25 woodland and plantations; the surface is pleasingly varied, and the village is situated on an eminence commanding extensive prospects over the land and sea. The improper tithes have been commuted for £72. 16. 7. At Whittle Hill are some slight remains of a camp, of which the intrincments have been removed for repairing the roads, and the site almost obliterated by the plough: near it is an ancient barrow, in which coins have been found.

THROPTON, a township, in the parish and union of ROTHBURY, W. division of COQUETDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W. by N.) from Rothbury; containing 207 inhabitants. The township comprises 835 acres, of which 670 are arable, 113 meadow and pasture, 10 woodland and plantations, and the remainder roads and waste; the surface is beautifully undulated, and the scenery pleasingly varied; the soil in the valley is a rich loam, but on the hills rocky and less fertile. There are some quarries of excellent stone for building, two of which belong to the Duke of Northumberland. The village is situated near the confluence of the river Coquet and the Wreigh burn, of which the former is a remarkably fine trout stream, winding through a picturesque vale, and over the latter a substantial bridge was erected by subscription, in 1810, to replace a structure which had fallen down some years before. At the eastern and western extremities of the village were formerly stone crosses, erected at the junction of three roads, and which have disappeared within the last age. The tithes have been commuted for £175. 17. 6. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians; and a Roman Catholic chapel, to which is attached a house, with about 8 acres of land, has been recently enlarged and repaired, and is under the pastoral superintendence of the Rev. Dr. Corless. A school, which has been built by subscription, is supported chiefly by the contributions of the children attending it. In the village are the remains of three strong holds and a border tower, used as places of security for cattle and other property, during time of warfare; and on a hill, about half a mile distant, are some remains of a Roman camp.

THROSTON, a township, in the parish of HART, union of STOCKTON, N. E. division of STOCKTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.) from Hartlepool; containing 101 inhabitants. This district, which adjoins Tunstall, in the parish of Stranton, has always formed a part of the Hart estate, or belonged to the same proprietors, and was conveyed, with Hart, by the Earl of Cumberland to Lord Lumley, in 1586; it was also included in the sale of the Hart property for £72,000, by the Earl of Scarborough to Sir George Pocock, in 1772. The township comprises about 1050 acres, and the village is situated a mile and a half south-south-east of Hart. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £201. 5., and the vicarial for £28. 12.

THROWLEY, a parish, in the union of OAKHAMPTON, hundred of WONFORD, WONFORD and S. divisions of DEVON, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Oakhampton; containing 445 inhabitants. It comprises about 1800 acres, the surface of which is hilly, and the soil in general loose and sandy: the river Teign forms one of the boundaries. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £19. 6. $10\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £172; a parsonage-house is attached to the benefice, and the glebe contains about 50 acres. The church is a small plain building. There are some remains of a chapel at Walland Hill.

THROWLEY (St. Mary), a parish, in the union and hundred of FAVERSHAM, upper division of the lathe of SCRAY, E. division of KENT, 4 miles (S. S. W.) from Faversham; containing 682 inhabitants. The parish is situated near the road from Faversham to Ashford, and comprises by admeasurement 3173 acres, about 2235 of which are arable and hop-grounds, 530 orchard and meadow, 320 wood, and the remainder roads, &c.; the soil is a strong loam, with a considerable admixture of flints, and rests upon chalk. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 11. 8., and in the gift of the appropriator, the Prebendary of Rugmere in the Cathedral of St. Paul, London: the prebendal tithes have been commuted for £602. 10., and the vicarial for £257, with a glebe of 25 acres. Sir Thomas Sondes, in 1592, endowed a free school, which has merged into a national school established in 1814; and there are three almshouses, founded by the same family. The vicarage-house occupies the site of a priory which was a cell to the abbey of St. Bertin, at St. Omers, in Artois, and was granted, in the 22nd of Henry VI., to the abbey of Sion.

THROWLEY, a hamlet, in the parish of ILAM, N. division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Ashbourn; containing 69 inhabitants. Throwley Hall, now a farm-house, is an ancient mansion, once occupied by the family of Oliver Cromwell.

THROXENBY, a township, in the parish of SCALBY, union of SCARBOROUGH, PICKERING lythe, N. riding of YORK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Scarborough; containing 71 inhabitants. It comprises about 400 acres: the village is a mile north-west of Falsgrave.

THRUMPTON (All Saints), a parish, in the union of BASFORD, N. division of the wapentake of RUSHCLIFFE, S. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 7 miles (S. W.) from Nottingham; containing 147 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the Trent, and comprises by computation 900 acres. On the bank of the river is a fine old mansion, built by the Pigot family in 1630, in the style prevalent in the reign of Elizabeth. The Midland-Counties' railway passes through the parish, within a mile of the village. The living is a perpetual curacy, with a net income of £77, and in the patronage of the coheiresses of the late J. E. Wescomb, Esq.

THRUNSCOE, a hamlet, in the parish of CLEE, union of CAISTOR, wapentake of BRADLEY-HAVERSTOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN; containing 25 inhabitants.

THRUP, a hamlet, in the parish of KIDLINGTON, union of WOODSTOCK, hundred of WOOTTON, county of OXFORD, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (E. S. E.) from Woodstock; containing 125 inhabitants.

THRUPP and WICK, a liberty, in the parish of RADLEY, union of ABINGDON, hundred of HORMER, county of BERKS, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (E.) from Abingdon; containing 28 inhabitants.

THRUPP, a hamlet, in the parish of NORTON, union of DAVENTRY, hundred of FAWSLEY, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON; containing 46 inhabitants.

THRUPP, THE, a hamlet, in the parish and union of STROUD, hundred of BISLEY, East division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 1 mile from Stroud. It is pleasantly situated in a vale through which passes the Thames and Severn canal, affording a facility of conveyance for the produce of the several works carried on within its limits. Of these the principal are for the manufacture of superfine woollen-cloths, chiefly black, for which there are two very extensive and several smaller establishments, together employing about 2000 persons. In the hamlet are also a large wool-stapling business, an extensive iron and brass foundry, and a general engineering establishment, in which from 40 to 50 persons are regularly engaged. There is an endowed school in connexion with the Established Church.

THRUSCROSS, or WEST-END, a chapelry, in the parish of FEWSTON, union of PATELEY-BRIDGE, Lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, W. riding of YORK, 10 miles (N. N. W.) from Otley; containing 576 inhabitants. The chapelry comprises the hamlets of Bramley-Head, West-End, Low-Green, Thruscross-Green, and Rockingstone-Hall, and contains about 6340 acres, of which a considerable portion is moorland, and the remainder meadow and pasture, with a little arable, in good cultivation; the surface is diversified with hills and valleys richly wooded. Considerable quantities of flax are spun, for the preparation of which there are four flax-mills, partially in operation. The village is beautifully situated in a romantic vale. The chapel, a neat edifice, was enlarged in 1810, and in 1841 was repaired and beautified by voluntary contributions; it is served by the vicar or his curate, the stipend of the latter being derived from a grant by the Church Pastoral Aid Society. There are places of worship for Primitive Methodists and Wesleyans; and a school in connexion with the Established Church has been built by Stephen Nicholson, Esq., of Roundhay, who gives £15 per annum, and the farmers £20, towards its support.

THRUSHELTON (St. George), a parish, in the union of TAVISTOCK, hundred of LIFTON, Lifton and S. divisions of DEVON, 10 miles (S. W. by W.) from Oakhampton; containing 628 inhabitants. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Mary-Stow: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £130, and the vicarial for £109. By a deed dated 1504, the parishioners were allowed on certain conditions to have a cemetery near their chapel, to avoid the difficulty they experienced from inundation, in conveying their dead to the burial-ground of the mother church at Mary-Stow.

THRUSSINGTON (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of BARROW-UPON-SOAR, hundred of EAST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, $8\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Leicester; containing 645 inhabitants. The parish is situated about a mile from the Leicester and Melton-Mowbray road, and comprises 1953a. 3r. 31p., of which 911 acres are arable, 1002 pasture, and 40 woodland; the soil in some parts is clayey, and in others sandy, and the river Wreak and the Melton navigation pass through the parish. Here are the kennels of the Melton Hunt, erected at an expense of £12,000, by the late Sir Harry Goodricke, Bart.; they contain stabling for 60 horses, and kennels for 300 hounds, with offices for 20 servants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6; net income, £240; patron and incumbent, the Rev. C. B. Woolley. The church, which is a very ancient edifice, has been lately repewed.

THRUXTON (ST. BARTHOLOMEW), a parish, in the union of DORE, hundred of WESTREE, county of HEREFORD, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Hereford; containing 55 inhabitants, and comprising 430 acres. The living is a discharged rectory, with the vicarage of Kingstone united, valued in the king's books at £4. 8. 4.; net income, £252; patron, the Dean; appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Hereford. The tithes of Thrupton have been commuted for £99. 15., and the glebe consists of $8\frac{1}{2}$ acres.

THRUXTON (HOLY ROAD), a parish, in the union and hundred of ANDOVER, Andover and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 5 miles (W.) from Andover; containing 246 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 1804 acres, of which 1457 are arable, 271 pasture, and 76 woodland and plantation. Redenham, in the parish, is the seat of Sir John Pollen, Bart. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15. 12. 11., and in the gift of the incumbent, the Rev. Donald Baynes: the tithes have been commuted for £387, and there are 50 acres of glebe. The church was repaired in 1839, and an east window of painted glass presented by the Rev. D. Baynes. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A beautiful Roman pavement, nearly perfect, was discovered in 1823.

THUNDERLEY, a hamlet (formerly a distinct parish), in the parish of WIMBISH, union of SAFFRON-WALDEN, hundred of UTTLESFORD, N. division of ESSEX, 2 miles (S. E. by S.) from Saffron-Walden. The vicarage has been consolidated with that of Wimbish: the church is in ruins.

THUNDERSLEY (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union of BILLERICAY, partly in the hundred of ROCHFORD, but chiefly in the hundred of BARSTABLE, S. division of ESSEX, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Rayleigh; containing 596 inhabitants, of whom 120 are in the hamlet. The parish is about two miles in length, and a mile and a half in breadth, and comprises 2100 acres, of which 100 are common or waste; the village is on elevated ground, and the surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 13. 4., and in the gift of the Rev. G. Hemming: the tithes have been commuted for £570; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 40 acres. The church is a venerable structure in the later Norman and early English styles, with a tower and spire.

THUNDRIDGE (ST. MARY AND ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of WARE, hundred of BRAUGHIN, county of HERTFORD, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Ware; containing, with part of the hamlet of Wadesmill, 535 inhabitants, and comprising 2170 acres. The living is a vicarage, annexed to that of Ware, and valued in the king's books at £6. The church, which is ornamented by an embattled tower with a lofty spire, had formerly a Norman arch between the nave and chancel, but, having been enlarged, in recently repairing the edifice, its original character has been destroyed.

THURCASTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of BARROW-UPON-SOAR, hundred of WEST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, 4 miles (N. by W.) from Leicester; containing, with the chapelry of Anstey and the township of Cropston, 1230 inhabitants, of whom 281 are in Thurcaston township. The parish comprises by admeasurement 1198 acres: stocking-frame knitting is carried on to a small extent. The living is a rectory, with Anstey consolidated, valued in the king's books at £23. 7. $8\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £676; patrons, the Master and Fellows of Emanuel College, Cambridge, to whom the advowson was given by Sir Francis Walsingham, secretary of state to Queen Elizabeth. The tithes were commuted for land and an annual money payment in 1798; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises between 400 and 500 acres. The Rev. Richard Hill, in 1730, bequeathed land now producing £21 a year, for teaching children. The zealous and venerable reformer and martyr, Hugh Latimer, Bishop of Worcester, was born here about 1480; and Dr. Hurd, bishop of the same diocese, was for some time incumbent: a handsome monument to the former has just been erected in the church, surmounted by his bust in white marble.

THURGARTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of ERPINGHAM, hundred of NORTH ERPINGHAM, E. division of NORFOLK, 8 miles (N.) from Aylsham; containing 247 inhabitants. Of this place, in Domesday book called Thurgartund, the abbot of St. Bennet at Holme, was lord of the manor in the reign of Edward the Confessor; and in the 5th year of King John, Thomas de Thurgarton held lands of the abbot. At the Dissolution, Henry VIII. settled the income of the abbey on the Bishop of Norwich, since which time the lordship has been appropriated to that see. The parish comprises by admeasurement 969 acres; the surface is flat, and the soil a good loamy earth. Thurgarton Hall is the residence of W. D. Spurrell, Esq., whose family have occupied the mansion for several centuries. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithes have been commuted for £232; the glebe contains 10 acres. The church, in the decorated style, consists of a nave and chancel separated by a carved screen, and has several memorials to the Spurrell family.

THURGARTON (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union of SOUTHWELL, S. division of the wapentake of THURGARTON and of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles

(S. by W.) from Southwell; containing 365 inhabitants. It is situated at the foot of a declivity overlooking the vale of the Trent. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £56; patrons and impropiators, the Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge. The church, formerly a magnificent structure, now consists only of one aisle. An Augustine priory in honour of St. Peter, was founded here in 1130, by Ralph de Ayncourt, and had a revenue of £359. 15. 10.

THURGOLAND, a township, in the parish of SILKSTONE, union of WORTLEY, wapentake of STAINCROSS, W. riding of YORK, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Penistone; containing 1333 inhabitants. The township comprises about 2080 acres, irregularly broken into hills; the scenery is wild and varied, and the higher grounds command extensive prospects embracing large tracts of wood and fertile vales; the substratum abounds with coal of excellent quality, of which there are several mines in operation. The village is built on an eminence on the road from Sheffield to Penistone, overlooking the river Don, and many of the inhabitants are employed in the manufacture of steel and iron wire. The Manchester and Sheffield railway passes through the township, within half a mile of the village. A church was erected in 1841, at an expense of £1400, on a site given by Lord Wharnccliffe, who also presented £100; it contains 507 sittings, of which 104 are free. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a school for boys and girls, of whom the latter are taught reading, needlework, and knitting, was built and is supported by subscription. Francis Wood, Esq., bequeathed property producing £5 per annum, for distribution among the poor. In a field called Chapel Flat, near Pule-Hill Hall, the remains of an ancient chapel were visible till about a century since; and in digging the ground in search of stone, several human bones have been found, at a depth of three feet from the surface.

THURLASTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of BLARY, hundred of SPARKENHOE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, 6 miles (N. E. by E.) from Hinckley; containing, with the hamlet of Normanton-Turville, 694 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1727 acres, of which 100 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 19. 7.; net income, £400; patron, R. Arkwright, Esq. The chancel of the church is the property of the lord of the manor. A school was erected in 1804, on the glebe land, by the Rev. Joseph Arkwright, rector, in consequence of an endowment of about £8 per annum bequeathed in 1802, by William Smart.

THURLASTON, a township, in the parish of DUNCHURCH, union of RUGBY, Rugby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, N. division of the county of WARWICK, 1 mile (W.) from Dunchurch; containing 307 inhabitants, and comprising 1714 acres of a moderately productive soil.

THURLBEAR (ST. THOMAS), a parish, in the union of TAUNTON, hundred of NORTH CURRY, W. division of SOMERSET, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Taunton; containing 194 inhabitants. The parish comprises by admeasurement 940 acres: limestone is quarried, and other stone for building. The living is a rectory and donative, in the gift of Lord Portman: the tithes have been commuted for £150; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 36 acres. The church, a Norman structure, was anciently a chapel to the vicarage of St. Mary Magdalene, in Taunton, but the tithes were restored by Sir Thomas Petman, Bart.

THURLBY (ST. GERMAN), a parish, in the union of NEWARK, Lower division of the wapentake of BOOTHBY-GRAFFO, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Lincoln; containing 154 inhabitants. The parish lies between the rivers Trent and Witham, the latter celebrated for its eels and pike, and comprises 1802a. 11p., of which the surface rises gradually from each river towards the centre of the parish, supplying important facilities for the drainage of fenny land; the soil, comprising almost every variety, is admirably adapted to the growth of the different kinds of produce. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £55; patron and appropriator, the Prebendary of Carlton cum Thurlby in the Cathedral of Lincoln, whose tithes have been commuted for £204: the glebe comprises about 20 acres. The church is principally in the later English style.

THURLBY, a hamlet, in the parish of BILSBY, union of SPILSBY, Wold division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Alford; containing 31 inhabitants. It was anciently a parish, and had a church.

THURLBY (ST. FIRMIN), a parish, in the union of BOURNE, wapentake of NESS, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Market-Deeping; containing, with the hamlets of Northorpe and Obthorpe, 699 inhabitants. The parish is on the road from Lincoln to Peterborough, and comprises by admeasurement 3842 acres, of which the soil passes through several varieties, from the gravelly earth of the hill to the loamy alluvial soil of the fen. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 9. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £252; patrons and impropiators, the Provost and Fellows of Eton College. The tithes were commuted for land in 1802; there is a parsonage-house, with 200 acres of land. The church, a handsome cruciform structure, comprises portions of the Norman and of the three styles of English architecture, and contains curious specimens of early piscinæ and sedilia, with the remains of a very old rood-loft; also two chantries, and a fine circular Norman font. The Wesleyans have a place of worship. The ancient Roman canal, Carr Dyke, passes close by the church.

THURLEIGH (ST. PETER), a parish, in the hundred of WILLEY, union and county of BEDFORD, 6 miles (N.) from Bedford; containing 617 inhabitants. It comprises by admeasurement 3379 acres: the manufacture of pillow-lace employs nearly the whole female population above 6 years of age. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9; net income, £142; patron and impropiator, S. Crawley, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1805; there is a parsonage-house, with 237 acres of land. The church, chiefly in the later English style, has an ancient tower entered by a Norman doorway, in which is an arch filled up with a stone block containing a sculptured representation of the Temptation and Fall of Adam and Eve in Paradise. There is a place of worship for Baptists; also a national school endowed with £17 per annum. Here is the moated site of the ancient mansion of Blackbull Hall; and on Bury Hill are vestiges of a circular camp.

THURLESTONE, a parish, in the union of KINGSBRIDGE, hundred of STANBOROUGH, Stanborough and Coleridge, and S. divisions of DEVON, 4 miles (W. by S.) from Kingsbridge; containing 437 inhabitants. This parish, situated on the coast of the English Channel, and on the east bank of the river Avon, at its confluence with the sea, comprises 1763a. 29p., of which about 1253 acres are arable, 167 meadow and pasture, 62 orchards and gardens, 100 brakes and common, and the remainder beach, &c. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £25. 10., and in the patronage of Sir J. B. Y. Buller, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £328. 10., and the glebe consists of about 33 acres, with an excellent house, lately built by the incumbent. The church appears to have been erected about the 14th century, in the early English style, and contains 200 sittings, of which about 50 are free. A remarkable rock, called Thurlestone rock, stands about a furlong out at sea, and is supposed to have given the name to the parish; it is arched, and in stormy weather, the noise of the resounding waves may be heard many miles off.

THURLESTONE, a township, in the parish of PENISTONE, union of WORTLEY, wapentake of STAINCROSS, W. riding of YORK, 8½ miles (S. W.) from Barnsley; containing 1872 inhabitants. The township comprises 7740 acres, a considerable portion of which is wild moor, extending to the confines of the county of Chester, but that under cultivation is fertile and productive. The substratum is generally coal, grit-stone, and iron-stone, all of which have been more fully disclosed in excavating the line for the Sheffield and Manchester railway. There are some woollen manufactories, and the village is spacious and well built, and situated on the river Don, on the banks of which are several mills. The Independents and Wesleyans each have a place of worship; and an old chapel, built by Presbyterians, is still used as a meeting-house by dissenters. Nicholas Saunderson, the eminent mathematician, and author of the Elements of Algebra, and a treatise on Fluxions, was born here in 1682; he lost his sight in infancy, but learned to read by passing his fingers over the inscriptions on the gravestones in the churchyard, and in addition to a profound knowledge of the mathematics, though blind, made himself perfect master of the dead languages. There is an inscription to his memory on a wall opposite the mansion of John C. Milner, Esq.

THURLOW, GREAT (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union and hundred of RISBRIDGE, W. division of SUFFOLK, 9 miles (S. by E.) from Newmarket; containing 431 inhabitants, and comprising 2023a. 2r. 12p. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 11. 5½., and has a net income of £300; the Queen presents, on the nomination of the owner of the manor, and the impropriation belongs to Lady Harland; the tithes have been commuted for £497. 10., and the glebe contains 72 acres. An hospital, or free chapel, dedicated to St. James, and subordinate to that of Hautpays, or De Alto Passu, was founded here in the time of Richard II., and, at the suppression of alien houses, was valued at £3 per annum, and granted by Edward IV. to the Maison de Dieu, in Cambridge, now part of King's College. Great Thurlow Hall was the seat of the Vernon family.

THURLOW, LITTLE (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union and hundred of RISBRIDGE, W. division of SUFFOLK, 5½ miles (N. by E.) from Haverhill; containing 422 inhabitants. Little Thurlow Hall, which has been the seat of the family of Soame since the reign of Elizabeth, was built by Sir Stephen Soame, Kut., lord mayor of London, who died in 1619, and was buried in the church of this parish under a handsome monument. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 10. 5.; net income, £401; patrons, the Representatives of the late R. C. Barnard, Esq. Sir Stephen Soame, in 1618, founded and endowed an almshouse for eight unmarried men or women, and a school for twenty boys.

THURLOXTON (ST. GILES), a parish, in the union of BRIDGWATER, hundred of NORTH PETHERTON, W. division of SOMERSET, 5 miles (S. S. W.) from Bridgewater; containing 188 inhabitants. It is intersected by the road from Bridgewater to Exeter, and comprises by admeasurement 551 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 15. 10., and in the gift of Lord Portman: the tithes have been commuted for £93. 14.; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 82 acres. The church is a small ancient structure.

THURLTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of LODDON and CLAVERING, hundred of CLAVERING, E. division of NORFOLK, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Loddon; containing 405 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and at present in the patronage of the Corporation of Norwich: the tithes have been commuted for £205, and the glebe contains 22½ acres. The church, chiefly in the later English style, is entered on the south through a rich Norman doorway.

THURLTON (ST. BOTOLPH), a parish, in the union, and liberty of the borough, of IPSWICH, E. division of SUFFOLK, 2½ miles (N. N. W.) from Ipswich. The living is a rectory, annexed to that of Whitton.

THURMASTON, NORTH, a chapelry, partly in the parish of BARKBY, and partly in that of BELGRAVE, union of BARROW-UPON-SOAR, hundred of EAST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, 3¼ miles (N. N. E.) from Leicester; containing 251 inhabitants. Petty-sessions for the hundred are held here. The walls of the ancient chapel, dedicated to St. John the Evangelist, are still remaining.

THURMASTON, SOUTH, a chapelry, in the parish of BELGRAVE, union of BARROW-UPON-SOAR, hundred of EAST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, 3 miles (N. N. E.) from Leicester; containing 978 inhabitants. The Leicester canal passes through the lordship, and joins the Melton-Mowbray canal near the village, which is also intersected by the Roman Fosseway. The chapelry comprises 1100 acres of land; the soil is in general light, and the substratum loam, gravel, and clay. In consequence of a benefaction of £200 by Dr. Percy, Bishop of Dromore, and the surrender of the yearly sum of £22 by the vicar of Belgrave, the chapelry was severed from Belgrave in 1798; the patronage of the living, a perpetual curacy, belongs to the Pochin family, and the net income is £100. The tithe-farm, consisting of upwards of 140 acres, belongs to the see of Lichfield. The chapel is dedicated to St. Michael, and contains many old monuments to the family of Simons. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. The most ancient Roman milliarium known in Britain was found here $3\frac{1}{2}$ feet high, and $7\frac{1}{2}$ inches in circumference, and now stands on a pillar in Leicester.

THURNBY (St. LUKE), a parish, in the union of BILLESDON, hundred of GARTREE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Leicester; containing, with the hamlet of Bushby and chapelry of Stoughton, 369 inhabitants, of whom 162 are in Thurnby township. The parish comprises about 1000 acres; the soil is fertile, resting on a fine bed of gravel, and the prevailing scenery is of pleasing character. The weaving of stockings, which was formerly carried on to a much greater extent, employs about five or six looms. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11; net income, £73; patron and impropiator, G. A. Leigh Keck, Esq.: the glebe comprises 4 acres. The church is an ancient structure, of which the chancel, having fallen into a state of dilapidation, was taken down towards the close of the last century. There is a chapel of ease at Stoughton.

THURNE, county of NORFOLK.—See THIRNE.

THURNHAM, a township, in the parish and union of LANCASTER, hundred of LONSDALE, south of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Lancaster; containing 723 inhabitants. This place is situated on the river Lune, and contains the modern harbour of Lancaster, called Glasson Dock, which was constructed in 1787, and is capable of receiving about 25 merchant vessels, of which the cargoes are discharged here, and forwarded by small craft to Lancaster. A considerable traffic is carried on, affording employment to most of the inhabitants; and a canal has been opened connecting Glasson Dock with the Preston and Lancaster canal, and greatly facilitating trade. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £122. 10. There is a Roman Catholic chapel. Within the township are the venerable remains of Cockersand Abbey, founded originally as an hospital for a prior and infirm brethren, in the reign of Henry II., by William of Lancaster, and afterwards endowed for Præmonstratensian canons: at the Dissolution its revenue was £157. 14. The remains are romantically situated on a neck of land projecting into the sea, near the Cocker sands, from which the abbey derived its name, and consist chiefly of the octagonal chapter-house, with a roof supported on a single central column, now the sepulchral chapel of the Daltons.

THURNING (St. JAMES), a parish, in the union of OUNDLE, partly in the hundred of POLEBROOKE, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, but chiefly in that of LEIGHTONSTONE, county of HUNTINGDON, 5 miles (S. E.) from Oundle; containing 161 inhabitants, of whom 124 are in Huntingdon. The parish comprises by admeasurement 1001 acres, of which 60 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 4. 2., and in the gift of Emanuel College, Cambridge: the tithes have been commuted for £180, and the glebe comprises 60 acres.

THURNING (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of AYLHAM, hundred of EYNSFORD, E. division of NORFOLK, 14 miles (N. E. by N.) from East Dereham; containing 166 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1584*a.* 1*r.* 19*p.*, of which 1200 acres are arable, 300 pasture and meadow, and 80 plantation; the surface is agreeably undulated, and the high grounds command fine views of picturesque scenery within and around the parish, which is remarkable for the number and variety of wild flowers with which its meadows are studded. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7, and in the gift of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge: the tithes have been commuted for £367, and the glebe comprises upwards of 18 acres, with a handsome house erected in 1832. The church is chiefly in the decorated style, with a square embattled tower; the chancel is entirely dilapidated, but the other parts of the edifice were thoroughly repaired, and the body repewed, in 1825.

THURNSCOE (St. HELEN), a parish, in the union of DONCASTER, N. division of the wapentake of STRAF-FORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Doncaster; containing 220 inhabitants. This place, in the Domesday survey Ternusch, is of remote antiquity; and the church, of which notice occurs in the foundation charter of the monastery of the Holy Trinity, at York, dated 1089, was most probably founded by the Paganel family. The parish comprises by measurement 1665 acres, of which 1002 are arable, 424 meadow and pasture, 214 woodland and plantations, and 23 roads and waste; the soil is partly a clayey, and partly a sandy loam, and the arable lands are in good cultivation, producing excellent crops of wheat, barley, and turnips. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 7. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of Earl Fitzwilliam: the tithes have been commuted for £186, and there is a good parsonage-house, with a glebe of 133 $\frac{3}{4}$ acres. The present church was built by subscription of the patron and proprietors of the land, in 1729, and is a neat structure in the Grecian style, of stone from the quarries at Badsworth and South Kirkby. There are some almshouses founded in 1710, by the Rev. Dr. Spencer, who endowed them with a rent-charge of £5.

THURROCK, GRAYS (St. PETER AND St. PAUL), a market-town and parish, in the union of ORSETT, hundred of CHAFFORD, S. division of ESSEX, 22 miles (S. S. W.) from Chelmsford, and $20\frac{1}{2}$ (E. by S.) from London; containing 1464 inhabitants. The town consists of a single street irregularly built on the north bank of the Thames, from which there branches a creek navigable for small craft. On the river is a wharf connected by means of a railway with some kilns where lime-burning is carried on to a considerable extent; and the making of bricks for the London builders, which are conveyed hence in barges, affords employment to about 300 persons. Great facility of communication with the metropolis is afforded by the Gravesend steamers, some of which stop at the neat pier of this place, and perform the distance in two hours. The market is on Thursday; and fairs for cattle and hardware are held on May 23rd and October 20th. The parish, which takes its distinguishing epithet from the noble family of Grey, who were proprietors of the manor for more than three centuries, comprises 1300 acres, all arable, with the exception of a little woodland, and 100 acres of pasture. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 0. 10., and in the gift of the Rev. R. S. Hele: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £220, and the vicarial for £249. The church is a handsome cruciform structure, with a tower rising from the north transept. The old market-house is used as a place of worship for dissenters. A free school situated in the churchyard, and now united with a national school, was founded and endowed by William Palmer, in 1706. Rare and valuable fossils are frequently found in the chalk-pits.

THURROCK, LITTLE (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of ORSETT, hundred of BARSTABLE, S. division of ESSEX, 1 mile (E.) from Grays-Thurrock; containing 301 inhabitants. It is bounded on the south-west by the river Thames, and comprises by computation 1400 acres, of which 800 are arable, and 600 pasture. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 15.; net income, £505; patron, the Rev. E. Bowlby. In the south wall of the church are some arched recesses. Near the highway leading to Stifford are ancient excavations termed Danes' Holes.

THURROCK, WEST (St. CLEMENT), a parish, in the union of ORSETT, hundred of CHAFFORD, S. division of ESSEX, 1 mile (W.) from Grays-Thurrock; containing 1032 inhabitants. This parish, which includes the populous village of Purfleet, is bounded on the south by the river Thames, where is a landing-place opposite to Greenhithe, and is about three miles in length, and two and a half in breadth. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £15. 13. 4., and in the gift of W. H. Whitbread, Esq., who, with the family of Montgomery, is impropiator: the great tithes have been commuted for £236. 18., and the vicarial for £311. 14., and there is a parsonage-house, with a glebe of 4 acres. The church is an ancient structure of stone, with a massive square tower. There is a chapel of ease at Purfleet.

THURSBY (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of WIGTON, ward, and E. division of the county, of CUMBERLAND, containing, with the townships of Crofton, and Parton with Micklethwaite, 574 inhabitants, of whom 390 are in the township of High Thursby, 6 miles (S. W.) from Carlisle. This place is supposed to have derived its name from Thor, the Saxon deity, to whose honour a temple is said to have been erected at Woodrigs, in the neighbourhood. The parish comprises 1071a. 1r. 6p., of which about 861 acres are arable, 176 meadow, and 21 mere. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11. 10. 5.; net income, £160; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Carlisle. There is a school founded in 1740, and endowed in 1798, by Thomas Tomlinson, Esq., with the interest of £354. A pillar of coarse stone, inscribed to Philip the Emperor and his son, A.D. 248, dug up near the military way at Wigton, is carefully preserved here.

THURSFIELD, or NEW-CHAPEL, a chapelry, in the parish of WOLSTANTON, union of WOLSTANTON and BURSLEM, N. division of the hundred of PIREHILL and of the county of STAFFORD, 6½ miles (N. by E.) from Newcastle; containing, with the townships of Brieryhurst, Chell, Stadmorslow, and Wedgwood, 3191 inhabitants, of whom 495 are in the township of Thursfield. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £81; patrons, Ralph Sneyd, Esq., and others. The chapel is a plain brick edifice, erected in 1767, and re-roofed in 1827. Dr. Robert Hulme, in 1708, bequeathed certain lands now producing an income of £73, for instruction. James Brindley, of Turnhurst, the celebrated engineer, was interred here in 1772; and a plain altar-tomb has been erected to his memory.

THURSFORD (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of WALSINGHAM, hundred of NORTH GREENHOE, W. division of NORFOLK, 3½ miles (S. E. by E.) from Walsingham; containing 347 inhabitants. The road from Holt to Fakenham, and that from Holt to Walsingham, run through the parish. The living is a discharged rectory, annexed to that of Great Snoring, and valued in the king's books at £8. The church contains portions of the three styles of English architecture, with a square embattled tower, and is situated in the grounds belonging to the Hall.

THURSLEY (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of HAMBLEDON, Second division of the hundred of GODALMING, W. division of SURREY, 5 miles (S. W. by W.) from Godalming; containing 704 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 3170 acres, of which 1330 are arable, 180 meadow, 150 copse, and 1500 waste. Ironstone is abundant, and there were anciently several large iron-foundries, of which the only memorials are four large ponds called Hammer Ponds. The silk manufacture was subsequently introduced, but has been for some years discontinued. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Witley.

THURSTASTON (St. BARTHOLOMEW), a parish, in the union, and Lower division of the hundred, of WIRRAL, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 5 miles (N. W. by N.) from Great Neston; containing, with part of the townships of Greasby and Irby, 168 inhabitants, of whom 114 are in Thurstaston township. The river Dee passes by this place to Chester. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 6.; net income, £242; patrons, the Dean and Chapter of Chester. The church has been lately rebuilt, and a parsonage-house erected, partly at the expense of the incumbent.

THURSTON (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of STOW, hundred of THEDWASTRY, W. division of SUFFOLK, 4½ miles (E. by N.) from Bury St. Edmund's; containing 599 inhabitants. This parish, the situation of which is particularly healthy, comprises 2200a. 1r. 28p., and has a soil generally light, with gravel and sand pits. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of Charles Tyrell, Esq.: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £480. 3. 3., and the vicarial for £210. The church is a remarkably fine structure, and the pillars of the nave are peculiarly light and airy. There is some land arising from bequests and an allotment under an inclosure act, the rental of which, amounting to about £50, is appropriated to parochial and charitable purposes.

THURSTONLAND, a township, in the parish of KIRK-BURTON, union of HUDDERSFIELD, Upper division of the wapentake of AGRIBIGG, W. riding of YORK, 5 miles (S. by E.) from Huddersfield; containing 1286 inhabitants. The township comprises about 2000 acres, in good cultivation; the substratum abounds with coal, of which there are three mines in operation, and there are some quarries of building-stone. Storthes Hall, the seat of Charles Horsfall Bill, Esq., lord of the manor, is a handsome residence here. The village is pleasantly situated on an eminence, and many of the inhabitants are employed in weaving. A chapel built by subscription in 1810, for dissenters, was in 1834 converted into a chapel of ease to the parochial church, and placed under the patronage of the vicar; it is a neat plain edifice, containing 300 sittings, of which 100 are free. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A parochial school was built by Mrs. Ann Ludlam, who in 1763 endowed it with £500, vested in a turnpike trust, with a house and garden; and twelve girls are instructed at the expense of Mrs. Bill. Many Roman coins of brass, of the Lower Empire, were dug up in a field in 1838, and one of silver.

THURTON (St. ETHELBERT), a parish, in the union of LODDON and CLAVERING, hundred of LODDON, E. division of NORFOLK, 8 miles (S. E.) from Norwich; containing 246 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Beccles to Norwich, and consists of about 772 acres. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £70; patron and improprator, Sir W. B. Proctor, Bart., whose tithes have been commuted for £220. The church is chiefly in the early style, and its windows have been decorated with stained glass; the entrance on the south is through a richly-ornamented doorway. Various Roman coins were found in 1707, and upon the opening of several tumuli a few years since, some Roman urns were discovered.

THURVASTON, with OSLESTON, a township, in the parish of SUTTON-ON-THE-HILL, union of BURTON-UPON-TRENT, hundred of APPLETREE, S. division of the county of DERBY, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Derby; containing 405 inhabitants. The impropriate tithes of this township, including those of Cropper, have been commuted for £112. 11. 6., and the vicarial for £125. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

THUXTON (St. PAUL), a parish, in the union of MITFORD and LAUNDITCH, hundred of MITFORD, W. division of NORFOLK, 4 miles (N. by E.) from Hingham; containing 103 inhabitants, and comprising 1084*a.* 2*r.* The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 6. 3.; net income, £211; patron and incumbent, the Rev. W. Castell. The church is an ancient structure in the early and later English styles, with a square tower and octagonal turret; in the east window is a handsome figure of St. Paul, in stained glass, given by the patron.

THWAITE (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of AYLSHAM, hundred of SOUTH ERPINGHAM, E. division of NORFOLK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.) from Aylsham; containing 170 inhabitants. The parish is situated on high ground commanding fine views of the surrounding country, and comprises 601 acres, of which 49 are common or waste. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7, and in the gift of the Bishop of Norwich: the tithes have been commuted for £200, and the glebe contains 7 acres. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £99; patrons, four land-owners in the chapelry. The chapel was rebuilt in 1715, and dedicated to St. Anne in 1724.

THWING (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of BRIDLINGTON, wapentake of DICKERING, E. riding of YORK, 8 miles (W. N. W.) from Bridlington; containing, with the township of Octon, 452 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 3600 acres of land, chiefly arable: the village lies a short distance north of the road from Bridlington to Sledmere. The living is a rectory in mediocrities, each valued in the king's books at £8. 12. 1.; net income, £500; patron, the Crown. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1769. A few years since the church, a very ancient edifice, was repaired and beautified, and an east window of painted glass added, at the expense of Robert Prickett, Esq., lord of the manor, who also erected a tablet to the memory of Archbishop Lamplugh, a native of the parish. The Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists have places of worship; and Mr. Prickett supports a girls' school.

TIBBENHAM (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union and hundred of DEPWADE, E. division of NORFOLK, 5 miles (W. S. W.) from Stratton St. Mary; containing 749 inhabitants. It comprises 3286*a.* 33*p.*, of which 2350 acres are arable, and 903 meadow and pasture. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 6. 8., and in the gift of the appropriator, the Bishop of Ely: the great tithes have been commuted for £769, and the vicarial for £325; there is a parsonage-house, and the vicarial glebe consists of 25 acres. The church is chiefly in the later English style, with a lofty embattled tower surmounted at the corners by representations of the Four Evangelists, and at the east end of the aisle is a chapel dedicated to St. Nicholas: the proceeds of an estate, amounting to £40 per annum, are applied to the repairs of the edifice. The Primitive Methodists have a place of worship. About a mile south-east of the church is Chanons Hall, occupying the site of the ancient manor-house of Chanons, which was a very extensive structure surrounded by a moat; and an old building called the Guild Hall, now inhabited by poor people, formerly belonged to a religious fraternity.

TIBBERTON (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of NEWENT, duchy of LANCASTER, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Newent; containing 344 inhabitants. This place formed part of the hundred of Botloc until the 30th of Edward III., when, Lancashire being made a county palatine, all the estates of the Duke of Lancaster in this county, of which Tibberton was one, were erected into a new hundred of the duchy. The parish comprises 1337*a.* 1*r.* 20*p.*; the surface is varied, and the soil a stiff clay. A stream called Tibberton brook falls into the river Leddon, in the adjacent parish of Rudford; and the Herefordshire and Gloucestershire canal passes on the eastern side of this parish. The parish comprises 8197*a.* 2*r.* 36*p.*, of which about 2600 acres are wood, and 400 hop-grounds; the surface is boldly undulated, and the scenery diversified. The village is on a gentle eminence on the road from Tonbridge-Wells to Hastings, and in its immediate vicinity is Highlands, the property of Charles Newington, Esq., who has here an extensive establishment for insane persons. An agricultural association has been established; a corn-market is held on Mondays, and there are cattle-fairs on May 4th and October 7th. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £18. 7. 6.; net income, £350; patrons, the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury: there is a glebe-house, with a glebe containing about 12 acres. The church is principally in the decorated style of English architecture, and consists of a nave, side aisles, chancel, and two chapels, with an embattled tower surmounted by a low spire. A district church, dedicated to St. Peter, was erected in 1838, at Stonegate, at a cost of about £1100, at the expense of Mrs. Courthope and her son, G. C. Courthope, Esq., of Whiligh, by whom it was also endowed with £1000; it is in the early English style, and the living is a perpetual curacy, in the gift of Mr. Courthope. Another district church, in the same style, dedicated to St. Augustine, was erected, in 1839, at Flimwell, by subscription, and Mrs. Maryatt, who contributed largely towards its erection, has endowed it with £1000; it is a perpetual curacy, in the gift of the Bishop of Chichester. The Wesleyans and Baptists have places of worship. The poor law union comprises 8 parishes or places, and contains a population of 14,197.

TICHFIELD.—See TITCHFIELD.

TICKENCOTE (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of OAKHAM, hundred of EAST, county of RUTLAND, 3 miles (N. W. by W.) from Stamford; containing 111 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from London to York, and comprises by computation 1270 acres. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 5. 8., and in the gift of John Wingfield, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £162. 9., and the glebe comprises $3\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church was formerly in the earliest Norman style, but has been partially rebuilt: Stukeley says, "it is the most venerable church extant, and was the entire oratory of Prince Peada, founder of Peterborough abbey."

TICKENHAM (St. QUIRICUS AND St. JULIETTA), a parish, in the union of BEDMINSTER, hundred of PORTBURY, E. division of SOMERSET, 9 miles (W. by S.) from Bristol; containing 423 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Bristol to Clevedon, and comprises 1627*a.* 30*p.*: limestone of good quality is quarried for building, the repair of roads, and agricultural use, and small portions of lead have been found. The Nailsea station on the Bristol and Exeter railway is a mile to the south. The living is a discharged vicarage, united to that of Portbury, and valued in the king's books at £8. 15. 5.: the vicarial tithes have been commuted for £150. About a mile north of the church are the remains of a double entrenched Roman camp.

TICKHILL (St. MARY), a market-town and parish, in the union of DONCASTER, S. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK; containing, with the township of Stancill with Wellingley and Wilsick, 2040 inhabitants, of whom 1981 are in Tickhill township, 45 miles (S.) from York, and 157 (N. by W.) from London. This manor was given by William the Conqueror to Roger de Busli, who erected or rebuilt a castle, which, with the honour of Tickhill, being subsequently forfeited, was granted by King Stephen to the Count of Eu, in Normandy, but it afterwards reverted to the crown, and was bestowed by Richard I. upon his brother, Prince John. In the reign of Henry III., it was restored to the Count of Eu, but, after several changes, became again vested in the crown, in the time of Henry IV. At the commencement of the great civil war, the castle, then considered a very strong fortress, was garrisoned for the king, and, after a siege of two days, was surrendered to the assailants, and soon after dismantled by order of parliament. The town is situated in a fertile valley, close to the river Torn, on the border of the county of Nottingham, and on the roads between Doncaster and Worksop, and Bawtry and Sheffield, which here cross each other; the streets are neat and spacious, and the houses in general of respectable appearance, but built in a straggling manner; the inhabitants are well supplied with water. The trade in malt was formerly large, and at present there are several very extensive kilns, three corn-mills, and a paper-manufactory. The market, held on Friday, was for some years discontinued, but was revived in 1836, and a fair is held on the second Friday in October for cattle, and various articles of merchandise: the market-cross is a circular building of stone, erected in 1776, in the centre of the town. Manorial courts leet and baron are held annually.

The parish comprises 5336*a.* 21*p.*, of which 1000 acres are pasture, 56 woodland, and the remainder arable; the soil, a sandy loam, is generally fertile, and there was formerly a large tract of peat moss, of which the greater part has been brought under profitable cultivation; the substrata are chiefly limestone, clay, and red sandstone. The LIVING is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 2. 6.; net income, £261; patron and impropriator, G. S. Foljambe, Esq.: the vicarial tithes were commuted for land in 1765. The church, a handsome structure in the later English style, with a fine tower, was greatly injured by lightning in 1825, but has undergone a complete repair, at an expense of £1950. In the chancel is an altar, or altar-tomb, ornamented at the sides with large quatrefoils; on the wall near it is a brass plate with an inscription to the memory of William Eastfield, seneschal of the lordship of Holderness, and of the honour of Tickhill, who died in 1386; and at the east end of the south aisle is an alabaster monument, with the effigies of a knight and his lady: all these have evidently been brought hither from other places or decayed religious houses. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. Near the church is a Maison de Dieu, comprising fourteen almshouses for widows, of uncertain foundation. The remains of the castle, on the south-east side of the town, consist of the mound, on which the foundations of the keep are visible; the ditch, with part of the external walls, and a dilapidated Norman gateway: the northern part has been converted into a modern residence, and the ground within the walls formed into gardens and shrubberies. The ruins of an Augustine priory, established in the reign of Henry III., and situated in an adjacent vale, have been changed into a farm-house. John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, resided at Tickhill Castle.

TICKNALL (St. THOMAS à BECKET), a parish, in the union of ASHBY-DE-LA-ZOUCH, hundred of REPTON and GRESLEY, S. division of the county of DERBY, 9½ miles (S.) from Derby; containing 1271 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Derby to Ashby, and comprises 1860*a.* 1*r.* 19*p.*: extensive lime-works are in operation, affording employment to many of the population, and there are railways for conveying the lime to various parts. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £97; patron and impropriator, Sir George Crewe, Bart.: a parsonage-house has been recently built, and there is a glebe containing about 70½ acres. The church is partly in the early and partly in the later English style, but is greatly dilapidated. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans. A school-house was erected by Dame Catherine Harpur, who, in 1744, conveyed for its support land now producing an income of £25, and the premises were rebuilt in 1825, at the expense of Sir George Crewe. An hospital for seven decayed housekeepers was founded in 1771, by Charles Harpur, Esq., who gave £500 for building it, and endowed it with £2000, now yielding £70 per annum.

TICKTON, with HULL-BRIDGE, a township, in the parish of St. JOHN, BEVERLEY, union, and liberties of the borough, of BEVERLEY, E. riding of YORK, 2½ miles (N. E.) from Beverley; containing 51 inhabitants, of whom 193 are in Tickton. The hamlet of Tickton was in possession of the church of St. John at Beverley so early as the time of Athelstan, and is returned in Domesday book as a berewick belonging to the archbishop, in Holderness; it is situated a little to the east of the Hull river, and Hull-Bridge derives its name from a bridge at that place over the river. The township comprises 700 acres, nearly all arable land; the surface is level, interspersed with ornamental plantations, and the soil in the carrs is of a vegetable quality, imbedded with numerous trees, and in other parts a kind of loam. On the river is a commodious wharf, and a bone and oil-mill. A church was erected in 1843, at a cost of £800, defrayed by public subscription. There is a place of worship for Primitive Methodists. On the lands of S. Wormald, Esq., is a strong chalybeate spring, which forces itself upwards, a height of two yards, in the manner of a fountain.

TIDCOMBE (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of HUNGERFORD, hundred of KINWARDSTONE, Everley and Pewsey, and S. divisions of WILTS, 6¼ miles (N. N. E.) from Ludgershall; containing 226 inhabitants, and comprising about 2000 acres. The living is a perpetual curacy, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4.; net income, £77; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Canons of Windsor. The tithes have been commuted for £468, and the glebe contains 47½ acres.

TIDDESLEY-HAY, an extra-parochial liberty, in the E. division of the hundred of CUTTLESTONE, S. division of the county of STAFFORD, 2¼ miles (N. E.) from Penkridge; comprising about 3500 acres, and containing 61 inhabitants. This was a royal chase, adjoining that of Cannock, till the reign of Elizabeth; who granted it jointly to the Earls of Warwick and Leicester, by whom it was sold to Sir Edward Littleton, of Pillaton Hall. There were then no other inclosures upon it than two ancient parks, and in that state it continued till recently, when it was wholly appropriated by Lord Hatherton.

TIDDINGTON, a hamlet, in the parish of ALBURY, union of THAME, hundred of BULLINGDON, county of OXFORD, 3¼ miles (N. N. W.) from Tetsworth; containing 207 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £162.

TIDENHAM (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of CHEPSTOW, and forming, with Wollaston, a detached portion of the hundred of WESTBURY, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 2 miles (N. E.) from Chepstow; containing 1407 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated at the extremity of a peninsula, and bounded on two sides by the Wye and the Severn, comprises about 6000 acres, divided into the six hamlets of Churchend, Bishton, Sedbury, Beachley, Wibdon, and Stroat. The Severn is here crossed by the Old Passage ferry at Beachley, which has been lately much improved, and forms the principal communication with South Wales. Sedbury Park, the property of George Ormerod, Esq., is in the parish; and within the grounds is the southern termination of Offa's Dyke, which passes through the estate, and over Buttindon Hill, to a lofty cliff overhanging the Severn near its confluence with the Wye. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 14., and in the patronage of Highford Burr, Esq., with a net income of £441, and a handsome parsonage-house, in the Elizabethan style, lately built by the Rev. Henry S. Burr: the glebe consists of about 7 acres. The church is chiefly in the early and decorated styles, with a square tower; the font is of lead, ancient, and curiously sculptured. A church was erected in 1833, at Beachley, where is also a national school, built in 1840; and in 1841 a national school was erected at Tidenham. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Among the relics of antiquity are, the ruins of a chapel, on a small rocky island near the confluence of the Wye and Severn; the Akeman-street, crossing Sedbury in its line from Oldbury to Caerwent; and some Roman and Danish camps on the line of Offa's Dyke, in the hamlets of Churchend and Wibdon, of which some were occupied as stations during the civil war in the reign of Charles I.

TIDESWELL (St. John the Baptist), a market-town and parish, in the union of BAKEWELL, hundred of HIGH PEAK, N. division of the county of DERBY; containing, with the chapelry of Wormhill, and the hamlets of Litton and Whetstone, 3043 inhabitants, of which number 1777 are in Tideswell township, 33 miles (N. N. W.) from Derby, and 160 (N. W. by N.) from London. The first account of this place is in Domesday book, in which, under the name Tiddeswall, it is described as a royal demesne having a chapel, which in 1215 was given by King John to the canons of Lichfield. The town is situated in a valley, surrounded by some of the most barren lands in the county, on the road from Chesterfield to Manchester; the houses in general are of mean appearance, but the inhabitants are supplied with good water, by means of a small stream which flows through the town. The chief branches of trade are calico-weaving, and mining. A market and two fairs were granted by Henry III., and confirmed by subsequent sovereigns; the market is on Wednesday, and fairs are held on March 24th, May 15th, the last Wednesday in July, the second Wednesday in September, and October 29th, for cattle and sheep. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Lichfield (the appropriators), valued in the king's books at £7. 0. 7½.; net income, £109. The church is a remarkably fine cruciform structure, principally in the decorated English style, having an embattled tower at the west end, with crocketed pinnacles; the chancel is separated from the nave by a light screen of carved oak, and from the vestry-room by an embattled stone screen enriched with tracery. In the south transept is a tombstone to the memory of John Foljambe, who contributed largely to the erection of the church, in 1358: in the chancel is an altar-tomb, ornamented with brasses, to the memory of Sampson Meverell, who served under the Duke of Bedford in France, and was knighted upon the field at St. Luce; and another altar-tomb records the death of Robert Pursglove, a native of this town, prior of Gisburn abbey, and bishop of Hull, who died May 2nd, 1579. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Roman Catholics; also a free grammar school founded in 1560, under letters-patent from Queen Elizabeth, by the above-mentioned Robert Pursglove, and endowed with land producing £227 per annum, one-fourth of which has generally been distributed among the poor.

TIDMARSH (St. Lawrence), a parish, in the union of BRADFELD, hundred of THEALE, county of BERKS, 6 miles (W. N. W.) from Reading; containing 146 inhabitants, and comprising 754*a.* 2*r.* 3*p.* The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 2. 6., and in the gift of Robert Hopkins, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £220; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 28¼ acres. The church is partly Norman, and partly in the early English style, of the former of which the doorway is a particularly fine specimen; the ceiling of the chancel is of panelled oak, and there are two slabs of blue marble, with ancient brasses.

TIDMINGTON, a parish, in the union of SHIPSTON-UPON-STOUR, Upper division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, Blockley and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, but locally in the Kington division of the hundred of Kington, county of Warwick, 1½ mile (S. by E.) from Shipston; containing 70 inhabitants, and comprising 754*a.* 1*r.* 12*p.* of land. Tidmington and Shipston, townships in the parish of Tredington, were separated by act of parliament, in the 6th of George I., and made distinct; on which occasion the rectory of the old parish was divided into three parts. The living is a rectory, annexed to that of Shipston: the church is partly in the early English style, and partly of later date.

TIDWORTH, NORTH (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of ANDOVER, hundred of AMESBURY, Everley and Pewsey, and S. divisions of WILTS, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Ludgershall; containing 417 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 17. 1., and in the patronage of the Crown: the incumbent's tithes have been commuted for £324; a sum of £30 is paid to the Dean and Chapter of Winchester, and the glebe contains 14 acres. An almshouse was founded and endowed with a rent-charge of £21 by Dr. Thomas Price, in 1689, and is occupied by four unmarried people. North-west of the village, on the summit of an isolated hill, is the large earthwork called Chidbury Camp, in form resembling a heart, and inclosing an area of seventeen acres. Robert Maton, a celebrated divine, was born here about 1607.

TIDWORTH, SOUTH (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of ANDOVER, Andover and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Ludgershall; containing, with the hamlet of Hampshire-Cross, 254 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 15. $2\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of T. A. Smith, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £398, and the glebe contains 36 acres.

TIFFIELD (ST. JOHN), a parish, in the union and hundred of TOWCESTER, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Towcester; containing 146 inhabitants. The road from Northampton to Towcester passes in the vicinity, and the parish consists of $1221\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 9. 7.; net income, £175; patron, J. Flesher, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land and annual money payments in 1780; and there is a glebe-house. The old Roman Watling-street runs through the parish.

TILBROOK (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of ST. NEOT'S, hundred of STODDEN, county of BEDFORD, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. W. by W.) from Kimbolton; containing 319 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 10.; net income, £388, with a house; patron, Lord St. John. The tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents, under an inclosure act, in the 39th and 40th of George III. Charles Higgins bequeathed £300 in support of a Sunday school, which sum, with subscriptions, produces £20 a year.

TILBURY, EAST (ST. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of ORSETT, hundred of BARSTABLE, S. division of ESSEX, 18 miles (S. E. by E.) from Romford; containing 311 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2136 acres, of which 71 are common or waste; it is bounded on the south-east by part of the Thames, called the Hope, where was an ancient ferry, said to be the place where Claudius crossed the river in pursuit of the Britons. The lofty tower of the manor-house of Gossalyne, here, was battered down by the Dutch fleet, which ascended the Thames in the reign of Charles II. On Hope Point is a battery for the defence of the river below Tilbury Fort. The parish comprises 2112 acres, nearly equally divided between arable and pasture, the latter including about 70 acres which are saltings. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown; impropiator, the Rev. E. Lloyd. The great tithes have been commuted for £382, and the vicarial for £242; the impropriate glebe contains $28\frac{1}{2}$ acres.

TILBURY-JUXTA-CLARE, a parish, in the union of HALSTEAD, hundred of HINCKFORD, N. division of ESSEX, 4 miles (N. N. W.) from Castle-Hedingham; containing 276 inhabitants. This parish, which derives the affix to its name from its proximity to the parish of Clare, in Suffolk, is about five miles in circumference, and is intersected by a rivulet that has its source in the adjoining parish of Ridgwell; the soil is moderately fertile, and the lands are in a good state of cultivation. The living is a rectory, consolidated with that of Ovington, and valued in the king's books at £8: the incumbent's tithes have been commuted for £260. 15.; £12 are paid to the rector of Great Yeldham, and the glebe contains 16 acres. The church, with the exception of the tower, which is of brick, is an ancient edifice of stone.

TILBURY, WEST (ST. JAMES), a parish, in the union of ORSETT, hundred of BARSTABLE, S. division of ESSEX, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E.) from Grays-Thurrock; containing 516 inhabitants. According to Bede, Tilbury, or Tilla-burgh, was the seat of Bishop Cedda, when, about 630, he was engaged in baptizing the East Saxons. Tilbury Fort, partly in this parish, and partly in that of Chadwell, was originally a block-house, built in the reign of Henry VIII.; but after the memorable attack of the Dutch fleet, in 1667, upon the English shipping in the Medway, it was converted into a regular fortification, to which considerable additions have since been made. It is encompassed by a deep wide fosse, and its ramparts present several formidable batteries of heavy ordnance, particularly towards the river; it contains comfortable barracks, and other accommodations for the garrison, which consists of a fort-major and a detachment of invalids. The parish is bounded on the south by the Thames, and comprises 1830 acres, of which 118 are common or waste; the surface is elevated, and the soil light and gravelly in the northern parts, and the marsh lands in the vicinity of the river are stiff and clayey. It lies directly opposite to Gravesend, with which town and the interior of Kent there is a constant traffic, by means of ferry-boats. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £20, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £577. 10.; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains $47\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church, an ancient edifice of stone, had originally a lofty square embattled tower, which fell down some time since, and has been replaced with a belfry turret and spire of wood. In a chalk hill near the village are several caverns termed Danes' Holes, curiously constructed of stone, being narrow at the entrance, and very spacious at the depth of thirty feet; and some traces of a camp formed in the neighbourhood, to oppose the invasion of the Spanish Armada, are still visible. Two mineral springs were discovered in the last century, the water of one of which was much celebrated a few years since, but they have now both fallen into disuse.

TILDESLEY.—See TYLDERSLEY.

TILEHURST (ST. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of BRADFIELD, hundred of READING, county of BERKS, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.) from Reading; containing 2147 inhabitants. This parish, which has the river Thames on the north, and the Kennet on the south, and is intersected by the Great Western railway, has been by act of parliament divided into two parts, of which one constitutes the present parish of Theale. It comprises 6205*a.* 3*r.* 3*p.*, of which about 3393 acres are arable, 920 pasture, and 401 woodland. The living is composed of a rectory and vicarage, united in 1586, valued in the king's books at £21. 15. 2½, and in the patronage of Mrs. Sophia Sheppard. The church is a plain brick structure, containing some ancient brasses, and a sumptuous monument to the memory of Sir Peter Vanlore, Knt., who died in 1627. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also a school endowed by the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Sheppard. Richard Lloyd, the learned Bishop of Worcester, was born here in 1627.

TILFORD, with CULVERLANDS, a tything, in the parish and hundred of FARNHAM, W. division of SURREY, 3 miles (S. E.) from Farnham; containing 509 inhabitants.

TILLEY, a township, in the parish and union of WEM, Whitchurch division of the hundred of NORTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP, 1 mile (S.) from Wem; containing 333 inhabitants.

TILLINGHAM (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of MALDON, hundred of DENGIE, S. division of ESSEX, 14 miles (E. by S.) from Maldon; containing 1106 inhabitants. This parish, situated on the shore of the North Sea, which washes its eastern boundary, comprises 4135*a.* 3*r.* 29*p.*, whereof 2973 acres are arable, and 1128 grass; the surface rises gradually from the marshes till it attains a considerable elevation; the lands are watered by numerous fine springs, and the soil is generally fertile. The living is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, London (the appropriators), valued in the king's books at £25. 3. 9.: the great tithes have been commuted for £797. 17., and the vicarial for £335. 15.; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 12 acres. The church was rebuilt, at the expense of the inhabitants, in 1708.

TILLINGTON, a township, in the parish of BURG-HILL, hundred of GRIMSWORTH, union and county of HEREFORD, 5 miles (N. W. by N.) from Hereford; containing 462 inhabitants.

TILLINGTON, a township, in the parish of St. MARY and St. CHAD, STAFFORD, union of STAFFORD, S. division of the hundred of PIREHILL, N. division of the county of STAFFORD, 1½ mile (N. N. W.) from Stafford; containing 55 inhabitants. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £112. 15. 4.

TILLINGTON, a parish, in the union of MIDHURST, hundred of ROTHERBRIDGE, rape of ARUNDEL, W. division of SUSSEX, 1 mile (W.) from Petworth; containing 949 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the south by the Rother navigation, and comprises 3765*a.* 2*r.* 35*p.*, of which the portion under tillage, including orchards, contains 2112 acres, the meadow and pasture 673, woods, hedge plantations, &c., 714, and the commons 238 acres. The soil is chiefly a mellow brown earth, but in some places altogether clayey; the surface is in general hilly, and there are some very extensive quarries of stone of good quality for building and other purposes. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 10., and in the gift of Col. Wyndham: the tithes have been commuted for £740; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 22 acres. The church, principally in the decorated English style, with trifling insertions of a later date, was almost entirely rebuilt in 1837, at the expense of the late Earl of Egremont, with the exception of the tower, which had been erected by the earl in 1808, after the style of the tower of St. Dunstan's-in-the-East, London. In the hamlet of River was formerly a chapel; and some years since, a stone coffin was dug up near the site, and is now used as a trough for water. An almshouse for six persons was built chiefly from a bequest of the Styles family, now extinct; and in 1839, Col. Wyndham erected houses for two persons, and endowed them with £20 per annum. The late Dr. J. S. Clark, chaplain and librarian at Carlton-House, and author of the Life of Nelson, with whom he was present at the battle of Trafalgar, was rector of the parish.

TILMANSTONE (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union and hundred of EASTRY, lathe of St. AUGUSTINE, E. division of KENT, 6 miles (W. by S.) from Deal; containing 445 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 12. 6.; patron and appropriator, the Archbishop of Canterbury. The great tithes have been commuted for £160, and the vicarial for £263; there is a vicarage-house, and the appropriate glebe contains 27¼ acres.

TILNEY (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of WISBECH, hundred of FREEBRIDGE-MARSHLAND, W. division of NORFOLK, 4½ miles (W. S. W.) from Lynn; containing 441 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2578*a.* 7*p.*, of which 1451 acres are arable, 1064 meadow and pasture, and the remainder homesteads and roads; the soil is fertile, and the pastures luxuriantly rich. The living is a vicarage, with that of Tilney St. Lawrence annexed, valued in the king's books at £30, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Pembroke College, Cambridge, who, with others, are impropiators. The great tithes of both parishes have been commuted for £1055, and the vicarial for £307, with a glebe of 60 acres, and a handsome house, rebuilt by the Rev. C. Currie, the present vicar. The church is a venerable structure in the Norman style, with a lofty square embattled tower of the later English, surmounted by a spire; the nave is separated from the aisles by a fine range of Norman arches, springing from massive columns, and supporting the roof, which is elaborately groined. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Dr. John Aylmer, Bishop of London, who died in 1594, was a native of the parish.

TILNEY (St. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of WISBECH, hundred of FREEBRIDGE-MARSHLAND, W. division of NORFOLK, 5½ miles (S. W. by W.) from Lynn; containing 762 inhabitants. It comprises 3461*a.* 30*p.*, of which 2079 acres are arable, 1284 meadow and pasture, and the remainder homesteads and roads. The living is a vicarage, annexed to that of Tilney All Saints. The church is a handsome structure, principally in the later English style, with a square embattled tower. There are places of worship for Calvinists and Primitive Methodists.

TILNEY CUM ISLINGTON.—See ISLINGTON.

TILSHEAD (St. THOMAS à BECKET), a parish, in the union of AMESBURY, hundred of BRANCH and DOLE, Devizes and S. divisions of WILTS, 10 miles (S. by E.) from Devizes; containing 426 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Devizes to Salisbury, and comprises 3751*a.* 3*r.* 31*p.*, of which about 2377 acres are arable, 1247 pasture, and 90 plantations; the soil is light and chalky, and the parish forms part of the high land called Salisbury Plain. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 16., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £216; improPRIATOR, G. W. Taylor, Esq. The great tithes of the new inclosures, and all the vicarial tithes, those on mills excepted, were commuted for land in 1811. The church, which is very ancient, contains 400 sittings, half of which are free. The downs near the village were once celebrated for great numbers of bustards, the last of which here, taken alive in 1801, after having made an attack upon a man on horseback, weighed upwards of 20 pounds, and measured 5 feet from the extremities of its wings. Fossil sponge is found in the neighbourhood, and madrepores are largely collected in flint stones.

TILSOP, with NASH and WESTON, a chapelry, in the parish of BURFORD, union of TENBURY, hundred of OVERS, S. division of SALOP, 4½ miles (W. S. W.) from Cleobury - Mortimer; containing 381 inhabitants, of whom 226 are in Tilsop.

TILSTOCK, a chapelry, in the parish of WHITCHURCH, Whitchurch division of the hundred of NORTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP, 2½ miles (S.) from Whitchurch; containing 637 inhabitants. The district is situated on the road from Shrewsbury to Chester, and is about 3 miles long, and 1½ broad. Whitchurch heath, and that of Prees, comprehended within its limits, consist of a fine open common, crossed by the road from Birmingham to Chester. The soil is rich and gravelly, and the Ellesmere and Chester canal passes through the chapelry. The living is a perpetual curacy, with a net income of £87; it is in the patronage of Lady Bridgewater, and the appropriator is the rector of Whitchurch; a glebe-house has been recently built, and the glebe contains 125 acres. The chapel, dedicated to St. Giles, was rebuilt in 1834, by a bequest of Francis, Earl of Bridgewater, who was rector of Whitchurch. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Independents; and a national school has been erected upon the site of the former chapel, which was remarkable for its antiquity, and was surrounded by very fine old yew-trees.

TILSTON (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of GREAT BOUGHTON, Higher division of the hundred of BROXTON, S. division of the county of CHESTER; containing, with the townships of Carden, Grafton, Horton-by-Malpas, and Stretton, 923 inhabitants, of whom 450 are in Tilston township, 3 miles (N. W. by N.) from Malpas. The Chester canal passes close to the village. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 2. 11.; net income, £333; patrons, the Marquess of Cholmondeley and T. T. Drake, Esq. A national school is supported partly by an endowment of £16 per annum.

TILSTON-FERNALL, a township, in the parish of BUNBURY, union of NANTWICH, First division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 2¾ miles (S. S. E.) from Tarporley; containing 189 inhabitants. A church was built in the year 1836, and was endowed at the expense of John Tollemache, Esq.; it is a brick edifice, cased with white stone, in the later English style. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £70, payable to the Haberdashers' Company, London.

TILSWORTH (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of WOBURN, hundred of MANSHEAD, county of BEDFORD, 3½ miles (N. W. by W.) from Dunstable; containing 311 inhabitants. It comprises about 1220 acres, of which the surface is varied, and the soil clay. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8; net income, £60; patron and impropriator, Sir G. O. Page Turner, Bart. The church contains several old monuments of the Fowler family, one to the memory of Sir Henry Chester, K.B., and an ancient altar-tomb with an inscription in French, and the effigy of Adam de Tullesworth, in sacerdotal robes.

TILTON (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of BILLESDON, partly in the hundred of GARTREE, but chiefly in that of EAST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, 8¼ miles (W. S. W.) from Oakham; containing, with the townships of Halstead and Marefield, and the hamlet of Whatborough, 408 inhabitants, of whom 190 are in Tilton township. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12. 16. 8., and in the patronage of the Rev. George Greaves: the vicarial tithes have been commuted for £174, and the impropriate for £52. The church is partly in the later English style. Here was an ancient hospital, which Sir William Burdett annexed to Burton-Lazars, in the time of Henry II.

TILTS, with LANGTHWAITE, a township, in the parish and union of DONCASTER, N. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, 4 miles (N.) from Doncaster; containing 25 inhabitants. The township consists of three farms, of which two are in the hamlet of Tilts.

TILTY (St. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of DUNMOW, N. division of ESSEX, 3 miles (S. by W.) from Thaxted; containing 96 inhabitants. The living is a donative; net income, £30; patron and impropriator, Viscount Maynard. The church constitutes the remains of an abbey church, a fine specimen of the decorated English style; the east and north windows are ornamented with remarkably elegant tracery, and there are some rich stalls in the chancel, and several ancient and interesting monuments. The abbey was founded about 1152, by Robert Ferrers, Earl of Derby, and Maurice Fitz-Jeffery, for White monks, whose revenue, at the Dissolution, was valued at £177. 9. 4.

TIMBERLAND (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of SLEAFORD, First division of the wapentake of LANGOE, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, 10 miles (N. N. E.) from Sleaford; containing, with the townships of Martin and Thorpe-Tilney, 1649 inhabitants, of whom 597 are in Timberland township. An act was passed in 1839, for the more effectual drainage of the fen and dales of Timberland and Timberland-Thorpe. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12. 2. 11.; net income, £216; patron and impropriator, Sir T. Whichcote, Bart. The tithes were commuted for land and annual money payments in 1774 and 1794. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

TIMBERSCOMBE (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of WILLITON, hundred of CARHAMPTON, W. division of SOMERSET, 2½ miles (W. S. W.) from Dunster; containing 476 inhabitants. The parish is beautifully situated in a small fertile valley surrounded by high hills, and is traversed by the road from Dunster to Dulverton; it comprises by admeasurement 1432 acres, the soil of which is in some parts gravelly, and in others stony, and good stone is quarried for building. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the patronage of the Prebendary of Timberscombe in the Cathedral of Wells (the appropriator), valued in the king's books at £6. 10.; net income, £170. There is a parsonage-house; the glebe consists of about $3\frac{1}{2}$ acres, and the appropriator possesses also 43 acres. The church has an embattled tower surmounted by a low spire, which are much more ancient than the body of the edifice, which was built in the 15th century, and is in the later English style; there is a south aisle, and the nave is separated from the chancel by a handsome old screen, in excellent preservation. Richard Ellsworth, in 1714, bequeathed £200 towards building a school-house, and an annuity of £20 for clothing and educating children; it was not erected till 1824, and the original endowment having accumulated to £50 per annum, about 60 children are instructed and clothed. There are two strong chalybeate springs in the parish.

TIMBLE, GREAT, a township, in the parish of FEWSTON, Lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, W. riding of YORK, 6 miles (N. by W.) from Otley; containing 206 inhabitants. The township comprises by computation nearly 1500 acres, divided into numerous farms, in a profitable state of cultivation. A school, supported by subscription, was endowed with an allotment of land, on the inclosure of Knaresborough forest, which was sold by the overseers for £10.

TIMBLE, LITTLE, a township, in the parish of OTLEY, Upper division of the wapentake of CLARO; W. riding of YORK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Otley; containing 63 inhabitants. The township comprises about 420 acres of land, pleasantly situated in the vale of the rivulet Washburn. Here is the ruin of a once handsome mansion, of which no account is preserved.

TIMPERLEY, a township, in the parish of BOWDON, union of ALTRINCHAM, hundred of BUCKLOW, N. division of the county of CHESTER, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. E. by E.) from Altrincham; containing 947 inhabitants. A church has been built containing 500 sittings, 340 of which are free, the Incorporated Society having granted £300 in aid of the expense. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £49, and the appropriate for £225. 17., payable to the Bishop of Chester. A school is supported by the interest of £300, presented by Mrs. Jane Houghton, who also gave £100 for purchasing bibles and prayer-books.

TIMSBURY (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of CLUTTON, hundred of CHEW, E. division of SOMERSET, 8 miles (S. W.) from Bath; containing 1666 inhabitants. The parish is situated about $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile from the road between Bath and Wells, and comprises 1148a. 1r. 31p., of which 132 acres are arable, and 983 pasture; the soil is rich, and elm and ash grow luxuriantly. Several coal-mines are worked, and the Somerset coal canal commences at the south-western extremity of the parish, and passes along its southern boundary. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 19. $9\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of Balliol College, Oxford: the tithes have been commuted for £283; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 64 acres. The church was rebuilt on an enlarged scale, in 1825, at a cost of £2110, of which sum the Incorporated Society granted £250; it contains 606 sittings. There are places of worship for Wesleyans, Independents, and Baptists.

TIMSBURY (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of ROMSEY, hundred of KING'S-SOMBOURN, Andover and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Romsey; containing 223 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the Romsey and Stockbridge road, and comprises 1384a. 1r. 17p., of which about 797 acres are arable, 499 meadow and pasture, and 87 wood. The Andover canal has a wharf here; and the beautiful river Test, celebrated for its trout, adorns the finely-wooded undulations through which its bright and rapid stream runs. Extensive and picturesque views are obtained from the high grounds, embracing the abbey church of Romsey, and many other interesting objects. The living is a vicarage, with a net income of £64, derived partly from a payment of £34, made by the patrons, J. Fleming and W. Chamberlayne, Esqrs., who present alternately, and the latter of whom is impropiator, and holds all the glebe lands. The church is built of flint, and has a wooden belfry; there is a piscina in good preservation, and the chancel, which is very elegant, contains two fine wainscot pews, in the form of stalls.

TIMSWORTH (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of TINGOE, hundred of THEDWASTRY, W. division of SUFFOLK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Bury St. Edmund's; containing 212 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, consolidated with the rectory of Ingham, and valued in the king's books at £9. 17. 11.

TINCLETON, a parish, in the union of DORCHESTER, hundred of PIDDLETOWN, Dorchester division of DORSET, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Dorchester; containing 187 inhabitants. It is bounded on the south by the river Frome, and comprises 1000 acres by computation. The living is a perpetual curacy, valued in the king's books at £5. 11. 8.; net income, £92; patron, C. H. Sturt, Esq.: the glebe contains about 4 acres. The church is a small structure, the burial-place of the Baynards, of Cliff, of which family it has several sepulchral memorials.

TINGEWICK (St. Mary), a parish, in the union, hundred, and county of BUCKINGHAM, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Buckingham; containing 911 inhabitants. A market was formerly held on Tuesday, granted in 1246 to the Abbey de Monte Rothomago, in Normandy, to which the manor had previously been given by the family of Finmore. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 16. 3.; net income, £260; patrons, the Warden and Fellows of New College, Oxford: the tithes were commuted for land in 1773. The church is evidently of great antiquity; the southern doorway exhibits a handsomely-carved Norman arch; and the tower, which is built from the ground, and the chancel, were erected by William of Wykeham, in the English style. A stone over the central window, in the south battlement, contains a very old and curious inscription; and there is a brass tablet to the memory of Erasmus Williams, who died rector in 1608. The building was completely restored a few years since, by the parish, at an expense of £500. Charles Longland, in 1688, bequeathed property producing £11 per annum for the poor; and the Rev. Francis Edmonds, in 1751, endowed a charity school with £15 per annum.

TINGRITH (St. Nicholas), a parish, in the union of WOBURN, hundred of MANSHEAD, county of BEDFORD, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Woburn; containing 158 inhabitants. It comprises 942*a.* 1*r.* 30*p.*: about thirty-five women and children are employed in making lace and straw-plat. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £9, and in the patronage of the Misses Trevor: the tithes have been commuted for £240; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 5½ acres.

TINHEAD, a tything, in the parish of EDINGTON, union of WESTBURY and WHORWELSDOWN, hundred of WHORWELSDOWN, Whorwelsdown and N. divisions of WILTS, 1 mile (N. by E.) from Edington; containing 484 inhabitants.

TINSLEY, a parochial chapelry, in the union of ROTHERHAM, S. division of the wapentake of STRAFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, 2¾ miles (S. W. by W.) from Rotherham; containing 512 inhabitants. It comprises about 1570 acres, the property of Earl Fitzwilliam, who is lord of the manor; the soil is fertile, and the surface varied. A large portion of an ancient, and formerly very extensive, wood, still retains the name of Tinsley Park. The strata abound with excellent coal, in the working of which a great part of the population is employed; and slate of an inferior quality is quarried. The Rotherham and Sheffield canal runs through the chapelry, and joins the river Don a little below the village, where is an old wharf; and the high road to Sheffield also intersects the chapelry. The living is reputed to be a vicarage, and has a net income of about £100; patron and improprator, Earl Fitzwilliam. The church is very ancient, and has portions of the earliest Norman style. A school is endowed with £10 per annum.

TINTAGEL (St. SYMPHORINA), a parish, in the union of CAMELFORD, hundred of LESNEWTII, E. division of CORNWALL; comprising the disfranchised borough of Bossiney, and containing 1185 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the shore of the Bristol Channel, by which it is bounded on the north, and was distinguished at an early period for a castle, of which the foundation is attributed to King Arthur. This fortress, which was built partly on a stupendous craggy rock surrounded by the sea, and partly on the precipitous cliff that skirts the main land, consisted of two divisions separated by a frightful chasm, 300 feet deep, over which was a draw-bridge affording means of communication. It was occasionally occupied by the English princes: in 1245, Richard, Earl of Cornwall, entertained his nephew, Davydd, Prince of Wales, in it, during his rebellion against Henry III.; and, in subsequent reigns, till within a few years of that of Elizabeth, it continued to be a royal castle, under a governor appointed by the crown, and was used as a state prison for the duchy of Cornwall. The parish comprises 3709 acres, of which 450 are common or waste land; the soil exhibits almost every variety. The surrounding scenery is strikingly picturesque; and on the Trevillet estate is a deep romantic vale of considerable length, in some parts richly wooded, in others alternated with spiral rocks and overhanging precipices, and terminating on the south-east with a lofty cascade. Upon the cliffs, which are bold and romantic, are several slate-quarries, whence 200 cargoes are annually procured, and shipped at a wharf near the remains of Arthur's Castle, and in which are found those beautifully transparent and regular polygonal crystals called Cornish diamonds. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 11. 3.; net income, £220; patrons, the Dean and Canons of Windsor; improprator, Lord Wharnclyffe: there is a parsonage-house, with a glebe consisting of 40 acres. The church is an ancient structure, with a curious Norman font: there were formerly two chapels in the parish, of which one was dedicated to St. Piran, and the other to St. Denis. The Wesleyans have a place of worship. On the Trevillet estate are some remains of earthworks called Condolden Burrows; in the churchyard are three barrows, and in the town of Bossiney is another, on which the writ for the election of members for that borough was read. Near the town also is an ancient cross. The remains of King Arthur's Castle consist chiefly of large scattered masses of the broken towers, and walls pierced for the discharge of arrows: in Leland's time the keep was remaining, and, according to that writer, contained "a praty chapel, with a tumber on the left syde."

TINTERN, LITTLE (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union and division of CHEPSTOW, hundred of RAGLAN, county of MONMOUTH, 6 miles (N.) from Chepstow; containing 375 inhabitants. This parish, which consists of about 650 acres, is most romantically situated on the right bank of the river Wye, and on the road from Chepstow to Monmouth; the neighbourhood is adorned with the remains of the abbey of Tintern, described in the article on Chapel-Hill. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £2. 1. 5½.; net income, £162; patron, W. Gale, Esq. The church is an ancient structure. Philip Hacket, in 1634, bequeathed property now producing £36 per annum, for the poor of Chapel-Hill and Little Tintern.

TINTINHULL (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of YEOVIL, hundred of TINTINHULL, W. division of SOMERSET, 2¼ miles (S. W.) from Ilchester; containing 553 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £90; patron and improprator, the Hon. Hugh Arbuthnot. The tithes were commuted for £396. 10., and there is a glebe of one acre. The old Roman Fosse-way passes through the parish, which is bounded on the north by the navigable river Ivel. Stock-Dennis, now a tything, was anciently a very populous place.

TINTWISTLE, a township, in the parish of MOTTRAM-IN-LONGDENDALE, union of ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE, hundred of MACCLESFIELD, N. division of the county of CHESTER, 9½ miles (N. E. by E.) from Stockport; containing 2290 inhabitants, who are mostly employed in the manufacture of cotton and woollen goods, and at quarries of stone in the neighbourhood. The village is situated on an acclivity rising from the western bank of the river Etherow: fairs for cattle are held on May 2nd and November 1st. This was anciently a borough, and had a court leet; but it is now a member of the lordship of Mottram, and is within the jurisdiction of a court of requests held there, for the recovery of debts under 40s. A church was consecrated October 18th, 1837. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists; and a school is endowed with £5. 5. per annum.

TINWELL (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of STAMFORD, hundred of EAST, county of RUTLAND, 1½ mile (S. W. by W.) from Stamford; containing, with the hamlet of Ingthorpe, 258 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the border of the county, and bounded on the south and south-east by the river Welland, which separates Rutland from Northampton and Lincoln. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 10. 5.; net income, £303; patron, the Marquess of Exeter. A payment of £105 per annum, in lieu of tithes, is received from his lordship; and the glebe consists of about 158 acres. The church contains a monument to Elizabeth Cecil, sister of Lord Treasurer Burghley. A national school was built in 1834, and has an endowment of £14 per annum, given by the marquess.

TIPTON (St. MARTIN), a parish, in the union of DUDLEY, S. division of the hundred of OFFLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. E.) from Dudley; containing 18,891 inhabitants. This place, called sometimes Tibbington, is situated nearly in the centre of a rich mining district, and has risen progressively from an inconsiderable village to its present extent and importance, from the abundant and apparently exhaustless mines of coal and iron-stone under almost every acre of its surface. The coal, which is of excellent quality, occurs in seams of about thirty feet in thickness, and is extensively wrought at the Moat and Tibbington collieries, on which, within half a mile of each other, are four powerful steam-engines, pumping from the mines not less than 10,000 tons of water every twenty-four hours, exclusively of numerous other engines in the immediate neighbourhood. The iron is also wrought to a very great extent; there are not less than twelve blast-furnaces with apparatus for smelting the ore, and on an average 1500 tons of pig-iron are made weekly, in the production of which 1500 tons of coal are consumed. There are also twelve forges for the manufacture of wrought-iron articles of every kind, including boilers for steam-engines, iron-boats, fenders, fire-irons, hinges, nails, and tin-plates; and several factories for soap, muriatic potash, and red-lead. The principal iron-works are those of Messrs. John Bagnall and Sons, at Toll-End, in which 250 tons of iron are made weekly; of Messrs. Edward Cresswell and Sons, producing about the same quantity; and those of Messrs. Bramah, Barrows, and Hall, in which 400 tons are made weekly. In the works of Messrs. John and Edward Walker, at Gospel-Oak, 100 tons of iron are made weekly, and belonging to the firm are a foundry for cannon of large calibre, and tin-plate and iron-works, together employing 350 persons; cannons also of wrought iron are made in this establishment, and have been brought to such perfection as probably to supersede those of brass, from their possessing a greater degree of tenacity, when hot, than those of brass. At the Moat forge, belonging to Mr. Thomas Spencer, every description of hammered iron is made for marine engines and other uses; the Park Lane coal and iron works, the property of Messrs. Thomas Morris and Sons, and the Horsley iron-works, are also extensive, and there are several others on a smaller scale.

The town and the various factories are lighted with gas from works at West Bromwich, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles distant; and the trade is much facilitated by the Birmingham canal, and several of its collateral branches, which intersect the parish, affording a communication with almost every line of inland navigation. The district is within the jurisdiction of a court of requests for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5; and a court leet is held annually by the lord of the manor, at which officers are regularly appointed for its internal regulation. The parish comprises 2095a. 2r. 7p., of which the greater portion is arable; the surface is greatly diversified, and the river Trent has its source within a few hundred yards of the western boundary. The LIVING is a perpetual curacy; net income, £419; patron, J. S. Hellier, Esq.; appropriator, the Prebendary of Prees, or Pipa Minor, in the Cathedral of Lichfield. The church, a neat structure of brick, with a tower and cupola, was erected at a cost of £1500, in 1797, to replace the ancient edifice, which had become dilapidated. The church dedicated to St. Paul, and to which has been assigned an ecclesiastical district including Tipton-Green and a population of 7000, was erected in 1839, at a cost of £3700, of which £2000 were granted by the commissioners, and the remainder raised by subscription; it contains 1300 sittings, of which 770 are free in consideration of a grant of £300 from the Incorporated Society. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Incumbent of the parish, and is endowed with £1000, and a parsonage-house. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Primitive Methodists, Methodists of the New Connexion, and Wesleyans; and several national schools are supported by subscription, and the proceeds of a bequest of £650, by Mr. Solomon Woodhall, in 1796, for the foundation and endowment of a school, to which subsequent benefactions have been added. Mr. Sheldon bequeathed £40 per annum, to be distributed in bread to poor widows not receiving parochial relief.

TIRLEY (St. MATTHEW), a parish, in the union of TEWKESBURY, partly in the Lower division of the hundred of WESTMINSTER, and partly in that of the hundred of DEERHURST, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 8 miles (N. by E.) from Gloucester; containing 550 inhabitants. The parish comprises by admeasurement 1891 acres, about one-third of which is arable, and the remainder pasture; the soil is a rich loam. The navigable river Severn flows through the parish, and is crossed at Haw by a handsome stone bridge, completed in 1824, on the new line of road leading from Cheltenham into Herefordshire, Monmouthshire, and South Wales. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £375; impropiator, the Earl of Coventry: the tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1795. The church is partly in the decorated and partly in the later English style. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

TISBURY (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), the head of a union, in the hundred of DUNWORTH, Hindon and S. divisions of WILTS, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Hindon; comprising East and West Tisbury parishes, and containing, with the parish of Wardour, 2420 inhabitants, of whom 972 are in East, and 735 in West, Tisbury. A castle appears to have been erected here prior to the reign of Edward III., since which time it has been successively the seat of the families of St. Martin, Touchet, Audley, and Willoughby de Broke, and subsequently of Sir John Arundel, whose son Thomas was, by James I., created Lord Arundel of Wardour, by which name the castle was distinguished. In the civil war of the 17th century, it was besieged by a detachment of the parliamentary army, consisting of 1300 men, under the command of Sir Edward Hungerford, and defended in the absence of Lord Arundel by his wife, the Lady Blanche, with a garrison of only 25 men, for nearly a week, when it surrendered on May 8th, 1643, upon honourable terms, which, however, were not fulfilled by the captors. It was, in the course of the same summer, retaken by the royalists under Lord Arundel and Sir Francis Doddington, after a siege of several weeks, from the celebrated Edmund Ludlow, who had been made governor by the parliament, and who, in his memoirs, accuses the royalists of the same disregard of the terms of capitulation which had been shown by the parliamentarians. In consequence of the great injury the castle received, especially on the latter occasion, it became totally unfit either for the purposes of a fortress or a residence; and since the year 1776, the family of Arundel have erected a magnificent mansion called Wardour Castle, consisting of a centre and two wings projecting in a curvilinear shape, the whole forming a handsome structure of freestone, beautifully situated within a mile of the original castle.

The parish of Tisbury was divided in 1834, by act of parliament, into the three parishes of East and West Tisbury, and Wardour. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £18. 10. 10.; patron, Lord Arundel; appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Bristol. The great tithes have been commuted for £880, and the vicarial for £440; £67. 12. are paid to the rector of Compton-Chamberlayne, and £50 to another appropriator; there is a parsonage-house, and the appropriate and vicarial glebes contain respectively 12 and 3 acres. The church is a spacious structure in the Norman style, and contains numerous monuments to the family of Arundel. There is a place of worship for Independents. Several bequests have been left to the poor. The union of Tisbury comprises 20 parishes or places, and includes a population of 10,106. The remains of the ancient castle are situated under a range of hills in the form of an amphitheatre, richly crowned with wood, and consist principally of the hexagonal court which formed the centre of the buildings; and almost contiguous are the remains of the mansion occupied by the Arundel family, after the destruction of the castle, till the completion of their present seat. Sir Nicholas Hyde, chief justice of the king's bench and lord treasurer in the reign of James I., was born in Wardour Castle; and Sir John Davies, eminent as a lawyer, poet, and political writer, was a native of the hamlet of Chisgrove, in the parish.

TISSINGTON (ST. MARY), a parish, in the hundred of WIRKSWORTH, S. division of the county of DERBY, 4 miles (N.) from Ashbourn; containing 427 inhabitants. This parish, situated on the road from Ashbourn to Buxton, comprises 2262 acres by admeasurement, and includes the romantic district of Dovedale, which abounds with striking scenery. Thorpe Cloud on the right, and a towering pile of massive rocks on the left, of the entrance of the vale, form natural ramparts of majestic elevation, between which the river winds with varied course, sometimes rushing with tumultuous effort along the bases of stupendous cliffs, and at others expanding into a smooth and placid surface, reflecting the luxuriant verdure of its wood-crowned banks. At intervals, rude rocky masses of grotesque form, which have been fancifully denominated My Lady's Chair, Dovedale Castle, the Church, the Twelve Apostles, the Lion's Head, the Sugar Loaves, and the Lover's Leap, rise in succession throughout this enchanting dale, in which the more simple and the more sublime beauties of nature, in all their variety, are strikingly combined. There is a stone-quarry, the material of which is used for building; and a cotton-factory, situated on Bradbourn Brook, employs about 130 hands. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of Sir H. Fitzherbert, Bart., with a net income of £97: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £229, and the vicarial for £3. 10. The church, partly Norman, and partly of later date, and containing handsome memorials to the Fitzherbert family, is beautifully situated in the midst of fine old trees, on an eminence overlooking the village. There are five springs of the purest water, which at a remote period are said to have furnished the only supply of the neighbourhood for several miles round.

TISTED, EAST (ST. JAMES), a parish, in the union of ALTON, hundred of SELBORNE, Alton and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 5 miles (S. by W.) from Alton; containing, with the tything of Rotherfield, 220 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Alton to Gosport and Portsmouth, and comprises 2200 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16; net income, £333; patron, James Scott, Esq. There is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 29 acres. The Rev. Philip Valois, in 1760, bequeathed £300, and the Rev. John Williams, in 1822, gave £400 three per cents., in support of a school; the united income is about £20, since increased by £20, and a school-house and dwelling were built by Mr. Scott, in 1837. John Groves, Savilian professor of astronomy in the university of Oxford, in the reign of Charles II., was born here.

TISTED, WEST, a parish, in the union of ALRESFORD, hundred of BISHOP'S-SUTTON, Alton and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 9 miles (S. W. by S.) from Alton; containing 252 inhabitants. It is about a mile from the London and Gosport road, and comprises 2236 acres by admeasurement, of which about 1938 are arable, 47 meadow, and 251 wood and coppice. The surface is undulated, and the soil a poor flinty earth, upon a substratum of chalk; the chief produce is wheat, oats, barley, and turnips. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £58; patrons and appropriators, the President and Fellows of Magdalen College, Oxford. The church contains about 150 sittings, of which half are free.

TITCHBOURN (ST. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of ALRESFORD, hundred of FAWLEY, Winchester and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 2½ miles (S. W. by S.) from New Alresford; containing 340 inhabitants. The living is annexed, with that of Kilmeston, to the rectory of Cheriton: the tithes have been commuted for £494, and there are 2½ acres of glebe.

TITCHFIELD (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union of FAREHAM, hundred of TITCHFIELD, Fareham and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 2½ miles (W.) from Fareham; containing, with the chapelry of Crofton and Sarisbury, 4030 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the west by the Southampton Water, and comprises 15,407 acres, of which 1372 are common or waste; the town is well built, and pleasantly situated in a valley on the road from Southampton to Portsmouth and Brighton, about two miles to the west of the Titchfield river. A customary corn-market is held on Tuesday; and fairs take place on the Saturday fortnight before Lady-day, May 14th, September 25th (for hiring servants), and the Saturday fortnight before December 21st. A court baron occurs twice a year, and a court leet annually, the latter with jurisdiction in all pleas of debt under 40s. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 17. 3½.; patron, H. P. Delmé, Esq.; appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Winchester. The great tithes have been commuted for £2886, and the vicarial for £35; the incumbent receives also £150 from the appropriators; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 7 acres. The church is a fine edifice, the north aisle of which was built by William of Wykeham; the chancel is kept in repair by the Duke of Portland, and contains a handsome monument to Henry, the first earl of Southampton, to whom the property belonged after the dissolution of monasteries. At Crofton is a chapel; and a district church was built at Sarisbury, in 1836, and contains 440 sittings; the incumbent has a net income of £120, and a good parsonage-house. There are places of worship for Independents and other dissenters. Twelve girls are educated from funds arising out of the rental of land and premises demised in 1620, by Henry, Earl of Southampton, for charitable uses, and now producing about £70 per annum. At a short distance north of the town are the remains of Palace or Place House, erected by the earl, on the site and with the materials of an abbey for Præmonstratensian canons founded by Peter de Rupibus, in 1231, and the revenue of which, at the suppression, was valued at £280. 19. 10. In this mansion Charles I. was concealed after his escape from Hampton Court, in 1647, and again previously to resigning himself to Col. Hammond, who conducted him to Carisbrooke Castle, in the Isle of Wight; the building is in a state of ruin, and the entrance gateway is the only part standing. It is asserted that the nuptials of Henry VI. with Margaret of Anjou were celebrated at this place. Rachel, wife of Lord William Russell, who was beheaded in the reign of Charles II., was born here. Titchfield confers the title of Marquess on the family of Bentinck.

TITCHMARSH (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of THRAPSTONE, hundred of NAVISFORD, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 2 miles (E. N. E.) from Thrapstone; containing 905 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the east by a portion of the county of Huntingdon, and consists of 3857 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £45; net income, £782; patron, Lord Lilford. An allotment of about 28 acres was awarded under an inclosure act, in 1778, in lieu of an estate purchased with a bequest by Edward Pickering, in 1697; and the rental, amounting to £36. 10., is distributed among poor persons. Dorothy Elizabeth Pickering and Frances Byrd, in 1756, founded and endowed an almshouse for eight unmarried women, of which the income is £165.

TITCHWELL (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of DOCKING, hundred of SMITHDON, W. division of NORFOLK, ½ a mile (W.) from Brancaster; containing 166 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1521a. 2r. 13p., of which 1300 acres are arable, and 200 pasture and marsh: at the inclosure in 1786, about 220 acres of salt-marsh were embanked against the irruption of the sea. In the village, which is situated on the road from Lynn to Wells, is the lofty octagonal shaft of an ancient cross. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12, and in the gift of Eton College: the tithes have been commuted for £410; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 18¾ acres. The church is chiefly in the later English style, with a circular tower. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

TITHE HILL, a hamlet, in the parish of CARHAM, union of GLENDALE, W. division of GLENDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 4½ miles (S. S. E.) from Coldstream. It comprises about 230 acres of good arable land, having a level surface and light soil.

TITLEY (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union of KINGTON, hundred of WIGMORE, county of HEREFORD, 3 miles (N. E. by E.) from Kington; containing 393 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road between Presteign and Kington, and comprises 1757 acres. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £231; patrons and impropriators, the Warden and Fellows of Winchester College, whose tithes have been commuted for £229. 10. The church was erected about 60 years since, on the site of one that belonged to a priory of Benedictine monks founded as a cell to the abbey of Tyrone, in France. There are no vestiges of the priory, except the moat that encompassed it, and a remarkably fine spring of water, still called the Priory well.

TITLINGTON, a township, in the parish of EGLINGHAM, union of ALNWICK, N. division of COQUETDALE ward and of NORTHUMBERLAND, 7¼ miles (W. by N.) from Alnwick; containing 70 inhabitants. It lies to the east of the road between Morpeth and Wooler, at the southern extremity of the parish; and between it and Crawley is a high hill called Titlington Pike. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £54. 0. 6., and the impropriate for £24. 9.

TITSEY, a parish, in the union of GODSTONE, second division of the hundred of TANDRIDGE, E. division of SURREY, 5 miles (N. E. by E.) from Godstone; containing 205 inhabitants. This parish, situated on the road from Croydon to Maidstone, and including within its limits one of the sources of the river Medway, comprises between 1800 and 1900 acres; the soil is in some parts chalk, and in others clay, and lime of superior quality is made from the chalk-pits of Botley Hill, here, which is 880 feet above the level of the sea. The village is beautifully situated in the midst of verdant meadows and richly-wooded hills. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 17. 3½.; net income, £290; patron, W. L. Gower, Esq.: the glebe contains about 30 acres. The ancient church, which stood near the mansion-house of Titsey Place, was taken down, and a new edifice erected, in 1776, by Sir John Graham, who removed all the old monuments, with the exception of the tomb of the Staples family, now in the grounds of the Place; in the north wall of the chancel is a stone with brass effigies of William Graham and family.

TITTENHANGER, a hamlet, in the parish of ST. PETER, borough and union of ST. ALBAN'S, hundred of CASHIO, or liberty of ST. ALBAN'S, county of HERTFORD, 2½ miles (S. E. by E.) from St. Alban's; containing 1220 inhabitants.

TITTENLEY, a township, in the parish of AUDLEM, union of DRAYTON, hundred of NANTWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER; containing 23 inhabitants, TITTENSOR, a liberty, in the parish and union of STONE, S. division of the hundred of PIREHILL, N. division of the county of STAFFORD; containing 347 inhabitants.

TITISWORTH, a township, in the parish and union of LEEK, N. division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, 2 miles (N. E. by N.) from Leek; containing 438 inhabitants.

TITLESHALL (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of MITFORD and LAUNDITCH, hundred of LAUNDITCH, W. division of NORFOLK, 10 miles (N. N. E.) from Swaffham; containing, with the parish of Godwick, 607 inhabitants. The united parishes comprise 3364*a. 1r. 28p.*, of which 2306 acres are arable, 634 meadow and pasture, and 260 woodland. The living of Tittleshall with Godwick is a rectory, with that of Wellingham annexed, valued in the king's books at £11. 1. 6½., and in the gift of the Earl of Leicester: the tithes have been commuted for £665, and the glebe comprises 52 acres, with a house. The church, an ancient structure in the decorated style, with a square embattled tower, contains, among several other monuments, an altar-tomb and effigy in white marble of the celebrated Sir Edward Coke, in his judicial costume, and on the north side of the chancel is the mausoleum of the Earl of Leicester. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans.

TIVERTON, a township, in the parish of BUNBURY, union of NANTWICH, First division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 1¼ mile (S.) from Tarporley; containing 687 inhabitants. At Four-lane Ends, in the township, an old established corn-market is held every Monday. The Chester canal passes in the vicinity. The improper tithes have been commuted for £116, payable to the Haberdashers' Company, London. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

Corporation Seal.

Tiverton (St. Peter), a borough, market-town, and parish, possessing exclusive jurisdiction, and the head of a union, locally in the hundred of TIVERTON, Collumpton and N. divisions of DEVON, 14 miles (N. by E.) from Exeter, and 175 (W. by S.) from London; containing 10,040 inhabitants, of whom 7769 are in the town quarter. This place, formerly Twy-ford, Twy-ford-ton, or Two-ford-ton, derives its name from its situation between two rivers anciently called Fords, the Exe and the Lowman, and was known as the village of Twyford so early as 872. A castle was erected here in 1106, by Rivers, Earl of Devon, which continued for many ages the head of the barony, and, with the lordship of the hundred and the manor, is now the property of Sir W. P. Carew, Bart. In 1200, the town had a market and three annual fairs; and, in 1250, it was supplied with water by means of a stream called the Leat, at the expense of Isabel, Countess of Westmorland. In the year 1353, the wool trade was introduced, and in 1500 the inhabitants were extensively engaged in the manufacture of baizes, plain cloths, and kerseys, for which, in the time of Elizabeth, the town enjoyed considerable repute; and although in 1591, the plague greatly checked its prosperity, destroying nearly 600 of the inhabitants, and a destructive fire occurred in 1598, Tiverton was regarded, in 1612, as the chief manufacturing place in the West of England. About this time, however, a second fire consumed 600 houses, and occasioned very great distress. During the contest between Charles and the parliament, the townsmen were much divided; in 1643, they were for a time subject to the king, but in 1645 the republican forces effected the entire subjugation of the town, and the castle, church, and outworks were taken, together with the governor and 200 men. In 1731, a third fire destroyed 300 houses; and, ten years after, one-twelfth of the population was cut off by a severe epidemic fever. In 1745, the introduction of Norwich stuffs, and the subsequent establishment of a manufactory at Wellington, occasioned the decay of the woollen trade, which, in 1815, was entirely superseded by the patent-net manufacture, now the staple trade of the place.

The town is pleasantly situated on elevated ground between the rivers Exe and Lowman, which unite their streams a little to the south, and consists of several streets of respectable appearance, paved throughout, under an act obtained in 1794, and lighted with gas, by subscription; some of the private mansions are spacious, and the inhabitants are well supplied with water. At its eastern extremity is a wharf, whence a canal extends to Burlescombe, passing in its course near the rocks of Canonsleigh, which yield excellent limestone. The lofty factories on the west side of the Exe have an imposing effect, and the river is crossed by a handsome stone bridge originally erected in 1590, by the munificence of Walter Tyrrel, a linen-draper of the town, and lately rebuilt, from which is a fine view of the castle and church. A subscription reading-room, theatre, and assembly-room, are the chief sources of amusement. About 1500 persons are employed in the lace manufacture. The markets are on Tuesday and Saturday, of which the former is the principal; there are four great markets for cattle during the year, and fairs are held on the second Tuesday after Whit-Sunday and on Michaelmas-day. The first charter of incorporation was granted by James I., in 1615; but, in 1723, the mayor absconding on the day of election, it became forfeited, and a second was bestowed by George I., in 1737. The corporation, however, now consists of a mayor, six aldermen, and eighteen councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76; the borough is divided into three wards, and the municipal boundaries are co-extensive with those for parliamentary purposes; the mayor, late mayor, and recorder are justices of the peace, and the total number of magistrates is nine. The town returns two representatives to parliament: the elective franchise was extended in 1832 to the £10 householders of the borough and parish, which are co-extensive, and the mayor is returning officer. The recorder holds a court of session quarterly, and a court of record occasionally for all pleas not exceeding £100; and petty-sessions take place every alternate week. The bridewell, a commodious edifice, was rebuilt about 40 years since; and the other principal public buildings are the guildhall, and a spacious new market-place, erected in 1830.

The parish comprises about 18,000 acres, the greater part of which is meadow and pasture, and the remainder, with the exception of a small portion of woodland, arable.

At the close of the thirteenth century, the LIVING was divided by Hugh Courtenay, Baron of Oakhampton and Earl of Devon, into the portions of Clare, Pitt, Tidcombe, and Priors, of which the last was given to the monastery of St. James, Exeter, and having been subsequently assigned, with the convent, to King's College, Cambridge, that society, as owners of the impropriate rectory, appoint the curate. The Clare portion is valued in the king's books at £27; the Pitt portion, with Cove chapelry annexed, at £36; and the Tidcombe portion, at £27. These three, which are rectorial, are in the patronage of the Earl of Harrowby, Sir W. P. Carew, Bart., Sir R. Vyvyan, Bart., and the Rev. John Spurway: net income of Clare, £452; of Pitt, £675; and of Tidcombe, £735. The church has been rebuilt on an enlarged plan: the altar-piece, of which the subject is the Deliverance of St. Peter from Prison, was painted and presented by the celebrated Mr. Gosway, a native of the town; the churchyard occupies a commanding elevation, and forms an agreeable promenade. A handsome edifice in the Grecian style, was erected in 1730, as a chapel of ease, dedicated to St. George, and each of the four portionists officiates in turn. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyans.

The free grammar school was founded in 1604, pursuant to the will of Peter Blundell, a clothier of Tiverton, who gave £2400 for the purchase of ground and the erection of the building, and for its maintenance devised all his lands in Devon to 27 trustees, directing his executors to apply £2000 of the proceeds in the establishment and perpetual maintenance of six students at either of the universities. Certain exhibitions were added by John Ham, in 1678; by R. Downe, in 1806; and one to Balliol College, Oxford, by John Newte, in 1715; and there are likewise two exhibitions of £30 per annum each, endowed with the dividends on stock bequeathed by Benjamin Gilberd, in 1783. The whole income is upwards of £1100 per annum. The building is a venerable edifice, having its north front cased with freestone; and the façade exhibits two porches, and is of considerable extent, with a spacious quadrangular court opposite. The free English school, in Peter-street, was instituted in 1611, by Robert Comyn, alias Chilcot, who gave £400 for its erection, and an annuity of £20 for the master's salary. Almshouses for nine men, situated in Gold-street, were established by John Greenway, in 1529; and a chapel is attached, which contains some good carved work. The Western almshouse, which has also a small chapel, for eight men, was founded in 1579, by John Waldron; and another, in Peter-street, for six aged women, in 1613, by George Slee. A charitable fund was established pursuant to the will of Mary Rice, in 1697, under the management of trustees, from which 67 persons receive life annuities; and other charitable benefactions are expended in various ways. The poor law union comprises 27 parishes or places, and contains a population of 32,499. Some few remains of the boundary wall of the old castle, with its flanking and angular towers, are still perceptible, particularly a portion of the grand east-entrance, and fragments on the south-west; the site occupies about an acre of ground, on a level with the churchyard, and overhangs the river. Mrs. Cowley, the dramatic writer, was a native of the town.

TIVETSHALL (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of DERWADE, hundred of DISS, E. division of NORFOLK, 6 miles (N. E. by E.) from Diss; containing 368 inhabitants. The road from London to Norwich, by way of Bury, runs through the parish. The living is a rectory, annexed to that of Tivetshall St. Mary: the tithes have been commuted for £526. The church contains portions of the early and decorated English styles, with a tower, and the nave is ornamented with a handsomely carved oak roof, and separated from the chancel by an ancient screen. The Society of Friends have a place of worship.

TIVETSHALL (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of DERWADE, hundred of DISS, E. division of NORFOLK, 5½ miles (N. E. by N.) from Diss; containing 331 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from London to Norwich, through Bury St. Edmund's. The living is a rectory, with that of Tivetshall St. Margaret annexed, valued in the king's books at £20; patron, the Earl of Orford. The tithes have been commuted for £475. 3. 4.; there is a glebe of about 28 acres, and also a glebe-house, much improved by the Rev. J. N. White. The church is partly in the early and partly in the decorated style, and has an ancient square tower at the west end.

TIXALL (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the S. division of the hundred of PIREHILL, union, and N. division of the county, of STAFFORD, 3½ miles (E. by S.) from Stafford; containing 209 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated between the London and Liverpool, and the London and Chester, roads, at the distance of one mile from each, is bounded on the east by the river Trent, and comprises 2323 acres by admeasurement. Immense quantities of freestone are quarried in the neighbourhood of Tixall Hall, a fine old mansion, built of that found upon the spot; and much of it has been used in the construction of the bridges and locks of the Staffordshire and Worcestershire canal, which passes through the parish, and of the Trent and Mersey canal, in the vicinity, the stone being peculiarly adapted for resisting the action of water. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 0. 8.; net income, £200; patron, the Earl Talbot, to whom the whole parish belongs, by purchase in 1844 from Sir Clifford Constable: there is a parsonage-house, with about 40 acres of glebe-land.

TIXOVER (St. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish, in the union of STAMFORD, hundred of WRANDIKE, county of RUTLAND, 6 miles (N. W. by W.) from Stamford; containing 102 inhabitants. It is situated close to the road from Wansford to Uppingham, and bounded on the south and east by the river Welland, and comprises about 900 acres of land, chiefly arable. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Ketton: the church is very ancient, and in the early Norman style.

TOCKENHAM (St. JOHN), a parish, in the union of CRICKLADE and WOOTTON-BASSETT, hundred of KINGSBRIDGE, Swindon and N. divisions of WILTS, 8 miles (S. W.) from Wootton-Basset; containing 263 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from London to Bath, and comprises 761a. 2r. 26p., of which about 154 acres are arable, 568 pasture, and 15 wood: the Wilts and Berks canal and the Great Western railway pass through. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £245; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 36 acres. In the church are handsome memorials to the family of Buxton, proprietors of the parish.

TOCKETTS, a township, in the parish and union of GUISBOROUGH, E. division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, N. riding of YORK, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. by E.) from Guisborough; containing 43 inhabitants. The place, at the time of the Domesday survey, was called Toscutun, and then belonged to the Earl of Morton; it afterwards came to the family of de Brus, and was, more recently, held by the Thwengs, Tocketts, and others. There was formerly a chapel, dedicated to St. James, which was founded by the family of Tocketts, and was connected with the priory of Guisborough. The township is in the district called Cleveland, and comprises about 584 acres, of which 384 are arable, 170 meadow and pasture, and 30 woodland and plantation; the soil is a rich loam, the surface undulated, and the high lands command a fine view of the sea and the Cleveland hills. The manufacture of tiles and bricks is carried on, for which purpose there is abundance of excellent clay. The appropriate tithes have been commuted for £130, payable to the Archbishop of York.

TOCKHOLES, a chapelry, in the parish, union, and Lower division of the hundred, of BLACKBURN, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Blackburn; containing 1023 inhabitants. The township comprises 1926*a. 3r. 13p.*; the surface is mountainous, and chiefly meadow and pasture; there are several coal-mines, but indifferently worked, and stone of good quality for building is extensively quarried. Several of the inhabitants are employed in hand-loom weaving of cotton; and there are also a cotton-factory and some print-works. The road from Blackburn to Manchester passes near the eastern boundary of the chapelry, and the Leeds and Liverpool canal on the west and north. The living is a perpetual curacy, of which the net income is £150; patron, the Vicar of Blackburn. The chapel, dedicated to St. Michael, was rebuilt in the early English style, in 1833, at an expense of £2567. There is a place of worship for Independents. Cannon-balls have been found at various times; a twelve-pounder has been discovered in the garden of the parsonage, and on clearing out an old pond in 1833, skeletons of 48 horses were found, from which it would appear that skirmishes have taken place, most probably between the royalists and parliamentarians.

TOCKINGTON, LOWER, a tything, in the parish of ALMONBURY, union of THORNBURY, Lower division of the hundred of LANGLEY and SWINEHEAD, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Thornbury; containing 440 inhabitants.

TOCKINGTON, UPPER, a tything, in the parish of OLVESTON, union of THORNBURY, Lower division of the hundred of LANGLEY and SWINEHEAD, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 3 miles (S. by W.) from Thornbury; containing 769 inhabitants.

TOCKWITH, a township, in the parish of BILTON, W. division of AINSTY wapentake, W. riding of YORK, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Wetherby; containing 557 inhabitants. It comprises 1692*a. 1p.*, the property of various families mostly resident: the village is situated about a mile south of the river Nidd, which flows in a very devious course. The tithes were commuted for land and annual money payments in 1792. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

TODBERE, a parish, in the union of SHAFTESBURY, hundred of REDLANE, Sturminster division of DORSET, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Shaftesbury; containing 138 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, united in 1746 to that of Stower-Provost, and valued in the king's books at £5. 19. 4.: the tithes have been commuted for £105, and the glebe contains 23 acres. The church was considered a chapel to Gillingham till 1434, when it was made parochial, though the inhabitants, by ancient custom, bury at Stower.

TODBURN, a township, in the parish of LONG HORSLEY, union of ROTHBURY, W. division of MORPETH ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 8 miles (N. W. by N.) from Morpeth; containing 22 inhabitants. This place belonged to the Merlays, and some lands were also held here by the Plessys; other proprietors have been, the families of Thornton, Lumley, Horsley, and Collingwood. The township comprises about 691 acres, of a thin clayey soil, and is the property of C. W. Bigge, Esq. It is divided from Wingates by the Tod burn, which is formed by the Wray and Wingates burns, and, after taking in the Linden, falls into the Coquet a little above Wejdon bridge; its banks are generally steep and narrow, but beautifully wooded, especially on the left.

TODDENHAM (St. THOMAS à BECKET), a parish, in the union of SHIPSTON-UPON-STOUR, Upper division of the hundred of WESTMINSTER, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Moreton-in-the-Marsh; containing 474 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £18. 19. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £254; patron, the Bishop of London; improPRIATOR, A. Pole, Esq.: the tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1775. The church is a handsome structure, with a tower and spire, and contains in the chancel some canopied stone stalls. The old Fosse-way bounds the parish on the west.

TODDINGTON (St. GEORGE), a market-town and parish, in the union of WOBURN, hundred of MANSHEAD, county of BEDFORD, 5 miles (N.) from Dunstable; containing, with Chalton hamlet, 2225 inhabitants, of whom 2001 are in the township of Toddington with Fancot. This place, which is of remote antiquity, was distinguished as the scene of a battle between the Romans under Aulus Plautius, who encamped his forces on Conger hill, near the church, and the Britons, commanded by their prince, Togodumnus; the latter were defeated, with the loss of their leader. In the reign of Henry III., the manor, which was a free warren, was given by that monarch to Sir Paulinus Peyvre, who obtained for the inhabitants a market and other privileges. The grand manor-house, erected by Hugh Wadlowe, and rebuilt by Sir Paulinus Peyvre, steward to Henry III., was situated at the distance of a mile from Toddington, and was the seat of his descendants, amongst whom was Sir John Broughton, Lord Cheney, chamberlain to Edward VI. and Elizabeth. Queen Elizabeth, in 1563, passed some time in the manor-house, which was also honoured by a visit from James I., in 1608; it was the residence of the Duke of Cleveland, and of Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford; and in it James, Duke of Monmouth, was concealed for some time after the battle of Sedgemoor. During the civil war of the 17th century, the parliamentary general called Hudibras, with his army, was encamped at the place; and the king, who had posted himself on Sundon hills, occupied a house at Woodend, in the parish, the site of the encampment and the moat surrounding it being still visible.

The town is pleasantly situated on an eminence; the houses are chiefly of ancient appearance and irregularly built, and the young persons are principally employed in the manufacture of straw-plat, which is carried on to a considerable extent. The market, granted by charter of Henry III., is on Saturday, but has greatly declined; and the fairs are on St. George's-day, the first Monday in June, September 4th, November 2nd, and December 16th: the ancient market-house, which was very spacious, was demolished in 1799. The parish contains 5437 acres of land; the soil is a rich loamy and gravelly earth, and about 2718 acres are under tillage. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £29. 2. 11.; net income, £829; patrons, the Heirs of the late Lady Louisa Conolly: the tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1798. The church is partly in the later English style, with earlier portions; the exterior is ornamented with grotesque sculptures of various animals, and the interior contains several interesting monuments, among which are some to the descendants of Sir Paulinus Peyvre, and a very costly monument to the memory of Henrietta, Baroness Wentworth, who is said to have died of grief, a few months after the execution of James, Duke of Monmouth, to whom she had been betrothed. The Wesleyans and Baptists have each a place of worship; and there are six almshouses. When digging gravel in a field on the estate of Mr. William Harbett, in 1829 and 1830, great quantities of human bones and skulls, several urns containing small bones, the head of a spear, a sword-blade, some beads, and other relics of antiquity, were discovered.

TODDINGTON (St. LEONARD), a parish, in the union of WINCHCOMB, Lower division of the hundred of KIFTSGATE, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Winchcomb; containing 229 inhabitants. It comprises about 1300 acres, of which the surface is in general flat, and the soil a strong fertile clay. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Stanley-Pontlarge annexed, valued in the king's books at £7. 15. 4.; net income, £56; patron, Lord Sudeley. There is a parsonage-house, with a glebe of about 34 acres.

TODMORDEN, a chapelry, and the head of a union; containing 16,830 inhabitants, of whom 10,776 are in a part of the town of Todmorden, and in the townships of Langfield and Stansfield, parish of HALIFAX, W. riding of YORK, and 6054 in the greater portion of the town of Todmorden, and in the hamlet of Walsden, parish of ROCHDALE, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 20 miles (N. E.) from Manchester, and 207 (N. W. by N.) from London. This place, which is situated in the fertile and romantic vale of Todmorden, anciently Todmare-dene, or the valley of the Fox mere, belonged in the reign of Edward III. to the family of Radcliffe, of Radcliffe Tower, who resided here and at Mearley, alternately, for more than four centuries. The estate was conveyed, however, by marriage with Elizabeth, heiress of Joshua Radcliffe, Esq., to Roger Mainwaring, of the county of Chester, by whom it was alienated, and subsequently sold, about the close of the 17th century. The vale, which is watered by the Calder, abounds with coal, and with stone and timber for building; numerous mills for spinning cotton, and spacious factories for the weaving of calicoes, fustians, dimities, satteens, and velveteens, have been erected on the banks of the river, and are scattered throughout the valley, and the manufacture also of worsted goods has been introduced, and is carried on to a very great extent. In addition to the water-mills on the Calder, there are in the township several of which the machinery is propelled by steam; the number of engines employed in the factories is 34, of the aggregate power of 608 horses; and in the extensive cotton-works of Messrs. Fielden, of this place, are five steam-engines of the aggregate power of 242 horses, and water-power equivalent to that of 15 horses. About 60,000lbs. of cotton-yarn are spun, and 7000 pieces of calico woven weekly in the town and vicinity, exclusively of fustians and other goods; and ten packs of wool are used weekly in the manufacture of various kinds of worsted goods.

The town is situated near the junction of the several townships, and skirted on the south by the Rochdale canal, which opens a direct communication with the inland navigation of Yorkshire and Lancashire, and, through those channels, with the eastern and western sea-ports; and the Manchester and Leeds railway also passes near the town. The market for corn and provisions is on Thursday, and for cattle on the first Thursday in every month; and fairs for cattle, which continue for three days each, are held on the Thursday before Easter, and the 27th of September. A court of petty-sessions, established in 1833, by John Crossley, Esq., of Scaitcliffe, at the request of the inhabitants, is still continued. The chapel erected about the time of the Reformation, on land given for its site, and also for a spacious cemetery, by the Radcliffes, of Todmorden Hall, having become ruinous, was rebuilt in 1770, by Anthony Crossley, Esq., at an expense of £605, and is at present used for the performance of the funeral service. A church dedicated to Christ, which is now the parochial chapel, was erected in 1832, at a cost of nearly £4500, by subscription, aided by a liberal grant from the Parliamentary Commissioners; it is a handsome structure in the early English style, with a square embattled tower, and near it are excellent national schools, just erected at a cost of £2000. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £165; patron, the Vicar of Rochdale. A school adjoining the old churchyard was endowed in 1713, with £100, by the Rev. Richard Clegg, vicar of Kirkham, and with £50 by subscription. The union of Todmorden comprises six townships, containing a population of 31,656.

TODRIDGE, a township, in the parish of HARTBURN, union, and W. division of the ward, of MORPETH, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Hartburn; containing 6 inhabitants. It comprises about 60 acres of a good arable soil, formerly the property of Newminster Abbey, and now tithe-free.

TODWICK (St. PETER AND St. PAUL), a parish, in the union of WORKSOP, S. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, 10 miles (E. by S.) from Sheffield; containing 214 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Sheffield to Worksop, and comprises about 1700 acres of tolerably fertile land, including 50 acres of wood: good red gritstone is quarried for building. From a hill called Gospel Hill, extensive views are obtained, embracing seven churches and fourteen hamlets. Todwick Grange, the seat of George Colton Fox, Esq., is a handsome residence. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 14. 7.; net income, £160; patron, Mr. Fox. The tithes for the manor were commuted for land and a money payment in 1767: there is a parsonage-house, with 68 acres of land. The church is a small neat edifice, with a square tower.

TOFT (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of CAXTON and ARRINGTON, hundred of LONGSTOW, county of CAMBRIDGE, 5 miles (E. by S.) from Caxton; containing 338 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with the vicarage of Caldecote annexed, valued in the king's books at £6. 16. 10½.; net income, £287; patrons, the Master and Fellows of Christ's College, Cambridge. A national school has been endowed by the Rev. John Preston with the interest of £500.

TOFT, a township, in the parish of KNUTSFORD, union of ALTRINCHAM, hundred of BUCKLOW, N. division of the county of CHESTER, 1½ mile (S.) from Nether Knutsford; containing 236 inhabitants.

TOFT, with LOUND, a township, in the parish of WITHAM-ON-THE-HILL, union of BOURNE, wapentake of BELTISLOE, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, 3 miles (S. W.) from Bourne; containing 225 inhabitants, of whom 167 are in Toft hamlet.

TOFT, MONKS' (St. Margaret), a parish, in the union of LODDON and CLAVERING, hundred of CLAVERING, E. division of NORFOLK, 3½ miles (N.) from Beccles; containing 349 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Beccles to Yarmouth, and comprises 2205a. 1r. 21p., of which about 1402 acres are arable, 164 pasture, 76 woods, 552 marsh, and 10 waste. The Hall, which is moated, is supposed to have been part of an alien priory, a cell to the abbey of St. Peter and St. Paul, at Preaux, in Normandy, founded here in the time of Henry I., and the revenue of which, on its suppression, was annexed by Henry V. to the Carthusian monastery at Witham, by Henry VI. to Eton College, and by Edward IV. to King's College, Cambridge. The living is a discharged rectory, united to that of Haddiscoe, and valued in the king's books at £8: a tithe rent-charge of £316. 13. is paid to King's College, which also has a glebe of 13 acres; a rent-charge of £153. 16. 8. belongs to the rector of this parish, and one of £26 to the incumbent of Gillingham. The inhabitants, by a charter, are exempt from serving on juries.

TOFT-NEXT-NEWTON (St. Peter and St. Paul), a parish, in the union of CAISTOR, N. division of the wapentake of WALSHCROFT, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 4½ miles (W.) from Market-Rasen; containing 71 inhabitants, and comprising 1230 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 10. 10., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £230; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 43½ acres.

TOFT, WEST (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of THETFORD, hundred of GRIMSHOE, W. division of NORFOLK, 5 miles (N. E.) from Brandon; containing 182 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Thetford to Watton, and comprises about 2700 acres, of which 500 are woodland in the demesne of the Hall. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 6.; net income, £110; patron, Sir R. Sutton, Bart. The church is an ancient building of flint and stone, with a large square tower erected early in the reign of Edward IV., and coped and embattled with freestone. In 1720, an oaken coffin was discovered, containing, among other relics, human bones, the representation of a face cut in jet, a blue cypher, and several beads.

TOFTREES (All Saints), a parish, in the union of WALSINGHAM, hundred of GALLOW, W. division of NORFOLK, 2½ miles (S. W.) from Fakenham; containing 84 inhabitants. It comprises 1184a. 2r. 4p., of which 774 acres are arable, 286 meadow and pasture, and 93 woodland. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 18. 6., and in the gift of the improPRIATORS, the family of Townshend: the great tithes have been commuted for £155, and the vicarial for £157. 12., and the glebe contains 9 acres. The church is chiefly in the early English style, with a square tower; the font is Norman, and there are some other details of that character.

TOGSTON, a township, in the parish of WARKWORTH, union of ALNWICK, E. division of COQUETDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 10 miles (S. E. by S.) from Alnwick; containing 151 inhabitants. It is bounded on the east by the sea, and comprises 1031 acres, of which two-thirds are arable land, of a good strong soil: 634 acres are the property of Thomas George Smith, Esq., of Togston House, 117 that of James Dand, jun., Esq., of Togston Hall, and the remainder belong to the Countess of Newburgh. In 1830, a colliery was opened by Mr. Smith, and another is also in operation, both for the supply of the district. The appropriate tithes have been commuted for £157. 13., and the vicarial for £32. 12. 2. The Winston Dyke passes through the township.

TOLLAND (St. John the Baptist), a parish, in the union of TAUNTON, hundred of TAUNTON and TAUNTON-DEAN, W. division of SOMERSET, 3½ miles (N. N. E.) from Wiveliscombe; containing 124 inhabitants. The parish comprises 825 acres by admeasurement, and the road from Wiveliscombe to Dunster and Minehead runs through it on the south-west, and the old road to the same places on the north-east. Lime is quarried for agricultural use. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £140; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 40 acres. The church is a very small ancient edifice.

TOLLARD-ROYAL (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of TISBURY, partly in the hundred of CRANBORNE, Shaston division of DORSET, but chiefly in the hundred of CHALK, Hindon and S. divisions of WILTS, 6¾ miles (S. E. by E.) from Shaftesbury; containing, with the tything of Farnham-Tollard, 548 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2807 acres, of which 416 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16, and in the gift of J. Austin, Esq.: the improPRIATE tithes have been commuted for £10, and the rectorial for £560; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 55 acres. In the parish is an old farmhouse called King John's hunting-seat, thought to be the remains of an ancient royal residence for hunting in Cranborne Chase.

TOLLER-FRATRUM (St. Basil), a parish, in the union of DORCHESTER, hundred of TOLLERFORD, Dorchester division of DORSET, 9 miles (N. W. by W.) from Dorchester; containing 67 inhabitants. The parish formerly belonged to the brethren of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, whence it derived its distinguishing appellation. The living is a discharged vicarage, with Winford-Eagle annexed, valued in the king's books at £10. 6.; net income, £161; patron, J. F. Browne, Esq., who, with Lord Wynford, is improprator. Near the road to Maiden-Newton are slight traces of an ancient intrenchment, upon an eminence called White Sheet; and on Farn down, a barrow was opened many years since, which contained seventeen urns, full of firm bones and black ashes.

TOLLER-PORCORUM (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of DORCHESTER, partly in the hundred of BEAMINSTER-FORUM and REDHONE, Bridport division, but chiefly in the hundred of TOLLERFORD, Dorchester division of DORSET, 10 miles (W. N. W.) from Dorchester; containing, with the tything of Kingcombe, 543 inhabitants. This parish, which is said to have derived its distinguishing name from the great number of swine formerly bred here, comprises by admeasurement 3145 acres. There are chalk-pits, and stone is quarried, and used for all kinds of buildings. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5; net income, £180; patron and improprator, J. F. Browne, Esq.: there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 71 acres. The parish partakes, with Toller-Fratrum, in the benefit of a school founded in 1772, by George Browne, and endowed with a school-house, &c., and an annuity of £21.

TOLLERTON (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of BINGHAM, S. division of the wapentake of BINGHAM and of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 4 miles (S. E. by E.) from Nottingham; containing 155 inhabitants. This place, which takes its name from Torlaston, one of its possessors before the Conquest, in the reign of Stephen became the manor of Radulphus Barre, with the descendants of whose family it still remains. The parish comprises by admeasurement 1198 acres, of which the surface in some parts is hilly, and the soil varied with sand, clay, and marl. The Hall is situated in the midst of extensive grounds, and has a fine lake, which is ornamented with a small woody island; the village stands on a declivity, and has a picturesque appearance. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15. 9. 4½.; net income, £435; patron, Pendock Barry, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land in 1803; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 218 acres. The church, which suffered much in the civil wars, has been nearly rebuilt and greatly beautified by the present patron, to members of whose family it contains handsome memorials.

TOLLERTON, a township, in the parish of ALNE, union of EASINGWOULD, wapentake of BULMER, N. riding of YORK, 4½ miles (S. by W.) from Easingwold; containing 521 inhabitants. The township comprises by computation about 2000 acres: the village is in the vale of the small river Linton, which is supposed to have been formerly navigable, and one of the stations of the Great Northern railway is situated here. A large cattle and sheep fair is held on the 15th of August. The tithes, with certain exceptions, were commuted for land and a money payment in 1810. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

TOLLESBURY (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of MALDON, hundred of THURSTABLE, N. division of ESSEX, 8 miles (E. N. E.) from Maldon; containing 1149 inhabitants. The parish comprises 7918 acres, of which 1382 are common or waste land; it is bounded on the south by the bay and river Blackwater, and the creek of Southfleet is navigable to the village for vessels drawing six feet of water. It is supposed to have derived its name from having been the place where customs or tolls were formerly paid by ships entering the bay. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £16. 6. 3.; net income, £484; patrons, the family of Lawson; improprator, R. Benyon de Beauvoir, Esq. The church is an ancient edifice, with a stone tower. There is a place of worship for Independents.

TOLLESHUNT, D'ARCY (St. Nicholas), a parish, in the union of MALDON, hundred of THURSTABLE, N. division of ESSEX, 7 miles (N. E. by E.) from Maldon; containing 733 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the south-east by the river Blackwater and Northfleet creek, derives the adjunct to its name from the family of D'Arcy, who were anciently lords of the manor. Corn is sent to Maldon to be shipped, and great quantities of fish-manure are landed in the parish. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £18. 10.; patron and improprator, Lieut.-General Rebow. The great tithes have been commuted for £351, and the vicarial for £250, and the glebe contains 3 acres. The church has a square embattled tower of stone. New House, or White House Farm, in the parish, was purchased in 1635, by the trustees of the charity of Henry Smith, Esq., who, besides his great munificence to almost every town and village in Surrey, left money to buy lands, directing the rents to be distributed among the poor of fourteen parishes, of which this is one.

TOLLESHUNT, KNIGHTS' (All Saints), a parish, in the union of MALDON, hundred of THURSTABLE, N. division of ESSEX, 9 miles (N. E.) from Maldon; containing 313 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises 2079a. 3r. 17p., mostly arable land, is pleasantly situated, and contains some ancient mansions; the village is neatly built, and a fair is held on the 29th of June. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £540, and the glebe contains 60 acres. The church is a very ancient edifice, with a belfry turret of wood, and has a monument of a Knight Templar. Near the manor-house of Barnewalden, here, some Roman pavements were discovered a few years since.

TOLLESHUNT MAJOR, or BECKINGHAM (St. Nicholas), a parish, in the union of MALDON, hundred of THURSTABLE, N. division of ESSEX, 5 miles (N. E. by E.) from Maldon; containing 447 inhabitants. It comprises 2185a. 3r. 5p., about three-fourths of which are arable. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8; net income, £150; patron, the Rev. C. W. Carwardine; improprators, the New England Company. The church is an ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, on the north side of which was a chapel, now destroyed, and the arched entrance walled up.

TOLPUDDLE, a parish, in the union of DORCHESTER, hundred of PIDDLETOWN, Dorchester division of DORSET, 7 miles (E. N. E.) from Dorchester; containing 368 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1856 acres, of which 169 are common or waste; the soil is chalky. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £15. 7. 3½.; net income, £240; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford, whose tithes have been commuted for £400, and who have a glebe of 10 acres. The church is a small ancient fabric, built of rubble. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

TONBRIDGE, or TUNBRIDGE (St. PETER AND St. PAUL), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the lowey of TONBRIDGE, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, 14 miles (W. S. W.) from Maidstone, and 30 (S. E.) from London; containing, with Southborough, and part of the chapelry of Tonbridge-Wells, 12,530 inhabitants. This place, which is supposed to have been originally called "Town of Bridges," from the stone bridges crossing the five streams into which the river Medway here branches, probably owes its origin to a castle of formidable strength, considered by some to have existed before the Conquest, but more generally thought to have been erected very soon after that period, by Richard, Earl of Clare, a relation of the Conqueror's. This castle, which was frequently an object of contention, was besieged by William Rufus, the proprietor having declared in favour of Robert, Duke of Normandy; it was afterwards taken by King John, in his war with the barons, and subsequently was besieged by Prince Edward, son of Henry III., on which occasion the town was burned by the garrison, to prevent its giving shelter to the assailants. Edward having become king, was sumptuously entertained here by Gilbert, Earl of Clare; and during his absence in Flanders, his son, afterwards Edward II., when administering the government of the country, resided in this castle, and, having been crowned, took possession of it, in consequence of the rebellion of its owner, after which it became, with three others, the depository of the records of the kingdom. The lordship, some time after, was the property of the Staffords; and on the attainder of the Duke of Buckingham, the last powerful member of that family, in the reign of Henry VIII., it was seized by the crown, with his other possessions, and the castle was suffered to fall into decay.

The town consists mainly of a long spacious street, paved, and lighted with gas, and containing some good houses, and its situation on the declivity of a hill contributes greatly to its cleanliness. The only public buildings are the town-hall and market-house, a plain brick edifice: the principal bridge was erected in 1775, by Mr. Milne, at an expense of £1100. The chief articles manufactured are, Tonbridge ware, and gunpowder, but both to a less extent than formerly. The river Medway, on which convenient wharfs have been erected for the accommodation of the trade, which is very considerable, was made navigable to the town about the middle of the last century, and a large quantity of coal and timber is brought by it from Maidstone. The South-Eastern railway passes near the town, on the south, where a station is established. The weekly market, on Friday, is now discontinued; but there is a cattle-market on the first Tuesday in every month, which is very numerously attended, and a fair is held on October 12th. The county magistrates meet on the second and fourth Wednesdays in each month; and a court of requests for the recovery of debts under £5, takes place on the third Monday in the month. Two representatives were sent to parliament from the town in the 23rd of Edward I., but it has not since exercised the elective franchise.

The parish comprises 15,234a. 3r. 35p., of which about 5284 acres are arable, 4636 pasture, 5313 woodland, and 89 common or waste. The LIVING is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £20. 3. 4., and in the gift of John Deacon, Esq.: the vicarial tithes have been commuted for £1077, and the impropriate for £873. 7. The church, a spacious and handsome structure, with a square embattled tower, was some years since repaired and enlarged; and a district church has been erected at Southborough. The grammar school was founded by Sir Andrew Judd, alderman of London, in the 7th of Edward VI.; and, by letters-patent of that monarch, it was ordained that, after the death of the founder, the management should be vested in the Skinners' Company, London. A salary of £500 is paid to the headmaster, and one of £200 to the under-master, both having also rent-free residences; and sixteen exhibitions of £100 a year each, to continue for four years, are maintained from the income, for boys going to either of the universities. In addition to these exhibitions, the pupils are eligible to a fellowship at St. John's College, Oxford, instituted by Sir Thomas Whyte; to six exhibitions of £10 per annum each, tenable at any college in either university, founded by Sir Thomas Smith; to a scholarship of £17. 9. 6. a year, at Brasenose College, Oxford, founded by Mr. Henry Fisher; to an exhibition of £2. 13. 4. per annum, at either of the universities, established by Mr. Thomas Lampard; to two exhibitions of £6 per annum each, at St. John's College, Cambridge, founded by Mr. Worrall; to an exhibition originally £4, now £8 a year, at either university (in default of scholars from Seven-Oaks' school), established by Mr. Robert Holmedon; and to two exhibitions, of £75 per annum each, at Jesus' College, Cambridge (also in default of scholars from Seven-Oaks), instituted by Lady Mary Boswell. The school premises, which have been repaired and enlarged, form an elegant range of building, with a frontage of 130 feet, and attached is a play-ground of about 12 acres in extent. The poor law union of Tonbridge comprises 10 parishes or places, containing a population of 23,814. The remains of the once celebrated castle consist only of the entrance gateway, flanked by two round towers and an artificial mount, on which the keep stood. At some distance, on the opposite side of the river, are the ruins of a priory of Black canons founded by Richard de Clare, about the end of the reign of Henry I.: upon its dissolution, in 1525, the revenue, amounting to £169. 10. 3., was intended to form a part of the endowment of Wolsey's colleges at Ipswich and Oxford, but the cardinal's disgrace occurring before the grant was confirmed, it became vested in the crown: the foundation is still visible, but little remains besides the refectory, or hall, which has been converted into a barn. About a mile from the town is a well of mineral water of the same quality as that of Tonbridge Wells.

TONBRIDGE, or TUNBRIDGE, WELLS, a market-town and chapelry, partly in the parish and lowey of TONBRIDGE, and partly in the parish of SPELDHURST, hundred of WASHLINGSTONE, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, and partly in the parish of FRANT, hundred of ROTHERFIELD, rape of PEVENSEY, E. division of SUSSEX, 20 miles (S. W.) from Maidstone, and 36 (S. E. by S.) from London; the whole containing 8302 inhabitants. This attractive and fashionable watering-place owes its importance to its medicinal springs, which were first discovered in 1606, by Dudley, Lord North, then staying at Eridge House, for the benefit of his health; and in consequence of the benefit he derived from the use of them, Lord Abergavenny, who resided at Eridge, was induced to fit up the wells, and make such improvements as might lead to their becoming a public resort. The springs soon acquired such celebrity, that Henrietta Maria, queen of Charles I., retired hither to enjoy the benefit of the waters, after the birth of her eldest son, Prince Charles; and there being no suitable residence, she and her suite were lodged in tents upon Bishop's-Down. Their increasing reputation continuing to attract many visitors, various retail dealers constructed standings, on which they exhibited their wares, under a row of trees in the road by which the company usually passed to the Wells; and finally lodging-houses were erected. Soon after the Restoration, in 1664, the place was visited by Charles II. and his Queen Catherine, who, residing here for some time, with the gay court of that monarch, gave it additional attraction. It was also a very favourite residence of Queen Anne, prior to her accession to the throne, and has continued ever since to attract a great concourse of company during the season, from May to November. The waters, which are chalybeate, are of nearly equal strength with those of the German Spa, and are considered very efficacious in cases of weak digestion, or where tonics are necessary.

The town is irregularly but beautifully built, and consists of clusters of houses in different situations. It is lighted with gas, and watched under the provisions of a local act obtained in 1815; and in 1835, also, an act was passed for lighting, watching, and improving the town, for regulating the supply of water, and establishing a market. The Well is situated close to the parade, and the water, which rises into a stone basin, is served by women called "Dippers," who receive a certain sum for the season from each person drinking it. Near the Well, which is 300 feet above the level of the sea, are the principal shops and places of amusement; and a spacious building called the Bath House has been erected, containing both hot and cold mineral baths. The Parade, which is broad and handsome, is bounded on one side by the assembly-rooms, libraries, and by shops in which Tonbridge ware and fancy articles of every kind are sold, and in front of which is a piazza extending nearly the whole length; and on the opposite side is a row of trees, with an orchestra in the midst, where a band usually plays during a portion of each day in the season. With the Parade is connected what are called the Upper and Lower walk, divided by palisades of iron. The other parts of the town are situated on detached eminences, at short distances from the Wells, called Calverley, Mount-Ephraim, Mount-Sion, Mount-Pleasant, Bishop's-Down, Grove-Hill, and Nevill-Park, which, being interspersed with shrubberies and pleasure-grounds, and connected with the Wells by walks regularly disposed, present a combination of interesting scenery. The inns, and boarding and lodging houses, are generally of a superior description.

The estate of Calverley was purchased in 1828, by John Ward, Esq., who opened the mansion as an hotel, and laid out the grounds with great elegance and taste, forming a park, with a terrace, parade, and promenade, to which 24 villas have been added, conferring upon the locality the appearance of a new town. A library and baths are attached to the promenade; and the splendid hotel, with its ornamental appendages and beautiful adjacent scenery, is justly considered as elevating this delightful spot to a rivalry with any establishment of the same kind in the kingdom. Calverley House was frequently occupied by her present Majesty while Princess Victoria, and by the Duchess of Kent; and the inhabitants, as a proof of their grateful remembrance of royal patronage, planted, in 1835, a grove on the common named Victoria Grove, which consists of elms, limes, and sycamores, disposed in three rows, and measures 550 feet in length, and 50 in breadth. About a mile south-west of the town, is a beautifully romantic spot called the High Rocks, the group of which, with the surrounding scenery, resembles parts of Derbyshire, and forms a point of strong attraction to the numerous visitors.

A literary and scientific institution and a horticultural society have been established; there is a small neat theatre near the Wells, and races are held in August, on the common. The manufacture of wooden toys and articles for domestic use, commonly denominated Tonbridge ware, is carried on to a considerable extent. A handsome market house has been erected by Mr. Ward, near Calverley Park; it is a fine range of building, with an area in front, in the centre of which is a fountain, and contains an elegant and spacious room for assemblies and public meetings. The government is vested in commissioners chosen under the local act of 1835, which embraces a district of one mile beyond the town; constables are appointed at the court leet for the "hundred of Southborough and manor of Rusthall," and petty-sessions are held every alternate Wednesday. A district church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, was erected in 1829, at an expense of £12,000, by subscription, aided by a grant of £6000 from his Majesty's Commissioners, in that part of the town which is in the parish of Tonbridge; it is a handsome structure in the later English style, accommodating between 1500 and 1600 persons, and a finely-painted window has lately been erected at the east end. The incumbent is appointed by the vicar of Tonbridge during his life, after which the living will be a perpetual curacy in the gift of the Patron of Tonbridge. A church called Christ-church, in the rich Norman style of the 12th century, was erected in 1835, but was not opened until 1841, when it became the property, by purchase, of the Rev. Thomas Ward Franklyn, in whom the patronage is vested. There are places of worship for the Connexion of the Countess of Huntingdon, Independents, and Wesleyans; and a Roman Catholic chapel in the Grecian style, erected in 1838. The late Richard Cumberland, the celebrated dramatist, was for many years a resident on Mount-Sion, and frequently attracted hither some of the most eminent literary characters of the day; he died in the year 1811.

TONE, a hamlet, in the township of COLWELL with SWINBURN, parish of CHOLLERTON, union of HEXHAM, N. E. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 10 miles (N.) from Hexham. It comprises about 1121 acres, lying on a high elevation, and is the property of Henry Gregson, Esq., who has here a good modern mansion.

TONG (St. GILES), a parish, in the union and hundred of MILTON, Upper division of the lathe of SCRAY, E. division of KENT, 2 miles (E. by N.) from Sittingbourne; containing 212 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 6. 8.; patron, W. Baldwin, Esq.; appropriator, the Archbishop of Canterbury. The great tithes have been commuted for £522. 10., and the vicarial for £205, and the glebes comprise respectively 7 and 2 acres. The church has a steeple on the south side. Here was a castle in which Hengist surprised King Vortigern and his nobles, the latter of whom he massacred, and the former kept prisoner till he surrendered his kingdom: of this fortress the ditch and keep-mount still remain, at a short distance to the south of the church. At Pukeshall, in the parish, was anciently a hospital dedicated to St. James.

TONG (St. BARTHOLOMEW), a parish, in the union of SHIFFNALL, Shiffnall division of the hundred of BRIMSTREE, S. division of the county of SALOP, 3¼ miles (E. by S.) from Shiffnall; containing 566 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Birmingham to Chester, and comprises by admeasurement 3466 acres; the river Worf commences from the union of two brooks at the western extremity of the parish. Tong Castle, the seat of George Durant, Esq., a magnificent and extensive mansion, remodelled in the last century, is crowned with numerous turrets, pinnacles, and lofty domes, producing a grand and striking effect, and contains many valuable pictures and cabinets. There are several quarries of red and white stone, the material of which is used for building. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the gift of Mr. Durant: the salary of the incumbent was originally £14 per annum, with board, &c., at the castle, but Lord Pierrepont, who built the present handsome parsonage-house, endowed the benefice with £80 per annum. The glebe comprises two acres. The church, which is in the decorated style, with a spire rising from the centre, and is a fine specimen of ancient monastic architecture, originally belonged to the abbey of Shrewsbury, and was purchased in 1411, by Isabel, relict of Sir Fulk Pembridge, Knt., who, with others, rebuilt and made it collegiate for a warden, four secular chaplains, priests, and two clerks, with an hospital for thirteen poor persons; the revenue, at the Dissolution, according to Dugdale, was £22. 8. 1. Within the choir are splendid altar-tombs with statues to the Pembridges and Vernons, the ancient lords of the manor; also a monument in memory of Sir Thomas Stanley, which formerly stood in the chancel, and the inscription upon which is said to have been written by Shakespeare. There are some bequests for the poor. King Charles II. is stated to have found refuge in a farm-house in the parish before the Restoration.

TONG, a chapelry, in the parish of BIRSTAL, union of BRADFORD, wapentake of MORLEY, W. riding of the county of YORK, 6½ miles (W. S. W.) from Leeds; containing 2515 inhabitants. The manor, including the hamlets of Cutler-Height, Far-Street, Rycroft, Holme, and Westgate-Hill, comprises by admeasurement 2643 acres, principally the property of John Plumbe Tempest, Esq., who is lord of the manor. The surface is hilly, and the scenery enriched with extensive woods of native growth; the soil is fertile, and the substratum abounds with coal and iron-stone, but the latter is not wrought. Tong Hall, the seat of Col. Tempest, is a stately mansion, erected by Sir George Tempest, on the site of an ancient hall occupied by the De Tonge, Mirfield, and Tempest families for more than 750 years; it is situated in a finely-wooded demesne, comprising much beautiful scenery, and commanding extensive and interesting views. The village is neatly built, and though in the centre of a populous manufacturing district, is rural and retired; the inhabitants are mostly employed in agriculture, and in the combing of wool, and the making of rope and twine. A court of requests for the recovery of small debts, partly for the lordship and liberty of Tong, was established by act of parliament, in 1839. The chapel, dedicated to St. James, was rebuilt in 1727, chiefly at the expense of Sir Geo. Tempest: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £166; patron and impropiator, Col. Tempest. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A school was built by Sir Geo. Tempest, in 1737, and endowed by him and Mr. Gervas Browne, for the instruction of twelve children; and there are some small bequests for distribution among the poor.

TONGE, with HAULGH, a township, in the parish and union of BOLTON, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 1¼ mile (E. N. E.) from Bolton; containing 2627 inhabitants. The population is chiefly employed in the manufacture of cotton and counterpanes, and in extensive bleaching-grounds, spinning-mills, and paper-mills. The ingenious Crompton resided at Hull-i'-th'-Wood, here, the ancient seat of the Starkie family, where he completed his invention of the spinning-mill, which he sold for not more than £100; he, however, received a grant from parliament of £5000, and a subscription was opened by the cotton-spinners and others of Bolton and Manchester, for the purchase of an annuity, which he enjoyed during the remainder of his life.

TONGE, a township, in the parish of PRESTWICH, union of OLDHAM, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER; containing 2423 inhabitants. The township adjoins Middleton, and forms a populous part of the environs of that town. A district church has been built by aid from Her Majesty's Commissioners, at an expense of £1773, and contains 350 free sittings: the incumbent has a grant of £137 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners: the tithes have been commuted for £20.

TONGE, a hamlet, in the parish of BREEDON, union of SHARDLOW, hundred of WEST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER; containing 150 inhabitants.

TONGHAM, a hamlet, in the parish of SEAL, hundred of FARNHAM, W. division of the county of SURREY, 3½ miles (N. E. by E.) from Farnham; containing 242 inhabitants.

TOOLEY, a hamlet, in the parish of PECKLETON, union of MARKET-BOSWORTH, hundred of SPARKENHOE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, 5 miles (N. E.) from Hinckley; containing 25 inhabitants.

TOOTHOG, a township, in the parish of CWMYOY, union of ABERGAVENNY, hundred of EWYASLACY, county of HEREFORD, 10 miles (N. N. W.) from Abergavenny; containing 132 inhabitants, and comprising 2300 acres.

TOOTING, LOWER, or TOOTING-GRAVENY (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of WANDSWORTH, W. division of the hundred of BRIXTON, E. division of SURREY, 7 miles (S. S. W.) from London; containing 2840 inhabitants. The parish comprises 500 acres by admeasurement, of which 50 are common, and the remainder chiefly pasture. The village, consisting of two streets, is situated on the road from London to Brighton, through Reigate, and is lighted with oil, and supplied with water from wells produced by boring; the atmosphere is considered very salubrious, and the environs are studded with elegant cottages and villas. Assemblies are occasionally held during the winter months. The parish is within the jurisdiction of a court of requests at Wandsworth, for the recovery of debts under £5, and is also under the superintendence of the new police. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 8. 6½.; net income, £374; patron, the Rev. Richard Greaves. The church was rebuilt in 1833, in the later English style, by subscription, by a sale of part of Tooting common, and by a grant of £350 from the Incorporated Society; it contains monuments to Sir John Hebdon, ambassador to Russia in the reign of Charles I., Sir James Bateman, and others. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans; also national schools, erected on the site of some former ones, in 1828, at an expense of £1800.

TOOTING, UPPER, a hamlet, in the parish of STREATHAM, union of WANDSWORTH and CLAPHAM, E. division of BRIXTON hundred and of the county of SURREY, 6¾ miles (S. S. W.) from London. This village, which is also designated Tooting-Beck, is well sheltered from the north winds; and the salubrity of the air, the purity of the water, and its dry gravelly soil, have made it the residence of several respectable families. In that part adjoining Balham-Hill, a hamlet in the parish, is a proprietary episcopal chapel, erected by the inhabitants, at an expense of nearly £7000, about the year 1806, and since greatly enlarged by the addition of two wings; it will accommodate about 1000 persons, and over the altar is a painted window.

TOPCLIFFE (St. COLUMB), a parish, in the union of THIRSK, partly in the wapentake of BIRDFORTH, and partly in the wapentake of HALLIKELD, N. riding of YORK; containing 2964 inhabitants, of whom 706 are in the township of Topcliffe, 4½ miles (S. S. W.) from Thirsk. The parish comprises by computation 14,733 acres, and consists of the chapelries of Dishforth and Marton-le-Moor, and the townships of Asenby, Baldersby, Catton, Dalton, Elmire with Crakehill, Rainton with Newby, Skipton, and Topcliffe. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £19. 19. 2.; net income, £600; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of York. The church is a building of great antiquity. There is a chapel at Dishforth; and a church has recently been built at Skipton. The Wesleyans have a place of worship. John Hartforth, in 1588, gave land and money in support of a free grammar school, which, with subsequent bequests, produce £70 a year. Here are slight vestiges of an ancient baronial mansion of the Percy family called Maiden Bower, in which Henry, fourth earl of Northumberland, was murdered by the populace, in 1520, for enforcing a tax imposed in the reign of Henry VII. Charles I. was confined in it, and the sum of £200,000, for giving him up to the parliament, was here paid to the Scottish commissioners.

TOPCROFT (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of LODDON and CLAVERING, hundred of LODDON, E. division of NORFOLK, 5½ miles (E. by S.) from Long Stratton; containing 475 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 13. 4., and in the gift of the Bishop of Norwich: the tithes have been commuted for £400; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains about 48 acres. The church is chiefly in the later English style, with a circular tower, the upper part of which is octagonal. Near Topcroft Hall was formerly a free chapel, dedicated to St. Giles. There is a place of worship for Independents.

TOPPESFIELD (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of HALSTEAD, hundred of HINCKFORD, N. division of ESSEX, 8 miles (N. W.) from Halstead; containing 1073 inhabitants. The parish comprises by admeasurement 3220 acres, of which about 2870 are arable, 300 pasture, and 50 woodland. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £26; it is in the patronage of the Crown, and the tithes have been commuted for £1100, with a glebe containing 20 acres. The church has a handsome modern tower of brick, supplying the place of the original one of stone, which was burnt down in 1700, and rebuilt by the Rev. Mr. Wilde, then rector: under an arch in the south wall of the chancel is a very ancient tomb, and there are several interesting monuments. The Independents have a place of worship.

TOPSHAM (St. MARGARET), a market-town and parish, in the union of ST. THOMAS, hundred of WONFORD, Wonford and S. divisions of DEVON, 3½ miles (S. E.) from Exeter, and 170 (W. S. W.) from London; containing 3733 inhabitants. In the civil war of the 17th century, the Earl of Warwick brought some ships up the river Exe, but the vessels being left upon the sands, on the ebbing of the tide, two were captured and one burnt by the army under Fairfax, who remained here a short time. The Duke of Monmouth is also said to have been at this place, in consequence of which one of the streets was called after his name. This town, situated just above the influx of the river Clyst into the Exe, and about 6 miles from the sea, is so celebrated for the salubrity of its air that it is reported to have lost only one person when the plague was raging at Exeter and in the vicinity, in the reign of Charles II.; and during the desolation produced in the neighbourhood by the cholera, in 1832, it entirely escaped the contagion. The place is lighted with gas; and on the strand are some neat residences, fronted with gardens, extending to the water's edge, the view being justly admired for its variety and extent. An act for better cleansing and lighting the town was passed in 1843. The foreign TRADE was formerly very great, but has gradually fallen away, and at the present time its vessels are chiefly employed in the coasting trade; in the time of William III., the number engaged in the Newfoundland fishery exceeded that of any port in the kingdom, with the exception of London, but these vessels were mostly taken in the American revolutionary war, and the little trade that remained was transferred to Teign-mouth. The river Exe expands here to a considerable width, forming, at high tides, a noble sheet of water. About a mile to the south, on the opposite side of it, are the sea-locks, opening into the canal leading to Exeter, which cut was begun in 1563, and altered at various periods, but especially in 1829, when it was extended to Turf, about a mile below the town; an act was passed in 1840, for improving the navigation of the river, to execute the provisions of which seven commissioners have been appointed. A quay, built about 1313, by Hugh Courtenay, was purchased by the Chamber of Exeter, in 1778, and is capable of receiving vessels of 200 tons' burthen. Ship-building is carried on extensively; chain-cables, anchors, ropes, twine, and sacking, are manufactured; a large paper-manufactory is in operation, and there is a considerable trade in coal and timber. In 1257, an annual fair for three days was granted to the inhabitants, and, together with a market on Saturdays, confirmed to them by Edward I.; the market is still held on Saturday, and there is a small fair on the Thursday after the 20th of July.

The parish comprises 1552a. 2r., which rest principally upon a substratum of gravel; the ground is diversified with hill and dale, and the soil is a rich loam. The LIVING is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Exeter (the appropriators), with a net income of £227: the glebe consists of about 30 acres. The church was nearly rebuilt in 1794, and enlarged in 1827 and 1832, and contains some good monuments by Chantrey, among which is one to Sir John Duckworth, Bart., and another to the memory of his son, Lieut.-Col. Duckworth, who fell in the battle of Albuera. A chapel of ease, built by subscription, was consecrated in 1838; the patronage is in the incumbent of Topsham, and it is endowed with £1500, raised also by subscription, to which £200 have since been added, £100 from the Rev. C. Burne, and £200 from the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty. There are places of worship for Independents, Wesleyans, and Unitarians; and benefactions for instruction produce about £15 per annum, of which £5 are paid to a national, and £10 to another, school. Capt. Burgess, R.N., who was killed at the battle of Camperdown, and to whose memory a public monument was erected in St. Paul's Cathedral, was a native of this place; and Capt. Watson, who lost his life in the West Indies, under Admiral Rowley, resided here for some time.

TORBRIAN (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of NEWTON-ABBOT, hundred of HAYTOR, Teignbridge and S. divisions of DEVON, 4 miles (S. W. by S.) from Newton-Bushell; containing 264 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1972 acres, of which 200 are common or waste land; it abounds with limestone of excellent quality. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £20. 14. 7., and in the gift of John Wolston, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £340, and the glebe comprises 14 acres. The church contains three sepulchral chapels, and has an elegant wooden screen, an enriched pulpit of wood, an ancient font, and a piscina; the porch is ornamented with sculptured angels, and in the churchyard is a cross.

TORKINGTON, a township, in the parish and union of STOCKPORT, hundred of MACCLESFIELD, N. division of the county of CHESTER, 4½ miles (S. E.) from Stockport; containing 345 inhabitants.

TORKSEY (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union of GAINSBOROUGH, wapentake of LAWRESS, though locally in the wapentake of WELL, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 3 miles (N.) from Newton-on-Trent; containing, with the chapelry of Brampton, and the township of Hardwick, 615 inhabitants, of whom 420 are in Torksey township. This place formerly enjoyed many privileges, on condition that the king's ambassadors, when travelling this way, should be conveyed by the inhabitants, in their own barges, down the Trent to York; and a priory of Black canons, in honour of St. Leonard, was founded here by King John, which at the Dissolution was valued at £27. 2. 8. per annum. The parish is situated on the road from Gainsborough to Lincoln, at the junction of the Fosse-Dyke with the river Trent, and comprises 1487 acres by admeasurement, of which 530 are arable, 945 grass land, and about 12 wood; the soil in some parts is sandy, and in others clayey. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £42; patron and impropiator, Sir A. Hume, Bart. The body of the church was rebuilt in 1821.

TORLETON, a hamlet, and formerly a chapelry, partly in the parish of COATES, hundred of CROWTHORNE and MINET, and partly in that of RODMARTON, hundred of LONGTREE, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 5 miles (W. by S.) from Cirencester. The chapel is desecrated.

TORMARTON (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of CHIPPING-SODBURY, Lower division of the hundred of GRUMBALD'S-ASH, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Chipping-Sodbury; containing, with the chapelry of West Littleton, 620 inhabitants. The parish is intersected by the road from Bristol to Malmesbury, and consists of 2616 acres. The living is a rectory, with the vicarage of Acton-Turville united, valued in the king's books at £27; net income, £600; patron, N. Castleton, Esq.; impropiator, Duke of Beaufort. There is a chapel of case at West Littleton.

TOR-MOHUN, or TOR-MOHAM, a parish, in the union of NEWTON-ABBOT, hundred of HAYTOR, Paignton and S. divisions of DEVON, ¾ of a mile (N. W.) from Torquay, with which it contains 5982 inhabitants. In 1835, an act was passed for lighting, watching, and improving this place. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Cockington annexed; net income, £270; patron, the Rev. R. Mallock, the impropiator of Cockington; impropiators of Tor-Mohun, Sir L. V. Palk, Bart., and H. G. Cary, Esq. The church has an elegant wooden screen, formerly painted and gilt, and an ancient stone font. Of 32 Præmonstratensian monasteries in England, that of Torre, founded and endowed by William de Brewer, in 1196, was by far the richest; it was dedicated to Our Holy Saviour, the Virgin Mary, and the Holy Trinity, and, at the Dissolution, had a revenue of £396. 0. 11. The situation of the abbey is most beautiful; and the remains of the church (which is said to have been richly furnished with cloth of gold), the chapter-house, &c., evince the former magnificence of the buildings: the old refectory was, many years since, converted into a Roman Catholic chapel, still existing; and of the three gateways mentioned by Leland, the only one now remaining is much admired for the beauty of its architectural proportions. The modern mansion of Torre Abbey is the seat of Mr. Cary, in whose family it has continued since 1662. On a hill about half a mile from the church, are the remains of a chapel dedicated to St. Michael.

TORPENHOW (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of WIGTON, ALLERDALE ward below Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND; including the townships of Bewaldeth with Snittlegarth, Blennerhassett with Kirkland, and Bothel with Threapland; and containing 1067 inhabitants, of whom 315 are in the township of Torpenhow with Whitrigg, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Ireby. This parish, which is bounded on the north by the river Ellen, abounds with freestone and limestone. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £33. 6. 8., and in the gift of the Bishop of Carlisle: the tithes were commuted for land under inclosure acts, in 1807 and 1814. The church is principally in the Norman style; the roof, of carved oak, is painted and curiously embellished.

TORPOINT, a chapelry, in the parish of St. ANTHONY, union of St. GERMAN'S, S. division of the hundred of EAST, E. division of CORNWALL, 3 miles (W.) from Devonport. The village occupies a peninsula formed by the river Tamar, the Lynher, and St. John's Lake, from which the inhabitants derive an abundance of fish. Though small, it is highly respectable; and in the vicinity are many genteel seats, of which Trematon Castle is the most distinguished. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £124; patron, the Hon. R. P. Carew. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. Sir Coventry Carew founded a small free school; and there is also a national school.

TORQUAY, a chapelry, in the parish of TOR-MOHUN, union of NEWTON-ABBOT, hundred of HAYTOR, Paignton and S. divisions of DEVON, 7 miles (S. E. by S.) from Newton-Bushell, and 23 (S.) from Exeter; containing 4085 inhabitants. This town, about half a century since an insignificant fishing-hamlet, is now a fashionable and attractive watering-place, situated in the most northerly cove of Torbay, and occupying a somewhat irregular, but singularly beautiful site. The first great improvement was the erection of a pier and quay, for which an act of parliament was obtained by Sir Lawrence Palk, to whom the town is greatly indebted; it was commenced in 1803, and completed in 1807, and another pier has since been constructed, forming a secure basin, 500 feet long and 300 broad. A considerable portion of the town, consisting of neat and comfortable residences (principally lodging-houses) and shops of the best description, is built at the sides of the basin and on the strand; and there are two excellent hotels, warm and cold baths, and a library, with billiard and news rooms. On the north, east, and west sides, the town is completely sheltered by hills, on the declivities of which are detached houses and terraces, some of them very handsome buildings; and the heights on which they are situated being richly clothed with wood, their appearance from the pier-head is strikingly beautiful. A regatta takes place about August, at which the principal prize is a splendid gold challenge cup, of the value of £100, with an accumulated fund added. There is an assembly-room erected in 1826, much frequented during the season, which is from September to May. The salubrity and mildness of the air, arising from its contiguity to the sea and its sheltered situation, render this a most desirable winter residence for persons of a consumptive habit, or those for whom a mild climate is necessary; and it is usually, at this period of the year, very full of company. It is adequately supplied with water. Torquay has a trifling share in the Newfoundland trade; and, in addition to several coasting-vessels employed in the importation of coal and other commodities, it has a weekly communication by water with London, and the advantage of steam-boats passing four times in the week. There is a small but very convenient market-place, well furnished with provisions at the customary markets, which are on Tuesday and Friday; and a fair is held at Easter. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £104; patron, the Perpetual Curate of Tor-Mohun. The chapel having been found insufficient to accommodate the increasing population, and, from its confined situation, being incapable of enlargement, another has recently been erected; they are both handsome structures. There are also places of worship for Calvinistic Methodists and Wesleyans; and a national school. In the cliffs in the neighbourhood are some remarkable fissures, or openings, particularly one of extraordinary magnitude, called Kent's Hole, comprising numerous caves of various elevations, to which are several openings, one of them 93 feet deep, 100 wide, and 30 in height, containing many interesting specimens, both stalactital and organic, and fossil remains of the elephant and other animals. Druidical knives have also been discovered.

TORRINGTON, BLACK (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of HOLSWORTHY, hundred of BLACK TORRINGTON, Holsworthy and N. divisions of DEVON, 6 miles (W. by N.) from Hatherleigh; containing 1252 inhabitants. This parish, which is intersected by the river Torrige, comprises 7200 acres, chiefly arable; 708 acres are common or waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £22. 8. 9.; net income, £303; patron, Lord Poltimore. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

TORRINGTON, EAST (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of CAISTOR, W. division of the wapentake of WRAGGEOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 4 miles (N. N. E.) from Wragby; containing 113 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with the vicarage of Wragby united in 1735, valued in the king's books at £7. 10. 10.; net income, £327; patron, C. Turnor, Esq.

TORRINGTON, GREAT (St. MICHAEL), an incorporated market-town and parish, having separate jurisdiction, and the head of a union, locally in the hundred of FREMINGTON, Great Torrington and N. divisions of DEVON, 34 miles (N. W.) from Exeter, and 202 (W. by S.) from London; containing 3419 inhabitants. The name of this place is derived from its situation on the river Torrige; and its antiquity as a market-town is evident from various old records, in which it occurs under the appellation of Cheping-Toriton. At a very early period it gave the title of Baron to its lords, who had the power of life and death throughout the lordship; and, in 1340, Richard de Merton, in whose possession it then was, erected a castle here, of which the chapel was remaining about the close of the last century. In 1484, Bishop Courtenay was tried at the sessions here, on a charge of treason against Richard III.; and, in 1590, the county-sessions were held at this place, on the appearance of the plague at Exeter, which malady afterwards extended to Torrington. During the civil war, Colonel Digby, who had fortified himself here, was attacked in 1643, by a party of the parliamentary forces, strengthened by the garrisons of Barnstaple and Bideford, whom he defeated and put to flight. In 1646, the royalists, under Lords Hopton and Capel, and Sir John Digby, having taken possession of, and fortified the town, were besieged by some troops under Sir Thomas Fairfax, who, after a severe contest, drove them from their post, and obtained a victory which put an end to the power of the royalists in this part of the country, and which was celebrated by a thanksgiving sermon preached in the market-place by the noted Hugh Peters. Fairfax, however, was frustrated in his intention of prolonging his stay here, by the accidental explosion of eighty barrels of gunpowder, deposited in the church, by which the south-west angle of that building was destroyed, and 200 prisoners who were confined in it, together with the soldiers on guard, perished. In 1724, the place suffered from an accidental fire, by which about eighty houses were destroyed, and the records of the corporation burnt.

The town occupies a singularly bold and picturesque situation on the summit and declivity of a lofty cliff, washed at its base by the river Torridge, over which is a bridge connecting this parish with that of Little Torrington. It is lighted with gas, and consists of several good houses surrounding the market-place, and of two streets respectively on the ridge and on the declivity of the cliff, with gardens sloping down towards the river; the banks of the stream are crowned with finely-varied scenery, and in its winding course, a little above the town, it passes beneath some of the richest hanging woods in the kingdom. The woollen-trade, which was formerly considerable, is now confined to the manufacture of a few serges, blankets, and some coarse woollen-cloths; and the principal business at present is the making of kid, chamois, beaver, and other gloves, for the London and foreign markets. The beaver gloves are the same as those called Woodstock, and the preparation of the leather affords employment to a large number of men; great quantities of gloves are also sewn by commission, and in the trade altogether 3000 girls in the town and neighbourhood are engaged. There are two tan-yards, and on the river is a corn-mill. A canal constructed by Lord Rolle, at a cost of more than £40,000, extends from the town to the sea-lock near Bideford, and runs in a direction nearly parallel with the river, which at that place becomes navigable for sloops. The market, held by prescription, is on Saturday, and on the third Saturday in March is one of the largest cattle-markets in the west of England; there is a smaller cattle-market in November, and fairs are held on May 4th, July 5th, and October 10th. An act was passed in 1842, for the erection of a market-house, and for regulating the market.

Corporation Seal.

Charters of incorporation were granted to the inhabitants by Philip and Mary in 1554, by James I. in 1617, and by James II. in 1686. The corporation, however, at present consists of a mayor, four aldermen, and twelve councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76; the mayor and late mayor are justices of the peace, and hold a court of petty-sessions every three weeks, and the county magistrates have petty-sessions for the division every Saturday. The place sent representatives to thirteen parliaments, in the reigns of Edward I. and succeeding sovereigns, but the inhabitants were released on their own petition. They enjoy the right of pasturage on a common of about 500 acres, granted to the occupiers of ancient messuages by William Fitz-Robert, lord of the manor of Great Torrington: of this tract, however, fifty acres were inclosed a few years since, for cultivation by the poor. The town-hall is a neat modern edifice of brick, ornamented with stone, supported on arches affording a covered area underneath; and there is a small prison. The LIVING is a perpetual curacy, with that of St. Giles-in-the-Wood annexed, valued in the king's books at £20; net income, £162; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford. The church, after its partial destruction by gunpowder in 1646, was rebuilt in 1651; and the present structure, which is of the Tuscan order in the interior, includes such portions of the old edifice as escaped destruction. In 1831, a south transept was erected, at an expense of £130, on the site of the old steeple; and a western tower surmounted by a spire, was built at a cost of £1600, of which £700 were defrayed by the feoffees of the town lands, and the remainder by a rate. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyans. The Blue school, in Well-street, was established in 1709, by Denys Rolle, Esq., who endowed it with a message and £200 in money, which sum was increased by the Rolle family to £950; and there is an almshouse for eight persons, since increased to twelve, founded and endowed in 1604, by John Huddle. The workhouse for the union, which comprises twenty-three parishes, is adapted for 200 paupers, and the whole union contains a population of 18,188. On the restoration of Charles II., General Monk, among other honours, was made Earl of Torrington, which place at present gives the title of Viscount to the family of Byng.

TORRINGTON, LITTLE, a parish, in the union of TORRINGTON, hundred of SHEBBEAR, Black Torrington and Shebbear, and N. divisions of DEVON, 2 miles (S.) from Great Torrington; containing 588 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2597 acres, of which 227 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 18. 11½, and in the patronage of Lord Rolle, Mr. Buckingham, and Mrs. Stephens: the tithes have been commuted for £460; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 44 acres. At Taddipport, in the parish, is an hospital with a chapel attached, appropriated to the poor.

TORRINGTON, WEST (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of HORNCASTLE, W. division of the wapentake of WRAGOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Wragby; containing 138 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4; patron and impropiator, Sir R. S. Ainslie, Bart. The tithes have been commuted for £84. 8., and the glebe contains about an acre.

TORRISHOLME, a township, in the parish of LANCASTER, hundred of LONSDALE, south of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 2 miles (N. W.) from Lancaster; containing 217 inhabitants.

TORTINGTON, a parish, in the hundred of AVISFORD, rape of ARUNDEL, W. division of SUSSEX, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Arundel; containing 75 inhabitants. It is bounded on the east by the river Arun. The living is a vicarage not in charge, endowed with the rectorial tithes, and in the gift of the Duke of Norfolk: the tithes have been commuted for £175. The church is a small structure in the early English style, containing portions of Norman architecture; the south door has an arch of rich workmanship, and another arch, separating the nave from the chancel, is ornamented with a curious moulding; the font is sculptured, and figures of the Four Evangelists in stained glass were put into the east window in 1835. A priory of Augustine canons, in honour of St. Mary Magdalene, was founded by the Lady Avicia Corbet, before the reign of John, and at the Dissolution possessed a revenue of £101. 4. 1.

TORTWORTH (St. Leonard), a parish, in the union of THORNBURY, Upper division of the hundred of GRUMBALD'S-ASH, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 4 miles (W.) from Wotton-under-Edge; containing 240 inhabitants. The parish is intersected by the road between Chipping-Sodbury and Berkeley, and comprises 1523 acres, of which 50 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 3. 9.; net income, £428; patrons, the Provost and Fellows of Oriol College, Oxford.

TORVER, a chapelry, in the parish and union of ULVERSTONE, hundred of LONSDALE, north of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 6 miles (W. S. W.) from Hawkeshead; containing 199 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £59; patron, T. R. G. Braddyll, Esq. The interest of £200 was given by John Fleming, in 1777, in support of a free grammar school, for which a house has been built by subscription.

TORWORTH, a township, in the parish of BLYTH, union of EAST RETFORD, Hatfield division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from East Retford; containing 252 inhabitants, and consisting of 1362 acres. A rent-charge of £420 has been awarded as a commutation for the impropriate tithes, payable to Trinity College, Cambridge, and one of £80 for the vicarial.

TOSELAND (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of ST. NEOT'S, hundred of TOSELAND, county of HUNTINGDON, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from St. Neot's; containing 204 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 1353 acres; the soil is chiefly a strong clay, producing good wheat; the surface, though flat, is elevated, and the surrounding scenery is of pleasing character. The living is annexed, with that of Little Paxton, to the vicarage of Great Paxton: the tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1811.

TOSSIDE, or TOSSET, an extra-parochial township and chapelry, in the union of SETTLE, wapentake of STAINCLIFFE WEST, W. riding of YORK, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Settle; containing 120 inhabitants. This place is the property of the Rev. H. S. Broome, Matthew Wilson, Esq., and others. The chapel, dedicated to St. Bartholomew, is a neat edifice: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £50; patron, the Vicar of Gisburn.

TOSSON, GREAT, with RYE-HILL, a township, in the parish and union of ROTHBURY, W. division of COQUETDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 2 miles (W. S. W.) from Rothbury; containing 178 inhabitants, who are chiefly employed in the manufacture of woollen-cloth, and at limestone-quarries in the neighbourhood. The township comprises 2760 acres, of which 1829 are common or waste land: the village, formerly a considerable place, is situated at the very foot of the lofty Simonside hills, on the northern extremity of which is a British encampment, and there are still the remains of an ancient tower. A rent-charge of £204 has been awarded as a commutation for the tithes.

TOSSON, LITTLE, a township, in the parish and union of ROTHBURY, W. division of COQUETDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Rothbury; containing 31 inhabitants. It stands pleasantly on rising ground, about a mile south-west from Rye-Hill; the Coquet river runs on the north, and is shortly joined by the Lorrbottle burn, and the Simonside hills stretch out in the southern direction. The lands are the property of Mr. Clennell. The tithes have been commuted for £38. 18.

TOSTOCK (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of STOW, hundred of THEDWASTRY, W. division of SUFFOLK, 7 miles (E.) from Bury St. Edmund's; containing 367 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Bury to Ipswich, and comprises about 1000 acres of land, of which the soil is of a mixed quality, but mostly fertile; gravel abounds, and the roads are generally good. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 8. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$.; income, £250; patron, the Rev. W. Gilbert Tuck. The church contains some old richly-carved benches for free seats, which have been much defaced, probably by Cromwell's agents during the interregnum. There was formerly an ancient mansion, the residence of Lords North and Grey.

TOTHAM, GREAT (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of MALDON, hundred of THURSTABLE, N. division of ESSEX, 3 miles (N. N. E.) from Maldon; containing 786 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2679 acres, of which 150 are common or waste; the surface is generally much elevated, and some parts are supposed to be the highest land in the county. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10; net income, £95; patrons and impropiators, the Trustees of the late W. P. Honeywood, Esq. The church contains several ancient monuments.

TOTHAM, LITTLE (All Saints), a parish, in the union of MALDON, hundred of THURSTABLE, N. division of ESSEX, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Maldon; containing 384 inhabitants. This parish, which is on the shore of Blackwater bay, is about five miles in circumference, and comprises 1200 acres, of which 200 are common or waste; the situation is low and uninviting, and the soil light and gravelly. Some salt-works are carried on in a creek of the river Blackwater. The living is a rectory, in the patronage of the Executrix of the late Rev. W. Westcomb: the tithes have been commuted for £366, and the glebe comprises 6 acres. The church is a small ancient edifice, with a tower of flint and stone, surmounted by a spire.

TOTHILL (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, Marsh division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Alford; containing 73 inhabitants. This place is said to take its name from a very high round hill in the parish called Toote Hill; it comprises by admeasurement 845 acres, 160 of which are woodland, and the road from Louth to Alford runs along the eastern part, and a fine trout stream on the west. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 17.; net income, £173; patron, Lord Willoughby de Broke: the glebe contains 64 acres. The church was erected about 60 years since.

TOTLEY, a hamlet, in the parish of DRONFIELD, union of ECCLESALL-BIERLOW, hundred of SCARSDALE, N. division of the county of DERBY, 3 miles (S. S. W.) from Sheffield; containing 408 inhabitants. The hamlet comprises 1884 acres, of which 1276 are common or waste land; the road from Bakewell to Sheffield passes through, and the river Sheaf runs at a short distance on the north. The inclosures are diversified with numerous woods, and the pasture is of fine quality; stone is largely quarried for the repair of roads and for common fences; a thin coal is wrought, and there are two brick-kilns, the clay used in which abounds in the neighbourhood, and is carried in considerable quantities to Sheffield. An act was passed in 1839 for inclosing waste. There are two or three grinding-wheels for scythes, and a few persons are employed in making saw handles, and in file-cutting. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £22, and the vicarial for £3. 3. A school built in 1827, by D'Ewes Coke, Esq., is endowed with about £15 per annum.

TOTMONSLOW, a village, in the parish of DRAYCOTT-IN-THE-MOORS, union of CHEADLE, S. division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, N. division of the county of STAFFORD.

Corporation Seal.

TOTNES (St. Mary), a borough, market-town, and parish, having separate jurisdiction, and the head of a union, locally in the hundred of COLERIDGE, Stanborough and Coleridge, and S. divisions of DEVON, 24 miles (S. S. W.) from Exeter, and 196 (W. S. W.) from London; containing 3849 inhabitants. It is variously denominated in ancient records: in Domesday book it is called Totneis; Camden speaks of it as having once been Totonese; and Risdon alludes to it under the name of Toutaness, by contraction Totnes, or Totness. The latter author accedes to the opinion of Leland, who imagines the name to be a modernisation of Dodonesse, signifying a rocky town, its situation rendering this supposition probable. The antiquity of the place is attested by Venerable Bede, who describes it as the station where the British troops assembled under Ambrosius and Pendragon, prior to their successful attack upon the tyrant Vortigern. The manor of Great Totnes, having been a royal demesne in the time of the Confessor, was bestowed by William I. upon Judhel, one of his nobles, who took the title of "de Totneis," and erected the castle at the north-western extremity of the town. It is probable that Totnes was fortified at a very early period, having, according to Risdon, undergone alteration under the Romans, Saxons, Danes, and Normans. Of the present town, which is divided into the Higher, Middle, and Lower quarters, the Middle quarter was included within the ancient boundary wall, in which were three gateways, viz., the East, West, and North. At the time of the Norman survey, Totnes was rated when Exeter was, and, if there was any expedition by land or water, Totnes, Barnstaple, and Lidford, paid as much as Exeter: in that record it is described as containing ninety-five burgesses within the borough, and fifteen without. During the civil war of the 17th century, the place became the temporary station of General Goring; and Fairfax subsequently halted here, on his way to and from Dartmouth.

The town is neatly built, and of highly respectable appearance, containing many good shops and substantial private residences, and occupies a situation of much beauty and salubrity, on the western bank of the river Dart, over which is a handsome bridge of three arches, completed in 1828, at an expense of about £12,000. It consists chiefly of one long street, descending from Bridgetown, on the east, to the bridge, from the foot of which it rises gradually in a western direction till it reaches a considerable elevation near the site of the castle. This street is crossed midway by the East gateway belonging to the old fortifications, and many of the fronts of the houses beyond are supported by pillars, affording a spacious covered way for foot passengers; the inhabitants are well supplied with water. The general aspect of the place, from the bridge, is picturesque, the church tower appearing on the right of the ascent, and the ivied ruins of the castle crowning the summit of the hill. The surrounding country, particularly as viewed from the castle and the hills, is extremely fine; and the course of the Dart between Totnes and its influx into the channel is through diversified and interesting scenery. There are two libraries, a small theatre, and an assembly-room; and races are held in July or August, on a good course. The town has been noted for its serge manufacture, and there is still some weaving carried on, but the trade is on the decline. During spring tides only, vessels of 100 tons' burthen could formerly come up to the quay, but the river has lately been deepened at an expense of £8000, by which means they can approach at all times of the tide, a convenience that much facilitates the commercial intercourse with London and Plymouth. Salmon are caught in great quantities in the Dart, and the town is also plentifully supplied with other kinds of fish; cider is the chief article of exportation, and coal, grain, and culm (the last mostly used for the burning of lime, which abounds in the neighbourhood) are the principal imports. A steam-packet and several other boats proceed daily to Dartmouth. A customary market is held on Saturday; there is a great cattle-market, which is one of the best in the west of England, on the first Tuesday in every month; and fairs for cattle take place on May 12th and October 28th.

The burgesses obtained a charter of privileges from King John, which was confirmed by Edward I., in whose time, it is understood, Totnes first sent members to parliament; and Queen Elizabeth granted a charter in the 30th of her reign. The corporation at present, however, consists of a mayor, four aldermen, and twelve councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76; the municipal boundaries have been made co-extensive with those for parliamentary purposes; the mayor and late mayor are justices of the peace, and the total number of magistrates is seven. The town sends two representatives to parliament, elected by the £10 householders of the parish of Totnes and the manor of Bridgetown, in the parish of Berry-Pomeroy, which, by the act of the 2nd and 3rd of William IV., cap. 64, were constituted the new borough, comprising 1162 acres: the mayor is returning officer. An act for the more speedy recovery of small debts was passed in 1841. There are a guildhall and chamber, and a town prison. The corporation claim many privileges, such as freedom from quayage and wharfage throughout the kingdom, except the port of London, and exemption from serving on juries, except in the borough, for all inhabitants of the borough and parish, whether members of the corporation or not.

The LIVING is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12. 8. 9., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £150; impropiator, the Duke of Somerset. The church, which has been enlarged, is in the later English style, with a handsome embattled tower, surmounted by octagonal pinnacles; it is composed of a red stone strongly resembling brick, and contains an elegant stone screen, with the remains of an ancient rood-loft and steps; a curious stone pulpit, enriched with tracery; a handsome altar-piece; and a library, in which are many old and valuable books. An episcopal chapel has been erected at Bridgetown, at an expense of £7000, by the Duke of Somerset. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans, and a Roman Catholic chapel at Follaton. A grammar school was founded in 1554, and endowed in 1658 with lands now worth £70 a year, by Sir John Maynard, trustee of Elizeus Hele, Esq., who left considerable property for charitable purposes; a charity school is endowed with about £40 per annum, and a diocesan commercial school was recently formed. There was formerly a lazaret-house, the remains of which were incorporated in an edifice fitted up in 1832, for the reception of cholera patients, and now inhabited by some poor people. The union of Totnes comprises 28 parishes or places, containing a population of 34,126. Of Totnes Castle little remains except the embattled walls of a circular keep, occupying the summit of a lofty mound at the western extremity of the town, and commanding a delightful prospect, in which the windings of the Dart are prominently conspicuous: near them is the ruin of a gateway, through which the ancient town was entered on the north. Several religious foundations are mentioned as formerly existing at or near Totnes, the principal of which, endowed in the time of the Conqueror, by Judhel de Totneis, was of the Benedictine order, dedicated to St. Mary, and formed an appendage to an abbey at Angiers; the site is occupied by a dwelling-house called the Priory. There are some remains of an ancient chapel; and Leland mentions a Roman Fosseway, commencing in the vicinity. Crystallised rhomboidal carbonate of lime has been found on grey limestone in the Peto quarry, about three miles to the west of the town, on the north of the Plymouth road. Dr. Philip Furneaux, a nonconformist divine; Benjamin Kennicott, a learned biblical critic, who was in early life master of the charity school; and Edward Lye, a celebrated lexicographer, were natives of Totnes.

TOTON, a hamlet, in the parish of ATTENBOROUGH, union of SHARDLOW, S. division of the wapentake of BROXTOW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Nottingham; containing 140 inhabitants.

TOTTENHAM (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union and hundred of EDMONTON, county of MIDDLESEX, 4 miles (N. by E.) from London; containing 8584 inhabitants. This place, written in Domesday book Toteham, and now frequently called Tottenham High Cross, is a genteel village, consisting chiefly of one long street, formed by houses irregularly arranged, on the line of road from London to Cambridge; it is lighted with gas, and well supplied with water from several fountains produced by boring, and the immediate vicinity is adorned with numerous handsome villas. Near Tottenham Green, a cross has stood for many years: the present structure, superseding the original one of wood, is an octagonal brick column, erected in 1600 by Dean Wood, and repaired and decorated with various architectural embellishments, in 1809, by subscription. At the entrance of Page Green, on the east side of the high road, is a remarkable circular clump of elm-trees, called the Seven Sisters, in the centre of which was formerly a walnut-tree, that, according to tradition, never increased in size, though it continued annually to bear leaves: these trees appear to have been at their full growth in 1631, but no authentic account of their being planted is extant. Within a short distance from the road is Bruce Castle, a mansion built in the seventeenth century, on the site of an ancient castellated edifice erected in the reign of Henry VIII., and honoured, in the year 1516, with the presence of that monarch, who came hither to meet his sister, Margaret, Queen of Scots; in 1578, Elizabeth also visited it. The original structure was the residence and property of Robert de Bruce, father of Robert, King of Scotland; the present building has been converted into a school, and a detached brick tower, which covers a deep well, is the only vestige of the ancient castle. In the parish is a well of water similar in its properties to that at Cheltenham; also a spring called Lady's Well, of reputed efficacy for disorders in the eyes, and of which the water, it is said, never freezes. There are extensive flour and oil mills, the former established time immemorially, a pottery for coarse brown ware, and a brewery; and near the entrance of the village, on an ancient stream now called the Moselle, are the works of the London Caoutchouc Company, for the manufacture of India-rubber solution for rendering cloth and garments of every kind water-proof, also tie-bands, ropes, cables, webs, and various other articles to which the use of India-rubber has been appropriated. The navigable river Lea passes through the parish, and the Northern and Eastern railway has an intermediate station near it. Tottenham is within the jurisdiction of a court of requests held at Enfield, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

The parish comprises 4402 acres, of which 90 are common or waste. The LIVING is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £14; net income, £978; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, London. The church stands about a quarter of a mile west of the high road, and is in the later English style, with a square embattled and ivy-mantled tower: on the summit was formerly a lofty wooden cross (whence, according to some, the adjunct to the name of the village), which was destroyed during the civil war; and on the south side of the church is a large brick porch, erected prior to 1500. At the east end of the north aisle is a vestry of circular form, surmounted by a dome, erected in 1696 by Lord Henry Coleraine, and repaired in 1790, underneath which is the family vault. The east window, divided into eight compartments, and containing representations of the Evangelists and some of the Prophets, in fine old painted glass, was given to the parish, in 1807, by the late J. Eardley Wilmot, Esq.; the font is curious and of great antiquity, and many old monuments adorn the interior, of which one in white marble, to the memory of the family of Sir Robert Barkham, is worthy of especial notice. The building was repaired in 1816, at an expense of £3000. A church dedicated to the Holy Trinity, in the later English style, with turrets at each angle, and pinnacles over the aisles, was erected in 1829, on Tottenham Green, by aid of the Parliamentary Commissioners, who granted £4893, and by subscription: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £309; patron, the Vicar. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Wesleyans, and Roman Catholics. The grammar school, founded by means of a bequest from Nicholas Reynardson, alderman of London, in 1685, was endowed in the following year by Sarah, Duchess Dowager of Somerset, with £250 for enlarging the buildings, and £1100 for extending the benefits of the institution. Almshouses for four men and four women were endowed about 1600, with a small rent-charge by Balthasar Sanches, pastry-cook to Philip of Spain, with whom he came over to this country, and the first who exercised that trade in London. An almshouse for six men and six women, with a chapel in the centre, was founded and endowed with £2000 by N. Reynardson, Esq., in 1685; some valuable augmentations have been made to the funds, and, in 1828, the buildings were repaired at an expense of £450, defrayed by voluntary contributions. Some almshouses on the high road are occupied by four women, chosen by the parishioners; and there is a savings' bank in the parish, one of the first established in England.

TOTTENHILL (St. BOTOLPH), a parish, in the union of DOWNHAM, hundred of CLACKCLOSE, W. division of NORFOLK, 6 miles (N. N. E.) from Downham-Market; containing 426 inhabitants. It comprises 1463 acres, tithe-free, about 10 of which are woodland. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £62; patron, the Bishop of Ely. The church is chiefly in the early English style, with a square embattled tower, and an entrance on the south through a richly-decorated Norman doorway. The poor have the benefit of 16 acres of land, let for the sum of £50 per annum, and two small commons.

TOTTERIDGE (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of BARNET, and forming a detached portion of the hundred of BROADWATER, though locally in that of CASHIO, or liberty of St. ALBAN's, county of HERTFORD, 2 miles (S. by W.) from Chipping-Barnet; containing 469 inhabitants. The parish is on the border of Middlesex, and comprises 1591a. 3r. 33p., most of which is grass land; 39 acres are common or waste. The living is annexed to the rectory of Bishop's-Hatfield: the tithes have been commuted for £345, and the glebe contains 7 acres. The church, which was rebuilt in 1798, has a latticed square tower, with a spire. There is a place of worship for Independents.

TOTTERNHOE (St. GILES), a parish, in the union of LUTON, hundred of MANSHEAD, county of BEDFORD, 2 miles (W. S. W.) from Dunstable; containing 656 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1775 acres, of which 321 are common or waste. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Countess of Bridgewater, to whom, with Trinity College, Cambridge, the impropriation belongs: the tithes of the vicar have been commuted for £133, those of the college for £135, those of the countess for £300, and those of the incumbent of Eaton-Bray for £15; the vicar has a glebe of 6 acres, and the minister of Eaton-Bray one of 4 acres. On the north side of the church passes the Roman Ikeneld-street, skirting the downs, upon which are the remains of Totternhoe Castle, overhanging the village of Stanbridge; the keep-mount is lofty, and encompassed by a circular fosse within another that is square, the latter inclosing the entire breadth of the ridge. Near this fortification is an ancient quadrangular camp; and to the eastward are extensive quarries of freestone and limestone, below which, at a great depth, is a bed of clay.

TOTTINGTON (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union and hundred of WAYLAND, W. division of NORFOLK, 3 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Watton; containing 340 inhabitants. It comprises 2206 acres, including 150 of plantations, and within its bounds rises the river Wissey; the soil is light and sandy, and liable to be drifted by the wind. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 14. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £89; patrons and impropiators, the Trustees of Chigwell free schools. The church is chiefly in the decorated and later English styles, with a square embattled tower; the nave is separated from the chancel by a beautifully carved screen, and the seats, which are open, are also elaborately worked. At the inclosure in 1774, 60 acres were allotted to the poor.

TOTTINGTON, HIGHER, a township, in the parish of BURY, union of HASLINGDEN, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 3 miles (N. W.) from Bury; containing 3446 inhabitants. It comprises 3686 acres, of which 794 are common or waste. The tithes have been commuted for £20, equally divided between the rectors of Bury and Prestwick.

TOTTINGTON, LOWER, a township, in the parish and union of BURY, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 3 miles (N. W. by W.) from Bury; containing 9929 inhabitants, of whom 5445 are in the Higher division. It comprises 5038 acres, of which 749 are common or waste. There are very extensive establishments for the printing and bleaching of cotton, in which more than 2500 persons are employed.

A fair is held on October 12th. Here is a chapel, dedicated to St. Anne, of which the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £145; patrons, Trustees. Rent-charges, as commutations for the tithes, have been awarded, amounting to £62. 5., which sum is divided between the rectors of Bury and Prestwick. A school erected in 1715 has an income of £24. Dr. Wood, the celebrated mathematician, was born at the place.

TOULSTON, a township, in the parish of NEWTON-KYME, Upper division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, W. riding of YORK, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Tadcaster; containing 74 inhabitants. The land, which is fertile, is set out in farms.

TOWCESTER (ST. LAWRENCE), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of TOWCESTER, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Northampton, and 60 (N. W.) from London; containing 2749 inhabitants. This place, which in Domesday book is written Tovecestre, "a city, or fortified spot, on the river Tove," is considered to have been a Roman station, from the discovery of numerous coins, especially on an artificial mount north-eastward of the town, called Berrymont Hill, and in many of the gardens and homesteads. On the north-west side are remains of a fosse, and the ruins of a tower, supposed to be Saxon. The Watling-street passed along the site of the town, and some antiquaries have thought that the station of Lactodorum should be placed here, in preference to Stony-Stratford. During the Saxon era, the town appears to have been so well defended as to have offered a protracted and effectual resistance to the attacks of the Danes: about the year 921, a mandate was issued by Edward, for rebuilding and fortifying it, and it was surrounded by a stone wall, of which some vestiges are yet discernible. In the reign of Henry VI., a college and chantry were founded here by William Sponne, Archdeacon of Norfolk, the revenue of which, at the Dissolution, was valued at £19. 6. 8. per annum. The town is on the river Tove, and consists principally of one long street, composed of well-built houses, and paved under the direction of the trustees of the charities of Archdeacon Sponne, who devised the Tabart inn, and certain lands producing about £150 per annum, for that purpose; the inhabitants are well supplied with water. The manufactures comprise bobbin-lace, boots, and shoes; and some advantages are derived from the situation of the town on the great road from London to Holyhead. The market is on Tuesday; fairs are held on Shrove-Tuesday, May 12th, and October 29th, for cattle; and on October 10th is a statute-fair for hiring servants. A manorial court takes place at Michaelmas, at which the constables for the parish are chosen.

The parish, including the hamlets of Caldicott, Handley, and Wood-Burcott, comprises 3368*a.* 1*r.* 13*p.* The living is a discharged vicarage; net income, £217; patron and appropriator, the Bishop of Lichfield: the tithes were commuted for land and money payments in 1762. The church is a neat building of the 11th century, in the early English style, and contains a monument of Archdeacon Sponne, already alluded to, who held the living. Among the various incumbents was Pope Boniface VIII., at the time of his promotion to the pontificate, in 1294. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyans. The grammar school was founded in 1552, by the trustees of Sponne's charity, who, on the dissolution of the college and chantry, purchased and converted them to this use; the income is £57. Three almshouses were founded and endowed in 1695, by Thomas Bickerstaff, of this place; and there are a few other bequests. The poor law union of Towcester comprises 23 parishes or places, containing a population of 12,537. In the vicinity is a petrifying spring. Sir Richard Empson, once proprietor of the manor, and a celebrated lawyer, who was promoted to the chancellorship of the duchy of Lancaster in the time of Henry VII., and beheaded on Tower-hill in the succeeding reign, in the year 1509, was the son of a sieve-maker in this town. About a mile and a half from Towcester, at Easton-Neston, is the seat of Earl Pomfret, formerly celebrated for its splendid collection of paintings and statues, presented in 1756 to the University of Oxford, by the then Countess of Pomfret.

TOWEDNACK (ST. TWINNOCK), a parish, in the union of PENZANCE, W. division of the county of CORNWALL, 3 miles (S. W. by W.) from St. Ives; containing 967 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2800 acres, of which 1060 are common or waste land; the mine called Wheal Durla is situated here, and in various parts are vast rocks of fine granite. The living is a vicarage, annexed to that of Uny-Lelant: the inappropriate tithes have been commuted for £118, and the vicarial for £150. There is a place of worship for a congregation of Wesleyan Methodists.

TOWER-HAMLETS, one of the newly-enfranchised metropolitan boroughs, in the union of WHITECHAPEL; comprising the Liberty of the Tower, and part of the Tower division of the hundred of OSSLSTONE, and forming the north-eastern part of the suburbs of the metropolis. The borough includes an area of 3954 acres, and returns two members to parliament; the number of voters is 13,551, and the chief bailiffs of the liberty are the returning officers.—See LONDON.

TOWERSEY (ST. CATHERINE), a parish, in the union of WYCOMBE, hundred of ASHENDON, county of BUCKINGHAM, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Thame; containing 413 inhabitants. The living is annexed, with those of Sydenham and Tetsworth, to the vicarage of Thame: the tithes were commuted for land, corn-rents, and money payments, in 1822.

TOWNGREEN, a township, in the parish of WYMONDHAM, incorporation and hundred of FOREHOE, E. division of NORFOLK; containing 808 inhabitants.

TOWNSTALL, DEVON.—See DARTMOUTH.

TOWTHORPE, a township, in the parish of WHARRAM-PERCY, union of DRIFFIELD, wapentake of BUCKROSE, E. riding of YORK, 9 miles (W. N. W.) from Driffield; containing 50 inhabitants. This place is said to have formerly had a village which was destroyed by fire, and to have been the seat of the ancient family of Ughtred; it comprises about 1790 acres of land, set out in two farms.

TOWTHORPE, a township, in the union of YORK, partly in the parish of STRENSALL, and partly in that of HUNTINGDON, wapentake of BULMER, N. riding of YORK, 5 miles (N. by E.) from York; containing, in the latter portion, 67 inhabitants. It is situated on the Foss, and comprises about 1050 acres of land; the village is on the east side of the river, a short distance from its bank.

TOWTON, a township, in the parish of SAXTON, Upper division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, W. riding of YORK, 3 miles (S.) from Tadcaster; containing 146 inhabitants. This is memorable as the scene of the celebrated engagement between the forces of the Yorkists and Lancastrians, which took place on Towton field, on Palm-Sunday, 1461, and is one of the most important in the annals of that calamitous period of intestine war. It lasted from nine in the morning till seven in the evening, and ended in the defeat of the latter; and in this sanguinary conflict, it is recorded, 110,000 Englishmen were engaged, of whom 36,776 were slain. The township comprises nearly 1400 acres, chiefly the property of Lord Hawke, who is lord of the manor; the lands are fertile, and in good cultivation, and the surrounding scenery is of pleasing character. Towton Hall, an ancient mansion, was repaired and beautified about the year 1790.

TOXTETH-PARK, an extra-parochial district, in the union and hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, adjoining the town of Liverpool, and containing 41,295 inhabitants. This place, which is delightfully situated on the bank of the Mersey, was anciently a park belonging to the dukes of Lancaster, and afterwards passed to the Molyneux family. In consequence of its proximity to Liverpool, it has become the residence of numerous merchants, manufacturers, retired tradesmen, &c.; and several new streets have been formed within the last few years. It is supposed to have formerly been included in the parish of Walton-on-the-Hill, to which it still pays tithes, though commonly deemed extra-parochial. It possesses two chapels, dedicated respectively to St. James and St. Michael, the latter consecrated in 1818: the livings are perpetual curacies, in the patronage of the Rector of Walton; net income of St. James's, £188; and of St. Michael's, £210. A district church, dedicated to St. John, in the later English style, with a tower, was erected in 1831, at an expense of £6648; and another has been erected and endowed by John Gladstone, Esq., who possesses the patronage. There is a place of worship for Unitarians.

TOYNTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of SPILSBY, E. division of the soke of BOLINGBROKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 1½ mile (S.) from Spilsby; containing 483 inhabitants. The living is a discharged perpetual curacy, valued in the king's books at £5. 11. 3.; net income, £243; patron and proprietor, Lord Willoughby de Eresby. The tithes of Toynton All Saints and St. Peter were commuted for land and a money payment in 1773.

TOYNTON (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union of SPILSBY, E. division of the soke of BOLINGBROKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 2¼ miles (S. by E.) from Spilsby; containing 439 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 0. 2.; net income, £199; patron, Lord Willoughby de Eresby. About £7 are annually distributed among the poor.

TOYNTON, HIGH (ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union and soke of HORNCastle, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 1 mile (E.) from Horncastle; containing 199 inhabitants. It comprises 1037a. 1r. 38p., about two-thirds of which are arable, and the rest pasture; the soil is loamy, and the subsoil a white clay. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £53; patron and appropriator, the Bishop of Carlisle: the tithes were commuted for land in 1768. The church, which is a very plain structure, was rebuilt in 1772. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

TOYNTON, LOW (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union and soke of HORNCastle, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 1½ mile (N. E.) from Horncastle; containing 129 inhabitants. It comprises about 1100 acres, two-thirds of which are arable, and the rest pasture; the soil is light, and the subsoil a white clay. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 1. 8.; net income, £332; patron, Lord Willoughby de Eresby: the tithes were commuted for land in 1772. The church, which was rebuilt in 1811, contains about 50 sittings. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

TRAFFORD, BRIDGE, a township, in the parish of PLEMONSTALL, union of GREAT BOUGHTON, Second division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 4½ miles (N. E. by N.) from Chester; containing 63 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £46.

TRAFFORD, MICKLE, a township, in the parish of PLEMONSTALL, union of GREAT BOUGHTON, Lower division of the hundred of BROXTON, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 3½ miles (N. E.) from Chester; containing 334 inhabitants. A rent-charge of £128 has been awarded as a commutation for the tithes, and there is a glebe of 23¾ acres.

TRAFFORD, WIMBOLDS, a township, in the parish of THORNTON, union of GREAT BOUGHTON, Second division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 6 miles (N. E. by N.) from Chester; containing 116 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £63. 11.

TRANMERE, a township, in the parish of BENNINGTON, union, and Lower division of the hundred, of WIRRAL, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 7½ miles (N. N. E.) from Great Neston; containing 2554 inhabitants. The river Mersey is here crossed by a ferry, and the Birkenhead and Chester railway passes through the township. A neat and commodious district church, dedicated to St. Catherine, was erected in 1831, and contains a fine painting of the Resurrection by Le Brun, presented by T. Warrington, Esq.: the living is a perpetual curacy, of which the net income is £150. and the Rector of Bebington is patron.

TRANWELL, with HIGH Church, a township, in the parish and union of MORPETH, W. division of CASTLE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 2 miles (S. S. W.) from Morpeth; containing 55 inhabitants. This place anciently formed part of the barony of Merlay, and was a member of the manor of Morpeth; among its various proprietors have been the families of Somer-ville, Thornton, Mitford, and Greystock, from which last the property has descended to the Earl of Carlisle, its present owner. The township comprises about 1064 acres, of which 646 are arable, 254 meadow and pasture, and the remainder woodland and plantations; the soil in the northern part is a rich loam, producing favourable crops, and in the southern portion a stiff barren clay. The parish church and rectory-house are both situated in the township. The tithes have been commuted for £147.

TRAWDEN-FOREST, a township, in the parish of WHALLEY, union of BURNLEY, Higher division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S. E.) from Colne; containing 2900 inhabitants. This district, which, like other forests in the kingdom, was rejected as of little value, at the time of the original distribution of land, comprises ten square miles; and manufactures, similar to those carried on in the neighbouring towns and villages, have been introduced. A church was erected in 1841, containing 315 sittings, of which 158 are free, the Incorporated Society having granted £200 in aid of the expense. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends and Wesleyans; and schools are supported by subscription.

TRAYFORD, SUSSEX.—See TREYFORD.

TREALES, with ROSEACRE and WHARLES, a township, in the parish of KIRKHAM, union of the FYLDE, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (N. E.) from Kirkham; containing 709 inhabitants. It comprises 4015 acres, of which 53 are common or waste. The tithes have been commuted for £806. 6. 8., of which £572 are payable to the Dean and Chapter of Christ-Church, Oxford, and £232. 13. 4. to the vicar. A school, now conducted on the national plan, was established in 1814, from the surplus funds of an estate of William Grumbaldson, bequeathed in 1725, for charitable purposes.

TREBOROUGH (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of WILLITON, hundred of CARHAMPTON, W. division of SOMERSET, 6 miles (S. by E.) from Dunster; containing 138 inhabitants. This place, which belonged in ancient times to Cleeve Abbey, supplied that institution with fuel, and the prior resided here. The parish comprises 1798 acres, of which 376 are common or waste land; lime is procured, and there are extensive quarries of slate, of very good quality. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 10. 5.; net income, £137; patron, Sir J. Trevelyan, Bart.: there is a glebe-house, and the glebe contains 31 acres. In the churchyard is a fine old cross.

TREBRODIER, a township, in the parish of BETUS, union of KNIGHTON, hundred of PURLOW, S. division of the county of SALOP; containing 139 inhabitants. It comprises 1894 acres, of which 1150 are common or waste land.

TRECILLA, a township, in the parish of LLANGARRAN, union of ROSS, Lower division of the hundred of WORMELOW, county of HEREFORD; containing 156 inhabitants.

TREDEGAR, a market-town, in the township of USHLAWRÇOED, parish and division of BEDWELTY, union of ABERGAVENNY, hundred of WENTLLOOG, county of MONMOUTH, 12 miles (W. by S.) from Abergavenny; containing nearly 8000 inhabitants. This place, which, previously to the year 1800, contained only three houses, has since that period rapidly increased in importance, and is now a populous and flourishing market-town. For its present prosperity it is indebted to the persevering efforts of Messrs. Samuel Homfray, the late R. Fothergill, W. Thompson, W. Foreman, and the Rev. Matthew Monkhouse, who appreciating its advantageous situation in a district abounding with coal and iron-stone, established some extensive iron-works, which have been progressively enlarged and improved. Coal of excellent quality is obtained on the spot; the mines of iron-stone are vast, and appear, from scoria frequently found on the sides of the hills, to have been worked at an early period; and limestone is found in the adjoining parish of Llangynidr, in the county of Brecon. A tram-road was constructed in 1802 from the works, leading down the valley of Sirhowy to Newport, a distance of twenty-four miles; and at Risca this line is joined by several other tram-roads, and is conducted across the valley and the river by a viaduct of thirty-two arches, nearly a mile and a quarter in length, from which the road is continued in a direction parallel with a canal for some distance. On the line are locomotive steam-engines belonging to the Tredegar iron-works, and the Ebbw Vale Company, who in 1832, carried a tunnel through the centre of the Manmoel mountain, nearly two miles in length, joining their works to those of Tredegar and Sirhowy, all in the parish of Bedwelty. Connected with the district are the following iron-works, with their respective populations:—Tredegar, 7324; Sirhowy, and part of Beaufort, 2221; Ebbw Vale, 2300; Victoria, 1979; and Rumney, 5582. An excellent turnpike-road, adjoining the tram-road, has been constructed from Tredegar to Newport; and the mail-road from Merthyr to Abergavenny, through a singularly wild and romantic tract of country, passes close to the town.

The town is situated on the west bank of the Sirhowy river, and consists of a square, from which diverge four principal streets; a long and wide street leading to the Sirhowy works; several smaller streets, and some detached houses. The whole is on land belonging to the Tredegar Iron Company, by whom it was arranged and the buildings were erected, and who, under the direction of Samuel Homfray, Esq., of Bedwelty House, the only resident proprietor, built a very handsome town-hall, market-house, shambles, and slaughter-houses, that were completed in 1833. The market, on Saturday, is well supplied with provisions and necessaries of all kinds; and fairs are held at present on the 19th of April, September 23rd, and November 18th. The parochial church is eight miles distant; but a church has been built in the town, towards the erection of which the Parliamentary Commissioners granted £1000, the Incorporated Society £450, and upwards of £600 was subscribed by private individuals; it contains 1020 sittings, half of which are free. There are places of worship for English and Welsh Baptists, Independents, and English and Welsh Wesleyan and Calvinistic Methodists.

TREDINGTON, a parish, in the union and Lower division of the hundred of TEWKESBURY, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 3 miles (S. E. by S.) from Tewkesbury; containing 163 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 900 acres, the surface of which is flat, and the soil a deep clay: the Gloucester and Birmingham railroad runs through it. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £51; patron the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol. The church is very small; the churchyard contains a stone pillar twelve feet high, which is the shaft of an ancient cross, resting upon a basis of four steps.

TREDINGTON (St. GREGORY), a parish, in the union of SHIPSTON-UPON-STOUR, and forming, with the parishes of Shipston and Tidmington, a distinct portion of the Upper division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, Blockley and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, locally in the Kington division of the hundred of Kington, county of Warwick, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.) from Shipston; containing 1106 inhabitants, of whom 297 are in the township. This parish, which is intersected by the river Stour, was divided under an act passed in the 6th of Geo. I., when the townships of Shipston and Tidmington were separated from it; and in 1833 an act was obtained for a further division, by forming into a distinct parish the hamlets of Newbold and Armscott. The parish includes the hamlets of Blackwell and Darlingscott, and comprises 2564 acres, of which 84 are common or waste; the surface, with some slight exceptions, is flat, and the soil partly sandy, and partly a cold clay. The living is a rectory, in two portions, jointly valued in the king's books (for the whole of the ancient parish) at £99. 17. 6.; net income of the first portion, £415, and of the second, £539; patrons, the Principal and Fellows of Jesus' College, Oxford. The tithes have been commuted for £622, and the glebe comprises £104 acres. John Jordan, in 1830, bequeathed an annuity of £50, for founding and endowing a free school at Armscott; and another school has been endowed by Thomas Eden with £12 per annum. There was formerly a religious establishment, the remaining part of which is now the rectory-house.

TREDOUGHAN, a township, in the parish of LLANGARRAN, union of ROSS, Lower division of the hundred of WORMELOW, county of HEREFORD; containing 511 inhabitants.

TREDUNNOCK (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of NEWPORT, division of CAERLEON, and hundred of USK, county of MONMOUTH, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Usk; containing 156 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 0. 5., and in the gift of Capel Hanbury Leigh, Esq.; the tithes have been commuted for £180, and the glebe comprises 46 acres. The church contains the monument of a Roman soldier of the second legion, which was discovered near the foundation of the building.

TREETON (St. Helen), a parish, in the union of ROTHERHAM, S. division of the wapentake of STRAFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, 3 miles (S. by E.) from Rotherham; containing, with the township of Brampton-en-le-Morthen, and part of Ulley, 661 inhabitants, of whom 419 are in Treeton township. The parish comprises 3154*a. 17. 16p.*, of which about two-thirds are arable, 110 acres woodland, and the remainder pasture; 1290 acres are in the township of Treeton, and the property chiefly of the Duke of Norfolk, who is lord of the manor; a portion of about 400 acres, detached from the rest of the township, is in the parish of Wales. The surface is varied, and the scenery in some parts beautifully picturesque; there are quarries of good building-stone, and also of stone which is used for the Sheffield furnaces. The river Rother bounds the parish on the west; and on its banks is a very extensive flour-mill, belonging to Mr. Robert Taylor, which is noticed in the Domesday survey. The North-Midland railway has an intermediate station at the place. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12; net income, £674; patron, the Duke of Norfolk: the glebe comprises about 140 acres. The church, which is of great antiquity, and the only one in Hallamshire noticed in the Domesday survey, contains many old monuments, and an effigy of an armed knight, supposed to be that of Earl Gilbert. A cottage near the churchyard has long been occupied rent-free by a schoolmistress, for teaching six children. At Spa House is a strong chalybeate spring.

TREGARE (St. Mary), a parish, in the division and hundred of RAGLAN, union and county of MONMOUTH, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Monmouth; containing 294 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Monmouth to Abergavenny; the soil is a stiff clay, and the surface is diversified with hills, which command fine and extensive views. Charles I. slept a night at Llwyn-y-Gare, an old moated mansion here. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Dingestow: there are about 10 acres of glebe. The church is an ancient structure, with a square tower, and contains a font curiously sculptured. A national school, capable of accommodating 40 children, was built in 1841. Hugh Watkins bequeathed money and land now producing £18 per annum, which sum, with minor bequests, is distributed among the poor.

TREGAVETHAN, a manor, and extra-parochial district, in the parish of KEA, union of TRURO, W. division of the hundred of POWDER and of the county of CORNWALL; containing 52 inhabitants. The manor comprises 1024 acres, of which 389 are common or waste land; it is situated on the borders of the parish of Kenwyn, and an aisle in that church is appropriated for the use of its population. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £70. 16. 8., and the vicarial for £22. 16. 8.

TREGONEY CUM ST. JAMES, a parish, comprising the disfranchised borough and market-town of Tregoney, in the union of TRURO, W. division of the hundred of POWDER and of the county of CORNWALL, $41\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Launceston, and 248 (S. W. by W.) from London; containing 995 inhabitants. The original town, situated at the base of the hill on which the present is built, was of very great antiquity, and formerly a place of considerable importance; it was distinguished for its castle, probably erected in the reign of Richard I., the site of which, and of the moat that surrounded it, is plainly discernible. A priory is supposed by some writers to have existed here, as a cell to the convent of Merton, in Surrey; but this opinion rests solely, according to Bishop Tanner, on the erroneous mention of the advowson of the priory of Tregoney having been appropriated to the prior and convent of Merton, instead of the advowson of the rectory of St. James in Tregoney, which was actually so given by the abbot of De Valle, in Normandy, to whom it previously belonged. The present town, which has been materially lessened in importance since the increase of Truro, is pleasantly situated on the road from St. Austell to St. Mawes, and consists of one principal street; it is watered by the river Fal, which was formerly navigable for a mile above the town, for small barges, and over which a neat bridge has been erected. The market, which is well supplied with meat and provisions, is on Saturday; and fairs are held on Shrove-Tuesday, May 3rd, July 25th, Sept. 1st, and November 6th. The inhabitants received a charter of incorporation from James I., in 1620, by which the government was vested in a mayor, recorder, and eight capital burgesses or aldermen; the mayor and the senior aldermen are justices of the peace. The borough first returned members to parliament in the reign of Edward I., and, after having discontinued for many years, regained the elective franchise in 1559, which it continued to exercise till by the late bill for "amending the representation," it was totally disfranchised. The parish comprises about 130 acres, under tillage, of which the soil is rich, and rests upon marl. The living is a rectory, with the vicarage of Cuby annexed, valued in the king's books at £10. 4. 2.; net income, £311; patron, J. A. Gordon, Esq., the impropiator of Cuby. The church, though situated close to the town, is within the parish of Cuby: the former one, dedicated to St. James, which stood in a meadow, and near the site of the original town, was taken down more than fifty years since. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans; also an hospital for decayed housekeepers founded in 1696, by Hugh Boscawen, Esq., who endowed it with lands producing at present £90 per annum.

TRELLECK (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, chiefly in the union of MONMOUTH, but partly in that of CHEPSTOW, division of TRELLECK, hundred of RAGLAN, county of MONMOUTH; containing 1122 inhabitants, of whom 135 are in the township of Trelleck, 5 miles (S.) from Monmouth. This place derives its name, anciently written Tre lech, from three massive upright stones, which, though called by the inhabitants Harold's stones, are more generally supposed to be the remains of some Druidical monuments, whereof there are other vestiges in the vicinity. The parish, which embraces some very elevated ground, contains about 5500 acres; the village is on the old road from Monmouth to Chepstow, and the surrounding scenery is strikingly diversified with features of wildly romantic and pleasingly picturesque beauty. The living is a vicarage, with Penalth annexed, endowed with the rectorial tithes, valued in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of the Crown, in right of the duchy of Cornwall; net income, £430. The church is in the early English style, and consists of a nave, chancel, and side aisles, with a square tower surmounted by a lofty spire. Zacharias Babington, in 1689 and 1691, bequeathed property for maintaining a school and establishing a lectureship; the school, upon the national system, has about £15, and the lecturer receives about £30, per annum. Near the village are several chalybeate springs strongly impregnated with iron, which, from the cinders of ancient blomerics, appears to have been wrought here at an early period. In the garden of a house in the village is a large tumulus surrounded by a deep fosse, about 450 feet in circumference, supposed by some to be the site of a castle formerly belonging to the earls of Clare, and by others to be a barrow raised over the bodies of the Britons slain in some battle which took place near the spot, and to have been subsequently occupied by the English, previously to the battle of Craig-y-Dorth, in which Owain Glyndwr defeated the royal forces and pursued them to the gate of Monmouth.

TRELLECK-GRANGE, a chapelry, in the parish and division of TRELLECK, union of CHEPSTOW, hundred of RAGLAN, county of MONMOUTH, 6 miles (N. W. by N.) from Chepstow; containing 163 inhabitants. It comprises 1805 acres, the property of the Duke of Beaufort: stone is quarried for building, and for mending the roads. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £74; patron and impropiator, the Duke:

there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 85 acres. The church, a small building, formerly belonged to Tintern Abbey.

TREMAYNE, a parish, in the union of LAUNCESTON, N. division of the hundred of EAST, E. division of CORNWALL, 6 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Launceston; containing 107 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to that of Egloskerry: the tithes have been commuted for £83. 14.

TRENDLE, a tything, in the parish of PITMINSTER, union of TAUNTON, hundred of TAUNTON and TAUNTON-DEAN, W. division of SOMERSET.

TRENEGLOS (St. WERBURGH), a parish, in the union of LAUNCESTON, hundred of LESNEWTII, E. division of CORNWALL, 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Camel-ford; containing 192 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2362 acres, of which 700 are common or waste land; the surface is hilly, and the soil light. The living is a vicarage, with that of Warbstow annexed, valued in the king's books at £9. 9. 7., and in the patronage of the Crown, in right of the duchy of Cornwall; net income, £187; impropiator, the Earl of St. Germans. The great tithes have been commuted for £63. 15., and the vicarial for £90; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 20 acres. On the moors are several ancient barrows.

TRENT (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of SHERBORNE, hundred of HORETHORNE, E. division of SOMERSET, 4 miles (W. N. W.) from Sherborne; containing 505 inhabitants. It comprises by admeasurement 1590 acres, of which 460 are arable, and 943 pasture. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £23. 5. 5., and in the gift of Corpus Christi College, Oxford: the tithes have been commuted for £460; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 48 acres. The church, in the later English style, has a tower at the south-east corner, surmounted by an hexagonal spire, and contains 355 sittings, 255 of which are free. John Young, in 1678, bequeathed £1000 for the erection and endowment of a free school, of which the annual income is about £95.

TRENTHAM (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of STONE, N. division of the hundred of PIREHILL and of the county of STAFFORD; containing, with the two chapelries of Blurton with Lightwood-Forest, and Hanford, and the townships of Butterton, Clayton-Griffith, and Hanchurch, 2567 inhabitants, of which number 655 are in Trentham township, 4 miles (S. S. E.) from Newcastle. The ancient parish, situated on the London and Liverpool road, was divided into three distinct and separate parishes, under the 16th section of the act of the 58th of George III. The Trent and Mersey canal passes through the district; and in the neighbourhood is a considerable manufacture of remarkably good bricks and tiles, of a dark blue colour, in which about 200 persons are employed. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £113; patron and impropiator, the Duke of Sutherland. The church accommodates about 450 persons, and is an ancient structure, of which the tower was taken down about a century since; it is the only remaining portion of an Augustine priory. A church was opened at Hanford, in July 1828; there is a church at Blurton, and a chapel at Moor-Heath has been recently licensed by the bishop. There was once a nunnery, of which St. Werburgh, in the 7th century, was appointed abess, by her brother, King Ethelred. In the reign of Henry I., Randal, Earl of Chester, converted it into a priory of Augustine canons, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary and All Saints, and, at the Dissolution, it had a revenue of £121. 3. 2., and was granted to Charles, Duke of Suffolk. Trentham gives the inferior title of Viscount to the Duke of Sutherland, whose noble-mansion is in the parish.

TRENTISHOE (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of BARNSTAPLE, hundred of BRAUNTON, Braunton and N. divisions of DEVON, 10 miles (E. by N.) from Ilfracombe; containing 132 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the north by the Bristol Channel, and comprises 1300 acres, of which 650 are common or waste. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 8. 4., and has a net income of £118; it is in the patronage of Mrs. A. W. Griffiths, and the glebe contains 35 acres. The church is a very small ancient edifice.

TREPRENAL, a township, in the parish of LLANYMYNECH, hundred of OSWESTRY, county of SALOP, 5 miles (S.) from the town of Oswestry; containing 21 inhabitants.

TRESCOTT, with PIRTON, a hamlet, in the parish of TETTENHALL, union, and N. division of the hundred, of SEISDON, S. division of the county of STAFFORD, 4 miles (W. by S.) from Wolverhampton; containing 306 inhabitants.

TRESHAM, a chapelry, in the parish of HAWKESBURY, union of CHIPPING-SODBURY, Upper division of the hundred of GRUMBALD'S-ASH, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Wotton-under-Edge; containing 296 inhabitants. The tithes for the manor were partially commuted for land in 1818.

TRESMEER (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of LAUNCESTON, N. division of the hundred of EAST, E. division of CORNWALL, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Launceston; containing 182 inhabitants. It comprises 1344 acres, of which 108 are common or waste; the river Ottery separates the parish on the north from that of North Petherwin, and the road from Launceston to Camelford passes through it. Stone is quarried for the repair of the roads and for building, and there are mines of manganese, but not at present worked. A small fair for cattle and sheep is held on the 20th July. The living is a perpetual curacy, with a net income of £85; it is in the patronage of the Crown, and the tithes have been commuted for £130. The church was erected about the year 1486, and is now much dilapidated. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

TRESWELL (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of EAST RETFORD, South-Clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 5 miles (E. by S.) from East Retford; containing 228 inhabitants. The soil of the parish, which consists of 1721 acres, is a fertile clay, except at the east end, where it joins the Trent marsh, and is sandy. The living is a rectory, formerly in two portions, which were united in 1764; the eastern is valued in the king's books at £8. 1. 4.; and the western at £9. 15. 8.; net income, £254; patrons, the Dean and Chapter of York. The church is an ancient structure, with a lofty embattled tower. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans, TRETILLA, a township, in the parish of LLANGARRAN, union of ROSS, Lower division of the hundred of WORMELOW, county of HEREFORD; containing 132 inhabitants.

TRETIRE (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of ROSS, Lower division of the hundred of WORMELOW, county of HEREFORD, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.) from Ross; containing 135 inhabitants, and comprising 1326 acres. The living is a rectory, with the rectory of Michael-Church united, valued in the king's books at £6. 1. 8., and in the gift of Guy's Hospital, London: the tithes have been commuted for £259. 12., and there is a parsonage-house, with a glebe containing 2 acres.

TREVALGA, a parish, in the union of CAMELFORD, hundred of LESNEWTH, E. division of CORNWALL, 4 miles (N. by W.) from Camelford; containing 184 inhabitants. It is bounded on the north-west by the Bristol Channel, and comprises by admeasurement 1290 acres, of which one-third is pasture, and the remainder arable, except about 150 acres of furze and coarse land; the surface is hilly, and the soil various, and there are quarries of slate. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 6. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £146; patrons, the Dean and Chapter of Exeter: the glebe consists of about 20 acres. The church contains 300 sittings, half free.

TREVENA.—See BOSSINEY with TREVENA.

TREVETHAN (St. CADOCUS), a parish, in the union and division of PONT-Y-POOL, hundred of ABERGAVENNY, county of MONMOUTH; containing, with the market-town of Pont-y-Pool, 14,942 inhabitants. The parish comprises 8212 acres, of which 4095 are common or waste: the Monmouthshire and Brecon canals, and numerous railroads, pass through. The inhabitants are employed in extensive mines of iron and coal, with which the neighbourhood abounds, in the burning of lime, and in large iron-works at Pont-y-Pool and in its vicinity. The British Mining Company established furnaces at the Varteage, three miles from Pont-y-Pool, and buildings for the overseers and workmen were erected in almost every direction; but these works were lately stopped. The living is united, with that of Mamilad, to the vicarage of Llanover. The church, a very ancient building, has been enlarged; and an additional church, in the later English style, with a campanile turret, was erected in 1832, at an expense of £1764. Charles Price, in 1826, bequeathed £200, the interest to be appropriated in supplying bread to the poor; and schools are supported by subscription.

TREVILLE, an extra-parochial liberty, in the union of DORE, Upper division of the hundred of WORMELOW, county of HEREFORD, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Ross; containing 101 inhabitants, and consisting of 1560 acres.

TREWARLET, a hamlet, in the parish of LEZANT, union of LAUNCESTON, N. division of the hundred of EAST, E. division of CORNWALL; containing 47 inhabitants.

TREWEN (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of LAUNCESTON, N. division of the hundred of EAST, E. division of CORNWALL, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Launceston; containing 221 inhabitants. The living is a joint vicarage with South Petherwin. Fairs for colts, sheep, and lambs, are held on May 1st and October 10th.

TREWHITT, HIGH and LOW, a township, in the parish and union of ROTHBURY, W. division of COQUETDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND; containing 130 inhabitants. High Trewhitt is $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W.), and Low Trewhitt $4\frac{1}{2}$ (N. W. by N.) from Rothbury. These places were, in the time of James I., possessed by Sir Ephraim Widdrington: the family of Clavering held High Trewhitt in the reign of Charles I., but forfeited it by their attachment to the house of Stuart. Low Trewhitt lies at the foot of a declivity on the west side of the Wreigh burn; and High Trewhitt is seated on an eminence about a mile to the north-east.

TREWICK, a township, in the parish of BOLAM, union and W. division of CASTLE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Morpeth; containing 21 inhabitants. This place was a member of the barony of Bolam, and, in 1240, holden of it by the soccage service of half a mark by Robert de Trewick, of which family notices continue to occur till the 14th century: of subsequent owners have been the families of Bekering, Loraine, and Middleton. The township is situated on the north side of the Blyth river, and comprises about 708 acres of land, the property of Sir Charles M. L. Monck, Bart. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £61. 19., and the vicarial for £9. 9. 6.

TREYFORD, a parish, in the union of MIDHURST, hundred of DUMPFORD, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of SUSSEX, 4 miles (S. W. by W.) from Midhurst; containing 155 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with the vicarage of Didling annexed, valued in the king's books at £7. 12. 1.; net income, £144; patron, the Rev. L. V. Harcourt. Contiguous to the Downs are several circular and conical barrows.

TRILL, a tything, in the parish, union, and hundred of AXMINSTER, Honiton and S. divisions of DEVON; containing 39 inhabitants.

TRIMDON (St. Mary Magdalene), a parish, in the union of SEDFIELD, S. division of EASINGTON ward, N. division of the county of DURHAM, 9 miles (S. E.) from Durham; containing 382 inhabitants. The soil is a strong clayey loam, upon a substratum of limestone; large specimens of lead-ore have been dug up in the neighbourhood, though no mine has yet been opened, and coal is raised, and shipped at Hartlepool. The village is situated on the summit of a hill, and commands extensive and beautiful views. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £96; patron and impropriator, William Beckwith, Esq., whose tithes have been commuted for £175. 14.; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 120 acres. A lectureship was endowed, before 1730, with £21. 5. a year, by John Smith, Esq. A national school is endowed with £12 per annum; and an estate purchased with various bequests, and let for £32 per annum, is applied in apprenticing children and relieving the poor.

TRIMMINGHAM (St. John the Baptist), a parish, in the union of ERPINGHAM, hundred of NORTH ERPINGHAM, E. division of NORFOLK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Cromer; containing 222 inhabitants. It is situated on the coast of the North-Sea, and comprises by admeasurement 550 acres, all of which are arable, with the exception of 50 near the sea, consisting of waste, common heath, and recent plantations. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6, and in the patronage of the Crown, in right of the duchy of Lancaster: the tithes have been commuted for £134, and the glebe comprises 4 acres; there is also a rent-charge of £7. 10. payable to the rector of Sidestrands, who has a glebe here of one acre. The church, a small ancient edifice, formerly dependent on Brankholm Abbey, is in the early English style, with a low square tower; the nave is separated from the chancel by the remains of a beautifully carved screen, containing in the lower compartments representations of the Apostles. In papal times it was pretended that the head of St. John the Baptist, the patron saint of the church, was deposited here, to which rich offerings were made.

TRIMLEY (St. Martin), a parish, in the union of WOODBRIDGE, hundred of COLNEIS, E. division of SUFFOLK, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Ipswich; containing 496 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 2000 acres, and its western boundary is washed by the river Orwell. The living is a discharged rectory, with Alleton consolidated (of the church of which there are no remains), valued in the king's books at £12. 0. 5., and in the gift of the Rev. C. Waller: the tithes have been commuted for £500; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe consists of $21\frac{3}{4}$ acres. The church is situated in the same churchyard with that of Trimley St. Mary, and contains a mausoleum of the family of Sir John Barker, Bart.; the walls of the burial-ground were repaired with the stones of Felixton Castle and priory, of which the former was anciently a Roman station; the sites have been lost by encroachment of the sea. Grimston Hall, in the parish, the site of which is now occupied by a farm-house, was the seat of Thomas Cavendish, celebrated as the first English circumnavigator, who was born here.

TRIMLEY (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of WOODBRIDGE, hundred of COLNEIS, E. division of SUFFOLK, 9 miles (S. E. by E.) from Ipswich; containing 430 inhabitants. It is stated that there was anciently a considerable town here, that gave name to the haven and the river, and which is recorded in history to have been plundered by the Danes. The parish is bounded on the west by the river Orwell, and comprises by admeasurement 1823 acres. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £470, and the glebe contains 7 acres. The steeple and part of the nave of the church are in ruins.

TRING (St. Peter and St. Paul), a market-town and parish, in the union of BERKHAMPSTEAD, hundred of DACORUM, county of HERTFORD, 30 miles (W. by N.) from Hertford, and 31 (N. W. by W.) from London; containing, with the hamlet of Wilstone, and the chapelry of Long Marston, 4260 inhabitants, of whom 2772 are in the town. This place is of remote antiquity: the opinion that it is of Roman origin receives confirmation from the fact that the Ikeneld-way from Dorchester to Colchester passed in its vicinity; and at the time of the division of the county by Alfred, it was considered of sufficient importance to give name to the hundred in which it was situated, being then called Treung. Antiquaries have attributed the derivation of its name to the form of the town, which they suppose to have been originally triangular. The town consists of two principal streets, the larger crossed at the top by the other, and both containing good houses, generally of modern style. Contiguous to it is the elegant mansion of Tring Park (built by Charles II., for his favourite mistress, Eleanor Gwynn, and since modernised), with the hills rising in the back-ground, clothed with fine beech-trees. The general appearance is exceedingly neat, the atmosphere very salubrious, and the inhabitants are amply supplied with water. A silk-mill, worked partly by water and partly by steam, gives employment to upwards of 300 persons, and the manufacture of canvas and straw-plat is carried on. The Grand Junction canal passes within about a mile of the town; and in the parish are four large reservoirs, to supply any loss of water to that navigation. At Wilstone is one of the sources of the river Thames, and a first-class station on the London and Birmingham railway is situated at Tring, where the line attains its summit level, 332 feet above the Euston-square terminus. The market, granted by charter of Charles II. to Henry Guy, Esq., in 1681 (upon whom that monarch had, the year before, bestowed the manor), is on Friday, for straw-plat, corn, meat, and pedlery; and cattle-fairs are held on Easter-Monday and Old Michaelmas-day. The market-house, the property of the lord of the manor, is on the north side of the principal street. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £157; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford: the tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1797. The church, situated near the market-house, is a handsome embattled structure in the ancient English style, with a large tower at the west end, surmounted by a low spire; the font is in the later English style, highly enriched. At Long Marston is a chapel of ease; and there are places of worship for Baptists and Independents. Two allotments of land, containing together about 110 acres, now let for £71 per annum, were awarded to the parish under the inclosure act, and the rent, with the produce of some small bequests, is appropriated to supplying the poor with coal, &c. A Roman helmet was found in digging the Grand Junction canal, near Northcote Hill, between this town and Berkhamstead. Robert Hill, a remarkable self-taught linguist, was born here in 1699.

TRIPPLETON, with WHITTON, a township, in the parish of LEINTWARDINE, union of LUDLOW, hundred of WIGMORE, county of HEREFORD; containing 72 inhabitants, of whom 32 are in Trippleton.

TRITLINGTON, a township, in the parochial chapelry of HEBBURN, union, and W. division of the ward, of MORPETH, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.) from Morpeth; containing 131 inhabitants. This place was once the property of the Threlkelds, whose ancient mansion of stone has a well-sheltered garden adjoining it on the north; in the west wall of the courtyard is an ornamented gateway, of which the four pillars are crowned with vases of stone, and two of them, higher than the others, with circular fruit baskets. The township comprises 1027*a.* 3*r.* 1*p.*, of which 817 acres are arable, 159 meadow and pasture, and 51 woodland; the surface is watered by the small stream of the Line, on the south bank of which the retired village is chiefly situated. The tithes have been commuted for £147. 7.

TROSTON (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of THINGOE, hundred of BLACKBOURN, W. division of SUFFOLK, 7 miles (N. N. E.) from Bury St. Edmund's; containing 409 inhabitants. It comprises 1760 acres, of which the surface is flat, and the soil, with slight exceptions, light and sandy. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 4. 7., and in the patronage of the Crown; there is a parsonage-house; the glebe contains 33 acres, and the tithes have been commuted for £332. 10. The church is in the early and decorated styles, with an embattled tower. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. An allotment of about 15 acres, awarded under an inclosure act, in 1806, is let for £22 per annum, expended in coal for the poor. Capel Lofft had a seat here.

TROSTREY (St. DAVID), a parish, in the union of PONT-Y-POOL, division and hundred of USK, county of MONMOUTH, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Usk; containing 196 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 1200 acres on the eastern bank of the river Usk, and the road from Usk to Abergavenny runs through it. The living is a discharged perpetual curacy, valued in the king's books at £3. 8. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £72; patron and impropriator, Sir S. Fludyer, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £202. 10. The church is an ancient structure.

TROTTERSCLIFFE, or TROSLEY (St. PETER AND St. PAUL), a parish, in the union of MALLING, hundred of LARKFIELD, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, 2 miles (N. E. by E.) from Wrotham; containing 305 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 2. 11., and in the alternate patronage of the Crown and the Bishop of Rochester; net income, £287. The Rev. Paul Baristow, in 1711, bequeathed land producing £8 a year, for teaching children.

TROTON (St. GEORGE), a parish, in the union and borough of MIDHURST, partly in the hundred of EASEBOURNE, but chiefly in that of DUMPFORD, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of SUSSEX, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Midhurst; containing, with the chapelry of Milland, 481 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3877 acres, of which 494 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9, and in the gift of S. Twyford, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £414, and £35. 15. are paid to the Dean and Chapter of Chichester; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe consists of 39 acres. The church is principally in the decorated style, and contains a beautiful monument of brass inlaid with Sussex marble, to Lord and Lady Camois. There is a chapel of ease at Milland, near the border of Hampshire. Thomas Otway, the poet, was born here in 1651.

TROUGH, a township, in the parish of STAPLETON, union of LONGTOWN, ESKDALE ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Longtown; containing 143 inhabitants.

TROUGHEND-WARD, a township, in the parish of ELSDON, union of BELLINGHAM, S. division of COQUETDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Bellingham; containing 314 inhabitants. This ward is sixteen miles in length, and two and a half in average breadth, and comprises by measurement 26,010 acres, of which about 236 are arable, 96 woodland, and the remainder pasture, principally extensive sheep-walks, on which the purest breed of Cheviot sheep are kept; it comprehends that part of the parish on the west side of the river Redc. The old Tower of Troughend, which was long the seat of the family of de Buttycombe, and is mentioned in the records of a very early period, stood a little to the west of the modern mansion, and its foundations, of strong masonry, though overgrown with grass, are still traceable. The present house was built in the last century by Elrington Reed, Esq., who also greatly improved the place by planting, and whose ancestors were settled here at a remote date. The common, which contained 2500 acres, was inclosed, agreeably with an act of parliament, in 1769.

TROUTBECK, a chapelry, in the parish of WINDERMERE, union and ward of KENDAL, county of WEST-MORLAND, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Ambleside; containing 299 inhabitants. The chapelry is intersected by a rivulet, from which it derives its name: in the neighbourhood are extensive quarries of fine blue slate. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £43; patron, the Rector of Windermere, whose tithes here have been commuted for £34. The chapel, called Jesus' chapel, was consecrated in 1562; and adjoining is a school-house built in 1639, with an endowment of £8 per annum. There were formerly two cairns, supposed to be British, on the removal of one of which a rude stone chest was discovered, inclosing a quantity of human bones.

TROUTSDALE, a township, in the parish of BROMPTON, union of SCARBOROUGH, PICKERING lythe, N. riding of YORK, 8 miles (W.) from Scarborough; containing 96 inhabitants. It comprises about 1000 acres, partly waste land, and of which the substratum has excellent beds of freestone; it is situated in a deep and narrow dale in the high moors.

TROWAY, a township, in the ecclesiastical district of RIDGEWAY, parish of ECKINGTON, union of CHESTERFIELD, hundred of SCARSDALE, N. division of the county of DERBY, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Chesterfield; containing 1467 inhabitants.

TROWBRIDGE (St. James), a market-town and parish, in the union and hundred of MELKSHAM, Westbury and N. divisions, and Trowbridge and Bradford subdivisions, of WILTS, 30 miles (N. W.) from Salisbury, and 99 (W. by S.) from London; containing, with the chapelry of Staverton, 11,050 inhabitants. The origin of this place, and the etymology of its name, are involved in much obscurity: Camden says it was called by the Saxons Truthabrig, a strong and faithful town. It is not mentioned in Domesday book; but a place called Little Trowle, now a hamlet in the parish, is therein recorded, and hence the present name is by many supposed to be a corruption of Trowlebridge, by which it is described by Geoffrey of Monmouth; Leland writes it Throughbridge, or Thorough-bridge. It was anciently a royal manor, forming part of the duchy of Lancaster, having been granted by the crown to John of Gaunt; it afterwards reverted to the crown, and was given by Henry VIII., in the 28th year of his reign, to Sir Edward Seymour, Knt., Viscount Beauchamp. Having again lapsed to the crown, Queen Elizabeth, in the 24th of her reign, assigned it, with the profits of the fairs and markets, &c., to Edward, Earl of Hertford; it afterwards became the property of the Duke of Rutland, who sold it to Thomas Timbrell, Esq., in whose family it still continues. The earliest historical circumstance relating to the town is its defence against King Stephen, by Humphrey de Bohun, who held it for the Empress Ma- tilda, at which period its castle is supposed to have existed, though some writers ascribe its erection to John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster; it was demolished previously to the time of Henry VIII., as, when Leland wrote, it was in ruins, only two of its seven towers remaining; not a vestige of it now exists, its site being occupied by other buildings.

The town is situated upon a rocky hill, near the river Biss, across which is a stone bridge, and is very irregularly built, the houses mostly of stone; the principal street is spacious, and contains some excellent houses, but the others are generally narrow, and the buildings old, and of rather a mean appearance; it is paved, lighted with gas, and tolerably well supplied with water. The manufacture of woollen-cloth was introduced at an early period, and must have very soon become a thriving branch of trade, as Camden mentions that Trowbridge was then famous for the clothing business; the articles made are chiefly kerseymeres, with some superfine broad-cloth. The Kennet and Avon canal passes about a mile north, by which a communication is opened with London and Bristol; and it has been proposed, according to a provision in the act for the Great Western railway, to form a branch from that line to the town. The markets are on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday, of which the last is the principal, and are well supplied with provisions; there is a fair on the 5th of August, that lasts two days, for cattle, cheese, woollen goods, &c. A petty-session takes place on the first Tuesday in the month. A court of requests, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5, occurs every Tuesday three weeks; and a court leet and a court baron are held by the lord of the manor at Easter, at the former of which constables, tythingmen, a crier, and cornets of the market, are appointed.

The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £20. 12. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the Duke of Rutland: the tithes have been commuted for £600; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 54 acres; a rent-charge of £16. 16. is paid to the lay impropiator of Staverton, and a modus of £25. 15. out of the same hamlet to the rector. The parochial, called the New church, in consequence of a more ancient one having existed about 70 yards to the south-east, is a large building, with a tower at the west end, surmounted by a lofty spire; the walls of the nave and aisles are crowned with battlements and crocketed pinnacles. There are fragments of painted glass in some of the windows; the font is lofty, and covered with a profusion of tracery and panelling; and attached to the eastern extremities of the aisles are chapels, that on the south belonging to the lord of the manor, and that on the north to John Clark, Esq., as owner of Wickhouse and estate. A district church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, has been erected, of which the first stone was laid April 8th, 1837, and which was consecrated November 1st, 1839; it contains 1000 sittings, half free, and the living is a perpetual curacy, with a net income of £150. At Staverton is a district chapel; and there are places of worship for Particular Baptists, General Baptists, Independents, Wesleyans, Presbyterians, and Irvingites. George Keate, a poetical and miscellaneous writer of some celebrity, was born here in 1730; and Crabbe, the poet, was instituted to the rectory in 1814, which he held till his death in 1832. Trowbridge formerly gave the title of Baron to the family of Seymour, dukes of Somerset, one of whom is buried here, but the title is extinct.

TROWELL (St. HELEN), a parish, in the union of BASFORD, S. division of the wapentake of BROXTOW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Nottingham; containing 380 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the west by the river Erewash, separating it from Derbyshire, and comprises by computation 1600 acres, about two-fifths of which are arable, and the remainder grass; the soil in general is clay. The road from Nottingham to Ilkeston, and the Nottingham canal, pass through the village, which is situated at the foot of a steep declivity near the river. The living is a rectory in two portions, each valued in the king's books at £4. 14. $4\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £440; patron, Lord Middleton. The tithes of the lordship were commuted for land in 1787, and there is a glebe-house. The church is an ancient structure, with a noble tower, and has sittings for 150 persons.

TROWLE, a tything, in the parish of GREAT BRADFORD, union and hundred of BRADFORD, Westbury and N. divisions, and Trowbridge and Bradford subdivisions, of WILTS; containing 343 inhabitants.

TROWSE-NEWTON (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union and hundred of HENSTEAD, E. division of NORFOLK, 1 mile (S. E. by S.) from Norwich; containing 562 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the north by the river Yare, and comprises 1121a. 3r., of which $725\frac{1}{2}$ acres are arable, and the rest pasture; the surface is varied, and Crown Point, an eminence in the parish, commands a fine view of the city of Norwich, with the village of Thorpe and the rivers Wensum and Yare. The village is pleasantly situated on the bank of the river, and consists of neatly-built houses. There is an extensive flour-mill in Trowse-Millgate, which, together with the hamlets of Brecondale and Carrow, are within the county of the city of Norwich; and the road from Norwich to Beccles and Bungay passes through the parish, and also the railway from Norwich to Yarmouth. The living is a vicarage, with that of Lakenham annexed, in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Norwich (the appropriators), valued in the king's books at £5; net income, £314: the glebe comprises 10 acres. The church is in the decorated and later English styles, with a square embattled tower. Trowse-Newton Hall, an ancient building with a chapel, erected by the priors of Norwich, has been converted into a farm-house.

TRUDOX-HILL, a hamlet, in the parish of NUNNEY, union and hundred of FROME, E. division of SOMERSET, 4 miles (S. W.) from Frome; containing 270 inhabitants. Here was formerly a chapel.

TRULL (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of TAUNTON, hundred of TAUNTON and TAUNTON-DEAN, W. division of SOMERSET, 1 mile (S. S. W.) from Taunton; containing 547 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Taunton to Honiton, and comprises about 1700 acres, nearly equally divided between arable and pasture; the earth rests upon a substratum of red marl. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £98; patron and impropiator, Sir F. G. Cooper, Bart. John Wyatt, in 1756, gave the proceeds of £210 in support of a school, of which the annual income is £24.

TRUMPINGTON (St. MARY AND St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of CHESTERTON, hundred of TRIP- low, county of CAMBRIDGE, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Cambridge; containing 759 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 6. 8.; net income, £241; patrons and impropiators, the Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge: the tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1801. William Austin, in 1679, gave fourteen acres of land now producing £18 per annum, for teaching eight children. There are still some remains of the mill here celebrated by Chaucer in his Reeve's Tale. At Dam Hill, near the river Cam, which runs through the parish, several beautiful vases and pateræ, urns containing calcined human bones, and other relics of antiquity, have been discovered. Christopher Anstey, author of the poetical Bath Guide, was born here in 1724.

TRUNCH (St. BOTOLPH), a parish, in the union of ERPINGHAM, hundred of NORTH ERPINGHAM, E. division of NORFOLK, 3 miles (N. by E.) from North Walsham; containing 464 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1353a. 38p., of which about 1161 acres are arable, 106 pasture, and 32 woodland. In the village is a large brewing and malting establishment. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 13. 4., and in the gift of Catherine Hall, Cambridge: the tithes have been commuted for £420; there is a parsonage-house, erected in 1832, and the glebe contains about 21 acres. The church is chiefly in the decorated and later English styles, with a square tower; the chancel is separated from the nave by the remains of a beautiful screen, richly carved and gilt, and the font has a canopy of wood handsomely carved with tabernacle-work, supported by columns. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

TRURO (St. MARY), a borough, port, market-town, and parish, and the head of a union, locally in the W. division of the hundred of POWDER, W. division of CORNWALL, 43 miles (S. W. by W.) from Launceston, and 250 (W. by S.) from London; containing within the parish of St. Mary 3043 inhabitants, but within the borough, which extends into the parishes of St. Clement and Kenwyn, about 10,034. This place is called in ancient records Triueru, Treuru, Truru, and Truruburgh, and in a receipt given for the payment of a fine to the king in the 15th of Henry VII., the ville de Truro, all of similar import, being supposed to have derived its name from the three streets of which the town originally consisted. The manor, in 1161, belonged to Richard de Luci, chief justice of England and lord of Truro, who probably built the castle, of which the memorial is preserved in the name of its site, still termed Castle Hill, and invested the inhabitants with numerous privileges, which were subsequently confirmed by Reginald Fitz-Henry, Earl of Cornwall, natural son of Henry I. In 1410, a petition was presented to the parliament by the inhabitants of the town, praying that the rent payable to the crown, which had been reduced by Richard II. from £12. 1. 10. to £2. 10., for a term of years, in consequence of their sufferings from war and pestilence, might be continued in perpetuity; and stating that, instead of rebuilding their houses; the inhabitants were about to leave the town, which might be considered as the defence of that part of the country from the attempts of the enemy. Here, after the defeat at Naseby, the remains of the royalist army surrendered to Sir Thomas Fairfax; and while the negotiations were pending, Lord Hopton, their general, and the Prince of Wales, afterwards Charles II., Sir Edward Hyde, afterwards Lord Clarendon, Lord Capel, and other royalists of distinction, made their escape and embarked at Falmouth for Scilly, and thence to Jersey.

The town is situated at the confluence of the rivers Kenwyn and St. Allen, which here fall into a creek from the river Fal, forming together an estuary sufficient to enable vessels of 100 tons' burthen to approach the town at spring tides; it is in the centre of a rich and extensive mining district, to which it is principally indebted for its commercial importance. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and at high tides a beautiful lake, nearly two miles in length, is formed above Mopus. A considerable increase has recently taken place in the number of houses, and great improvements have been made in the streets and approaches; it has consequently become a handsome, well-built town, paved, and lighted with gas, and amply supplied with water by streams flowing through the main streets. These improvements were effected under an act passed in 1790; but the place having outgrown its jurisdiction, a new act was obtained in 1835, and to the exertions of the commissioners the town is indebted for its general neatness and cleanliness, and comparative exemption from disease. The Royal Institution of Cornwall, to the support of which Her Majesty subscribes £50 per annum, is established here, and possesses a museum, handsomely fitted up and enriched with objects of natural history, geological and mineralogical specimens, antiquities, coins, and various productions of the artists of China, America, Africa, the South Sea Islands, &c. In the same building is the county library, also very liberally supported, and containing at present about 4000 volumes; the Truro Institution holds its meetings in the lecture-room, and promotes the diffusion of knowledge by means of lectures on literary and scientific subjects; and the Royal Horticultural Society of Cornwall has its museum and library in a part of the building. There is a very handsome assembly-room, which is occasionally converted into a theatre, and to which an elegant subscription billiard-room is added. At the top of Lemon-street, a Doric column of granite has been erected to commemorate the discovery of the termination of the river Niger, or Quorra, in the sea at the Bight of Benin, by John and Richard Lander, natives of this place, and which had been unsuccessfully attempted by Park, Clapperton, and others.

The port exercises jurisdiction over the several creeks of Newham, Tresillian, Restronguet, Devoran, Tregoney, Pill, and Mylor. The principal exports are tin and copper ore; the former, which is made into blocks weighing four cwt., ingots from 60 to 70 lb., and bars from 4 to 6 oz. each, is shipped chiefly to France, the Mediterranean, and the Baltic; and the copper-ore, principally from the neighbourhood of Redruth, is shipped at Devoran, about a mile above Restronguet, where is a ferry for horse and foot passengers, making the distance from Truro to Falmouth only $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles.

The imports are principally iron, coal, timber, and other commodities. The number of vessels of above 50 tons registered at the port, is 25, of the aggregate burthen of 1879 tons; they are chiefly employed in the coasting trade. A large carpet and woollen manufactory has been established for more than forty years, and there are also an iron-foundry, two tanneries, and two small potteries for the coarser kinds of earthenware. The smelting of tin is carried on extensively, and there are now four smelting-houses in the town, and its immediate vicinity, viz. at Calenick, on the Falmouth road, where the best crucibles in Europe for assaying are made; at Carvedras, containing four reverberating furnaces, with a chimney 110 feet high, with which the flues from the furnaces communicate; a third near Garras Wharf, on the south side of the town; and a fourth recently established at the eastern entrance to the town, where an elegant chimney, 120 feet high, has been erected, forming one of the chief ornaments of the neighbourhood. The coinage-hall, in which the tin formerly received the duchy stamp, is an ancient edifice, at the east end of Boscawen-street. This place and Helston and Penzance were the principal stannary towns in the county: the custom of coining the tin, as it was called, has been recently abolished. The jurisdiction of the ancient stannary courts having been confined to cases wherein tin or tanners were concerned, and this having been found a serious inconvenience to persons engaged in raising other minerals, by an act passed in the 6th and 7th of William IV., it was declared expedient to unite the court of equity of the vice-warden with the courts of common law of the stewards of the stannaries, and to extend the jurisdiction of the court to all metals and metallic minerals in the said stannaries, and to all transactions connected therewith in the county. This court is held quarterly at Truro, and has proved of the greatest utility to the mining interests. The markets are on Wednesday and Saturday, the former for corn, and both are abundantly supplied with provisions of all kinds; a cattle-market has been recently established, on the first Wednesday in every month; and fairs for cattle are held on the Wednesday after Mid-Lent Sunday, Wednesday after Whit-Sunday, November 19th, and December 8th.

The original charter granted to the inhabitants by Earl Reginald has no date, but it must have been bestowed between 1140 (5th of Stephen) and 1176 (22nd of Henry II.): others were obtained from Edward I., in 1284; Edward III., in 1369; Henry IV., in 1402; Edward, Prince of Wales, as Duke of Cornwall (afterwards Edward V.), in 1477; Henry VII., in 1488; and Elizabeth, in 1589; all which are among the muniments of the corporation. The government, however, is now vested in a mayor, six aldermen, and eighteen councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76; the municipal boundaries are co-extensive with those for parliamentary purposes, and the borough is divided into two wards; the average income of the corporation is about £1200 per annum. The mayor and late mayor are justices of the peace, with three others appointed by the crown. The borough first sent members to parliament in the reign of Edward I.: the right of election was extended in 1832 to the £10 householders of an enlarged district, comprising 1235 acres; the mayor is returning officer. The charter of Elizabeth describes the mayor of Truro to be also mayor of Falmouth, and as such he exercised jurisdiction over Falmouth harbour, the customs and dues of which he received; but this claim was in part successfully resisted by the inhabitants of that town, and the mayor has now jurisdiction only over a small part of the harbour. The Easter quarter-sessions for the county were formerly held at this place; but at the Midsummer sessions held at Bodmin in 1839, the magistrates voted that for the future they should be held there. The petty-sessions for the Western division of the hundred take place on the first Thursday in every month.

The LIVING is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £16; net income, £135; patron, the Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe, one of the high lords of the manor. The church, a handsome structure, partly of granite and partly of freestone, in the later English style, was built in 1518; but the tower, which is surmounted by a spire, was not erected until 1769. It contains some remains of ancient stained glass, and elegant monuments to the families of Robarts, Vivian, Pendarves, and others. A church dedicated to St. John, in the Grecian style, with a campanile turret, has been erected in Lemon-street by subscription, aided by a grant of £700 from the Parliamentary Commissioners: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Kenwyn; net income, £95. There are places of worship for Baptists, Bryanites, the Society of Friends, Independents, and Methodists of the Old and New Connexion. Near the site of the castle is the burial-ground of the parish of St. Mary, which is provided with a chapel, for the performance of the funeral service. The free grammar school is under the management of the corporation, who allow the master £25 a year, and has two exhibitions of £30 per annum each to Exeter College, Oxford, founded by the Rev. St. John Elliot, rector of St. Mary's, who died in 1760: Sir Humphrey Davy, Lord Exmouth, Sir Hussey Vivian, Polwhele, Henry Martyn, and many other distinguished characters, received the rudiments of their education in the establishment. An hospital for ten people was founded in 1631, by Henry Williams, who endowed it with lands now producing about £200 per annum. The county infirmary, situated on an elevated and healthy spot near the town, was opened in 1799, under the patronage of George IV., then Duke of Cornwall, and is liberally supported by subscription. The poor law union of Truro comprises twenty-four parishes or places, containing a population of 43,137. A convent of Black friars was founded here in the latter part of the reign of Henry III., by an ancestor of Rauf Reskmyer, who was a great benefactor to the establishment in the reign of Edward IV.; it flourished till the Dissolution, and in the reign of Edward VI. the site was granted to Edward Aglionby, and is now partly occupied by a tanyard, in Kenwyn-street, in sinking the pits of which, about thirty years since, many stone coffins, with bones and urns containing various coins, were discovered. Samuel Foote, of dramatic celebrity, was born in 1720, in the house now called the Red Lion hotel; and the Rev. Richard Polwhele, author of histories of Cornwall and Devon, and many other works, was born here in 1760, and died here in March 1838.

TRUSHAM, a parish, in the union of NEWTON-ABBOT, hundred of EXMINSTER, Teignbridge and S. 392 divisions of DEVON, 2 miles (N. N. W.) from Chudleigh; containing 213 inhabitants, and comprising 655 acres by computation. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 4. 9½, and in the gift of Sir W. T. Pole, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £130: there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 60 acres. The church contains a very rich wooden screen. A school, and an almshouse for widows, were endowed by Mr. Storke, in 1687.

TRUSLEY (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of BURTON-UPON-TRENT, hundred of APPLETREE, S. division of the county of DERBY, 7 miles (W.) from Derby; containing 105 inhabitants, and comprising 1076a. 2r. 4p. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., and in the gift of John Coke, Esq.; the tithes have been commuted for £100; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 46¼ acres. The church is a brick edifice in the Grecian style, built on the site of the old structure, in 1717.

TRUSTHORPE (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, Marsh division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 7 miles (N. E.) from Alford; containing 273 inhabitants, and comprising 1370 acres. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £19. 10. 2½; net income, £212; patron and incumbent, the Rev. H. Rycroft: the tithes were commuted for land in 1811. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

TRYSULL (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union, and S. division of the hundred, of SEISDON, S. division of the county of STAFFORD, 5 miles (S. W.) from Wolverhampton; containing, with the township of Seisdon, 541 inhabitants. This place takes its name from John de Tressel, or Trysull, to whom the manor, together with that of Seisdon, which gives name to the hundred, belonged in the reign of Edward II. The living is a vicarage not in charge, annexed to that of Wombourn: the small tithes were commuted for land in 1773. The church, a handsome structure with a square tower, was nearly rebuilt in 1844, at a cost of £1000, and contains 400 sittings, of which 180 are free; on the north wall is a carved figure of a bishop. Thomas Rudge bequeathed £200 to purchase land, now producing, with other bequests, £16. 10. per annum, for instruction.

TUBNEY, a parish, in the union of ABINGDON, hundred of OCK, county of BERKS, 4¼ miles (W. by N.) from Abingdon; containing 190 inhabitants, and comprising 1124a. 2r. 36p. The living is a sinecure rectory, valued in the king's books at £3. 1. 10½, and in the gift of Magdalen College, Oxford: the tithes have been commuted for £147. 10., and the glebe contains 10 acres. The church has been entirely demolished, and on the induction of a rector, the ceremony takes place in the open air. The parishioners attend Fyfield church.

TUCKTON, a tything, in the parish, union, and hundred of CHRISTCHURCH, Ringwood and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 172 inhabitants.

TUDDENHAM (ST. MARTIN), a parish, in the union of WOODBRIDGE, hundred of CARLFORD, E. division of SUFFOLK, 3 miles (N. E. by N.) from Ipswich; containing 423 inhabitants, and comprising by admeasurement 1232 acres. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 13. 4.; patron and impropriator, the Rev. C. W. Fonnereau. The great tithes have been commuted for £220, and the vicarial for £110, and there are three acres of glebe. The north door of the church is a richly-moulded Norman arch; the font has the date 1363 inscribed on it.

TUDDENHAM (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of MILDENHALL, hundred of LACKFORD, W. division of SUFFOLK, 3 miles (S. E. by S.) from Mildenhall; containing 428 inhabitants, and comprising by admeasurement 2583 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 17. 6., and in the gift of the Marquess of Bristol: the tithes have been commuted for £360, and the glebe comprises 17 acres. John Cockerton, in 1723, founded a free school, and endowed it with an estate now producing a rental of £70.

TUDDENHAM, EAST (All Saints), a parish, in the union of MITFORD and LAUNDITCH, hundred of MITFORD, W. division of NORFOLK, 8½ miles (W. N. W.) from Norwich; containing 556 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2065*a.* 3*r.* 35*p.*, of which 1629 acres are arable, 359 meadow and pasture, and 44 woodland: the village is pleasantly situated on the road from Norwich to Mattishall. The living is a discharged vicarage, annexed to that of Honingham, and valued in the king's books at £7. 6. 0½.: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £168, and the vicarial for £415; the glebe contains 102 acres. The church is chiefly in the later English style, with a square embattled tower; the east window is embellished with stained glass representing the Descent from the Cross and other scriptural subjects, inserted at the expense of Mrs. Mellish. There is a place of worship for Primitive Methodists. At the inclosure of the parish, twenty-four acres were allotted for fuel to the poor, who have also £40 per annum arising from several bequests.

TUDDENHAM, NORTH and WEST (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of MITFORD and LAUNDITCH, hundred of MITFORD, W. division of NORFOLK, 4¼ miles (E. by S.) from East Dereham; containing 417 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Norwich to East Dereham, and comprises 2270*a.* 1*r.* 8*p.*, of which 1706 acres are arable, 469 meadow and pasture, and 41 woodland. Tuddenham Hall, formerly the seat of the Skippe family, and an ancient mansion of brick surrounded with a moat, is now a farm-house. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 5. 5., and in the gift of the Rev. J. Day: the tithes have been commuted for £680; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 65 acres.

TUDELY, or TUDELY CUM CAPEL (All Saints), a parish, in the union of TONBRIDGE, partly in the hundred of TWYFORD, but chiefly in that of WASHLINGSTONE, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, 2 miles (E. S. E.) from Tonbridge; containing 643 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1593*a.* 1*r.* 6*p.*, about 50 acres of which are hop-grounds: the South-Eastern railway passes through it. The living is a vicarage, held jointly with Capel, valued in the king's books at £4. 16. 0½., and in the patronage of the Baroness le Despencer; net income, £238. The church is a small building of stone, with a square tower of brick, and a spire. There are mineral springs, having the same properties as those of Tonbridge-Wells. Here was formerly a seat of the earls of Westmorland, now a farm-house.

TUDERLEY.—See TYTHERLEY.

TUDHOE, a township, in the parochial chapelry of WHITWORTH, S. E. division of DARLINGTON ward, union, and S. division of the county, of DURHAM, 5 miles (S. by W.) from Durham; containing 327 inhabitants. The township, anciently called Tudhowe, comprises by computation 1770 acres of land: the village, which is reputed as being very healthy, is pleasantly situated near the source of a brook, about a mile south of the river Wear. The tithes have been commuted for £167. 13. 3., payable to the rector of Brancepeth. A small school on the national plan has been established.

TUDY, ST., a parish, in the union of BODMIN, hundred of TRIGG, E. division of CORNWALL, 6¼ miles (N.) from Bodmin; containing 661 inhabitants. Fairs for sheep and cattle are held on May 20th and September 14th. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £31; net income, £700; patrons, the Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford. The church contains several ancient monuments to the family of Nichols, of Penrose, in the parish. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and at Tintern and Kelly-Green are the remains of two ancient chapels. Dr. Richard Lower, an eminent physician in the time of Charles II., who first brought into notice the mineral water at Astrop, in Northamptonshire, and who is mentioned in Dr. Good's Study of Medicine, as having either discovered or brought to perfection the practice of transfusing blood, was born at Tremere, in the parish, about 1631, and was interred at his native place in 1690.

TUFFLEY, a hamlet, in the parish of ST. MARY-DE-LODE, city of GLOUCESTER, Middle division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S-BARTON, union, and E. division of the county, of GLOUCESTER, 2¼ miles (S. by W.) from Gloucester; containing 107 inhabitants, and comprising 770 acres, of which 50 are common or waste land.

TUFTON, or TUCKINGTON (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of WHITCHURCH, hundred of WHERWELL, Kingsclere and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, ½ a mile (S. W.) from Whitchurch; containing 153 inhabitants. It comprises about 1500 acres, of which the surface is hilly, and the soil rests upon chalk and gravel. The living is annexed, with that of Bullington, to the vicarage of Wherwell.

TUGBY (St. Thomas à Becket), a parish, in the union of BILLESDON, partly in the hundred of GARTREE, but chiefly in that of EAST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, 7 miles (W. by N.) from Uppingham; containing, with the liberty of Keythorpe, 288 inhabitants. This parish, which forms some of the highest land in the county, is situated on the road from Leicester to Stamford, and comprises about 2000 acres. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of East Norton annexed, valued in the king's books at £11. 8. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes were partly commuted for land in 1784, and a commutation has taken place under the recent act, for a rent-charge of £147. 8.; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 137 acres. The church has been repewed. Robert Wilson, in 1726, bequeathed land, directing the produce to be applied for teaching children, and the relief of the poor. Catherine Parker, in 1746, left £50 per annum to be distributed among three widows, two of whom were to be of this place, and one of East Norton; £23 per annum, derived from land apportioned at the inclosure, are applied to the apprenticing of children, and the sum of £7. 5., derived from land purchased with several bequests, is distributed among the poor.

TUGFORD (St. CATHERINE), a parish, in the union of LUDLOW, hundred of MUNSLOW, S. division of SALOP, 10 miles (N. N. E.) from Ludlow; containing 145 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, united to that of Holdgate, and valued in the king's books at £4. 13. 4.: the tithes have been commuted for £180; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 23 acres.

TUGGAL, or TUGHALL, a township, in the parish, and N. division of the ward, of BAMBROUGH, union of BELFORD, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 3 miles (N. N. W.) from Embleton; containing 119 inhabitants. It is situated on the southern extremity of the parish, near Tuggal burn, which shortly falls into the North Sea; and comprises about 1500 acres of good wheat land and excellent pasture, in the proportions of two-thirds of the former and one-third of the latter, the property of the Duke of Northumberland and J. R. Forster, Esq. At a little distance eastward from the village stands Tuggal Hall. Here is a chapel in ruins.

TUMBY, a hamlet, in the parish of REVESBY, union of HORNCastle, W. division of the soke of BOLINGBROKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 2½ miles (N. by W.) from Bolingbroke; containing 12 inhabitants.

TUMBY, a township, in the parish of KIRKBY-UPON-BAIN, union of HORNCastle, S. division of the wapentake of GARTREE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 2½ miles (N. E. by N.) from Tattershall; containing 344 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Under the will of Sir John Nelthorpe, Bart., in 1669, a moiety of his bequest to the school of Glandford-Brigg, producing nearly £200 per annum, is appropriated for providing lodging, diet, clothing, and books for the poor of Fullsby, in this township, and for those of Legsby.

TUNBRIDGE, KENT.—See TONBRIDGE.

TUNSTALL, a township, in the parish of BISHOP-WEARMOUTH, union of SUNDERLAND, N. division of EASINGTON ward and of the county of DURHAM, 2¾ miles (S. by W.) from Sunderland; containing 64 inhabitants. The township lies between the road from Sunderland to Durham, and that from Sunderland to Stockton, and comprises about 760 acres, mostly arable land. It is chiefly remarkable for the hills named after it, which form one of the most prominent features of the district, and are a long monotonous chain or ridge of limestone, running from north to south, and terminating in two depressed round summits; the eastern ascent is tame and gradual, but the western rises rapidly from a deep and romantic gill. From these hills fine views of the sea and of Sunderland are presented, and they form a landmark for mariners; imbedded in the limestone have been found fossils, and a considerable quantity of iron-ore; there are some vestiges of a Druidical circle, and a rude sepulchre, constructed with fragments of stone, was discovered in 1814. The tithes have been commuted for £182. 15. 3. A division of waste lands took place in 1671.

TUNSTALL (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union and hundred of MILTON, Upper division of the lathe of SCRAY, E. division of KENT, 1½ mile (S. W. by W.) from Sittingbourne; containing 188 inhabitants. It comprises 1179a. 25p., of which nearly 627 acres are arable, 291 pasture, 229 woodland, and 15 hop-grounds; the soil is loamy, with a considerable admixture of flint, and rests upon a substratum of chalk. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 8. 4., and in the gift of the Archbishop of Canterbury: the tithes have been commuted for £510, and there is a glebe-house, with 9½ acres of land. The church, which is principally in the later English style, and has several handsome monuments, is built of flint, and contains about 300 sittings. Edward Rowe Mores, a distinguished antiquary, was born here in 1730.

TUNSTALL (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of LANCASTER, hundred of LONSDALE, south of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER; containing, with the chapelry of Leck, and the townships of Burrow and Cantsfield, 721 inhabitants, of whom 142 are in Tunstall township, 3¾ miles (S.) from Kirkby-Lonsdale. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 3. 11½.; net income, £332; patron and impropiator, R. T. North, Esq.: the tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1814. The church is very ancient, and occupies a retired situation. Twenty-four children receive education for about £26 a year, arising from bequests.

TUNSTALL (St. PETER AND St. PAUL), a parish, in the union of BLOFIELD, hundred of WALSHAM, E. division of NORFOLK, 2¾ miles (S. S. E.) from Acle; containing 116 inhabitants, and comprising about 1600 acres. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £70; patron, the Bishop of Norwich. The church forms a picturesque ruin, and the chancel only is fitted up for public worship.

TUNSTALL, a township, in the parish of ABDASTON, union of NEWPORT, N. division of the hundred of PIREHILL and of the county of STAFFORD; containing 124 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £135, payable to the prebendary of Abdaston.

TUNSTALL (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union and hundred of PLOMESGATE, E. division of SUFFOLK, 8 miles (N. E. by E.) from Woodbridge; containing, with the hamlet of Dunningworth, 658 inhabitants, and comprising by admeasurement 3057 acres. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Dunningworth annexed, valued in the king's books at £21. 0. 5.; net income, £352; patron and incumbent, the Rev. T. G. Ferrand. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

TUNSTALL (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of PATRINGTON, Middle division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, E. riding of YORK, 5½ miles (N.) from Patrington; containing 159 inhabitants. This place is of considerable antiquity, as a church existed here in 1115, when Stephen, Earl of Albemarle, gave the church and tithes of Tunstall to the abbey of St. Martin. The parish is bounded on the east by the German Ocean, and comprises 1193a. 16p., of which 919 acres are arable, and 274 pasture; about 100 acres have been lost since the inclosure in 1777, by the encroachment of the sea. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Succentor of the Cathedral of York, with a net income of £52; appropriators, the Dean and Chapter. The tithes of the township were commuted for land and a money payment in 1777. The church, situated near the centre of the village, on exposed ground, consists of a nave, north and south aisles, and chancel, with a tower; the elevation is lofty, and the edifice of very substantial erection.

TUNSTALL, a township, in the parish of CATTERICK, union of RICHMOND, wapentake of HANG-EAST, N. riding of YORK, 2 miles (S. W.) from Catterick; containing 314 inhabitants. It comprises about 1470 acres, belonging to various proprietors: its scattered village is seated in a narrow vale, near the source and on both sides of a small rivulet. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

TUNSTALL-COURT, a considerable modern town, and ecclesiastical district, consisting of the townships of Oldcott, Tunstall, and Rainscliff, in the parish of WOLSTANTON, parliamentary borough of STOKE, union of WOLSTANTON and BURSLEM, N. division of the hundred of PIREHILL and of the county of STAFFORD, 4 miles (N. by E.) from Newcastle; containing altogether 9240 inhabitants, of whom 6978 are in the town. The population is chiefly employed in the china and earthenware manufactures, of which there are nearly 20 establishments, and in collieries and brick and tile works, the latter being extensively carried on, and producing articles of superior hardness and quality, in great demand in Lancashire and the northern parts. Goods are forwarded by the Grand Trunk canal, which passes on its summit level near the west side of the town, and is conducted into Cheshire in two collateral tunnels under Harecastle-hill, within half a mile north-west of the town: these tunnels are 2888 yards in length. The town has very much increased and improved within the present century, the population in 1811 having been 1677 only: in 1816, a market-place was set out, and a town-hall erected by shares, a neat building of brick in the centre of the market-place; and a market has since been established, which is held on Saturday and Monday. The township of Tunstall contains 795 acres, but the manor, of which Ralph Sneyd, Esq., of Keele Hall, is lord, comprehends also 12 contiguous townships, including Burslem. A church was erected in 1831, on a site given by Mr. Sneyd, by the Parliamentary Commissioners, at an expense of £4000, including £1000 raised by subscription; it is a plain building of stone, with a spire, and a vicarage-house has been erected by aid from Queen Anne's Bounty and private subscription. There are places of worship for Wesleyan and Primitive Methodists.

TUNSTEAD (St. Mary), a parish, in the TUNSTEAD and HAPPING incorporation, hundred of TUNSTEAD, E. division of NORFOLK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Colts-hall; containing 488 inhabitants. It comprises 2261*a.* 1*r.* 2*p.*, of which 2155 acres are arable, 70 pasture, and 20 wood. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of South Ruston annexed, valued in the king's books at £18. 9. 7.; patron and incumbent, the Rev. T. Mack, who is joint impropiator, with R. Johnson, Esq. The great tithes not held by the landowners have been commuted for £355, and the vicarial for £284; the glebe contains 6 acres. The church is chiefly in the decorated style, with a square embattled tower; on the south side of the chancel are three stone seats with highly decorated canopies, and there are also a piscina and a handsomely sculptured font. The Wesleyans have a place of worship.

TUNWORTH (All Saints), a parish, in the union and hundred of BASINGSTOKE, Basingstoke and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 3 miles (S. E.) from Basingstoke; containing 124 inhabitants. It comprises 1045 acres by admeasurement, of which 548 are arable, 200 down, 160 meadow and pasture, and 137 woodland; the earth rests upon a substratum of chalk. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 18. 9., and in the gift of G. P. Jervoise, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £175; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 40 acres.

TUPHOLME, a parish, in the union of HORNCastle, W. division of the wapentake of WRAGGoe, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 7 miles (S.) from Wragby; containing 74 inhabitants. It comprises 1795 acres, of which 487 are arable, 1011 meadow and pasture, and 297 woodland. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £2. 10. 10.; net income, £89; patron and appropriator, the Bishop of Lincoln. An abbey of Præmonstratensian caons, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, was founded here in the time of Henry II., by Allan and Gilbert de Nevill, and, at the Dissolution, possessed a revenue of £119. 2. 8.

TUPSLEY, a township, in the parish of BISHOPHAMPTON, hundred of GRIMSWORTH, union and county of HEREFORD, 2 miles (E. S. E.) from Hereford; containing 556 inhabitants. It comprises, with an extra-parochial place of 8 acres, 1401 acres, of which 473 are arable, and the remainder meadow and garden.

TUPTON, a township, in the parish of NORTH WINGFIELD, union of CHESTERFIELD, hundred of SCARSDALE, N. division of the county of DERBY, 4 miles (S.) from Chesterfield; containing 317 inhabitants.

TURKDEAN (All Saints), a parish, in the union of NORTHLEACH, hundred of BRADLEY, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 2 miles (N. by W.) from Northleach; containing 246 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 2100 acres, the soil of which is light, and the surface boldly undulated. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Aldsworth annexed, valued in the king's books at £10; net income, £208; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford. The tithes were commuted for land and annual money payments in 1792; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 180 acres.

TURNASTONE (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of DORE, hundred of WEBTREE, county of HEREFORD, 11 miles (W. by S.) from Hereford; containing 76 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the banks of the river Dore, near the Hay and Hereford road, and comprises 550 acres, a large portion of which is woodland. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £2. 14. 2., and in the patronage of Lady Boughton: the tithes have been commuted for £73, and the glebe comprises $5\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church is in the Norman style.

TURNDITCH (All Saints), a chapelry, in the parish of DUFFIELD, union of BELPER, hundred of APPLETREE, S. division of the county of DERBY, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Belper; containing 405 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £63; patron, the Vicar of Duffield; impropiator, Lord Beauchamp. There are places of worship for Baptists and Primitive Methodists.

TURNERS-PUDDLE (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of WAREHAM and PURBECK, hundred of HUNDREDSBARROW, Wareham division of DORSET, 7½ miles (N. W.) from Wareham; containing 122 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 13. 4., and in the gift of J. Framp-ton, Esq.; the tithes have been commuted for £168, and the glebe comprises 3½ acres. The church was partly blown down in 1758, and rebuilt in 1759.

TURNHAM-GREEN, a hamlet, in the parish of CHISWICK, union of BRENTFORD, Kensington division of the hundred of OSSULSTONE, county of MIDDLESEX, 5 miles (W. by S.) from London. The great western road passes through the village, which contains many handsome houses occupied by genteel families, and is lighted with gas, and supplied with water from the West London water-works. On the south side is the Horticultural Society's garden, of which the principal entrance is from the green here. The hamlet is within the jurisdiction of a court of requests held in Kingsgate-street, Holborn, for the recovery of debts under 40s.; and is under the superintendence of the new police. A cruciform church in the early English style, with a handsome tower surmounted by a lofty spire, has lately been erected, and contains 930 sittings.

TURNHILL, an extra-parochial place, adjoining the parish of Middleton, in the union and lythe of PICKERING, N. riding of YORK; containing 12 inhabitants.

TURNWORTH (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of BLANDFORD, hundred of CRANBORNE, Blandford division of DORSET, 5 miles (W. by N.) from Blandford-Forum; containing 89 inhabitants. It comprises 1560*a.* 1*r.* 39*p.* by computation, of which about 528 acres are arable, 805 pasture, 95 woodland, 17 orchard and garden, and 88 waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 12. 3., and in the gift of the Bishop of Salisbury: the tithes have been commuted for £125, and the glebe contains 25 acres.

TURTON, a chapelry, in the parish and union of BOLTON, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 4½ miles (N.) from Great Bolton; containing 3577 inhabitants. The chapelry is bounded by two rivulets tributary to the Irwell, that supply the power for various cotton-spinning, bleaching, dyeing, and printing works, of which the largest are the Egerton spinning and dye mills, worked by a strong water-wheel. At these establishments about 1000 persons are employed; and the weaving of cotton, by hand-loom, is extensively carried on by the cottagers. Fairs for cattle, horses, &c., are held on Sept. 4th and 5th, at the village of Chapel-Town here. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £155; patron, G. N. Hoare, Esq. The chapel, dedicated to St. Bartholomew, has been rebuilt. There is a place of worship for Unitarians. Humphrey Cheetham, Esq., in 1746, endowed a small school; another was founded by Abigail Cheetham, who assigned to it property now let for £28 a year; and a small sum is appropriated from Mrs. Smalley's charity to the Eagley-Bridge school here, established in 1794. A Roman road passed through the chapelry, in which the remains of a Druidical temple, and the copper head of an old British standard, have been discovered. Turton Tower, an embattled structure four stories high, has been the residence of the Orrells, the Cheethams, and the Greames, but is now a farm-house.

TURVEY (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the hundred of WILLEY, union and county of BEDFORD, 4 miles (E.) from Olney; containing 960 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the west by the river Ouse, and situated on the road from Northampton to Bedford. It comprises by admeasurement 3960 acres, of which about half are under tillage, and the remainder pasture and woodland: there are quarries of limestone and stone for building. Most of the females are engaged in lace-making. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16; patron, T. C. Higgins, Esq.; appropriators, the Bishop of Ely and the Rector. The great tithes have been commuted for £253, and the incumbent's for £458. 9.; the parsonage-house was lately rebuilt. The church contains portions of various styles, and has three chancels, and several fine monuments of the noble family of Mordaunt; the remains of the celebrated Earl of Peterborough are deposited in the family vault. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. The ancient mansion called Turvey Abbey, situated here, was formerly a dependency of the abbey of St. Neot's, Huntingdonshire: the moats and foundations of Turvey Hall, the residence of the Lords Peterborough, are still visible. Among other fossils, ammonites and belemnites have been found. The parish confers the title of Baron on the Duke of Bedford.

TURVILLE (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of WYCOMBE, hundred of DESBOROUGH, county of BUCKINGHAM, 6 miles (N. W. by W.) from Great Marlow; containing 476 inhabitants, several of whom are employed in the manufacture of lace. The parish comprises 2275 acres, of which 120 are common or waste land. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 9. 9½.; present income, under commutation, £90, and there are 40 acres of glebe; patron, Joseph Bailey, Esq.; impropiators, the landed proprietors. The celebrated French general, Dumourier, resided at this place during the last two or three years of his life, and died here.

TURWESTON (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of BRACKLEY, hundred and county of BUCKINGHAM, ½ a mile (E.) from Brackley; containing 361 inhabitants. It comprises about 1150 acres, the chief part of which is arable; the soil is clayey, incumbent upon a substratum of limestone; the river Ouse rises in the vicinity. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 16. 3.; net income, £300; patrons, the Dean and Chapter of Westminster. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1813.

TURWICK, county of SUSSEX.—See TERWICK.

TUSHINGHAM, with GRINDLEY, a township, in the parish of MALPAS, union of NANTWICH, Higher division of the hundred of BROXTON, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 3½ miles (E. S. E.) from Malpas; containing 320 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £120.

TUSMORE, a parish, in the union of BICESTER, hundred of PLOUGHLEY, county of OXFORD, 6 miles (N. by W.) from Bicester; containing 19 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £3. 5.; net income, £15; patron, Sir H. Dashwood, Bart. The church has been destroyed.

TUTBURY (ST. MARY), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union of BURTON-UPON-TRENT, N.

division of the hundred of OFFLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Burton; containing 1835 inhabitants. On the division of lands after the Conquest, Tutbury was included in the domain allotted to Henry de Ferrars, a Norman nobleman, who either built the castle of this place, or received it in gift from William. His descendant, Robert, joining Leicester in the rebellion against Henry III., was fined £50,000, and, being unable to pay so large a sum, forfeited his castle to the king, who granted it to his son, Edmund, Earl of Lancaster. After the attainder of Thomas, Earl of Lancaster, who, with the Earl of Hereford, had attempted the dethronement of Edward II., the fortress was suffered to fall to ruin, and so remained till the year 1350, when John of Gaunt, becoming its possessor, rebuilt the greater part of it, with the gatehouse, and surrounded it on three sides by a wall, the precipitous declivity on the fourth rendering further security unnecessary. Mary, Queen of Scots, was for some time imprisoned here; and at the commencement of the civil war, it was garrisoned for the king, but, by order of parliament, was nearly demolished in 1646. The ruins, however, are still sufficient to indicate its former extent and magnificence, and exhibit good specimens of the early and later English styles.

The town, situated on the west bank of the river Dove, which is crossed by a stone bridge of five arches, of modern erection, was, at a very early period, erected into a free borough, and possessed many valuable privileges. On the river are extensive corn and cotton-spinning mills, and there is also a considerable cut-glass manufactory: the country between Tutbury and Needwood Forest abounds with alabaster. Fairs for horses and cattle are held on Feb. 14th, Aug. 15th, and Dec. 1st. The manor, or honour, of Tutbury belongs to the crown, in right of the duchy of Lancaster; its jurisdiction extends over a great portion of Staffordshire, and into several of the neighbouring counties, and, in her Majesty's name, courts leet and baron are held here once a year; also a court of pleas every third Tuesday, for all debts under 40s. contracted within the honour. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7; patron, the Vicar of Bakewell; impropriators, the Executors of R. Stone, Esq. The great tithes have been commuted for £400. 10., and the vicarial for £37; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains $83\frac{1}{4}$ acres. The church, which is the nave of a more extensive structure, and a fine specimen of the Norman style, has been enlarged, newly pewed, and greatly improved, at an expense of nearly £2000, whereof £250 were contributed by the Incorporated Society. There are places of worship for Wesleyans, Independents, and Primitive Methodists. A free school was founded by Richard Wakefield, who, about 1730, endowed it with lands producing about £40 per annum, and the school-house was rebuilt in 1789; the same person also, by his will in 1773, devised land and tithes now producing about £450, to trustees, for charitable uses.

On the declivity of the commanding eminence upon which the castle stood, a Benedictine priory, in honour of the Blessed Virgin, was established in 1080, by Henry de Ferrars, and though a cell to the abbey of St. Peter super Divam, in Normandy, survived till the general Dissolution, when its revenue was valued at £244. 16. 8. In 1831, some workmen, while digging a quantity of gravel out of the bed of the river, discovered, thirty yards below the bridge, and from four to five feet under the surface of the gravel, about 100,000 valuable coins, chiefly sterlings of the empire of Brabant, Lorraine, and Hainault; several Scottish coins of Alexander III., John Balliol, and Robert Bruce; coins of Edward I., Henry III., and Edward II.; specimens of all the prelatial coins of the reigns of Edward I. and II.; of Beck, Keller, and Beaumont, bishops of Durham; some others, supposed to have been struck by the abbot of Bury St. Edmund's, bearing the inscription "Rob. de Hadley," and a few of the archiepiscopal see of York. These coins were the contents of the military chest of the Earl of Lancaster, left at Tutbury Castle on his retreat from that place, then threatened by the army of Edward II., to his castle of Pontefract, in the county of York; and which, with baggage entrusted to his treasurer, was lost in the river Dove, on his attempting to cross it at a high flood, in the darkness of the night and with a panic-struck guard. Among other curious customs that formerly prevailed here, was a minstrel fête given by the Duke of Lancaster on Assumption-day, to which all the itinerant musicians of the neighbourhood were invited. There was also a sport called "Bull running," which consisted in chasing a bull with a soaped tail; and, if caught in the county, he was conducted to the market-place and there baited, otherwise he remained the property of the Duke of Devonshire, who held the priory on condition of furnishing a bull annually for the purpose. Ann Moore, who professed the ability to live without food, resided here during the period of her imposture.

TUTNAL, with COBLEY, a township, in the parish of TARDEBIGG, union of BROMSGROVE, Alcester division of the hundred of BARLICHWAY, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 2 miles (E. S. E.) from Bromsgrove; containing 533 inhabitants, and comprising 3347 acres.

TUTTINGTON (St. PETER AND St. PAUL), a parish, in the union of AYLISHAM, hundred of SOUTH ERPINGHAM, E. division of NORFOLK, 2 miles (E.) from Aylsham; containing 227 inhabitants. It comprises 813a. 3r. 21p., about one-fifth of which consists of meadow, woodland, and waste, and the remainder is arable. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 0. 7½., and in the gift of the appropriator, the Bishop of Ely: the great tithes have been commuted for £200, and the vicarial for £102. 10., and the glebe contains nearly 16 acres.

TUXFORD (St. NICHOLAS), a market-town and parish, in the union of EAST-RET福德, South-Clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 30 miles (N. E. by N.) from Nottingham, and 139 (N. by W.) from London, on the great north road; containing 1079 inhabitants. This place, often denominated Tuxford-in-the-Clay, to designate its situation, is a small town of modern appearance, having been rebuilt since 1702, when the old village was destroyed by fire. The only branch of trade, which is somewhat extensive, is in hops, large quantities being grown in the neighbourhood. The market is on Monday; and fairs are held on May 12th, for cattle, sheep, swine, and poultry, and on Sept. 25th, for hops. The parish comprises 2913 acres by admeasurement. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 14. 7.; net income, £260; patrons and impropriators, the Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge. The tithes were partly exchanged for land and a money payment in 1799, and a commutation has taken place under the recent act, for a rent-charge of £236. 12.; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe consists of nearly 104 acres. The church contains portions in various styles. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Independents; also a free school founded in 1670, by Charles Read, Esq., who bequeathed £200 for the erection of the building, and endowed it with lands producing £40 per annum.

TWAMBROOK, a township, in the parish of GREAT BUDWORTH, union and hundred of NORTHWICH, county of CHESTER, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile (E.) from Northwich.

TWEEDMOUTH (St. Bartholomew), a parish, in the union of BERWICK-UPON-TWEED, ISLANDSHIRE, county of DURHAM, though locally northward, and for electoral purposes connected with the N. division, of NORTHUMBERLAND; adjoining Berwick, and containing, with the townships of Ord and Spittle, 5202 inhabitants, of whom 2574 are in the township of Tweedmouth. In 1203, King John made an attempt to fortify the town of Tweedmouth, but his progress was twice interrupted by the Scots, and during the occupation of Berwick by William the Lion, the works were entirely demolished. The town, which is situated on the south bank of the river Tweed, forms a handsome suburb to the borough of Berwick, with which it is connected by an elegant bridge. The inhabitants of the parish are chiefly employed in agriculture and fishing; but in the town are two extensive foundries, a yard for boat-building, a public brewery, a millwright's establishment, and a mill for crushing bones for manure, in which a considerable number of persons are engaged. The proposed extension of the Edinburgh and Newcastle railway, in order to complete the communication with London, will pass through the village. It is in contemplation to form a railway from some collieries belonging to Greenwich Hospital, to a depôt on the Tweedmouth side of the harbour; and from the abundance of coal, limestone, and stone for building in the neighbourhood, with facilities of conveyance, and the command of a good harbour, there is every prospect of a great increase in the manufacturing and commercial importance of the place. A part of the parish is, under the Reform act, included within the boundaries of the borough of Berwick; and petty-sessions for this portion are held every Friday, and for that part of it within the county of Durham on the first Wednesday in every month. The parish comprises 4520 acres, chiefly arable. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £150; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Durham. The church, formerly a chapel of ease to Holy Island, was rebuilt in 1783. There are two places of worship for Presbyterians; and a national school, erected in 1825, is supported by subscription. An ancient hospital once existed here, near the site of which is a slightly impregnated mineral spring; and in the neighbourhood of the village of Ord are vestiges of a British intrenchment, close to which fragments of military weapons have been found.

TWEMLOW, a township, in the parish of SANDBACH, union of CONGLETON, hundred of NORTHWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Middlewich; containing 241 inhabitants. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £69, and the inappropriate for £36. 12. 6.

TWICKENHAM (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of BRENTFORD, hundred of ISLEWORTH, county of MIDDLESEX, 9 miles (W. S. W.) from London; containing 5208 inhabitants. The name of this place, formerly written Twickenam, is said to refer to its situation between two streams, or brooks, that flow into the Thames at each end of the village, which occupies a most delightful position on its western bank, on the road from London, through Isleworth, to Hampton Court. Twickenham is deservedly admired for the beauty of its scenery, enlivened by the windings of the Thames, and embellished with handsome seats and tasteful villas, and has been the favourite retreat of the statesman and the poet. At the southern extremity of the village, fronted by a lawn sloping to the verge of the river, is Pope's villa; but the house has been much enlarged, and the celebrated grotto erected under the immediate superintendence of the poet has lost nearly all its original character. Strawberry Hill, formerly the residence of Sir Robert Walpole, is also an interesting object as seen from the river, in the middle of which, nearly opposite to the church, is an island called Twickenham Ait. This island comprises about eight acres, chiefly pleasure-grounds, and in the centre is the Eel Pie house, noted for the last two centuries, as a favourite resort for refreshment and recreation to water parties, and persons repairing hither for the amusement of fishing; the old building was taken down in 1830, and a very handsome and commodious edifice, comprising a good assembly-room, measuring 50 feet by 15, has been erected on the site. There are powder and oil mills in the parish; and fairs are held on Holy-Thursday and August 9th and 10th. The inhabitants are under the jurisdiction of a court of requests, for the recovery of debts under 40s., held at Brentford during the summer half year, and at Uxbridge during the winter.

The LIVING is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11; net income, £717; patrons, the Dean and Canons of Windsor; impropiator, H. Pownall, Esq. The church, rebuilt in 1714, is a neat structure of brick, ornamented with stone, of the Doric order, with an ancient embattled tower of the 11th century: in the interior is a monument to the memory of Pope, erected by Bishop Warburton; and another to Mrs. Clive, the actress. Midway between Twickenham and Richmond is a chapel of ease, erected about 1721. A district church on the common, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, and in the patronage of the Bishop of London, of which the first stone was laid August 31st, 1840, was consecrated in July, 1841; it was built and endowed by subscription, and is in the early English style, and an interesting specimen of a village church. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans; also a national school formed in 1809, by the union of three schools, and the appropriation of some endowments belonging to them, amounting to £133 per annum. Six boys and one girl of this parish are eligible for instruction and apprenticeship, or to be put to service, on the foundation of John and Frances West, who conveyed estates in trust to the Governors of Christ's Hospital for that purpose; £20 being paid with each boy, and £5 with each girl.

TWIGMOOR, a hamlet, in the parish of MANTON, union of GLANDFORD-BRIGG, E. division of the wapentake of MANLEY, parts of LINDSEY, county of LIN-COLN, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Glandford-Brigg; containing 45 inhabitants.

TWIGWORTH, a hamlet, in the parish of St. CATHERINE, GLOUCESTER, Upper division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S-BARTON, union, and E. division of the county, of GLOUCESTER, 2 miles (N. N. E.) from Gloucester; containing 136 inhabitants, and comprising 400 acres. In 1841 a grant of £100 was made by the Incorporated Society, towards building a church at this place, to contain 210 sittings.

TWINEHAM (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of CUCKFIELD, hundred of BUTTINGHILL, rape of LEWES, E. division of SUSSEX, 5 miles (S. W.) from Cuckfield; containing 358 inhabitants. The road from London to Brighton, by way of Hickstead, runs through the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 15. 5., and in the gift of Sir C. F. Goring, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £400; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 3 acres.

TWINING (St. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish, in the union of TEWKESBURY, Lower division of the hundred of KIFTS GATE, though locally in the Lower division of that of TEWKESBURY, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 2 miles (N. by E.) from Tewkesbury; containing 970 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3155 acres, of which 427 are common or waste; it is separated from Worcestershire by the navigable river Avon, across which is a ferry; and the Worcester and Gloucester road runs through it, near the northern boundary. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 9. 7.; net income, £127; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford. The church exhibits portions in the Norman style. Numerous Roman coins have been found in the neighbourhood.

TWINSTEAD, a parish, in the union of SUDBURY, hundred of HINCKFORD, N. division of ESSEX, 5 miles (N. E. by N.) from Halstead; containing 196 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1038a. 3r. 14p., of which about 824 acres are arable, and the remainder chiefly pasture; the situation is pleasant, the surface pleasingly diversified, and the soil fertile. Twinstead Hall, the ancient manor-house, has been partly modernised, but retains much of its original character, and part of the moat by which it was surrounded, and the old bridge across it, are still remaining. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6, and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £250. The church, originally a small edifice, has been rebuilt.

TWISTON, a township, in the parish of WHALLEY, union of CLITHEROE, Higher division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, N. division of the county of LANCAS-TER, 5 miles (E. N. E.) from Clitheroe; containing 199 inhabitants.

TWITCHEN (St. PETER), a parish, in the union and hundred of SOUTH MOLTON, South Molton and N. divisions of DEVON, 6 miles (N. E. by E.) from South Molton; containing 194 inhabitants. This place is situated on the border of the county, adjacent to Ex-moor Forest, in Somerset, and comprises 2823 acres, of which 310 are common or waste: there are several stone quarries, the material of which is used for ordinary buildings. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of North-Molton: the tithes have been commuted for £210. 17. 6. The church is ancient.

TWIVERTON (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of BATH, hundred of WELLOW, E. division of SOMER-SET, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (W. S. W.) from Bath; containing 3342 inhabitants. The river Avon runs through the parish, and turns several mills; and the Great Western railway passes in a nearly parallel direction. The living is a discharged vicarage, endowed with a portion of the rectorial tithes, and valued in the king's books at £5. 18. $1\frac{1}{2}$.; patrons, the Provost and Fellows of Oriel College, Ox-ford; impropiator of the remainder of the rectorial tithes, G. Langton, Esq. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £82. 10., and the vicarial for £251. 6.; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains $51\frac{1}{4}$ acres. The church has been enlarged. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

TWIZELL, a township, in the parish of NORHAM, union of BERWICK-UPON-TWEED, county of DURHAM, though locally to the northward, and for electoral purposes annexed to the N. division, of NORTHUMBERLAND, 10 miles (S. W.) from Berwick; containing 336 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Till, which is here crossed by a stone bridge of one arch, 91 feet in the span. Twizell Castle, a fine though unfinished castel-lated mansion of the Blakes, is seated on a rocky preci-pice, surrounded by scenery extremely picturesque; and near it is Tillmouth House, the present residence of the family, a member of which was the celebrated Admiral Blake, who died in 1657. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £63. 18. 3., and the appropriate for £400. 9. 4. payable to the Dean and Chapter of Durham. In the neighbourhood are the remains of an ancient chapel dedicated to St. Cuthbert.

TWIZELL, a township, in the parish of MORPETH, union and W. division of CASTLE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Morpeth; containing 45 inhabitants. The township is situ-ated on the east bank of the Blyth, where that river begins to run southward towards Kirkley; and on the boundary between Morpeth and Ponteland parishes. Twizell formed part of the ancient barony of Ogle: the present owner is the Rev. John Savile Ogle, of Kirkley Hall.

TWYCROSS (St. JAMES), a parish, in the union of MARKET-BOSWORTH, hundred of SPARKENHOE, S. divi-sion of the county of LEICESTER, 6 miles (N. E. by N.) from Atherstone; containing 336 inhabitants. It is situated on the road between Ashby-de-la-Zouch and Atherstone, and comprises 1514a. 3r. 16p. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Orton-on-the-Hill: the glebe consists of $3\frac{1}{4}$ acres. The church was erected in the 14th century, and consists of a nave, chancel, and north aisle, with a square embattled tower; the east window is ornamented with stained glass of the 13th century, lately presented by Sir Wathen Waller, Bart. The great south window contains the arms of several members of the Curzon family, with those of the Bishop of Oxford, and of the present incumbent, executed by Willement, who also presented the arms of William IV. impaled with those of Queen Adelaide; and a fine-toned organ has been erected at the cost of Earl Howe, who has lately expended a considerable sum in repairing the church. There is a parochial school, mainly sup-ported by the earl, and the mistress receives £16. 13. yearly, as a share of the interest of £1000 left in 1765, for instruction.

TWYFORD, a chapelry, in the parish of HURST, partly in the hundreds of CHARLTON and SONNING, county of BERKS, and partly in that of AMESBURY, S. division of WILTS, 8 miles (S. W.) from Maidenhead. A battle was fought near this place in 1688, between the partisans of James II. and those of the Prince of Orange, afterwards William III. The village, which is neatly built and populously inhabited, is situated on the Bath and Bristol road, by which it is divided into two parts, one in the county of Berks and the other in that of Wilts; the river Thames flows at a short distance, and the Great Western railway passes close by it. Silk-throwing is extensively carried on; and a fair for horses and other cattle is held on the 15th of July, but is very indifferently attended. The chapel, dedicated to St. Swithin, was erected, and endowed with £30 per annum, by Edward Polehampton, who died in 1721: the living is a donative, in the patronage of three Trustees. There is a place of worship for Independents. Mr. Polehampton, in 1721, also bequeathed a rent-charge of £10, with a dwelling-house for the master, to teach ten boys; and there is an hospital founded in 1640, by Lady Frances Winchcombe, for eight single women.

TWYFORD (St. MARY), a parish, in the union, hundred, and county of BUCKINGHAM, 6 miles (S. W. by S.) from Buckingham; containing, with the hamlets of Charndon and Poundon, 754 inhabitants, of whom 452 are in Twyford township. The parish is situated on a branch of the river Ouse, and comprises about 4500 acres by admeasurement, of which 200 are woodland, and of the remainder one-fifth arable, and four-fifths pasture and meadow; the soil is chiefly a heavy clay. The living is a rectory not in charge, annexed to the rectory of Lincoln College, Oxford; net income, £725. The tithes were commuted for land in 1774, and there is a glebe-house. The church is in the later English style, and contains 400 sittings, of which 250 are free.

TWYFORD, a chapelry, in the parish of BARROW, union of BURTON-UPON-TRENT, hundred of APPLETREE, S. division of the county of DERBY, 5 miles (S. S. W.) from Derby; containing, with the township of Stenson, 250 inhabitants. It is situated on the banks of the Trent, and comprises 1600 acres; the Trent and Mersey canal passes in the vicinity, and there is a station on the line of the Derby and Birmingham railway at Wilmington, two miles distant. The chapel, dedicated to St. Andrew, is a brick edifice, with the exception of the chancel, which is very ancient, and entered by a Norman arch. John Harpur and others, in 1696, bequeathed a rent-charge of £15, for teaching and apprenticing children.

TWYFORD (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of MELTON-MOWBRAY, hundred of EAST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, 6½ miles (S. by W.) from Melton-Mowbray; containing, with the chapelry of Thorpe-Satchville, 478 inhabitants, of whom 325 are in Twyford township. The living is a discharged vicarage, united to that of Hungerton in 1732, and valued in the king's books at £8. 8. 6. The sum of £14 per annum, a portion of Woollaston's charity at Whitchurch, is distributed in clothing among the poor.

TWYFORD, a hamlet, in the parish of COLSTERWORTH, union of GRANTHAM, hundred of BELTISLOE, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, ¾ of a mile (S.) from Colsterworth; containing 125 inhabitants, TWYFORD, an extra-parochial liberty, in the union of KENSINGTON, Kensington division of the hundred of OSSLUSTONE, county of MIDDLESEX, 6 miles (W. N. W.) from London; containing 27 inhabitants. Near this place, the London and Birmingham railway is carried over the valley of the Brent by a viaduct 30 feet wide, resting upon a river arch of 60 feet span, and 6 semi-circular land arches of 16 feet span each. There is a private chapel at Twyford Abbey.

TWYFORD (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of MITFORD and LAUNDITCH, hundred of EYNSFORD, E. division of NORFOLK, 1 mile (S. E.) from Guist; containing 94 inhabitants. The parish comprises 529a. 1r. 19p., of which 370 acres are arable, 131 meadow and pasture, 24 woodland, and 4 road and water; the river Wensum forms part of the western boundary. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 19. 9½., and in the gift of the Rev. John Spurgeon: the tithes have been commuted for £151, and the glebe comprises 11 acres. The church, which is beautifully situated in the grounds of Twyford Hall, is in the early English style, with a square embattled tower on the south side.

TWYFORD (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of NEW WINCHESTER, hundred of FAWLEY, Winchester and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 3 miles (S.) from Winchester; containing 1311 inhabitants. The parish comprises 4219a. 2r., of which 2208 acres are arable, 278 pasture, 291 coppice, 285 water-mead, and the remainder common, road, &c. The river Itchin and the Itchin navigation run through the parish, near the former of which are two immense Druidical stones; and the London and South-Western railway passes close to the place, on the west. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12. 12. 8½., and in the patronage of Lady Mildmay, on the nomination of Emanuel College, Cambridge; net income, £213; improPRIATORS, the Governors of the Hospital of St. Cross. In the churchyard is an extraordinary yew-tree. There was formerly a Roman Catholic seminary, in which the celebrated poet, Alexander Pope, received part of his education.

TWYWELL (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of THRAPSTONE, hundred of HUXLOE, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 3 miles (W. by S.) from Thrapstone; containing 232 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Wellingborough to Thrapstone and Oundle, and comprises 928a. 12p.: the river Nene passes at a small distance on the east. Machine-making is carried on. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9, and in the gift of the incumbent, the Rev. W. Alington: the tithes were commuted for land in 1765; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 250 acres, valued at £350 per annum. Mrs. Chapone, authoress of Letters on the Improvement of the Mind, and other works, was a native of the place.

TYDD (St. GILES), a parish, in the union and hundred of WISBECH, ISLE of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, 5½ miles (N. W. by N.) from Wisbech; containing 863 inhabitants. The Bedford Level canal, which is 100 feet wide and 30 feet deep, passes through the centre of the parish, by the construction of which many acres of fenny land, belonging to the Duke of Bedford, have been rendered arable. Woad for dyeing cloth is prepared here. The living is a rectory, in the patronage of the Bishop of Ely, valued in the king's books at £21. 13. 1½; net income, £653. The church and steeple are widely detached, probably in consequence of the percolating soil. There is a place of worship for Independents.

TYDD (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of HOLBECH, wapentake of ELLOE, parts of HOLLAND, county of LINCOLN, 6 miles (N. by W.) from Wisbech; containing 920 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the east by the river Nene, and comprises by admeasurement 4645 acres: the village is the last in the southern extremity of the county, and joins the Isle of Ely. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £17. 6. 5½, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £1255; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 55 acres. William Medley, in the reign of Elizabeth, left 50 acres of land for the poor, the proceeds of which amount to £150 a year. Nicholas Breakspear, who was raised to the papal dignity as Adrian IV., was rector of the parish.

TYLDERSLEY, or TILDESLEY CUM SHAKERLEY (St. George), a parochial district, in the union of LEIGH, hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 10 miles (W. by N.) from Manchester; containing 4718 inhabitants. In 1827, the township of Tyl- dersley was separated from Leigh, and erected into a distinct parish as regards ecclesiastical affairs; it comprises 2700 acres, of which 300 are arable, 800 meadow, 10 woodland, and the remainder pasture. Cotton-spinning affords employment to about 1000 persons, and the remainder of the labouring class are employed in weaving, in agriculture, and in neighbouring collieries, which are very considerable. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £135; patron, Lord Lilford. The church was erected in 1825, by the Commissioners for Building Churches, at an expense of more than £12,000, and will accommodate 2000 persons; it is a chaste and handsome structure, designed by Smirke, in the later English style, with a spire rising to the height of 150 feet, and was consecrated in September 1825. The site was presented by the late Thomas Johnson, Esq.; the munificence of George Ormerod, Esq., supplied the inclosure of the cemetery, a peal of bells, three beautifully painted windows, an organ, &c.; and the communion plate was the gift of Mrs. Ormerod. There are places of worship for the Connexion of the Countess of Huntingdon, and Wesleyans. Of the several antique mansions in the neighbourhood, there are considerable remains of Dam House, a very old brick building, with bay windows and gables; and, near it, the ruins of another, still more ancient.

TYNEHAM (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of WAREHAM and PURBECK, hundred of HASILOR, Wareham division of DORSET, 6 miles (S. S. W.) from Wareham; containing 250 inhabitants. This parish, bounded on the south by the English Channel, is situated at the western extremity of the Isle of Purbeck, and comprises 2840 acres, of which 1193 are common or waste: limestone is abundant, though not much quarried, and there are good veins of Purbeck marble and some gypsum, but neither worked. On the coast is a circular battery, for the defence of Worbarrow bay. The living is a rectory, united, by an act passed in the 8th of George I., to that of Steeple, and valued in the king's books at £11. 0. 10.: the tithes have been commuted for £210, and the glebe consists of 25 acres. The church is a small cruciform structure, with a campanile turret rising at the intersection; the south side has lately been rebuilt, and the south transept added, at the expense of the Rev. William Bond. There was formerly a chapel at Povington, in the parish; and another, dedicated to St. Margaret, at North Egleston. Here was an alien priory subordinate to the abbey of Bec, in Normandy, which, at the suppression, was given by Henry VI. to St. Anthony's hospital, London; by Edward IV. to Eton College, and afterwards to the Dean and Prebendaries of Westminster. Flowers-barrow, an ancient encampment, is situated in the parish; and a large mound, a little to the west of the church, was recently found to contain several skeletons, of which some were in a very perfect state, and at the head of one of them was a small urn of black unbaked clay. The bold escarpment of the rocks which bound one side of the parish, presents highly interesting portions to the geologist, abounding in organic remains.

TYNEMOUTH (St. Oswin), a parish, newly-enfranchised borough, and the head of a union, in the E. division of CASTLE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 8½ miles (E. N. E.) from Newcastle; comprising the townships of Chirton, Cullercoates, Monkseaton, Murton, Preston, North Shields, and Whitley; and containing 27,249 inhabitants, of whom

Seal and Arms.

11,890 are in Tynemouth township. This place derives its name from its situation at the mouth of the river Tyne; its fortress was by the Saxons called Penbal Crag, or the head of the rampart on the rock. From a votive altar dedicated to Jupiter by Ælius Rufus, præfect of the 4th cohort of the Lingones, and a tablet inscribed with the name of Caius Julius Maximianus as the founder of a temple, which were discovered here in 1783, it is supposed to have been the site of a Roman station. The truth of this opinion, however, so far from being corroborated by any collateral evidence, is rather contradicted by the strong probability that these relics of Roman antiquity were, together with other materials for building, removed from South Shields on the opposite bank of the river, for the first monastery of stone at this place. The earliest authentic record connected with the history of Tynemouth, relates to the erection of a small church and convent of wood by Edwin, King of Northumbria, about the year 625, in which his daughter, Rosella, assumed the veil, and which, in 634, was rebuilt with stone by his successor, Oswald, by whom it was dedicated to St. Mary. This establishment was repeatedly plundered and destroyed by the Danes during the eighth century, and in 833, a party of those invaders attempting to land, were defeated and driven back to their ships; but, returning frequently during that and the following centuries, and renewing their depredations, it was finally destroyed. The monastery was subsequently rebuilt from its foundation by Tosti, Earl of Northumberland, who endowed it with considerable revenues; and in 1074 it was given, with all its possessions, by his successor Waltheof, to the monastery of Jarrow, and with that institution became subordinate to the abbey of Durham, from which, in 1090, it was taken by Robert de Mowbray, Earl of Northumberland, who amply endowed it for Benedictine monks, whom he brought from the abbey of St. Alban's, in the county of Hertford, and made it a cell to that monastery. In 1094 Malcolm III., King of Scotland, and his son, Prince Edward, both killed at the siege of Alnwick Castle on the same day, were interred in the monastery, which had obtained a high degree of reputation for its sanctity, and become a place of sepulture for the most illustrious families. In 1095, Earl Mowbray, entering into a conspiracy against William Rufus, converted the monastery into a castle, which he strongly fortified; but after a siege of two months it was taken by storm, and Mowbray, making his escape by stealth, took refuge at Bambrough Castle; yet not thinking himself safe, he fled for sanctuary into the church of Tynemouth, whence he was dragged out by force, and sent prisoner to London. William Rufus confirmed to St. Alban's abbey the grant of the priory of Tynemouth, with all its possessions, which, in 1121, the monks of Durham made an unsuccessful attempt to recover; and in 1138, David, King of Scotland, who then occupied Newcastle with his army, issued a charter, dated at Norham, granting security and protection to the prior and monks, to whom also, in 1189, Richard I. gave several privileges and immunities; and King John, in 1205, exempted them from the duty of cornage.

In 1244, a peace was concluded between the King of England and the King of Scotland, through the mediation of the prior, to whom, in 1271, Henry III. granted a charter of liberties and free customs; and in 1296 the prior commenced the construction of a harbour in the vicinity with a view to establish a port. In this, however, he was opposed by the burgesses of Newcastle, who, claiming an exclusive right to the trade of the Tyne, commenced a suit in the court of king's bench, which was subsequently decided against the prior in the house of lords. In 1298, Edward I., after his victory over the Scots, remained for some time at the priory of Tynemouth, and in the year following conferred upon the prior the privilege of holding all pleas, including those of the crown, by his own justices, who had paramount jurisdiction within his liberty. In 1303, while Edward I. was on his last expedition into Scotland, his queen resided at the priory till his return; and in 1307, the prior, in pursuance of the privilege granted by that monarch, caused a pillory to be erected in the village of Tynemouth. Charters of privilege were also granted by Edward II. in 1316; and in the following year Sir William de Middleton and Walter de Seleby, who, at the head of a fanatic band, had committed depredations on the priory, were taken prisoners, and sent to London, where they were executed. In 1322, the queen of Edward II. resided here for some time. In 1347, the prior gave to Edward III. a loan of 20 marks towards the preparations for the siege of Calais; and in 1379, Richard II. granted to this establishment license to hold certain possessions to the amount of £20 per annum, in order to repair the fortifications of the priory, which at that time was regarded as an important fortress for the protection of the river Tyne, and for the defence of the country against the king's enemies. In 1361, some monks of St. Alban's abbey, who had been concerned in the insurrection of Wat Tyler, made their escape to this place, where they took sanctuary in the church of the priory; and in 1391, Thomas of Woodstock, Duke of Gloucester, and youngest son of Edward III., spent some days at the priory, which continued to flourish till the Dissolution, when it was surrendered, on the 12th January 1539 (30th Henry VIII.), by Robert Blakeney, the last prior, who received a pension of £80, and 15 monks and three novices were allowed smaller pensions. The priory, at the time, was in possession of various manors and lands in the county of Northumberland, and of others in the county of Durham, and its revenue was returned at £706. 10. 8½.: the site and remains were granted by Edward VI., in 1550, to John Dudley, Earl of Warwick, created Duke of Northumberland in the succeeding year, on whose attainder they reverted to the crown; the church continued to be parochial until 1657, when the roof fell in and the building became a ruin. The fortifications and other military works were kept in repair, and the priory has since been regarded solely as a CASTLE or royal garrison, of which, in 1559, Sir Henry Percy was appointed governor by Queen Elizabeth.

In 1633, Charles I. visited the castle, which, on the breaking out of the parliamentary war, was put into a complete state of defence, in 1642, by the Earl of Newcastle, who sent a garrison of 300 men and six large pieces of cannon for its defence; trenches were thrown up, and an additional fort was erected at the mouth of the haven. In 1644, the castle was besieged by the Scottish forces under General Leven, to whom, after some time, it surrendered upon terms, the garrison being allowed to march out with all their baggage, upon a stipulation of their paying obedience to the decrees of the parliament. During this siege, the garrison had suffered severely from the plague, which was then ravaging the country, and most of the principal commanders had been obliged to retire from their post. In 1646, the castle was garrisoned by the Scottish troops, by whom it was delivered, in 1647, to the parliament, who appointed Sir Arthur Haslerigg governor of Newcastle, and Colonel Lilburn his deputy, governor of Tynemouth. Lilburn soon after declaring for the king, continued for some time to hold possession of the castle, but being besieged by Sir Arthur Haslerigg, it was taken by storm, and the garrison put to the sword; the head was struck off from the dead body of Lilburn and fixed upon a pole, and the castle was placed by Haslerigg under the custody of General Monk. In 1665, the town council of Newcastle, upon application by letter from Charles II., voted the sum of £200 to put the castle in a state of repair, and for strengthening the fortifications on the eve of a Dutch war, and for protecting the trade of the river Tyne; the castle was, in 1783, resumed by the government, and has since that time been appropriated as a dépôt for arms and military stores, under the superintendance of a governor and lieutenant-governor.

The venerable remains of the priory and castle are romantically situated on the summit of a peninsular rock near the mouth of the Tyne, rising abruptly from the river with precipitous and towering grandeur; the approach from the west is by a square gateway tower with exploratory turrets at the angles, beyond which is a second gateway defended by a portcullis, connected with the former by a strong wall on each side, inclosing an interval of about six paces square, and leading into an open area of nearly seven acres, in which are the strikingly impressive and beautiful ruins of the ancient priory. These splendid remains consist principally of the eastern portion of the church, of which the east and south walls of the choir, though roofless, are still in tolerable preservation; the deeply-recessed and richly-moulded archway leading to the cloisters, of which some portions elaborately groined are yet remaining; and various parts of the conventual buildings, now converted to other uses. The remaining portion of the choir of this once stately and magnificent structure, which appears to have been of the later and richest character of the Norman style of architecture, passing into that of the early English, displays much grandeur of design and elaborate richness of embellishment. The east wall is perforated in the lower portion by a noble range of three lofty lancet-shaped windows with deep receding mouldings, of which the central window is of greater elevation than the others; above these is a series of smaller windows of similar character, with the exception of the central window, which is of an oval form; and in the centre of the gable, which is enriched on each side with a series of pointed arches of increasing height, is a triple lancet window, of which only the central compartment is open. The south wall is perforated also with three tiers of windows, of which the lowest, though of similar character, are less lofty than those of the east end, and are surmounted by a range of three lancet-formed windows, above which are two circular-headed windows of greater width. The interior abounds with details of the most impressive beauty: the lofty, clustered, and banded columns which sustained the roof, are richly embellished with flowered capitals, and from the stateliness of their elevation between the deeply-recessed and intricately-moulded arches of the lofty windows, convey a striking memorial of the magnificence of this venerable pile. The cloisters were the ancient place of sepulture; the present cemetery of the parishioners was the prior's garden. The gateway tower has been converted into barracks for 250 soldiers; at the eastern end of the garrison yard is a light-house, defended by a double wall extending towards the sea, which displays a revolving light to guide vessels into the harbour; and to the south of the priory church is a haven formed by the prior after his attempt to establish a trading port on the Tyne had been frustrated by the opposition of the burgesses of Newcastle.

The village adjoins the town of North Shields, of which it may be almost considered as a continuation, and consists of one principal and spacious street, in which are several handsome houses, and of a smaller street in nearly a parallel direction; it is much frequented during the bathing season by visitors, for whose accommodation there are several good inns. A gas company has been recently established. In the immediate neighbourhood is a fine beach of sand, affording every facility for bathing, and at Prior's Haven are some well-arranged baths, erected in 1807; the Bath hotel, built in 1842 by Mr. Bartleman, presents every convenience, and is connected by a passage with the old Bath inn. The haven is sheltered by an amphitheatre of rocks, and the surrounding scenery abounds with interesting features. At the extremity of a beach called the Long Sand, about a mile to the north of the village is the hamlet of Cullercoates, anciently Caller Cots, where is a chalybeate spring, of which the water has been analysed by Dr. Greenhow, and found in its properties to resemble the Tonbridge water. It is much resorted to by persons labouring under dyspepsia and other complaints, in which it is found beneficial; the spring is received into a stone basin, beyond which it finds a channel through the sands into the sea. Fairs for cattle are held on the 1st March, and 1st November, or on the last Friday in April, and the first Friday in November. The place was erected into a borough, with the privilege of returning one member to parliament under the provisions of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, by which the elective franchise is vested in the resident £10 householders of the townships of Tynemouth, North Shields, Chirton, Preston, and Cullercoates, comprising an area of 4754 acres, with a population of 25,808; the returning officer is appointed by the sheriff. The house of correction here has been recently enlarged.

The parish, which occupies the south-eastern portion of the county, locally termed Tynemouthshire, is about $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, from north to south, and about 3 miles in extreme breadth; it is bounded on the south by the river Tyne, and on the east by the German Sea, and comprises 5915 acres, of which 1300, previously tracts of moorland, were inclosed by acts of parliament in the reign of George III., and have been divided and brought into cultivation. The surface, though generally level, is in some parts elevated, and the soil is strong and fertile, and well adapted for wheat and beans; the district abounds with coal; ironstone is found in moderate quantity, and there are some strata of magnesian limestone, which scarcely occurs in other parts of the county. The LIVING is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £24. 19. 4., and in the patronage of the Duke of Northumberland, with a net income of £298; impropiators, the duke, and the guardians of the poor. The church, situated in North Shields, was erected in 1668, and consecrated by Bishop Cosins, after the conventual church of the priory had fallen into decay; it was built of brick, with a tower of stone, and almost entirely rebuilt of stone in 1792, and is now a neat edifice, containing 1800 sittings. A church dedicated to the Holy Saviour, was erected, at a cost of £2500, by subscription, aided by grants from the Church Building and Diocesan Societies, and was consecrated in August 1841, by the Bishop of Durham. It is a handsome cruciform structure of stone, in the later English style, with a tower surmounted by a spire, and contains 700 sittings, of which 350 are free; it is endowed with £700, and the vicar of Tynemouth officiates, assisted by a curate. The Wesleyans have a meeting-house; and at Cullercoates and in North Shields are places of worship for various denominations, and also at the latter several schools. Mr. George Crawford, of King's Langley, bequeathed, in 1811, £700 three per cent. consols., with which £420 five per cent. annuities have been purchased, producing a dividend of £17. 12. 9., for distribution among the poor; and Sir Mark Milbanke, of Halnaby, in the county of York, gave a moiety of the corn tithes, now yielding from £70 to £80 per annum, to the poor. The union of Tynemouth comprises 25 parishes or townships, containing a population of 55,625 persons.—See SHIELDS, NORTH.

TYRLEY.—See BLOORE-IN-TYRLEY.

TYRRINGHAM (St. PETER), with FILGROVE, a parish, in the union of NEWPORT-PAGNELL, hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Newport-Pagnell; containing 206 inhabitants, of whom 31 are in Tyrtingham. The living is a rectory, with that of Filgrove united, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of William Praed, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £450; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 15 $\frac{3}{4}$ acres.

TYSOE (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of SHIPSTON-UPON-STOUR, Kington division of the hundred of KINGTON, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 5 miles (S. by E.) from Kington; containing 1033 inhabitants. It is situated on the border of Oxfordshire, and intersected by the road between Stratford and Banbury, and comprises 4680 acres. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the rectory of Compton-Wyniates united, valued in the king's books at £10; net income, £266; patron, the Marquess of Northampton, who receives the tithes of Compton-Wyniates in consideration of £50 per annum paid to the incumbent; impropriators of Tysoe, several proprietors of land. The tithes were commuted for land and money payments in 1796. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Thirty-six boys are educated for £26 per annum, arising from property bequeathed to the parish in 1541, by John Middleton and Edward Richards.

TYTHBY (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union, and S. division of the wapentake, of BINGHAM, S. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 9 miles (E. S. E.) from Nottingham; containing, with the chapelry of Cropwell-Butler, 804 inhabitants. This parish, which is pleasantly situated at the western extremity of the vale of Belvoir, comprises 2367*a. 1r. 28p.*, and is intersected by the Grantham canal, in the south-west portion of it, where it is also crossed by the Fosse road. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £102; patron and impropriator, J. Musters, Esq.: the incumbent's tithes were commuted for 31 acres of land in 1788. The church, thoroughly repaired and repewed in 1824, contains a monument to a member of the ancient family of Chaworth, dated 1423. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a school in connexion with the Established Church is endowed with the interest of £300.

TYTHERINGTON, a township, in the parish of PRESTBURY, union and hundred of MACCLESFIELD, N. division of the county of CHESTER, 1 mile (N.) from Macclesfield; containing 389 inhabitants. The Macclesfield branch of the Manchester and Birmingham railway passes through the township.

TYTHERINGTON (St. JAMES), a parish, in the union of THORNBURY, partly in the Upper division of the hundred of HENBURY, but chiefly in the Lower division of that of THORNBURY, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 3 miles (S. E.) from Thornbury; containing 496 inhabitants, of whom 347 are in the township. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 11. 7., and in the gift of the impropriator, T. Hardwick, Esq.: the great tithes have been commuted for £440, and the vicarial for £309; the glebe contains 61 acres.

TYTHERINGTON (St. JAMES), a parish, in the union of WARMINSTER, hundred of HEYTESBURY, Warminster and S. divisions of WILTS, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Warminster; containing 119 inhabitants. This place forms the corps of a prebend in the Collegiate Church of Heytesbury, and the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Dean of Salisbury, as Dean of Heytesbury.

TYTHERLEY or TUDERLEY, EAST (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of STOCKBRIDGE, hundred of THORNGATE, Romsey and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 7 miles (S. W.) from Stockbridge; containing 335 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2275*a. 17p.*; and a variety of trees of remarkably luxuriant growth ornaments the locality, consisting of oaks, firs, elms, cedars, and very ancient yews, some of which are disposed in double rows, and form beautiful avenues. The living is a donative; net income, £40; patron and impropriator, J. L. Goldsmid, Esq. The church, a plain ancient edifice, with lancet windows, contains a monument to the Giffords, dated 1568; in the chancel are memorials to several members of the family of Rolle, and a tombstone of a distinguished dignitary, and in the aisle are two effigies with full-length crosses, intended, as is supposed, to represent priests. Sarah Rolle, in 1736, conveyed lands, &c., in support of a schoolmaster and mistress, and the income is about £200 a year. Danebury Hill, in the parish, commands a view of some extensive mounds or barrows, thought to have been raised by the sepulture of ancient warriors; and near these barrows are traces of the Roman road from Winchester to Salisbury.

TYTHERLEY WEST, a parish, in the union of STOCKBRIDGE, hundred of THORNGATE, Romsey and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Stockbridge; containing 469 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2270*a. 15p.*, of which 1883 acres are woodland, and the remainder pasture and arable; the soil is clay, upon a substratum of chalk. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 5. 10., and in the gift of C. B. Wall, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £361; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 31 acres. The church was rebuilt by subscription in 1832-3, at a cost of £1744.

TYTHERTON-KELLAWAYS, a tything, in the parish of BREMILL, union and hundred of CHIPPENHAM, Chippenham and Calne, and N. divisions of WILTS, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Chippenham. An individual named Connicker having embraced the original doctrines of Whitefield and Wesley, erected a meeting-house at Tytherton, and propagated his opinions with great success; but on the schism between the two founders of Methodism, he joined the Moravians, and induced most of his followers to do the same. About thirty years ago, having grown more numerous, the society built a new chapel and sister-house, with a neat residence for their pastor; and since that period, they have erected a large school-house.

TYTHERTON-LUCAS, a chapelry, in the parish, union, and hundred of CHIPPENHAM, Chippenham and Calne, and N. divisions of WILTS, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Chippenham; containing 93 inhabitants.

TYTHERTON-STANLEY, with NETHERMORE, a tything, in the parish, union, and hundred of CHIPPENHAM, Chippenham and Calne, and N. divisions of WILTS, 2 miles (E. by S.) from Chippenham.

TYWARDRETH (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of ST. AUSTELL, E. division of the hundred of POWDER and of the county of CORNWALL, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Fowey; containing 3152 inhabitants, of whom 1100 are in the town. The parish is bounded on the south by the English Channel, near which, on Greber Head, is a signal station. Petty-sessions for the district are held on the third Monday in every month. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 6. 8.; net income, £135; patron, W. Rashleigh, Esq.: the great tithes have been commuted for £400. The church has been repewed; and a chapel has been erected by Mr. Rashleigh, about half a mile from his seat here, Menabilly House. The Wesleyans have a place of worship. There was formerly a Benedictine priory, a cell to the monastery of St. Sergius and St. Bacchus, in Normandy, supposed to have been founded before 1169, by Ricardus Dapifer, steward of the household of the Earl of Cornwall; it was dedicated to St. Andrew, and continued till the general dissolution, when its revenue was estimated at £151. 16. 1. The site is now occupied by a farm-house.

U

UBBERLEY, a township, in the parish and union of STOKE-UPON-TRENT, N. division of the hundred of PIREHILL and of the county of STAFFORD; containing 215 inhabitants.

UBBESTON (St. Peter), a parish, in the union and hundred of BLYTHING, E. division of SUFFOLK, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Halesworth; containing 243 inhabitants. The parish is watered by the river Blyth, and comprises by measurement 1200 acres, whereof the soil is of a mixed quality, rather heavy than otherwise, and the surface more hilly than in the adjoining parishes. Ubbeston Hall, now a farm-house, was formerly the residence of the Kemp family, but was sold on the death of Sir Robert Kemp in 1780, without issue. The living is a discharged vicarage, endowed with the rectorial tithes, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the gift of the Rev. Edmund Holland: the tithes have been commuted for £315, and the glebe comprises $6\frac{3}{4}$ acres. The church, which is chiefly in the later English style, has an embattled tower, and a fine Norman arched doorway on the north side.

UBLEY, or OBLEIGH (St. Bartholomew), a parish, in the union of CLUTON, hundred of CHEWTON, E. division of SOMERSET, 9 miles (N. by W.) from Wells; containing 369 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 11. $5\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £194, and the glebe comprises 70 acres. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

UCKERBY, a township, in the parish of CATTERICK, union of RICHMOND, wapentake of GILLING-EAST, N. riding of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Catterick; containing 40 inhabitants. It comprises 740 acres, the property of the Earl of Tyrconnel, who is lord of the manor. St. Cuthbert's well here, is supposed to derive its name from a monastery dedicated to St. Cuthbert, but of which no traces remain; the water is said to be useful in the cure of cutaneous diseases and rheumatism. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £59, and the vicarial for £30. 10.

UCKFIELD (Holy Cross), a market-town, parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of LOXFIELD-DORSET, rape of PEVENSEY, E. division of SUSSEX, 8 miles (N. E. by N.) from Lewes; containing 1534 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the west by the river Ouse, and comprises 1636a. 2r. 37p., of which about 70 acres are under the cultivation of hops, and 40 are roads, sites of buildings and waste; the scenery is exceedingly picturesque, and the air of the neighbourhood salubrious. The village is situated on an eminence, on the road from Lewes to London and to Tonbridge-Wells, and contains several good houses. Petty-sessions are held every Friday in the winter, and every alternate Friday during the summer, in a large room at the Maidenhead hotel, where occasional assemblies take place in a handsome ball-room. There is a market for corn on Friday; and cattle-fairs occur on May 14th and August 29th. The living is annexed to the rectory of Buxted, and the rector's tithes have been commuted for £315. The church is principally in the pointed style; the nave was rebuilt in 1840, by subscription, and there are 900 sittings, of which about 500 are free; a spire has been added to the tower. The Baptists and Wesleyans have places of worship. Dr. Anthony Saunders, in 1719, left a school-house and land, now producing £70 per annum, in trust for the establishment of a free grammar school for six boys of this parish, and six of Buxted, and also gave his library for the use of the school; the residue of the rent is applied in apprenticing boys of Buxted. The poor law union of Uckfield comprises 11 parishes or places, containing a population of 16,447: the workhouse, situated on elevated ground, was erected in 1839. In a house once occupied by Bishop Christopherson, confessor to Queen Mary, are massive rings and some vestiges of popery; in the grounds of R. S. Streathfield, Esq., are various curiously-formed rocks, hollowed into caves. Dr. Edward Daniel Clarke, the celebrated traveller, and librarian to the University of Cambridge, passed much of the early part of his life at Uckfield.

UCKINGTON, a chapelry, in the parish of ELMSTONE-HARDWICKE, union of CHELTENHAM, Lower division of the hundred of DEERHURST, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Cheltenham; containing 200 inhabitants, and comprising 852 acres.

UDIMORE (St. Mary), a parish, in the union and borough of RYE, hundred of GOSTROW, rape of HASTINGS, E. division of SUSSEX, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Rye; containing 483 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the south by Brede Channel, and situated on the road from Rye to Battle, comprises 1950 acres, whereof 990 are arable, 750 meadow, pasture, and marsh, and 210 woodland; the surface is undulated with hill and dale, and the scenery enriched with every kind of wood. The living is a perpetual curacy, valued in the king's books at £8. 5. 2.; net income, £100; patron and impropriator, the Earl of Burlington. The great tithes have been commuted for £400, and the glebe comprises 5 acres. The church is principally in the early English style.

UFFCULME (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of TIVERTON, hundred of BAMPTON, Cullompton and N. divisions of DEVON, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Cullompton; containing 2011 inhabitants. This is a decayed market-town, and during the last century a great quantity of serges was made here; there are still some flannels manufactured, and fairs are held on the Wednesday in Passion-week, June 29th, and the middle Wednesday in September. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £18. 0. $2\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Uffculme in the Cathedral of Salisbury, whose tithes here have been commuted for £427. 11., and the vicarial for £455. 16. The church has a rich wooden screen. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents; also a free grammar school founded in 1701, by Nicholas Ayshford, who gave £1200 for its erection and endowment, of which sum £400 were expended in building. Bradfield Hall, in the parish, is a perfect ancient mansion, containing several curious apartments, and to which a chapel was formerly attached. On a common in the neighbourhood is a place called Pixy Garden, an old earthwork.

UFFINGTON (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of FARRINGDON, hundred of SHRIVENHAM, county of BERKS, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Farringdon; containing, with the chapelries of Baulking and Wolstone, 1170 inhabitants, of whom 640 are in Uffington township. The parish comprises 6028*a. 1r. 13p.*, and is intersected by the Wilts and Berks canal and the Great Western railway. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £21; net income, £369; patron and impropiator, C. Eyre, Esq. The church is a handsome cruciform structure in the early English style; the spire was destroyed by lightning, about 1750. There are chapels of ease at Baulking and Wolstone. Thomas Saunders, in 1636, founded and endowed a free school, and the rents applied for its support amount to £40. On White Horse hill, just above the village, is Uffington Castle, a large encampment surrounded by a double vallum, the inner one very high; it is 700 feet from east to west, 500 from north to south, and is supposed to be a work of the Britons, afterwards occupied by the Romans. The hill takes its name from the rude figure of a horse, 374 feet in length, cut in the turf, near the summit, said to be commemorative of a victory which Alfred obtained over the Danes in the neighbourhood, though some consider it a British work; lands were formerly held here by cutting away the turf, to render the figure more visible. To the westward of Uffington Castle is a large tumulus or cromlech called Wayland Smith's cave; and there are various other tumuli scattered on the downs, particularly between Uffington and Lambourn, the most considerable of which are those called the Seven Barrows. Uffington gives the inferior title of Viscount to the Earl of Craven.

UFFINGTON (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of STAMFORD, wapentake of NESS, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, 2 miles (E. by N.) from Stamford; containing, with the hamlet of Casewick, 530 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Stamford to Boston, and considerable facilities of communication are afforded by the river Welland: stone is quarried for the roads. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £21. 5. $2\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £837; patron, the Earl of Lindsey, whose splendid mansion is in the parish. There is a glebe of 60 acres, with a house; and some land in Deeping fen also belongs to the rectory. The church is a handsome structure, partly in the early and partly in the later English style, with a fine tower and spire, and some fragments of ancient stained glass. A national school was endowed by Albemarle, the 9th earl of Lindsey, with £20 per annum; £10. 4., arising from various bequests, are distributed in money and bread, and from this fund a child is occasionally apprenticed. An hospital, or priory, of Augustine canons, in honour of the Virgin Mary, was founded in the reign of Henry III., or his predecessor, by William de Albin, and at the Dissolution had a revenue of £42. 1. 3.

UFFINGTON (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of ATCHAM, Wellington division of the hundred of SOUTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP, 3 miles (E. N. E.) from Shrewsbury; containing 163 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation 1180 acres; some small coal-mines were lately worked, and a hard quality of trapstone is quarried on Haghmond hill, for the repair of roads and for rough walls. The village is situated on the banks of the Severn, and on the road leading from High Ercall to the London road at Atcham; the Shrewsbury canal passes at the end of the village. The living is a perpetual curacy, with a net income of £59; the patronage and impropriation belong to Mrs. Corbett, and there is a small glebe-house and garden. The church is supposed to have been built about the 14th century. Here are the beautiful remains of the abbey of Haghmond.

UFFORD, a tything, in the parish, union, and hundred of CREDITON, Crediton and N. divisions of DEVON, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Crediton; containing 286 inhabitants.

UFFORD (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of STAMFORD, soke of PETERBOROUGH, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON; containing, with the hamlet of Ashton, 286 inhabitants, of which number 185 are in Ufford hamlet, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Stamford. The parish comprises 1866*a. 2r. 18p.*; the soil is various, and the meadow land rich; the surface is partly hilly, and, where level, is sometimes flooded by the river Welland, which runs through the parish. The Roman road from the station at Caistor, leading towards Lincoln, passes on the east. The living is a rectory, with Bainton annexed, valued in the king's books at £26. 13. 4.; net income, £688; patrons, the Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge. There is a glebe of 37 acres.

UFFORD (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of WOODBRIDGE, hundred of WILFORD, E. division of SUFFOLK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Woodbridge; containing 673 inhabitants. It comprises 1155*a. 2r. 29p.*; the general quality of the soil is light or mixed, but in some places clay; the surface is partly hilly, and the lands adjacent to the river Deben, which flows through the parish, are subject to inundation. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 5.; net income, £299; patron, F. C. Brooke, Esq., whose seat, Ufford Place, is in the parish. The church contains a font, with a curious cover, which has been engraved at the expense of the Society of Antiquaries. Here was anciently a chapel called Sogenho, of which there are no remains. An hospital for four men was founded by Thomas Wood, D.D., Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, who endowed it with £15 per annum. William Otley, lord mayor of London in 1434, was born here, and the earls of Suffolk took their name from the place.

UFTON, or UPTON-NERRET (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of BRADFIELD, hundred of THEALE, county of BERKS, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Reading; containing 391 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2029a. 3r. 8p., of which the soil is gravel, and the surface hilly: the river Kennet runs through it. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 3. $1\frac{1}{2}$; net income, £426; patrons, the Provost and Fellows of Oriol College, Oxford. There are slight remains of a church which belonged to Upton-Greys, once a distinct parish, but consolidated with this in 1442.

UFTON (St. Michael), a parish, in the union of SOUTHAM, Kenilworth division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, S. division of the county of WARWICK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Southam; containing 188 inhabitants. The parish is intersected by the road from Warwick to Daventry, and consists of 1539 acres. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the prebendary of Ufton in the Cathedral of Lichfield, with a net income of £80: the tithes have been commuted for two rent-charges, each of £190, payable to the prebendary, one ex parte Decani, and the other ex parte Cantoris; there are $92\frac{1}{2}$ acres of glebe.

UGBOROUGH, a parish, in the union of TOTNES, hundred of ERMINGTON, Ermington and Plympton, and S. divisions of DEVON, 8 miles (W. S. W.) from Totnes; containing 523 inhabitants. The parish is on the road from Plymouth to Exeter: a lead-mine at Filham is worked, and there are some quarries of slate and limestone. Fairs are held in May and November. The living is a discharged vicarage, endowed with a portion of the rectorial tithes, and valued in the king's books at £20; net income, £260; patrons, the Grocers' Company; impropriator of the remainder of the rectorial tithes, Lady Carew. There are 3 acres of glebe. The church is a handsome structure, standing upon a bold eminence, and is a striking feature in the scenery; it is in the early English style, and contains a Norman font, and some curious remains of ancient screenwork. At Ivybridge is a district church; and at Earlscombe was formerly a chapel. There is a place of worship for Baptists. Sir John Kempthorn, a distinguished admiral, was born at Widescomb, in the parish, in 1620.

UGGESHALL (St. Mary), a parish, in the union and hundred of BLYTHING, E. division of SUFFOLK, 1 mile (N. W.) from Wangford; containing 295 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 1466 acres, of which 20 are roads. The living is a rectory, with that of Sotherton annexed, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the gift of the Earl of Stradbroke: the tithes have been commuted for £380, and the glebe comprises 43 acres, with a commodious parsonage-house, much improved by the present rector, the Rev. Thomas Sheriffe. The church has a low square tower, enveloped with ivy.

UGGLEBARNBY, a chapelry, in the parish and union of WHITBY, liberty of WHITBY-STRAND, N. riding of YORK, 4 miles (S. S. W.) from Whitby; containing 448 inhabitants. UGGLEBARNBY belonged to Whitby abbey, and at the Dissolution came into the possession of the Archbishop of York. The lower grounds are rich and fertile, and the higher indifferent corn land; the small river Little Beck runs through the chapelry. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to that of Eskdale-side: the chapel was built in 1137, by Nicholas, abbot of Whitby.

UGLEY (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of BISHOP-STORTFORD, hundred of CLAVERING, N. division of ESSEX, 2 miles (N.) from Stansted-Mountfitchet; containing 381 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises by measurement 2020 acres, is pleasantly situated in the north-eastern portion of the hundred, and intersected by the road from London to Cambridge. Ugley Hall is an ancient mansion near the church; and Orford House, a handsome residence of brick, takes its name from the Earl of Orford, by whom it was built. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Berdon annexed, valued in the king's books at £14. 13. 4.; patrons and impropriators, the Governors of Christ's Hospital, London. The great tithes have been commuted for £360. 13., and the vicarial for £99. 8.; the glebes comprise 48 and 3 acres. The church is a small edifice, with a belfry turret surmounted by a cupola, and has, on the south side of the chancel, a chapel belonging to Bollington Hall.

UGTHORPE, a township, in the parish of LYTHE, union of WHITBY, E. division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, N. riding of YORK, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Whitby; containing 242 inhabitants. This was an ancient demesne of the crown, and is styled in Domesday book Ughetorp; the Mauleys became lords here at an early period, from whom the manor and estate descended by marriage to the Bigods, and afterwards to the Ratcliffes, and by these last the whole was sold in parcels. The place is situated in the western part of the parish, to the south of the road between Whitby and Guisborough. A Roman Catholic chapel was erected about 1812; and a school is partly supported by £10 per annum from a Roman Catholic fund.

ULCEBY (All Saints), a parish, in the union of SPILSBY, Wold division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 3 miles (S. W.) from Alford; containing, with the hamlet of Fordington, 204 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Alford to Boston, and comprises by measurement 1872 acres, of which 1530 acres are arable, 227 pasture, and 115 woodland; the soil rests upon a calcareous subsoil; the surface is undulated with hill and dale, and from the higher grounds is an expansive view of the German Ocean. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £19. 16. 8.; net income, £519; patron and incumbent, the Rev. J. Robinson: the tithes have been commuted for 457 acres of land. The church was rebuilt in 1826, and is a neat brick building, containing 150 sittings, of which 60 are free. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. The Bull's Head, a lofty hill in the parish, is a noted landmark.

ULCEBY (St. Nicholas), a parish, in the union of GLANDFORD-BRIGG, N. division of the wapentake of YARBOROUGH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Barton-upon-Humber; containing 787 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11. 18. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £146; impropriators, W. D. Field, Esq., and others. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1824.

ULCOMBE (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of HOLLINGBOURN, hundred of EYHORNE, lath of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, 8 miles (S. E. by E.) from Maidstone; containing 685 inhabitants. This parish, which lies partly in the Weald, is intersected by several small streams that empty themselves into the Medway, and comprises by measurement 3529 acres. Ulcombe Place and manor belonged to the family of St. Leger, of whom Sir Robert, of an ancient house in Normandy, is said to have supported the Conqueror with his hand when landing on the Sussex coast. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 5. 10., and in the gift of the Hon. C. B. C. Wandesford: the tithes have been commuted for £770, and for an extraordinary charge of 17s. 6d. per acre upon hops, of which there are about 150 acres; the glebe consists of 80 acres, including 25 wood, with a house. The church belonged to the priory of Christ-Church, Canterbury, from which it was wrested in the Danish wars, but was restored in 941; in 1220 it was made collegiate by Archbishop Langton, for an archpresbyter, two canons, a deacon, and one clerk; and afterwards became a rectory. The present edifice, which is in the later English style, contains some very old monuments to several of the St. Legers, many to the family of Stringer, and, of more recent date, one to the Marquess and Marchioness of Ormonde, and another to Lady Sarah Wandesford.

ULDALE, a parish, in the union of WIGTON, ALLERDALE ward below Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, 8 miles (S. by W.) from Wigton; containing 330 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2217a. 3r. 10p., exclusively of waste and common. The river Ellen has its source here, in two small lakes well stocked with various kinds of fish; about a mile and a half south-east from which, a brook, tumbling from a lofty mountain down several rocky precipices, forms a beautiful cascade termed White Water Dash. Coal, freestone, limestone, and peat abound. A large fair for sheep is held on August 29th. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £17. 18. 1½.; net income, £151; patron and incumbent, the Rev. Joseph Cape. The church was rebuilt by the parishioners in 1730. The free school, founded in 1726, has an endowment of about £47 per annum.

ULEY (St. GILES), a parish, in the union of DURSLEY, Upper division of the hundred of BERKELEY, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 2½ miles (E. by N.) from Dursley; containing 1713 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Berkeley to Stroud and Cheltenham, and comprises by measurement 1400 acres, of which 1100 are arable and pasture, and 300 woodland; the district abounds with picturesque scenery. The manufacture of woollen-cloth was formerly carried on extensively, but has of late considerably declined: an iron-foundry employs about fifty persons. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 3. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £240, and the glebe consists of 15 acres. The church is an ancient edifice. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyans; and schools are supported by subscription. On an eminence north-west of the village, is an encampment called Uley-Bury, where various Roman coins have been found.

ULGHAM, a parochial chapelry, in the union, and E. division of the ward, of MORPETH, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 5 miles (N. E. by N.) from Morpeth; containing 368 inhabitants. This place, which, in the charter of Henry I. granting right of free chase on it to the Merlay family, is called Elchamp, was formerly, in part, the property of the abbot of Newminster; and the prior of the hospital of St. John of Jerusalem also held some lands here. It is situated on the road from Morpeth to Warkworth, by Widdrington, and comprises about 3409 acres, the property of Earl Grey and the Earl of Carlisle; the soil in some parts, especially about the village, is gravelly and good, but a considerable portion is stiff and clayey, which, however, under proper management, is very suitable to the growth of wheat and oats, alternated with clover and fallow. There were coal-mines here, possessed by Queen Elizabeth in 1600, and that article is still found in the chapelry, on the bank of the river Line, and was wrought not very long since in the immediate vicinity; there is also a quarry of freestone. According to vulgar tradition, a market was once held, and the stump of an ancient cross, said to have been connected with a market, still remains in the centre of the village, which occupies a pleasing site. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Morpeth: the tithes have been commuted for £307: the church is a plain modern edifice of stone, dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

ULLENHALL, a chapelry, in the parish of WOOTTON-WAWEN, union of STRATFORD, Henley division of the hundred of BARLICHWAY, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 2½ miles (N. W. by W.) from Henley-in-Arden; containing 461 inhabitants. The chapel is dedicated to St. Mary.

ULLESKELF, a township, in the parish of KIRKBY-WHARFE, Upper division of the wapentake of Barkstone-Ash, W. riding of YORK, 4½ miles (S. E.) from Tadcaster; containing 491 inhabitants. The township comprises about 1260 acres, chiefly the property of John Shilleto, Esq., lord of the manor; the soil is generally fertile, and the common was inclosed in 1838, and has been brought into cultivation. The village is pleasantly situated on the south side of the Wharfe, over which the York and North-Midland railway is carried, by a viaduct of nine arches. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a small school is supported by Mr. Shilleto.

ULLESTHORPE, a hamlet, in the parish of CLAYBROOKE, union of LUTTERWORTH, hundred of GUTHLAXTON, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, 3¼ miles (N. W.) from Lutterworth; containing 594 inhabitants. An intermediate station on the Midland-Counties' railway is situated here, in a very inconvenient position, on the top of a steep cutting. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents. A sum of £11 per annum, arising from an allotment of four acres made in 1725, is distributed among the poor.

ULLEY, a township, partly in the parish of ASTON, but chiefly in that of TREETON, union of ROTHERHAM, S. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, 4½ miles (S. E. by S.) from Rotherham; containing 188 inhabitants. This place, called in Domesday book Olleie, was formerly possessed by the priory of Worksop, which institution is recorded to have owned the manor in the reign of Edward II.; and after the Dissolution the farm and grange appear to have passed to the Darcys, while the manor was in the hands of the family of Tempest. The township is on the borders of the district designated Hallamshire, and comprises about 900 acres of profitable land in good cultivation: the old Hall is now a farm-house. Land and corn-rents were assigned to the rector of Treeton in lieu of tithes, in 1798.

ULLINGSWICK, a parish, in the union of BROMYARD, hundred of BROXASH, county of HEREFORD, 5 miles (S. W.) from Bromyard; containing 320 inhabitants. The parish is situated at the source of a branch of the river Lugg, and comprises 1184 acres. The living is a rectory, with that of Little Cowarne annexed, valued in the king's books at £9, and in the gift of the Bishop of Hereford: the tithes have been commuted for £195, and the glebe comprises 26 acres.

ULLOCK, with PARDSEY and DEAN-SCALES, a township, in the parish of DEAN, union of COCKERMOUTH, ALLERDALE ward above Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, 5½ miles (S. W. by S.) from Cockermouth; containing 350 inhabitants.

ULNES-WALTON, a township, in the parish of CROSTON, union of CHORLEY, hundred of LEYLAND, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 5¼ miles (W. by N.) from Chorley; containing 477 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £250, of which £190 are payable to the rector of Rufford, and £60 to the rector of Croston.

ULPHA, a chapelry, in the parish of MILLOM, union of BOOTLE, ALLERDALE ward above Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, 9 miles (E. by S.) from Raven-glass; containing 375 inhabitants. The chapelry extends along the western bank of the river Duddon to the mountains Hard-Knot and Wrynose, where is a stone marking the boundaries of Cumberland, Lancaster, and Westmorland. A Roman road crosses both these mountains; and about half way up the former are the remains of Hard-Knot Castle, a fortress anciently of great importance, though the period of its erection is involved in obscurity. There are quarries of excellent blue slate, of which about 1400 tons are annually raised; copper-mines were formerly worked, and zinc is known to exist. The coppices, with which the district abounds, produce a large supply of wood for making hoops and bobbins, the former disposed of at Liverpool, and the latter to the manufacturers of cotton, woollen, linen, and silk in other towns. A fair for sheep is held on the first Monday in September, and there are others on the Monday before Easter and July 9th, formerly for cloth and yarn, but now only resorted to for pleasure. Ulpha Hall, which bears marks of high antiquity, has been converted into a farm-house. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £49; patron, the Vicar of Millom. The chapel is dedicated to St. John. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

ULPHA, with METHOP, a township, in the parish of BEETHAM, union and ward of KENDAL, county of WESTMORLAND, 11 miles (S. S. W.) from Kendal; containing 87 inhabitants. It is bounded on the south by the estuary of the Kent.

ULROME, a chapelry, in the union of BRIDLINGTON, partly in the parish of BARMSTON, but chiefly in that of SKIPSEA, N. division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, E. riding of YORK, 8 miles (S.) from Bridlington, and 6 (N. N. W.) from Hornsea; containing 157 inhabitants. The village gave name to a family of note who were lords of Ulrome for several centuries, and occur as parties or witnesses in charters of a very early date; and among other landowners here were the priors of Bridlington and Nunkeeling. The chapelry, which is bounded on the east by the North Sea, comprises 3000 acres, chiefly arable: the commons, about 1200 acres, were inclosed in 1765. The village is situated on rising ground, and consists of scattered houses, nearly a mile in length. The living is a perpetual curacy, valued in the king's books at £3. 19. 2.; net income, £68; patrons, the Executors of J. Lockwood, Esq.; impropiator, the Rev. John W. Bower. The incumbent has a glebe of 22 acres; 57 acres are held by the impropiator in lieu of corn-tithes, with an annual money payment of £25; and the rector of Barmston has 74 acres, with a payment of £19 a year. The chapel, dedicated to St. Andrew, is a very ancient edifice, with modern alterations; the interior, which is of rude and primitive appearance, will contain 200 persons.

ULTING (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union and hundred of WITHAM, N. division of ESSEX, 4½ miles (S. S. W.) from Witham; containing 150 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the south by the river Chelmer, is about six miles in circumference; the soil is generally fertile, and the lands well cultivated. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 4. 2., and in the gift of the impropiator, R. Nicholson, Esq.: the great tithes have been commuted for £187. 17., and the vicarial for £164. 12. The church is a small ancient edifice of stone, with a turret of wood surmounted by a shingled spire, and is beautifully situated on the bank of the river.

ULVERSCROFT, an extra-parochial liberty, in the union of BARROW-UPON-SOAR, hundred of WEST GOS-COTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, 6 miles (W. by S.) from Mountsorrel; containing 146 inhabitants. At this place, in a deep sequestered valley of Charwood Forest, are the ruins of a church anciently belonging to an Augustine priory dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, which latter was founded by Robert Blanchmains, Earl of Leicester, in the reign of Henry II., and had, at the Dissolution, a revenue of £101. 3. 10.

ULVERSTONE (ST. MARY), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of LONSDALE, north of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER; containing, with the townships of Mansriggs, Osmotherley, and Subberthwaite, and the chapelries of Blawith, Church-Conistone, Egton with Newland, Lowick, and Torver, 8778 inhabitants, of whom 5352 are in the town, 22 miles (N. W.) from Lancaster, and 271 (N. W. by N.) from London. This place derives its name, written in old records Olvestonam, from Ulpha, a Saxon lord, and was conferred in 1127, on the abbey of Furness, by Stephen, afterwards King of England. It was subsequently granted to Gilbert, who had succeeded to the barony of Kendal, and who released the inhabitants from their state of feudalism, bestowing upon them a charter, which was augmented and confirmed by his successors. It afterwards reverted to the crown; and being, in 1609, divided into moieties, was eventually purchased, in 1736, by the Duke of Montagu, for £490, and is at present vested in the Duke of Buccleuch. A charter was obtained from Edward I., for a market and an annual fair; but it continued to be merely nominal until the dissolution of the abbey of Furness, near Dalton, the capital of that district, from which event the prosperity of Ulverstone may be dated. The town, situated near the estuary of the rivers Crake and Leven, consists principally of four spacious streets, and the houses are chiefly of stone. There are a newsroom, and two subscription libraries, one of which is general, founded in 1797, under the auspices of Thomas Sutherland, Esq., and contains 3000 volumes; the other clerical, instituted by the Associates of Dr. Bray, and greatly augmented by the donations and exertions of the Rev. Dr. Stonard, the learned commentator on the Prophecies, and by the contributions of other members. The theatre and public rooms, erected by subscription in 1796, were considerably improved in 1828, and during the hunt-week in November are genteelly attended. The peninsular situation of the town led to the appointment of mounted guides to direct travellers across the sands, who are paid by government, to be in attendance from sunrise to sunset, when the channel is fordable; but this arrangement has been partially superseded by the construction of a new road from Carnforth to Ulverstone, under an act of parliament.

The prevailing branches of manufacture are those of cotton, linen, check, canvas for sails, sacking, candle-wicks, hats, axes, adzes, spades, hoes, and sickles. The chief articles of export, in addition to some of the above, are iron and copper ores, pig and bar iron of the finest quality, the best blue and green slates, and limestone, wool, grain, butter, gunpowder, leather, hoops, basket-ropes, baskets called swills, crate and wheel-spoke wood, and oak and larch poles: these are principally sent coastwise, the intercourse with foreign countries being limited. There is a yard for ship-building, and the aggregate registry of ships belonging to the place is nearly 3000 tons; two or three vessels are employed in the American timber trade, and from other ports a few belonging to the town are engaged in the West India trade. Ulverstone is a creek within the limits of the port of Lancaster, and from this circumstance has, with the liberty of Furness, been released from the heavy duty on coal carried coastwise. In 1793, an act of parliament was obtained for making a canal, by means of which ships of 400 tons' burthen are safely moored in a capacious basin with extensive wharfs, and discharge their cargoes close to the town. The market, granted to Roger de Lancaster, in the 8th of Edward I., is on Thursday; and fairs are held on the Tuesday before Easter-Sunday, April 29th, Holy-Thursday, October 7th, and the first Thursday after October 23rd. Manorial courts leet and baron take place on the Monday next after October 24th; the court baron for the liberty of Furness, for the recovery of debts under 40s., occurs here every Saturday three weeks; the baronial court for the manor of Bolton with Adgarley is annual, and petty-sessions for the hundred of Lonsdale, north of the Sands, are also held here.

Ulverstone, which anciently formed part of the parish of Dalton, comprises by computation 32,640 acres, whereof about one-third is arable, and the remainder pasture, wood, and peat or moss land; the extent of ground between the north and south extremities is 18 or 19, and the greatest breadth about 3, miles. The LIVING is a perpetual curacy; net income, £149; patron and impropiator, the Rev. T. R. G. Braddyll. The church, situated on the south side of a hill, about a quarter of a mile from the town, is of very ancient and obscure foundation, and was rebuilt in the time of Henry VIII., and again, with the exception of the tower and a Norman doorway, at the commencement of the present century. In the east window is some fine stained glass, the designs from Rubens; an altar-piece representing the Descent from the Cross, with the three Cardinal Graces, was planned for the church by T. R. G. Braddyll, Esq., after the manner of Sir Joshua Reynolds, and there are several elegant and sumptuous monuments. A district church in the later English style, with a tower and spire, and dedicated to the Holy Trinity, was erected in 1831, at an expense of £5301: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £143; patron, the Rev. Mr. Braddyll. The chapel at Blawith is said to be the original one consecrated by Archbishop Cranmer; and at Pennybridge is a chapel, erected by subscription in 1792. There are places of worship for Independents, Wesleyans, and Roman Catholics; and about a mile to the south-west is another, for the Society of Friends, the first possessed by that community in England, having been built under the superintendence of George Fox, founder of the sect, who resided at Swartmoor Hall, in the neighbourhood. The poor law union of Ulverstone comprises twenty-seven parishes or places, containing a population of 26,746. Conishead priory, in the parish, was founded by Gamel de Pennington, for Black canons, and, at the Dissolution, its revenue was valued at £124. 2. 1.; the building was then dismantled, and the materials were sold for £333. 6. 3½., but some remains of the cemetery, pillars of the transept, the foundation walls of the church, with several skeletons, were discovered in the year 1823; the site is occupied by a modern edifice in the English style. Richard de Ulverstone, a monk of considerable eminence, and author of a work entitled Articles of Faith, was born here in 1434.

UNDERBARROW, a chapelry, in the parish, union, and ward of KENDAL, county of WESTMORLAND, 2¼ miles (W.) from Kendal; containing, with Bradley-Field, 515 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £92; patron, the Vicar of Kendal.

UNDERMILBECK, a township, in the parish of WINDERMERE, union and ward of KENDAL, county of WESTMORLAND, 8 miles (W. by N.) from Kendal; containing, with the chapelry of Winster, 1033 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £12, and there is a glebe of 1031a. 1r. 6p. A school is supported by endowment.

UNDER-SKIDDAW, a township, in the parish of CROSTHWAITE, union of COCKERMOUTH, ALLERDALE ward below Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, 6 miles (N. N. W.) from Keswick; containing 549 inhabitants. A school is supported by donations amounting to nearly £100 a year, and a handsome school-house has been erected at High Hill, in the township, at the expense of James Stanger, Esq., in which girls are taught on the national system.

UNDERWOOD, with OFFCOAT, a liberty, in the parish of ASHBOURN, hundred of WIRKSWORTH, S. division of the county of DERRY; containing 344 inhabitants.

UNDERWOOD, a hamlet, in the parish of SELSTON, union of BASFORD, N. division of the wapentake of BROXTOW and of the county of NOTTINGHAM; containing 412 inhabitants.

UNDY, a parish, in the union of CHEPSTOW, division of CHRISTCHURCH, hundred of CALDICOT, county of MONMOUTH, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Chepstow; containing 317 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the south by the Bristol Channel, and comprises 1726a. 1r. 4p. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 10. 7½.; the patronage and appropriation belong to the Dean and Chapter of Llandaff, whose tithes have been commuted for £150, and those of the vicar for £140; the appropriate glebe consists of 52 acres, and the vicarial of 4, with a parsonage-house. The church is in the early English style, and has a nave and chancel, with a square tower rising from between them.

UNSTONE, a township, in the parish of DRONFIELD, union of CHESTERFIELD, hundred of SCARSDALE, N. division of the county of DERBY, 4 miles (N. by W.) from Chesterfield; containing 688 inhabitants. A school has an endowment of £16 per annum.

UNSWORTH, a chapelry, in the parish of OLDHAM cum PRESTWICH, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 3 miles (S. S. E.) from Bury; containing 826 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £63; patron, the Rector of Prestwich. The chapel, dedicated to St. George, was consecrated in 1730. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. James Lancaster, in 1737, bequeathed property now producing £12. 12. per annum, for teaching children.

UNTHANK, a township, in the parish of SKELTON, union of PENRITH, LEATH ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Penrith; containing 228 inhabitants.

UNTHANK, a township, in the parish of ALNHAM, union of ROTHBURY, N. division of COQUETDALE ward and of NORTHUMBERLAND, $8\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Rothbury; containing 22 inhabitants. It is on the river Aln, which passes on the north, and separates it from Prendick. In the reign of Elizabeth, it belonged to a family named Unthank. The hall, now designated Collingwood House, is pleasantly seated near the river.

UPCHURCH (St. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of MILTON, Upper division of the lathe of SCRAY, E. division of KENT, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Chatham; containing 520 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3553a. 2r. 34p., of which 1277 acres are arable, 731 pasture, 1297 salt-marsh, 61 wood, 94 orchards and gardens, and 26 in hop-grounds; and exclusively of these are 63 acres of land tithe-free. On the north flows the Medway, where are Otterham creek and quay, at which corn produced in the neighbourhood is shipped for exportation. By a survey made in the reign of Elizabeth, it appears that twelve vessels belonged to the place. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11; net income, £155; patrons and improprators, the Warden and Fellows of All Souls' College, Oxford. The church, built probably in the reign of Edward III., is a handsome structure, partly in the decorated and partly in the later English style.

UPEND, a hamlet, in the parish of KIRTLING, union of NEWMARKET, hundred of CHEVELEY, county of CAMBRIDGE; containing 187 inhabitants.

UP-EXE, a tything, in the parish of REWE, union of St. THOMAS, hundred of HAYRIDGE, Wonford and N. divisions of DEVON, 6 miles (S. W. by W.) from Cul-lompton; containing 120 inhabitants.

UPHAM, a parish, in the union of DROXFORD, hundred of BISHOP'S-WALTHAM, Winchester and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 3 miles (N. W. by N.) from Bishop's-Waltham; containing, with the tything of Woodcott, 581 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2853a. 2r. 36p., of which 1602 acres are arable, 237 pasture, 502 woodland, hedge, and dells, 207 down, 46 orchard, buildings, and homesteads, 218 common, and 37 highway. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 2. 1., and in the gift of the Bishop of Winchester: the tithes have been commuted for £420, and there are 2 acres of glebe. The church contains fifty free sittings, the Incorporated Society having granted £20 towards defraying the expense. At Durley is a chapel of ease. Dr. Edward Young, author of the Night Thoughts, whose father was rector of the parish, was a native; and the mother of Bishop Heber was also born here, in the rectory-house, her father, the Rev. Mr. Allanson, being the incumbent for about eighty years. On Stephen Castle down, a barrow was opened in March, 1836, when four skeletons were dug up, all perfect, of which parts are preserved at Belmour House.

UPHAVEN (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of PEWSEY, hundred of SWANBOROUGH, Everley and Pewsey, and N. divisions of WILTS, 4 miles (S. W. by S.) from Pewsey; containing 512 inhabitants. A Benedictine priory, a cell to the abbey of Fontanelle, in Normandy, was founded here about the commencement of the reign of Henry I., and, at its suppression, was granted by Henry VI. to the monastery of Ivy-Church, in exchange for lands, &c., in Clarendon park. The parish, situated on the road from Devizes to Andover, is intersected by the river Avon, and comprises by computation 3287 acres. A market was granted by Henry III. to Peter de Mauley; and in the reign of Edward I., Hugh de Spencer procured a charter of free warren, and two annual fairs, one of which, as well as the market, is discontinued. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 16. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown; improprators, the Provost and Fellows of King's College, Cambridge, whose tithes have been commuted for £594. 18., and those of the vicar for £150: there are nearly 3 acres of glebe. The church was probably erected in the time of Henry VII., and the nave seems to have formed part of the priory. There are places of worship for Particular Baptists and Wesleyans. About a mile to the westward are the remains of an intrenched camp, with a spacious prætorium, called Casterley, the area of which, comprising sixty acres, is intersected from north to south by a broad fosse.

UPHAY, a tything, in the parish, union, and hundred of AXMINSTER, Honiton and S. divisions of DEVON; containing 57 inhabitants.

UPHILL (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of AXBRIDGE, hundred of WINTERSTOKE, E. division of SOMERSET, 8 miles (N. W. by W.) from Axbridge; containing 400 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1036a. 1r. 12p., and is bounded on the south by the river Axe, that falls into the Bristol Channel at the village, the proximity of which to Weston-Super-Mare, a fashionable bathing-place, has induced capitalists to purchase a considerable portion of land in the neighbourhood, with a view to erect houses upon it. Stone is quarried for building and for the roads; and the Bristol and Exeter railway passes through the parish. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 7.; net income, £184; patron, John Fisher, Esq.: there is a glebe of about 30 acres. The church, with a central tower, occupies the summit of a lofty eminence south of the village; and a new church is about to be erected by subscription. There is a place of worship for Baptists. A cave was discovered here a few years since, similar to those in the same ridge of hills, at Burrington and Banwell.

UP HOLLAND, LANCASHIRE.—See HOLLAND, UP.

UPLEADON (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of NEWENT, hundred of BOTLOE, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 3 miles (E. by N.) from Newent; containing 250 inhabitants. This parish, which takes its name from the river Leadon, by which it is intersected, is about two miles and a half from the road between Gloucester and Ledbury, and comprises by measurement 1100 acres, whereof nearly six-tenths are arable, four-tenths pasture, and about 12 acres woodland; the soil is chiefly loam, inclining to clay, and the surface level. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £82; patron, the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol; appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Gloucester. The church has a wooden tower, and a Norman entrance on the north side.

UPLEATHAM, a parish, in the union of GUISBOROUGH, E. division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, N. riding of YORK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Guisborough; containing, with part of the township of Redcar, 329 inhabitants, of whom 209 are in Upleatham township. This place, in Domesday book written Upe-licher, was granted by the Conqueror to Hugh, Earl of Chester, and was afterwards the fee of Robert de Brus, and descended to the lords Fauconberge, and from them to the lords Conyers; the Athertons subsequently held the estate, and among other families that have had possessions here, occur those of Lowther and Dundas. The parish forms part of the district called Cleveland, and comprises about 1100 acres, of which the soil is a rich loam, and the surface boldly undulated, commanding from the higher grounds some fine sea views: freestone of good quality for building is found in abundance. The village is pleasantly situated on a declivity. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £57; patron and appropriator, the Archbishop of York, whose tithes have been commuted for £236. The church was rebuilt, in 1836, at an expense of £450, by subscription, towards which the lord of the manor contributed £200, the patron £100, and the Incorporated Society £75; it is a neat structure in the Norman style, and fifty of the sittings are free. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. National schools, built by the late Earl of Zetland, are supported by the family.

UPLOWMAN (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of TIVERTON, partly in the hundred of HALBERTON, but chiefly in that of TIVERTON, Cullompton and N. divisions of DEVON, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Tiverton; containing, with the tything of Whitnage, 428 inhabitants. The parish comprises by computation 3000 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £21. 0. 10., and in the gift of the incumbent, the Rev. Sydenham Pidsley; net income, as returned to the commissioners for inquiry into Church revenues, in 1835, £601.

UPLYME (St. PETER AND St. PAUL), a parish, in the union and hundred of AXMINSTER, Honiton and S. divisions of DEVON, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (N. W.) from Lyme-Regis; containing 1057 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2358a. 3r. 2p., together with about 800 acres of common, an act for inclosing which was passed in 1841. There are extensive beds of blue and white lias, replete with organic marine remains, and applicable to building, paving, or burning into lime. A manufactory for woollen-cloth is carried on. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £20. 8. 11½., and in the gift of the Rev. C. W. Ethelston: the tithes have been commuted for £450, and the glebe contains 36 acres. The church, which is a very ancient structure, has been enlarged.

UPMINSTER (St. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of ROMFORD, hundred of CHAFFORD, S. division of ESSEX, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Romford; containing 1117 inhabitants. The parish is about seven miles in length, and one mile in average breadth; the surface towards the north is considerably elevated; the soil in the uplands is clayey, and in the low grounds light and sandy. It contains the hamlets of Corbetstye, Upmminster-Common, and Harton, and comprises 3369a. 1r. 36p., of which 1241 acres are arable, 1010 meadow and pasture, 91 woodland, 148 common, and 178 roads, &c. The scenery is finely varied, and enlivened with numerous good residences and flourishing plantations. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £26. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Trustees of the late J. R. Holden, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £1052, and there are 23 acres of glebe. The church is a handsome structure, with a tower and spire, and on the north side of the chancel is a chapel belonging to Gaines Hall. There is a place of worship for Independents. Dr. Derham, author of Physico-Theology, &c., was rector of the parish from 1689 to 1735.

UP-OTTERY (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of HONITON, hundred of AXMINSTER, Honiton and S. divisions of DEVON, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Honiton; containing 991 inhabitants. Fairs for cattle are held on March 17th and October 24th. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £15. 5. 7½., and in the gift of the appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Exeter, whose tithes have been commuted for £335, and those of the vicar for £430; there are 76 acres of appropriate glebe, and 4 of vicarial. The church has been enlarged. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists; and at Roridge, in the parish, was anciently a chapel.

UPPER ALLITHWAITE.—See ALLITHWAITE, UPPER.—And all places having a similar distinguishing prefix will be found under the proper name.

UPPERBY, a township, in the parish of St. CUTHBERT, union of CARLISLE, CUMBERLAND ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S. E. by S.) from Carlisle; containing 471 inhabitants, who are chiefly employed in the manufacture of linen.

UPPINGHAM (St. PETER AND St. PAUL), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of MARTINSLEY, county of RUTLAND, 6 miles (S.) from Oakham, and 89 (N. N. W.) from London; containing 2034 inhabitants. The name of this place is descriptive of its elevated situation: the town consists principally of one good street, with a square area in the centre, and is tolerably well paved; the houses are commodious and well built, and the inhabitants are supplied with water from a spring in the upper part of the town. The air, though keen, is pure and salubrious, and the surrounding country is pleasingly diversified. The market, granted by Edward I., in 1280, to Peter de Montfort, is held on Wednesday, and is well supplied with corn and cattle; and fairs take place on March 7th and July 7th, chiefly for horses, horned-cattle, and sheep, and also for coarse linen-cloth. The parish is situated on the roads from London to Melton-Mowbray, and Stamford to Leicester, and about three miles distant from the river Welland, which divides the county of Rutland from Northampton; the lands are on the lias formation, possessing all its peculiar features of long ridges of low but steep hills (on one of which the town stands), separated by fertile valleys, through each of which runs a small stream of water. The soil is of a red appearance; and beneath, to the depth generally of two or three feet, is a shaly red stone, and under this, as far as it has been worked, either a red, or a blue stone encrusted with red, of variable thickness, and a very stiff blue clay which makes good bricks: the red stone is soft, and easily worked; the blue is much harder, and both are used for building. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £20. 0. 10.; net income, £661; patron, the Bishop of London: the glebe amounts to about 265 acres, with a house. The church, situated on the south side of the square, is a spacious structure in the ancient English style, with a tower surmounted by a lofty spire. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The free grammar school, adjoining the churchyard, and an hospital for poor men, were founded in 1584, by the Rev. Robert Johnson, archdeacon of Leicester, and rector of North Luffenham, in this county, who also instituted a similar school and hospital at Oakham, which see. Many eminent persons have been educated in the school, including Dr. Charles Manners Sutton, late archbishop of Canterbury; Lord Manners, late chancellor of Ireland; Dr. Henry Ferne, Bishop of Chester; and Dr. Bramston, Roman Catholic Bishop of the London district. The poor law union of Uppingham comprises 35 parishes or places, of which 16 are in Leicestershire, and 19 in Rutland, the whole containing a population of 10,049. The celebrated Jeremy Taylor, Bishop of Down and Connor, was rector.

UPPINGTON (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of ATCHAM, WELLINGTON division of the hundred of SOUTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP, 4 miles (W. S. W.) from Wellington; containing 96 inhabitants, and comprising 747*a.* 2*r.* 20*p.* The living is a donative; net income, £70; patron and improprator, the Duke of Cleveland. The great tithes have been commuted for £140, and those of the incumbent for £40.

UPSALL, a township, in the parish of SOUTH KILVINGTON, union of THIRSK, wapentake of BIRDFORTH, N. riding of YORK, 3 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Thirsk; containing 98 inhabitants. It comprises about 1230 acres of fertile land, and its small village is pleasantly situated on a commanding eminence east of the road from Thirsk to Borrowby: a little to the west of it, flows a tributary of the Cod beck. There are some remains of the castle of the Mowbrays, which subsequently became the residence of the Scroop family.

UPSALL, a township, in the parish of ORMESBY, union of GUISBOROUGH, E. division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, N. riding of YORK, 3 miles (W.) from Guisborough; containing 15 inhabitants. It contains the hamlets of East and West Upsall, situated near the source of the river Tame, and upon the border of Barnaby moor. At the time of the Conquest, some land here was demesne of the crown; and since that date property has been held by the families, among others, of de Brus, Percy, Conyers, and Jackson. The appropriate tithes have been commuted for £30, payable to the Archbishop of York, and the vicarial for £18. 5.

UPSHIRE, a hamlet, in the parish of WALTHAM-ABBEY, or HOLY-CROSS, union of EDMONTON, hundred of WALTHAM, S. division of ESSEX; containing 853 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

UPSLAND, with KIRKCLINGTON, a township, in the parish of KIRKCLINGTON, union of BEDALE, wapentake of HALLIKELD, N. riding of YORK; containing 324 inhabitants. W. by W.) from Colnbrook; containing, with part of the town of Slough, and the chapelry of Chalvey, 2296 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the great Bath road, about a mile from the river Thames, and the Great Western railway passes through it. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 17., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £220; improprator, W. Bousey, Esq. The tithes for the new inclosures, and all tithes for Upton, with Chalvey, were exchanged for land and a money payment in 1808; and impropriate tithes have been just commuted for a rent-charge of £239. The church, which is said to have been partly built more than 1200 years since, has a fine Norman doorway, and is principally in that style. A church has been erected at Chalvey, towards which the late king gave £100, the Queen Dowager £50, and the improprator and incumbent £200 each; it is a handsome edifice in the Norman style, adapted for a congregation of 800. There is a place of worship for Independents. Benjamin Lane, in 1720, bequeathed a rent-charge of £20, for clothing six men and six women, and distributing some bibles annually. In the parish is situated the workhouse of the Eton union. The late Sir William Herschel, the celebrated astronomer, resided and was buried here; and his son, the present Sir John F. Herschel, Bart., was born and resides in the parish.

It is situated on the road from Brompton-Regis to Wiveliscombe, and comprises 3779a. 25p.: stone is quarried for building, and for making roads. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £50; patron and impropiator, John Bere, Esq., whose tithes have been commuted for £241. 15.

UPTON, a hamlet, in the parish of LONG SUTTON, union of LANGPORT, hundred of SOMERTON, W. division of SOMERSET; containing 192 inhabitants.

UPTON, a tything, in the parish of EAST KNOYLE, union of MERE, hundred of DOWNTON, Hindon and S. divisions of WILTS; containing 139 inhabitants.

UPTON, a township, in the parish of BADSWORTH, Upper division of the wapentake of OSGOLDCROSS, W. riding of YORK, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Pontefract; containing 235 inhabitants. The township comprises about 1000 acres, chiefly the property of George Cholmley and Charles Oxley, Esqrs., joint lords of the manor; the soil is various, and the substratum abounds with limestone, of which much is burnt into lime. The surface is boldly undulated, and on Beacon Hill is a small tower commanding a fine view of York minster, the wolds of Lincolnshire, and the Derbyshire hills. There are two schools, in which 14 children are paid for by a private family.

UPTON, BISHOP'S (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of ROSS, hundred of GREYTREE, county of HEREFORD, 4 miles (N. E. by E.) from Ross; containing 650 inhabitants. The parish embraces an elevated ridge of mountain, and consists of 3315 acres. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 17. 6.; net income, £708; patrons, the Dean and Chapter of Hereford. The tithes have been commuted for £456. 16. to the Dean and Chapter, £221. 18. to the vicar, £11. 11. to the dean and precentor, and £15. 10. to the rector of How chapel.

UPTON-CRESSETT (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of BRIDGENORTH, hundred of STOTTESDEN, S. division of SALOP, 5 miles (W. by S.) from Bridgenorth; containing 56 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 15. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Representatives of the late J. C. Pelham, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £191. 7., and the glebe comprises 4 acres.

UPTON-GRAY, a parish, in the union of BASINGSTOKE, hundred of BERMONDSPIT, Basingstoke and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 4 miles (W. S. W.) from Odiham; containing, with the tything of Hoddington, 504 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the gift of the impropiators, the Provost and Fellows of Queen's College, Oxford: the tithes have been commuted for £490, and there are 49 acres of glebe.

UPTON-HELLIONS (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of CREDITON, hundred of WEST BUDLEIGH, Crediton and N. divisions of DEVON, 2 miles (N. N. E.) from Crediton; containing 146 inhabitants. The parish is situated along the northern bank of the river Creedy, and comprises by measurement about 800 acres: there are several quarries of stone suitable for building. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 6. 8., and in the gift of the incumbent, the Rev. W. Wellington: the tithes have been commuted for £170, and there is a glebe of 40 acres. The church, a small neat building, supposed to have been erected in the 14th century, contains a handsome monument to the Reynell family.

UPTON-LOVELL, a parish, in the union of WARMINSTER, hundred of HEYTESBURY, Warminster and S. divisions of WILTS, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. E. by E.) from Heytesbury; containing 235 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the road from Heytesbury to Salisbury, and intersected by the river Wily, comprises 1399a. 15p.: the manufacture of fine broad-cloth is carried on to a considerable extent, and affords employment to about 400 persons of this and the adjoining villages. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £17. 18. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £329. 10., and the glebe comprises 30 acres. In the chancel of the church is a recumbent figure of Lord Lovel, from whom the parish derives its distinguishing appellation. The Rev. John Crouch, in 1794, bequeathed £500 three per cent. consols., the interest to be applied to instruction. On Upton-Lovell down, about two miles north of Heytesbury, is a single intrenchment called Knook Castle, including about two acres: on the summit of a hill, to the north-west of Elder Valley, is Bowls Barrow, a large tumulus, that has been found to contain fourteen human skeletons; and in the neighbourhood of Knook Castle, near the north bank of the Wily, is another large barrow, which, from the number of gold ornaments discovered in it, has been termed Golden Barrow.

UPTON MAGNA (St. LUCIA), a parish, in the union of ATCHAM, Wellington division of the hundred of SOUTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Shrewsbury; containing 494 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3129a. 2r. 9p., chiefly arable; a considerable hill on one side forms a rabbit-warren and sheep-walk, and the remainder is divided into several farms; the soil is generally good, and under profitable cultivation. Coal and limestone are found, and worked to a small extent, though neither is in much reputation; an iron-forge was in operation, but has been discontinued. The Shrewsbury canal passes through the parish, and at one extremity is the river Severn. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12; net income, £546; patron, Mrs. Corbet. The church is an ancient structure in the early and later English styles, with a square embattled tower, and consists of a nave and chancel, separated by a Norman arch; the windows have recently been filled with stained glass, presented by Miss Pigott.

UPTON-NOBLE, a parish, in the union of SHEPTON-MALLET, hundred of BRUTON, E. division of SOMERSET, 4 miles (N. N. E.) from Bruton; containing 241 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Batcombe. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

UPTON-PYNE, a parish, in the union of ST. THOMAS, hundred of WONFORD, Wonford and S. divisions of DEVON, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Exeter; containing 512 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 1800 acres by measurement; the river Exe bounds it on the south, and the Thorverton road passes immediately before the church. There are leather-mills, employing a few persons: manganese was produced in some quantity about twenty years since, and the mine is still worked, but not with much success. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £23. 6. 8., and in the gift of Sir S. H. Northcote, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £400, and the glebe comprises about 90 acres, with a house. The church contains a good painting of the Last Supper, the monument of a crusader, and some remains of ancient stained glass.

UPTON-SCUDAMORE (St. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of WARMINSTER, Warminster and S. divisions of WILTS, 2 miles (N.) from Warminster; containing 383 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 7. 1., and in the gift of Queen's College, Oxford. The incumbent's tithes have been commuted for £480, with a glebe of nearly 23 acres; the appropriate tithes for £20 and £35, respectively belonging to the Dean and Chapter of Salisbury and the Prebendary of Luxford; and £50 are payable to an impropriator, who has a glebe of 23½ acres.

UPTON-SNODSBURY (St. KENELME), a parish, in the union, and Upper division of the hundred, of PERSHORE, Worcester and W. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 5 miles (N.) from Pershore; containing 340 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises 1661*a. 3r. 12p.*, is intersected by the road from Worcester to Inkberrow; and the Birmingham and Gloucester railway passes at the distance of about two miles. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8, and in the gift of the incumbent, the Rev. Henry Green: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £100, and the vicarial for £119. 13., and there are 2 acres of glebe. The church is a plain edifice.

UPTON-UPON-SEVERN (St. PETER AND St. PAUL), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the Lower division of the hundred of PERSHORE, Upton and W. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 10 miles (S.) from Worcester, and 109 (N. W. by W.) from London; containing 2696 inhabitants. According to Dr. Stukeley, this was the Upoessa of Ravennas; and the probability of its having been a Roman station is strengthened by the discovery of some ancient armour in the neighbourhood. During the civil war, a bridge of six arches, erected pursuant to legislative enactment, in the reign of James I., was broken down, and a battery placed in the churchyard, to prevent the approach of Cromwell and his forces; but the plan was ineffectual, and the parliamentary troops entered the town. Upton is situated on the right bank of the river Severn, which is here navigable for vessels of 100 tons' burthen, and is crossed by a bridge erected in 1606; it is neatly built, and the streets are well paved; the surrounding country is in a state of high cultivation, and the scenery is varied and picturesque. There is a subscription library. A considerable quantity of cider, brought from Herefordshire and other parts, is shipped here for conveyance to different places in England; and there is a harbour for barges, with a wharf on the river for the convenience of loading and discharging. The market is on Thursday: a handsome market-house, including an assembly-room and apartments for the meetings of the magistrates, has been erected by subscription. Fairs are held on Mid-

Lent and Whitsun Thursday, July 10th, and the Thursday before October 2nd; a manorial court occurs occasionally, and petty-sessions once a fortnight.

The parish comprises 3025 acres of land. The LIVING is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £27; net income, £917; patron, the Bishop of Worcester. The church is a handsome structure, completed in 1758; the ancient tower was once surmounted by a spire, but this, from an apprehension of insecurity, was taken down, and a wooden cupola substituted. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans. A charity school for 20 girls was endowed in 1718, by Richard and Anne Smith, with property now producing £28 per annum, which was augmented with a bequest of £5 a year, in 1824, by Mrs. Sarah Husband: a boys' school was added to it in 1797, by a benefaction from George King, of property vested in the purchase of £100 three per cents., and £100 four per cent. consols.; and these two foundations are now incorporated into a national school. Edward Hall, in 1578, left an estate at present worth about £80 a year, for maintaining a bridge over the Severn at this place; and Thomas Morris, alias Woodward, in 1675, bequeathed £185, which sum was invested in land, &c., now valued at £35. 10. per annum, appropriated to parochial purposes. The poor law union comprises 22 parishes or places, and contains a population of 16,886. Dr. John Dee, the celebrated astrologer in the reign of Elizabeth, was a native of the town; and the late Rev. J. Davison, B.D., author of some highly-esteemed theological works, was rector.

UPTON-WARREN (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of DROITWICH, Upper division of the hundred of HALFSHIRE, Droitwich and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 2½ miles (S. W. by S.) from Bromsgrove; containing 441 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the Birmingham and Worcester road, and comprises 2574*a. 35p.*, of which 1600 acres are arable, 750 pasture, and 136 woodland; the surface is undulated, the soil partly a strong clay, and the scenery picturesque. The Stoke station on the Birmingham and Gloucester railway is one mile to the east, and the Bromsgrove station (for carriages) three miles distant: the river Salwarp or Warren propels a flour-mill. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 2. 3½., and in the patronage of the Earl of Shrewsbury: the tithes have been commuted for £670, and the glebe consists of 80 acres, with an excellent residence. The church, a plain edifice with a square tower surmounted by a spire, was partly rebuilt in 1793, and has a neat interior. There is a national school, endowed with £18 per annum by Elizabeth Lacey and others, in 1745; also a Church Sunday school. An annuity of £10 was bequeathed by Alderman Saunders to the Grocers' Company, for apprenticing a boy of this parish.

UPTON-WATERS (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of WELLINGTON, Wellington division of the hundred of SOUTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP, 5 miles (N. by W.) from Wellington; containing 228 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises by measurement 732 acres, is separated by the river Tern from the parish of High Ercal; and the village, situated on elevated ground, is intersected by the road between Wellington and Market-Drayton. A common red stone is quarried for building purposes. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £3. 17. 3½., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £135, and the glebe comprises 35 acres. The church is a small neat edifice.

UP WALTHAM.—See WALTHAM, UP.

UPWAY (St. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of WEYMOUTH, comprising the liberty of WEYBEY-HOUSE, the tything of Stottingway in the hundred of CULLIFORD-TREE, and that of Elwell in the liberty of WYKE-REGIS and ELWELL, Dorchester division of DORSET, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Dorchester; containing 619 inhabitants. The liberty of Weybey-house and the manor of Upway belong to the Rev. George Gould, whose ancestors have been seated here since the reign of James I.: part of the ancient manor-house is still remaining, but the family have for some years chiefly resided at Fleet, in this county. On the estate are some excellent quarries, from which was taken the stone for building the new church at Fleet. The manor of Stottingway belongs to the vicars-choral in the cathedral of Salisbury. Near the church, from the foot of a steep hill, rises the small river Way, which runs through the parish, and falls into the sea at Weymouth. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £18. 3. $1\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the Bishop of Salisbury: the tithes have been commuted for £380, and the glebe comprises $46\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church has an embattled tower crowned by pinnacles, and has been enlarged. On Ridgway down are numerous barrows, extending from that part of the ridge opposite Sutton-Pointz to beyond Long Bredy, a distance of nearly six miles, in a direction parallel to the ancient Roman road called Via Iceniana.

UPWELL (St. PETER), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union of WISBECH, partly in the hundred of WISBECH, ISLE of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, and partly in the hundred of CLACKCLOSE, W. division of the county of NORFOLK, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Wisbech; containing, with part of the chapelry of Welney, 4891 inhabitants, of whom 4300 are in Upwell township. The village is intersected by the river Nene, and the houses extend along its banks nearly to Outwell and Welney. The country about Welney, which lies in the cultivated fens of the Great Bedford level, has been greatly improved within the last thirty years; and a handsome suspension-bridge over the Hundred-Foot river was erected in 1826, at the expense of the Rev. W. G. Townley, the rector, from a design by Capt. Brown. King John granted a market on Wednesday, and Henry VI. a fair on St. Peter and St. Paul's day; the former has been discontinued, and the latter is now only a pleasure-fair, held on June 30th. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16; net income, £3855; patron, R. G. Townley, Esq. The church, which, with the greater part of the parish, is in Norfolk, is in the later English style, with a square tower, the upper part octagonal, surmounted by a lofty spire; the Rev. Mr. Townley repewed it chiefly at his own expense, and erected galleries, in 1839, and more recently formed a beautiful east window of stained glass, representing the Descent from the Cross. The reading-desk and pulpit, and other portions of the edifice, are finely carved; and there are several neat monuments and two sepulchral brasses in the chancel, where a brass plate records the death of 67 persons here between June 21st and August 13th, 1832, by cholera. At Welney is a chapel of ease. There are places of worship for Baptists and Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists; and the poor have £180 per annum, derived from land left by various individuals. In that part of the parish lying in Cambridgeshire are the sites of two ancient religious houses, one of which, at Mirmound, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, was founded by Richard I., and at the Dissolution was valued at £10. 7. 7.; and the other, a small priory of Gilbertines, also dedicated to the Virgin, was a cell to the priory of Sempringham, valued at the Dissolution at £13. 6. 1. per annum.

UPWOOD (St. PETER), a parish, in the hundred of HURSTINGSTONE, union and county of HUNTINGDON, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Ramsey; containing 378 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Great Raveley annexed, in the patronage of Miss Bickerton, and has a net income of £78: the tithes have been commuted for £340. Robert Gordon and Anthony Ashton, in 1660, gave land now let for £10 per annum, applied to parochial purposes.

URCHFONTE (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of DEVIZES, hundred of SWANSBOROUGH, Devizes and N. divisions of WILTS, 5 miles (S. E.) from Devizes; containing, with the hamlets of Eastcott, Lydeaway, and Wedhampton, 1530 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises between 5000 and 6000 acres, and is situated within a quarter of a mile from the road between Salisbury and Devizes, was once the property of Sir William Pynsent, Bart., and, with other estates, was left by his will to the great Earl of Chatham, in testimony of respect for his character. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Stert annexed, valued in the king's books at £15. 15. 10., and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Windsor, the appropriators, whose tithes have been commuted for £1425, and those of the vicar for £300; there are 28 acres of appropriate, and two of vicarial, glebe, with a house. The church is a fine ancient edifice. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

URMSTON, a township, in the parish of FLIXTON, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Manchester; containing 771 inhabitants. John Collier, commonly called Tim Bobbin, the author of the Lancashire Dialect, was born here.

URPETH, a township, in the parish and union of CHESTER-LE-STREET, Middle division of CHESTER ward, N. division of the county of DURHAM, 3 miles (N. by W.) from Chester-le-Street; containing 907 inhabitants. The township comprises 1614 acres, of which one-third is arable, one-third pasture and meadow, and one-third woodland; the soil is favourable to the growth of wheat, barley, and turnips, and in some parts is remarkably rich; the surface is elevated, but inclosed all round by greater heights, and the scenery is highly picturesque, with beautiful views formed by the intersection of the burns. A colliery, which comprehends nearly the whole township, is let on lease by the Bewicke family to Messrs. William Bell, Morrison, and partners; the works were commenced in 1833, and the coal seam at present wrought is found at a depth of 70 fathoms, and is of a rich bituminous quality. There are good freestone quarries, from one of which the principal part of Lambton has been erected; three forges for malleable iron are carried on by Messrs. Hawks and Co., employing about 50 hands; and a linseed-oil mill, conducted by Messrs. Charles Rayne and partners, employs about 40;

there are also a paper, and a corn, mill. A private railway runs to the Tyne; and the Pontop and South Shields railway passes within a quarter of a mile, to the south of the township. Mrs. Bewicke has a small house here, in the heart of her estate, at which she resides during a portion of the year. The village is situated three miles north-west of Chester, on the south of the Team.

URSWICK (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of ULVERSTONE, hundred of LONSDALE, north of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 3 miles (S. W. by S.) from Ulverstone; containing, with the hamlet of Little Urawick, 761 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 17. 6.; net income, £96; patrons, the Landowners. The church, which was repewed in 1826, is situated between the villages of Great and Little Urawick. At Bolton are the remains of an ancient chapel, in the immediate vicinity of which several Roman coins have been discovered, also a brass tripod.

URSWICK, LITTLE, a hamlet, in the parish of GREAT URSWICK, union of ULVERSTONE, hundred of LONSDALE, north of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER; containing 96 inhabitants. The village, which adjoins that of Great Urawick, is pleasantly situated, and is distinguished for a fine circular lake about half a mile in diameter, abounding with tench, roach, and other fish. A school was founded in 1580, by William Marshall, who endowed it with a rent-charge of £15.

USHAW, a hamlet, in the chapelry of ESH, union and parish of LANCHESTER, W. division of CHESTER ward, county of DURHAM, 4 miles (W.) from Durham. This place, which derives its name from the abundance of yew-trees that formerly grew in the neighbourhood, belongs to a Roman Catholic college, established here in 1808, and which owed its origin to the dissolution of the English College of Douay, in French Flanders, by the tyranny of the French republic in 1794. The majority of the professors and students, having escaped to their native land, settled at Crook Hall, in this county; but that building soon proving too small, they were enabled by the liberal support of the Roman Catholic clergy and laity, to raise the present edifice, which comprises a spacious quadrangle adapted to the reception of 150 students, with a president, vice-president, and professors, and has a valuable library of more than 12,000 volumes, with numerous splendidly illuminated MSS. Dr. Lingard and Dr. Wiseman were educated in the college.

USHLAWRÇOED, a hamlet, in the parish of BEDWELTY, union of ABERGAVENNY, Lower division of the hundred of WENTLLOOG, county of MONMOUTH; containing 13,140 inhabitants.—See TREDEGAR.

USK (St. Mary), a market-town, parish, and division, in the union of PONT-Y-POOL, hundred of USK, county of MONMOUTH, 13 miles (S. W.) from Monmouth, and 144 (W. by N.) from London; containing, with the hamlets of Glascoed and Gwehellog, 2182 inhabitants, of whom 1525 are in the town. This place, which derives its name from the Gaelic Ysc, signifying water, is of remote antiquity, and is generally admitted by antiquaries to have been the Burrium of the Romans. The ancient castle, erected on an eminence overlooking the town, experienced repeated assaults during the wars between the Welsh chieftains and the Anglo-Norman lords, especially in the time of the celebrated Owain Glyndwr; and, in the civil commotions in the reign of Charles I., it was, with the town, partly demolished by the parliamentary forces. The town is agreeably situated on the river Usk, which is crossed by a stone bridge; and consists of several streets, composed of detached houses, with intervening gardens and orchards. Some of the inhabitants are engaged in husbandry, and others in the salmon-fishery, and there is a small manufactory for japanned tin, or Pont-y-Pool ware. The market is on Friday; a cattle-market is held on the first Monday in each month, and fairs take place on April 20th (a large one for wool), June 20th, October 29th, and the Monday before Christmas-day. The town is governed by a corporation, consisting of a portreeve, recorder, and burgesses, assisted by four constables, appointed at a borough-leet, held annually; and the borough, conjointly with those of Monmouth and Newport, returns a member to parliament, the right of election being vested in the £10 householders of a district comprising 522 acres. The portreeve possesses magisterial authority concurrently with the county justices; the quarter-sessions for the shire, and the petty-sessions for the division, are held here; and a court leet occurs once a fortnight, at which the portreeve and recorder preside. The town-hall is a handsome edifice over the market-place, built at the expense of the Duke of Beaufort: the prison has been enlarged, and a tread-mill erected, by the county, at an expense of about £600.

The LIVING is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 10.; net income, £250; patron, W. Addams Williams, Esq.; impropiator, the Duke of Beaufort. The church, which was formerly conventual, appears to be of Anglo-Norman origin, and was originally cruciform, but has undergone numerous alterations; it contains several ancient monuments, and a modern one, erected in 1822, to commemorate the munificent benevolence of Mr. Roger Edwards, who, in 1621, bequeathed property now producing a yearly rental of £412, to establish and endow a free grammar school; to support an almshouse previously built by him at Llangeview, for 12 persons; and for other charitable purposes. Two separate schools are now held in premises adjoining the church; that called the grammar school is in the lower room, and the master, who is a graduate of Oxford, has a salary of £60, with the use of a house, &c.; in the other, termed the writing school, in the upper rooms, about 40 younger children are instructed in reading, writing, and accounts, by a master in holy orders, who receives £70. The same benefactor also founded and endowed a scholarship with £5 per annum in the University of Oxford, for a boy educated at the school. A national school is supported by subscription; and almshouses for 24 persons were erected in 1826, near the priory, upon the site of some old ones. There are places of worship for Independents, Wesleyans, and Roman Catholics. The remains of the castle, standing on an abrupt eminence to the east of the river, consist of the exterior walls and a tower gateway, with several apartments, amongst which is the baronial hall; the area is of considerable extent, and is flanked by square and round towers. To the south-east of the church are a few remains of a priory founded by one of the earls of Clare.

USSELBY (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of CAISTOR, N. division of the wapentake of WALSHCROFT, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 3 miles (N. by W.) from Market-Rasen; containing 92 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Caistor to Market-Rasen, and comprises between 700 and 800 acres. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £44; patron and impropiator, the Right Hon. C. T. D'Eyncourt, M.P. There are about 40 acres of glebe. The church, a small neat structure, was lately repaired at the expense of Bartholomew Elliot, Esq.

USWORTH, GREAT and LITTLE, an ecclesiastical district, in the parish of WASHINGTON, union of CHESTER-LE-STREET, E. division of CHESTER ward, N. division of the county of DURHAM, 5 miles (S. E.) from Gateshead; containing 1030 inhabitants. This township was separated for ecclesiastical purposes from Washington in 1831, and comprises 2543a. 11p., of which 1719 acres are arable, 736 meadow and pasture, 39 woodland, and 49 waste. It occupies an elevated site, surrounded with a great variety of interesting scenery; the air is salubrious, and the neighbourhood abounds with springs of excellent water, from which the distillers of Newcastle and Gateshead derive their supplies. The inhabitants are chiefly engaged in collieries, of which that called the Springwell colliery, belonging to Lord Ravensworth and partners, opened in 1822, affords employment to 500 persons; the coal is conveyed to Jarrow by a private railway, where it is shipped principally to London; John Laws, Esq., is head viewer. There are also some quarries of the finest freestone, which is raised for building; at North Biddick are fire-stone quarries, and bricks, fire-bricks, and tiles are manufactured. In 1834, an act was obtained for constructing a railway from the Hartlepool line, near Moorsley, to the Pontop and South Shields railway in this township. Usworth House and Usworth Place are both handsome mansions, surrounded with tastefully-embellished demesnes, commanding extensive and richly-varied prospects over the adjacent country, embracing a fine view of Durham cathedral, Lambton and Hilton castles, Sunderland, Wearmouth, and the German Sea. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Bishop of Durham, with a net income of £120: the church, erected in 1831, is a neat structure containing 410 sittings, and a gallery for the children of the schools. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also a school established by the Pearith family, who, in 1814, built an appropriate school-house, and endowed it with £30 per annum, and £3 per annum for keeping it in repair. In the grounds of Usworth Place is a sulphureous chalybeate spring.

UTKINTON, a township, in the parish of TARPORLEY, union of NANTWICH, First division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 1½ mile (N. by W.) from Tarporley; containing 606 inhabitants.

UTON, a tything, in the parish, union, and hundred of CREDITON, Crediton and N. divisions of DEVON, 2 miles (W. S. W.) from Crediton; containing 384 inhabitants.

UTTERBY (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, wapentake of LUDBOROUGH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 4½ miles (N. by W.) from Louth; containing 209 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Louth to Great Grimsby, and comprises by measurement 1568 acres, of which 342 are arable, 722 pasture, 432 meadow, 23 gardens, and 16 woodland; the Roman Barton-street passes on the west, and, according to tradition, here was a Roman encampment. Utterby House, the seat of the Rev. H. B. Benson, M.A., is beautifully situated, and the grounds comprehend some picturesque scenery; over the entrance are the armorial-bearings of the Sapsford family. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., and in the gift of the impropiators of the tithes, Lewin Cholmley, Esq., and others, as trustees of the Rev. L. E. Towne: the great tithes have been commuted for £200, and the vicarial for £125; the glebe is valued at £1. 8. per annum. The church contains monuments to the Harold family, of which several members were buried here.

UTTOXETER (St. MARY), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the S. division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, N. division of the county of STAFFORD, 13 miles (N. E. by E.) from Stafford, and 135 (N. W. by N.) from London; containing 4735 inhabitants. This place, anciently Uttokeshather, is of great antiquity, and is supposed to have derived its name from the Saxon words Uttoc, a mattock, and Hather, heath; it was afterwards called Utoc Cestre and Utcester. One of its late commons, called the High Wood (a moiety of which was seized by the crown within the last two centuries), anciently constituted, with other lands, one of the wards of the late Forest of Needwood. The manor heretofore formed part of the possessions of the duchy of Lancaster, and once belonged to the Peverills of the Peak, lords of Nottingham. Having come, by marriage, into the hands of William de Ferrars, Earl of Derby, it was forfeited to the crown, together with the other large estates of that family, by Earl Robert, in the reign of Henry III., and given to Edmund, Earl of Lancaster, the king's second son; and in 1308, Thomas, Earl of Lancaster, son of Edmund, obtained for it the grant of a market, and a fair on the eve, day, and morrow of St. Mary Magdalene. The manor reverted to the crown, as parcel of the duchy of Lancaster, in the person of Henry IV., son of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, who obtained it by marriage with Blanche, daughter and coheiress of Henry, Earl of Lancaster, nephew of Earl Thomas. Charles I., in the first year of his reign, granted it and the demesne to Robert Dixon and William Walley, as trustees for Henry, Viscount Mandeville, afterwards Earl of Manchester; and it is now vested, in twelve shares, in Earl Talbot and other proprietors: the market and fairs were sold at the same time, and are now the property of the earl. During the civil war of the seventeenth century, from its proximity to Tutbury Castle, it was alternately the head-quarters of the royalist and the parliamentary forces.

The town stands upon an eminence rising from the western bank of the river Dove, across which is an ancient stone bridge of six arches, connecting the counties of Stafford and Derby; it consists of several spacious streets, and a good central market-place, and the houses in general are well built, and several of them handsome. It has long been noted for the manufacture of clock cases and movements; there are also several maltsters, tanners, fell-mongers, nail-makers, bendware-manufacurers, wool-staplers, rope and twine spinners, timber-merchants, &c., and a large brewery. The local trade in cheese, corn, and other articles, is benefitted by the communication with the Potteries, by means of the Caldron branch of the Trent and Mersey canal, which comes up to a wharf at the northern end of the High-street. The land in the vicinity of the Dove is very fertile in pasturage; and the neighbouring rivers and brooks afford trout, grayling, and other kinds of fish. Near the town is found a pure red brick-clay, from one to five yards below the surface, in irregular masses. The market, which is well attended, is held on Wednesday; on every alternate Wednesday is a large market for cattle, merchandise, &c.; and fairs for cattle take place on the Tuesday before Old Candlemas, May 6th, July 31st, September 1st and 19th, and November 11th and 27th, of which those on May 6th and September 19th are the principal. The first charter of the town was granted in the 36th of Henry III., by William de Ferrars, Earl of Derby, and conferred on the burgesses all the privileges of a free borough. Uttoxeter, though a manor, with power to hold a court baron, was subject to the jurisdiction of the officers of the courts held for the honour of Tutbury; but, in 1636, an order of the court of the duchy chamber was made, discharging the inhabitants from further attendance at the courts for the honour. Petty-sessions for the southern division of the hundred of Totmonslow occur here, once a fortnight, under the county magistrates, who choose surveyors of the highways, and also constables, headboroughs, &c., in cases where the lords of the different courts leet in the neighbourhood neglect to make the necessary appointments.

The parish comprises 8983a. 1r. 7p., of which 6870 acres are pasture and meadow, 1846 arable, 121 woodland, and 146 waste, &c. The LIVING is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £27. 1. 8.; net income, £136; patrons, the Dean and Canons of Windsor, who hold courts for the rectorial manor. The church has been rebuilt, with the exception of the ancient tower and beautiful and lofty spire, and has received an additional number of sittings; the spire was damaged by lightning in 1814, and has been partly rebuilt. The chantries of St. Mary and the Holy Trinity founded in the church, were endowed with houses and lands in the neighbourhood. There are places of worship for Independents, the Society of Friends, Wesleyans, and Roman Catholics. A free grammar school, situated in Bridge-street, was established by the Rev. Thomas Allen, a celebrated mathematician in the sixteenth century; and there are almshouses for twelve persons, with small endowments, and a fund of about £60 per annum, for apprenticing children. The poor law union of Uttoxeter comprises 16 parishes or places, 12 of which are in the county of Stafford, and 4 in that of Derby, the whole containing a population of 14,407. Thomas Allen, the mathematician; Sir Simon Degge, the antiquary; and the distinguished Admiral Gardner, were natives of the place.

UXBRIDGE, a market-town and chapelry, and the head of a union, in the parish of HILLINGDON, hundred of ELTHORNE, county of MIDDLESEX, 15 miles (W. by N.) from London; containing, with the district of Uxbridge-Moor, 4226 inhabitants, of whom 3219 are in the town. The most ancient name of this place was Oxe- breuge, or Woxbrigge, perhaps of Saxon origin, which has passed through the several variations of Waxbridge, Woxbridge, and Oxbridge, whence its present name. The town, which was probably founded about the time of Alfred, was surrounded by a ditch, and the whole site comprised about 85 acres; in feudal times it was an important station as a frontier town, and appears to have been fortified at an early period. It afterwards had a regular garrison; and, during the civil war of the seventeenth century, it was the scene of the memorable, but unsuccessful, negotiation between the king and his parliament; sixteen commissioners on each side held a conference here, which commenced on the 30th of January, 1645, and continued about three weeks, in an ancient brick mansion, at the west end of the town, still designated the Treaty House. This house has undergone various alterations, and is now the Crown inn, but two of the principal rooms, used on the occasion, still present specimens of the ancient and curious wainscot, in a fine state of preservation. The edifice was occupied by the Earl of Northumberland, and a mansion in its vicinity was the temporary residence of the Earl of Pembroke. The royal commissioners selected the Crown inn, which formerly stood opposite the present White Horse; and the parliamentary commissioners, the George, which, although materially diminished in size, yet remains. In 1647, the head-quarters of the parliamentary army were fixed here; and there was a garrison so late as 1689.

The TOWN, situated on the road from London to Oxford, and occupying a gentle declivity on the banks of the river Colne, is paved, lighted, and supplied with water from numerous wells, and consists of one principal street, about a mile in length, called London or High-street, which runs south-east and north-west, with another diverging from it, in the direction towards Windsor. The common, which is surrounded by rich and beautiful scenery, has been reduced by inclosures to a space of fifteen acres, called the Recreation Ground. Vine-street, branching to the south-east, defines the limits of what was formerly denominated the borough, in that direction; and although the town extends considerably beyond it, eastward, this part, which is called Hillingdon-End, is within the parish of Hillingdon, and is neither paved nor lighted. A library and reading-room, belonging to the Uxbridge Book Society, and containing about 1300 volumes, is supported by subscription; and an assembly-room is attached to one of the inns. The Grand Junction canal passes through the town; and the facilities afforded by the river Colne for the erection of water-mills, and the water-carriage by the canal to Paddington, and the Thames, have rendered Uxbridge remarkable for an extensive flour trade. At the western extremity are three large flour-mills, and within three or four miles up and down the river, ten more, which are supposed, in the aggregate, to supply upwards of 3000 sacks of flour per week, a great part of which is sent to the metropolis: there are also two small breweries. South-east of the town is a fine soil of brick-earth, which extends several miles, and has been sold at £500 or £600 per acre; and the burning of bricks on these fields employs several hundred persons. The general trade of the town is likewise extensive; and manufactories for implements of husbandry and Windsor and garden chairs, are carried on to a considerable extent. The Colne is crossed by two bridges : over its principal branch is High-bridge, built of brick, about sixty years since, at the joint expense of the counties of Buckingham and Middlesex, and replacing an ancient one that had existed from the time of Henry VIII. ; over the smaller branch is a short bridge at Mercer's mill. There is likewise a bridge across the Grand Junction canal, on the banks of which are warehouses and wharfs for the convenience of trade. The market, granted in the reign of Henry II., is on Thursday, and is one of the largest markets in the kingdom for corn ; there is another market on Saturday, for meat, poultry, eggs, butter, &c. ; and fairs are held on March 25th, July 31st, September 29th, and October 11th, of which the two latter are now used as statute-fairs. The old market-house, built in 1561, was removed by act of parliament, in 1785, and the present commodious edifice of brick erected, at an expense which amounted to nearly £3000.

The town, which was anciently a borough, governed until the close of the 17th century by bailiffs, is now under the superintendence of two constables, four head-boroughs, and two ale-conners. In the 13th of Edward I., it was ordained that the high constable for the Uxbridge division, who generally resides in the town, should be chosen by the justices in quarter-sessions. A petty-session is held by the magistrates, on the first and third Mondays in every month ; and there is a county court of requests, for debts under 40s., on the first Tuesday in every month. The LIVING is a perpetual curacy, in the gift of the Trustees of the late G. Townsend, Esq., who present a fellow of Pembroke College, Oxford ; net income, £111, lately augmented by a gift of £660 from various persons, and by a grant of £37 per annum from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The chapel, now a district church, dedicated to St. Margaret, and built about 1447, on the site and partly from the materials of an old edifice which stood in the 13th century, is in the later English style, constructed of brick and flint, with a low square tower at the north-west angle : in the interior are an ancient octagonal stone font, decorated with quatrefoils and roses, and several fine monuments. A district church, dedicated to St. John the Evangelist, has been built at Uxbridge-Moor, containing 450 sittings, 250 of which are free, the Incorporated Society having granted £250 ; net income of the incumbent, £120. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, and Independents ; also a free school founded in 1809, principally through the benevolent exertions of T. Truesdale Clarke, Esq., and supported by subscription, together with the interest of £600 given by Mr. J. Hall, to be divided between this school and a school of industry. The profits arising from the manor and borough, chiefly invested in trust for charitable uses in the last century, are partly appropriated to the payment of £20 per annum amongst six men or women, and £10 a year by weekly payments, the donation of John Clarke ; the remainder is "for the benefit and advantage of the town only." The poor law union of Uxbridge comprises 10 parishes or places, and contains a population of 18,894. About four miles from the town, at Breakspear, some remains of Roman sepulchres have been discovered: Uxbridge gives the inferior title of Earl to the Marquess of Anglesey, the 9th Baron Paget having been raised to the dignity, May 19th, 1784.

VANGE (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of BILLERICAY, hundred of BARSTABLE, S. division of ESSEX, 5 miles (N. E. by E.) from Horndon-on-the-Hill ; containing 169 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the south by a creek of the river Thames, and comprehends a low tract of marshy land called Bower's Marsh, and a portion of Canvey Island, comprises 1451a. 28p. by computation, whereof 895 acres are arable, 484 meadow, 6½ reed land, 3 homesteads, and 60 glebe. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £14, and in the gift of Sir C. Smith, Bart. : the tithes have been commuted for £310. The church, a small ancient edifice, has been recently repaired, and enlarged by the addition of a gallery.

VAULTERSHOME, a tything, in the parish of MAKER, union of ST. GERMAN, hundred of ROBOROUGH, Roborough and S. divisions of DEVON, 1½ mile (S. by W.) from Devonport ; containing 1156 inhabitants.

VAUXHALL, county of SURREY.—See LAMBETH.

VEEP, ST. (ST. CYRICIUS), a parish, in the union of LISKEARD, hundred of WEST, E. division of CORNWALL, 3 miles (N. N. E.) from Fowey ; containing 710 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the west by the navigable river Fowey, on the north by the Leryn, and on the south by Penpol creek, is situated midway between Fowey and Lostwithiel, and comprises by computation 2394 acres, whereof the soil is fertile, and the surface hilly. In the civil war of the 17th century, the royalist cavalry were quartered here previously to the capitulation of the Earl of Essex, in the year 1644. Fairs are held on the Wednesday before Midsummer-day, and the second Tuesday after Shrove-Tuesday. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 0. 7½., and in the gift of the impropiator, David Howell, Esq. : the rectorial tithes have been commuted for £320, and the vicarial for £231. 10. ; the glebe contains 16 acres, and the parsonage-house is in good repair. The Wesleyans have a place of worship. There are some remains of the chapel of a small priory founded by one of the earls of Cornwall as a cell to that of Montacute, in the county of Somerset, and dedicated to St. Cyric and St. Juliett. Walter de Exon, author of a history of Guy, Earl of Warwick, in the latter part of the 13th century, was an inmate of the priory, in which he was interred.

VENN-OTTERY (ST. GREGORY), a parish, in the union of HONITON, hundred of EAST BUDLEIGH, Woodbury and S. divisions of DEVON, 3¼ miles (S. W. by S.) from Ottery St. Mary ; containing 134 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the right bank of the river Otter, and is divided from the parishes of Aylesbear and Rockbeare, on its western extremity, by a range of hills ; it comprises by measurement 907 acres, of which 497 are arable, 100 meadow or pasture, 4 wood, 280 common or waste, 18 orchard, 16 glebe, and 10 road. The surface is undulated, rising gently from the river to the hills, and intersected by several small brooks ; the soil is a strong loam, but in parts sandy and gravelly, with some marl and clay. The living is a vicarage, endowed with the rectorial tithes, and annexed to that of Harford: the tithes have been commuted for £125. The church is chiefly in the later English style.

VENTNOR (St. CATHERINE), a district, and fashionable watering-place, in the parish of NEWCHURCH, liberty of EAST MEDINA, Isle of Wight division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 10 miles (S. E. by S.) from Newport; containing 970 inhabitants. This place, which is situated on the southern coast of the island, has risen into reputation owing to the extreme salubrity of the air, which in the winter season is remarkably mild and dry, shelter being afforded from the north and east winds by the Undercliff. Stone applicable to building purposes abounds, and in the vicinity is an excellent flour-mill. The church is a handsome structure in the early English style, with a fine spire 103 feet high, and cost £3500, defrayed by John Hambrough, Esq., of Steephill Castle, who is the patron; it was consecrated on 20th July, 1837, and contains 500 sittings, one-third of which are free. The founder has also munificently endowed it with £1000, and erected a parsonage-house, at a cost of £2500. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans.

VERNHAM-DEAN, a parish, in the union of ANDOVER, hundred of PASTROW, Andover and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 8 miles (N. by W.) from Andover; containing 707 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 3500 acres, of which the soil is chiefly a strong clay, resting on a stratum of chalk, but in the valleys is more loose and gravelly. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Hurstbourn-Tarrant: the church occupies a lonely and romantic situation, in a delightfully sequestered spot. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

VERWOOD, a tything, in the parish of CRANBORNE, union of WIMBORNE and CRANBORNE, hundred of MONCKTON-UP-WIMBORNE, Wimborne division of DORSET; containing 685 inhabitants.

VERYAN (St. SYMPHOLIANA), a parish, in the union of TRURO, W. division of the hundred of POWDER and of the county of CORNWALL, 4 miles (S. by W.) from Tregoney; containing 1569 inhabitants. The parish is situated on a bay of the same name in the English Channel by which it is bounded on the south, and includes the fishing cove of Portloe, in the trade of which the inhabitants are principally employed; the road from Tregoney to St. Mawes passes through it. Stone is quarried for the purposes of husbandry and cottage-building. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £19, and in the gift of the appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Exeter: the rectorial tithes have been commuted for about £770, and the vicarial for £361; there is a glebe of 48 acres, Cornish measure. The church contains several neat monuments, and an ancient font enriched with sculpture. There are places of worship for Independents, Wesleyans, and Bryanites; also a national school endowed with £739 three per cent. consols. Within a mile of the church is a very large barrow called the Beacon, from which a fine view is obtained over the adjacent country, particularly towards the west; and on the road to Gwenda is a singular mound on the side of a hill, environed by a fosse.

VIRGINSTOW (St. BRIDGET), a parish, in the union of HOLSWORTHY, hundred of LIFTON, Lifton and S. divisions of DEVON, 6½ miles (N. E. by N.) from Launceston; containing 167 inhabitants. The parish comprises 800 acres, of which 400 are common or waste. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £115, and the glebe contains 40 acres.

VIRLEY (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of LEXDEN and WINSTREE, hundred of WINSTREE, N. division of ESSEX, 8¼ miles (S. S. W.) from Colchester; containing 68 inhabitants. Virley creek, in the parish, is navigable on the east to the North Sea. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 13. 4., and in the alternate patronage of the families of Abdy and Glover: the tithes have been commuted for £155, and there are 18 acres of glebe.

VOWCHURCH (St. BARTHOLOMEW), a parish, in the union of DORE, hundred of WEBTREE, county of HEREFORD, 10 miles (W. by S.) from Hereford; containing 355 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in the Golden valley, on the river Dore, celebrated as a fine trout stream, is also intersected by the road from Hereford to Hay, and comprises 2583a. 3r. 33p., whereof 1022 acres are arable, 1223 meadow and pasture, and 338 woodland and coppice. Stone is quarried, chiefly for building and tiling. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 9.; net income, £200; patron and appropriator, the Prebendary of Putson Major in the Cathedral of Hereford. The church is very ancient, and remarkable for its fine oak roof supported on large pillars of the same material. There was a chapel at Monington-Straddel, but it was pulled down some few years since, there being at the time no resident clergyman. A free school is partly supported with the interest of £100; and there are some small bequests for charitable purposes. In the neighbourhood is an old square encampment.

VOWMINE, a township, partly in the parish of CLIFFORD, hundred of HUNTINGTON, and partly in the parish of DORSTONE, hundred of WEBTREE, union of HAY, county of HEREFORD, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Hay; containing 97 inhabitants.

W

WABERTHWAITE (St. JOHN), a parish, in the union of BOOTLE, ALLERDALE ward above Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, 1½ mile (E. S. E.) from Ravensglass; containing 146 inhabitants. This parish, which forms an inclined plane from the mountains to the river Esk on the north-west, comprises 2001 acres, of which about 1000 are common or waste land; the soil is generally a strong clay, well adapted for wheat, but there are some small portions of lighter quality. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £3. 11. 8.; net income, £131; patron, Lord Muncaster. The glebe comprises 12 acres.

WACKERFIELD, a township, in the parish of STAINDROP, union of TEESDALL, S. W. division of DARLINGTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM, 2 miles (N. E.) from Staindrop; containing 122 inhabitants. This is one of the places said to have been given by Canute to the church of Durham; and it appears that in Bishop Langley's time a family named Sockburn held lands here under the prior of Durham. The township is on the road from Durham to Barnard-Castle, and comprises 744*a. 3r. 7p.*; the soil is of a mixed quality, with gravel and clay, and the scenery, which is very beautiful, embraces extensive views. An old Roman way passes on the north. The tithes have been commuted for £126. 17. 7.

WACTON, a parish, in the union of BROMYARD, hundred of BROXASH, county of HEREFORD, 3½ miles (N. W. by W.) from Bromyard; containing 109 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 970 acres, of which 350 are arable, 552 meadow and pasture, 56 hop plantations, and 12 woodland. The living is a perpetual curacy; patron, the Vicar of Bromyard; appropriator, the second Portionist of Bromyard: the appropriate tithes have been commuted for £66, and the vicarial for £63. The church is a very ancient edifice, and contains about 50 or 60 sittings.

WACTON (ALL SAINTS AND ST. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of DEFWADE, E. division of NORFOLK, 1½ mile (W. by S.) from Long Stratton; containing 267 inhabitants. This place, including the two parishes of Magna and Parva, now consolidated, comprises 1044*a. 3r. 22p.*, of which 582 acres are arable, 442 meadow and pasture, and 19 woodland and roads. The living is a discharged rectory, with the sinecure rectory of Wacton Parva annexed, the former valued in the king's books at £5, and the latter at £2. 13. 4.; patron, Rev. Ellis Burroughes. The tithes have been commuted for £310, and the glebe comprises 31 acres. The church of All Saints contains a monument to one of the Knyvet family: the church of St. Mary is in ruins.

WADBOROUGH, a hamlet, in the parish of the HOLY CROSS, PERSHORE, union, and Upper division of the hundred, of PERSHORE, Pershore and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 3½ miles (W. N. W.) from Pershore; containing 207 inhabitants. The Birmingham and Gloucester railway passes through the hamlet.

WADDESDON (ST. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of AYLESBURY, hundred of ASHENDON, county of BUCKINGHAM, 5½ miles (W. N. W.) from Aylesbury; containing, with the hamlets of Westcott and Woodham, 1750 inhabitants, of whom 1408 are in Waddesdon township. The living is a rectory, in three portions, each valued in the king's books at £15, and in the patronage of the Duke of Marlborough: the portionists officiate alternately; net income of the first, £178; of the second, £202; and of the third, £152. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1774. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans. Eighteen boys are gratuitously educated, and one is apprenticed, out of funds amounting to about £15 per annum, left by Lewis Fetto and John Beck. Alms-houses for six aged widows were founded and endowed with a rent-charge of £30, by Arthur Goodwin, in 1645; and William Turner, in 1784, bequeathed £3265. 11. three per cent. consols., the dividends of which are distributed among the poor, for whose benefit also an alms-cow is kept, the Duke of Marlborough allowing £10 per annum.

WADDINGTON (ST. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union, and within the liberty of the city, of LINCOLN, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 4½ miles (S.) from Lincoln; containing 814 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 3305 acres of arable and pasture land. The living is a rectory, with Meer annexed, valued in the king's books at £20. 16. 8.; net income, £566; patrons, the Rector and Fellows of Lincoln College, Oxford: the tithes were commuted for land in 1770. The church is principally in the Norman style. Connected with the parish was the ancient chapelry of Meer, of which the chapel, dedicated to St. James, is in ruins. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A house of Knights Templars, with an hospital, near Danston, was founded in 1246, by Simon de Poppele; the hospital was suffered to continue after the Dissolution.

WADDINGTON, a chapelry, in the parish of MITTON, union of CLITHEROE, W. division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, W. riding of YORK, 1¾ mile (N. W. by N.) from Clitheroe; containing 644 inhabitants. This place afforded an asylum to the unfortunate monarch Henry VI., who, after the battle of Hexham, was entertained at Waddington Hall, the property of the Croasdale family, and protected by concealment from the pursuit of his enemies for nearly twelve months, but being at length discovered by an emissary of the adverse party, he was conveyed as prisoner to the tower of London. The chapelry comprises nearly 1900 acres; the lands are chiefly pasture, and considerable numbers of cattle are fed. Waddow Hall here, is a handsome residence, and the village is pleasantly situated on the western side of Ribblesdale. The chapel, dedicated to St. Helen, was rebuilt in 1825, and is a neat structure in the later English style, containing some fine monuments to the Parker family, of Brows-holme: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £122; patron and impropiator, T. Parker, Esq. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. An hospital for widows of this place and of West Bradford, Grindleton, and Whitwell, was founded by Thomas Parker, Esq., who, in 1700, endowed it with property now producing £700 per annum; the building comprises a neat chapel, with apartments for twenty-six widows, each of whom receives £13, and the chaplain £30 per annum.

WADDINGWORTH (ST. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of HORNCASTLE, S. division of the wapentake of GARTREE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 6 miles (W.) from Horncastle; containing 64 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 924 acres, of which 390 are arable, and 534 pasture and meadow. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 0. 10., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £132. 10., and the glebe comprises 25 acres. The church, rebuilt about the year 1800, is a plain neat edifice.

WADE, with OWER, a tything, in the parish of ELING, union of NEW FOREST, hundred of REDBRIDGE, Romsey and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 290 inhabitants.

WADEBRIDGE, a market-town, partly in the parish of St. BREOCK, hundred of PYDER, and partly in that of EGLOSHAYLE, hundred of TRIGG, union of BODMIN, E. division of CORNWALL, 8 miles (E. S. E.) from Padstow, and 7 (W. N. W.) from Bodmin; containing 777 inhabitants. This place is chiefly remarkable for its noble bridge of seventeen arches, nearly 320 feet long, over the navigable river Camel; it was erected about 1485, and there are certain estates vested in trustees, with the rents of which it is kept in repair. The river is navigable to the place for vessels of 150 tons' burthen; commodious wharfs and quays have been constructed, and a quantity of granite and copper and iron ore is sent from this town, which, from its trade also in corn, its advantageous situation in connexion with a contemplated breakwater and a new line of road to Padstow, promises, at no distant period, to be one of the most flourishing towns in the county. There is a railway from Wadebridge, for twelve miles, in a direction nearly parallel with the river, to Wentworth Bridge, where a branch of two miles runs to Bodmin, and another of nearly a mile to Ruthern Bridge; it was completed at an expense of £35,000, and opened to the public in September, 1834. A discharging dock has been constructed, which, with the quay, is capable of containing five vessels; and another dock, for the reception of sand barges, has been formed at the expense of Sir W. Molesworth, Bart. The market, which is of ancient establishment, is on Friday; and fairs are held on March 3rd, May 12th, June 22nd, and October 10th. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyans.

WADENHOE (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of OUNDLE, hundred of NAVISFORD, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Oundle; containing 287 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the left bank of the river Nene, and consists of 1100 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11; net income, £186; patron and incumbent, the Rev. Dr. Roberts. The tithes were commuted for land in 1793.

WADESMILL, a hamlet, partly in the parish of THUNDRIDGE, and partly in that of STANDON, union of WARE, hundred of BRAUGHIN, county of HERTFORD; containing 499 inhabitants.

WADHURST (St. PETER AND St. PAUL), a market-town and parish, in the union of TICEHURST, hundred of LOXFIELD-PELHAM, rape of PEVENSEY, E. division of SUSSEX, 4 miles (S. W.) from Lamberhurst, and 5 (S. E.) from Tonbridge-Wells; containing 2491 inhabitants. This town, which is situated on the road from Hastings to Tonbridge-Wells, obtained a charter for a weekly market and annual fairs, in the reign of Henry III.; the market, almost exclusively for corn, is on Tuesday, and fairs are held on the 29th of April and the 1st of November. The parish comprises 10,134*a.* 2*r.* 35*p.*, of which 4100 acres are arable, 3100 meadow and pasture, 2700 woodland, and 234 roads and waste; the surface is finely varied with hill and dale, and Wadhurst Castle is beautifully situated here, and commands a view of Pevensy Bay, Beachy Head, and the adjacent country. There are quarries of good sand-stone which is used for building. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 1. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$.; patrons, the Warden and Fellows of Wadham College, Oxford; impropiator, S. Playsted, Esq. The great tithes have been commuted for £699. 15., and the vicarial for £912. 15.; the glebe comprises 9 acres. The church is partly in the early and partly in the later English style, with a tower surmounted by a lofty spire, and contains some ancient monuments, and on the floor numerous plates of iron, inscribed to various families. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans.

WADINGHAM, a parish, in the union of CAISTOR, E. division of the wapentake of MANLEY, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Glandford-Brigg; containing 678 inhabitants. It comprises nearly 7000 acres; the soil is chiefly clay, and peat moor; the surface is flat, and the lands are intersected by the river Ancholme. The living consists of the united rectories of St. Mary and St. Peter, with that of Snitterby annexed, valued in the king's books at £29. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £955. The tithes were commuted for land by an inclosure act of 1769; the glebe comprises nearly 400 acres. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A school was founded in 1719, by Mr. Thompson, who endowed it with land producing £39 per annum; and there are several allotments to the poor.

WADLEY, a tything, in the parish of GREAT FARRINGDON, union and hundred of FARRINGDON, county of BERKS, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. E. by E.) from Farringdon; containing 59 inhabitants.

WADSLEY, an ecclesiastical district, in the parish of ECCLESFIELD, union of WORTLEY, N. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, 3 miles (N. N. W.) from Sheffield; containing 4100 inhabitants. This place was anciently the baronial seat of the de Wadsley family, of whose Hall there are still some remains. The district, which is bounded on the east by the river Don, and on the west by the Loxley, contains coal of inferior quality, and some extensive quarries of excellent freestone, from which was raised the stone for the erection of the Sheffield infirmary, the church of this place, and many other public buildings. Wadsley House, the seat of Wilson Overend, Esq., is a handsome mansion, pleasantly situated. The population is chiefly employed in the manufacture of clasp-knives, of which a peculiar kind, known on the continent as the Wadsley flat-backed knives, is in high repute, and exported in large quantities. The road to Manchester, and the Sheffield and Manchester railway, pass through the district. The church was erected in 1834, by the Misses Ann and Elizabeth Harrison, of Weston, at a cost of £3000, to which they added £1000 as an endowment; it is in the early English style, with a square embattled tower surmounted by a spire, and contains 700 sittings, of which 250 are free. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Misses Harrison; and there is a good glebe-house. The tithes were commuted for land in 1765. There are places of worship for Wesleyans; and a national school, in connexion with the Church, one also for girls, and two infant schools, in all of which are about 350 children, have been erected at an expense of £1600. Six almshouses, also, for aged widows, each of whom receives 4*s.* 6*d.* per week, were built at a cost of £800, and endowed in 1841 by Miss Rawson, of Ward's-End; the buildings are of stone, and form a neat range in the Elizabethan style.

WADSWORTH, a township, in the chapelry of HEP-TONSTALL, parish of HALIFAX, union of TODMORDEN, wapentake of MORLEY, W. riding of YORK, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Halifax; containing 5583 inhabitants. This is the most extensive township in the parish of Halifax, and is supposed to have been a place of importance in the time of the Romans, and also of the Saxons. It comprises by computation 10,080 acres, the greater portion of which is uninclosed and uncultivated, appropriated as sheep-walks, and forming tolerable pasture. The surface is very uneven, being chiefly high moorland, and during the season affording excellent grouse shooting; the prevailing scenery is strikingly diversified. Coal of good quality is obtained, but in very small quantities, and at a great cost. The township includes a large portion of the village of Hebden-Bridge (which see), and numerous scattered hamlets; the inhabitants are chiefly employed in the cotton and worsted manufactures. The rivers Calder and Hebble have their confluence here; and the Rochdale canal passes through the township. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans.

WADWORTH (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of DONCASTER, S. division of the wapentake of STRAF-FORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Doncaster; containing 681 inhabitants. This parish, which is on the road from Doncaster to Tickhill, comprises by computation 3000 acres, chiefly the property of E. S. Foljambe, Esq., lord of the manor; the soil is fertile, and in good cultivation; the surface is agreeably diversified and richly embellished with wood, of which there are nearly 230 acres in the parish. There are some quarries of limestone, used for building, and also for burning into lime. Wadworth Hall, the seat of R. J. Coulman, Esq., is a handsome residence, finely situated. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 2. 6.; net income, £130; patron, W. Walker, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land in 1767. The church is a spacious and handsome structure, with a massive square tower, and contains two altar-tombs of the Fitzwilliam family, with recumbent effigies of a knight and his lady. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also a national school built in 1841, at an expense of £500.

WAGHEN, or WAWN (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of BEVERLEY, Middle division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, E. riding of YORK; containing 362 inhabitants, of whom 267 are in the township, 4 miles (S. E. by E.) from Beverley. The parish, including the hamlet of Meux, comprises 5600 acres, of which about one-fourth is meadow and pasture, 20 acres wood, and the remainder arable; the surface is level, and the soil chiefly a loamy sand, with a little carr, which by extensive draining has been made good land. Joseph Smith Wyndham, Esq., a descendant from Sir Thomas Smith, secretary of state to Queen Elizabeth, is lord of the manor, and owner of the township. The river Hull is seen stretching to the west, through the low lands, as far as the wolds; the village is pleasantly situated and encompassed by a good deal of wood. Meux, which contains 1600 acres, is celebrated for the remains of its once splendid abbey, and now also for its breed of race horses. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the patronage of the Chancellor of the Cathedral of York, valued in the king's books at £7. 0. 10.; net income, £49; appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of York. The church, erected in 1211, is partly in the decorated style, with a fine square tower of later date; there are three stalls in the chancel. A day and Sunday school, in connexion with the Established Church, is supported.

WAINFLEET, a market-town, in the union of SPILSBY, Marsh division of the wapentake of CANDLESHOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $39\frac{1}{2}$ miles

(E. S. E.) from Lincoln, and 128 (N. by E.) from London; containing 2257 inhabitants. In the time of the Romans, the whole province is said to have been supplied from this place with salt made from the sea-water: and a road across the fens, still called the Salters' road, is supposed to have been the Roman road between Ban-novallium and Lindum. Wainfleet returned one burgess to the grand council summoned in the 11th of Edward III., and, in 1359, it supplied two ships of war for the armament prepared for the invasion of Brittany. The town is situated on a creek in a marshy district; but, in consequence of the inclosure of the east fen, the waters have been carried off by a wide drain to Boston Scalf, which has so reduced them as to preclude the entrance of any but small craft. Previously to this event, it is believed that the town was higher up the creek, chiefly because the old church of All Saints, taken down in 1820, stood at High Wainfleet, about a mile and a half distant. The river, which is here called the Haven, and higher up the Limb, is navigable for three miles, and might easily be improved and extended. The market is on Saturday; and fairs are held on the third Saturday in May for cattle, and October 24th for sheep, and for pleasure. The place is within the jurisdiction of the Bolingbroke and Horncastle court of requests, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5.

The town comprises the parishes of All Saints, St. Mary, and St. Thomas, containing respectively 731, 140, and 1386 inhabitants. The parish of All Saints contains by admeasurement 1590 acres, of which 530 are arable, and 1060 meadow and pasture; the soil is partly heavy, and partly of lighter quality. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 3. 6½., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £406. 9., and the glebe comprises 23 acres. The church has been rebuilt at an expense of £3000. The parish of St. Mary contains 5874*a. 1r. 19p.* of arable and pasture land, in nearly equal portions: the living is a perpetual curacy, valued in the king's books at £8. 13. 4.; net income, £201; patrons and impropiators, the Governors of Bethlehem Hospital, London, whose tithes have been commuted for £620. The parish of St. Thomas comprises 24*a. 26p.*: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the family of Barnes; there is a burial-ground, but no remains of the ancient church. The Society of Friends and Wesleyans have places of worship. A free grammar school was founded in 1424, by William Patten, generally known as William of Waynflete, Bishop of Winchester, lord high chancellor of England in the reign of Henry VI., and founder of Magdalen College, Oxford, from which the master receives £11. 6. 8. per annum, and has, in addition, 17 acres of land and a rent-free residence. Another school is supported by the governors of Bethlehem Hospital; and there are some lands producing about £23 per annum, and about £13 from various bequests, appropriated to the poor.

WAITBY, a township, in the parish of KIRKBY-STEPHEN, EAST ward and union, county of WESTMORLAND, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (W.) from Kirkby-Stephen; containing 54 inhabitants. It comprises 972 acres, of which 450 are common or waste land. A free school was erected in 1680, by James Highmore, citizen of London, who endowed it with £400, now producing £40 per annum, and also bequeathed £5. 5. annually to the poor.

WAITH (St. MARTIN), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, wapentake of BRADLEY-HAVERSTOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Great Grimsby; containing 49 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £2. 14. 2.; net income, £86. The tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1807; the patronage and impropriation belong to William Haigh, Esq., and Mrs. Haigh.

WATHAM-HILL, with MOSSHOUSES, MARSHFIELD, and HERDHOUSE, an extra-parochial district, adjacent to the chapelry of Broughton-in-Furness, in the union of ULVERSTONE, hundred of LONSDALE, north of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER; containing 36 inhabitants.

Arms.

WAKEFIELD (ALL SAINTS), a borough, market-town, and parish, and the head of a union, in the Lower division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, W. riding of YORK; containing, with the townships of Alverthorpe with Thornes, and Stanley with Wrenthorpe, and the chapelry of Horbury, 29,992 inhabitants, of whom 14,754 are in the town, 30 miles (S.

W. by W.) from York, and 184 (N. N. W.) from London. This place, which, from the discovery of Roman coins, and some slight traces of a military road intersecting the parish, about two miles from the town, has by some writers been regarded as the site of a Roman station connecting Cambodunum with Legeolinum, is indisputably of Saxon origin, as its name, in the Domesday survey Wachefeld, obviously implies. In the reign of Edward the Confessor, it formed part of the royal demesnes, and, after the Conquest, was granted by Henry I. to William, Earl Warren, with whose descendants it remained till the reign of Edward III., when, in default of issue male, it escheated to the crown, and was given by that monarch to his fifth son, Edmund de Langley, upon whom he conferred the title of Earl of Cambridge, and who, in the reign of Richard II., was, for his important services, created Duke of York. On his decease, the manor came into the possession of his son and heir, Edward, Earl of Rutland, from whom, in failure of heirs, it passed to Richard de Coningsberg, second son of Edmund de Langley, who had married Anne, daughter of Roger de Mortimer, Earl of March, and whose son Richard, aspiring to the crown in the reign of Henry VI., was killed at the battle of Wakefield. From this time, the manor remained in the crown, till the reign of Charles I., by whom it was granted to Henry, Earl of Holland, by marriage with whose daughter it was conveyed to Sir Gervase Clifton, of Clifton, in the county of Nottingham; and after passing into the hands of other families, it was purchased in 1700, by the first duke of Leeds, of the heirs of Sir Christopher Clapham, and is now the property of Sackville Walter Lane Fox, Esq., who married the daughter of the late Duke of Leeds.

After the battle of Northampton, in 1459, in which the Lancastrians sustained a signal defeat, and Henry VI. was taken prisoner, his queen, Margaret, raised an army of 20,000 men in this part of the country, and the Duke of York advancing to oppose her with a body of 5000

Yorkists, on his arrival near Wakefield, learning the great superiority of her numbers, retired to Sandal Castle, his baronial residence, resolved to wait the arrival of his son, the Earl of March, with the remainder of his forces. The queen appearing before the walls of the castle with the main body of her army, commanded by the Dukes of Somerset and Exeter, the Duke of York suffered himself to be provoked to battle, and drawing up his forces on Wakefield Green, the rear of his army being attacked by a body of troops which the queen had placed in ambush, while his front was engaged with the main body of the queen's army, the battle soon terminated in the total defeat of the Yorkists, and the duke and 3000 of his men were left dead on the field; the duke's body being recognised among the slain, the head was taken off by order of the queen, and affixed to the gates of York. The spot on which the duke fell, about a mile from the town, was formerly inclosed with a fence; and a gold ring was found near the spot, some few years since, which is supposed to have been worn by him. During the parliamentary war in the reign of Charles I., the town suffered materially from the hostilities of the contending parties, by each of which it was alternately occupied; and on one occasion, in particular, General Fairfax was dispatched from Leeds to dislodge the royalists, who, having taken possession of the town, had drawn themselves up in battle array, and maintained their position against all his efforts, till he brought two pieces of cannon to bear upon them from the churchyard.

The town is principally situated on the gentle acclivities of an eminence rising from the banks of the Calder, over which is a handsome bridge of eight arches, affording a commodious approach from the south; it extends over the picturesque and fertile vale of the Calder, and consists of spacious and regular streets of well-built houses of brick, and is paved and flagged, lighted with gas, and supplied with water under acts of parliament. Great improvements have been made within the last few years, and more especially on the north side, where some handsome ranges of houses have been erected, and numerous detached mansions, surrounded with shrubberies and plantations, forming a pleasing appendage to this part of the town, which is called St. John's, or St. John's Place. A public library and newsroom is supported by subscription, for which a building has been erected in Wood-street, containing, on the upper floor, an assembly-room, in which concerts and other public amusements take place; and a mechanics' institution, consisting of upwards of 500 members, and having a library of 1300 volumes, is also held here. The building, which is in the Grecian style, and of the Ionic order, is highly ornamental to the neighbourhood in which it is situated. A literary society was established in 1827, and a geological society, of which Earl Fitzwilliam is president, has a valuable and well-assorted museum. The theatre, in Westgate, a neat building, was erected by the late James Banks, Esq., by whom it was leased to Tate Wilkinson and his trustees, and in 1836 Mr. Banks' heirs sold it to Mr. Joseph Smedley; it is usually opened in September, by the York, Hull, and Leeds company. Under the newsroom and library in Wood-street are some public baths, with all the requisite accommodations. The works for lighting the town with gas were erected at an expense of £12,500, raised in £25 shares, by a company incorporated by act of parliament in 1822, and contain four gasometers, of which one is capable of holding 24,000 cubic feet of gas.

The manufacture of woollen-cloths, and the spinning of worsted-yarn, were formerly carried on to a very great extent, affording employment to nearly the whole of the population; and Leland, describing the town in his time, says; "it standeth now al by clothyng;" but these manufactures have been principally transferred to other towns in the West riding, chiefly Leeds, and the staple TRADE is now mainly in corn, cattle, and wool. The shares of the original proprietors of the Tammy Hall, a spacious building erected for the sale of the lighter kinds of woollen-stuffs, have been purchased; and the building has been converted into a power-loom factory for damasks, moreens, and woollen-stuffs. There are also some large dyeing establishments, works for the manufacture of starch, several breweries and malting establishments, roperies, copperas-works, iron-foundries, and some yards for building boats and sloops. The trade in corn is very extensive, and, according to the official returns, more wheat is sold here than in Mark-lane, London; warehouses for storing it have been erected on so large a scale that more than 200,000 quarters may be deposited in them at once. Near the bridge is the soke mill, in which, with the exception of the inhabitants of Ossett, who have purchased their exemption, all persons within the jurisdiction of the soke are compelled to grind their corn; great quantities of barley are grown in the neighbourhood, and more malt is made here than in any district of equal extent in the kingdom. The trade in wool is also very considerable, and large quantities, procured in the vicinity, are sold to the manufacturers of the adjacent towns; coal, with which the surrounding districts abound, is brought to the town by railroads from the several collieries, and is sent in sloops to various places.

The river Calder was made navigable in 1698, and the Aire and Calder Navigation Company have their principal station near the bridge, with extensive wharfs and warehouses on the north side of the river, whence fly-boats start daily to Goole and Selby, and also to Dewsbury, Halifax, Todmorden, and Manchester. The navigation opens a direct communication with Hull, the East riding of York, Lincolnshire, and the whole of the eastern coast; the Barnsley canal with Barnsley and Sheffield; and the Calder and Hebble navigation, and the Huddersfield canal, with the southern part of Lancashire. The North-Midland railway passes about two miles to the south-east of the town, where is the Oaken-shaw station; and the Manchester and Leeds railway runs through the town, being conveyed by a viaduct of several arches over Kirkgate, by a level beam bridge. The market, which is on Friday, is abundantly supplied with corn and provisions of all kinds; and there is also a large market on alternate Wednesdays, for fat-cattle and sheep, which is numerously attended from distant parts of the country. The market-cross, built by subscription about the year 1720, is a handsome structure of the Doric order, consisting of a circular colonnade, with entablature and cornice, and crowned by a lofty dome; a spiral staircase within affords an ascent to a large room, lighted by a lantern, in which the meetings of the commissioners for paving, lighting, and watching, are held. From the confined area of the market-place, the corn-market was many years since removed to the top of Westgate, where a spacious corn-exchange, of the Corinthian order, has been erected at an expense of £10,000, from a design, and under the superintendance, of Mr. Moffat, of Doncaster; the saloon of the building is 99 feet in length, 46 in width, and 36 high, and the offices and appendages are well adapted to the purposes of the trade. The cattle market is held in an area on the south side of the town, comprising about 3½ acres, and is fitted up with pens and the various accommodations. Fairs, chiefly for horses, horned-cattle, and pedlery, are held on the 4th and 5th of July, and on the 11th and 12th of November, the latter being the statute-fair for hiring servants.

The town is under the superintendance of a constable, appointed and sworn into office by the steward of the lord of the manor, at the court leet, which takes place half-yearly, at the Moot-hall, in Kirkgate. A manor court, for the determination of petty causes, and for the recovery of debts under £5, is held by the steward, at the Moot-hall, every three weeks. There is a petty-session for the district on Monday, by the magistrates for the West riding; and the Christmas quarter-sessions for the riding occur by adjournment from Knaresborough, in the court-house in Wood-street, a handsome and appropriate building, first opened for the Christmas session of 1809. The register-office, a substantial building of stone, enlarged by the addition of a fire-proof wing in 1829, and also the office of the clerk of the peace for the riding, are situated in the town. The house of correction for the riding, near the bottom of Westgate, is an extensive pile of building constructed on the improved plan, comprising 36 work-rooms, 19 day-rooms, 19 airing-yards, a tread-mill for grinding corn, and 307 separate cells, with apartments for the sick, a chapel, and a school, the whole well adapted for classification; the prisoners are employed in weaving coarse cloths, calico, and linsey, and other work; a very considerable enlargement of the building is in progress. The town was constituted a borough, with authority to send one member to parliament, by the act of the 2nd of Wm. IV., cap. 45; the right of election, as in all the new boroughs, is wholly vested in the registered householders to the annual value of £10 and upwards; the borough comprises an area of 1036 acres, and the returning officer is appointed by the sheriff.

The parish comprises about 9000 acres, of which the soil, though various, is generally fertile, and in good cultivation, and the substratum abounds with different kinds of mineral produce. The baronial seat of the manor, which consists of a very extensive tract of land stretching nearly 30 miles in extent from east to west, was Sandal Castle, anciently a spacious structure of formidable strength, but now a desolate ruin, having been demolished during the parliamentary war in the reign of Charles I. The LIVING is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £29. 19. 2.; net income, £537; patron, the Crown; impropiators, the Heir of the late Sir James Ramsden, Bart., and others: the vicarial tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1793. The parochial church, situated on an eminence in the centre of the town, was erected in 1329, on the site of an ancient structure of Norman character, and, with the exception of the tower and spire, was rebuilt, on a large scale, in 1469; it has been subsequently partially reconstructed at various times, and the upper portion of the spire, which had been blown down by a violent gale, and never properly restored, was renewed in 1823. The edifice is chiefly in the early English style, but comprising portions of later date, with a lofty square embattled tower surmounted by a handsome spire, together 237 feet high; the chancel is separated from the nave by an elaborately-carved screen of oak, and contains some rich tabernacle-work, and the whole of the interior abounds with elegant detail. An afternoon lectureship was founded in 1652, by Lady Camden, who endowed it with £100 per annum, in the gift of the Mercers' Company; and an evening lectureship was established by subscription in 1801, which is in the patronage of seven trustees, including the vicar. The church dedicated to St. John, erected under a special act of parliament, at an expense of £10,000, and completed in 1795, is finely situated in a spacious cemetery; it is a handsome structure in the modern style, with a tower surmounted by a cupola and dome supported on a range of Ionic pillars, and contains more than 1000 sittings. The interior is chastely decorated; the east window is embellished with scriptural subjects in stained glass; the altar-piece is ornamented with representations of the Crucifixion, the Agony, and the Resurrection of the Saviour; and in niches above are two figures representing the Law and the Gospel, painted to resemble sculpture. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the vicar; net income £118. A church dedicated to the Holy Trinity has been built at an expense of £4000, raised wholly by subscription; it is in the early English style, with a turreted steeple, and contains 1000 sittings, of which one-third are let at a nominal rent, and the remainder are wholly free; it was consecrated by the Bishop of Ripon, September 30th, 1843, and the living is in the patronage of Trustees. Churches have also been erected at Alverthorpe, Horbury, Stanley, and Thornes, which are noticed under their several heads. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Primitive Methodists, Wesleyans, Unitarians, and Roman Catholics.

The Free grammar school was established in 1592, by charter of Queen Elizabeth, and is endowed with property given by the Saville family, and various subsequent donations, producing an income of about £360; it is under the direction of fourteen governors, who are a body corporate, and appoint a head master with a salary of £160, and an usher with a salary of £80. There are belonging to the foundation six exhibitions of £80 each per annum, of which two to Clare Hall, Cambridge, were instituted by Thomas Cave, Esq.; one to Queen's College, Oxford, by Lady Elizabeth Hastings; and three to either of the universities, by John Storie, Esq. The building is handsome and commodious, and contains a good library. Among the pupils educated here, were, Richard Bentley, D.D.; Dr. John Potter, Archbishop of Canterbury; and Dr. John Radcliffe, the munificent founder of the Radcliffe library of the university of Oxford, all three natives of the town. The West Riding proprietary school, for which a spacious building, capable of receiving 250 scholars, was erected in 1833, after a design of Richard Lane, Esq., of Manchester, was established by a company of proprietors with a capital of £15,000, raised in £25 shares, and vested in ten trustees; the general management is confided to a board of fifteen directors, and all the internal regulations of the school are under the controul of the principal, the Rev. Richard Garvey, M.A. The course of instruction comprehends the classics, the modern languages, and the mathematics in all their branches; the bishop of the diocese is visitor, and Earl Fitzwilliam, president, of the institution.

The Green-coat charity school was founded in 1707, by the trustees of the charity estates, and is endowed with lands given by various benefactors, and augmented by a gift of land appropriated by John Storie, Esq., to the instruction of poor children, of which the site of the cattle-market is part. The whole, including a bequest of John Bromley, Esq., in 1722, of cottages and lands, of which he appropriated £5 per annum to the curate of Wakefield, and the remainder to the clothing and instruction of children, produces an income of nearly £600 per annum, of which £73. 10. are paid to the master, and £30 to the mistress of the school, and the remainder partly expended in clothing, and in coal and books. National schools for boys and girls, the former in Burton-street, and the latter in Almshouse-lane, were commenced in 1813, and are attended by 200 boys and 150 girls; and Lancasterian schools afford instruction to an equal number of children of both sexes. A school of industry for 50 girls, and an infants' school, are supported by subscription.

The almshouses in Almshouse-lane were founded in 1646, by Cotton Horne, Esq., who endowed them with tenements and land worth £161 per annum, augmented in 1669 with a similar bequest, producing £121; the funds, together with a small rent-charge, amount to £300 a year, of which five shillings per week are paid to ten women, and £9 per annum to a nurse, and the remainder distributed among the inmates in coal and provisions. Almshouses for ten men, adjoining the former, were established in 1669, by William Horne, Esq., who assigned to them property now yielding £150 per annum, from which each of the almsmen receives £11. 14., with coal and a portion of provisions; the whole of the almshouses were rebuilt in 1793. There are houses also at Brooksbank for five persons, founded in 1580, by Leonard Bate, Esq., who endowed them with property now valued at £46 a year. The management of all these almshouses is vested in the governors of the grammar school, who have likewise the distribution of a bequest by John Bromley, Esq., distinguished from his bequest already noticed, as the "new gift," producing more than £700 per annum, for clothing and apprenticing boys, with whom £5 are given as a fee, £3 per annum to his master for clothing him, and, on the expiration of his indentures, £5 to the master, and £15 to himself, if he has conducted himself well. £40 are distributed yearly among poor housekeepers; and there is also a bequest by Lady Bolles, in 1662, for apprenticing children, producing £56 per annum.

The Dispensary, in Silver-street, was established by subscription, in 1824, and is under the care of a resident apothecary, and gratuitously visited by two physicians and two surgeons; its annual expenditure averages £400 per annum, and the number of patients 700. The House of recovery for patients under contagious fever, on Westgate Common, was instituted in 1826, and has accommodation for ten patients. The West Riding pauper lunatic asylum, established under an act of parliament in 1808, was opened in 1818, and has since been considerably enlarged: the building, erected at an expense of £50,000, possesses accommodation for 400 patients; it is under the superintendence of a resident physician, two surgeons, a chaplain, and other officers, and the number of patients is about 388. There are also numerous provident institutions, benefit and friendly societies, and a savings' bank, in which the deposits amount to £50,000, and the number of depositors is about 1200. The poor law union of Wakefield comprises 17 townships or places, containing a population of 45,648. On the bridge over the Calder are the remains of a chapel supposed to have been erected by Edward III., and endowed by that monarch with £10 per annum for two chaplains, and rebuilt by Edward IV. in memory of his father, the Duke of York, and his followers, who fell in the battle of Wakefield. It is a beautiful structure in the decorated English style, about ten yards in length and eight in width; the west front is extremely rich in ornamental detail, and divided into compartments by buttresses, with canopied niches, and adorned with delicate tracery and every embellishment for which that graceful style is distinguished. It has been lately used as a counting-house by a corn-merchant; but it is in contemplation to restore it as a church when the estimated expense, £2000, has been subscribed. Besides those already noticed, Dr. Thomas Zouch, Joseph Bingham, M.A., author of Origines Ecclesiasticæ, and Dr. John Burton, author of the Monasticon Eboracense, were natives of the place.

WAKELEY, an extra-parochial liberty, formerly a distinct parish, in the union of BUNTINGFORD, hundred of EDWINTREE, county of HERTFORD, 2 miles (S. W.) from Buntingford; containing 7 inhabitants.

WAKERING, GREAT (St. Nicholas), a parish, in the union and hundred of ROCHFORD, S. division of the county of ESSEX, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Southend; containing 860 inhabitants. The parish is situated near the mouth of the Thames, where is a small convenient haven, and is traversed by the road to Foulness Island. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £20. 13. 4.; patron, the Bishop of London; improprator, T. Clough, Esq. The great tithes have been commuted for £640, and the vicarial for £290; the impropriate glebe comprises 60, and the vicarial 2, acres. The church is a neat substantial structure, with a tower and spire. There is a place of worship for Independents.

WAKERING, LITTLE (St. Mary), a parish, in the union and hundred of ROCHFORD, S. division of ESSEX, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Southend; containing 301 inhabitants. This parish, bounded on the south by the parish of Great Wakering, includes the Island of Potten, which is formed by the river Bromhill and the haven of Wakering, and comprises 2694 acres, whereof 439 are common or waste. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12, and in the gift of the improprators, the Governors of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London: the great tithes have been commuted for £390, with a glebe of 18 acres, and the vicarial for £235, with 2 acres and a house. The church is a small ancient edifice, with a tower, on which are the armorial-bearings of Bishop Wakering.

WAKERLEY (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of UPPINGHAM, hundred of CORBY, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E.) from Uppingham; containing 216 inhabitants. It is bounded on the east and north by the river Welland, separating it from the county of Rutland, and consists of 1804 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 12. 6.; net income, £100; patron, the Marquess of Exeter. The Rev. Matthew Snow, in 1797, bequeathed £100 three per cent. consols., the interest to be expended in Bibles and Prayer-books for children.

WALBERSWICK (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union and hundred of BLYTHING, E. division of SUFFOLK, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S. W. by S.) from Southwold; containing 339 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 1672 acres, and is intersected by the navigable river Blyth, which falls into the sea at its northern extremity. The living is a perpetual curacy, held with that of Blythburgh; net income, £41; patron, Sir C. Blois, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £193. The church is in ruins, but a part of the south aisle has been fitted up for the performance of divine service: from the extent of the remains, it is probable that this place was formerly of much greater importance than it is at present.

WALBERTON (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of WEST HAMPNETT, hundred of AVISFORD, rape of ARUNDEL, W. division of SUSSEX, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Arundel; containing 561 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Arundel to Bognor, and comprises about 1500 acres, of which 100 are pasture, and the remainder arable land. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Yapton united, valued in the king's books at £10. 19. 2.; net income, £468; patron and appropriator, the Bishop of Chichester. The church is principally in the early English style. John Nash, in 1732, bequeathed a house and land, with a rent-charge of £12, for teaching children; and a national school has been established in connexion with the charity. In a field near Airsford House was found, in 1817, a coffer of gritstone, resembling that of Petworth, containing numerous vessels of glass and Roman pottery of rude construction.

WALBURN, a township, in the parish of DOWNHOLME, union of RICHMOND, wapentake of HANG-WEST, N. riding of YORK, 5 miles (S. W.) from Richmond; containing 24 inhabitants. It comprises about 1600 acres of high moorland, set out in farms.

WALBY, a township, in the parish of CROSBY-UPON-EDEN, union of CARLISLE, ESKDALE ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND, 4 miles (N. E. by N.) from Carlisle; containing 49 inhabitants. The village appears to have derived its name from its situation near the Roman wall.

WALCOMBE, a tything, in the parish of ST. CUTHBERT, without the limits of the city of WELLS, union of WELLS, hundred of WELLS-FORUM, E. division of SOMERSET; containing 31 inhabitants.

WALCOT (St. Nicholas), a parish, in the union of SLEAFORD, wapentake of AVELAND, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. W.) from Folkingham; containing 173 inhabitants. This place appears to have formed part of the possessions of Sempringham Priory, and there are two pieces of land still called the Granges, in which the monks of that convent had once a prison. The parish comprises by measurement 1750 acres, of which 754 are arable, 958 meadow and pasture, and 3 woodland; the soil is fertile, and easily convertible; the surface is boldly undulated, and in parts hilly, and there are some quarries of stone used chiefly for the roads. The living is a vicarage; net income, £159; patron and impropriator, Sir G. Heathcote, Bart., whose tithes have been commuted for £165. The church is principally in the decorated English style, with a tower surmounted by a fine crocketed spire: in the south aisle is a beautiful canopied niche with buttresses terminating in pinnacles; the east window is of very elegant design, and there are some remains of ancient stained glass. On the edge of the fens is a powerful mineral spring.

WALCOT (St. SWITHIN), a parish, in the union of BATH, partly within the city of BATH, and partly in the hundred of BATH-FORUM, E. division of SOMERSET; containing 26,210 inhabitants. The parish includes those parts of the city lying on the north, north-east, and north-west sides of the parish of St. Michael; also some handsome ranges of buildings on the declivities of Lansdown and Beacon hills.—See BATH.

WALCOTE, a hamlet, and formerly a chapelry, in the parish of MISTERTON, union of LUTTERWORTH, hundred of GUTHLAXTON, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (E. by S.) from Lutterworth; containing 521 inhabitants. The chapel, dedicated to St. Martin, has been destroyed.

WALCOTT, a chapelry, in the parish of BILLINGHAY, union of SLEAFORD, First division of the wapentake of LANGOE, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, $8\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Sleaford; containing 633 inhabitants, and comprising 3138*a. 2r. 34p.* The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Billingham: the chapel is dedicated to St. Oswald. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WALCOTT (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the TUNSTEAD and HAPPING incorporation, hundred of HAPPING, E. division of NORFOLK, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from North Walsham; containing 172 inhabitants. It is situated on the eastern coast, and comprises 696*a. 1r. 35p.*, of which 674 acres are arable. The living is a perpetual curacy, valued in the king's books at £30; net income, £80; patron and appropriator, the Bishop of Norwich, whose tithes have been commuted for £321. The church is a handsome structure in the decorated and later English styles, with a lofty square embattled tower; on the south side of the chancel are three sedilia of stone, and a piscina of elegant design. About thirty years since, a portion of waste land, containing nearly five acres, was set out as a compensation to the poor for the loss they had sustained by the inclosure; the proceeds are laid out in coal.

WALCOTT, with MEMBRIS, a hamlet, in the parish of HOLY CROSS, PERSHORE, union, and Upper division of the hundred, of PERSHORE, Pershore and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 2 miles (N. by W.) from Pershore; containing 383 inhabitants.

WALDEN, with BURTON, a township, in the parish of AYSGARTH, wapentake of HANG-WEST, N. riding of YORK, 10 miles (W. S. W.) from Middleham; containing 523 inhabitants. The hamlet of Walden has some scattered houses in its romantic dale, extending up the Walden stream to the distance of five miles south of Burton, between lofty moors and falls.

WALDEN, KING'S (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of HITCHIN, hundred of HITCHIN and PIRTON, county of HERTFORD, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Hitchin; containing 1034 inhabitants. The living is a donative curacy, in the patronage of W. Hale, Esq.; net income, £57. On the north side of the chancel of the church is a chapel, the burial-place of the family of Hale, erected by William Hale, Esq., who died in 1648. About £12 per annum, arising from bequests of R. Hale in 1616, and W. Smith in 1771, are distributed among the poor.

WALDEN ST. PAUL'S (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of HITCHIN, hundred of CASHIO, or liberty of ST. ALBAN'S, county of HERTFORD, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Welwyn; containing 1113 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10; present net income, £142; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, London. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents. This parish is one of fourteen entitled to a share of the charity of Henry Smith, which consists of about 295 acres of land, producing £325 per annum.

WALDEN, SAFFRON

(St. MARY), an incorporated market-town and parish, possessing separate jurisdiction, and the head of a union locally in the hundred of UTTLESFORD, N. division of ESSEX, 27 miles (N. N. W.) from Chelmsford, and 40 (N. N. E.) from London; containing 5111 inhabitants. The name of Walden is said to be derived from the Saxon words Weald and Den, signifying a woody valley. At a later period the place was called Waldenburgh; and in the reign of Stephen, when Geoffrey de Mandeville, Earl of Essex, procured from the Empress Maud the grant of a market, previously held at Newport, the town took the appellation of Cheping-Walden. The present designation owes its origin to the culture of saffron in the neighbourhood, which is supposed to have been introduced into England in the time of Edward III., but has long since been discontinued: the device of the seal of the corporation is a rebus on the name, being three saffron flowers walled in. The Earl of Essex, above-mentioned, who was grandson of Geoffrey de Mandeville, a Norman chief, and one of the most distinguished followers of William I., founded a Benedictine priory, near the south-western extremity of the parish, which was richly endowed, and, in 1190, converted into an abbey; its revenue, at the time of the Dissolution, amounted, according to Speed, to £406. 5. 11. In 1537, the abbey was surrendered, with all its possessions, to the king, who granted them to Sir Thomas Audley, K.G., afterwards lord chancellor, and created Baron Audley, of Walden. Upon the site of the monastic buildings, and partly out of the ruins, Thomas, first earl of Suffolk, in 1603, erected a stately fabric, which he called Audley-End, in honour of his maternal grandfather, the chancellor; but of this magnificent house, which occupied thirteen years in completing, and was considered the largest mansion within the realm, one court only remains, though even this comparatively small portion of the original building forms a splendid residence. Lord Braybrooke, the present possessor, has greatly improved the estate.

The town, which is beautifully situated in a district abounding with interesting scenery, contains several good streets, and a spacious market-place, in which is a neat town-hall. The old houses are principally built of lath and plaster, and some of them are very ancient; but the more modern ones are of brick, and recent improvements have materially altered the general appearance of the place; a bridge has been built over the Slade, and some pleasant promenades have been opened for the use of the inhabitants. The situation of the town is thus emphatically described by Dr. Stukeley: "A narrow tongue of land shoots itself out like a promontory, encompassed with a valley in the form of a horse-shoe, inclosed by distant and delightful hills. On the bottom of the tongue, towards the east, stands the ruins of the castle, and on the top, or extremity, the church, the greater part of which is seen above the surrounding houses." A scientific and literary institution has been established, and there are horticultural and other societies. The trade in malt and barley is very considerable. The market is on Saturday; fairs are held on Mid-Lent Saturday and November 1st, and a fair for sheep and lambs takes place on the 3rd and 4th of August, which is much frequented. By a charter granted in 1549, the controul of the town was vested in twenty persons; but the government was remodelled by William and Mary, and, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76, the corporation at present consists of a mayor, four aldermen, and twelve councillors; the number of magistrates is two, besides the mayor, late mayor, and recorder. The sessions are held quarterly, under a grant from his late majesty; and a court of record occurs every three weeks, for the recovery of debts and the determination of pleas to any amount, at which the recorder presides. The courts leet and baron for the manors of Brook and Chipping-Walden, belonging to the owner of Audley-End, take place at stated times; and the magistrates for the division have their sessions in the town, once a fortnight.

The LIVING is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £33. 6. 8., and in the patronage of Lord Braybrooke, the impropiator: the tithes have been commuted for £1061. 8. 3., of which £710. 18. 3. are payable to the impropiator, £300 to the vicar, £30 to the trustees of Edward VI.'s almshouses, and £20 to Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge; there are 5 acres of vicarial glebe. The church, which was erected in the reigns of Henry VI. and VII., is a spacious structure in the later English style, with a lofty square embattled tower, strengthened by double buttresses of five stages, terminating in minarets rising above the battlements, and surmounted by a lofty crocketed spire of recent erection; the western front is of imposing grandeur, having over the central doorway a handsome window of three, and at the extremities of the side aisles windows of five, lights of elegant design, and at the angles of the building enriched buttresses terminating in crocketed pinnacles. The interior is beautifully arranged; the nave is lighted by clerestory windows, and separated from the aisles by clustered columns supporting the roof, which, like that of the chancel and aisles, is richly groined; and the altar is embellished with a fine painting of the Holy Family, after Correggio. The middle and south chancels were erected by Chancellor Audley, and the north by the inhabitants, aided by John Leche, who was vicar from 1489 to 1521, and whose tomb may still be seen near the north chancel door. There are places of worship for General Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Wesleyans, and Unitarians. Walden school, in which the classics were formerly taught, owes its origin to John Leche, and his sister, Johane Bradbury; the learned Sir Thomas Smith, secretary to Edward VI., a native of Walden, is said to have received his early education here, and through his interest the school was advanced to a royal foundation. There is also a charity school, now on the national plan, established by subscription, and subsequently endowed with benefactions producing £100 per annum. A range of almshouses was built in 1829, at the south-west end of the town, to replace some founded by Edward VI., for the reception of sixteen decayed housekeepers of each sex; the elevation of the buildings, which cost nearly £5000, is handsome and appropriate, and the income is above £900 a year. This was the first town in which the system of allotment for the poor and working classes was introduced; and about forty acres are thus appropriated, much to the benefit of nearly 800 of the population. It is the head of a union, comprising twenty-four parishes, with a population of 18,821, and a commodious workhouse has been erected. Between the town and Audley-End Park are the remains of an old embankment called The Battle Ditches, respecting which there is no clear or satisfactory tradition: Dr. Stukeley found the south bank to be 730 feet long, 20 high, 50 broad at the base, and 8 at the top; the length of the western bank is 588 feet: both banks and ditches are well preserved and extremely bold. The ruins of the castle, erected soon after the Conquest, by Geoffrey de Mandeville, are only remarkable for the thickness of the walls and the rude character of the building; the remains, and the hill on which they stand, are held by trustees, under lease from Lord Braybrooke, for the benefit of the town. A museum was erected within the grounds, in 1835, which contains many rare specimens of zoology and other departments of natural history; and a spacious hall has been added to the building by Lord Braybrooke for an agricultural society. Lord Howard de Walden takes the title of Baron from the town.

WALDEN-STUBBS, a township, in the parish of WOMERSLEY, Lower division of the wapentake of OS-GOLDCROSS, W. riding of YORK, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Pontefract; containing 137 inhabitants. The township comprises about 1200 acres of fine arable and pasture land, in good cultivation; the surface is level, and the soil a rich loamy clay, sometimes flooded by the river Went, which passes on the south-east. The village consists chiefly of scattered houses. The tithes were commuted for land in 1787.

WALDERSHARE (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union and hundred of EASTRY, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, E. division of KENT, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Dover; containing 92 inhabitants. A fair for toys and pedlery is held on Whit-Tuesday. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 8.; net income, £133; patron and appropriator, the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church contains some handsome monuments. A national school for this and the adjoining parishes is supported by the Earl of Guilford, whose seat is in the parish.

WALDINGFIELD, GREAT (ST. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of SUDBURY, hundred of BABERGH, W. division of SUFFOLK, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Sudbury; containing 676 inhabitants, and comprising 2423*a.* 2*r.* 2*p.* The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £21. 6. 8., and in the gift of Clare Hall, Cambridge: the tithes have been commuted for £710, and the glebe comprises 20 acres. Roger Spencer, lord mayor of London in 1594, was a native of this parish.

WALDINGFIELD, LITTLE (ST. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of SUDBURY, hundred of BABERGH, W. division of SUFFOLK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Sudbury; containing 420 inhabitants, and comprising 1574*a.* 3*r.* 14*p.* The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 18. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the incumbent and impropiator, the Rev. B. B. Syer: the great tithes have been commuted for £245, and the vicarial for £164. 14.; the glebe contains one acre. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Holbrook Hall, in the parish, is the seat of a branch of the Hanmer family.

WALDINGHAM, a parish, in the union of GODSTONE, Second division of the hundred of TANDRIDGE, county of SURREY, 5 miles (N. E. by N.) from Godstone; containing 47 inhabitants. The living is a donative curacy; net income, £45; patron, J. F. Jones, Esq. The church, seated on an eminence, is a small neat structure, rebuilt by the patron in 1830. Numerous relics of antiquity have been found in the grounds of Upper Court Lodge, now a farm.

WALDRIDGE, a hamlet, in the parish of DINTON, hundred of AYLESBURY, county of BUCKINGHAM; containing 17 inhabitants.

WALDRIDGE, a township, in the parish and union of CHESTER-LE-STREET, Middle division of CHESTER ward, county of DURHAM, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. W.) from Chester-le-Street; containing 432 inhabitants. This place, situated on the north of the Cone beck, a mile to the west of Chester, was long the estate of the Lumleys, of whom John, Lord Lumley, alienated it to the Smith family in 1607; it has since passed through various families. The township comprises an area of 795 acres. A coal-pit has been opened; and on a common of between 200 and 300 acres, immediately above it, appears a vein of lead-ore. The tithes were commuted in 1841, for a rent-charge of £63, payable to the perpetual curate of the parish. There is a place of worship for dissenters, which is also used as a day school.

WALDRINGFIELD (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of WOODBIDGE, hundred of CARLFORD, E. division of SUFFOLK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Woodbridge; containing 174 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 17. 11., and in the gift of the Rev. William Edge: the tithes have been commuted for £160, and the glebe comprises 47 acres. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

WALDRON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of UCKFIELD, hundred of SHIPLAKE, rape of PEVENSEY, E. division of SUSSEX, 6 miles (E. S. E.) from Uckfield; containing 1065 inhabitants. The parish comprises 6217*a.* 3*r.* 13*p.*, of which about one-half are arable, one-sixth meadow and pasture, and one-third woodland and roads. The village is situated on elevated ground, and the surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified; there are some chalybeate springs in the parish, and iron-works were formerly carried on. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 4. 7., and in the patronage of Exeter College, Oxford: the tithes have been commuted for £616, and there are 38 acres of glebe. The church is partly in the early and partly in the later English style, with an embattled tower: from the churchyard is an extensive view, embracing the town of Lewes and the South Downs. The Wesleyans have a place of worship. There are some picturesque remains of a fine old mansion at Possingworth.

WALES (ST. JOHN), a parish, in the union of WORKSOP, S. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, 10 miles (E. by S.) from Sheffield; containing 351 inhabitants. This parish, in the Domesday survey Walise, belonged to Morcar, Earl of Northumberland, in the reign of Edward the Confessor, and subsequently to the Hewett family; it comprises by measurement 1255 acres, of which 711 are arable, 525 pasture, and 19 woodland, and is chiefly the property of the Duke of Leeds. The village, which is of considerable antiquity, is situated on a gentle acclivity near the Chesterfield and Trent canal, which passes under a tunnel one mile and a half in length. A small coal-mine is in operation. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Prebendary of Laughton-en-le-Morthen in the Cathedral of York, the appropriator: the tithes were commuted for money payments in 1766. The church is in the Norman style, and contains a mural monument of the Hewetts. Six children are taught for an annuity of £6, the gift of Mr. Turie.

WALESBY (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of CAISTOR, S. division of the wapentake of WALSHCROFT, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Market-Rasen; containing, with the hamlets of Otby and Risby, 326 inhabitants. The parish is situated in a picturesque part of the wolds, and comprises 2868 acres, of which 342 are common or waste land; the surface is of a bold and varied character; corn is grown to some extent, and the rearing of cattle is one of the chief occupations of the farmer. The lands of Risby, which consist of about 730 acres, are the property of Clare Hall, Cambridge. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £23. 18. 1 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £441; patron, J. J. Angerstein, Esq., to whom the greater portion of the parish belongs: there is a glebe of about 99 acres, and a glebe-house, erected in 1632. The church, which stands on a commanding eminence, is an ancient edifice with a square tower, and was repaired and new-roofed in 1822, at an expense of nearly £1000. Dr. Daniel Waterland, a celebrated controversialist, who vindicated the doctrine of the Trinity against Dr. Clarke, and published a History of the Athanasian Creed and other works, was born here; and Robert Burton, author of the Anatomy of Melancholy, was rector of the parish in the 17th century.

WALESBY (ST. EDMUND), a parish, in the union of SOUTHWELL, Hatfield division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 3 miles (N. E.) from Ollerton; containing 416 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1429*a.* 1*r.* 29*p.*; the soil is partly clay and bog, but chiefly a fertile sand; the surface is generally flat, and the grounds are watered by a small brook. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 1. 3.; net income, £158; patron, the Earl of Scarborough. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1821; the glebe comprises 152 acres. The church is in the Norman style, with a low tower surmounted by a pyramidal roof.

WALFORD (St. LEONARD), a parish, in the union of ROSS, hundred of GREY TREE, county of HEREFORD, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Ross; containing 1227 inhabitants. This parish, situated on the left bank of the river Wye, is intersected by the road from Ross to Gloucester, and contains 3024 acres. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Ruardean annexed, valued in the king's books at £13. 2. 1.; net income, £218; patron, the Precentor in the Cathedral of Hereford. A school is endowed with £5 per annum; a school appertaining to Baptists is supported by the trustees of the late Edward Goff, Esq., and another school is partly maintained by a donation from a private individual.

WALFORD, with LETTON and NEWTON, a township, in the parish of LEINTWARDINE, union of KNIGHTON, hundred of WIGMORE, county of HEREFORD, 13 miles (N. W. by N.) from Leominster; containing 213 inhabitants, and comprising 1345 acres.

WALGHERTON, a township, in the parish of WYBUNBURY, union and hundred of NANTWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Nantwich; containing 229 inhabitants.

WALGRAVE (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of BRIKWORTH, hundred of ORLINGBURY, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Wellingborough; containing 593 inhabitants, and comprising 2251a. 36p. The village is pleasantly situated on the road to Kettering; the population is partly employed in the manufacture of shoes, and in lace-making. The living is a rectory, with that of Hannington annexed, valued in the king's books at £22. 4. 7., and in the gift of the Bishop of Lincoln: the tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1776; the glebe comprises 436 acres, with a house. The church is a handsome structure, chiefly in the decorated English style, with a square embattled tower surmounted by a lofty spire. There is a place of worship for Baptists. Montague Lane, in 1670, bequeathed £200, of which the interest, £12, is applied to a national school.

WALHAM, a hamlet, in the parish of CLAREBOROUGH, union of EAST RETFORD, North-Clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM; containing 110 inhabitants.

WALHAM-GREEN, a chapelry, in the parish of FULHAM, union of KENSINGTON, Kensington division of the hundred of OSSULSTONE, county of MIDDLESEX, 3 miles (S. W. by W.) from London. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £230; patron, the Vicar of Fulham. The chapel, dedicated to St. John, was erected in 1829, at an expense of £9683, raised by subscription, and a grant from the Parliamentary Commissioners; it is a handsome edifice, in the early English style, with a tower. An asylum was recently erected in connexion with the Butchers' Charitable Institution.

WALHAMPTON, a tything, in the parish of BOLDBRE, union of LYMINGTON, hundred of CHRISTCHURCH, Lymington and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 237 inhabitants.

WALKER, a township, in the parish of LONG BENTON, union of TYNEMOUTH, E. division of CASTLE ward,

S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 3 miles (E.) from Newcastle; containing 3417 inhabitants. The township is bounded on the south by the river Tyne, and comprises 1108a. 3r. 33p., of which the soil is a strong clay, good for wheat; the whole belonging to the corporation of Newcastle, partly in their own right, and partly as trustees for Jesus' Hospital. Along the banks of the river are several extensive manufactories and coal-staiths. Walker colliery is the property of Captain Potts and Messrs. Jobling and Carr; the pit is 110 fathoms deep to the main seam, and the coal, which is of the best quality, is chiefly sent to the London market. In this colliery is a salt-spring, which was used in the manufacture of soda, when that substance was first made an article of commerce; it was begun by permission of the government in 1795, by Messrs. Surtees and Losh, who may be regarded as the first manufacturers of mineral alkali and soda in England. Large iron-works are carried on by Messrs. Losh, Wilson, and Bell, whose blast-furnaces, foundries, rolling-mills, and general engineering, employ about a thousand hands. Messrs. Charles Rayne and Co. have mills for crushing seeds, an oil-factory, and turpentine-distillery; iron ship-building, also, is conducted by Mr. Coutts; and bricks and tiles, and copperas, are extensively manufactured. The Newcastle and North Shields railway has an intermediate station here. The township is exempt from great tithes: the vicarial tithes have been commuted for £22. 10., and a modus of £2 per annum is paid to Balliol College, Oxford. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Presbyterians; and two schools are supported. The great Roman wall passes on its way to Wallsend, and terminates within a mile and a half of the village; there are traces of the ditch in front, and stones and other remains have frequently been dug up from the foundations.

WALKERINGHAM (St. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish, in the union of GAINSBOROUGH, North-Clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 4 miles (N. W. by W.) from Gainsborough; containing 536 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the east by the river Trent, and comprises 2861a. 3r. 3p.: the village consists of a long line of detached and irregularly-built dwellings. There is a ferry across the Trent; and the Chesterfield canal passes through the parish. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 11. 4.; net income, £204; patrons and improPRIATORS, the Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1802; the glebe comprises 158 acres. The church is a spacious ancient structure; in the churchyard are the base and part of the shaft of an old cross. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Robert Woodhouse, in 1719, bequeathed a rent-charge of £15 for teaching children.

WALKERITH, a hamlet, in the parish and union of GAINSBOROUGH, wapentake of CORRINGHAM, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Gainsborough; containing 77 inhabitants.

WALKERN (St. MARY), a parish, in the hundred of BROADWATER, union and county of HERTFORD, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Stevenage; containing 718 inhabitants. A fair for cattle is held on November 5th. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £20. 1. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of King's College, Cambridge: the great tithes have been commuted for £75. 7., and the rectorial for £588. 13.; the glebes comprise respectively 100 and 26 acres. The church contains a curious monument of a Knight Templar. There is a place of worship for Independents.

WALKHAMPTON, a parish, in the union of TAVISTOCK, hundred of ROBOROUGH, Midland-Roborough and S. divisions of DEVON, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Tavistock; containing 717 inhabitants. The parish comprises 10,501 acres, of which 6602 are common or waste: the Plymouth railway passes through. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 14. 7., and in the gift of the impropiator, Sir R. Lopes, Bart.: the great tithes have been commuted for £124, and the vicarial for £140, with a glebe of 21 acres; there is also a rent-charge of £37. 10., payable to the rector of Bickleigh. The church is situated on the verge of Dartmoor Forest. Lady Modyford, in 1719, gave a school-house, with the rent of certain premises, now producing about £161.

WALKINGHAM-HILL, with OCCANEY, an extra-parochial liberty, in the Upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, W. riding of YORK, 4 miles (N.) from Knaresborough; containing 24 inhabitants. It comprises about 330 acres, divided into two farms, and a rabbit-warren. The tithes have been commuted for £36, of which £2 are payable to the vicar, and £34 to the prebendary of Beechill and Knaresborough.

WALKINGTON (ALL HALLOWS), a parish, in the union of BEVERLEY, partly in the Hunsley-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, but chiefly in the wapentake of HOWDENSHERE, E. riding of YORK, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Beverley; containing 633 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 3552 acres, of which the greater portion is arable land; and consists of the two constablewicks or townships of Walkington and Provosts'-Fee; the latter so called, as having been anciently the fee of the provost of Beverley. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £24. 13. 4.; net income, £676; patron and incumbent, the Rev. D. Ferguson: the tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1794. The church, with the exception of the tower, was rebuilt in 1820. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also a school, with a house for the master, built in 1822. Wm. Sherwood, in 1537, left property, now producing £86 per annum, for the poor, and other purposes.

WALKINSTEAD, SURREY.—See GODSTONE.

WALKMILL, a township, in the parish of WARKWORTH, union of ALNWICK, E. division of COQUETDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND; containing 5 inhabitants. It is situated on the north-western bank of the Coquet river, two miles west-south-west from Warkworth.

WALL, a chapelry, in the parish of ST. JOHN LEE, union of HEXHAM, S. division of TINDALE ward and of NORTHUMBERLAND, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Hexham; containing 437 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the gift of the family of Beaumont: the tithes have been commuted for £274. The chapel, dedicated to St. Oswald, was erected by the monks of Hexham, upon the spot where the king of that name, who was afterwards canonized, raised the standard of the cross, and defeated the Britons under Cadwalla. A silver coin of the saint was found when the chapel underwent repair, and a mutilated Roman altar lies in the cemetery; adjoining which is a field, where human skulls and fragments of military weapons have been often turned up by the plough.

WALL, a hamlet, in the parish of ST. MICHAEL, LICHFIELD, union of LICHFIELD, S. division of the hundred of OFFLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Lichfield; containing 91 inhabitants. The Rev. Burnes Floyer gave a piece of land for the site of a church, and John Smith, Esq., £500 towards the building; it was erected in 1843, at a cost of about £1400, and is a neat edifice, with a bell-tower. There is a day and Sunday school. The hamlet is intersected by the Watling-street, and is the ancient Roman station Etocetum, of which many vestiges may still be traced in the walls.

WALL-TOWN, a township, in the parish and union of HALTWHISTLE, W. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 3 miles (N. W. by W.) from Haltwhistle; containing 85 inhabitants. This was one of the twelve vills of South Tindale, which, in 1315, prayed the king for remedy against William de Soules, to whom Robert de Brus, King of Scotland, had given the manor of Wark, in Tindale, in which these townships were situated. In Henry VIII.'s time Wall-Town was the property of the Riddleys, who continued here till the reign of Charles I., if not later; and the place has been subsequently owned by the families of Marshall, Bacon, and Wastell. The Roman wall passed through the township, in which were the stations Vindolana, now termed Little Chesters, and Æsica, called Great Chesters, the ramparts of which, particularly the latter, where are also considerable traces of a town, are in a better state of preservation than those of any other on the line of the wall. Roman baths, altars, tombstones, inscriptions, curious pieces of sculpture, and numerous other relics of antiquity, have been found in both; and in a neighbouring hill called Chapel-Steads, many urns have been discovered. Near the military road connecting the two stations are tumuli, termed the Four Lawes; and, on an adjoining hill, a rude monument of three large stones, vulgarly called the Mare and Foals. The tower of Wall-Town, which was a castellated building, is described, in 1542, as the inheritance of John Ridley, and in good repair; but at present only the site is visible, the ruins having been used in the construction of a modern farm-house.

WALLASEA, ISLE OF, in the parishes of CANEWDON, EASTWOOD, PAGLESHAM, GREAT STAMBRIDGE, and LITTLE WAKERING, union and hundred of ROCHFORD, S. division of ESSEX, 6 miles (E. N. E.) from Rochford. It is now a peninsula, formed by the rivers Crouch and Broomhill, and joined to the main land by a causeway, kept up at the expense of the several parishes.

WALLASEY (ST. HILARY), a parish, in the union, and Lower division of the hundred, of WIRRALL, S. division of the county of CHESTER; containing, with the townships of Liscard, and Poulton with Seacombe, 6261 inhabitants, of whom 942 are in Wallasey township, $11\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Great Neston. This parish, situated in the north-west corner of the county, is a peninsula of a triangular form, bounded on the west by the Irish Sea, on the north-east by the Mersey, and on the south-east by a branch of the Mersey, called Wallasey Pool: there are sand-hills bordering on the sea, which are a natural barrier against its encroachments. Many handsome houses and marine villas have been erected on the banks of the Mersey, and the place is much frequented for bathing. The principal house in the village is an ancient mansion by the sea side, denominated Mockbeggar Hall, or more properly, Leasowe Castle, formerly a seat of the Egertons, which has been converted by its proprietor, Col. Edward Cust, into a commodious hotel for visitors. On the Black rock, at the north-west point of the parish, is a very strong fort, mounting fifteen large guns; and, further in the sea, a small lighthouse, on the plan of the Eddystone, has been lately erected. The masses of sandstone near the Black rock, called the Red Noses, well merit the attention of the naturalist, being worn, by the action of the sea, into a variety of caverns of the most romantic forms. Between the village and the shore is an inclosure (formerly a common) named the Leasowe, where races, which were of very early origin, were held till 1760; here the unfortunate Duke of Monmouth ran his horse, in the reign of Charles II., won the plate, and presented it to the daughter of the mayor of Chester. Steam-boats cross every half-hour from Egremont and Seacombe ferries to Liverpool, which is directly opposite. At Liscard, on the bank of the river, is a magazine, where all ships entering the port of Liverpool deposit their gunpowder, prior to admission into the docks. The parish comprises about 3270 acres, of which 3015 are in cultivation, and the remainder sand-hills; the soil varies from a stiff marl to sand; the general surface is flat, and there are some quarries of sandstone, which is used for inferior buildings, but is of too soft a texture for works of any magnitude. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 0. 2½; net income, £393; patron, the Bishop of Chester. The church, rebuilt about 70 years since, except the tower, which bears date 1560, stands in the centre of the parish, on a hill composed of red sandstone. There was another church prior to the Dissolution, appropriated to Birkenhead Abbey, but there are no traces of it, though a path near its site is still called the Kirkway. A school is endowed with land producing £90 per annum.

WALLBOTTLE, a township, in the parish of NEWBURN, union and W. division of CASTLE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 4¾ miles (W. by N.) from Newcastle, on the road to Hexham and Carlisle; containing 683 inhabitants. The township is the property of the Duke of Northumberland, lord of the manor of Newburn, and comprises 1241a. 1r. 29p., of which 905 acres are arable, 273 meadow and pasture, 5 woodland, and 58 buildings, roads, and waste; the soil produces good crops of wheat, barley, and oats, and a portion of it grows turnips and potatoes. From the higher grounds are extensive views of the south side of the river Tyne, and of its fine valley. There are several seams of coal, the lowest seam of the Newcastle series being worked here, and a large colliery is in operation by Messrs. Joseph Lamb and Co., who employ 379 hands, of whom 246 work underground: whinstone and freestone, also, are quarried, the former for the roads, and the latter for building. The Newcastle and Carlisle railway passes about two miles south of the village. Wallbottle House is the pleasant residence of A. G. Potter, Esq., and William Oliver, Esq., head viewer of the colliery, has a house here. There are places of worship for Primitive Methodists and Wesleyans; also two schools, for one of which the owners of the colliery provide the schoolroom and the master's house. The site of the Roman wall is traced in a western direction through the township.

WALLCOTT, a hamlet, in the parish of CHARLBURY, union of CHIPPING-NORTON, hundred of CHADLINGTON, county of OXFORD, 5½ miles (S. S. E.) from Chipping-Norton; containing 9 inhabitants.

WALLDITCH (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of BRIDPORT, hundred of GODDERTHORNE, Bridport division of DORSET, 1½ mile (E. by S.) from Bridport; containing 191 inhabitants. It comprises about 308 acres, and is situated on the road from Bridport to Dorchester. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £54; patrons and impropiators, Lord Rolle and J. Bragge, Esq. The great tithes have been commuted for £60, and the incumbent's for £33; the impropriate glebe comprises 28 acres. The church, once a free chapel or chantry, is a small neat edifice, forming a picturesque object, as seen from the surrounding hills.

WALLERSCOAT, a township, in the parish of WEAVERHAM, union of NORTHWICH, Second division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 1½ mile (W.) from Northwich; containing 8 inhabitants.

WALLERTHWAITE, with MARKINGTON, a township, in the parish and liberty of RIPON, W. riding of YORK, 4 miles (N. N. E.) from Ripley; containing 510 inhabitants. The hamlet of Wallerthwaite consists of a farm and a few cottages, distant about a mile eastward of the village of Markington.

WALLINGFORD, a borough and market-town, having exclusive jurisdiction, and the head of a union, locally in the hundred of MORETON, county of BERKS, 15 miles (N. N. W.) from Reading, and 46 (W. by N.) from London; containing, with the extra-parochial liberty of the Castle, 2750 inhabitants. The name is derived from the ancient British word Gualen, or the Roman Vallum, each signifying "an old fort," and from a ford over the Thames: subsequently to the Roman invasion, it was converted into a strong fortification by that people, and is supposed to have been the principal station of the Attrebatii. On the arrival of the Saxons, it became one of their chief forts, and continued to be a place of considerable repute until it was burnt by the Danes, in 1006, from the effects of which calamity it, however, speedily recovered, and, in the reign of Edward the Confessor, had risen to the dignity of a royal prescriptive borough. At the Conquest, William, having arrived with his army, received here the homage of Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury, and many other prelates and barons. During the civil war between Stephen and the Empress Matilda, the castle was occupied and held for the latter; and it was subsequently the place of meeting between John and the barons. The honour, having become vested in the crown, was given by Richard I. to his brother John; and Henry III., on being elected King of the Romans, entertained all the prelates and barons in the castle.

Seal.

Having been afterwards annexed, by act of parliament, to the duchy of Cornwall, on the reversion of these estates to the crown, the castle and manor were granted to Cardinal Wolsey, who conferred them on his then newly-erected college of Christ-Church, Oxford; and, in Camden's time, part of the castle was used as an occasional retreat in time of sickness, by the students of that college: a portion of the buildings, called the Priests' Chambers, has been converted into a malt-house. At the commencement of the parliamentary war, it was repaired and garrisoned for the king, and was not surrendered till nearly the close of the war; but, in 1653, it was completely demolished, and at present, part of a wall towards the river is all that remains of this ancient and celebrated structure.

The TOWN, which is situated on the road between Reading and Oxford, and has a remarkably neat and clean appearance, consists principally of a handsome market-place and two streets, well paved, and lighted with gas, under an act obtained in 1795, and is abundantly supplied with water. Across the river Thames, which passes on the eastern side of the town, is a fine stone bridge of several arches, about 300 yards in length, constructed in 1809, in lieu of a dilapidated structure supposed to have been built five centuries before: there is a rent-charge of £42 per annum on houses for its repair, under the management of trustees appointed by the 49th of George III. Some business is done in malting, but it is not so extensive as formerly. A line of communication has been opened with Birmingham, Bath, and Bristol, by means of a canal navigation running into the Thames, by which river coal is brought hither, and corn and flour are conveyed to London and other places; and the Great Western railway passes through the town. The market is on Friday; and a statute and pleasure fair is held on September 29th. Wallingford is a borough by prescription, and has received charters from various sovereigns: by the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76, the corporation consists of a mayor, four aldermen, and twelve councillors, and the number of magistrates is six. The borough formerly returned two members to parliament, but it now sends only one, and the right of election has been extended to the £10 householders of an enlarged district; the old borough comprised 435 acres, and the new comprehends 16,352; the mayor is returning officer. In former times, criminals convicted capitally in the borough, for the first time, had their lives spared on certain conditions; and, in the 45th of Henry III., a return made by the jurors declared, that no person belonging to the place ought to be executed for one offence. Petty-sessions for the division are held every Friday.

Wallingford comprises the parishes of All Hallows, containing 172; St. Leonard, 883; St. Mary-le-More, 1241; and St. Peter, 476 inhabitants. The living of All Hallows is a sinecure rectory, in the patronage of Pembroke College, Oxford: tithes in the parish which belong to the Dean and Canons of Windsor, have been commuted for £45. 10., and others, in the possession of the college, for £283, with a glebe of 3½ acres. The church was demolished in 1648. The living of St. Leonard's is a discharged rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Sotwell annexed, valued in the king's books at £7. 12. 6., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £153. The church is a very ancient building, with a few Norman remains. The living of St. Mary-le-More is a discharged rectory, valued at £4, and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £137. The church is a very handsome edifice, situated in the space near the market-house, with a square embattled tower ornamented by pinnacles, and on which is the figure of an armed knight on horseback, supposed to represent King Stephen; the tower, which bears the date of 1658; was built by the corporation, with materials said to have been taken from the ruins of the castle. The living of St. Peter's is a discharged rectory, valued at £6. 1. 3.; net income, £100; patron, W. S. Blackstone, Esq. The church is a fine structure, bearing date 1769, with a square tower surmounted by an elegant spire of Portland stone, supported on pillars and arches, and erected in 1777, by subscription, to which the learned Sir William Blackstone, who was an inhabitant of the town, and whose remains are deposited in the church, was a liberal contributor. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Calvinists, and Wesleyans; also a free school established by Walter Bigg, alderman of London, in 1659, by whom it was endowed with £10 per annum. An almshouse for six widows was founded, and endowed with £34 per annum, in 1681, by William Angier and Mary his sister; and the endowment has been augmented by subsequent benefactions. The poor law union of Wallingford comprises 28 parishes or places, 17 of which are in Berks, and 11 in Oxfordshire, and contains a population of 13,930. On Wittenham Hill (the ancient Sinodun), in the neighbourhood, are some remains of a Roman camp, where numerous coins have been found. Richard de Wallingford, abbot of St. Alban's, a celebrated mathematician and mechanic; and John de Wallingford, a monk of that abbey, are supposed to have been natives of the town; and Joan, the fair maid of Kent, and widow of the Black Prince, died here in 1385. Wallingford formerly conferred the title of Viscount on the Earl of Banbury, but it has now merged in the Earldom of Abingdon.

WALLINGTON (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of BUNTINGFORD, hundred of ODSEY, county of HERTFORD, 3 miles (E.) from Baldock; containing 274 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 15. 2½., and in the gift of the Master of Emanuel College, Cambridge: the tithes have been commuted for £458. 16. The church is an ancient structure, with an embattled tower surmounted by a short spire; attached to the north side of the chancel are several mutilated altar-tombs, and other sepulchral remains.

WALLINGTON (St. Margaret), a parish, in the union of DOWNHAM, hundred of CLACKCLOSE, W. division of NORFOLK, 3½ miles (N. by E.) from Downham Market; containing, with Thorpland, 77 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 574 acres, and the village is on the road to Lynn. Wallington Hall, formerly the seat of the Coningsbys and Gawdys, is a handsome mansion, situated in a well-wooded park, in the grounds of which are the tower and spire of the ancient church, now a ruin. The living is a rectory, with those of Holme, South Runcton, and Thorpland consolidated: the tithes have been commuted for £100.

WALLINGTON, a hamlet, in the parish of BEDDINGTON, union of CROYDON, Second division of the hundred of WALLINGTON, E. division of SURREY, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Croydon; containing 934 inhabitants. This place gives name to the hundred, the whole of which is within the jurisdiction of the court of requests held at Croydon, for the recovery of debts under £5. Here was formerly a chapel, now in ruins.

WALLINGTON-DEMESNE, a township, in the parish of HARTBURN, union of MORPETH, N. E. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $12\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Morpeth; containing 167 inhabitants. The township consists of 1781 acres, of which 664 are arable, 954 pasture, and 163 woodland. It was formerly the property of the Fenwicks, and in the beginning of the last century became that of Sir Walter Blackett, who built the mansion-house, and laid out the park and surrounding grounds; from him it passed to the Trevelyans, an ancient Somersetshire family, and is now the property of Sir John Trevelyan, Bart. The house is a large and imposing structure, and the extensive pleasure-grounds display some taste, and present many fine views; it contains a well-selected museum of natural history. Most of the land is tithe-free; a rent-charge of £1. 4. only is paid to the vicar of Hartburn. In pulling down the remains of Fenwick tower, in 1775, several hundred gold nobles, of the coinage of Edward III., were found in an open stone chest, which are supposed to have been concealed on the invasion of David, King of Scotland, in 1360, who made prisoners the two sons of Sir John Fenwick, then owner of the castle.

WALLINGWELLS, an extra-parochial liberty, partly in the S. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, but chiefly in the Hatfield division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, county of NOTTINGHAM, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Worksop; containing 36 inhabitants. A Benedictine nunnery in honour of the Virgin Mary was founded here in the reign of Stephen, by Ralph de Cheroul, and at the Dissolution had a revenue of £88. 11. 6. The district, which is included within the consolidated chapelry of Woodsetts, comprises 612 acres, the property of Sir Thomas Woollaston White, Bart., whose mansion, erected on the site of the ancient priory, is an elegant structure beautifully situated in an extensive and richly-wooded park. In excavating near the house, in 1829, several stone coffins were found, and amongst them that of Dame Margery Dourant, second abbess of the convent, who died in the reign of Richard I.

WALLOP, NETHER (ST. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of STOCKBRIDGE, hundred of THORNGATE, Andover and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 7 miles (S. W. by S.) from Andover; containing 949 inhabitants. The parish comprises 7201a. 3r. 32p., of which the soil is chiefly chalk, and the surface hilly; the lower grounds are watered by a stream. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 13. 4., and in the gift of the appropriators, the Subchanter and Vicars Choral of York; the vicarial tithes have been commuted for £346. 18., and the glebe comprises two acres. The church is an ancient structure, and contains several old monuments, among which are a brass to Lady Gore, an abbess, dated 1432, and one to a mitred abbot: in the churchyard is a pyramidal monument to Dr. Douce. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans. A national school is endowed with £17 per annum, bequeathed by Dr. Douce, in 1759, and with £21 by William Warwick, Esq., in 1826; and Dr. Douce also left £12 a year for the poor. On a point, or head, of an elevated ridge called Danebury Hill, or Bill, are remains of a circular fortification, with lofty ramparts, inclosing an extensive area: a short distance to the westward is an outwork, for the defence of that side; but on the east and north sides, where the ground is more steep, it is protected by a single ditch only: the entrance is by a winding course, strengthened by embankments. There are several barrows near this camp, two of which, two miles distant, are called Canute's barrows.

WALLOP, OVER (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union of STOCKBRIDGE, hundred of THORNGATE, Andover and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 7 miles (S. W.) from Andover; containing 481 inhabitants. The parish comprises 4576 acres, of which 118 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £27. 5. $2\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the Earl of Portsmouth: the tithes have been commuted for £820, and there are 9 acres of glebe. The church is an ancient structure, and contains several monuments, among which is one to the late lady of the Rev. Henry Wake, who was first cousin to the Earl of Portsmouth.

WALLSEND (HOLY CROSS), a parish, in the union of TYNEMOUTH, E. division of CASTLE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Newcastle, on the road to North Shields and Tynemouth; containing, with the townships of Howden-Pans and Willington, 4758 inhabitants, of whom 1988 are in Wallsend township. This parish, of which the name is obviously derived from its situation at the extremity of the wall of Severus, on the east, contained the Roman station Segedunum, so called from its situation, and from having been a magazine for corn, whence stations in the interior were supplied. The place was garrisoned by the first cohort of the Lergi, who were posted here for the defence of shipping; and an altar to Jupiter, centurial stones, tegulæ, horns and bones of various animals, and evident traces of the ramparts, and of three of the turrets at its angles, with other curious relics, have been found upon the spot. Beyond this point the wall does not appear to have been continued; the Tyne itself, near its influx into the ocean, forming, by its great breadth and depth, a sufficient barrier. The ruins of a quay still further evince that this was anciently a considerable trading colony of the Romans, who nearly sixteen centuries since discharged their freights where now are numerous staiths projecting from the northern bank of the Tyne, and at which vessels are continually taking in immense quantities of the celebrated coal termed Wallsend, for the London and other markets. The parish comprises about 2038 acres, of which the soil is generally a strong clay, producing good wheat: the township of Wallsend consists of several small estates held under leases from the Dean and Chapter of Durham. The village, situated on the north side of, and about a field's breadth from, the Shields road, has a spacious green in the centre, and contains some good houses, among which may be mentioned the residences of Edward and John Grace, and John Coutts, Esqrs. To the south-west of the village is Carville House, a fine old mansion, surrounded with thriving plantations, and commanding fine views of the river, the seat of Charles Rayne, Esq.; and to the south-east is Point Pleasant, the property of William Losh, Esq., and now the residence of John Straker, Esq. There are several yards for ship-building, extensive roperies, lime-kilns, and manufactories for copperas and earthenware, a steam corn-mill, and several ballast-quays: John Carr and Company have large coke-works. At Howden and Carville are stations on the Newcastle and North-Shields railway.

The LIVING is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Durham, with a net income of £250: the tithes have been commuted for £165. The Rev. H. Douglas and the Rev. J. S. Ogle are impropriators, as prebendaries of the Cathedral of Durham. The church, a stone building, with a spire, situated on the turnpike-road, at some distance from the village, was erected at the expense of nearly £5000, of which about £3300 were raised by tontine; the first stone was laid in 1807, and the edifice was consecrated in August 1809. Two galleries were erected in 1830, containing 300 free sittings; and an excellent organ has been supplied, and a new clock placed in the tower, both through the exertions of the present incumbent, the Rev. J. Armstrong, by whom also the churchyard has been greatly beautified, tastefully planted with trees, shrubs, and flowers, and surrounded by a substantial wall, instead of the former miserable fence. The old church, dedicated to the Holy Cross, and which is supposed to have been built in the 11th century, is now a ruin; the porch and west end are still standing, and the inner entrance of the porch contains a fine specimen of an early Norman arch. There is a record existing of one Allanus, who is entitled "Presbyter de Valeshead," having been curate in 1153, at which period the parish was called Valeshead, from its situation at the head of a valley or dene. The Methodists, Independents, and Anti-Burghers have places of worship. At the eastern extremity of the village is a schoolroom, which, with a room above for the master, was erected in 1748, at the expense of Mrs. Stuart, for a parish school; and a national school to accommodate 200 children was erected in 1833, on a site adjoining the churchyard, through the influence of the incumbent.

WALMER (St. Mary), a parish, and a member of the cinque-port liberty of SANDWICH, in the union of EASTRY, locally in the hundred of CORNILO, lathe of St. AUGUSTINE, E. division of KENT, 2 miles (S.) from Deal; containing 2170 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 885 acres, of which 372 are arable, 272 meadow and pasture, 114 homesteads and gardens, and 100 sea-beach. Walmer-street, which is situated on the road from Deal to Dover, is neatly built, and interspersed with genteel houses and marine villas; and, partly on account of its convenient position, as regards those two towns, is much frequented during the season for sea-bathing. It is noted for the salubrity of its air, and for the fine prospects in its vicinity, over the Downs and the straits of Dover to the French coast; but chiefly for the celebrated fortress, Walmer Castle, erected by Henry VIII., at the same period with those of Deal and Sandown, for the defence of the coast, and now appropriated to the lord warden of the cinque-ports, for whose residence the principal apartments were fitted up some years since, and the fosse was converted into a garden. Since this appropriation, many handsome marine villas have been erected in the vicinity, and an esplanade has been formed; bathing-machines are in constant attendance, and a complete establishment has been opened of hot, vapour, and shower baths, with reading-rooms and every accommodation for visitors. From the esplanade is a delightful promenade to Deal Castle (the principal part of which is in this parish), commanding a splendid view of the sea, with the shipping in the Downs. In the village is a large brewery and malting establishment. The living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with the vicarial tithes; net income, £154; patron and appropriator, the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church, which has been repaired, and the nave considerably enlarged, is entered on the west under a highly-enriched Norman arch, and there is a similar arch between the nave and chancel: in the burial-ground are two remarkably fine yew-trees. Near the church is a deep fosse, with other vestiges of ancient intrenchments; and in the churchyard several stone coffins were discovered about 50 years since, supposed to have belonged to the family of Crowl, of whom Sir Nicholas, in the reign of Edward I., erected a mansion in the village, of which there are still some remains. His late Majesty and the Queen Dowager, when Duke and Duchess of Clarence, resided at Walmer Castle in the summer of 1822; the Princess Amelia occupied for many years an old mansion in the village, and Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the court, have resided at the castle for a short period.

WALMERSLEY, a township, in the parish and union of BURY, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Bury; containing, with Shuttleworth, 4880 inhabitants. The township, with Shuttleworth, comprises 5056 acres, of which 582 are common or waste land. The population is chiefly employed in extensive spinning-mills on the river Irwell, which runs through it. A church was erected in 1837, containing 670 sittings, 340 of which are free, the Incorporated Society having granted £250 for that purpose. The tithes have been commuted for £66, and the glebe consists of 51 acres. There is a place of worship for Independents.

WALMSGATE, a parish, in the union of LOUTH, hundred of HILL, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Louth; containing 84 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Louth to London, and comprises nearly 900 acres, tithe-free; the surrounding scenery is pleasing, and the seat of J. Whiting Yorke, Esq., here, commands some finely-varied prospects. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Burwell, and the church having fallen to ruins, the inhabitants attend that of Burwell.

WALMSLEY, a chapelry, in the parish and union of BOLTON, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 4 miles (N.) from Bolton. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £69; patron, the Vicar of Bolton. The chapel has been enlarged. There is a place of worship for Unitarians; also a school-house erected by subscription, in 1716.

WALNEY, ISLE OF, a chapelry, in the parish of DALTON-IN-FURNESS, union of ULVERSTONE, hundred of LONSDALE, north of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 5 miles (S. W.) from Dalton; containing 921 inhabitants. This place, which is insular at high water, is ten miles in length, and about one in breadth, and has a light-house on its southern extremity, a short distance north from which is a rocky islet termed the Pile of Fouldrey, i. e., the island of fowls, where are the venerable ruins of a strong castle built by an abbot of Furness. There are several other small isles in the group, the principal of which is Old Barrow, lying between this and the main land, opposite the small village and port of Barrow. Walney, which is stated to have been once covered with wood, is described by West, in his Antiquities of Furness, as lying on a bed of moss, which is found by digging through a layer of sand and clay, and in which trees have been discovered. There are some remarkable intermitting springs of fresh water. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £94; patron, the Vicar of Dalton.

WALPOLE (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of WISBECH, hundred of FREEBRIDGE-MARSHLAND, W. division of NORFOLK, $8\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Lynn; containing 565 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the great wall raised by the Romans to defend it from the encroachments of the sea, and an extensive pool of water formerly in the immediate vicinity: in a garden at the foot of this embankment, many Roman bricks have been discovered, and also the remains of an aqueduct formed of earthen pipes. The estuary in the neighbourhood, called Cross Keys Wash, has been rendered passable to Long Sutton, in the county of Lincoln, by a high embankment and a bridge, completed at a great expense, within the last few years. The parish comprises 2364*a.* 31*p.*, of which 1500 are arable, 783 meadow and pasture, and the remainder roads and waste. Walpole St. Andrew and St. Peter together form one township, though they are for all ecclesiastical purposes perfectly distinct. The living is a discharged vicarage, rated in the king's books at £26. 13. 4., and endowed by Lord Coleraine, in 1736, with the tithes of certain manors in this and the adjoining parish of St. Peter; it is in the gift of the Rev. C. H. Townshend, and the tithes have been commuted for £657. 19., of which £399 are payable to the incumbent of St. Peter's. The church is an ancient structure of brick, in the later English style, with a square embattled tower. Several chapels formerly existed in the township, dedicated respectively to St. Catherine, St. Edmund, St. Helen, St. James, St. Mary, and St. Thomas; but no vestiges of any of them are now remaining. There is a place of worship for Primitive Methodists. The poor have ten houses, and 85 acres of land, of which 43 are let in single acres to labourers, at a nominal rent.

WALPOLE (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of WISBECH, hundred of FREEBRIDGE-MARSHLAND, W. division of NORFOLK, 6 miles (N. E. by N.) from Wisbech; containing 1335 inhabitants. The parish comprises 6981*a.* 3*r.* 16*p.*, of which 4154 acres are arable, 2785 meadow and pasture, and about 60 salt-marsh; the soil is various, and the scenery in some parts of interesting character. The living is a rectory, endowed with the tithes of certain manors in this and the adjoining parish of Walpole St. Andrew, by Lord Coleraine, valued in the king's books at £21, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £2187. 16. 10., of which £1303. 16. 10. are payable to the incumbent of St. Andrew's; the glebe comprises 15 acres, with a good house. The church, which was erected in the reign of Henry VI., is an ex-trremely elegant structure in the later English style, with a lofty square embattled tower, and a south porch of beautiful design; the nave is lighted by a noble range of thirteen clerestory windows on each side, and the whole of the edifice, both externally and internally, presents details of a highly interesting character. A chapel of ease has been just erected; and there are places of worship for Primitive Methodists and Wesleyans. Anthony Curton, in 1705, bequeathed a house and 60 acres of land, now producing a rental of £100, for the instruction of children of this parish, and of St. Andrew's. Almshouses for four widows were founded in 1630, by Robert Butler, who endowed them with 36 acres of land, worth £83. 16. per annum; and W. Wake, in 1697, bequeathed to the poor a house and 39 acres of land, yielding a rent of £60. On digging near the Roman wall, which now forms the road to West Walton, several Roman bricks and other relics were discovered.

WALPOLE (St. Mary), a parish, in the union and hundred of BLYTHING, E. division of SUFFOLK, 2 miles (S. W.) from Halesworth; containing 615 inhabitants, and comprising 1652 acres. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £82; patron and impropiator, the Rev. B. Philpot. The church is an ancient edifice, chiefly in the early English style, with a tower surmounted by a spire; the entrance at the south porch is through a fine Norman doorway. There is a place of worship for Independents.

WALRIDGE, a township, in the parish of STAMFORDHAM, union of CASTLE ward, N. E. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Stamfordham; containing 4 inhabitants, and comprising 147*a.* 3*r.* 30*p.* The tithes have been commuted for £2. 17. 8., of which £2 are payable to the Bishop of Durham, and 17*s.* 8*d.* to the vicar.

WALSALL (St. Matthew), a parish, and the head of a union, in the S. division of the hundred of OFFLOW and of the county of STAFFORD; comprising the market-town and newly-enfranchised borough of Walsall, 18 miles (S. E. by S.) from Stafford, and 118 (N. W.) from London; and containing 20,852 inhabitants, of whom 7395 are in the township of the borough, and 13,457 in that of Walsall-Foreign, into which numerous streets of the town have extended. This place is supposed to have derived its name, in various ancient records written Whaleshall and Walshale, from its situation in or near an extensive forest, resorted to by the Druids for the celebration of their religious rites, and in which the Saxons subsequently erected a temple to their god Woden, from which also the appellation of the town of Wednesbury, in the vicinity, is deduced. In the early part of the tenth century, it was fortified by Ethelfleda, daughter of Alfred, and Countess of Mercia, probably about the same time as she built a castle at Stafford, and surrounded the town with walls. At the time of the Conquest, it was retained by William, and continued to be a royal demesne for nearly 20 years, till it was given by the Conqueror to Robert, son of Asculfus, who had accompanied him to Britain. In the time of Henry III., it was held in fee-farm by William Rufus, and it was subsequently owned by the Earl of Warwick, the "King-maker;" Henry VII. and VIII. afterwards possessed it, and the latter granted it to John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, on whose execution the manor was conferred by Mary upon the Wilbrahams, from whom it has descended to the present owner, the Earl of Bradford. Walsall is not connected with any events of historical interest: Queen Elizabeth, in one of her tours through the country, visited it, and affixed the royal seal and signature at Walshale, on the 13th of July, in the 28th year of her reign, to a deed preserved in the archives of the corporation, containing a grant of certain lands to the town. In 1643, Henrietta Maria, queen of Charles I., remained here for a short time previously to joining the king at Edgehill; and Charles II., on his road from Boscobel to the coast, found an asylum at Bently Hall, about a mile distant.

The town is pleasantly situated on the summit and acclivities of a rock of limestone, and is watered by a small brook called by Erdeswick "Walsal water," which falls into the river Tame, a little below the town; it consists of several regular and spacious streets, in some of which are handsome houses of modern erection, many of them of a superior description. The environs are interesting, and contain some pleasant villas, and much beautiful and varied scenery. The town is well paved, and lighted with gas, under the superintendence of the corporation, and amply supplied with water. A subscription library was established in 1800; and a handsome edifice, containing reading and news rooms, ornamented by a Doric colonnade 30 feet high, has been erected. The principal hotel, a very spacious building, has been enlarged and beautified at a considerable expense, and is adorned with a fine portico formed of pillars that once belonged to Fisherwick, the noble mansion of Lord Donegal. The chief articles of manufacture are bridle-bits, stirrups, spurs, saddle-trees, and every kind of saddlers' ironmongery; buckles, snuffers, spoons, and various other sorts of hardware; coach harness and furniture, plated ware, locks, chain-curbs, dog-chains, and other articles, some of which are brought into the town and sold by factors. Many mercantile houses have been established here, having an extensive business with America and other countries; and a considerable home trade is carried on. A manufactory for Hebert's patent progressive corn-mills has lately been erected within four miles of the town, where one of these mills is in operation. There are several brass and iron foundries, of which the iron-foundry at Goscote is the most important, as well as the oldest in the district; steam-engines of every power, cylinders, and cannon, besides the various smaller articles of cast-iron, are founded here upon the most improved principles. A good trade is also carried on in malt: in the vicinity are large quarries of limestone; and some extensive mines of coal and iron-stone, with which the neighbourhood abounds, have lately been opened at the Birchills and near Bloxwich, in consequence of which the population has been increasing rapidly. The situation of the town in the north-eastern part of a large mining and manufacturing district, abundantly supplied with coal, is peculiarly favourable to its manufactures. A branch of the Old Birmingham canal, which comes up to the west end of the town, and the Wyrley and Essington canal, which passes within a mile north of it, now united, afford every facility of inland navigation; and about a mile distant, is the Walsall station of the Grand Junction railway. The market is on Tuesday and Saturday; and fairs are held on February 24th; Whit-Tuesday, a pleasure-fair; and the Tuesday before Michaelmas-day, chiefly for horses, cattle, and cheese.

The inhabitants enjoy several immunities by prescription: Henry I. bestowed upon them exemption from toll throughout England, and from serving upon juries out of the limits of the "borough and foreign;" and the guilds of St. John the Baptist, and of Our Lady, appear to have been ancient establishments, exercising various rights and privileges. The earliest existing charter of incorporation was granted in the 3rd of Charles I., and confirmed by Charles II. in the 13th of his reign; but the government is now vested in a mayor, six aldermen, and 18 councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76; the borough is divided into three wards, and the number of magistrates is nine. By the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, Walsall was constituted a parliamentary borough, with the privilege of returning one member; the right of election is in the £10 householders of the parish, with the exception of a small detached part; the limits of the franchise comprise about 7080 acres, and the mayor is returning officer. The recorder holds quarterly courts of session for all offences not capital; and a court of record, under the charter of Charles II., as often as may be requisite, for the recovery of debts above 40s., and not exceeding £20. The hundred court takes place here, for the recovery of debts under 40s., before a steward chosen by the high sheriff of the county; and the lord of the manor has an annual court leet, at which constables and other officers are appointed. The town-hall is a handsome, though rather ancient edifice, well adapted to its purpose. The common gaol, until lately a very small building, has been enlarged.

The parish comprises about 7800 acres, of which about two-fifths are arable, and the remainder meadow and pasture. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 19. 7.; net income, about £390; patron, the Earl of Bradford, who, with Col. Walhouse, is impropiator. The church, an ancient and spacious cruciform structure, with several chapels in the aisles, was, with the exception of the tower and chancel, which latter has undergone several alterations, taken down and rebuilt in the later English style, in 1821, at an expense of £20,000; it occupies a commanding situation on the summit of the rock on which the town is built, and the tower, which is in fine proportion, and surmounted by a lofty spire, forms a conspicuous object in the distant view of the town. St. Paul's chapel, a handsome edifice in the Grecian style, was erected by the governors of the grammar school, who, having sold some mines under part of the land belonging to that establishment, in 1797, obtained an act of parliament for applying part of the purchase money to the erection of the chapel, which was completed in 1826: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the governors, who appoint the head master of the school to the office of minister; net income, £50. St. Peter's district church, erected in 1840, at the end of Stafford-street, on a site given by Lord Hatherton, is in the early English style, and contains 1141 sittings, of which 700 are free; of the cost, £3500, the Earl of Bradford contributed £1000. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Walsall, and is endowed with the interest of £2000, with a glebe-house. There are places of worship for Independents, Wesleyans, and Unitarians, and two Roman Catholic chapels, one of which is a handsome edifice in the Grecian style.

The free grammar school, in Park-street, was established in 1557, by Queen Mary, who endowed it with land belonging to the guilds and chantries which existed here previously to the Dissolution, and placed it under the controul of certain governors, whom she incorporated; the income is about £780 per annum, and the premises, built a few years since, are handsome and commodious. Bishop Hough received the rudiments of his education in the establishment. An English school is maintained from the same funds, in the old school buildings in the churchyard. The Blue-coat charity school, which was endowed with £14 a year, has been incorporated with a national school: a national school attached to St. Peter's Church, erected at a cost of £600, was opened in 1840; and there is another at Walsall-Wood, partly supported by an annual grant of £35 from the governors of the grammar school. Some almshouses, founded by John Harper, in the reign of James I., and endowed with land producing £40 per annum, were rebuilt in 1790, by the Rev. Mr. Rutter, then vicar, for the reception of six aged widows, among whom £10 per quarter are divided. Almshouses were erected and endowed in 1825, for eleven aged widows, to which purpose a dole of one penny, paid by the corporation to every person in the parishes of Walsall and Rushall, on the eve of the Epiphany, was appropriated. In the reign of Henry VI., Thomas Mollesley gave to the corporation a manor and estates in the county of Warwick, which now constitute part of their extensive possessions. There are also numerous charitable bequests for apprenticing children, and for distribution among the indigent. The poor law union of Walsall comprises 8 parishes or places, and contains a population of 34,274. On a farm belonging to Lord Bradford, near the town, is a powerful chalybeate spring called Alum Well, on the site of the ancient manor-house, of which the moat still remains.

WALSALL-FOREIGN, a township and ecclesiastical district, in the parish and union of WALSALL, S. division of the hundred of OFFLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Walsall, on the road to Lichfield; containing 13,457 inhabitants. It comprises the hamlets of Great and Little Bloxwich, Birchills, Coldmore, Horden, Walsall-Wood, and the Windmill-Streets, in the manor of Walsall; and Goscote, which is a manor of itself. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Walsall, and has a net income of £50, with a glebe-house. The church, dedicated to St. John, was built in 1837, at a cost of £1000, on a site given by the Earl of Bradford, who also contributed £300; the remainder was obtained by grants from societies. It contains 430 sittings, all of which, with the exception of 88, are free.

WALSDEN, a township, in the parish of ROCHDALE, union of TODMORDEN, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER; containing 3383 inhabitants.

WALSHAM-LE-WILLOWS (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of STOW, hundred of BLACKBOURN, W. division of SUFFOLK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Ixworth; containing 1265 inhabitants. The village is pleasantly situated in a picturesque valley, and in the immediate vicinity are several handsome villas in grounds tastefully laid out. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £93; patron and impropiator, S. Golding, Esq. The church is a spacious structure in the decorated English style, with a square embattled tower; the nave is lighted by a range of clerestory windows, and the roof is richly groined. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyans; and a national school has been established. At the inclosure, 100 acres of land were allotted to the poor, of which about 80 are let in small lots to them, with 30 more by Messrs. Wilkinson and Golding; there are also 50 acres for the repair of the church, and for fuel and clothing for the poor. Near the church is an old mansion, formerly a priory subordinate to the abbey of Ixworth, and in which, while under repair, several relics of antiquity have been found.

WALSHAM, NORTH (St. Mary), a market-town and parish, in the union of ERPINGHAM, hundred of TUNSTEAD, E. division of NORFOLK, 15 miles (N. N. E.) from Norwich, and 124 (N. E. by N.) from London; containing 2655 inhabitants. In the year 1600, nearly the whole of this town was destroyed by a fire, which, although it continued but three hours, consumed property of the value of £20,000. It is situated on an eminence on the road from Cromer to Norwich, and consists of three streets diverging from a central area, in which stands the church; it is paved, and lighted with gas, and the inhabitants are well supplied with water. There is a neat theatre, opened for performances once in two years. A canal passes through the parish, a short distance north-east of the town, in its course from Antingham; and the river Ant, not far distant, is navigable to Yarmouth. The market, which is chiefly for corn, is on Thursday; a fair is held on the day before and on Holy-Thursdays, for cattle and horses; and statute-fairs for hiring servants take place on the two Thursdays before Old Michaelmas-day. The market-cross, erected by Bishop Thirlby, in the reign of Edward VI., was repaired after the great fire in 1600, by Bishop Redman. Two courts baron occur annually, one of the Bishop of Norwich, and the other of Lord Suffield; and the magistrates hold petty-sessions every Thursday.

The parish comprises 4172a. 37p., of which about 400 acres are pasture and garden-ground, 150 woodland and plantations, and the remainder arable, with the exception of 200 acres not yet brought into cultivation. The LIVING is a vicarage, with the rectory of Antingham St. Margaret annexed, valued in the king's books at £8; net income, £336; patron and appropriator, the Bishop: the glebe comprises 2 acres, with a house. The church is a spacious and elegant structure, chiefly in the later English style; on the south side of the chancel are three sedilia of stone, and a piscina of elegant design. The tower, which was 147 feet high, fell down in the year 1724, and is in ruins. In the chancel is a mural monument to the memory of Sir William Paston, Knt.

a native of the town, and founder of the grammar school; it was erected during his life, and is surmounted by a recumbent statue in armour. There are places of worship for Wesleyans, the Society of Friends, Independents, and Primitive Methodists. The free grammar school was founded in 1606, by Sir William, for the education of 40 sons of residents in either of the hundreds of North or South Erpingham, Happing, Tunstead, and Flegg, and was endowed by him with the rents of certain estates at Horsey and Walcot, to the amount of £250 per annum: the school contains a good library, bequeathed by the Rev. Richard Berney, in 1787; and a monthly lecturer receives £12. 12. per annum out of the funds of the charity. Archbishop Tenison, Bishop Hoadly, and Admiral Lord Nelson received the rudiments of their education in the institution. A national school is supported; and £30 per annum, the rent of an allotment of waste land, is expended among the poor. About a mile south of the town is a stone cross, erected to commemorate a victory obtained in 1382, by Spencer, Bishop of Norwich, over some rebels headed by a dyer named Litester.

WALSHAM, SOUTH, in the union of BLOFIELD, hundred of WALSHAM, E. division of NORFOLK, 3 miles (N. W. by W.) from Acle; comprising the parishes of St. Lawrence and St. Mary, and containing 613 inhabitants, of whom 388 are in St. Mary's. This district, which is bounded on the north by the river Bure, was anciently of more importance than at present, and during the prosperity of the abbey of St. Benedict on the opposite side of the river, the town was of much greater extent; but after the dissolution of that establishment it fell into decay, and has subsequently degenerated into a mere village. The parish of St. Lawrence comprises 1805*a.* 29*p.*, and that of St. Mary 1250*a.* 32*p.* The living of St. Lawrence's is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the gift of Queen's College, Cambridge: the tithes have been commuted for £509. 6., of which £22. 6. are payable to the Bishop of Ely, and £486. 10. to the rector; the glebe comprises 57½ acres, and the parsonage-house has been greatly improved by the present rector, the Rev. J. Toplis, B.D. The living of St. Mary's is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5, and in the patronage of the trustees of the Old Men's hospital at Norwich, who are impropriators: the great tithes have been commuted for £270, and the vicarial for £159. 16.; the glebe comprises 36 acres, with a small house. The church of St. Lawrence, which was in the same churchyard as that of St. Mary's, and had been repaired at an expense of £850, in 1811, was destroyed by an accidental fire in 1827; the chancel was repaired and enlarged in 1832, and opened for divine service, but the lofty tower and nave are in ruins. The church of St. Mary is a handsome structure in the decorated and later English styles, with a square embattled tower. Richard Harrold, in 1718, bequeathed property, now let for about £20 per annum, for apprenticing children; and £34 a year, the rental of some waste land awarded under an inclosure act in the 41st of George III., are expended among the poor.

WALSHFORD, with GREAT RIBSTON, a township, in the parish of HUNSINGORE, Upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, W. riding of YORK, 3¼ miles (N. by E.) from Wetherby; containing 170 inhabitants.

The village is on the north side of the river Nidd, which is here crossed by a bridge.

WALSINGHAM.—See WOLSINGHAM.

WALSINGHAM, GREAT, a parish, in the union of WALSINGHAM, hundred of NORTH GREENHOE, W. division of NORFOLK, 1 mile (N. by E.) from Little Walsingham; comprising the united parishes of All Saints and St. Peter, and containing 426 inhabitants. This place, which is also called Old Walsingham, and was formerly of considerable importance, is situated in the valley of the Stiffkey river, on the road from Fakenham to Wells, and comprises 2407*a.* 2*r.* 24*p.*, of which about 2250 acres are arable, 100 meadow and pasture, and 50 woodland; the scenery is of pleasing character. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £100; patron and impropriator, the Rev. D. H. Lee Warner: the tithes were commuted for land in 1808. The church, remarkable for the fine proportions of its architecture, is in the later English style, with a square embattled tower. In 1658, from 40 to 50 Roman urns were dug up in a field near the village, and coins of the same people have been frequently discovered.

WALSINGHAM, LITTLE (St. Mary), a parish, the head of a union, and formerly a market-town, in the hundred of NORTH GREENHOE, W. division of NORFOLK, 28 miles (N. W.) from Norwich, and 114 (N. N. E.) from London; containing 1155 inhabitants. This place, also denominated New Walsingham, was of great celebrity, for many centuries, as containing a shrine of the Virgin, or Our Lady of Walsingham, constructed of wood, after the plan of the Sancta Casa at Nazareth, and founded in 1061, by the widow of Ricoldie Faverches, whose son, Sir Galfridus, confirmed her endowment, and established a monastery for Augustine canons, with a conventual church. This institution became immensely rich, and at the Dissolution its revenue was £446. 14. 4., exclusively of the valuable offerings of the numerous devotees of all nations who had visited the shrine, and which are said to have equalled those presented at that of Our Lady of Loretto, in Italy, and that of St. Thomas à Becket at Canterbury. Among the illustrious visitants were several of the kings and queens of England, especially Henry VIII., who, in the second year of his reign, walked hither barefoot from Barsham, to present a necklace to the image of the Virgin. The venerable remains of this once noble and stupendous pile are situated in the midst of a grove of stately trees, in the pleasure-grounds of the Rev. D. H. Lee Warner, and contiguous to a fine stream of water, over which is a handsome bridge. They chiefly consist of the great western portal, a lofty and magnificent arch, 75 feet high, which formed the east end of the conventual church; the spacious refectory, 78 feet by 27, with walls 26½ feet in height; a portion of the cloisters; and a stone bath with two wells called St. Mary's, or the Wishing Wells, near which is a Norman arch with zig-zag mouldings, removed hither from the mansion as an ornamental object. Here was also a house of Grey friars, founded in 1346, by Elizabeth de Burgo, Countess of Clare; the buildings occupied an area of about seven acres, and there are considerable remains of the refectory, cloisters, and other portions of the conventual buildings, in which some of the windows are nearly perfect.

The town is situated in a vale, surrounded by bold heights; the inhabitants are supplied with water from wells. A fair is held on the second Friday after Whit-Monday, and a statute-fair on the Friday before, and the Friday after, Michaelmas-day. The general quarter-sessions for the county take place here by adjournment, and petty-sessions on the first Monday in the month: the Bridewell, or house of correction, which was once an hospital for lepers, founded in 1486, has been considerably enlarged. The parish, formerly noted for the growth of saffron, comprises by measurement 976 acres, and the lands are watered by a small stream that flows near the town, and falls into the sea within a few miles. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £100, with a glebe of 9 acres, and a handsome house; patron, the Rev. Mr. Warner: the tithes were commuted for land in 1808. The church is a spacious structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower surmounted by a lofty spire, and contains a very ancient and beautiful font, of octagonal form, resting on a plinth of four ornamented steps, and representing, in compartments, the Seven Sacraments of the Church of Rome and the Crucifixion. There are places of worship for Independents, Primitive Methodists, and Wesleyans. The free grammar school was founded in 1639, by Richard Bond, Esq., who endowed it with £1040, which were vested in the purchase of an estate at Great Snoring, producing £110 per annum for the maintenance of a master and usher to teach 30 boys. Richard Brown, in 1630, bequeathed £400 to purchase land, and William Cleave, in 1665, the rent of 20 acres, together worth £100 per annum, for distribution among the poor; and Lady Townshend left 6 acres, valued at £20 a year, for apprenticing children. The union of Walsingham comprises 50 parishes or places, and contains a population of 20,960. The place confers the title of Baron on the family of De Grey.

WALSOKEN (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of WISBECH, hundred of FREEBRIDGE-MARSHLAND, W. division of NORFOLK; containing 2562 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 4500 acres; the village, which joins the town of Wisbech by a bridge over the canal, is about a mile in length; the surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, and the walks in its vicinity are much frequented. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £30. 13. 4., and in the gift of the incumbent, the Rev. John Bluck: the tithes have been commuted for £1234, and the glebe comprises 30 acres, with a house. The church is chiefly in the Norman style, with an embattled tower surmounted by a lofty spire of early English character; the nave is embellished with well-sculptured effigies of David and Solomon, and an interesting painting representing the Judgment of the latter; the chancel is divided from the nave by a finely-pointed arch, and at the extremity of each of the aisles is a chapel. The Primitive Methodists have a place of worship. There was anciently a chapel with the guild of the Holy Trinity, and a hermitage, of which the site is now unknown. Land producing £70 per annum has been bequeathed to the poor. Archbishop Herring was born here.

WALTERSTONE (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of DORE, hundred of EWYASLACY, county of HEREFORD, 15 miles (S. W. by W.) from Hereford; containing 150 inhabitants, and comprising 991 acres. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £136; patron, Edmund Higginson, Esq.; impropiator, the Incumbent of Rollstone.

WALTHAM (ST. BARTHOLOMEW), a parish, in the union of BRIDGE, hundred of BRIDGE and PETHAM, lath of ST. AUGUSTINE, E. division of KENT, 7 miles (S. S. W.) from Canterbury; containing 544 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3215 acres, of which 23 are common or waste. The living is a vicarage, with that of Petham annexed, valued in the king's books at £7. 15. 5.; net income, £535; patrons, alternately, the Archbishop of Canterbury and Sir J. C. Honeywood, Bart.; appropriator of Waltham, the Archbishop; and of Petham, the Rev. J. K. S. Brooke, and the Archbishop of a small portion. The great tithes of Waltham have been commuted for £400, and the vicarial for £320; the glebe contains an acre and a half. The church is in the early English style. There are some remains of a chapel and castle at Ashenfield, and of a chapel at Waddenhall, in the parish.

WALTHAM (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of CAISTOR, wapentake of BRADLEY-HAVERSTOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 3 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Great Grimsby; containing 656 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 2350 acres, of which the greater portion appears to have been anciently covered with wood. The village is pleasantly situated on the road to Binbrook: the Hall, a spacious house of brick, was erected in 1737, by the grandfather of the present lord of the manor. A statute-fair is held in May, and an agricultural society is supported by the gentry and farmers of the vicinity. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15. 10. 10., and in the patronage of the Chapter of the Collegiate Church of Southwell; net income, £331. The tithes were commuted for land in 1769; the glebe comprises 367 acres, with a rectory-house, a large mansion in the Elizabethan style, built in 1836. The church is a spacious structure in the later English style, and contains, on a monument of black marble, the effigies of Johanna Waltham and her son and daughter. There are places of worship for Primitive Methodists and Wesleyans.

WALTHAM-ABBAS.—See WALTHAM, WHITE.

WALTHAM-ABBEY, or HOLY-CROSS (HOLY CROSS AND ST. LAWRENCE), a market-town and parish, in the union of EDMONTON, hundred of WALTHAM, S. division of ESSEX; containing, with the hamlets of Holyfield, Sewardstone, and Upshire, 4177 inhabitants, of whom 2041 are in the town, 23 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Chelmsford, and 12 $\frac{1}{2}$ (N. by E.) from London. The name of this place is compounded of the Saxon words Weald and Ham, signifying a residence in or near a wood, and the adjunct is a term of distinction derived from an ancient abbey here. The town derived its origin, in the time of Canute the Great, from the facility and inducement for hunting afforded by the neighbourhood, which led Ralph de Toni, standard-bearer to that monarch, to build a few houses. A church was soon afterwards erected, principally for the preservation of the holy cross, to which many legends of miraculous efficacy were attached; and, upon a lapse of the property to the crown, Harold, to whom it had been given by Edward the Confessor, founded, in 1062, a monastery for Secular canons, for whom, in 1177, Henry II. substituted monks, of the order of St. Augustine, and dedicated the establishment to the Holy Cross: at the Dissolution, the revenue was valued at £1079. 12. 1. Within the choir, or eastern chapel, was entombed the body of Harold, who was slain in the battle of Hastings, with those of his brothers Gurth and Leofwin. In a place called Romeland, adjoining the abbey, was a house at which Henry VIII. occasionally resided; and to a conversation held here, on the important subject of the king's divorce, Cranmer was eventually indebted for the royal favour, and his ultimate elevation to the see of Canterbury.

The town, which is spacious and irregularly built, consisting chiefly of one long street, is situated on the banks of the river Lea, which here divides into many streams, and separates the two counties of Essex and Herts about half a mile to the west, and also the parishes of Cheshunt and Waltham-Abbey; the inhabitants are well supplied with water. Some gunpowder-mills belonging to government, situated here, afford employment to nearly 200 persons; about 100 are occupied in printing silk handkerchiefs, and some business is done in the manufacture of pins, though it is by no means so extensive as formerly: there are also a brewery, flour-mill, and two malt-kilns; and in the hamlet of Sewardstone is a factory for throwing and spinning silk, in which between 200 and 300 persons are engaged. At the west end of the town is the new cut from the river Lea, and the Northern and Eastern railway passes within half a mile. The market is on Tuesday: fairs are held on May 14th and September 25th, for horses and cattle; and on the 26th is a statute-fair for hiring servants. A town-hall has been erected. The parish comprises 11,474*a.* 1*r.* 38*p.*, of which about 9000 acres are inclosed, 400 common fields and meadows, 280 marsh, 385 roads, rivers, and waste, and 1352 ancient forest land. The living is a donative curacy; net income, £100; patrons and impropriators, the Trustees of the Earl of Norwich. The church, which is the nave of the old abbey church, is a spacious structure in the Norman style, with a tower of later date; on the south side is the Lady chapel, now used as a vestry and schoolroom. In the interior are three tiers of semicircular arches, enriched with zigzag ornaments, supported on circular massive piers, some of which are also decorated with waving lines. Among the various monuments and sepulchral tablets, the principal is one to the memory of Sir Edward Denny, who died in 1599; and a slab near the communion table retains the impression of an abbot with his crosier, the brass having been taken away. A district church, dedicated to St. Paul, for which the site, and a house for the minister, were given by Captain Sotheby, lord of the manor, has been erected at Sewardstone, by subscription, and was consecrated December 20th, 1837. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans. Several bequests have been left to the poor, and for purposes of education. The only remains of the venerable abbey, exclusively of the church, are a fine gate with a postern, the bridge leading to it, and some dilapidated walls.

WALTHAM, BISHOP'S (ST. PETER), a market-town and parish, in the union of DROXFORD, hundred of BISHOP'S-WALTHAM, Droxford and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 10 miles (E. N. E.) from Southampton, and 65 (S. W. by W.) from London; containing, with the tythings of Ashton, Curdridge, and West Hoe, 2193 inhabitants. The river Hamble has its source about half a mile from the village, and passes through the piece of water termed Waltham Pond, which formerly deserved the appellation given it by historians, of "a large and beautiful lake," but is now contracted by the encroachments of alluvial soil and rushes. On its bank are the remains of the once magnificent palace annexed to the see of Winchester, built in 1135, by Bishop Henry de Blois, brother of King Stephen, and greatly embellished by Wykeham. Henry II. held a great council in this palace in 1182, previously to entering upon the crusade, when a large sum of money was granted for that expedition; and Richard I., after his coronation in Winchester cathedral, visited the place in 1194. Cardinal Beaufort, in his will, bequeathed to Margaret of Anjou, Queen of England, the damask hangings of the apartments she used to occupy when at Waltham; and William of Wykeham, who died here, left a chalice to Waltham church. The palace continued to be the principal episcopal residence till the parliamentary war, when it was destroyed by the army under Waller, and the extensive park in which it stood was afterwards converted into farms by Bishop Morley. The market is on Friday; and fairs are held on the second Friday in May, for horses and toys; July 30th, for cheese and pedlery; and the first Friday after Old Michaelmas-day, for horses, and for stockings and toys. A bailiff is appointed at the court of the manor, held by the Bishop of Winchester. The parish comprises 7412*a.* 1*r.* 10*p.*, of which 4237 acres are arable, 381 meadow and pasture, 463 woodland, 627 common, 114 homesteads and gardens, and 110 roads, waste, and water. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £26. 12. 8½, and in the gift of the Bishop: the tithes have been commuted for £1250, and the glebe contains 98 acres. A district church was erected on Curdridge Common, in 1834, by subscription, towards which the Incorporated Society granted £230; it is a neat structure in the later English style, and the living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £100 from the tithes, and in the patronage of the Rector. A free school was founded by Bishop Morley, who endowed it with an annuity of £10, which sum has been augmented, by benefactions, to £38, for which 36 boys are instructed in a national school.

WALTHAM, BRIGHT, BRICKLETON, or BRIGHT-WOLTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of WANTAGE, hundred of FAIRCROSS, county of BERKS, 5 miles (W. S. W.) from East Ilsley; containing 441 inhabitants, and comprising 1891*a.* 1*r.* 18*p.* The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 15., and in the gift of B. Wroughton, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £700, and the glebe contains 86 acres.

WALTHAM, COLD, a parish, in the union of THAKEHAM, hundred of BURY, rape of ARUNDEL, W. division of SUSSEX, 5½ miles (S. E.) from Petworth; containing 460 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the north by the river Rother, and on the east by the Arun; and part of the Roman road from Chichester to London may be traced within its limits. The living is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Bishop of Chichester, the appropriator; net income, £65. The tithes have been commuted for £290; the glebe comprises 12 acres. Near the hamlet of Waterfield, a coarse earthen vessel was broken by a labourer at work, and was found to contain 1700 coins of the Emperor Gallienus and his immediate successors.

WALTHAM-CROSS, a ward, in the parish of CHESHUNT, union of EDMONTON, hundred and county of HERTFORD, 9 miles (S. by E.) from Hertford. This place received the adjunct to its name from a noble cross erected on the eastern side of the high road, by Edward I., to his beloved consort Eleanor, whose corpse rested at Waltham Abbey, on its way from Lincolnshire to London; it is hexangular, and highly enriched with tabernacle-work and foliage, having pendant shields bearing the devices of England, Castile, Leon, and Ponthieu, and crowned statues of the queen, the left hand holding a cordon, and the right a sceptre or globe. This beautiful monument having suffered much from mutilation, was, in 1757, at the instance of the Society of Antiquaries, inclosed by a brick wall, at the expense of Lord Monson, then lord of the manor; and one of the statues has recently been replaced, and the cross perfectly restored, and surrounded by an iron palisade, by subscription. Courts leet are held at Whitsuntide, and a court baron in October. The river Lea separates the ward from the parish of Waltham Holy-Cross; the New River runs through the western portion of it, and the Northern and Eastern railway has an intermediate station here. At a short distance from the village is the mansion built near the site of the palace of Theobalds, and pleasantly situated in an extensive park. A chapel has been erected by voluntary contribution, aided by parliamentary grant, the living of which is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Cheshunt. There is a place of worship for Independents; and almshouses for four widows, founded and endowed by Beaumont Spital, and taken down in 1830, have been lately rebuilt in the decorated English style.

WALTHAM, GREAT (St. Mary and St. Lawrence), a parish, in the union and hundred of CHELMSFORD, S. division of ESSEX, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Chelmsford; containing 2154 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in a fertile district, intersected by the river Chelmer, is amply supplied with excellent water from numerous springs, and comprises 7335*a.* 15*p.*, of which 5701 acres are arable, 1010 pasture and meadow, 101 woodland, 105 homesteads, and 243 roads and waste; the soil is rich, and favourable to the growth of wheat. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £18. 13. 4., and in the gift of the impropiators, the President and Fellows of Trinity College, Oxford: the great tithes have been commuted for £1800, with a glebe of 122 acres, and the vicarial for £400, with a glebe of 3 acres. The church is a spacious edifice of brick, with an octangular tower surmounted by a spire, and contains several splendid monuments. Near the western gateway of the churchyard is an ancient building called the Guildhall.

WALTHAM ST. LAWRENCE, a parish, in the union of COOKHAM, hundred of WARGRAVE, county of BERKS, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Maidenhead; containing 724 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 3500 acres; and the Great Western railway passes through the northern portion of it. A fair is held on the 11th of August. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 6. 8.; net income, £211; patron, Lord Braybrooke. Some tithes were commuted for land in 1810, and others have been just commuted for a rent-charge of £350, of which £50 are payable to the vicar. The church contains a fine monument in memory of Sir Henry Neville, one of the gentlemen of the privy chamber of Edward VI., and who died in 1593. A school is supported by Lord Braybrooke, the lord of the manor, who has an ancient residence at Billingbear, in the parish; and there are some small bequests. In a field between the church and the Bath road was a Roman station, where coins, urns, and tiles, have frequently been dug up.

WALTHAM, LITTLE (St. Martin), a parish, in the union and hundred of CHELMSFORD, S. division of ESSEX, 4 miles (N. by E.) from Chelmsford; containing 690 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Chelmer, and on the road to Norwich, through Sudbury and Bury, and comprises 2210*a.* 36*p.*, of which 1836 acres are arable, 222 meadow and pasture, 118 woodland, and 32 homesteads. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 10., and in the gift of the incumbent, the Rev. T. S. Hodges: the tithes have been commuted for £670, and the glebe comprises 12 acres. The church is a small edifice with an embattled tower, and contains several interesting monuments. There is a place of worship for Independents. Roger Poole, in the reign of Philip and Mary, assigned property for the support of a school; and John Aley, in 1660, gave £500 to be vested in land for apprenticing children.

WALTHAM, NORTH (St. Michael), a parish, in the union of BASINGSTOKE, hundred of OVERTON, Kingsclere and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 6 miles (S. W. by W.) from Basingstoke; containing 494 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15. 13. 4., and in the gift of the Bishop of Winchester: the tithes have been commuted for £390, and the glebe comprises 90 acres. The church has been enlarged, and 120 free sittings provided, the Incorporated Society having granted £40 in aid of the expense.

WALTHAM-ON-THE-WOLDS (St. Mary Magdalene), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union of MELTON-MOWBRAY, hundred of FRAMLAND, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Melton-Mowbray; containing 768 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £19. 5.; net income, £481; patron, the Duke of Rutland: the tithes were commuted for land in 1766. The church, principally in the decorated style, with portions of earlier date, has three enriched stalls; the font presents a curious admixture of the Norman and early English styles. Joseph and George Noble, in 1776, and Thomas Baker, left sums for instruction, now producing £12. 13. per annum.

WALTHAM, UP, a parish, in the union of WEST-HAMPNETT, hundred of BOX and STOCKBRIDGE, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of SUSSEX, 6 miles (S. S. W.) from Petworth; containing 99 inhabitants. The parish forms a portion of the South Downs, and comprises about 2000 acres, of which the soil is chalky, and the surface boldly undulated: the village is on the road from London to Chichester, by Petworth. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 2. 11., and in the gift of Colonel Wyndham: the tithes have been commuted for £128, and the glebe comprises $4\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church is in the early English style, with a circular east end.

WALTHAM, WHITE, or WALTHAM-ABBAS (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of COOKHAM, hundred of BEYNHURST, county of BERKS, 4 miles (S. W.) from Maidenhead; containing 1021 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2643a. 1r. 15p., of which about 250 acres are meadow and pasture, 100 woodland, and the remainder arable; the soil is partly a fine mould resting on chalk, and partly a strong clay, producing good crops of grain; the surface is flat, and a small stream passes on the south, and flows into the river Loddon. The Great Western railway runs through the parish. The living is a vicarage, united to the rectory of Shottesbrook in 1744, and valued in the king's books at £10. 13. 4.: the tithes were commuted for land in 1807. The church is in the Norman style. There are places of worship for Independents and Lady Huntingdon's Connexion; and a national school. Smewin's House, here, now occupied by a farmer, is said to have been a hunting-seat of Prince Arthur's, eldest son of Henry VII., and was also the retreat of the learned Dodwell, first Camden professor of ancient history at Oxford, and a celebrated writer on ecclesiastical antiquity. The vicarage-house was partly paved with Roman bricks; and many Roman tiles, coins, and other relics have been found near the church. There was formerly a chapel of ease at Feens. Thomas Hearne, the antiquary, was born here in 1678.

WALTHAMSTOW (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of WEST HAM, hundred of BECONTREE, S. division of ESSEX, 6 miles (N. E. by N.) from London; containing 4873 inhabitants. This manor, according to the Norman survey, wherein it is called Welannestun, was in the possession of Judith, niece to the Conqueror; and having subsequently belonged to the earls of Warwick, on the attainder and execution of Earl Thomas, in 1396, it lapsed to the crown. The name appears to be of Saxon origin, from weald, a wood, and ham, a dwelling; the adjunct stowe, a place, distinguishing it from other Walthams in the county; and the entire name being accurately descriptive. The village consists of numerous dwelling-houses and mansions, detached, and encompassed with trees and woodland, and pleasantly situated on the borders of Epping Forest, through which a new road has been cut to Woodford, in order to form a nearer communication with the great road from London to Newmarket. The parish comprises 4436 acres, of which 501 are common or waste: it is separated from the county of Middlesex by the navigable river Lea, over which is a bridge, and on its banks are extensive copper and flour mills, and an oil-mill. The Northern and Eastern railway passes through the parish. The LIVING is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8.; net income, £772; patron and incumbent, the Rev. W. Wilson, B.D.; impropiator, R. Orlebar, Esq. The church, situated on an eminence, is a neat structure, originally of flint and stone, with a tower at the west end, which was partly rebuilt by Sir George Monox, who also erected a chapel at the end of the north aisle, in 1535. It was enlarged, repaired, and beautified in 1817, at an expense of about £2000; and in the chancel is a circular window, divided into compartments, of stained glass, representing a Gloria, presented by Miss Russell. Among the various sepulchral memorials are those of Sir G. Monox, lord mayor of London in 1514, and his lady; a splendid monument of white marble, with figures of full size, to Sigismond Trafford, his wife, and their infant daughter; and another in memory of Lady Lucy Stanley, erected by her husband, Sir Edward Stanley. In the burial-ground is a white marble tomb, by Chantrey, in memory of Jesse Russell, Esq. At Chapel-End, a chapel of ease dedicated to St. John, was erected in 1829, at an expense of £1800, and is a neat structure in the Grecian style; a church dedicated to St. Peter, in the Norman style, was built at Forest-End, in 1840; and another, dedicated to St. James, also Norman, was erected in 1841. There are places of worship for Independents and Unitarians.

The almshouses and free school on the north side of the churchyard were founded in 1542, by Sir G. Monox, and endowed with a rent-charge of £42. 17. 4., which has been augmented, by benefactions, to an annual income of about £155; the almshouses are occupied by eight men and five single women, and the schoolmaster's emoluments are about £85 per annum. Almshouses for six widows were built by Mrs. Mary Squires, in 1795, and endowed with stock producing an annual dividend of £87. Henry Maynard, in 1686, bequeathed for various charitable purposes property now producing a net income of about £200. The churchwardens and other members of the vestry have under their controul a sum of £273 per annum, chiefly distributed in coal; and a fund of £61. 10. a year, left by James Holbrook, in 1805, and others, is appropriated towards supplying bread to the poor. George Gascoigne, a poet of considerable repute, and author of several dramatic pieces, who died in 1578, was a native of the village. The Rev. William Piers, D.D., Bishop of Bath and Wells, who died at the advanced age of 94, and was at the time the oldest bishop in Christendom, both with respect to years and date of consecration, lies interred in the chancel of the church; and Edward Rowe Mores, an eminent scholar, and one of the principal agents in forming the Equitable Assurance Society, was buried here in 1778. Thomas Cartwright, afterwards Bishop of Chester, and Edmund Chishall, a learned antiquary and divine, were respectively vicars of the parish.

WALTON (St. Michael), a parish, in the union of NEWPORT-PAGNELL, hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, 2 miles (N. by E.) from Fenny-Stratford; containing 103 inhabitants. The parish comprises 757 acres, of which 24 are common or waste land. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 9. 7., and in the gift of the incumbent, the Rev. Valentine Ellis: the tithes have been commuted for £195; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 48½ acres.

WALTON, a parish, in the union of BRAMPTON, ESKDALE ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND; containing 440 inhabitants, of whom 152 are in High Walton, 10½ miles (N. E. by E.), and 288 in Low Walton, 10 (N. E. by E.), from Carlisle. The parish comprises 3592 acres, of which 500 are undivided moor and peat moss; the soil is generally argillaceous, interspersed with patches of fine loam; the surface is gently undulated, and the lower lands are watered by two small rivulets, called the Cambeck and Kingwater, which flow into the Irthing. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £131; patrons, the Heirs of the late C. Dacre, Esq.; impropiator, W. P. Johnson, Esq. The church was rebuilt in 1813. The great tithes have been commuted for £176, and the small for £31. 7. The old Roman wall crossed the parish, which contained the station Petriana, the site of which is now called Castle

Steads, and out of its ruins several houses have been built: numerous inscriptions and other relics of antiquity have been discovered.

WALTON, a township, in the parish and union of CHESTERFIELD, hundred of SCARSDALE, N. division of the county of DERBY, 3 miles (S. W. by W.) from Chesterfield; containing 940 inhabitants.

WALTON, a hamlet, in the parish of DEERHURST, union of TEWKESBURY, Lower division of the hundred of WESTMINSTER, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Tewkesbury; containing 257 inhabitants.

WALTON, a township, in the parish of BISHOP'S-FROOME, union of BROMYARD, hundred of RADLOW, county of HEREFORD, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Bromyard; containing, with the townships of Halmonds-Froome and Leadon, 264 inhabitants.

WALTON, a hamlet, in the parishes of KIMCOTE and KNAPTOFT, union of LUTTERWORTH, hundred of GUTHLAXTON, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, 4 miles (N. E. by E.) from Lutterworth; containing 647 inhabitants.

WALTON, a hamlet, in the parish of PASTON, union and soke of PETERBOROUGH, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Peterborough; containing 179 inhabitants.

WALTON, a hamlet, in the parish of KING'S-SUTTON, union of BRACKLEY, hundred of KING'S-SUTTON, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON; containing 37 inhabitants.

WALTON (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of WELLS, hundred of WHITLEY, W. division of SOMERSET, 3 miles (S. W. by W.) from Glastonbury; containing 782 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Bath to Exeter, and comprises 2500 acres, of which 181 are common or waste: blue lias is quarried, which is used chiefly for walls and floors. The living is annexed to the rectory of Street: the tithes have been commuted for £380, and there is a parsonage-house, with about $18\frac{1}{2}$ acres of glebe land. The church was enlarged in 1837, when a new tower was built; the chancel is said to have been much injured by Cromwell's soldiers, who used it as a stable, but it has been restored, and the windows re-opened, and ornamented with stained glass. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Many valuable fossils are found in the quarries, and some of the beautiful specimens which enrich the British Museum were obtained from this place.

WALTON, a township, in the parish of BASWICH, union of STAFFORD, E. division of the hundred of CUTLESTONE, S. division of the county of STAFFORD, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Stafford. A church dedicated to St. Thomas, and consecrated in December, 1842, has been erected at a cost of £1400, on a site given by the Earl of Lichfield, and is a cruciform structure with a square tower and Lombard spire.

WALTON, a township, in the parish of ECCLESHALL, union of STONE, N. division of the hundred of PIREHILL and of the county of STAFFORD; containing 113 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £153. 19. 8., of which £1. 18. 8. are payable to the vicar, and £152. 1. to the Bishop of Lichfield.

WALTON, a liberty, in the parish and union of STONE, S. division of the hundred of PIREHILL, N. division of the county of STAFFORD; containing 226 inhabitants.

WALTON (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of WOODBRIDGE, hundred of COLNEIS, E. division of SUFFOLK, 10 miles (S. E. by E.) from Ipswich; containing 907 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the north-east by the river Deben, on the south-west by the harbour of Harwich, and on the south by the North Sea; it comprises about 1200 acres, the soil generally a rich loam, and the surface flat. On the shore is a Martello tower, for the defence of the coast; and there are still some small remains of Walton Castle, a stronghold of the Bigods, in the parish of Felixtow, anciently a Roman station, of which nearly the whole has been washed away by the sea; it had the privilege of a mint, and large quantities of Roman coins have been found on the site. The living is a discharged vicarage endowed with the rectorial tithes, with that of Felixtow annexed, and valued in the king's books at £4. 6. 8.; net income, £290; patrons, the family of Richards. There is a place of worship for Baptists. A cell of Benedictine monks, subordinate to the monastery of Rochester, was founded here in the reign of William Rufus, and continued till 1528, when it was given to Cardinal Wolsey towards the endowment of his intended colleges: there are very considerable remains of the buildings.

WALTON, a tything, in the parish of BOSHAM, union of WEST BOURNE, hundred of BOSHAM, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of SUSSEX; containing 91 inhabitants.

WALTON (ST. PETER), a parish, in the AINSTY wapentake, W. riding of YORK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Wetherby; containing 254 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 1670 acres of fertile land, mostly the property of G. L. Fox, Esq., who is lord of the manor: the village is pleasantly situated a short distance from the river Wharfe, which passes on the west and south. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £90; patrons and impropiators, C. A. Fischer, Esq., and another. The church, a neat structure, stands on an eminence, and has a tower at the west end. The old Roman Watling-street crosses the river at a place named St. Helen's, and passes through the parish to that part of the wall now called Rudgate.

WALTON, a township, in the parish of GREAT SANDALL, union of WAKEFIELD, Lower division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, W. riding of YORK, 3 miles (S. E. by S.) from Wakefield; containing 510 inhabitants. Walton Hall is the seat of Charles Waterton, Esq., author of a volume of Essays on natural history, and Wanderings in South America. The Barnsley canal and the North-Midland railway pass through the township; and about 20 persons are employed in soap and alkali works, established in 1820. A school is endowed with £6. 6. per annum.

WALTON-CARDIFF (ST. JAMES), a parish, in the union, and Lower division of the hundred, of TEWKESBURY, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (E. S. E.) from Tewkesbury; containing 69 inhabitants. It comprises 650 acres by admeasurement, consisting of about equal portions of arable and pasture land of good quality; the road from Tewkesbury to Evesham passes along the northern boundary, the river Severn runs at a short distance on the west, and the Gloucester and Birmingham railway on the east. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £53; patrons, the Warden and Fellows of All Souls' College, Oxford.

WALTON-DEIVILE (St. James), a parish, in the Warwick division of the hundred of KINGTON, union of STRATFORD-ON-AVON, S. division of the county of WARWICK, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Kington. The living is a rectory, annexed to the vicarage of Wellesbourn-Hastings, and valued in the king's books at £4. 13. 4.: the tithes of Walton-Deivile and Walton-Mauduit, have been commuted for £217, and the glebe contains $44\frac{3}{4}$ acres. The church was rebuilt by Sir C. Mordaunt, about ninety years since.

WALTON, EAST (St. Mary), a parish, in the union and hundred of FREEBRIDGE-LYNN, W. division of NORFOLK, 9 miles (E. S. E.) from Lynn; containing 196 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2643 acres, which are arable, with the exception of 100 of woodland, and 200 of warren and common. It was consolidated with that of Gayton-Thorpe, about ten years since. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 3. 4.; patron, A. Hamond, Esq.; appropriator, the Bishop of Ely. The great tithes have been commuted for £230, and the vicarial for £178; the glebe comprises an acre and a quarter, and there is a glebe-house. The church consists of a nave and chancel, with a circular tower. In the garden of a farm-house adjoining the churchyard, are the picturesque ruins of St. Andrew's chapel, formerly belonging to an ancient priory.

WALTON, INFERIOR, a township, in the parish and union of RUNCORN, hundred of BUCKLOW, N. division of the county of CHESTER, 2 miles (S.) from Warrington; containing 349 inhabitants. The Mersey and Irwell canal passes in the vicinity.

WALTON-IN-GORDANO (St. Paul), a parish, in the union of BEDMINSTER, hundred of PORTBURY, E. division of SOMERSET, 14 miles (W.) from Bristol; containing 217 inhabitants. The manor was formerly owned by Ralph de Mortimer, kinsman of William the Conqueror; some of his family were earls of March, and under them the manor was held for several generations by Richard de Walton and his descendants. The parish is bounded on the west by the Bristol Channel, and is situated about 2 miles north of Clevedon, a favourite watering-place, nearly opposite to Cardiff; it comprises 1153*a.* 2*r.* 22*p.*, of which 120 acres are common or waste land. Stone is abundant, and there is a quarry. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 15. 5., and in the gift of P. J. Miles, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £180, and the glebe comprises 25 acres. The church is a plain edifice, built about 1710, and enlarged to nearly double its original size in 1838. There are some remains of a more ancient church at the foot of the hill occupied by Walton Castle, an octangular pile, embattled, and crowned at each angle with a turret; the principal entrance is on the east, and the keep, which is octangular, is in the centre of the area.

WALTON-LE-DALE, a chapelry, in the parish, and Lower division of the hundred, of BLACKBURN, union of PRESTON, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 2 miles (S. E.) from Preston; containing 6659 inhabitants. It is distinguished as the scene of a great battle fought August 17th, 1648, between Cromwell and the Duke of Hamilton; and also for a gallant achievement performed in 1715, by General, or Parson, Wood, and his congregation, in defending the passage of the Ribble against the Scottish rebels. In 1701, the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Derwentwater, and other leaders of the Jacobites, incorporated themselves by the style of the "Mayor and Corporation of the ancient Borough of Walton," and held their meetings in a small public-house here, concealing their real motives under the guise of ludicrous transactions. They kept a register, a mace, a sword of state, and other mock insignia of office; and the society, notwithstanding the diminution of the number of its members by the unsuccessful rebellion of 1715, existed till about 40 years since, when it was entirely dissolved. Walton is situated on an eminence which commands fine views of the vale of Ribble on one side, and of that of Derwent on the other. Both the valleys are extremely picturesque, the banks of their respective rivers being steep, and richly clothed with wood: the back ground of the Ribble is formed by the high and extensive ranges of Longridge and Pendle; and that of the Derwent by Billinge Hill, and an abrupt elevation crowned with the ruins of Houghton Tower, the ancient baronial residence of the family of that name. There are three large cotton-manufactories and several printing establishments, affording employment to the greater portion of the inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £156; patron, the Vicar of Blackburn. A rent-charge of £387. 3. 3. has been awarded as a commutation for the tithes. The chapel, dedicated to St. Leonard, is principally in the later English style. A national school is supported by subscription, and a school built in 1672 is endowed with about £16 per annum.

WALTON-LE-SOKEN, or WALTON-ON-THE-NAZE (All Saints), a parish, in the union and hundred of TENDRING, N. division of ESSEX, $13\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Manningtree; containing 721 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on three sides by the sea, forms a noted promontory called the Naze, from the Saxon term signifying a nose of land. Imbedded in the clay which composes the basis of the cliffs, have been discovered, usually after the ebbing of very strong tides, some curious fossils, the tusks of elephants, with the horns, bones, and teeth of other huge animals. The shore abounds with pyrites chiefly of wood, of which immense quantities have been here manufactured into the crystal commonly called green copperas, or sulphate of iron; and nodules of argillaceous clay, which continually fall from the cliffs, and harden into stone, are gathered and conveyed to London and Harwich, for making Roman cement. The beach is a delightful promenade, and affords superior facilities for bathing, the ebb tides leaving a firm smooth sand several miles in extent; which advantages have, of late years, occasioned a number of persons to resort hither for the benefit of cold and warm sea-bathing. A highly respectable hotel, and some lodging-houses, have been erected; and an act was passed in 1841, for making certain improvements in the town. Adjoining the Hall is a square tower, built by the corporation of the Trinity House, as a mark to guide ships passing or entering the port of Harwich. The living is a discharged vicarage, consolidated with that of Thorpe, with the vicarage of Kirby, and valued in the king's books at £9; impropiators, the Hope Insurance Company, London, whose tithes have been commuted for £270, and those of the vicar for £133; there is $1\frac{1}{4}$ acre of glebe. The church was erected and consecrated by Bishop Porteus, in 1804, the ancient structure having, a few years previously, been entirely swept away by the sea, as well as the churchyard and every house near it but one of the old village; it was enlarged in 1832, but, being still inadequate, a further augmentation took place in 1835, when the expenses amounted to about £1000. Here was formerly an endowment of a prebend in the cathedral of St. Paul's, but it has long since been consumed by the encroachment of the sea, and the dignity is now held as Prebenda consumpta per Mare. There are about 35 acres of land, left chiefly by John Sadler, in 1563, for the poor.

WALTON-ON-THE-HILL (St. Mary), a parish, in the union and hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER; containing 37,917 inhabitants, of whom 1759 are in Walton township, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Liverpool. The parish consists of the chapels of Everton, Formby, Kirkby, and West Derby, and the townships of Bootle with Linacre, Fazakerley, Kirkdale, Simonswood, and Walton. In consequence of its proximity to Liverpool, the place has greatly advanced in population, and has become the residence of numerous merchants, retired tradesmen, &c. There is a house of correction at Kirkdale, at which place are held the adjourned general quarter-sessions for the hundred, and the petty-sessions for the Kirkdale division thereof. The living is a vicarage, endowed with the rectorial tithes, and valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4.; net income, £294; patron, J. S. Leigh, Esq.: the rectory is valued in the king's books at £69. 16. 10½. The church, which has been partially rebuilt, and has portions in the decorated English style, was, up to 1698, the mother church of Liverpool; and the present edifice of St. Nicholas there, was a chapel of ease under the Vicar of Walton. The church of St. James, in Toxteth-Park, is dependent on Walton; and a church has been erected at Poplar-Grove, containing 1100 sittings, 640 of which are free.

WALTON-ON-THE-HILL (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of REIGATE, First division of the hundred of COPTHORNE, W. division of SURREY, 4 miles (S. by E.) from Epsom; containing 362 inhabitants. This place is situated between Epsom and Reigate, at the distance of about a mile from the London and Brighton road, by way of Sutton, and comprises 2591a. 1r. 23p., a considerable portion of which is open down and common; the soil consists of gravel, chalk, and clay, variously disposed. The surface is very hilly, and the eminences are covered with an extensive range of woods remarkable for a profusion of wild strawberries, and containing many valuable botanical plants; the scenery in every direction is beautiful, and from the southern extremity of the parish, fine views may be had of the Surrey hills and valleys, and also of the Sussex downs. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 6. 5½.; net income, £346; patron, Sir B. H. Carew. The body of the old church having fallen to decay, was rebuilt in 1826, by the parishioners; and an elegant octagonal tower was erected at the expense of Mrs. A. Paston Gee. The chancel contains some remains of stained glass; and there is a curious leaden font, formed with nine compartments, in each of which is a figure in a sitting posture. Roman tiles and pottery have been dug up in an inclosure on Walton Heath, an ancient earthwork, where, also, a brass figure of Æsculapius has been found. There are some springs in the parish, the water of which is of a mineral quality.

WALTON-ON-THE-WOLDS (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of BARROW-UPON-SOAR, hundred of EAST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, 4 miles (E.) from Loughborough; containing 285 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the west by the river Soar, and is situated on the road from Loughborough to Melton-Mowbray; it comprises 1500 acres by admeasurement, and limestone is quarried for agricultural purposes. The Midland-Counties' railway passes within about 2 miles. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15; net income, £403; patron, the Rev. Augustus Packe. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1792; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 289 acres. The church is a neat brick edifice, rebuilt in 1739. There is a place of worship for Primitive Methodists.

WALTON-ON-TRENT (St. John the Baptist), a parish, in the union of BURTON, hundred of REPTON and GRESLEY, S. division of the county of DERBY, 4 miles (S. W.) from Burton; containing 472 inhabitants. Edward II. forded the Trent at this place, in pursuit of Thomas, Earl of Lancaster, and the disaffected barons. In 1833, an act was obtained for building a bridge over it to Barton-under-Needwood, in Staffordshire. The river bounds the parish on the west; and the Birmingham and Derby railroad, upon which there is a second-class station, passes through it. The living is a rectory, with that of Rosliston annexed, valued in the king's books at £17. 2. 8½.; net income, £828; patrons, the family of Townshend. The tithes of Walton have been commuted for £656. 18.; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 69 acres. The church was a few years since repaired at a considerable expense, defrayed by subscription; it contains several ancient monumental tombs. A school on the national system is partly supported with £20 a year, arising from land bequeathed in 1760.

WALTON, SUPERIOR, a township, in the parish and union of RUNCORN, hundred of BUCKLOW, N. division of the county of CHESTER, 2½ miles (S. S. W.) from Warrington; containing 229 inhabitants. The Duke of Bridgewater's canal passes in the vicinity.

WALTON-UPON-THAMES (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of CHERTSEY, First division of the hundred of ELMBRIDGE, W. division of SURREY, 3 miles (N. W.) from Esher, and 18 (S. W. by W.) from London; containing 2537 inhabitants. This place probably derived its name from formidable Roman works yet visible within its precincts, the principal of which, on St. George's Hill, is styled the camp of Cæsar, who here gave battle to Cassivelaunus, at the head of the Britons; but that chieftain, having first taken the precaution of driving stakes into the bed of the Thames, successfully opposed the vigorous attempts of the Romans to force the passage of the river, at a place still called Coway Stakes. The village is pleasantly situated on the bank of the river, and is much frequented by anglers; it derives some importance from the many noble mansions in its immediate neighbourhood, and the elegant villas by which it is surrounded. Here are Ashley Park, one of the numerous mansions built by Cardinal Wolsey; Oatlands, formerly the property of the late Duke of York, partly in this parish and partly in that of Weybridge, the boundary line passing through the house; and Apps Court, once the residence of Wolsey, but of which the ancient building has given place to a more modern and elegant mansion. A farm-house also is mentioned as having been the seat of Bradshaw, who presided at the trial of Charles I., and which was afterwards occupied by Judge Jeffreys. A curious wooden bridge, of three arches, over the Thames, was built about 1750, by S. Dicker, Esq.; and, more recently, another of brick and stone, of fifteen arches, across the low meadows, was added to it; but the former, falling to decay, was replaced by the present structure, built uniformly with that which remained, and both now appear as one bridge of considerable length and beauty. The London and South-Western railway intersects the parish, and a station has been established here. A fair for cattle, granted by Henry VIII., is held on Wednesday and Thursday in Easter-week. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £209; impropiator, J. W. Spicer, Esq., whose tithes have been commuted for £91. 18. The church, a structure of some antiquity, contains many fine monuments, of which the most conspicuous is one by Roubilliac, to the memory of Richard Boyle, Viscount Shannon, who distinguished himself at the memorable battle of the Boyne; and several members of the Rodney family, and other eminent persons, have been buried here. A chapel of ease was built at Hershams, on a site given by Mr. William Holmes, at an expense of £1800, and is a neat edifice in the early Norman style, containing 472 sittings, half of which are free; it has been endowed with £1000 by Sir H. Fletcher, and was consecrated on the 8th of November, 1839. There is a place of worship for Independents. Thomas Fenner, in 1635, bequeathed a message in the parish of St. Helen, Bishopsgate, producing £210 per annum, which sum is appropriated to the relief of 20 poor families, and the apprenticing of boys. William Lilly, the celebrated astrologer, was interred here.

WALTON, WEST (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of WISBECH, hundred of FREEBRIDGE-MARSHLAND, W. division of NORFOLK, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Wisbech; containing 954 inhabitants. The parish comprises 5219*a.* 4*p.*, of which 3058 acres are arable, and 2052 meadow and pasture: the river Nene separates a portion of the land containing about 600 acres, which are in the Isle of Ely. The living is a rectory in mediocreties, called respectively Lewis and Eliensis, the former valued in the king's books at £16. 13. 4., in the patronage of the Rev. C. H. Townshend, and the latter at £16, in the gift of the Crown: the tithes of Lewis have been commuted for £802, and those of Eliensis for £572. 17., with a glebe of 6 acres. The church is an extremely beautiful structure in the early and decorated English styles, with a massive and highly-enriched tower detached from the building, and forming an arched entrance into the churchyard; the south porch is an elegant specimen of the early English style, and the tower, which consists of three stages crowned with a perforated parapet and angular pinnacles, is profusely ornamented with series of arches. The interior, which is 130 feet in length and 65 in breadth, though much defaced by injudicious alterations and additions, retains numerous interesting details. There are places of worship for Independents and Primitive Methodists. Mrs. Dale, in 1794, left £750 three per cent. consols. for teaching children; and thirty acres of land, producing £91. 5. per annum, have been bequeathed to the poor.

WALTON, WOOD (St. Andrew), a parish, in the hundred of NORMAN-CROSS, union and county of HUNTINGDON, 7 miles (N. by W.) from Huntingdon; containing 273 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11, and in the gift of Admiral Hussey: the tithes have been commuted for £530, and the glebe comprises 22 acres.

WALWICK, a liberty, locally in the parish of WARDEEN, union of HEXHAM, N. W. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 5¼ miles (N. W. by N.) from Hexham. This place, situated on the western bank of the North Tyne, and on the line of Severus' Wall, was the Cilurnum of the Romans, and the station of the Ala Secunda Asturum; its extent, which may still be traced, was, from east to west, 570 feet, and from north to south 400. Among the numerous relics discovered are a spacious vault, a mutilated statue of Europa neatly sculptured in freestone, and a curious tablet commemorative of the rebuilding of some edifice by the second wing of the Astures. In this district are two good mansions, Walwick Hall and Walwick Chesters, the former belonging to Thomas Butler, Esq., and the latter to Nathaniel Clayton, Esq. Walwick Grange, formerly the seat of the Errington family, built out of an old tower, has been converted into a farm-house; and in Hoiner's-lane are fragments of an ancient cross.

WALWORTH, a township, in the parish of HEIGHINGTON, union of DARLINGTON, S. E. division of DARLINGTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM, 4½ miles (N. W.) from Darlington; containing 152 inhabitants. It is divided into the two hamlets or districts of High and Low Walworth, in the former of which is Walworth Castle, beautifully situated, the seat of John Aylmer, Esq. The tithes have been commuted for £261, of which £31 are payable to the vicar, and £230 to the prebendary of Durham.

WALWORTH, a hamlet, in the parish and union of ST. MARY, NEWINGTON, E. division of the hundred of BRIXTON and of the county of SURREY, 2 miles (S.) from London. This place consists of a continued line of modern houses on the road to Camberwell, and also extends on the west to Kennington, and on the east to the Kent-road, several streets in each direction having been built within a few years. The Royal Surrey Zoological Gardens, opened in August, 1831, occupy an area of about 17 acres attached to the manor-house, which have been inclosed and tastefully laid out in parterres of flowers, lawns, and shrubberies, intersected by gravel-walks leading to the various objects of attraction within the grounds. A church, dedicated to St. Peter, was erected in 1825, at an expense of £19,126, of which a moiety was granted by the Parliamentary Commissioners, and the other advanced on loan for eight years without interest, to be repaid by a rate on the inhabitants. It is a spacious and handsome edifice of brick ornamented with stone, having at the western entrance a receding portico of four Ionic columns supporting a cornice and balustrade, with a slender square tower, which is adorned at the quoins with pillars of the Corinthian order, and surmounted by a circular campanile turret, surrounded with Corinthian pillars and crowned by a conical dome. The living, which will eventually become a district incumbency, is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Rector of Newington. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyans; and several schools are supported.

WAMBROOK (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of CHARD, hundred of BEAMINSTER, Bridport division of DORSET, 2 miles (S. W.) from Chard; containing 223 inhabitants. It is situated near the great western road from London, and comprises 1889*a.* 2*r.* 14*p.*, of which about 150 acres are woodland and plantation, 100 furze and rough pasture, 55 orchard, and the remainder meadow, pasture, and arable. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 7. 1., and in the patronage of Mrs. Martha Edwards; net income, £262. The church, which was anciently a chapel to the vicarage of Chardstock, contains 150 sittings.

WAMPOOL, a township, in the parish of AIKTON, union of WIGTON, CUMBERLAND ward, and E. division of the county of CUMBERLAND, 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Wigton; containing 107 inhabitants.

WANBOROUGH, a parish, in the union of GUILDFORD, First division of the hundred of WOKEING, W. division of SURREY, 4 miles (W.) from Guildford; containing 171 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 1792 acres, and is intersected by a high ridge of land called the Hog's Back, which commands an extensive and richly-diversified view of the surrounding country. Nearly one-third of the area is coppice and common waste; the soil is light, and there are several chalk-pits in the parish. Wanborough is tithe-free, and exempt from ecclesiastical jurisdiction: the church, which was presented to by the abbot of Waverley, has fallen into decay, and part of it was converted into a mausoleum by the late James Mangles, Esq., who was interred here in 1838.

WANBOROUGH (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of HIGHWORTH and SWINDON, hundred of KINGSBRIDGE, Swindon and N. divisions of WILTS, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Swindon; containing 992 inhabitants. It is about a mile from the Hungerford and Swindon road, and comprises by admeasurement 4617 acres, of which about two-thirds are pasture; the soil is in general clayey. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £21. 10. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £375; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Winchester. The tithes were commuted for land and annual money payments in 1779. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WANDSWORTH (All Saints), a parish, and the head of a union, in the W. division of the hundred of BRIXTON, E. division of SURREY, 6 miles (S. W.) from London; containing 7614 inhabitants. The name is derived from the river Wandle, which falls into the Thames here. The town consists chiefly of one street, occupying the declivities of two hills, on each of which are several mansions of a superior description; the inhabitants are supplied with water from springs. The manufactures comprise scarlet-dyeing, established for more than a century; hat-making, introduced by some French emigrants who settled here in the time of Louis XIV.; the making of bolting-cloths, the printing of kerseymeres and silk handkerchiefs, the whitening and pressing of stuffs, and calico-printing. There are also three corn-mills, and mills for the preparation of iron, white-lead, and linseed-oil, now on the decline; vinegar-works, distilleries, and a large brewery; the whole furnishing employment to several hundred persons. A tram-road extends from the basin near the junction of the Wandle with the Thames, through Mitcham, to Croydon, a distance of 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and with a branch of 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ mile to Carshalton, is used for the conveyance of lime, coal, &c.: the act for the road, which was one of the first public acts obtained for railways, was passed in 1801, and the road was opened in 1805. The London and South-Western railway also passes through the parish, and has a station about a mile from the church. A fair is held on Whit-Monday, for cattle, horses, and pigs; and there is a pleasure-fair on the two following days. The town is under the controul of the new police; petty-sessions for the Western division of the hundred of Brixton are held every Saturday; and a court of requests, for the recovery of debts under £5, comprises the parish within its jurisdiction.

The parish comprises 2245*a.* 3*r.* 4*p.*, of which about 463 acres are arable, 1020 meadow and pasture, 131 market-gardens, and 201 common and waste. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £15. 5. 5.; net income, £840; patron, W. Borradaile, Esq.; impropiators, the Trustees of Marshall's charity. The church is a plain brick structure in the Grecian style, rebuilt in 1780, with the exception of a square tower at the west end; it contains several monuments. An additional church, also in the Grecian style, capable of accommodating nearly 2000 persons, and dedicated to St. Anne, was erected a few years since, at an expense of £14,600, defrayed by Her Majesty's Commissioners for building new churches: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £162; patron, the Vicar. There is also a chapel, with a parsonage-house, in the hamlet of Summer's-Town, the former erected at the cost of James Gordon and Joshua Stanger, Esqrs., and the latter at the expense of Mr. Stanger, who also gave about half an acre of garden-ground. The Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyans, have places of worship; and the Friends have a school at which the eminent citizen, Sir John Barnard, was educated. On the south-west portion of the common is the Surrey Pauper Lunatic Asylum, erected in 1841, at an expense of nearly £65,000, after a design by Mr. W. Moseley, and having 96 acres of land attached; it is a spacious and handsome building of red brick, with stone dressing in the Elizabethan style, 535 feet in length, and consisting of a centre and two wings, the latter projecting 85 feet from the line of the principal range, of which the central portion has also a projection of 47 feet. Fifteen watermen of the parish receive £4 per annum each, the produce of bequests; and amongst the miscellaneous charities, those of the famous Alderman Smith, who was born and buried here, deserve particular notice, extending not only to Wandsworth, but to most of the parishes in the county. The poor law union of Wandsworth and Clapham comprises six parishes, and contains a population of 39,853. The first Presbyterian congregation established in the kingdom was at this place, in the year 1572. In Garratt-lane, between Wandsworth and Tooting, a mock election used to be held after every parliamentary election, to which Foote's dramatic production of "the Mayor of Garratt" has given celebrity.

WANGFORD (St. Peter), a parish and post-town, in the union and hundred of BLVTHING, E. division of SUFFOLK, 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Southwold; containing, with the hamlet of Henham, 818 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from London to Yarmouth, and comprises 811 acres. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £79; patron and proprietor, the Earl of Stradbroke, whose seat, Henham Hall, is in the parish. The tithes have been commuted for £93. The church is chiefly in the later English style, and has a steeple at the north-east angle of the building; it is supposed to have belonged to a Cluniac priory, a cell to Thetford, founded here before 1160, by Doudo Asini, steward to the king's household, or, as some think, by Eudo Dapifer, and which, at the suppression, had a revenue of £30. 9. 5. In the church are handsome monuments to members of the noble family of Stradbroke who lie interred here.

WANGFORD (St. Denis), a parish, in the union of MILDENHALL, hundred of LACKFORD, W. division of SUFFOLK, 3 miles (S. W. by W.) from Brandon-Ferry; containing 46 inhabitants. The road from London to Lynn, by way of Mildenhall, passes through this parish, which comprises about 3000 acres. The living is a discharged rectory, annexed to that of Brandon, and valued in the king's books at £9. 11. 8½. : the tithes have been commuted for £570, and there are 16 acres of glebe. The church is a small ancient structure.

WANLIP (St. Nicholas), a parish, in the union of BARROW-UPON-SOAR, hundred of WEST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, 3¼ miles (S. E. by S.) from Mountsorrel; containing 122 inhabitants. It comprises about 950 acres, of which the soil is partly loam, and partly a sandy earth, and the surface in some places hilly. The river Soar, or the Leicester and Melton-Mowbray navigation, runs through the parish, and is crossed by a bridge. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 4. 4½., and in the gift of Sir G. J. Palmer, Bart. : the tithes have been commuted for £275, and the glebe comprises 26 acres. The church was founded in the reign of Richard II., by Sir Thomas Walsh, over whose tomb is a brass plate. Near the old Fosse-road, which passes in the vicinity, a Roman tessellated pavement, coins, broken urns, and other relics, have been found.

WANSFORD (St. Mary), a parish and post-town, in the union of STAMFORD, soke of PETERBOROUGH, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 36 miles (N. E.) from Northampton; containing 205 inhabitants. This parish, situated on the river Nene, and traversed by the great road from London to York, comprises 469*a. 1r. 9p.* The living is annexed to the rectory of Thornhaugh: the tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1807. The church exhibits specimens of various styles.

WANSFORD, a township, in the parish of NAFFERTON, union of DRIFFIELD, wapentake of DICKERING, E. riding of YORK, 3 miles (E. S. E.) from Great Driffield; containing 242 inhabitants. Some persons are employed in the manufacture of cotton goods and carpets, the establishment for the latter of which is situated on the navigable river Hull, and is the only one of the kind in this part of the kingdom; there are extensive corn-mills, and by the Driffield canal, vessels of seventy tons' burthen can come up to the village. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1769. There is a place of worship for a congregation of Wesleyan Methodists.

WANSTEAD (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of WEST HAM, hundred of BECONTREE, S. division of ESSEX, 6½ miles (N. E.) from London; containing 1608 inhabitants. The parish is separated from that of Barkings by the river Roden, and comprises 2004*a. 27p.*, of which about 273 acres are arable, 582 pasture, and 1148 woodland, waste, and water. The village is situated on the borders of Waltham Forest, near the main road from London to Cambridge, and is principally worthy of note as the site of Wanstead House, built in 1715, by Sir Richard, son of Sir Josiah Child, created Viscount Castlemain in 1718, and Earl of Tynley in 1731, and which was considerably extended and embellished by his descendants. This splendid mansion was surrounded by a very extensive and beautiful park, laid out with great taste, and interspersed with gardens, pleasure-grounds, and grottos, and was the temporary residence of the Prince of Condé; but having come, by marriage, into the possession of the Hon. W. T. L. P. Wellesley, it was sold and demolished in 1822, since which time the park has been let out in portions for the grazing of cattle; and of the buildings, nothing remains but the stables and out-offices. Snaresbrook, a hamlet in the parish, situated on the borders of the forest, contains several handsome houses, occupied by respectable families; the scenery is beautifully picturesque, and enlivened with a fine sheet of water, and the immediate neighbourhood abounds with handsome seats and pleasing villas. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 9., and in the gift of the Hon. Mr. Wellesley: the tithes have been commuted for £377, and the glebe comprises 83 acres. The church, rebuilt about the year 1790, is of brick and Portland stone, with a fine Doric portico, and, at the west end, a cupola supported on eight Ionic pillars; the interior is of light and elegant appearance, and in the chancel is a window of beautifully stained glass, by Eginton, representing Christ bearing the Cross, in imitation of the altar-piece in the chapel of Magdalen College, Oxford; also a superb monument to the memory of Sir Josiah Child, Bart., who died in 1699. A free school, in connexion with the National Society, is partly supported by the proceeds of £200 three per cents., the bequest of George Bowles, Esq., in 1805. On the high road is the Infant Orphan Asylum, of which the foundation-stone was laid by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, on the 24th of July, 1841. The institution was established in 1827, at Dalston, in the parish of Hackney; but it having been found necessary to provide larger and more convenient premises, the present exceedingly handsome edifice, for the admission of 400 children, was erected at a cost of about £40,000, and opened with much ceremony, the King of the Belgians assisting, on the 27th June, 1843; it is in the Elizabethan style, and contains an excellent chapel, and is surrounded by extensive gardens. About the year 1735, a tessellated pavement of considerable dimensions, brass and silver coins, fragments of urns, and other relics of antiquity, were dug up on the south side of Wanstead Park.

WANSTROW (St. Mary), a parish, in the union and hundred of FROME, E. division of SOMERSET, 6 miles (S. W.) from Frome; containing 438 inhabitants. It comprises 2054*a. 1r. 11p.*, of which about 1378 acres are pasture, 424 arable, 117 wood, and 111 common. A new road has been formed in the parish, which has added considerably to its advantages. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 9. 9½, and in the gift of John Shore, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £320; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 57¾ acres.

WANTAGE (St. Peter and St. Paul), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of WANTAGE, county of BERKS; containing, with the chapelry of Grove, and the hamlets of Charlton and West Lockinge, 3650 inhabitants, of whom 2850 are in the town, 9 miles (S. W. by W.) from Abingdon, 24 miles (W. N. W.) from Reading, and 60 (W.) from London. This town, celebrated as the birthplace, in 849, of Alfred the Great, and as a royal residence in the time of the West Saxons, was made a borough after the Conquest, through the influence of Fulk Fitz-Warren, who had obtained a grant of the manor from Bigod, earl-marshal of England. It is situated at the edge of the Vale of White Horse, on a branch of the river Ock; the streets are irregular, but contain many good houses; the town is lighted, paved, and watched, under a local act, and the inhabitants are supplied with water from wells, and from a brook which runs into the river. The principal branches of trade and manufacture are those of sacking, twine, malt, and flour. Coal is brought hither, and corn, flour, and malt are sent to different parts, by means of a branch of the Wilts and Berks canal, which comes up to the town, affording a communication with Bath, Bristol, and London; and the Great Western railway passes two miles to the north. The market is held every alternate Saturday, chiefly for corn, but also for pigs and cattle. Fairs take place on the first Saturdays in March and May, for cattle and cheese, and on July 18th, for cherries; on October 18th is a statute-fair, and a cheese-fair occurs on the first Saturday in every month. The town-hall, in the centre of the market-place, was erected in 1835. The petty-sessions for the division are held here every Saturday, and a manorial court annually.

The parish comprises 5889 acres, of which 3566 are arable, 2308 meadow and pasture, and 12 wood. The living is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Windsor (the appropriators), valued in the king's books at £35. 2. 8½: the tithes have been commuted for £750; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 3 acres. The church, a spacious and handsome cruciform structure, with a square embattled tower rising from the intersection, is said to have been built by some of the Fitz-Warrens, to different members of which family are several monuments. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyans. About £400 per annum, the proceeds of town lands bequeathed in the reigns of Henry VI. and VII., and in 1598, and vested in twelve governors for the support of a free grammar school, are now appropriated to the purchase of cloth to the amount of £100, the payment of £160 in pensions to aged widows, the maintenance of apartments for poor persons, and to the support of an English school. Twelve almshouses were founded and endowed by Richard Styles, in 1680, with land in Hampshire, producing about £70 a year. The union of Wantage comprises 34 parishes or places, and contains a population of 16,826. King Alfred's memory is here retained by a petrifying spring called Alfred's Well. Dr. Joseph Butler, Bishop of Durham, and author of The Analogy, was born here in 1692; as was also the Rev. Isaac Kimber, a learned theological writer, who died in 1755.

WANTISDEN (St. John the Baptist), a parish, in the union and hundred of PLOMESGATE, E. division of SUFFOLK, 6 miles (E. N. E.) from Woodbridge; containing 110 inhabitants, and comprising 2000 acres by computation. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £64; patron and impropriator, N. C. Barnardiston, Esq. The church has many Norman details.

WAPLEY (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of CHIPPING-SODBURY, Lower division of the hundred of GRUMBALD'S-ASH, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 2½ miles (S. S. W.) from Chipping-Sodbury; containing 366 inhabitants. The parish is intersected by the road from Bristol to Malmesbury, and comprises 2448 acres, of which 41 are common or waste. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 18.; net income, £400; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Bristol. The great tithes of Wapley, with Codrington, have been commuted for £95, and the vicarial for £340; £9 are paid to the rector of Tate, and there is a glebe-house.

WAPLINGTON, a township, in the parish of ALLERTHORPE, union of POCKLINGTON, Wilton-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of the county of YORK, 2¾ miles (S. W.) from Pocklington; containing 45 inhabitants. The township is situated near the York and Hull road, and comprises by measurement 790 acres, of which 647 are arable, 53 meadow and pasture, 50 wood, and 40 moorland; the surface is level, and the soil of a sandy nature. There are marl and clay pits of fine quality, and kilns for the manufacture of bricks and draining-tiles. Within the last few years, about 300 acres of land, forming a rabbit-warren, have been brought into a good state of cultivation; and a house has been built in the rustic style, called Waplington Manor, surrounded with plantations, and the property and residence of Robert Denison, Esq. The Pocklington canal passes at a short distance. The appropriate tithes have been commuted for £61. 2. 6., payable to the Dean of York, and the vicarial for £13. 12.

WAPPENBURY (St. John the Baptist), a parish, in the union of WARWICK, Southam division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 5 miles (N. E.) from Leamington; containing 260 inhabitants, of whom 85 are in the township. The parish comprises 1356 acres, of which 576 are in the hamlet of Eathorpe, separated from that of Wapenbury by the river Leam. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8; the income is derived from 32 acres of land, situated at Bishop's-Itchington and Napton-on-the-Hill, and valued at £60 per annum, which sum is augmented by a donation of £10 from Lord Clifford, who is patron and impropriator. The church was built about the beginning of the 15th century, and has a chancel of more ancient date. There is a Roman Catholic chapel.

WAPPENHAM (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of TOWCESTER, hundred of KING'S-SUTTON, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 5 miles (W. S. W.) from Towcester; containing, with the hamlets of Astwell and Falcutt, 641 inhabitants, of whom 513 are in Wappenham township. The parish comprises 3933a.

3r. 3p., of which 1790 acres are in Astwell and Falcutt. At Astwell is an ancient mansion-house, formerly the seat of the earls Ferrars. Most of the females are employed in making pillow-lace. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £21. 9. 9½. and in the gift of the Bishop of Lincoln: the tithes were commuted for land in 1761; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises about 314 acres. The church is in the early English style. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WAPPING (St. JOHN THE EVANGELIST), a parish, adjoining the eastern portion of the city of London, in the union of STEPNEY, Tower division of the hundred of OSSULSTONE, county of MIDDLESEX; containing 4108 inhabitants. This place, originally overflowed by the Thames, was recovered from inundation, and denominated Wapping Wash, in the time of Elizabeth, under whose auspices it was inclosed and defended by walls. In the early part of the reign of Charles II. it comprised one street, which extended from within a quarter of a mile of the Tower, along the northern bank of the Thames, to the entrance of St. Katherine's Docks. In the reign of William and Mary it was made a parish, by act of parliament. About the end of the last century, upwards of 60 houses and other buildings were destroyed by fire, and several lives were lost, from the explosion of some barrels of gunpowder; the damage sustained on which occasion was estimated at more than £200,000. On the abdication of James II., the notorious Judge Jeffreys, who had fled in order to escape the probable effects of popular rage, assumed the disguise of a sailor, and concealed himself for a short time in an obscure part of Wapping, but was at last discovered and committed to the Tower, where he died in a few days. The parish, a portion of which is in the precincts of Well-close, in the liberty of the Tower, consists of several streets, paved, and lighted with gas; the main street has been widened in several places within the last few years, and the inhabitants are well supplied with water. It is within the jurisdiction of the court of requests for the Tower Hamlets, for the recovery of debts under £5. The business transacted is chiefly of a maritime and commercial character, to the growth of which the construction of the London Docks has materially contributed. The living is a rectory not in charge; net income, £258; patrons, the Principal and Fellows of Brasenose College, Oxford. The church contains a very fine monument by Roubilliac. There is a place of worship for Roman Catholics. A free school was established by subscription, in 1704; and, in 1822, its funds were augmented by a bequest of £5000 from Samuel Troutbeck, of Madras, Esq. Thomas Dilworth, author of the spelling-book, and system of arithmetic, was master of the school.

WARBLETON (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of HAILSHAM, hundred of HAWKESBOROUGH, rape of HASTINGS, E. division of SUSSEX, 12 miles (E. by S.) from Uckfield; containing 1300 inhabitants. The parish comprises 5762a. 23p., of which 2277 acres are arable, 1466 meadow and pasture, 213 hops, 72 garden and orchard, and 1677 wood and roughs; the surface is diversified with hill and dale. Iron and sand stone are abundant, and the smelting of the former was once carried on to a great extent. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the gift of Dr. John Haviland: the tithes have been commuted for £930; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 38 acres. The church is in the early and later English styles, with an embattled tower: on a slab in the chancel is a fine brass monument to the memory of W. Prestwick, Dean of Battle, who is habited in his canonicals. The poor have a few bequests. About two miles and a half eastward of the church, are remains of a priory built for Augustine canons in the 14th year of Henry IV.

WARBLINGTON, a parish, in the union of HAVANT, hundred of BOSMERE, Fareham and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, ½ a mile (S. E. by E.) from Havant; containing, with the chapelry of Emsworth, 2270 inhabitants, of whom 1105 are in Warblington township. The parish is bounded on the south by Langstone harbour, and situated on the road between Chichester and Portsmouth, and comprises about 3000 acres, of which 1542 are arable, 444 meadow, and 473 woodland. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £19. 9. 4½., and in the gift of the incumbent, the Rev. W. Norris: the tithes have been commuted for £740, and the glebe comprises 30 acres. The church was built about the beginning of the 13th century, and is partly Norman, and partly in the early English style, with an oratory at the end of each aisle. The ruins called Warblington Castle are the remains of a quadrangular mansion of the Montacutes and the Cottons, of which there are only the gateway and tower, the whole surrounded by a deep fosse.—See EMSWORTH.

WARBORNE, with PILLEY, a tything, in the parish of BOLDE, union of LYMINGTON, E. division of the hundred of NEW-FOREST, Lymington and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 435 inhabitants.

WARBOROUGH CUM SHILLINGFORD (St. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of WALLINGFORD, hundred of EWELME, county of OXFORD, 3 miles (N.) from Wallingford; containing 737 inhabitants, of whom 537 are in Warborough. The parish is partially bounded by the rivers Thame and Thames, and comprises about 1700 acres. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £350; patrons and impropiators, the President and Fellows of Corpus Christi College, Oxford. The church is an ancient edifice, with a tower, built in 1666; the font is of lead, on an octagonal stone shaft, and there are several interesting monuments, among which is one of marble to Francis Randolph, Margaret professor of divinity, and for some time principal of St. Alban's Hall, Oxford. The Society of Friends have a place of worship.

WARBOYS (St. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish, in the union of ST. IVES, hundred of HURSTINGSTONE, county of HUNTINGDON, 7 miles (N. E.) from Huntingdon; containing 1800 inhabitants. The parish comprises 8103a. 3r. 9p., of which about 2736 acres are arable, 575 grass, and 142 wood; the soil in the high lands is clay, and in the low grounds fen. A pleasure-fair is held in the beginning of July, and continues for three days. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £27. 10.; net income, £1250; patron, T. Daniel, Esq. Some tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1795, and a commutation has taken place under the recent act for a rent-charge of £200; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 109 acres. The church has been enlarged. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans; and a national school is supported by the incumbent, at whose cost also the premises were built. The Rev. Robert Fowler, in 1824, bequeathed £200, of which the interest is distributed among the poor.

WARBRICK, with LAYTON, a township, in the parish of BISPHAM, union of the FYLDE, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Poulton; containing 1968 inhabitants. In this township is Blackpool, which see.

WARBSTOW (St. WERBURGH), a parish, in the union of LAUNCESTON, hundred of LESNEWTH, E. division of CORNWALL, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Camelford; containing 503 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3237 acres, of which 1133 are common or waste land; the ground is hilly, and the soil light. The living is a vicarage, annexed to that of Treneglos: the church has a curious Norman font. There are places of worship for Bryanites and Wesleyans; and a national school. Warbstow Barrow, here, is a remarkably ancient fortification.

WARBURTON (St. WERBURGH), a parish, in the union of ALTRINCHAM, hundred of BUCKLOW, N. division of the county of CHESTER, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Warrington; containing 509 inhabitants. It comprises about 1732 acres, of which 400 are under tillage, 1200 meadow and pasture, 8 woodland, and 32 uncultivated moss. The rivers Mersey and Botling run through the parish, the surface of which is flat, and the chief produce cheese and potatoes. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the second mediety of the rectory of Lymm: the tithes have been commuted for £249. 18., and the glebe comprises 3 acres. The church, a small ancient structure, appears to have been originally of wood and plaster-work, but has received many additions of brick, of which material a tower was erected at the east end, in 1711; it contains about 250 sittings. Here was anciently a monastery of Præmonstratensian canons, dedicated to St. Werburgh.

WARCOP (St. COLUMBA), a parish, in EAST ward and union, county of WESTMORLAND, 3 miles (W. by N.) from Brough; containing 705 inhabitants. This place is situated near the road between Brough and Appleby, and is bounded on the north by the lofty ridge of mountains that extends from Stainmore to the borders of Scotland. The parish is intersected by the river Eden, and comprises about 11,000 acres, of which a large portion is high waste land; the soil in some parts is light and sandy, and in others mixed with red or blue clay; red freestone is quarried for all kinds of buildings, and lead-mines are in operation. In the village is an ancient cross, which was recently brought from the common, at the expense of the lord of the manor, who holds his court in June or July. A large fair takes place on the last day in Sept. and first day in Oct., called Brough Hill Fair; it is chiefly for the sale of cattle, horses, and sheep, but there is also an extensive traffic carried on in cloth by the Yorkshire clothiers, and articles of hardware, &c., form part of the numerous commodities exposed for sale. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 5. $1\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £194; patron, incumbent, and impropiator, the Rev. W. M. S. Preston. The tithes of the township were commuted for land in 1815; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains about 160 acres. The church is a plain structure, with some handsome windows. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Castle-hill, here, is supposed to be the site of an ancient castle, and Kirksteads that of a chapel. A singular festival, called the Rush-bearing, is celebrated on St. Peter's-day.

WARD-END, a village, in the hamlet of LITTLE BROMWICH, parish and union of ASTON, Birmingham division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, N. division of the county of WARWICK, 3 miles (N. E.) from Birmingham. A chapel was erected about the year 1516, but, the Reformation following immediately after, it is doubtful whether divine service was ever performed in the chapel, which fell into a state of dilapidation, and so continued till the year 1835. At this time, the remains were taken down, and a church was erected at a cost of £1500, raised by voluntary contributions, and was licensed by the bishop, but not consecrated till the 23rd of October, 1841. It is a handsome structure of brick coated with Roman cement, in the early English style, with a square embattled tower, and windows and doorways of stone; there are 306 sittings, including 178 free, and the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Aston, endowed with £1000 in the funds, of which £600 have been since laid out in the purchase of $6\frac{1}{2}$ acres of land and three cottages near the church, which, like the old chapel, is dedicated to the Holy Trinity, the Blessed Virgin, and St. Margaret.

WARDEN (St. JAMES), a parish, in the union, and within the liberty of the ISLE of SHEPPY, Upper division of the lathe of SCRAY, E. division of KENT, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E.) from Queenborough; containing 52 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 17. $8\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £90; patron, V. B. Simpson, Esq. The tower of the church was built at the expense of Delmark Banks, Esq., in 1834, with part of the materials of the old London bridge.

WARDEN (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of HEXHAM, N. W. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Hexham; containing, with the townships of Brokenheugh, Deanraw, and Lipwood, and the parochial chapels of Newbrough and Haydon, 2987 inhabitants, of whom 532 are in the township of Warden. This place derives its name, originally Wardon, from the remarkable don or hill under which the church and village are beautifully situated on the south-east, and on the rocky summit of which are vestiges of a circular British camp, subsequently occupied by the Romans, who raised additional works. Within the area of this encampment, the foundations of buildings and several querns have been found; and not far from the vicarage-house, are traces of a similar fort, most probably connected with the wall of Severus, between which and the North and South Tyne rivers, the parish is situated, near their confluence. The manor and the church, in 1298, belonged to the convent of Hexham, to which they had been granted, according to the record, "from a time beyond all memory," by Adam de Tyndale; and from the Dissolution till 1610, the manor was held by the crown, since which time it has been the property of various private families.

The township comprises 2995 acres; of which about two-thirds are arable, and the remainder, with the exception of 200 acres of woodland, meadow and pasture. The surface rises from the banks of the North and South Tyne to an elevation of about 480 feet; the soil in the valleys is a rich sandy loam, of lighter quality on the rising grounds, and on the ridges of the hills, various, and resting upon limestone, freestone, and whinstone. Works are carried on for obtaining coal, freestone, lime, and lead, which last was wrought in the Hawden and Settlingstones' ground from 1687 to 1697, and was resumed a few years since. The Newcastle and Carlisle railway passes for nearly 8 miles through the parish. The living is a vicarage, with Newbrough and Haydon annexed, valued in the king's books at £8. 16. 3.; net income, £504; patron, T. W. Beaumont, Esq.; impropiators, the Governors of Greenwich Hospital, the Allgood family, and others. The church, a very ancient cruciform structure in the early English style, was almost entirely rebuilt in 1765, and contains 300 sittings: the churchyard is spacious, and ornamented with some rows of beech and elm trees, and there is a vicarage-house. A school has been established.

WARDEN, CHIPPING (St. Peter and St. Paul), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union of BANBURY, hundred of CHIPPING-WARDEN, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Banbury; containing 545 inhabitants. The river Cherwell passes through the parish, and the Banbury and Lutteryworth road through the village. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £26. 10., and in the patronage of the Rt. Hon. Lady Susan North, with a net income of £277: the tithes have been commuted for £34. The Rev. William Smart, in 1466, bequeathed an estate, the rental of which, amounting to about £80, is distributed among the poor. In the neighbourhood are some Saxon or Danish intrenchments called Arberry Banks.

WARDEN-LAW, a township, in the parish and union of HOUGHTON-LE-SPRING, N. division of EASINGTON ward and of the county of DURHAM, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Durham; containing 60 inhabitants. It was formerly the property of the families of Claxton and Bowes, and, in the beginning of the 17th century, of that of Belasyse. The township is east of the road between Sunderland and Durham, and comprises by measurement 440 acres, of which 240 are arable, 193 grass land, 1 wood, and 6 waste; it occupies a lofty eminence, the highest ground on the eastern coast of Durham, crossed by a railway having a steam-engine on its summit, for drawing up and letting down waggons employed in conveying coal from the Hetton pits. The only remains of the vill of Warden are a few straggling cottages along the side of the ancient track called Salters-way.

WARDEN, OLD (St. Leonard), a parish, in the union of BIGGLESWADE, hundred of WIXAMTREE, county of BEDFORD, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Biggleswade; containing 630 inhabitants. A market and fair, granted in 1218, were formerly held, but have been long disused. The living is a discharged vicarage, united to that of Southill. In the cemetery is the mausoleum of Lord Ongley. An abbey for Cistercian monks from Rivaulx was founded here in 1135, by Walter L'Espee; it was dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary, and at the Dissolution had a revenue of £442. 11. 11.

WARDINGTON, a chapelry, in the parish of CROPPEDY, union and hundred of BANBURY, county of OXFORD, 5 miles (N. E. by N.) from Banbury; containing, with the hamlets of Coton and Williamsote, 865 inhabitants, some of whom are employed in the manufacture of plush and girth-webbing. The chapel is dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene.

WARDLE, a township, in the parish of BUNBURY, union of NANTWICH, First division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, S. division of CHESHIRE, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Nantwich; containing 181 inhabitants. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £48, payable to the Haberdashers' Company, London.

WARDLE, with WUERDALE, a township, in the parish and union of ROCHDALE, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 3 miles (N. N. E.) from Rochdale; containing 6875 inhabitants, of whom 2164 are in Wardle. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WARDLEWORTH, a township, in the parish and union of ROCHDALE, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER; containing 11,400 inhabitants, and comprising the principal part of the town of Rochdale, which see.

WARDLEY (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of UPPINGHAM, soke of OAKHAM, county of RUTLAND, 4 miles (W. by N.) from Uppingham; containing 59 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road between Uppingham and Leicester, and bounded on the south by the river Eye, which separates it from Leicestershire. It comprises 730 acres, of which 163 are wood, and the rest grass; the soil is a black fertile earth, with a gravelly substratum; the woodland was formerly part of Beaumont Chase. The living is a discharged rectory, with the vicarage of Belton annexed, valued in the king's books at £10. 16., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £287; impropiators of Belton, Dr. Bishop and J. Eagleton, Esq.: the glebe contains 23 acres. The church is Norman, and contains, on the south side of the nave, four handsome arches in that style. A school is endowed with £10 per annum, and the master also receives £12 from the trustees of thirty acres of land belonging to the poor.

WARDLOW, a township, in the union of BAKEWELL, partly in the parish of HOPE, but chiefly in that of BAKEWELL, hundred of HIGH PEAK, N. division of the county of DERBY, 2 miles (E. by S.) from Tideswell; containing 171 inhabitants, of whom 71 are in Wardlow Mires. The vicarial tithes were commuted for land in 1810. In making a turnpike-road through the village, in 1759, a circular heap of stones was opened, and found to contain the remains of about seventeen bodies, interred in rude cells or coffins of stone, and supposed to have been the bodies of men slain during the war between the houses of York and Lancaster, or of persons interred in a family burial-place.

WARDOUR, WILTS.—See TISBURY.

WARDY-HILL, a hamlet, in the parish of COVENEY, hundred of SOUTH WITCHFORD, union and ISLE of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE; containing 146 inhabitants.

WARE (St. Mary), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of BRAUGHIN, county of HERTFORD, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Hertford, and 21 (N.) from London; containing 4653 inhabitants.

This place, anciently called Guare, derived both its origin and name from a weare, or dam, constructed on the river Lea, and strongly fortified by the Danes in 894, in order to defend their vessels; but Alfred, by draining the bed of the river, is said to have stranded them and destroyed the fort. His son Edward built a town here, which was, however, of no importance till the reign of John, when Sayer de Quincy forced the thoroughfare of the bridge over the Lea, by breaking the chain placed there until toll was paid to the king's bailiff at Hertford. This led to the diversion of the northern road through this town, instead of Hertford, which essentially conduced to its prosperity. In the time of Henry III., a tournament was held here by Gilbert Marshall, Earl of Pembroke, in which he was slain; and, in the same reign, a Benedictine priory was founded by Margaret, Countess of Leicester, as a cell to the monastery of Ebralf, at Uttica, in Normandy, and was eventually bestowed by Henry V. on the Carthusian monastery of Sheen, in Surrey: here was also a house of Franciscan friars. The town is situated in a valley, on the east side of the river Lea, and consists of several streets, the principal extending about a mile along the high road from London to Cambridge; it is lighted, well supplied with both river and spring water, and is in a state of general improvement. A public library was established in 1795. The place was formerly subject to floods; but, from diverting into the river the water that flowed through Baldock-street to near the centre of the town, the inconvenience has been removed. The trade is chiefly in malt, which is made to a very great extent; most of the London breweries are supplied from this town, and there are above seventy malting establishments. The river is navigable hence to Hertford and London, furnishing ample facilities for the conveyance of malt and corn to the metropolis, and for bringing back coal and manure; and a branch railway has been formed to the town from the Northern and Eastern line. The market is on Tuesday; and fairs take place on the last Tuesday in April, and the Tuesday before September 21st, for cattle. A market-house, erected by subscription, supported on sixteen arches, and containing an elegant assembly-room, was completed in 1827, on a site given by the lord of the manor. The town is under the superintendence of four constables and three headboroughs; the county magistrates hold a petty-session every alternate Tuesday, and a court baron occurs annually.

The parish comprises about 4493 acres, exclusive of waste land. The LIVING is a vicarage, with that of Thundridge annexed, valued in the king's books at £20. 10.; net income, £333; patrons and impropriators, the Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge. The church, which has been repewed, is situated in the centre of the town, and is an ancient cruciform edifice, with two sepulchral chapels and a west tower surmounted by a low spire; there is an antique font in the later English style. In the churchyard is a tombstone bearing an inscription to the memory of William Mead, M.D., "who departed this life on the 28th day of October, 1652, aged 148 years, 9 months, 3 weeks, and 4 days." A church has been erected at English-Hall, containing 500 sittings, 380 of which are free, the Incorporated Society having granted £400 in aid of the expense; and a chapel of ease has just been completed, near the hamlet of Wareside, in the Norman style, by subscription. There are places of worship for Independents, Wesleyans, the Society of Friends, and Roman Catholics; also an old school-house belonging to the governors of Christ's Hospital, with a range of buildings for the accommodation of the nurses and children. Here are seventeen almshouses for widows and others, some of which have small endowments; and bequests to the amount of about £300 per annum have been left for the poor. The union of Ware comprises fifteen parishes or places, and contains a population of 15,528. Near the town are two springs of excellent water, called the Chadwell Spring, or New River Head, and the Amwell Spring, which, under the superintendence of the New River Company, supply the metropolis. In the grounds of Amwell House is a beautiful grotto. The great bed of Ware, sufficiently capacious to accommodate six couple, is of uncertain and conjectural origin; at the head is carved the date 1453. Four stone coffins were found in 1802, in Bury field, at the south-west corner of the town, supposed to have been the burial-place of the priory.

WAREHAM, a borough and market-town, having exclusive jurisdiction, and the head of the union of WAREHAM and PURBECK, locally in the hundred of WINFRITH, Wareham division of DORSET, 17 miles (E. by S.) from Dorchester, and 119 (S. W. by W.) from London; containing, with the liberty of Stoborough, 2746 inhabitants. This town, which was once of great note, and existed in the time of the Britons, was by them called Durngueis, and by the Saxons Væpham, Vepham, Veapham, and Thornsata, and in ancient records is designated Werham, and Varama, a compound of Var-Ham, "a habitation on a fishing shore." It has been supposed to occupy the site of the Morionium, or Moriconium, of Ravennas; and that it was known to the Romans is demonstrated by the existence of a Roman way proceeding to Dorchester, and by the discovery of coins in the vicinity. In the Saxon times it was of some importance, and the burial-place of Brithric, the West Saxon king, about the year 800. The Danes soon afterwards massacred the inhabitants, and reduced the town to ruins; but it had so recovered in the time of Athelstan, that he established two mints in it. In 978, the body of Edward the Martyr, after his assassination at Corfe Castle, was temporarily interred here, and was removed by St. Dunstan, with much ceremony, to Shaftesbury. After the lapse of twenty years more, the town was again ravaged by the Danes, who making the Isle of Wight their general place of rendezvous, proceeded thence to the mouth of the river Frome, and kept Wareham in a state of continual alarm. In 1138, the castle and town were seized for the Empress Maud, by Robert de Lincoln, but retaken and burnt by Stephen; and on the intended expedition of John against France, in 1205, that monarch landed here, and three years afterwards garrisoned the town, which, in 1213, became the scene of the cruel execution of Peter of Pomfret, a religious enthusiast, and his son, because the former had foretold the deposition of that monarch. During the parliamentary war, Wareham was alternately possessed by the king and the parliament, but was finally given up to the former, on the surrender of Corfe Castle. In 1762, two-thirds of it were destroyed by fire; but by a liberal subscription and an act procured for its restoration, it was, within two years, completely rebuilt.

The town, which has been greatly improved, and is lighted with gas, is pleasantly situated between the mouths of the Frome and the Piddle, on an eminence which commands a prospect of Poole harbour, and in form resembles a parallelogram, occupying an area of about 100 acres, inclosed, except on the south, by a high wall, or rampart of earth; the intervening space between the wall and the town is laid out in large garden-grounds, divided into regular squares by lanes, which still exhibit traces of some ancient buildings. The four principal streets, as well as the minor streets and lanes, diverge at right angles, and the former are open and spacious, corresponding with the cardinal points of the compass. The south and north entrances are by bridges over the Frome and the Piddle, the former a handsome stone structure, erected in 1775, in lieu of an old edifice which had stood from the time of William Rufus. Wareham was once a noted port, and in the reign of Edward III., furnished three ships and 59 men for the siege of Calais; but the retreat of the sea from its harbour has long destroyed its importance, and withdrawn its commercial traffic, although, at very high tides, the water flows up nearly five miles to Holme bridge: the quay is on the south side of the town. The river Frome was anciently a celebrated salmon-fishery, of which the profits formed part of the dowry granted by Henry VII. to his queen; but the fishery has long since declined, and few fish are now caught. The manufacture of shirt-buttons and straw-plat, and the knitting of stockings, employ a great number of females; pipeclay is obtained in large quantities from pits in the neighbourhood, and considerably more than 10,000 tons are annually shipped at Poole. The market is on Saturday; fairs are held on April 17th and September 11th, for cattle, cheese, and hogs; and of late years six cattle-markets have been held during the spring, and are well attended: the toll of the market and fairs belongs to the mayor. This is a borough by prescription, and the inhabitants have had their privileges confirmed by several charters, whereof the last was granted by Queen Anne, in 1703, under which the municipal body consists of a mayor, and six capital and twelve assistant burgesses, with a recorder, town-clerk, and inferior officers. The town returned two members to parliament from the time of Edward I. to the 2nd of William IV., when it was deprived of one, and the right of voting was extended to the £10 householders of an enlarged district, comprehending 13,950 acres; the mayor is returning officer. The mayor, who is a justice of the peace, and coroner for the town and the isles of Purbeck and Brownsea, and the capital burgesses, hold quarter-sessions of the peace, having exclusive jurisdiction; a court of record occurs on the first Monday in every month, for the recovery of debts under £40, and a court baron is held annually by the lord of the manor.

Wareham includes the parish of the Holy Trinity, Within and Without, containing, with Stoborough liberty, 769 inhabitants; the parish of St. Martin, Within and Without, 531; and Lady St. Mary, Within and Without, 1446. The first comprises 1421*a.* 2*r.* 38*p.*; the second, 3154*a.* 3*r.* 33*p.*, of which 1290 acres are common or waste; and the third, 372*a.* 2*r.* 32*p.* The living of Holy Trinity parish is a rectory, to which those of St. Martin's and St. Mary's were united in 1678, valued in the king's books at £7. 5. 5., and in the patronage of J. Hales Calcraft, Esq.: the church has been appropriated for a school on the national plan. The living of St. Martin's is valued in the king's books at £8. 2. 6.: only the burial service is read in this church. The living of St. Mary's is a rectory not in charge: the church, a spacious and ancient structure containing early and decorated portions, is believed to have been attached to a priory founded here before 876, when the monastery was destroyed by the Danes, and to have been rebuilt about the period of the Conquest. Over a small north door is a rude piece of sculpture, representing the Crucifixion, surmounted by a Norman arch. In a south chapel, of which the ceiling is richly groined, are the recumbent effigies of two warriors in complete mail: in this chapel the remains of Mr. Hutchins, rector of the place, and author of the History and Antiquities of the County of Dorset, are deposited; and in the chancel are several mural monuments to members of the Calcraft family. Two other parochial churches, St. Peter's and St. Michael's, formerly existed. There are places of worship for Independents, Wesleyans, and Unitarians; also a free school, in the parish of Lady St. Mary, founded by George Pitt, Esq., with a salary of £20 for a master, which was augmented in 1703, with £10 a year, now paid to a mistress. The poor law union of Wareham and Purbeck comprises twenty-seven parishes or places, and contains a population of 16,542. The antiquities comprise the walls, supposed to have been built by the Britons. Bloody-bank was the place of execution, in 1684, of Mr. Baxter, Holman, and others, for their attachment to the Duke of Monmouth. Of the castle, situated in the south-west angle of the town, and thought to have been originally built by the Romans, and renewed by the Conqueror, only the mound, or keep, called Castle Hill, remains; and the relics of the priory have been converted into a dwelling-house. At Stoborough, on opening a barrow, in 1767, a large hollow trunk of an oak was discovered, in which were human bones wrapped up in a large covering composed of several deer skins, and a small vessel of oak, in the shape of an urn, conjectured by Mr. Hutchins to have been the drinking cup of the deceased, who, in the opinion of Mr. Gough, was some Saxon or Danish chieftain. Dr. John Chapman, tutor to the great Lord Camden; and Horace Walpole, Earl of Orford, were natives of the town.

WAREHORNE (St. MATTHEW), a parish, in the union of EAST ASHFORD, partly in the hundred of HAM, lathe of SHEPWAY, E. division, and partly in the hundred of BLACKBOURNE, lathe of SCRAX, W. division, of KENT, 7½ miles (S. by W.) from Ashford; containing 428 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 3000 acres, of which that part at the foot of the hill, southward, is in the level of Romney Marsh, and in the borough of Great Kenardington. The village is situated on an eminence near the western extremity of the hills, and this eminence, with the whole of the land above the marsh, is within the weald, the soil whereof is in general a very deep clay. The river Rother has its source here, and the Royal Military canal crosses the southern portion of the parish. Fairs are held on May 14th, for toys, and October 2nd and 3rd, for cattle; the former on Ham-Street Green, and the latter on Warehorne Green. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £19, and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £298. A glebe-house has been lately built, a handsome residence in the Elizabethan style, and beautifully situated on elevated ground near the village, which latter stretches itself round the green; the glebe contains 40 acres. The church is a structure of great antiquity, in the early Norman style, to which a square brick tower was added about eighty years since, the old one having fallen down.

WARENFORD, or WARRINGTON, a township, in the chapelry of LUCKER, parish of BAMBROUGH, union of BELFORD, N. division of BAMBROUGH ward and of NORTHUMBERLAND, 4 miles (S. E. by S.) from Belford, on the road to Alnwick; containing 41 inhabitants. The village was formerly considerable, and, though now very small, has been much improved: the Waren burn passes in the vicinity, crossing the great north road. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians; also a school built in 1839.

WARESLEY (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of ST. NEOT'S, hundred of TOSELAND, county of HUNTINGDON, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Potton; containing 226 inhabitants. It comprises 1976 acres by admeasurement, and is on the road from St. Ives to Biggleswade. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 16. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the impropriators, the Master and Fellows of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge: the great tithes have been commuted for £335, and the vicarial for £188; the glebe contains 98 acres. The old church fell down in 1724, in consequence of which the present edifice was erected in 1728; it is a plain stone edifice, and has a slated roof with a cupola.

WARFIELD (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of EAST HAMPSTEAD, hundred of WARGRAVE, county of BERKS, 6 miles (E. N. E.) from Wokingham; containing 1317 inhabitants. This parish, which once formed part of Windsor Forest, comprises 3360*a.* 2*r.* 21*p.*; about 1447 acres are arable, 1554 meadow, 165 coppice and plantations, and 71 heath, and the neighbourhood is thickly studded with gentlemen's seats. At New Bracknell, fairs are held on April 25th, August 22nd, and October 1st. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8.; patron, Maxwell Windle, Esq.; impropriators, the Landowners: the great tithes have been commuted for £668. 12., and the vicarial for £200, and the glebe comprises 16 acres. The church contains some handsome monuments; and in a chapel, the burial-place of the Stavertons, attached to the north side of the chancel, is an ancient brass, with an effigy of one of that family. The sum of £200, bequeathed by the Hon. Gen. William Hervey, has been expended in the erection of premises for a national school, on land given by the late Lord Braybrooke. There are some remains of an intrenchment called Cæsar's Camp, where many Roman coins have been found.

WARFORD, GREAT, a township, in the parish of ALDERLEY, union and hundred of MACCLESFIELD, N.

division of the county of CHESTER, 5 miles (E. by S.) from Nether Knutsford; containing 404 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

WARFORD, LITTLE, with MARTALL, a township, in the parish of ROSTHERN, union of ALTRINCHAM, hundred of BUCKLOW, N. division of the county of CHESTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Nether Knutsford; containing 254 inhabitants.

WARGRAVE (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of WOKINGHAM, hundred of WARGRAVE, county of BERKS, 3 miles (S. S. E.) from Henley; containing 1739 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the north by the river Thames, and comprises 4308 acres, of which 2691 are arable, 844 pasture, 430 woodland, 25 lavender-grounds, 38 fisheries, and the remainder roads, sites of houses, &c. A market granted in 1218 to Peter de Rupibus, Bishop of Winchester, which was held here on Monday, has long been disused. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 13. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of Lord Braybrooke, as lord of the manor and impropriator, to whose ancestor, Sir Henry Nevill, the Billingbear estates, and the hundred of Wargrave, once attached to the see of Winchester, were granted by Edward VI. The great tithes have been commuted for £820, and the vicarial for £300; there is a parsonage-house, and the impropriate glebe contains 43 acres. The church has a tower in the later English style. The first stone of a church dedicated to St. Peter, was laid at Knowl-Hill, on the 20th of July, 1839, by Lady East; a district has been assigned, consisting of outlying parts of Wargrave and Hurley, and the building is situated in the parish of Hurley. Richard Aldworth, in 1692, left an annuity of £5, and Robert Pigot, Esq., in 1796, £6700 three per cent. stock, which bequests have been applied to the support of a national school.

WARHAM (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of WALSINGHAM, hundred of NORTH GREENHOE, W. division of NORFOLK, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Wells; containing 337 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1174*a.* 29*p.*, of which 734 acres are arable, 430 pasture and meadow, and 10 salt-marsh: the German Ocean forms the northern boundary. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £16, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £245, and the glebe contains 7 acres. The church is a cruciform structure, partly in the early and partly in the later English style. In the valley of the Stifkey stream are remains of an intrenchment supposed to have been thrown up by the Danes; and in the grounds of Chalk Farm is the ancient font of the church, where it has remained for centuries.

WARHAM (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of WALSINGHAM, hundred of NORTH GREENHOE, W. division of NORFOLK, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Wells; containing 75 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2056 acres, of which about 1080 are arable, 860 pasture and meadow (the greater part salt-marsh), 80 wood, and 36 roads and water. It was consolidated in 1795, for all except ecclesiastical matters, with Warham All Saints. The living consists of the united rectories of St. Mary and St. Mary Magdalene, with that of Waterden annexed, valued jointly at £11. 6. 8., and in the gift of the Earl of Leicester. The tithes of the parish have been commuted for £373. 10.; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 15 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church is chiefly in the later English style, and consists of a nave and chancel, and a chapel, with a square embattled tower: the chancel contains a neat monument to the late rector, the Rev. A. W. Langton, at whose expense several of the windows were ornamented with stained glass; and the floor of the chapel is covered with marble slabs to members of the Turner family, who resided at the Hall, an ancient mansion in the Elizabethan style, taken down in 1815. There are small remains of the church dedicated to St. Mary the Virgin.

WARK, a parish, in the union of BELLINGHAM, N. W. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND; containing, with the townships of Warksburn, and Shitlington High and Low Quarter, 940 inhabitants, of whom 490 are in Wark township, 12 miles (N. W. by N.) from Hexham. The manor was a possession of the crown in the reign of Elizabeth, and was granted to the Earl of Suffolk in 1603, and afterwards sold to the Earl of Derwentwater, by whose son it was forfeited for high treason, when it was given, together with his other large estates, to Greenwich Hospital. The parish is one of the six into which the parish of Simonburn was divided in 1814, under the authority of an act of parliament obtained in 1811; it is bounded on the east by the North Tyne, across which is a ferry, and comprises 20,944*a. 1r. 2p.*, whereof about 20,579 acres are meadow and pasture, 95 woodland, and 270 roads and waste. The village is ancient, and was considerably improved a few years since, by the erection of a handsome row of houses, with stone taken from some extensive ruins. The living is a rectory not in charge, in the patronage of the Governors of Greenwich Hospital, who erected a handsome church, which was opened on Aug. 10th, 1818, and also built a parsonage-house, the whole at the cost of £7410, exclusively of the ground: the tithes have been commuted for £330, and there is a small portion of glebe land. The Presbyterians and Wesleyans have places of worship. A school is endowed with £45 per annum, and a house for the master; and there is a fund for apprenticing children, and the relief of the poor. About half a mile to the north of the village are, the site of an old church, a tumulus, and a cairn, in which urns and other relics have been found. Within the parish, also, are vestiges of several fortifications, said to have been thrown up by Edward III.; and on the bank of the river is Moat Hill, formerly occupied by a tower, and more recently used as an observatory to watch the movements of an enemy. There are two mineral springs in the neighbourhood, slightly impregnated with sulphur.

WARK, a township, in the parish of CARRHAM, union of GLENDALE, W. division of GLENDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 4½ miles (W. S. W.) from Coldstream. It is bounded on the north by the river Tweed, and comprises about 3000 acres of land, mostly arable; the surface, on the banks of the Tweed, is rather level, and the soil is a good deep loam. The whole of the township is the property of the Earl of Tankerville, with the exception of 100 acres, the occupiers of which claim exemption from rent. The village is situated on the road from Kelso to Cornhill; and a little to the west are the ruins of Wark Castle, upon a circular mount apparently formed by art. This fortress was a formidable bulwark in the 12th century, when, according to Leland, it was built by order of Henry II.; and it formed a prominent object in the annals of the border wars.

WARKLEIGH (St. JOHN), a parish, in the union and hundred of SOUTH MOLTON, South Molton and N. divisions of DEVON, 5½ miles (W. S. W.) from South Molton; containing 291 inhabitants. It is bounded on the west by the river Taw, and on the east by the Mole, and comprises 2000 acres by computation. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 4. 7., and in the gift of James Gould, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £230, and the glebe contains about 22 acres. The church is an ancient cruciform structure in the early English style, of which the interior contains a piscina and a beautifully carved oak screen.

WARKSBURN, a township, in the parish of WARK, union of BELLINGHAM, N. W. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 5¼ miles (S.) from Bellingham; containing 272 inhabitants. This place extends along both sides of a rivulet of its own name, and consists of numerous farms, several of which are held by the tenure of customary freehold, paying a fine when the lord dies, and giving the best cow on the death of the tenant. The area of the township is 10,387 acres. At a short distance from a farm-house called Roses Bower, is a medicinal spring known as the Holy Well, said to be of great efficacy in the cure of ague, the gravel, and similar complaints.

WARKTON (St. EDMUND), a parish, in the union of KETTERING, hundred of HUXLOE, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 2 miles (E. N. E.) from Kettering; containing 313 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1867 acres, of which 216 are woodland, and the rest about equally divided between arable and pasture; the soil varies, but consists chiefly of clay, with an occasional admixture of loam, resting on a substratum of limestone; barley and turnips are grown, but wheat and beans constitute the main produce. The surface, which is undulated, is beautifully ornamented with rows of elm and lime trees, forming noble avenues of imposing appearance, planted by John, Duke of Montagu. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £18. 16. 3.; net income, £293; patron, the Duke of Buccleuch: the tithes were commuted for land in 1807, and there is a glebe-house. The church was originally of early English character, but the windows of the nave have been altered to the style of the chancel, which is Grecian, and was built for the reception of monuments to the Montagu family, two of which are by Roubilliac.

WARKWORTH (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of BANBURY, hundred of KING'S-SUTTON, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 2 miles (E.) from Banbury; containing 42 inhabitants, and comprising about 2900 acres. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Marston St. Lawrence: the tithes for the township were commuted for land in 1764. The church was repaired in 1841.

WARKWORTH (St. LAWRENCE), an ancient borough and parish, in the union of ALNWICK, partly in the E. division of COQUETDALE, and partly in the E. division of MORPETH ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 7 miles (S. E.) from Alnwick; containing 3512 inhabitants, of whom 785 are in the township of Warkworth. This place is of great antiquity, and during the heptarchy was of considerable importance: a church was founded here in 736, by Ceolwulph, King of Northumbria, who is supposed to have granted the inhabitants a charter of incorporation, under the provisions of which the town still retains the privileges of a borough by prescription. In 1174, William the Lion, King of Scotland, took up his head-quarters here, and sent Earl Duncan, who commanded his army, to lay waste the adjacent country; and on the same day that William was defeated and taken prisoner at Alnwick, the earl, entering the town with his soldiers, set fire to it, and massacred the inhabitants without distinction of age or sex. The baronial CASTLE here, is thought to have been erected in the 11th century; and, on its forfeiture by the first earl of Northumberland, was granted to Roger de Umfraville, by Henry IV., who, in his progress northward, reduced it after a siege of eight days; but it was restored to the Percys by Henry V. On subsequent attainders of the family, the castle was frequently forfeited to the crown, and became the property of various nobles till the reign of Mary, when, in 1557, it was, with all the honours and estates appertaining to it, restored to Sir Thomas Percy, afterwards Earl of Northumberland, whose descendants are the present proprietors. The castle, which is now an interesting ruin, is situated on a lofty eminence on the south side of the river Coquet, commanding a splendid prospect over sea and land. It appears never to have been a favourite residence of the Percys, and in 1608 the lead was stripped off the roofs of the towers in the inner court, then in a dilapidated state, and in 1810, the timber was removed and sold; the lead was subsequently taken from the keep, and of this once magnificent structure, little more than the walls are now remaining, which, however, from the excellence of the masonry, are likely to endure for centuries to come.

The TOWN is at a small distance from the sea, towards the west, and is almost encircled by a bend of the Coquet, over which is a bridge of two ribbed arches, built, it is supposed, about the year 1380, for which purpose 20 marks had been previously bequeathed by John Cooke, of Newcastle. At the south end of the bridge is a gateway tower of more ancient date, through which the road passes. The town consists principally of three streets diverging from the market-cross, of which one forms an ascent to the castle, another leads to the bridge, and the third to the church; the houses are well built, and of modern appearance. A lucrative fishery was formerly carried on here, in which five boats were employed, and the number of fish taken averaged annually from 15,000 to 17,000; but, either from a change in the channel of the river, or the erection of a wear, and of a tin-plate manufactory, soon afterwards, about 6 miles higher up, the number of fish taken has been diminished to about 5000, chiefly salmon-trout of small size, and two boats only are employed. An act of parliament has been lately obtained for improving the navigation of the river, under commissioners, by Mr. Browne, of Amble, one of the owners of a most extensive colliery, upon which, and in the erection of two breakwaters at the mouth of the river, upwards of £200,000 have been expended by that gentleman and his partners. From 50,000 to 60,000 tons of coal are yearly shipped from Warkworth; and as there is a virgin coal-field of 200 square miles in extent in this part, it is estimated that, when the works now in progress are completed, the port will become of considerable note, more especially because there is no other affording any remarkable facilities on this portion of the coast. The market, granted by King John, has long been discontinued; but there is a customary market for butchers' meat and provisions in the market-place every Saturday, and fairs are annually held on the second Thursday in May, the third Thursday in August, and the last Thursday in November, when a cattle-market is also held. The chief remains of the privileges of the ancient borough consist in 77 burgage tenures, of which the occupants have a right of pasture on the common for their cattle; and the holding of a court leet by the steward of the Duke of Northumberland, annually, within 21 days after Michaelmas, at which a borough reeve, two moor grieves, constables, ale-tasters, bread-weighers, and other officers are appointed.

The parish comprises the townships of Amble, Acklington, Acklington-Park, Birling, Brotherwick, Bullock's-Hall, High and Low Buston, East and West Chevington, Gloster-Hill, Hadstone, Hauxley, Morwick, Sturton-Grange, Togston, Walkmill, and Warkworth; it extends for about eight miles and a half from north to south, and about five from east to west, and comprises by computation 16,110 acres, whereof 892 are in Warkworth township, of which latter number 170 are common or waste land. The substratum of the parish abounds with coal, iron-stone, limestone, freestone, and whinstone, all of excellent quality. The LIVING is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £18. 5. 7½.; net income, £528; patron and appropriator, the Bishop of Carlisle. The church, founded in 736, and rebuilt at a later period, is situated at the northern extremity of the town, near the river; it retains many of the original details of Saxon architecture, and has a very handsome spire of more recent date, 108 feet in height, forming a conspicuous and interesting feature in the landscape. In the south-west angle of the church is a monument on which is the recumbent figure of a Knight Templar in armour, with a dog at the feet, and, in a panel in front, the inscription, "The effigies of Sir Hugh de Morwicke who gave the common to the towne of Warkwarthe;" and in the churchyard, which is shaded with stately lime-trees, are numerous ancient monuments. There are places of worship for Scottish Seceders and Wesleyans; and national schools for boys and girls, and an infants' school, are supported by subscription. Nearly adjoining the churchyard, may be traced some foundations of a small Benedictine priory erected and endowed by Nicholas Farnham, Bishop of Durham, who died in 1257. About a mile to the west of the castle, is an ancient hermitage, with a small chapel hewn out of the solid rock, supposed to have been the secluded retreat of one of the Bertram family; the chapel is 18 feet long, and about 8 feet in width, and in close imitation of the early English style of architecture. The roof is groined, and rests on semi-hexagonal columns projecting from the walls; at the east end is the altar, to which is an ascent of two steps, and under a window in a recess at the south end, is formed a table monument with the recumbent figure of a female, at the feet of which is that of a hermit, in a pensive attitude, having the head reclining on the right hand, and the left hand placed across the breast. There are various other apartments in this retreat, all cut out of the solid rock, among which is a kitchen, with a chamber over it; and above the hermitage is a garden, to which is an ascent by a winding staircase in the rock. Dr. Percy, Bishop of Dromore, in 1771, and author of the poem called the Hermit of Warkworth, says that the Percy family maintained a chantry priest to reside in the hermitage and celebrate mass in the chapel, of whom, according to records still preserved, the last, whose appointment is dated Dec. 3rd, 1532, received an annual stipend of 20 marks, with pasture for cattle, a garden, and other perquisites. Warkworth gives the inferior title of Baron to the Duke of Northumberland.

COQUET ISLAND, situated about one mile and a half from the mouth of the river, towards the south-east, is of elliptical form, three-quarters of a mile in circumference, and comprises about 13 acres of good pasture land. It was formerly the site of a Benedictine cell subject to the priory of Tynemouth, and a favourite resort of pilgrims during the time of St. Cuthbert; and in the reign of Charles I., it was taken by the Scots, with 200 prisoners and seven pieces of cannon. Part of the ruins of the ancient convent was converted, some years since, into a cottage for the residence of a family who had the care of a warren of Angola rabbits belonging to the Duke of Northumberland, who is proprietor of the island. Between it and the shore is a safe roadstead for shipping, though difficult of entrance both on the north and the south from sunken rocks; and a lighthouse was erected here in 1841, with some houses for the light-keepers built on the site of the Benedictine cell.

WARLABY, a township, in the parish of AIN-DERBY-STEEPLE, union of NORTH-ALLERTON, wapentake of GILLING-EAST, N. riding of YORK, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles
(S. S. W.) from North-Allerton; containing 82 inhabitants. It is situated in the vale of the Wisk, and comprises by computation 754 acres.

WARLEGGON (St. Bartholomew), a parish, in the union of BODMIN, hundred of WEST, E. division of CORNWALL, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Bodmin; containing 277 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 1900 acres, of which 500 are common or waste; the surface is hilly, and the soil peaty, and in many parts encumbered with slate. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 17. 6., and in the gift of G. W. F. Gregory, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £170; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 9 acres.

WARLEY, a township, in the parish and union of HALIFAX, wapentake of MORLEY, W. riding of YORK,
2 miles (W.) from Halifax; containing 6857 inhabitants.
This township, which is in the manor of Wakefield, is divided into Upper and Lower, the former in the cha-pelry of Luddenden, and the latter in that of Sowerby-Bridge, and comprises by computation 3980 acres, chiefly meadow and pasture. Warley House, an extensive mansion with fine views, is the seat of Thomas Milne, Esq. The village is situated on an eminence, and the surrounding scenery is beautifully picturesque; the inhabitants are principally employed in woollen and worsted mills, iron-foundries, and chemical-works.
There are places of worship for Independents; and a school partly supported by subscription. In the neighbourhood is one of the remarkable rocking-stones, supposed to be of Druidical origin.

WARLEY, GREAT (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of ROMFORD, hundred of CHAFFORD, S. division of ESSEX, 4 miles (S.) from Brentwood; containing 596 inhabitants. This parish, which is separated from Little Warley by a rivulet that flows into the Thames, comprises 2793a. 28p., whereof about 1339 acres are arable, 1029 pasture, 209 wood, and 159 common; the surface is hilly, and the soil in the higher grounds gravelly, and in the lower loamy. About 5 acres were appropriated for recreation, under an act in 1838, for inclosing waste land. The village, about two miles in length, consists of well-built houses widely detached from each other; and the Eastern-Counties' railway passes through the north-eastern extremity of the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14, and in the gift of St. John's College, Cambridge: the master of Ilford Hospital is impropiator of two-thirds of the great tithes of 903 acres, which have been commuted for a rent-charge of £90, and the rectorial tithes have been commuted for £520, with a glebe of 10 acres. The church is an ancient edifice of brick, with a belfry turret of wood surmounted by a small spire. Dr.

Fulke, a puritan divine, and author of annotations on the Rhemish Testament, was rector of the parish; and Mr.
Day, author of Sandford and Merton, was born here.

WARLEY, LITTLE (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of BILLERICAY, hundred of CHAFFORD, S. division of ESSEX, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Brentwood; containing 216 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1651 acres, of which 140 are common or waste; it is bounded on the west by a stream which flows into the Thames, and the Eastern-Counties' railway passes within a mile.
A barrack for horse artillery, capable of receiving two troops, was erected in 1804. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 3. 9., and in the gift of the Rev. John Pearson: the tithes have been commuted for £280; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 32 acres. The church is a small ancient edifice, with a tower, which has been rebuilt of brick.
A small farm, with a house, producing £25 per annum, was bequeathed to the poor by Hugh Chappington, Esq., about a century since.

WARLEY-SALOP, a township, in the parish of HALES-OWEN, union of BROMSGROVE, Hales-Owen division of the hundred of BRIMSTREE, county of SALOP; containing 356 inhabitants.

WARLEY-WIGORN, a hamlet, in the parish of HALES-OWEN, union of WEST BROMWICH, Lower division of the hundred of HALFSHIRE, Dudley and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 3 miles (N. E. by E.) from Hales-Owen; containing 964 inhabitants, and comprising 1450 acres of land.

WARLINGHAM CUM CHELSHAM (All Saints), a parish, in the union of GODSTONE, Second division of the hundred of TANDRIDGE, E. division of SURREY, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Croydon; containing 512 inhabitants. The parish comprises 5091 acres, of which 479 are common or waste. The living is a vicarage endowed with the rectorial tithes, united with Chelsham, and valued in the king's books at £11. 12. 11.; net income, £471; patron, A. D. Wigsell, Esq. The church is principally in the early English style. H. Atwood, Esq., in 1675, bequeathed two annuities of £10 each to the curate, and erected an almshouse, which he endowed with £20 per annum, for four aged persons.

WARFIELD, or KIRKTHORPE (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of WAKEFIELD, Lower division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, W. riding of YORK; containing, with Sharleston township, 1050 inhabitants, of whom 829 are in the township of Warmfield with Heath, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Wakefield. The parish comprises 2592a. 3r. 17p., of which 1318 acres are arable, 967 pasture and meadow, 33 woodland, and 203 common or waste: there are mines belonging to the Earl of Westmorland, producing inferior coal, and at Heath is a valuable stone quarry. The water in the neighbourhood is celebrated for its fine quality. The Leeds and Manchester railway skirts the parish, and the North-Midland railway runs through it: the village is situated a short distance east of the river Calder. The living is a vicarage, endowed with a moiety of the rectorial tithes, and valued in the king's books at £5. 4. 2.; net income, £148; patrons, the Master and Fellows of Clare Hall, Cambridge, the impropriators of the other half of the rectorial tithes. The church is a neat substantial fabric, with a square tower, and contains handsome monuments to the Smyth family, of Heath Hall. Lady Mary Bowles, in 1660, conveyed to trustees a building to be used as a school-house for 10 boys, and a rent-charge of £20; and John Smyth, Esq., in 1729, left three houses and an annuity of £3, for educating six children. Othoneus Sagar, in 1558, founded, and endowed with a rent-charge of £12, an almshouse for four women, situated at Kirkthorpe; and there is another house at the same place, containing a common hall with seven apartments, and an adjoining cottage for a matron, founded and endowed with about £30 per annum, by John Freeston, in 1592, for aged unmarried men.

WARMINGHAM (St. LEONARD), a parish, partly in the union of NANTWICH, but chiefly in that of CONGLETON, hundred of NORTHWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER; containing, with the townships of Elton, Moston, and Tetton, 1396 inhabitants, of which number 420 are in Warmingham township, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Sandbach. The parish comprises 4732a. 1r. 18p., and the Trent and Mersey canal, and the Grand Junction railway, pass through it. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 4. 7., and in the gift of Lord Crewe: the tithes have been commuted for £556. 12.; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 116 acres. A free school, founded by Thomas Minshull, has endowments in land of the annual value of £23.

WARMINGHURST, a parish, in the union of THAKEHAM, hundred of EAST EASWRITH, rape of BRAMBER, W. division of SUSSEX, 12 miles (N. W. by N.) from Shoreham; containing 117 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 1120 acres, of which 700 are arable, 300 pasture, and 120 woodland. The incumbent of the living receives a voluntary stipend from the Duke of Norfolk: the church is in the later English style, and contains neat monuments to the families of Shelley and Butler. W. Penn, the founder of Pennsylvania, resided for several years in the parish.

WARMINGTON (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of OUNDLE, chiefly in the hundred of POLEBROOK, but partly in that of WILLYBROOK, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Oundle; containing 640 inhabitants. The parish extends from the right bank of the river Nene to the borders of the county of Huntingdon, and consists of 3732 acres; it is intersected by the road from Oundle to Stamford and Peterborough. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8.; net income, £107; patron, the Earl of Westmorland; impropriator, T. Gardner, Esq. The church is a beautiful structure, principally in the early English style, with an enriched tower and spire. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. The water of Chadwell Spring, in the neighbourhood, possesses some mineral properties.

WARMINGTON (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of BANBURY, Burton-Dasset division of the hundred of KINGTON, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 5 miles (N. W. by N.) from Banbury; containing, with the hamlet of Arlescote, 496 inhabitants. It is intersected by the road from Warwick to Banbury, and comprises 1779 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 3. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £450; patrons, the Trustees of Mr. Hulme's exhibitions to Brasenose College, Oxford. The tithes were exchanged for land and a money payment in 1776, except those of Arlescote, which have been commuted for a rent-charge of £187. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A Benedictine priory, subordinate to the abbey of St. Peter and St. Paul de Pratellis, or Preaux, in Normandy, was founded here in the time of Henry I., and, after the suppression of alien houses, was granted by Henry VI. to the Carthusian priory at Witham, in Somersetshire. Nadbury camp, in the vicinity, where some fix the ancient Tripontium, is of a square form, rounded at the angles, and comprises about twelve acres. Captain Alexander Gordon, who was killed in the battle of Edge-Hill, was buried in the churchyard.

WARMINSTER (St. DENIS), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of WARMINSTER, Warminster and S. divisions of WILTS, 21 miles (W. N. W.) from Salisbury, and 97 (W. S. W.) from London; containing 6211 inhabitants. According to Camden, this place was the Verlucio of the Romans, and the first syllable of its name is considered by him to be a corruption of that of its ancient appellation; but others deduce the name from the little stream Were that runs through the town, and from a minster, or monastery, stated to have been once situated in its vicinity; which conjecture receives confirmation from the supposed site being still called The Nunnery, and a walk upon the neighbourhood hill, Nuns' Path. At the Conquest it was denominated Guerminstre, and having been held in demesne by Edward the Confessor, paid neither Dancgeld nor Hidage: at a later period it became celebrated for its corn-market, which, in the time of Henry VIII., appears to have been of considerable note. The town is situated on the river Willey, near the south-western extremity of Salisbury Plain, and consists principally of one street, nearly a mile long, well paved, and of clean appearance; it is one of the most healthy towns in England, and has been remarkable for the longevity of its inhabitants. The malt trade was formerly carried on to a greater extent here than at any other town in the west of England, and it is still a considerable branch of trade; the manufacture of broad-cloths and kerseymeres was also extensive until of late years, but these branches are at present entirely discontinued: the silk business, however, has been recently introduced, and affords employment to many females and children. The market, which is on Saturday, is very considerable for the sale of corn, of which the whole is previously warehoused in the town, and a sack from every load pitched in the market-place. Fairs are held on April 22nd, August 10th, and October 26th, the last pre-eminently called "The Great Fair," for sheep, cattle, and cheese. A high constable, deputy constables, and tythingmen, are chosen annually at the manorial court of the Marquess of Bath. The county-sessions of the peace for the summer quarter take place here in July; petty-sessions occur monthly; and a court of requests, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5, is held every fortnight, on Tuesday, at Warminster and Westbury alternately. The town-hall was pulled down a few years since, and the Marquess of Bath has erected, at his own expense, an elegant building in the centre of the market-place, comprising every accommodation for holding the sessions, and a handsome suite of apartments for assemblies, public meetings, &c.

The LIVING is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £18. 0. 2½.; net income, £324; patron, the Bishop of Salisbury; appropriators, the Dean and Chapter. The tithes were commuted in 1780, for land and annual money payments. The parochial church, situated on the Bath road, near the north-western extremity of the town, is a spacious and handsome structure of various styles, with a low tower rising from the centre, originally built about the time of Edward III.; but the body and aisles were rebuilt on the old foundation, in 1724. A proprietary chapel, founded in the reign of Edward I., and dedicated to St. Lawrence, stands near the market-place; it was endowed by two maiden sisters named Hewett, and after the surrender was granted by Edward VI. to Richard Robertes in free socage, and is vested in feoffees; the original tower remains, but the body of the chapel was rebuilt in 1725, and has lately been repaired and beautified. Christ Church, to which a district has been assigned, was built in 1831, at an expense of £4708, defrayed by subscription, &c., aided by a grant from the Parliamentary Commissioners; it occupies an elevated site, and forms an interesting object in the view of the town: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £121; patron, the Vicar. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Wesleyans, and Unitarians: also a free grammar school, built and endowed by the first Viscount Weymouth, in 1707. The poor law union of Warminster comprises 21 parishes or places, and contains a population of 17,109. In the vicinity are many British tumuli, and several remains of Roman encampments, particularly Battlesbury, a strong earthwork with double sides, where spear-heads and other weapons have been ploughed up. Near this intrenchment, on the edge of the river Willey, a beautiful tessellated pavement, and the foundations of a Roman villa, with its hypocaust, sudatory, &c., were discovered in 1786; among other portraits was the figure of Diana, with a hare, the former of which was too much injured to be removed, but the latter is carefully preserved at Longleat House. On the west side of the town is Clay or Cly hill, a steep conical eminence surmounted by a tumulus, 900 feet above low-water mark at Bristol. The environs are rich in fossil remains, many of which have been deposited in the British Museum; and in the year 1816, a toad and a newt, both living, were found imbedded in a thick stratum of rock, which had not the smallest crack or orifice. Dr. Samuel Squire, Bishop of St. David's, an able and learned writer, was a native of the town.

WARMLEY, a hamlet, in the parish of SUTTON-COLDFIELD, union of ASTON, Birmingham division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, N. division of the county of WARWICK; containing 600 inhabitants. A church and parsonage-house, on a site given by the corporation of Sutton, have been completed at an expense of £1500, towards which £400 were presented by Miss Riland, who has also assigned £1000 towards the endowment of the living.

WARMSWORTH (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of DONCASTER, S. division of the wapentake of STRAF-FORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, 2¾ miles (S. W.) from Doncaster; containing 358 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1032a. 3r. 33p., of which 652 acres are arable, 325 grass, and 55 woodland and quarries; the soil is fertile, and there are extensive limestone quarries on the banks of the navigable river Don, which separates the parish from that of Sprotbrough. The village is pleasantly situated on the road from Sheffield to Doncaster, and in the vicinity is a flint-mill. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 10. 10., and in the gift of W. B. Wrightson, Esq., who resides at the Hall: the tithes have been commuted for £112. 12., of which £59. 17. are paid to the Archbishop of York, £2. 5. to the vicar of Conisbrough, and £49. 16. to an impropiator; the glebe contains 44¾ acres. The church, erected at the expense of the late Mr. Wrightson, on the site of the old edifice, which was pulled down in 1810, is a neat structure about half a mile from the village, on an eminence overlooking the Don. At the angle of the wall of the garden belonging to the parsonage is a tower containing the church bell. There was formerly a place of worship for the Society of Friends, founded in the time of George Fox, and one of the first establishments belonging to that sect. Premises accommodating 100 children, with a house for the mistress, were erected in 1831, at a cost of £500, by William Aldam, Esq., M.P., by whom the school is supported, and who has a beautiful residence at this place.

WARMWELL, a parish, in the union of DORCHESTER, hundred of WINFRITH, Dorchester division of DORSET, 5½ miles (S. E.) from Dorchester; containing 94 inhabitants. It is situated half a mile north of the road from Wareham to Dorchester and Weymouth, and comprises about 1200 acres, of which 800 are cultivated, 250 heath, and 150 rough land. The living is a rectory, with which that of Poxwell was united in 1749, valued in the king's books at £15, and in the gift of John T. Trenchard, Esq.: the tithes of Warmwell have been commuted for £120, and the glebe comprises 34 acres.

WARNBOROUGH, NORTH, a tything, in the parish and hundred of ODIHAM, union of HARTLEY-WINTNEY, Odiham and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 1 mile (N. W.) from Odiham; containing 704 inhabitants.

WARNBOROUGH, SOUTH (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of HARTLEY-WINTNEY, hundred of BERMONDSPIT, Odiham and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON 2½ miles (S. W. by S.) from Odiham; containing 371 inhabitants. It is on the road from Odiham to Alton, and comprises 2569a. 2p., of which 100 acres are meadow, 200 woodland, and the remainder arable. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 12. 3½, and in the gift of St. John's College, Oxford: the tithes have been commuted for £720; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 38½ acres. The church is very ancient, having a fine Norman arch at the entrance; in the chancel is a curious monument to Sir Thomas White and his family. Tradition says that Queen Elizabeth, then occasionally residing at Odiham, rode over to the manor-house, and after partaking of breakfast with this gentleman, knighted him in his own saloon. The Rev. John Duman, D.D., rector, in 1785, gave £200 in the three per cents., the interest to be applied in support of a school. There is a singular mound in the churchyard, apparently covering the remains of combatants. Peter Mews, afterwards Bishop of Winchester, and Peter Heylin, the cosmographer, were rectors of the parish.

WARDON (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of DROITWICH, Lower division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, Worcester and W. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 2½ miles (E. N. E.) from Worcester; containing 187 inhabitants, and comprising 850*a.* 2*r.* 12*p.* The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 0. 2½; net income, £151; patron, R. Berkeley, Esq. The Birmingham and Worcester canal passes through the parish.

WARNFORD, a parish, in the union of DROXFORD, hundred of MEON-STOKE, Droxford and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 13 miles (S. W. by S.) from Alton; containing, with the hamlet of Riversdown, 381 inhabitants. The manor, in the reign of William I., belonged to Hugh de Port, whose descendant, William, assumed the name of his maternal grandmother, St. John, and whose mansion, near the church, is now a ruin called King John's, by corruption of the family name. The parish comprises 3010 acres, of which 396 are common or waste land: Warnford Park is a spacious mansion. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £21. 9. 4½, and in the gift of W. Abbott, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £615; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 22 acres. The church, in the early English style, with a Norman tower, was founded by Wilfrid, and rebuilt in the reign of the Conqueror; the font is large and of Norman character, and there are numerous ancient details, among which are a confessional and a recessed niche, in which the sacred vessels were deposited. The building also contains a marble monument, in the Italian style, to the family of Neale, with recumbent effigies of the parents, and those of their children in kneeling attitudes.

WARNHAM (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of HORSHAM, hundred of SINGLECROSS, rape of BRAMBER, W. division of SUSSEX, 2 miles (N. N. W.) from Horsham; containing 1007 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the north by the county of Surrey, and comprises 4100*a.* 3*r.* by computation, of which 495 acres are coppice; the surface is diversified with hill and dale, and enriched with wood, and near Warnham Mill is a large sheet of water covering about 100 acres. Warnham Court is a spacious mansion in the Elizabethan style, on an elevated site commanding extensive views. On Old-house farm is a large quarry of stone, much used for paving. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 1. 0½; net income, £191; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury.

The church is an ancient structure, containing in the north chancel the effigies of Sir John Caryll and his lady, with their children. Percy Bysshe Shelley, the poet, was born at Field Place, here, the residence of Sir Timothy Shelley, Bart.

WARNINGCAMP, an ancient chapelry, annexed to the parish of LEOMINSTER, in the hundred of POLING, rape of ARUNDEL, W. division of SUSSEX, 1¾ mile (E.) from Arundel; containing 119 inhabitants. The tithes belong to Eton College, and have been commuted for £191. 10., and there is a glebe of 4 acres: the chapel has long since disappeared.

WARPSGROVE (St. JAMES), a parish, in the union of THAME, hundred of EWELME, county of OXFORD; containing 23 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £2. 11. 10½, and in the patronage of the Crown. There being no church here, the parishioners attend that of Chalgrove.

WARRENTON, a township, in the parish, and N. division of the ward, of BAMBROUGH, union of BELFORD, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 2 miles (S.) from Belford, on the road to Alnwick; containing 163 inhabitants. It comprises about 1380 acres, mostly arable; the remainder is pasture, with 90 acres of plantation; the surface is undulated, the soil light and gravelly, and coal and freestone are wrought. Newlands, here, with 980 acres around the house, belongs to Thomas H. Graham, Esq., and is occupied by Henry Dinning, Esq., of Elford.

WARRINGTON, a hamlet, in the parish of OLNEY, union of NEWPORT-PAGNELL, hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, 1¾ mile (N. by E.) from Olney; containing 75 inhabitants.

WARRINGTON (St. HELEN), a newly-enfranchised borough, market-town, and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER; containing, with the chapelry of Burtonwood, and the townships of Poulton with Fearnhead, Rixton with Glazebrook, and Woolston with Martinscroft, 21,901 inhabitants, of whom 18,981 are in the town, 52 miles (S. by E.) from Lancaster, and 188 (N. W. by N.) from London. This place is supposed by Mr. Whitaker, in his History of Manchester, to have been originally a British town, and on the invasion of the Romans under Agricola, in the year 79, to have been converted into a Roman station; which opinion rests chiefly on the circumstance of three Roman roads leading respectively from the stations of Condate, Coccium, and Mancunium, to a ford here over the Mersey; the vestiges of a castrum and fosse still discernible; and the discovery of some coins on both sides of the river, near the ancient ford, and other antiquities, which have been subsequently dug up. On its occupation by the Saxons, it obtained the appellation of Weringtun, from the Saxon Wæring, a fortification, and tun, a town, and was at that time of sufficient importance to give name to a wapentake, which afterwards merged into the hundred of West Derby, and formed part of the demesne of Edward the Confessor; it had been previously the head of a deanery, of which the jurisdiction still remains. In Domesday book it is noticed under the name of Wallintun; and in the reign of Edward I. it was in the possession of William le Boteler, who obtained for it the grant of a market, and other privileges. From the earliest period, the river Mersey at this place was passed only by the ancient ford, till the close of the 15th century, when Thomas, first earl of Derby, in compliment to Henry VII., on his visit to Latham and Knowsley, in 1496, erected the first bridge of stone, soon after which the passage of the river by the ford ceased. In the reign of Henry VIII., Leland, speaking of Warrington, says, "it is a pavid towne of a prety bignes; the parochie church is at the taylor of the towne; it is a better market than Manchestre."

Nothing of importance is recorded of it from this period till the commencement of the civil war, when the inhabitants openly declared in favour of the royal cause, and the town was garrisoned for Charles. In 1643, a detachment of the parliamentary forces, stationed at Manchester, laid siege to it, on which occasion the royalists under Colonel Norris, the governor, took refuge in the church, and, fortifying that edifice against the assailants, obstinately resisted their attack for five days; but the enemy having erected a battery, which they brought to bear upon it, the king's party was compelled to surrender. Their number was 1600, of whom 300 were taken prisoners; and ten pieces of ordnance, with a large quantity of arms and ammunition, fell into the hands of the enemy. The royalists seem, however, to have soon regained possession of the town, for in less than three months it was again attacked by the parliamentarians, who carried it by storm, when the former lost 600 men and eight pieces of cannon. In 1648, a numerous body of Scottish troops, under the command of the Duke of Hamilton, on their retreat after the battle of Ribblesdale, rallied at Warrington; and, after an obstinate but unsuccessful encounter with the parliamentary troops under General Lambert, in which 1000 men were slain, the remainder, consisting of 2000, surrendered themselves prisoners of war. The same general, in 1651, encountered and repulsed the Scottish army, under the command of the young king, near the town. Towards the close of the interregnum, Sir George Booth, knight of the shire, who had been a strenuous opponent of Charles, being dissatisfied with the conduct of public affairs, and anxious for the re-establishment of a free parliament under a legitimate head, raised a considerable force, in 1658; but, after a severe engagement with the troops under General Lambert, at Winnington Bridge, near Delamere Forest, he was defeated, and part of his army retreating to Warrington, the men were arrested in their flight by the parliamentary garrison stationed in that town. Since the erection of the bridge over the Mersey, Warrington, as a military station, was regarded as commanding the entrance into the county of Lancaster; and in 1745, on the approach of the army under Prince Charles Edward, the young pretender, who was advancing from Wigan, the central arches were demolished by the Liverpool Blues, who, having thus intercepted their progress, captured part of the rebel army, whom they sent prisoners to Chester Castle. The bridge was repaired in 1747, but afterwards becoming much dilapidated, it was taken down, and a wooden one on stone piers was constructed in 1812, at the joint expense of the counties of Chester and Lancaster; this has since been replaced by the present substantial structure of stone.

The town, which is pleasantly situated on the river Mersey, consists of four principal streets diverging from the centre, and intersected by several smaller; they are in general narrow and inconvenient, but have undergone considerable improvement, under the superintendence of commissioners appointed by an act of parliament obtained in 1813; the houses are, for the greater part, of indifferent appearance, but interspersed with numerous respectable modern edifices, which form a striking contrast. Prior to the construction of the railroad from Liverpool to Manchester, it was the great thoroughfare between these two places, and seventy stage coaches passed through it daily. The town is well paved, under the provisions of the act, and is lighted with gas by a company incorporated in 1822, whose works on a very extensive scale in Mersey-street, were erected at an expense of £15,000, advanced on shares of £20 each; it is amply supplied with water. A public subscription library was established in 1760, and is well supported; there is a floral and horticultural society, and a mechanics' institute was established in 1825. A neat and well-arranged theatre is opened occasionally, and a handsome suite of assembly-rooms has been erected.

Warrington has been long celebrated as a place of TRADE: until the early part of the 18th century, the principal branches of manufacture were coarse linen and checks, to which succeeded that of sail-cloth, which was carried on so extensively, that one-half of that used by the British navy is computed to have been made here. On the decline of this branch of business after the peace, the spinning of cotton was introduced, together with the manufacture of muslin, calico, velveteen, and other cotton goods, which, with sail-cloth on a less extensive scale, constitute a very great portion of the trade of the town, and for the sale of which two cloth-halls have been erected. There are several considerable pin-factories, which is the principal staple trade; and the making of files, for which the artificers have obtained a high degree of reputation, and other articles of hardware, employs a great number of men. The manufacture of glass and glass bottles is also largely carried on, and there are several establishments, of which the Bank Quay Glass Company's is the chief. Some business is done in malt, and there are several tanneries, soap-factories, and breweries: the ale of the place is in high repute. The soil in the neighbourhood is extremely fertile, and productive of early vegetables for the supply of the neighbouring markets. The Mersey and Irwell navigation affords a direct communication with Manchester, and the other districts with which that town is connected by various canals. The Sankey canal, commencing at the river Mersey, about one mile westward of the town, and approaching very near its northern extremity, was the first formed in the county, the act for its construction having been obtained in 1755; it extends about twelve miles to the collieries near St. Helen's. In 1830, a railway, with two collateral branches, was constructed from Warrington to join the one between Manchester and Liverpool, at Newton-in-Mackerfield; and subsequently this line was purchased by the Grand Junction Company, and converted into a part of their own railway from Birmingham to Liverpool, which has a principal station here.

On the Mersey was formerly a valuable fishery, which, in 1763, was let for £400 per annum; it abounded with salmon and smelts of a very superior kind, but has now greatly declined, not only in the quantity, but also in the size and flavour, of the fish. At spring tides, the water in the river rises to a height varying from ten to twelve feet at Warrington bridge, at which time vessels of from 70 to 100 tons' burthen can sail up to the quay, a little above the town, where warehouses and other accommodations have been erected. The town, from its situation as regards Liverpool and Manchester, enjoys considerable traffic, having a constant communication, both by land and water, with those places. The market-days are Wednesday and Saturday, of which the former, the principal, is abundantly supplied with corn; there is a large cattle-market every alternate Wednesday, and fairs are held on July 18th and November 30th, each continuing ten days, for the sale of woollen-cloth and other goods, and for horses, cattle, sheep, and pigs. The market-hall is a neat and convenient building, over which is a good suite of rooms, where the assemblies were formerly held; adjoining it is the principal cloth-hall, occupying three sides of a quadrangle; and there is another on a smaller scale, in Buttermarket-street. The county magistrates hold a petty-session for the division on the first and third Wednesdays in every month; and constables and other officers are appointed in October, at the court leet of the lord of the manor. A court of requests was established under an act passed in 1839. By the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, Warrington was constituted a borough, with the privilege of returning a member to parliament; the boundaries comprise by estimation 5657 acres, and the returning officer is appointed by the sheriff. The town-hall was erected in 1820, at an expense of £2800, raised by subscription.

The LIVING is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £40; patron, Lord Lilford. The ancient church, dedicated to St. Elfin, which was of Saxon origin, existed at the time of the Conquest, but of this there are few remains, and the site is occupied by the present church, dedicated to St. Helen, a spacious and ancient cruciform structure, of various styles, with a central tower, which, with the piers and arches supporting it, and the chancel, are parts of the original building, and a fine specimen of the decorated English style. The windows of the chancel, particularly the east one, are enriched with tracery of beautiful design; the north transept is later English, of an inferior character, and the nave and south transept are modern additions. Two of the ancient sepulchral chapels are remaining, in one of which is the magnificent tomb of Sir Thomas Boteler and his lady, with their effigies, the former in armour, and both surrounded by various sculptured figures; in the other chapel, that once belonged to the family of Massey, are several monuments to the Pattens, one of which is embellished with an elegant specimen of Italian sculpture, to the memory of T. Wilson Patten, Esq., who died in 1819. Trinity Chapel, in Sankey-street, is a neat and commodious edifice: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £130; patron, Thomas Legh, Esq. A district church, dedicated to St. Paul, was erected in Bewsey-street, in 1830, at an expense of £5347: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £137; patron, the Rector of Warrington. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, the Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion, Independents, Wesleyans, Independent Methodists, Unitarians, and Roman Catholics.

The free grammar school was founded and amply endowed in 1526, by a member of the Boteler family; the trustees pay the master a salary of £300, with the use of the school-house, garden, and land adjoining, and there are an usher and writing-master. The late Right Hon. George Tierney was educated here. A Blue-coat school, in Winwick-street, instituted in 1677, is supported partly by benefactions, producing more than £200 per annum, and the establishment has also the reversion of an estate at Sankey, worth £6000, granted by John Watkins, Esq., in 1797, and the reversionsary interest of an estate in the county of Bedford, given in 1685, by Arthur Borron, Esq. There is a society for the relief of widows and orphans of clergymen of the archdeaconry of Chester, established in the early part of the last century, under the patronage of the bishop of the diocese, and liberally supported. A dispensary was formed in 1810, and an appropriate building erected for its use in 1818, at an expense of £1030; and there are various other institutions and provident societies for promoting the instruction and the comfort of the poor. The union of Warrington comprises 15 chapelries and townships, in the parishes of Warrington, Winwick, and Prescot, containing a population of 31,732. Orford Hall, about a mile from the town, was the residence of John Blackburne, Esq., a celebrated botanist, who died in 1796, at the advanced age of 96; and Litherland, the inventor of the patent-lever watch, was a native of the town. Warrington gives the title of Earl to the family of Grey, who are now earls of Stamford and Warrington.

WARSILL, a township, in the parish and liberty of RYON, W. riding of YORK, 5 miles (E.) from Pateley-Bridge; containing 81 inhabitants. It comprises about 1000 acres, chiefly the property of John Greenwood, Esq., J.P. There is a place of worship for Independents.

WARSLOW, a chapelry, in the parish of ALSTONFIELD, union of LEEK, N. division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Leek; containing 519 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £105; patron, the Vicar of Alstonfield; impropiator, Sir George Crewe, Bart. The chapel, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is a neat modern structure. A school, erected in 1728, is endowed with about £17 per annum.

WARSOP (ST. PETER AND ST. PAUL), a parish, in the union of MANSFIELD, Hatfield division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Mansfield; containing with the chapelry of Sokeholme, 1384 inhabitants, of whom 1318 are in Warsop township. The parish comprises 6953a. 3r. 10p., of which about 200 acres are in woods and plantations; the soil is of a sandy nature, incumbent on limestone, which is quarried for roads and building, and for burning into lime; the forest land was partly inclosed in 1775, and the remainder by an act of 1818. The small river Meden, and the road from Nottingham, through Mansfield, to Worksop and Doncaster, intersect the parish. The village is considerable, and fairs for cattle and horses are held in it on the Monday before Whitsuntide, September 29th, and November 17th. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £22. 15. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income £1020; patron, Henry Gally Knight, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land in 1818; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 713 $\frac{3}{4}$ acres. The church is a neat edifice, thoroughly repaired in 1831, at a cost of £600. There is a chapel of ease at Sokeholme. Thomas Whiteman, in 1811, bequeathed £400 for instruction, now producing £15. 15. per annum. Dr. Samuel Hallifax, Bishop of St. Asaph, a prelate of deep erudition, died also rector of this parish, in 1790.

WARTER (St. James), a parish, in the union of Pocklington, Bainton-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of YORK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Pocklington; containing 439 inhabitants. The parish comprises 7830 acres, of which 7270 are under tillage, and the remainder meadow and pasture. It embraces a large portion of the hills and dales of the wolds, and the scenery in many parts, especially in the deep vale where the village is situated, is highly picturesque; the soil is flinty, though much improved of late by good cultivation. The air is very salubrious, and from the excellence of the water the place is supposed by some to have derived its name. The wold road from Driffield to Pocklington intersects the parish. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4; net income, £100; patron and improprator, Lord Muncaster. The church is an ancient edifice, of which the chancel was repaired in 1842. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A priory of Black canons, in honour of St. James, was founded here in 1132, by Geoffry Fitz-Pain, and at the Dissolution possessed a revenue of £221. 3. 10. In the vicinity are various tumuli.

WARTHERMASK, with SWINTON, a township, in the parish of MASHAM, union of BEDALE, wapentake of HANG-EAST, N. riding of YORK, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Bedale; containing 214 inhabitants. Large tracts of moor in this neighbourhood were brought into cultivation by the late Mr. Danby, who also planted many of the acclivities, and built a bridge over a deep glen.

WARTHILL (St. Mary), a parish, in the wapentake of BULMER, union and N. riding of YORK; containing 159 inhabitants, of whom 117 are in the township, 5 miles (N. E. by E.) from York. The parish consists of about 860 acres, the surface being generally flat, and the soil of rather inferior quality. Brockfield, the seat of Benjamin Agar, Esq., J.P., is situated here, surrounded with thriving plantations. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the patronage of the Prebendary of Warthill in the Cathedral of York (the appropriator), valued in the king's books at £3. 1. 8.; net income, £100. The tithes, with certain exceptions, were commuted for land in 1812, under an inclosure act. The church, a brick building, rebuilt, in 1778, at the sole expense of Mr. Agar, stands in an elevated position, upon a ridge of gravel. The Wesleyans have a place of worship.

WARTLING (St. Mary Magdalene), a parish, in the union of HAILSHAM, hundred of FOXEARLE, rape of HASTINGS, E. division of SUSSEX, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Hailsham; containing 962 inhabitants. The parish comprises 4461 acres, of which 20 are common or waste; the road from Lewes to Battle and Hastings passes through. A considerable portion of land is employed as hop-grounds. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £16. 0. $2\frac{1}{2}$.; patron, the Rev. John Pratt; improprators, the Rev. J. B. Hayley and Miss Rosarn. The great tithes have been commuted for £450, and the vicarial for £475; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 9 acres. The church is in the decorated style, with later additions, and having a spire rising from the western portion of the roof; the chancel contains handsome monuments to the Courteis family, of Windmill Hill. There is a place of worship for Independents.

WARTNABY, a chapelry, in the parish of ROTHLEY, union of MELTON-MOWBRAY, hundred of EAST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Melton-Mowbray; containing 107 inhabitants. The tithes for the fields of the chapelry were commuted for land in 1764. The chapel is dedicated to St. Michael.

WARTON, a chapelry, in the parish of KIRKHAM, union of the FYLDE, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 3 miles (S. S. W.) from Kirkham; containing 522 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £86; patron, the Vicar of Kirkham, whose tithes here have been commuted for £77. 13. 4., and those of the Dean and Chapter of Christ-Church, Oxford, for £198. The chapel, dedicated to St. Paul, was consecrated in 1725. A national school is supported by endowments producing an annual income of nearly £100.

WARTON (Holy Trinity), a parish, in the hundred of LONSDALE, south of the Sands, union, and N. division of the county, of LANCASTER; containing 2209 inhabitants, of whom 633 are in the township of Warton with Lindeth, 7 miles (N. by E.) from Lancaster. The parish comprises 22,000 acres by computation, and includes the chapelries of Borwick and Silverdale, and the townships of Carnworth, Priest-Hutton, Yealand-Conyers, and Yealand-Redmayne. The ground is hilly, with the exception of that portion of it contiguous to the sea, and the soil is in general a thin earth resting occasionally on layers of gravel, but chiefly on limestone. Morecambe bay bounds the parish on the west; and the Kendal and Lancaster road, and the Lancaster canal, pass through it. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £74. 10. $2\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £187; patrons, the Dean and Chapter of Worcester. The church is ancient, and contains portions of the several styles of English architecture. A free grammar school and an hospital were founded and endowed in 1594, by Matthew Hutton, Archbishop of York, and their income afterwards increased with bequests from Robert Lucas and others. The remains of a Roman encampment may still be traced; and under Warton Cragg is a coppermine, but not now worked.

WARTON, a township, in the parish and union of ROTHBURY, W. division of COQUETDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Rothbury; containing 74 inhabitants. It was formerly a member of the Hepple barony. The land in the neighbourhood is called the "core of Coquet," from the general excellence of its soil. The tithes have been commuted for £20.

WARWICK (St. Leonard), a parish, in the union of CARLISLE, partly in CUMBERLAND ward, and partly in ESKDALE ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND; containing, with the townships of Aglionby and Little Corby, 645 inhabitants, of whom 225 are in Warwick township, 4 miles (E. by N.) from Carlisle. The parish is bounded on the north by the river Eden, and on the west by the Irthing; and, from large earthworks still remaining, is supposed to be the site of the ancient Virosidum, where the sixth cohort of the Nervii was stationed. The village is pleasantly situated on the western bank of the Eden, which is crossed by a bridge of four arches, near the base of an eminence on which are the remains of trenches, probably thrown up to guard the pass during the border feuds. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to that of Wetheral. The church is a small stone edifice, of singular appearance, partly in the Norman style, with a semicircular chancel, and 13 lancet windows.

WARWICK, a borough and market-town, having separate jurisdiction, and the head of a union, locally in the Warwick division of the hundred of KINGTON, S. division of the county of WARWICK, of which it is the chief town, 90 miles (N. W.) from London; containing 9775 inhabitants. This place is said by Rous, the historian of the county, to have been a British town of considerable importance prior to the Roman invasion, and this statement is confirmed by Camden, Dugdale, and other writers. The same author relates that, after its devastation by the frequent incursions of the Picts, it was rebuilt by Caractacus, on whose defeat by Claudius, in the year 50, the Romans, in order to secure their conquests in Britain, erected several fortresses on the banks of the Severn and Avon, of which latter, Warwick Castle was one; but this is very doubtful, the nearest Roman station having, probably, been that at Chesterton. Upon the establishment of the Saxons in the island, the town, included in the kingdom of Mercia, fell under the dominion of Warremund, who rebuilt it, and, after his own name, called it Warre-wyke: it appears, however, from a coin of Hardicanute, that its Anglo-Saxon name was Werhica; but from either of these sources its present name may be derived. The place was subsequently destroyed by the Danes, and, according to the most authentic records, Ethelfleda, daughter of Alfred, and Countess of Mercia, restored it, about the year 913, and built a fort, which evidently forms the most ancient part of the present castle. At the time of the Conquest, this fortress was considerably enlarged, and the town was surrounded with walls and a ditch, of which there are still some vestiges, and a memorial is preserved in the appellation of a certain part of the town, called "Wall-dyke." In the reign of Edward I., the fortifications were repaired by Guy, Earl of Warwick, who, in 1312, with the Earl of Lancaster, having taken Piers Gavestone, the favourite of Edward II., on his route to Wallingford, brought him to this castle, where he was secured for the night under the barons' guard, and in the morning removed to Blacklow hill, about a mile from the town, where he was tried and beheaded.

In 1571, Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, celebrated in St. Mary's church the ceremony of the order of St. Michael, which, by permission of Elizabeth, had been conferred upon him by Charles IX. of France. William Parr, brother of Catherine, the last consort of Henry VIII., assisted at this ceremony, and, dying soon after, was buried in the chancel of the church. Queen Elizabeth visited Warwick, in 1572, on her route to Kenilworth Castle; and, in 1617, James I. was splendidly entertained in the great hall of the Earl of Leicester's hospital, in commemoration of which, a tablet, with an appropriate inscription, was put up on one of the walls of that building. During the great civil war, in the reign of Charles I., Robert Greville, Lord Brooke, who embraced the cause of the parliament, defended the castle against the king. Having occasion to repair to London, in order to procure a supply of arms and ammunition, he deputed Sir Edward Peto governor during his absence. The supply being obtained, he was met on his return by the Earl of Northampton, with a considerable force, near Edge Hill; but an accommodation taking place, Lord Brooke deposited his artillery and ammunition in Banbury Castle, and returned to London. After his departure, the earl, having attacked Banbury Castle, and taken the military stores, advanced to Warwick, and laid siege to the castle, which was defended by the governor for fourteen days, till Lord Brooke, on his return from London, after a successful skirmish with the earl near Southam, came to his assistance, and compelled the royalists to abandon the siege. William III., in 1695, visited the town, of which, in the course of the preceding year, more than one-half had been destroyed by a dreadful conflagration, occasioned by a spark, from a lighted piece of wood in the hand of a boy, communicating with the thatched roof of a dwelling-house. A great quantity of goods, probably in a state of ignition, having been removed for safety into the collegiate church of St. Mary, set fire to that venerable pile, which, with the exception of the chancel, the Beauchamp chapel, and the chapter-house, was destroyed. In a few years after, the town was rebuilt by means of a national contribution amounting to £110,000, of which £1000 were bestowed by Queen Anne.

The town is pleasantly situated on a rock of freestone, rising gently from the north side of the river Avon, which winds round its base; the approaches on every side are beautiful, and the surrounding scenery is richly diversified. The entrance from the Banbury road is strikingly picturesque: a handsome stone bridge, of one noble arch 100 feet in the span, leads into the town, which rises gradually from the bank of the river, and presents in succession the venerable castle on the left, the spire of St. Nicholas' church in the lower ground, and the lofty tower of St. Mary's in the distance. The entrance from the Birmingham road, after passing through the suburb called Saltisford, commands a view of the priory, the county hall, and the fine tower of St. Mary's church. The approach from the Stratford road is through a long ancient arched gateway, with a lofty tower on the west; and that from the Emscote road through an archway, which supports the chapel of St. Peter. The streets are spacious and regularly formed, consisting chiefly of two principal ones running east and west, crossed by another inclining to the centre of the town; the houses are in general modern and well built, interspersed with elegant mansions, and others affording occasional specimens of the style which prevailed before the fire. The town is well paved, lighted with gas, and amply supplied with water from springs about half a mile distant. Assemblies are held in the town-hall, and for larger meetings, and during the races, in the county-hall; the theatre is opened during the race-week, and occasionally at other times, by the Cheltenham company. Races take place in the first week of September, and continue for three days; the course is a fine level, with a little rising ground in one part, and has undergone such improvement as to make it one of the best in the kingdom; the grand stand is handsome and commodious.

The CASTLE, which is on the south side of the town, is one of the most splendid and entire specimens of feudal grandeur in the kingdom, and is not less remarkable for its stately magnificence than for the elegance of its architecture and the beauty of its situation; it incloses within its walls an area of nearly three acres, and the plot surrounded by the moat is more than five acres and a half. A winding road cut through the solid rock, the sides of which are covered with ivy and skirted with shrubs, leads from the outer lodge to a massive gateway flanked with two towers connected by an embrasure above, and formerly defended by a portcullis. This gateway leads into the inner court, in the north angle of which is a lofty octangular tower, with a projecting and embattled parapet resting upon corbels; in the south angle is Guy's tower, of a duodecagonal form, but more ancient, and having an exploratory turret rising from within the battlements; on the north-east side are two low embattled towers, in one of which bears were anciently kept, for the purpose of baiting. The range of state apartments on the east, as viewed from this side of the castle, is strikingly magnificent; the windows are in fine proportion, and every part is in the highest preservation. At the western extremity, and commanding, from its elevated site, an extensive view of the surrounding country, is the keep, erected by Ethelfleda, as a place of security against any sudden irruption of the Danes, and also an exploratory tower, from which their movements might be observed; the ascent is by a winding path, now richly planted with forest trees, among which are some cedars of Lebanon. The façade of the castle, rising from the river Avon, is a long line of flat masonry relieved only by the number and variety of its windows; the broken arches of an ancient bridge, which formerly led into the town, are still preserved, and add greatly to the beauty of the scene. The state-rooms, the armoury, and the other various apartments, are preserved in a style of appropriate grandeur; the lawns and gardens are tastefully laid out, and in the greenhouse, built expressly for its reception, is the beautiful Grecian vase of Lysippus, which was dug from the ruins of Adrian's palace, at Tivoli, near Rome, and brought to England by Sir William Hamilton, under the direction and at the expense of his nephew, the late Earl of Warwick.

Very little TRADE is carried on beyond what is necessary for the supply of the inhabitants: the cotton manufacture, which was formerly introduced, has entirely declined; and a worsted factory, subsequently established, is decreasing. There are several large malting-houses, and lime, timber, and coal wharfs on the banks of the Warwick and Birmingham, and Warwick and Napton canals, which form a junction at Warwick, and come up to the northern part of the town, and, communicating with the Oxford and Birmingham canal, afford every facility of inland navigation. The market, which is abundantly supplied with corn and provisions of every kind, is on Saturday; and fairs are held on Jan. 21st, Feb. 11th and 23rd, April 1st, May 13th, June 3rd, July 5th, Aug. 12th, Sept. 4th, Oct. 12th (which is a pleasure and statute fair, during which an ox is generally roasted in the market-place), Nov. 8th, and December 16th. The market-place is an extensive area surrounded by respectable houses, in the centre of which is the market-house, a neat substantial building of stone, of which the upper story, surmounted by a cupola and dome, is occupied by the interesting museum of the Warwickshire Natural History and Archæological Society. Warwick was first incorporated in the 37th of Henry VIII., and made a "mayor town" by Queen Mary, in 1553; the GOVERNMENT is now vested in a mayor, six aldermen, and eighteen councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76. The borough is divided into two wards, and the municipal and parliamentary boundaries are co-extensive; the mayor and late mayor are justices of the peace, and there are eight others. It first exercised the elective franchise in the 23rd of Edward I., since which time it has regularly returned two members to parliament; the right of election is vested in the £10 householders, and the limits of the borough comprise 5273 acres; the mayor is returning officer. The recorder holds quarterly courts of session, for all offences not capital; and a court of record occurs every Wednesday, except in the Christmas, Easter, and Whitsun weeks, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £40, at which the town-clerk generally presides; a court leet takes place annually before the same officer as steward, and petty-sessions are held every Monday. The court-house, in which the borough sessions and courts of record are held, is a handsome stone building in High-street, ornamented with fluted Corinthian pilasters, and having over the entrance a sculptured figure of Justice, surmounted by the arms of the borough; in the upper story is an elegant assembly-room. The assizes and general quarter-sessions of the peace for the county, take place in the county-hall, Northgate-street, an elegant building of freestone, in the Grecian style, of which the façade is embellished with pilasters of the Corinthian order, and with a central portico of Corinthian columns supporting a triangular pediment. On the left of the county-hall is the judges' mansion, a neat stone edifice with a handsome portico, and on the right hand is the county gaol, a large structure, also of stone, of the Doric order, with massive columns in front. Opposite to the side entrance of the gaol is the county bridewell, inclosed within a high stone wall.

The town comprises the parish of St. Mary, with 6328; and that of St. Nicholas, with 3447, inhabitants; and the former consisting of 2744, and the latter of 2374, acres. The living of St. Mary's is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £20; the vicar's stipend is £280, besides surplice fees, and an assistant minister is paid. £120 out of charity estates; it is in the gift of the Crown, and the impropriation belongs to the Corporation. St. Mary's CHURCH, formerly collegiate, of which the tower and the greater part were destroyed in the conflagration, and rebuilt in 1704, though comprising an incongruous mixture of styles, blending Roman and later English architecture, is, notwithstanding, a very stately and magnificent structure. The exterior, in many parts, is strikingly handsome, but the eastern part, in particular, is elaborately embellished with pannelled and richly-canopied buttresses; the tower, which risers in successive stages, variously embellished, to the height of 130 feet, is supported on four pointed arches, affording a spacious passage underneath, and crowned by lofty pinnacles at the angles, and with others in the centre, of less elevation. The chancel, which is in its original state, is an elegant and highly-enriched specimen of the later English style, and contains a fine altar-tomb to the memory of Thomas Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, and his lady, Catherine, daughter of Roger Mortimer, first earl of March. In the south transept is the entrance to the chapel of St. Mary, erected by Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, and thence called the Beauchamp chapel; it is of later English character, and, both in its external and internal embellishments, is inferior only to the chapel of Henry VII. at Westminster. Its roof is elaborately groined and enriched with fan tracery, and the altar is adorned with a well-executed representation of the Salutation, in basso-relievo, by Collins; behind it is an apartment within the buttresses, said, but on insufficient authority, to have been the library of John Rous, the historian; and on the north side is a chantry, from which an ascent of four stone steps, deeply worn, leads into an apartment supposed to have been formerly used as a confessional. In the centre of the chapel is the splendid monument of the founder, in gilt brass, in which his effigy, recumbent on an altar-tomb decorated with shields of armorial-bearings and numerous figures, and surmounted by a canopy, is finely executed; on the north side is a large monument, in the Elizabethan style, to the memory of Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester. On the north side of the church is the ancient chapter-house, the interior of which is entirely occupied by the stately monument of Sir Fulke Greville, the first Lord Brooke. The living of St. Nicholas' is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Countess of Warwick, by purchase from the Corporation, who are impropiators; net income, £220, besides surplice fees. The church was rebuilt in 1780, the tower and spire having been rebuilt about 40 years previously; it is a neat edifice in the later English style, of which the roof is groined, and supported on clustered columns. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Wesleyans, and Unitarians; and a Roman Catholic chapel at Hampton Cottage, Grove Park.

The Free Grammar school, situated on the Butts (a place formerly set apart for the young men of the town to exercise themselves in the use of the bow, prior to the invention of gunpowder), was established by Henry VIII., and endowed with a portion of the lands of dissolved monasteries; the master is appointed by the crown, with a salary of £200. There are two exhibitions, of £70 per annum each, to any of the colleges at Oxford, founded by Mr. Fulk Weale, of Warwick; and the school is also entitled to two exhibitions to Trinity College, Cambridge, in failure of candidates from Combrook school, founded by Lady Verney. The premises occupy a quadrangle, with a cloister on two sides, built by Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, for the dean and canons of the church of St. Mary, in which he founded a collegiate establishment. A charity school, now held in the ancient chapel of St. Peter, was endowed by Lady Greville, Lord Brooke, and Mr. T. Oaken; the master's salary is £70. Warwick hospital, founded by Robert, Earl of Leicester, occupies the buildings formerly used by the ancient guild of St. George, which, after being united in the reign of Richard II. with the guild of the Blessed Virgin and the Holy Trinity, became, at the Dissolution, vested in the corporation. By them the buildings were conveyed to the earl, and he converted them into an hospital, which he endowed for a master and twelve aged brethren, especially such as had been wounded in the service of their country; the income is £2015. 16. per annum. The premises, near the west end of High-street, form a quadrangle, on one side of which is the great hall, and on another are the master's apartments, the two remaining sides being occupied by the brethren, who have separate dwellings, and a common kitchen. The chapel of St. James, over the west gate of the town, annexed to, and forming part of the hospital, is neatly fitted up, and its altar is embellished with a painting of the Ascension, by Millar, a pupil of Sir Joshua Reynolds: behind the quadrangle is a spacious and well-planted garden, bounded on one side by part of the ancient walls of the town. Those portions of the building which were embellished in the time of the guilds, were, during the Commonwealth, concealed with a covering of lath and plaster, to preserve them from mutilation by the emissaries of the parliament; but in 1833, part of this covering, having fallen into decay, was blown down, and on the discovery of the ornamented parts, the original exterior of the edifice was restored by the master and brethren. Warwick is one of the towns included in Sir Thomas White's charity, by which young tradesmen are assisted with a free loan of £100 for nine years, to enable them to commence business. There are not less than 40 almshouses in various parts of the town, chiefly for aged women; and large funds for charitable uses and for distribution among the poor, are vested in trustees. The union of Warwick comprises 34 parishes or places, and contains a population of 37,209.

About a mile from Warwick, on the road to Kenilworth, is Guy's Cliff, the solitary retreat, for some years prior to his death, of the celebrated Guy, Earl of Warwick, of whom so many legendary tales are recorded: the cave in which he is said to have lived in retirement and devotion, and in which he was buried, is hewn in the rock near the bank of the Avon. Near it is a range of cells, having the appearance of a nunnery, and some cloisters hewn in the rock, and rudely arched, called Phillis' Cloisters, after the countess, who survived him only a few days, and was buried near him. Under a Roman arch, built by the late proprietor to sustain an ancient pointed one, which was falling to decay, are preserved two stone basins, called Guy's Well, covered with moss, into which a fine spring of clear water is constantly flowing. On this cliff, Richard de Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, built a chapel, dedicated to St. Margaret, in which he erected a colossal statue of Guy in armour, in the attitude of drawing his sword; the edifice, now dismantled, is in the later English style, with a very beautiful porch, the roof of which, like that of the chapel, is richly groined. The mansion built on this cliff by the late Mr. Greatheed, and now the seat of the Honourable Charles Bertie Percy, is a handsome modern structure, with a stately avenue of noble fir-trees in front; the Avon winds beautifully round the base of the cliff, and through the grounds, in which is a water-mill for grinding corn, erected prior to the Conquest. Nearly opposite to Guy's Cliff, on the other side of the road, is Blacklow Hill, a rocky eminence planted with forest trees: in the hollow part of the rock, which appears to have been quarried, Piers Gavestone was beheaded, in commemoration of which event a monument of four slender upright shafts, resting upon a pedestal, with a suitable inscription, and supporting a flat stone surmounted by a cross, has been erected on the summit.

Numerous monastic establishments anciently existed in the town. The Priory was instituted by Henry de Newbury, Earl of Warwick, and completed by his son Roger, in the reign of Henry I., for canons regular of the order of the Holy Sepulchre, and its revenue, at the Dissolution, was £49. 13. 6.; the remains have been converted into a private mansion, but retain very considerable portions of the ancient architecture, and are situated at the entrance into the town from Birmingham. The hospital of St. John the Baptist was established in the time of Henry II., by William, Earl of Warwick, for the reception of strangers and pilgrims, and had an income of £19. 17. 3.: the building, which is a fine specimen of the architecture of the time, is now occupied as a private boarding-school, and is situated near the extremity of the town, on the road to Leamington. Within the precincts of the castle was the collegiate church of All Saints, of which John Rous relates, that St. Dubricius made it an episcopal seat, about the latter end of the 6th century, the Secular priests, or canons, of which establishment were, in 1125, united to the college of St. Mary. In the north-west part of the town was an abbey, which was destroyed by Canute, in 1016, who also reduced to ashes a unnery, occupying the site of St. Nicholas' churchyard. In the north suburb was the chapel of St. Michael, to which was annexed an hospital founded about the close of the reign of Henry I., or the beginning of that of Stephen, by Roger, Earl of Warwick, for a master and leprous brethren, whose revenue was £10. 19. 10.: the remains are appropriated as an almshouse for aged women. Of the hospital of St. Thomas, stated by Rous to have been instituted by William, Earl of Warwick, not even the site is known. The convent of Dominican friars, which was situated in the western suburbs, was established in the reign of Henry III., by the Botelers, lords Studley, and the Montforts; the income was £4. 18. 6. Attached to the chapel of St. James, now forming part of the Leicester hospital, was a college for four Secular priests, founded in the reign of Richard II., which continued till the Dissolution; and there were also numerous churches in the town, which were suffered to fall into decay. Edward Plantagenet, son of George, Duke of Clarence, and the last male heir of that family, was born in Warwick Castle; he was beheaded in 1499. Warwick gives the title of Earl to the family of Greville.

WARWICKSHIRE, an inland county, bounded on the east by Leicestershire and Northamptonshire, on the south by Oxfordshire and Gloucestershire, on the west by Worcestershire, and on the north-west and north by Staffordshire. It extends from 51° 58' to 52° 42' (N. Lat.), and from 1° 10' to 1° 57' (W. Lon.), and comprises an area of 902 square miles, or 577,250 statute acres. There are 81,321 inhabited houses, 6905 uninhabited, and 668 in progress of erection; and the population amounts to 401,715, of whom 195,679 are males, and 206,036 females. At the period of the invasion of Britain by Julius Cæsar, the county was included partly in the territory of the Cornavii, and partly in that of the Wigantes, or Wiccii; the former occupying the northern, and the latter the southern portion of it. It was first subjected to Roman sway by Ostorius Scapula, the second Roman governor of Britain, who entered it with his forces about the year 50, and constructed a line of intrenched camps along the banks of the Avon; and it was afterwards included in the province called Flavia Cæsariensis. On the complete establishment of the Saxon heptarchy, it was included in the powerful kingdom of Mercia, the sovereigns of which selected Warwick, Tamworth, and Kingsbury, as occasional places of residence. Warwickshire was formerly partly in the diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, and partly in that of Worcester; but under the new ecclesiastical arrangements, made pursuant to the act of the 6th and 7th of William IV., cap. 77, it is now entirely within the latter diocese, in the province of Canterbury. It contains the deaneries of Arden, Coventry, Marton, and Stonely, in the archdeaconry of Coventry; and those of Kington and Warwick, in the archdeaconry of Worcester. For purposes of civil government it is divided into four hundreds; viz., Barlichway, having the divisions of Alcester, Henley, Snitterfield, and Stratford; Hemlingford, having those of Atherstone, Birmingham, Solihull, and Tamworth; Kington, having those of Brails, Burton-Dasset, Kington, and Warwick; and Knightlow, having those of Kenilworth, Kirby, Rugby, and Southam. Warwickshire contains the city of Coventry, the boroughs and market-towns of Warwick and Birmingham, and the market-towns of Alcester, Atherstone, Coleshill, Henley-in-Arden, Kenilworth, Kington, Leamington-Priors, Nuncaton, Rugby, Southam, Stratford-upon-Avon, and Sutton-Coldfield. Under the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, the county was divided into two electoral portions, called the Northern and Southern divisions, each empowered to send two members to parliament. Two citizens are returned for the city of Coventry, and two burgesses for each of the boroughs of Birmingham and Warwick. The county is in the Midland circuit: the assizes and quarter-sessions are held at Warwick, where stand the common gaol and house of correction.

A considerable part of the county, on its south-western border, is separated from the rest by a detached portion of Worcestershire; and a smaller isolated district, lying at a short distance beyond its western confines, is surrounded by Worcestershire. The general SURFACE is undulated, and, though seldom presenting romantic scenery, has, for the most part, a rich and pleasing appearance, greatly heightened by numerous small tracts of woodland. The banks of the Avon, though in some places flat and uninteresting, are in many, particularly near Warwick, highly beautiful and picturesque. The soils are generally fertile, comprehending almost every kind, except such as contain chalk or flints. The courses of crops are various; those commonly cultivated are wheat, barley, oats, peas, beans, turnips, potatoes, and tares or vetches. This is a noted grazing county; the permanent meadow and pasture amount by computation to 235,000 acres, and the quantity of land under artificial grasses to 60,000, making a total of 295,000 acres : on each bank of the Avon, during the whole of its course through the county, there is much rich meadow and grazing land ; and numerous other parts abound with fine old pastures. The middle, western, and northern parts of the county are those most abounding with timber, of which a large proportion is oak of remarkable growth, those parts having been formerly occupied by the extensive forest of Arden : there are numerous thriving plantations of different kinds of forest trees in various parts. The extent of uninclosed land is inconsiderable : the commons of Sutton-Coldfield and Sutton-Park are the most extensive. The chief Mineral productions are coal, limestone, freestone, and a blue flag-stone. The coal of the best quality is found at Bedworth, between Coventry and Nuneaton, where the seam varies in thickness from three to four feet, and is worked to a considerable extent. Large quantities are also raised at Griff-hollow, Chilvers-Coton, Nuneaton common, Hunts-hall, and Oldbury, lying to the north of the first-mentioned place, and the same vein extends still further northward, by Merevale, to Polesworth and Wilnecote. Limestone is found to a great extent, and quarried at numerous places, where it is also burned into lime ; and abundance of freestone exists in the neighbourhoods of Warwick, Leamington, Kenilworth, Coventry, and many other places, chiefly where the soil is light and sandy. At Coton-End, near Warwick, a light-coloured sandstone is quarried, which is one of the beds of the upper new red-sandstone ; these quarries have recently attracted much notice from the discovery of fossil remains of an extinct genus of animals, which, from the structure of the teeth, Professor Owen has called Labyrinthodon, and has determined to belong to a gigantic Batrachian reptile of the frog or toad family. Blue flag-stone, of the lias formation, used for paving and flooring, is found in many places, and is quarried in the neighbourhoods of Bidford and Wilnecote. There is iron-stone at Oldbury and Merevale, near the former of which it was anciently worked. The western part of the county abounds with marl of different colours and qualities, much of which is strong and excellent ; and a peculiar kind of blue clay, having some of the properties of soap, exists in great quantities in the eastern part of it. The hardware Manufactures of Birmingham and its vicinity are the principal in the county ; the next in importance is that of silk, ribbons, &c., at Coventry and the surrounding villages, and that city is also noted for the making of watches. There are considerable flax-mills at Berkeswell and Balsall, and in the vicinity of Tamworth, where much linen-yarn is spun ; at Kenilworth horn-combs of all descriptions are manufactured ; at Alcester are made fish-hooks and needles ; and at Atherstone are several factories for hats and ribbons, which latter article is also manufactured at Nuneaton.

The principal Rivers are the Avon and the Tame, of which the former, called the Upper Avon, to distinguish it from the river that forms the harbour of Bristol, was made navigable for vessels of 40 tons' burthen up to Stratford, in 1637. The county has an extensive artificial navigation ; and Birmingham is the grand centre from which most of the important lines of communication radiate, enabling that town to send the produce of its manufactures, by a direct and easy water carriage, to the four great ports of the kingdom. The Birmingham

Old canal affords a medium for the conveyance of coal and iron to Birmingham and other places, from the numerous mines on its banks, and the manufactured goods of that town to Liverpool, Manchester, &c. The Birmingham and Worcester canal was formed principally for the conveyance of coal, and for opening a more direct communication between Birmingham and the Severn. The Dudley Extension canal branches from this a little before it enters the county near Birmingham ; and the Stratford-on-Avon canal commences in it at King's-Norton, in Worcestershire, and proceeds through this county to its termination in the navigable channel of the Avon at Stratford. This canal has a short branch to the village of Tanworth, and a longer one to the Grafton lime-works ; and it also communicates by a short cut with the Warwick and Birmingham canal, near Lapworth-street. The Birmingham and Fazeley canal, commencing in the Coventry canal at Whittington brook, was formed chiefly for the conveyance of the produce of the Birmingham manufactures towards London and Hull, and for supplying Birmingham with grain and other commodities. The Coventry canal is an important line in the communication between London, Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool, &c., and, by means of it, great quantities of coal are conveyed from the pits in its vicinity, chiefly to the city of Coventry ; it has a branch, about a mile in length, extending to the Griff collieries, and another, from which are several minor branches, to those near Lees-wood, Pool, and Bedworth. The Ashby-de-la-Zouch canal begins in the Coventry canal at Marston Bridge, near Nuneaton, and, taking an irregular north-easterly course, soon quits the county near Hinckley. The Oxford canal commences in the Coventry canal at Longford, about four miles from Coventry, and finally quits for Oxfordshire a little to the south of Wormleighton ; the Grand Junction canal commences in the last-mentioned at Braunston, on the eastern border of Warwickshire, but in the county of Northampton. The Warwick and Birmingham canal, commencing in the Digbeth cut of the Birmingham and Fazeley canal at Digbeth, near Birmingham, proceeds south-eastward near Solihull to Warwick, whence the navigation is continued by the Warwick and Napton canal, which terminates in the Oxford canal near Napton-on-the-hill. The London and Birmingham railway enters the county to the south-east of Rugby, where it is joined by the Midland-Counties' railway, and passes by Coventry to Birmingham, where the Grand Junction line commences. The Birmingham and Derby railway has a branch from the London line at Hampton-in-Arden, and another near Birmingham, that unite near Kingsbury, whence the railway proceeds to Tamworth, where it quits the county for Staffordshire. A railroad has been constructed from Stratford-upon-Avon to Moreton-in-the-Marsh, in the county of Gloucester ; and an act was obtained in 1833, for making a branch to Shipston-upon-Stour.

Warwickshire contained the Roman station of Manduessedum, situated on the Watling-street, at Mancetter ; and that of Alauna, at Alcester ; while another was probably fixed at Chesterton. It was traversed by the Watling-street, the Fosse-way, the Ikeneld-street, and the Ridge-way ; and several vicinal ways diverged from each extremity of the great roads. The Roman camps are not very numerous ; the principal are situated along the course of the Fosse-way, and on the banks of the river Avon. In the vicinity of these and of the roads are found many tumuli and coins, and various other vestiges of Roman occupation have been discovered in almost every part of the county. On Welcombe hills, to the west of the village of Alveston, are extensive earthworks called the Dingles, supposed to be of Saxon origin. The number of Religious houses, including hospitals and colleges, was about 57; and there yet exist the remains of the abbey of Merevale, comprising some interesting specimens of early Norman architecture; of the priories of Coventry, Kenilworth, and Maxstoke; and of the nunneries of Nuneaton, Pindley, and Polesworth. There are remains of the Castles of Astley, Brandon, Kenilworth, Maxstoke, Tamworth, and Warwick, the last of which are particularly extensive, and form the chief part of the present magnificent residence of the Earl of Warwick. The most remarkable ancient Mansions are Clopton House, Compton-Wyniates House, and Aston Hall, near Birmingham; and some of the most distinguished of the more modern seats of the nobility and gentry, besides Warwick Castle, are Ragley Hall, Combe Abbey, Packington Hall, and Stoneleigh Abbey. There are various chalybeate Springs, particularly at Birmingham, Ilmington, and Newnham-Regis: but the waters of Leamington are by far the most celebrated, and their reputation has of late years converted this formerly obscure village into a place of fashionable resort.

WARWICK-BRIDGE, a township, in the parish of WITHERAL, union of CARLISLE, ESKDALE ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Carlisle; containing 439 inhabitants. The river Eden is here crossed by a fine stone bridge of four arches to the opposite village of Warwick. A strong party of royalists stationed to defend its passage, in June, 1648, was put to the rout by General Lambert. Extensive cotton-mills and bleaching-grounds, established by Messrs. Dixon and Sons, employ more than 500 persons. There is a Roman Catholic chapel.

WASDALE, or NETHER WASDALE, a chapelry, in the parish of ST. BEES, union of WHITEHAVEN, ALLERDALE ward above Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, 4 miles (E.) from Gosforth; containing 203 inhabitants. The chapelry comprises about 15,200 acres by computation, of which 14,000 are common and waste, and the rest arable, pasture, and woodland, in nearly equal portions. Here is the beautiful lake West-water, three miles long, half a mile broad, and forty-five fathoms deep, or about fifteen fathoms below the level of the sea, which disproportion as to its extent and depth accounts, perhaps, for its never having been known to freeze. A fair for sheep is held on the first Monday in September. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £66; patron, the Incumbent of St. Bees.

WASDALE-HEAD, with ESKDALE, a chapelry, in the parish of ST. BEES, union of BOOTLE, ALLERDALE ward above Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, 11 miles (S. W. by S.) from Keswick; containing 375 inhabitants, of whom 35 are in Wasdale-Head. It is pleasantly situated at the head of West-water lake, in a narrow valley almost surrounded by lofty hills. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £49; patron, the Incumbent of St. Bees. The chapel is very small.

WASHAWAY, a hamlet, in the parish of EGLOSHAYLE, union of BODMIN, hundred of TRIGG, E. division of CORNWALL, 3 miles (N. W.) from Bodmin. The petty-sessions for the division are held here, on the last Monday in every month.

WASHBOURN, GREAT (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of WINCHCOMB, Upper division of the hundred of TEWKESBURY, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 6 miles (E. by N.) from Tewkesbury; containing 100 inhabitants. It comprises 650 acres, the whole, with the exception of about 100 acres, the property of the Craven family. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £59; patron, J. B. Smith, Esq. The church has recently been newly pewed and beautified, and is a neat edifice, situated on an elevation commanding extensive views of the beautiful country by which it is surrounded.

WASHBOURN, LITTLE, a chapelry, in the parish of OVERBURY, union of WINCHCOMB, Middle division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, Pershore and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Tewkesbury; containing 37 inhabitants, and comprising 449 acres.

WASHBROOK (St. Mary), a parish, in the incorporation, and hundred, of SAMFORD, E. division of SUFFOLK, 4 miles (W. by S.) from Ipswich; containing 506 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, annexed to the rectory of Copdock, and valued in the king's books at £8. 6. 8.: the inappropriate tithes have been commuted for £191. 10., and the vicarial for £217; the glebe comprises 26 acres. The church contains several ancient stalls, which have been recently renovated; and over the communion-table, a window of stained glass has been placed, at the expense of Lord Walsingham. Felchurch was formerly a chapel to Washbrook, but has been for many years destroyed.

WASHFIELD (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of TIVERTON, hundred of WEST BUDLEIGH, Cullompton and N. divisions of DEVON, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Tiverton; containing 503 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £19. 7. 6., and in the gift of J. Francis Worth, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £400; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 25 acres. The church contains an old oak screen, which has been painted white, and a curious monument with brasses to the family of Worth. Ancient swords and other military weapons have been found upon the site of what is supposed to have been a Roman encampment.

WASHFORD-PINE (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of CREDITON, hundred of WITHERIDGE, South Molton and N. divisions of DEVON, 7 miles (N. by W.) from Crediton; containing 197 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Exeter to South Molton, and comprises 1140a. 3r. 7p., of which about 112 acres are moor now in progress of being drained and inclosed, 75 coppice and plantations, 15 orchard, and the remainder arable, with a little pasture; the soil in general is a dark earth, upon a subsoil of clay. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 0. $2\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of William Comyns, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £90; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 90 acres. There was formerly a chapel at Whenham, in the parish.

WASHINGBOROUGH (St. John the Evangelist), a parish, in the Second division of the wapentake of LANGOE, parts of KESTEVEN, union and county of LIN-COLN, 3 miles (N. E.) from Lincoln; containing, with the chapelry of Heighington, 1099 inhabitants, of whom 573 are in Washingborough township. The parish is bounded on the north by the navigable river Witham, and includes by admeasurement 4860 acres, consisting of two distinct portions, one of which is high, and the other fen land. The former, comprising 2734 acres, is considerably undulated, and the soil runs through several varieties from light loam to heavy clay; about 550 acres are pasture, and the rest, with the exception of 42 acres of wood, good corn land. The fenny tract consists of a peaty earth, formed chiefly by the decomposition of vegetable matter, and nearly all suited to the growth of grain and hardy vegetables. Washingborough is a considerable village on the banks of the river. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £26. 13. 4., and in the gift of Sir W. A. Ingilby, Bart.; there is an excellent parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 536 acres, valued at £785 per annum, in addition to which there are corn-rents amounting to £850. The church is a large handsome structure, with a lofty tower, and accommodates 450 persons. There is a chapel at Heighington, at which place, also, is a Wesleyan meeting-house. A school for young children has an endowment of £15. 10. per annum; and there is a free grammar school at Heighington, founded in 1619, by Thomas Garrett, who endowed it with lands and houses of the present annual value of £134. In 1701, Sir Edward Clarke left land now producing £70 per annum, for apprenticing children.

WASHINGLEY, a parish, in the union of PETERBOROUGH, hundred of NORMAN-CROSS, county of HUNTINGDON, 1½ mile (W.) from Stilton; containing 133 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, united to that of Lutton: there being no church, the inhabitants attend at Lutton.

WASHINGTON, a parish, in the union of CHESTER-LE-STREET, E. division of CHESTER ward, N. division of the county of DURHAM; containing, with the chapelry of Usworth, and the township of Barmston, and part of North Bidick, 2396 inhabitants, of whom 941 are in Washington township, 5½ miles (S. E.) from Gateshead. The township comprises 1802 acres; the surface of the parish generally is elevated about 100 feet above the river Wear, by which it is bounded on the south and south-east. The soil is various, but in a good state of cultivation, producing excellent crops, and the scenery embraces extensive views, including the cathedral of Durham, the vale of the Wear, and Gateshead Fell. There are several quarries of fine building-stone, and one of fire-stone of great value; and three coal-mines are in operation, affording employment to 700 or 800 hands. A small manufactory of magnesia and other chemicals belongs to Hugh Lee Pattinson, Esq., of Gateshead. The river is navigable for small vessels as high as the staiths just on the southern borders of the parish, about a mile from the village; and the Pontop and Shields, and the Great North of England, railways pass through the parish. The Hall, a large gavel-ended old mansion with windows divided by stone mullions and transoms, stands a little south of the church: the village is scattered and on irregular, broken ground. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £18, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Durham: the tithes have been commuted for £528, and the glebe comprises 130 acres of good land, with a parsonage-house. The church is a neat structure, erected in 1832. A national school is supported by the rector and by subscription. There are several sulphureous springs. The family of Washington, the American general, is said to have come from this place.

WASHINGTON, a parish, in the union of THAKEHAM, hundred of STEYNING, rape of BRAMBER, W. division of SUSSEX, 10 miles (N. W.) from Shoreham; containing 880 inhabitants. This parish, situated on the road from London to Worthing, is remarkable for its fine sweep of lofty down land, and comprises 3164 acres, of which 1470 are arable, 1106 pasture, 265 wood, and 323 waste and roads. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 10., and in the gift of the impropiators, the President and Fellows of Magdalen College, Oxford: the great tithes have been commuted for £398. 5., and the vicarial for £201. 14.; the glebe contains 13¼ acres. The church is in the early English style.

WASING (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of NEWBURY, hundred of FAIRCROSS, county of BERKS, 8 miles (E. S. E.) from Newbury; containing 87 inhabitants. It comprises 685 acres, of which 206 are arable, 205 pasture, 221 woodland, and 53 waste, &c. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £3. 13. 4.; net income, £100; patron, W. Mount, Esq.

WASPERTON (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of WARWICK, Warwick division of the hundred of KINGTON, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 4 miles (S. S. W.) from Warwick; containing 283 inhabitants. The parish is partly bounded on the west and north by the river Avon, and intersected by the road from Warwick to Shipston; it comprises 1619 acres. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5; patron and appropriator, the Rector of Hampton-Lucy. The great tithes have been commuted for £290, and the vicarial for £108; the glebe comprises 50 acres.

WASS, a township, in the parish of KILBURN, union of HELMSLEY, wapentake of BIRDFORTH, N. riding of YORK, 4½ miles (S. W.) from Helmsley; containing 137 inhabitants. The township comprises about 800 acres: the village is pleasantly situated near the source of a rivulet, in a secluded spot sheltered by moorland hills richly wooded, and within half a mile of the picturesque ruins of Byland Abbey.

WASSAND, a hamlet, in the township of SEATON, parish of SIGGLESTHORNE, union of SKIRLAUGH, N. division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, E. riding of YORK, 2 miles (W.) from Hornsea. It is called in Domesday book Wadsande, and after passing through the abbeys of Meaux and St. Mary, York, and several families, came, in the time of Henry VIII., to the Constables, by whom it is still possessed, and whose seat, Wassand Hall, occupying the site of the old mansion, is an elegant edifice in the Italian style, surrounded by grounds very agreeably disposed, which in some parts command beautiful views. The Wassand family resided at the place for about two centuries. The lordship consists of nearly 400 acres of land, chiefly laid out in pasture; the soil in general is a mixture of sand, gravel, and light clay.

WASTE-LANDS, an extra-parochial liberty, locally in the parish of SWINESHEAD, union of BOSTON, wapentake of KIRTON, parts of HOLLAND, county of LINCOLN, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Boston.

WATCHETT, a sea-port and market-town, in the parish of ST. DECUMAN, union of WILLITON, hundred of WILLITON and FREEMANNERS, W. division of SOMERSET, 5 miles (E.) from Dunster, and 154 (W. by S.) from London; containing 916 inhabitants. This place, which was anciently called Weced-poort, and suffered severely from the Danes in 886, is agreeably situated in a pleasant valley, on a creek of the Bristol Channel, and consists chiefly of four paved streets. It once had an extensive trade, and was noted for its herring-fishery: vessels are now employed in the coasting trade, and in the importation of coal from Newport and Swansea; and two packets ply between the place and Bristol every fortnight. A pier, originally erected by the Wyndham family, was repaired by Sir William Wyndham previously to 1740. The cliffs in the vicinity abound with alabaster and limestone. There is a small manufacture of woollen-cloth and paper. The market is on Saturday; and a fair takes place on November 17th. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans.

WATCHFIELD, a township, and formerly a chapelry, in the parish and hundred of SHRIVENHAM, union of FARRINGTON, county of BERKS, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Great Farringdon; containing 375 inhabitants, and comprising 1476*a.* 3*r.* 38*p.* The chapel was taken down about 1770.

WATCHHOUSE, a tything, in the parish of PORTBURY, union of BEMINSTER, hundred of PORTBURY, E. division of SOMERSET; containing 49 inhabitants.

WATER, EAST, a tything, in the parish of St. CUTHBERT, without the limits of the city of Wells, union of WELLS, hundred of WELLS-FORUM, E. division of SOMERSET; containing 49 inhabitants.

WATERBEACH (St. JOHN), a parish, in the union of CHESTERTON, hundred of NORTHSTOW, county of CAMBRIDGE, 5 miles (N. E. by N.) from Cambridge; containing 1270 inhabitants. The road from Ely to Cambridge passes within about half a mile on the west, and the river Cam at nearly the same distance on the east; the parish comprises 3373*a.* 3*r.* The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 15. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the appropriator, the Bishop of Ely: the great tithes have been commuted for £9. 6., and the vicarial for £73; the glebes comprise allotments of land consisting of 332 and 288 acres, respectively. The church is in the early English style, and is supposed to have been built about the beginning of the 13th century. A charity school, now conducted on the national plan, was instituted in 1687, and endowed with lands, by Grace Clarke and Dorothy Staines; the master's salary is upwards of £40. An almshouse for six widows was founded in 1628, by a bequest from Mr. John Yaxley, alderman of Cambridge, and endowed with £12 per annum, to which a rent-charge of £15 was added by Mrs. Jane Brigham, in 1705. About the year 1160, a cell to the monastery of Ely was established in a small island called Elmeneye, but was shortly after removed to Denney, both in this parish; in the following century, it was occupied by the Knights Templars, who then possessed the manor of Waterbeach. In 1293, an abbey for minoresses of the order of St. Clare was founded by Dionysia de Mountchensi, which, in 1338 (the order of the Templars being then abolished), was transferred to their house at Denney; at the Dissolution there were twenty-five nuns, and the annual value of the lands was estimated at £172. The abbey house and the demesne have been many years rented as a farm, and the refectory converted into a barn.

WATERCOMBE, an extra-parochial liberty, in the union of WEYMOUTH, hundred of WINFRITH, Dorchester division of DORSET; containing 27 inhabitants.

WATERDEN (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of DOCKING, hundred of BROTHERCROSS, W. division of NORFOLK, 5 miles (S. E.) from Burnham-Market; containing 29 inhabitants. It comprises 793*a.* 1*r.* 30*p.*, of which 640 acres are arable, 120 pasture and meadow, and 10 woodland. The living is a discharged rectory, annexed to that of Warham St. Mary, and valued in the king's books at £5. 6. 8.: the tithes have been commuted for £190, and the glebe comprises 18 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church is chiefly in the early style; there was formerly a south aisle, but it has been removed, and the tower is in ruins.

WATER-EATON, a township, in the parish of BLETCHLEY, union of NEWPORT-PAGNELL, hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (S.) from Fenny-Stratford; containing 267 inhabitants. There is an ancient manor-house, with a chapel, in which divine service is performed every Sunday.

WATER-EATON, a hamlet, in the parish of KIDLINGTON, union of WOODSTOCK, hundred of WOOTTON, county of OXFORD, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.) from Oxford; containing 104 inhabitants.

WATER-EATON, a tything, in the parish of EISEY, union of CRICKLADE and WOOTTON-BASSET, hundred of HIGHWORTH, CRICKLADE, and STAPLE, Cricklade and N. divisions of WILTS, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Cricklade; containing 51 inhabitants.

WATEREND, a tything, in the parish and union of BASING, hundred of BASINGSTOKE, Basingstoke and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 32 inhabitants.

WATERFALL (St. JAMES), a parish, in the S. division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, N. division of the county of STAFFORD, 7 miles (E. S. E.) from Leek; containing, with the chapelry of Calton, 517 inhabitants, of whom 446 are in Waterfall township. The river Hamps, which encompasses about two-thirds of the parish, enters the ground at Waterhouses, and pursues a subterraneous course of about three miles to Ilam, where it emerges and joins the river Manifold. The parish comprises about 1200 acres by computation, of which the surface is diversified with hill and dale, and the soil is various, but chiefly marked by strong clay. Limestone (a considerable quantity of which is burned), gritstone, and lead-ore, are found in the neighbourhood; and at the adjoining hamlet of Winkshill are two paper-mills, a flax-mill, and an iron forge and foundry. The living is a perpetual curacy, with a net income of £65; it is in the patronage of Mrs. Jane Wilmott, and the impropriation belongs to Mrs. Townsend. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WATERGALL, an extra-parochial liberty, in the union of SOUTHAM, Southam division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 4 miles (S.) from Southam; containing 14 inhabitants, and comprising 507 acres. This place gives name to a river which unites with the Avon.

WATERHEAD, a township, in the parish of LANERCOST-ABBEY, union of BRAMPTON, ESKDALE ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Brampton; containing 366 inhabitants. The township is bounded on the east by the river Irthing, which here separates the county from Northumberland; the surface is undulated, the soil various, and the scenery and views beautiful. Burdoswald, the Amboglana of the Romans, and next station, westward, from Caer Voran, stands on a large plain, at the head of a steep descent towards the Irthing. Camden discovered here six altars, dedicated to Jupiter Optimus Maximus, and an inscription, "The Sixth Legion, victorious, pious, and happy, made this;" and other altars have been found, as have also several sepulchral and other memorials.

WATERINGBURY (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union of WEST MALLING, hundred of TWYFORD, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, 5 miles (W. by S.) from Maidstone; containing 1273 inhabitants. The parish, situated on the road between Tonbridge and Maidstone, is bounded on the south by the river Medway, and comprises 1420*a.* 27*p.*; the scenery is agreeably enlivened by several gentlemen's seats in the neighbourhood of the village. Fruit is extensively raised for the supply of the London market. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5, and in the gift of the appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Rochester: the great tithes have been commuted for £96. 16., and the vicarial for £820; there is a glebe-house, with 2 acres of garden-ground. The church, an ancient edifice in the early English style, with a spire, formerly exhibited a profusion of stained glass, with portraits of Edward III. and his consort Philippa; it has been enlarged, and a handsome vestry-room was added in 1838, at the expense of M. P. Lucas, Esq.

WATERLOO-VILLE, an extra-parochial district, in the union of CATHERINGTON, hundred of FINCH-DEAN, Petersfield and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 175 inhabitants. It is on the road from Horndean to Portsmouth. A church, a neat edifice consecrated in 1841, and dedicated to St. George, has been erected at the cost of £1400, and contains 530 sittings, of which 370 are free. The living is a perpetual curacy, the income of which arises from an endowment of 8 acres of land and the pew-rents; the patronage belongs alternately to the Bishop of Winchester and Winchester College.

WATER-MILLOCK, a chapelry, in the parish of GREYSTOCK, union of PENRITH, LEATH ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND, 7 miles (S. W.) from Penrith; containing 524 inhabitants. This place, sometimes called Newchurch, (from the present chapel, which was built in 1558, on a more convenient site than the former,) is situated on the north side of Ullswater lake, in a district abounding with diversified scenery, the natural beauties of which have been heightened and improved by the erection of several handsome private residences, with pleasure-grounds tastefully laid out. In a deep glen in Gow-Barrow Park, rushing impetuously through the thick foliage of full-grown trees, is Airey Force, a beautiful cataract, which, dashing violently from rock to rock, emits a considerable spray. The discharge of a gun produces, from the reverberation of the hills, an effect somewhat like thunder, and one or two French horns that of a harmonious concert of musical instruments. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £55; patron, the Rector of Greystock. A school for boys is endowed with £525 in the three and a half per cent. consols.

WATER-OVERTON, a chapelry, in the parish and union of ASTON, Birmingham division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, N. division of the county of WARWICK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Coleshill; containing 252 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £115; patrons and impropriators, Trustees. The chapel is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul.

WATERPERRY (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of THAME, hundred of BULLINGDON, county of OXFORD, 2 miles (S. W.) from Wheatley; containing, with the hamlet of Thomley, 270 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 1. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £60; patron and impropriator, Joseph Henley, Esq. The church consists of a nave, south aisle, and chancel, with a wooden tower of singular construction, and contains some fine brasses to the Curzon family, whose ancient mansion near it is now the property of Mr. Henley. In the south aisle is an altar-tomb, with the recumbent effigy of a crusader, supposed to be one of the family of Ledwell; and in the chancel is a splendid monument, by Chantrey, to Mrs. Greaves.

WATERSFIELD, a tything, in the parish of COLD WALTHAM, union of THAKEHAM, hundred of BURY, rape of ARUNDEL, W. division of SUSSEX; containing 225 inhabitants.

WATERSIDE, a hamlet, in the parish of CHESHAM, union of AMERSHAM, hundred of BURNHAM, county of BUCKINGHAM; containing 753 inhabitants.

WATERSTOCK (St. LEONARD), a parish, in the union and hundred of THAME, county of OXFORD, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Wheatley; containing 127 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 16. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £58; patron, William Henry Ashurst, Esq. The chancel of the church is of modern erection, and contains a monument to the memory of Sir George Crook, one of the judges of the court of king's bench in the reign of Charles I.

WATFORD (St. MARY), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of CASHIO, or liberty of ST. ALBAN'S, county of HERTFORD; containing, with the hamlets of Cashio, Leavesden, and Oxhey, 5989 inhabitants, of whom 3697 are in the town, 20 miles (W. S. W.) from Hertford, and 15 (N. W.) from London. This place, situated on the river Colne, derives its name from the Watling-street, which passes in the vicinity, and from a ford over the river, to which latter its origin also is attributed; it consists of one principal street, about a mile in length, irregularly built, and is supplied with water by a forcing pump, erected by subscription. By means of the Grand Junction canal, which runs a mile to the westward, a communication is maintained with the metropolis and the northern part of the kingdom. The manufacture of straw-plat, and three mills for the throwing of silk, employ a considerable number of persons; and there are likewise eight malt-kilns, and two extensive breweries. The London and Birmingham railway intersects the southern part of the parish, and at a short distance from the town is a first-class station; $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles beyond is the Watford tunnel, about a mile in length, and here also the line crosses the valley of the Colne, on a viaduct 312 feet in length and 30 in breadth. The market, granted by Henry I., is held on Tuesday: the market-house is an indifferent building, supported on wooden pillars, with granaries over it. Fairs are held on the Tuesday after Whit-Tuesday, and on August 29th and 30th, for cattle and pedlery; and a statute for hiring servants in September. A meeting of the magistrates takes place every Tuesday; and there is a weekly court of requests, for the recovery of debts under 40s., the jurisdiction of which is co-extensive with the liberty of St. Alban's.

The LIVING is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £21. 12. 1.; net income, £730; patron and impropiator, the Earl of Essex. The church, situated in the centre of the street, on the south side of the town, has two chapels annexed, with a tower; a monument has been erected in the private chapel belonging to the Capel family, to the memory of the late Earl of Essex, who died in 1839. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Connexion of the Countess of Huntingdon, and Wesleyans. The free school was founded in 1708, by Elizabeth Fuller, who endowed it with a rent-charge of £52, which has been augmented by bequests, altogether producing a revenue of £178: the school-house is a handsome structure, at the south-west corner of the churchyard. A parochial free school was founded in 1641, and endowed with a rent-charge of £10, by Francis Coombe, who also left an estate, the rent of which, with the produce of bequests from others, amounting altogether to about £100 per annum, is distributed among the poor. Almshouses for eight widows were founded by Francis, Earl of Bedford, and his Countess, in 1580, and were endowed by Charles Morrison in 1583, Lady Mary Morrison in 1629, and Mary Newman in 1789, with property now yielding an income of £72. Almshouses were erected in Lote's-lane in 1824, in lieu of a building given by Lady Dorothy Morrison, in 1614, as a free residence for a lecturer and four widows; the present income is £55. 10., and the lecturer receives about £100 a year, arising from a corn-mill given by Lady Elizabeth Russell, in 1610. The annual rent of the church lands is £151. 6.; and there are £70 per annum for apprenticing children. The poor law union of Watford comprises 6 parishes or places, containing a population of 18,009.

WATFORD (ST. PETER AND ST. PAUL), a parish, in the union of DAVENTRY, hundred of GUILSBOROUGH, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Daventry; containing 415 inhabitants. It comprises 3361*a.* 2*r.* 20*p.*, the soil of which is a strong loam, and the surface in general hilly; the union canal passes through the parish: on the west is the ancient Watling-street. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11. 7. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £296; impropiator, Lord Henley. The tithes were commuted for land in 1771. Sarah Clarke in 1702, gave £400, now producing £33 a year, applied in aid of a national school. There are some springs strongly impregnated with iron.

WATH (ST. MARY), a parish, partly in the wapentake of ALLERTONSHIRE, and partly in that of HALLIKELD, N. riding of YORK; containing, with the townships of Melmerby, Middleton-Quernhow, and Norton-Conyers, 709 inhabitants, of whom 208 are in Wath township, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Ripon. The parish comprises 3563*a.* 3*r.* 3*p.*, of which about 134 acres are woodland, and the rest pasture and meadow, and arable, in nearly equal portions. About 737 acres are in the township of Wath: the village is distant from the river Ure a mile and a half. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £17. 17. 1., and in the gift of the Marquess of Ailesbury: the tithes have been commuted for £918. 10., and the glebe comprises 74*a.* 3*r.* 15*p.* The Rev. Peter Samwaise, in 1690, founded a free school, and endowed it with lands and houses producing about £75 a year.

WATH, a township, in the parish of HOVINGHAM, union of MALTON, wapentake of RYEDALE, N. riding of YORK, 8 miles (W. by N.) from Malton; containing 28 inhabitants. It comprises about 300 acres of land: the village lies south of the river Rye, at a short distance south-east of Hovingham.

WATH-UPON-DEARNE (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of ROTHERHAM, N. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK; containing, with the township of Brampton-Bierlow, and the chapelries of Nether Hoyland, Swinton, and Wentworth, 8911 inhabitants, of whom 1453 are in Wath township, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.) from Rotherham. This parish, which is bounded by the rivers Dearne and Don, is six miles in length, and four in average breadth, and comprises 10,536*a.* 1*r.* 31*p.*, of which 1522*a.* 2*r.* 36*p.* are in the township; of the latter, 832 acres are arable, 578 grass land, 47 wood, 41 homesteads and orchards, and 23 canal. The parish is principally the property of Earl Fitzwilliam, who is lord of the several manors, and whose princely seat is within its limits. Cross House, the residence of William Carr, Esq., is also situated here. The soil is generally fertile, and in a high state of cultivation; the substratum is rich in mineral wealth, and considerable numbers of the population are employed in the iron-works, coal-mines, stone-quarries, and potteries, and in the various manufacturing establishments with which the district abounds, and for which it has long been celebrated. The village is pleasantly situated on an acclivity near the Dearne and Dove canal, and consists of numerous well-built houses and handsome shops, amply stored with every requisite for the supply of the populous neighbourhood by which it is surrounded. There are several good inns and houses of public entertainment; and for some years a periodical work, called the Village Magazine, was published here monthly, under the auspices of some literary gentlemen of the vicinity. The North-Midland railway has a station here. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Adwick-upon-Dearne annexed, valued in the king's books at £15. 10. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$., net income, £315, patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford. The church is a handsome structure in the later English style, with an embattled tower surmounted by a spire. Chapels of ease are situated at Swinton, Wentworth, and Hoyland, and in the hamlets of Elsecar and Thorpe-Hesley. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. The Rev. Thomas Wombwell, in 1663, gave £30 towards the erection of a school, which was subsequently endowed by Anthony Sowdrie, Esq., with land worth £13 per annum. Five cottages and five acres of land producing £26. 10. a year, a rent-charge of £5 given by W. Spencer, Esq., and some other benefactions, are appropriated for distribution among the poor. The Roman Ikeneld-street passed through the parish.

WATLESBOROUGH, a township, in the parishes of ALBERBURY and CARDESTON, union of ATCHAM, hundred of FORD, S. division of SALOP, 6 miles (W.) from Shrewsbury; containing 301 inhabitants.

WATLINGTON (St. PETER AND St. PAUL), a parish, in the union of DOWNHAM, hundred of CLACKCLOSE, W. division of NORFOLK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Downham-Market; containing 502 inhabitants. It is bounded on the west by the Great Ouse, over which is a bridge of wood, and comprises 1709a. 32p., of which about 823 acres are arable, 746 pasture, 38 wood, and 73 roads and rivers. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 16. 8., and in the gift of C. B. Plestow, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £488. 11., and the glebe contains 24 acres. The church is in the early and decorated English styles, with a square embattled tower surmounted by a small spire; on the south side of the chancel are a piscina and three sedilia of stone; and the font is elaborately embellished with sculpture. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WATLINGTON (St. LEONARD), a market-town and parish, in the union of HENLEY, hundred of PIRTON, county of OXFORD, 15 miles (E. S. E.) from Oxford, and 43 (W. by N.) from London; containing 1855 inhabitants. The name is supposed to have been derived from the Saxon Watelar, hurdles or wattles, alluding to the way in which the Britons are described to have built their towns, "as groves fenced in with hewn trees." It is traditionally said that a military chest of money was left at the house of Robert Parslow, in the town, and never afterwards reclaimed, in consequence of which he bequeathed a liberal donation to the poor of the parish. The town is situated between the two high roads leading from London to Oxford, about half a mile from the line of the Ikeneld-street; it is irregularly built, and consists of some narrow streets, the houses, with a few exceptions, being of mean appearance; water is supplied from an adjacent brook, that rises in one of the Chiltern hills. On the hill immediately above the town is an obelisk, from the summit of which is obtained a view over nine counties. The market, granted in the reign of Richard I., is on Saturday: a substantial market-house was built in 1666, by Thomas Stonor, Esq., and over it is a room where public business is transacted. A fair is held on April 5th, and on the Saturday before and after Old Michaelmas is a statute-fair; two courts leet take place annually, and petty-sessions for the hundred occur once a fortnight. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12, and has a net income of £175: the tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1808; the patronage and impropriation belong to Miss Tilson. The church stands on the north-western side of the town; in the chancel is a burial-place of the Horne family, with some interesting monuments. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. The free grammar school, once a noted classical institution, but now confined to English instruction, was founded in 1664, and endowed with a rent-charge of £10, by Thomas Stonor, Esq., which sum has been augmented; the master receives a salary of £20 per annum. Twenty men are provided with coats from Parslow's bequest, and there are several charities for the repair of the church, and for distribution among the poor. On Bretwell hill are remains of trenches, indicating the site of an encampment. Of Watlington Castle, which stood south-east of the church, there are only some traces of the moat by which it was surrounded.

WATNALL-CANTELOPE and WATNALL-CHAWORTH, hamlets, in the parish of GREASLY, union of BASFORD, S. division of the wapentake of BROXTOW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM; containing, respectively, 192 and 200 inhabitants.

WATTISFIELD (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of STOW, hundred of BLACKBOURN, W. division of SUFFOLK, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Botesdale; containing 601 inhabitants. It is on the road from Bury to Norwich. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 11. 8., and in the patronage of Mrs. Morgan; net income, £336. The church is in the decorated style, with a square tower. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. A rental of £71. 17., derived from town lands, is appropriated to general parochial purposes. The Rev. Thomas Harmer, author of Observations on Divers Passages of Scripture, and other works, resided in the parish, as minister of the Independent meeting-house, for more than 50 years.

WATTISHAM (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union and hundred of COSFORD, W. division of SUFFOLK, 2 miles (N. E.) from Bildeston; containing 240 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 1298 acres, of which about 15 are roads and waste, and the remainder arable, meadow, and pasture. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £100; patrons and impropriators, the Provost and Fellows of King's College, Cambridge. In the church is a tablet recording a singular calamity that happened to a poor family, by which six persons lost their feet through mortification. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

WATTLEFIELD, a division, in the parish of WYMONDHAM, incorporation and hundred of FOREHOE, E. division of NORFOLK, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Wymondham; containing 500 inhabitants.

WATTON (St. MARY AND St. ANDREW), a parish, in the hundred of BROADWATER, union and county of HERTFORD, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Hertford; containing 920 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the old north road, and comprises 3499 acres by admeasurement, of which 378 are wood, and the remainder arable and pasture; the surface is hilly, and the scenery picturesque and beautiful. The river Beane runs through the parish, which was also intersected by one of the Roman vicinal ways, on the supposed line whereof is still a large stone, apparently of high antiquity. A pleasure-fair is held at Michaelmas. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £19. 8. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of Abel Smith, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £700; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 68 acres. The church has a square embattled tower, and a chapel is attached to the north side of the chancel. Sir William and Maurice Thompson, in 1662, founded a free school, and endowed it with property, now producing a rental of about £25 per annum for a national school: in 1818 a school-room was erected at the expense of Samuel and Abel Smith, Esqrs. A battle between the British and the Danes is said to have been fought near Broom Hall.

WATTON (St. Mary), a market-town and parish, in the union and hundred of WAYLAND, W. division of NORFOLK, 21 miles (W. by S.) from Norwich, and 94 (N. N. E.) from London; containing 1188 inhabitants. This place is of considerable antiquity, and appears to have had the grant of a market prior to 1204, which during that year was suspended by writ of inquiry, but soon after restored to Oliver de Vaux, lord of the manor; in 1673 an accidental fire destroyed a great portion of the town, with property to the amount of £10,000. The town is situated nearly in the centre of the hundred, on the verge of that part of Norfolk called Filand, or the "open country," and consists principally of one spacious street at the junction of several cross roads; it is lighted with oil, and the inhabitants are supplied with water from springs. There is a brewery, and also a malting establishment; but the chief trade arises from its situation on a great public thoroughfare. The market, which is on Wednesday, and chiefly for corn, was formerly celebrated as a mart for butter, of which large quantities were sent weekly to London. The ancient fairs are on the 10th of July, 11th of October, and the 8th of November, for cattle; and those of more modern establishment, on the second Wednesday in July, and the first Wednesday after Old Michaelmas-day, for sheep. A neat obelisk was erected in 1820, on the site of the ancient market-cross, which was then taken down; and a curious sculptured device, containing a rebus on the name of the town, with which it was ornamented, was placed in the front of a small square building erected soon after the fire, containing a clock and one bell, which is rung on Sundays preparatory to divine service. A manorial court is held annually, and a court of petty-sessions for the hundred on the first Wednesday in the month. The parish comprises 1807*a.* 3*r.* 34*p.*, of which 1169 acres are arable, 503 meadow and pasture, and 85 woodland. The LIVING is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 0. 4., and in the gift of the Trustees of W. H. Hicks, Esq.: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £290, and the vicarial for £188. 4.; the glebe comprises 12 acres, with a good house. The church appears to have been originally erected in the reign of Henry I.; the present structure is chiefly in the early and decorated English styles, with a circular tower, octagonal in the upper stage, and surmounted by a spire; it was enlarged by widening the aisles in 1840, and an ancient crucifix of stone was removed from the north porch, and placed at the east end of the nave. There are places of worship for Independents, Primitive Methodists, and Wesleyans. On the inclosure of the common, 48 acres of land were allotted to the poor for fuel. In Wayland Wood near the town, and which gives name to the hundred, the sheriff's court was anciently held.

WATTON (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of DRIFFIELD, Bainton-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of YORK, 5½ miles (S.) from Great Driffield; containing 329 inhabitants. A nunnery of the Sempringham order, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, was founded here in 1150, upon the site of a more ancient priory, which existed in the year 686: at the Dissolution, its revenue was valued at £453. 7. 8., when its site and remains, which are still considerable, were granted to the Earl of Warwick.

The parish is west of the river Hull, and comprises 4277 acres of fertile land, of which 3190 are arable, 1069 pasture, and 18 woodland, all tithe-free. A considerable portion of the parish, known as Watton Carr, was formerly a complete morass with a decoy in the centre, but was reclaimed by drainage, and is now sound and useful land. A great portion of the soil belongs to Richard Bethell, Esq., whose family were long seated at Walton Abbey, a brick mansion in the Tudor style, with octagonal turrets, stone dressings and buttresses, and fine gardens attached; it is now, by permission of Mr. Bethell, the residence of the incumbent. The village is situated on the banks of a rivulet, and on the road between Driffield and Beverley. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £60; patron, Mr. Bethell. The church is a neat edifice, with a tower at the west end, and contains some mural tablets to the Bethell and Dickinson families. Two schools are chiefly supported by Mr. Bethell.

WAULDBY, a township, in the parish of ELLOUGHTON with BROUGH, union of SCULCOATES, Hunsley-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of YORK, 4¼ miles (E. by S.) from South Cave; containing 48 inhabitants. It comprises about 990 acres of land, and is situated south of the road from South Cave to Kirk-Ella. There are remains of an ancient chapel, in which is a mural tablet in memory of John Parkinson, "lord of Wauldby," who died in 1676.

WAVENDON (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of NEWPORT-PAGNELL, hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, 3½ miles (N. W.) from Woburn; containing 846 inhabitants. The parish is on the road from Woburn to Newport-Pagnell and Northampton, and comprises 2600 acres by admeasurement: there are pits for obtaining fullers'-earth. The manufacture of bone-lace is carried on by women and children, and a few are engaged in making straw-plat. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £26. 6. 10½., and in the gift of Sir H. R. Hoare, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £702; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 82 acres. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and the Society of Friends. George Wells, in 1714, bequeathed £800, and his niece, Beatrice Miller, added £200, for founding and endowing a free school, which sums were invested in land now producing a clear rental of £84. 18. The Duke of Bedford annually supplies coal to the amount of £150, for the poor, in lieu of waste land awarded under an inclosure act in 1791; and the parish is in possession of town lands, the rents of which, amounting to about £20, together with the produce of some minor charities, are distributed among the poor. Almshouses for four widows were lately built by Sir H. Hugh Hoare.

WAVERLEY, an extra-parochial liberty, in the hundred of FARNHAM, W. division of SURREY, 2 miles (S. E. by E.) from Farnham; containing 69 inhabitants. An abbey of Cistercian monks, said to have been the first of that order established in England, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, was founded here in 1128, by William Giffard, Bishop of Winchester, and at the Dissolution had a revenue of £196. 13. 11. The remains are considerable, and have an interesting effect, much enhanced by the luxuriant ivy with which they are overgrown. The property has been greatly improved, and now forms one of the most magnificent seats in the county.

WAVERTON (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of GREAT BOUGHTON, Lower division of the hundred of BROXTON, S. division of the county of CHESTER; containing, with the townships of Hatton and Huxley, 776 inhabitants, of whom 341 are in Waverton township, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Chester. This parish comprises 3946 acres by admeasurement; and the road from Chester to Whitchurch, the Chester and Crewe railway, and the Chester and Nantwich canal pass through it. There is a quarry of excellent red stone, with which Chester cathedral was repaired a few years since. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the gift of the Bishop of Chester: the rectory is valued in the king's books at £23. 6. 8., and is annexed to the bishopric: the tithes have been commuted for £435, and the glebe comprises 21 acres. The church has a very fine tower.

WAVERTON, a township, in the parish and union of WIGTON, ward and E. division of CUMBERLAND, 2½ miles (W. S. W.) from Wigton; containing 543 inhabitants. The river Waver intersects the township, dividing it into High and Low. The tithes were commuted for land in 1811.

WAVERTREE, a chapelry, in the parish of CHILDWALL, union and hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 2½ miles (E. by S.) from Liverpool; containing 2669 inhabitants. Its proximity to Liverpool has made it the residence of several respectable families. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £117; patrons, certain Trustees. There is a well at which contributions were formerly received by some monks; it bears a curious Latin inscription, and the date 1414. Mrs. Hemans, the poetess, resided here.

WAXHAM (St. JOHN AND St. MARGARET), a parish, in the TUNSTEAD and HAPPING incorporation, hundred of HAPING, E. division of NORFOLK, 5 miles (E.) from Stalham; containing 90 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1955a. 2r., of which 718 acres are arable, 1007 pasture, 29 wood, and about 200 marsh land, which last, by prescription tithe-free, are the property of Lord Braybrooke, constituting the only remaining part of the parish of Little Waxham, the rest having been swallowed up by the sea. Hickling Hall, a respectable farm-house, was the ball-room of the ancient mansion, and the principal entrance still remains, exhibiting specimens of well-executed sculpture. The living is a discharged rectory, with the vicarage of Palling annexed, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the gift of H. J. Conyers, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £343; the glebe comprises 1½ acre, and about 20 acres of land in the parish of Hickling belong to the benefice.

WAXHOLME, a township, in the parish of OWTORNE, union of PATRINGTON, Middle division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, E. riding of YORK, 15½ miles (E.) from Hull; containing 99 inhabitants. The township has been much wasted by the incursions of the German Ocean, and now comprises about 502 acres of land: the coast here and at Tunstall is called Sand la Mare, from the knightly family of la Mare, who were anciently seated in the neighbourhood. Here is a coast-guard station, established in 1826.

WAYBOURNE (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of ERPINGHAM, hundred of HOLT, W. division of NORFOLK, 3 miles (N. E.) from Holt; containing 311 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the north by the North Sea, and comprises 1625a. 2r. 9p., of which 1168 acres are arable, 30 pasture and meadow, 274 heath or sheep-walks, and 152 woodland. The village is picturesquely situated on the coast, in a deep romantic bay, sheltered by a semicircular range of lofty hills extending on each side of the beach; the sea is so deep that ships are able to ride almost close to the shore. There are a brewery and malting establishment, and a house for curing fish; and several boats are employed in crab and lobster fishing. The living is a perpetual curacy and donative, in the patronage of the Earl of Orford, the impropiator, whose tithes have been commuted for £300. The church is in the decorated style, with a square embattled tower: near it are the remains of a church belonging to a priory of Augustine canons founded in the reign of Henry II.

WAYFORD, a parish, in the union of CHARD, hundred of CREWKERNE, W. division of SOMERSET, 2½ miles (S. W.) from Crewkerne; containing, with the tything of Oathill, 223 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1460 acres, of which 20 are common or waste. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 1. 5½.; net income, £132; patron, John Pinney, Esq.

WEALD, a chapelry, in the parish and union of SEVEN-OAKS, hundred of CODSHEATH, lathe of SUTTON-AT-HONE, W. division of KENT, 2 miles (S.) from Seven-Oaks; containing 1036 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of Earl Amherst, with reversion to the Vicar of Seven-Oaks; net income, £100. The church, an elegant structure in the early English style, was erected in 1820, and the tower was added in 1839, by subscription.

WEALD, a hamlet, in the parish of HARROW-ON-THE-HILL, union of HENDON, hundred of GORE, county of MIDDLESEX, 2½ miles (N.) from Harrow; containing 1031 inhabitants.

WEALD, a hamlet, in the parish of BAMPTON, union of WITNEY, hundred of BAMPTON, county of OXFORD; containing 826 inhabitants.

WEALD, NORTH, or NORTH-WEALD-BASSET (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of EPPING, partly in the hundred of HARLOW, but chiefly in that of ONGAR, S. division of ESSEX, 3 miles (N. E. by E.) from Epping; containing, with the hamlets of Hastingwood and Thornwood, 886 inhabitants. The parish is situated near the northern extremity of the hundred, and comprises 3065 acres, of which 1338 are arable, 1348 pasture, and 300 common; the soil is heavy, but under good management has been rendered abundantly productive. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8.; net income, £353; patrons, the Bishop of London and R. P. Ward, Esq.; impropiator, J. King, Esq. The great tithes have been commuted for £426, and the vicarial for £446; the impropriate glebe comprises 24 acres, and the vicarial 11. The church is a small ancient edifice, with a substantial tower of brick. A school is endowed with £10 per annum.

WEALD, SOUTH (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of BILLERICAY, hundred of CHAFFORD, S. division of ESSEX; containing, with the town of Brentwood, 3812 inhabitants, of whom 1450 are in the township of South Weald. This parish, which, from its name, is supposed to have been that portion of the forest first inhabited, is situated on the road between Romford and Chelmsford, and comprises by admeasurement 5053 acres, which, with the exception of 150 acres of woodland, are about equally divided between arable and pasture. The Eastern-Counties' railroad runs through the parish. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £26. 13. 4.; patron, the Bishop of London; impropriator, C. T. Tower, Esq. The great tithes have been commuted for £215, and the vicarial for £680; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 16 acres. The church is a handsome stone structure, and has a fine old embattled tower, and a curious Norman porch. There are five almshouses founded by Sir Anthony Brown, the inmates of which, three men and two women, receive £10 per annum each. In front of the ancient Hall is a mild chalybeate spring, much resorted to in summer, possessing properties somewhat similar to those of seawater. Bishop Horsley was vicar of the parish.

WEARDALE, ST. JOHN, or ST. JOHN'S CHAPEL, a chapelry, within the limits of the parish of STANHOPE, union of WEARDALE, N. W. division of DARLINGTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM, 7 miles (W. N. W.) from the village of Stanhope. This is a small thriving town, situated in the Vale of Wear, through which runs the river of that name; its chief support is derived from the neighbouring lead-mines, in which the population is employed. A customary market, on Saturday, has been established for more than a century; and there are cattle-fairs in spring and autumn: the market-cross was erected at the expense of the late Sir Ralph Milbank, Bart. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £186; patron, the Rector of Stanhope: there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe is valued at about £150 per annum. The chapel, a handsome structure, was rebuilt at the expense of the late Sir William Blackett, Bart., aided by a bequest of £50 from Dr. Hartwell, rector of Stanhope. Dr. Shute Barrington, late Bishop of Durham, erected another chapel, at Heathery-Cleugh, which is presented to by the rector; and, about the same time, two national schools, which he partly endowed. There are several places of worship for Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists in the vicinity. About a mile below West-gate, in the chapelry, the army of King Edward III. was encamped by the Wear, and the Scots on the opposite hill, when Sir James Douglas, in the dead of night, attacked the English camp, and is said to have killed the king's chaplain. Emerson, the celebrated mathematician, had a house in the neighbourhood of the town, where he occasionally resided.

WEARDLEY, a township, in the parish of HAREWOOD, Upper division of the wapentake of SKYRACK, W. riding of YORK, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Otley; containing 158 inhabitants. It comprises about 1080 acres of land, lying south of the river Wharfe: the village is on the road from Otley to Wetherby, and a mile west of Harewood.

WEARE (ST. GREGORY), a parish, in the union of AXBRIDGE, hundred of BEMPSTONE, E. division of SOMERSET, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Axbridge; containing 784 inhabitants. This place is situated on the river Axe, here crossed by an ancient bridge, and on the road between Bristol and Exeter, and comprises 2215 acres. The living is a vicarage, endowed with the rectorial tithes, valued in the king's books at £12. 1. $5\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the Dean and Chapter of Bristol: the tithes have been commuted for £378; there is a glebe-house, and the glebe contains 37 acres. There are places of worship for Baptists, Methodists, and Bryanites. That part of the parish termed Nether Weare enjoyed, among many other privileges granted by different monarchs, that of sending members to parliament in the 34th and 35th of Edward I., and had a market on Wednesday, with an annual fair.

WEAR-GIFFORD (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of TORRINGTON, hundred of SHEBBEAR, Great Torrington and N. divisions of DEVON, 3 miles (N. N. W.) from Great Torrington; containing 576 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1360 acres by admeasurement, and is situated on the river Torridge, which forms about two miles of the boundary line, and is navigable for coal-barges when the tide is up. Good building-stone is abundant; and there is a small woollen factory. The ancient manor-house, built by the Denzells in the 15th century, is a stone building, the hall of which is ceiled with oak richly carved, and the walls curiously plastered and ornamented with escutcheons of armorial-bearings; the mansion has lately been repaired, and the interior fitted up in the original style. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 5., and in the gift of Earl Fortescue: the tithes have been commuted for £175; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe consists of 8 acres of coppice, and 4 of arable land. The church contains the figures of a cross-legged knight and his lady, carved in stone, and now placed in an erect position against the wall, though formerly recumbent on an altar-tomb, and most probably the effigies of some of the Gifford family. There are two places of worship for Wesleyans; and 16 children are taught to read for £15 per annum, the bequest of John Lovering, in 1671.

WEARMOUTH, BISHOP (ST. MICHAEL), a parish, partly in the union of HOUGHTON-LE-SPRING, but chiefly in that of SUNDERLAND, N. division of EASINGTON ward and of the county of DURHAM, 11 miles (S. E.) from Newcastle; containing, with the chapelries of Ford and Ryhope, and the townships of Bishop-Wearmouth Pans, Burdon, Silksworth, and Tunstall, 27,092 inhabitants, of whom 24,206 are in Bishop-Wearmouth township. This place, which is on the south side of the river Wear, adjoining the town of Sunderland, appears to have derived the affix to its name, by which it is distinguished from Monk-Wearmouth, on the opposite side of the river, from its having belonged to the bishops of Durham, under whom the rector of the parish holds the lordship of the manor. The first notice of it occurs during the reign of Athelstan, who, on an expedition against Constantine, King of Scotland, about the year 930, visited the shrine of St. Cuthbert here, on which occasion he restored to the church the ancient possessions of which it had been unjustly deprived, granted to it additional lands, and confirmed to it all its ancient privileges. The township, from its advantageous position, the rapid increase of the coal trade, and the numerous manufactories in the vicinity, has greatly advanced in importance and prosperity, and is connected with the town of Sunderland by a spacious and well-formed street, rather more than a mile in length, from which several handsome and uniform streets branch off to the north and south, consisting of well-built houses, many of which are of elegant appearance. The streets are paved, and lighted with gas; the inhabitants are amply supplied with water, and very considerable improvements have been made under the provisions of an act of parliament for lighting and watching the town during the winter months. Hot and cold baths were established at Hendon in 1800; and in 1821 an establishment of hot, cold, vapour, and medicated baths, was erected in the parish, at the extremity of Sunderland Moor, with every requisite accommodation. There are also on the sands several bathing-machines in constant attendance.

The subscription library of Bishop-Wearmouth, for which a handsome building has been erected in the principal street, at an expense of £1300, by a proprietary of £10 shareholders, contains a collection of about 3000 volumes; and a select library belonging to the Wesleyans is supported. The Literary and Philosophical Institution, and the Society for promoting the study of Natural History, which has a valuable museum, hold their meetings in the Athenæum, a Grecian building, in Fawcett-street, erected in 1840, at an expense of £5000, by a proprietary of shareholders, and in which is also a newsroom. The Mechanics' Institute in Bridge-street was established in 1836, and attached to it is a good library, with a reading and newsroom. Among the many improvements that have taken place within the last fifty years, the most important is the construction of a cast-iron bridge across the Wear, connecting the town with Monk-Wearmouth; it was commenced 24th September, 1793, and completed in 1796, at a cost of £33,400, of which sum £30,000 were advanced by Rowland Burdon, Esq., M.P. for the county, to whom the origin of the undertaking is attributed. The bridge was erected under the superintendence of Mr. Thomas Wilson, of this place, and the iron-work was cast at the foundry at Masbrough, near Rotherham, in the county of York. The arch is 236 feet in span, and 100 feet in height from low-water mark, admitting vessels of considerable burthen to pass under it, without lowering more than their top-gallant masts; the whole weight of the arch is 260 tons, of which 46 are of malleable, and the remainder of cast iron, and the piers on which it rests are 42 feet in breadth at the base, 37 feet at the summit, and 24 in thickness.

The parish comprises 8880 acres, of which 3280 are in the township; the lands under cultivation are fertile; the surface is agreeably diversified with hill and dale, and the scenery in some parts is pleasingly picturesque. On the side of an eminence called Building Hill, is a quarry of fine limestone, which, on the division of the lands in 1694, was reserved for the use of the copyholders within the manor, on payment of one penny per load as compensation for surface damage; and from time immemorial the inhabitants have enjoyed the privilege of bleaching their linen on a piece of ground called the Burnfields, near the road leading to Durham. The LIVING is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £89. 18. 1½; and in the patronage of the Bishop of Durham, with a net income of £2899: the church, altered in 1807, mostly on the walls and foundation of the ancient structure, which had existed from the commencement of the 9th century, is a handsome edifice of freestone, with a square embattled tower, and contains 1100 sittings. A church dedicated to St. Thomas, was erected in John-street in 1829, at an expense of £5000, of which £1260 were raised by subscription, towards which £500 were contributed by Mrs. Woodcock, £200 by Bishop Barrington, £300 by the trustees of Lord Crewe's charity, £100 by the Rev. Dr. Gray, £150 by John Fawcett, Esq., and various smaller sums by different individuals; the remainder of the cost was defrayed by the Parliamentary Commissioners. The edifice, which is handsome, is of freestone, in the later English style, and contains 1000 sittings, of which 700 are free: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Rector of Bishop-Wearmouth; net income, £200. Churches have been erected likewise at Deptford, Ford, Ryhope, and Hylton-Ferry. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Primitive Methodists, Methodists of the New Connexion, Wesleyans, Scottish Burghers, Presbyterians in connexion with the Scottish Church, Unitarians, and the Society of Friends; also a Roman Catholic chapel, and a Jews' synagogue.

In Low-row is a national school, built by subscription, aided by grants from the trustees of Lord Crewe, the executors of Dr. Paley, and the late Bishop of Durham, at an expense of £500; the school is at present supported by the rector, and affords instruction to 200 boys and 200 girls. A British and Foreign school in Nicholson-street, and a school of industry for girls in Sans-street, are maintained by subscription; and there is an infirmary, now combined with a dispensary, for which an appropriate and handsome building was erected in 1822, at a cost of £3000. The Sunderland and Bishop-Wearmouth Maritime Institution was founded and endowed in 1820, by Mrs. Elizabeth Woodcock, for ten widows, or unmarried daughters, of master mariners, who have each an annuity of £10. Almshouses were built in Church-lane, and endowed under a bequest of Mrs. Jane Gibson in 1725, for twelve poor women, each of whom receives a half-yearly payment of £5. 9. 6., arising from funds purchased with the residue of the bequest, after paying the cost of the erection of the building. There are also almshouses on the Green, built by the Rev. John Bowes, rector of Bishop-Wearmouth, in 1712, for twelve persons, and endowed in 1725 with £100 by Mr. Thomas Ogle. In the vicinity is the Grange school, founded about the year 1820, by James Cowan, Esq., LL.D., in which are about 180 pupils under the care of 15 masters, and which has since its foundation been much distinguished as a classical, mathematical, and commercial academy.—See SUNDERLAND.

WEARMOUTH, MONK (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of SUNDERLAND, E. division of CHESTER ward, N. division of the county of DURHAM; containing, with the townships of Monk-Wearmouth-Shore, Fulwell, Hylton, and Southwick, 12,493 inhabitants, of whom 2155 are in Monk-Wearmouth township, ½ a mile (N.) from Sunderland. This place derives its name from its situation at the mouth of the river Wear, and the prefix from the foundation of a Benedictine monastery about the year 674, by Biscopius, a Saxon noble, who obtained from Egfrid, King of Northumbria, a grant of land on the north bank of the Wear, for the erection of the splendid abbey, which he dedicated to St. Peter. In the reign of Ethelred, the monastery was destroyed by the Danes, and though subsequently restored, the greater number of the monks, among whom was the Venerable Bede, remained in the abbey of Jarrow, erected by the same founder, into which they had retired; and a few only returned to Monk-Wearmouth, which afterwards became a cell to the monastery of St. Cuthbert, in the city of Durham, and remained as such till the Dissolution, when its revenue was returned at £26. 9. 9. Of the church, which was splendidly decorated with paintings, and relics brought by its founder from Rome, the nave and tower, with a few scattered details, only remain; and the conventual buildings, which, about the middle of the last century, occupied three sides of a spacious quadrangle, have entirely disappeared.

The TOWN is situated on the north bank of the Wear, opposite to Sunderland and Bishop-Wearmouth, with which it is connected by a beautiful iron bridge, and comprises two distinct portions, called the Upper and Lower, the former in the township of Monk-Wearmouth, and the latter in that of Monk-Wearmouth-Shore. The upper town consists of a long and spacious street, extending from east to west, parallel with which is a narrower street, both intersected by several streets of recent formation connecting it on the south with the lower town; on the west is the Sunderland and Newcastle turnpike-road. The lower town, which originally consisted of a few fishermen's huts, and, till within the last twenty years, of three narrow streets extending along the shore, has been greatly improved by the erection of some streets of handsome houses, under the more liberal leases granted by the proprietor, Sir Hedworth Williamson, Bart., and contains by far the greater portion of the population. Public baths have been erected by a company, and several commodious lodging-houses, with a good hotel for the reception of visitors, forming together a handsome terrace overlooking the sea. The principal manufactures carried on are those of rope, blocks, masts, chain-cables, and anchors, and other articles connected with ship and boat building, for which there are spacious yards; and there are various establishments requisite for the fitting out of vessels. The chief trade of the port is the exportation of coal and lime, procured in the collieries and lime-works in the parish, and sent to Aberdeen, Montrose, Arbroath, and other Scottish ports; of the former, about 30,000 chaldrons are annually shipped, and of the latter about 70,000, exclusively of 20,000 chaldrons consumed in the surrounding districts. Large quantities of blue, white, and brown earthenware, for which there are extensive potteries in the villages of Southwick and Hylton, are also shipped for France, Holland, and Germany. For the conveyance of the produce of the mines and potteries to the port, great facility is afforded by the river, which is navigable for vessels of light burthen for several miles. The Brandling Junction railway, likewise, from which is a branch leading to the docks, connects the towns of Sunderland, Bishop and Monk Wearmouth, South Shields, and Newcastle, and opens a communication with the Carlisle railway, and, southwards, with the Clarence, Durham Junction, Darlington and Stockton, and Great North of England railways. The docks, situated about 350 yards from the mouth of the river, comprise an outer basin about an acre and a half in extent, having an entrance from the river 120 feet in width, and surrounded on all sides with massive walls of freestone; this basin has, in ordinary tides, from 12 to 18 feet depth of water, and communicates, by a floodgate, 45 feet wide, with an inner dock to the north, which is six acres and a half in extent, and has an average depth of 16 feet, in which 100 vessels may lie in safety. These docks were commenced in 1835, and completed in 1837.

The parish comprises an area of 5196 acres, of which 547*a.* 2*r.* 24*p.* are in the township of Monk-Wearmouth, and 250 acres in Monk-Wearmouth-Shore; the surface is almost uniformly level, and from the small proportion of woodland and plantations, the scenery is but little varied, and has few interesting features. The lands are well cultivated, and produce favourable crops; the soil in the west and south-west parts is a strong clay, and in the eastern portion an argillaceous loam, resting on a substratum of magnesian limestone, which prevails throughout the neighbourhood. About half a mile to the west of the town is one of the deepest and most scientifically constructed coal-mines in the kingdom, belonging to Messrs. Pemberton and Company, and affording a striking example of enterprise and unwearied perseverance. The shaft, which is of cylindrical form, 12 feet in diameter, and 264 fathoms in depth, was commenced in 1826, and completed in 1836; and in order, by proper ventilation, to guard against the numerous accidents, a second shaft has been sunk, partly perpendicular, and partly diverging in a diagonal line to the seam of coal. To the north-west of the town are the extensive lime quarries and kilns of Fulwell, wrought by Sir Hedworth Williamson, at which about 9000 chaldrons of lime are annually produced, and conveyed by an iron railway to the staiths on the river. The LIVING is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of Sir H. Williamson: the tithes have been commuted for £215. 16. 6. The church, originally that of the monastery, retains but little of its ancient splendour: the tower, of Norman character, supported on four massive circular arches, the nave, and the north aisle, are alone remaining, the rest having long since been destroyed; the interior has undergone many alterations and repairs, and is chiefly modern. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists, members of the Church of Scotland, and Seceders; also a school supported by the Wesleyan congregation, and a school for girls under the patronage of Lady Williamson, built in 1832, partly by subscription, and partly by the profits of a bazaar.—See SUNDERLAND.

WEARMOUTH-PANS, BISHOP, a township, in the parish of BISHOP-WEARMOUTH, borough and union of SUNDERLAND, N. division of EASINGTON ward and of the county of DURHAM; containing 298 inhabitants.

WEARMOUTH-SHORE, MONK, a township, on the northern bank of the river Wear, adjoining the town of Sunderland, in the parish of MONK-WEARMOUTH, union of SUNDERLAND, E. division of CHESTER ward, N. division of the county of DURHAM; containing 7742 inhabitants. This place owes its origin to extensive yards for ship-building, constructed during the late continental war, and to the increased commerce of the port of Sunderland.

WEARNE, a hamlet, in the parish of HUISH-EPISCOPI, union of LANGPORT, E. division of the hundred of KINGSBURY, W. division of SOMERSET; containing 232 inhabitants.

WEASENHAM (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of MITFORD and LAUNDITCH, hundred of LAUNDITCH, W. division of NORFOLK, 1 mile (E. by N.) from Rougham; containing 363 inhabitants. It comprises 1988*a.* 2*r.* 1*p.*, of which 1578 acres are arable, 226 pasture and meadow, and 140 woodland. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Weasenham St. Peter annexed, valued in the king's books at £15. 10., and in the patronage of the Crown; impropiator, the Earl of Leicester. Certain vicarial tithes were commuted for land in 1806: the great tithes have been recently commuted for a rent-charge of £350, and the vicarial for £225; the glebe contains 18 $\frac{3}{4}$ acres. The church is chiefly in the later English style; the tower fell down about the year 1665, when the church was shortened at the west end; the south porch, which was exceedingly handsome, has been raised, and now forms the belfry. The commons of this parish, and of that of Weasenham St. Peter, were inclosed in 1806, when 40 acres were allotted to the poor of both places, for fuel. Sir John de Wesenham, in the reign of Edward III., was the king's butler.

WEASENHAM (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of MITFORD and LAUNDITCH, hundred of LAUNDITCH, W. division of NORFOLK, 2 miles (E. N. E.) from Rougham; containing 310 inhabitants. It comprises 1423*a.* 1*r.* 32*p.*, of which 1074 acres are arable, 200 pasture and meadow, and 71 heath. The living is a discharged vicarage, annexed to that of Weasenham All Saints: certain vicarial tithes were commuted for land in 1806; the impropriate tithes have been just commuted for £222, and the vicarial for £150, and the glebe contains about 19 acres, with a good house. The church is chiefly in the decorated and later English styles, with a square tower; the font is handsome, and on the south side of the chancel is a piscina.

WEATHERSFIELD.—See WETHERSFIELD.

WEAVERHAM (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of NORTHWICH, Second division of the hundred of EDISBURY, S. division of the county of CHESTER; containing 2596 inhabitants, of whom 834 are in the township of Weaverham cum Milton, and 580 in the lordship of Weaverham, 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Northwich. The parish comprises 7000 acres, and includes the townships of Acton, Crowton, Cuddington, Onston, and Wallerscoat. The road from Manchester to Chester runs along the southern and eastern boundary, and the river Weaver on the north; and the Grand Junction railway passes through the parish for about three miles, nearly from the Hartford station to the Great Dutton viaduct over the valley of the Weaver. There are pig-fairs in spring and autumn. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12. 11. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the appropriator, the Bishop of Chester: the great tithes have been commuted for £400, and the vicarial for £340; there is a glebe-house, and the glebe contains 30 acres. The church was erected in the reign of Elizabeth. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists; also a free school, endowed by Mr. William Barker. The interest of £100, left by Mary Barker, is applied to apprenticing children; and here is a charity for six decayed housekeepers selected by the vicar.

WEAVERTHORPE (All Saints), a parish, in the union of DRIFFIELD, wapentake of BUCKROSE, E. riding of YORK; containing, with Lutton township, 952 inhabitants, of whom 547 are in the township of Weaverthorpe, 5 miles (N. N. E.) from Sledmere. The parish comprises 3000 acres, of which about 200 are pasture and woodland; it belongs to several proprietors, of whom Sir Tatton Sykes is the principal and the lord of the manor. The village is well built, and pleasantly seated in a valley of the wolds. The living is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of York (the appropriators), valued in the king's books at £9. 6. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £168: the tithes were commuted for land in 1801. The church stands on the brow of a hill, and has a lofty tower of Norman architecture. At West Lutton is a chapel of ease. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists; and a school is supported by Sir Tatton Sykes and the Hon. M. Langley.

WEBDEN, a hamlet, in the parish of TIDENHAM, union of CHEPSTOW, hundred of WESTBURY, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER; containing 176 inhabitants.

WEBHEATH-YIELDS, a township, in the parish of TARDEBIGG, union of BROMSGROVE, Upper division of the hundred of HALFSHIRE, Droitwich and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER; containing 792 inhabitants, and comprising 2024 acres.

WEDDINGTON (St. James), a parish, in the union of NUNEATON, Atherstone division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, N. division of the county of WARWICK, 1 $\frac{1}{4}$ mile (N.) from Nuneaton; containing 77 inhabitants. It is bounded on the east by the Watling-street, and comprises 919 acres, whereof 90 are woodland; the soil is in general marly. The river Anker runs through the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 10. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$.: the tithes have been commuted for £176. 19.; there is a glebe-house, and the glebe contains 45 acres. The church, built about the year 1736, is a brick edifice with a tower, and contains 90 sittings, of which 20 are free.

WEDGWOOD, a township, in the parish of WOLSTANTON, union of WOLSTANTON and BURSLEM, N. division of the hundred of PIREHILL and of the county of STAFFORD, 3 miles (N. E.) from Burslem; containing 132 inhabitants. This place, which comprises 431 acres of arable land, is supposed to have been originally the residence of the ancestors of the Wedgwood family, of whom several have been eminent for their improvements in the earthenware and porcelain manufacture.

WEDHAMPTON, a tything, in the parish of URCHFON, union of DEVIZES, hundred of SWANBOROUGH, Devizes and N. divisions of WILTS, 3 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from East Lavington; containing 237 inhabitants.

WEDMORE (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of AXBRIDGE, hundred of BEMPSTONE, E. division of SOMERSET, 6 miles (S. by E.) from Axbridge, and 8 (W. by N.) from Wells; containing 3995 inhabitants. This place, originally called Wet-moor, was the residence of the West Saxon monarchs. Few districts have undergone such rapid and extensive improvement, since, within memory, the immediate neighbourhood was usually under water nine months in the year. The parish comprises 10,000 acres of rich pasture, and the situation of the village is extremely pleasant, being considerably elevated above the adjacent level, which from the drainage effected during the last half century, has been rendered valuable land: there are some quarries of building-stone. Two sheep and cattle fairs are held, one in July, on the first Monday after St. James's-day, and the other on the last Monday in September. The ancient borough of Wedmore, by which distinction a part of the parish is still known, is under the superintendence of a portreeve, chosen annually at the manorial court, with water-bailiffs, constables, and other officers. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Wells (the appropriators), valued in the king's books at £20. 8. 6½; the appropriate tithes have been commuted for £340, the vicarial for £210, and the impropriate for £30; there are 63 acres of glebe. The church contains accommodation for 700 persons, and is a handsome cruciform edifice in the later English style, with a stately tower at the intersection; on each side of the chancel is a chapel, and annexed to the south aisle is another of smaller dimensions. Over the porch is a library, the gift of the Rev. Mr. Andrews, a former vicar. Blackford Chapel, erected in 1824, contains 320 sittings; and a chapel built in 1828 at Theale, 349 sittings. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans.

WEDNESBURY, or WODENSBURY (St. Bartholomew), a market-town and parish, in the union of WEST BROMWICH, S. division of the hundred of OFFLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, 19 miles (S. S. E.) from Stafford, and 117 (N. W.) from London; containing 11,625 inhabitants. This place, denominated by the Saxons Weadesbury, and now commonly called Wedgebury, was fortified in 916, against the Danes, by Ethelfleda, daughter of Alfred the Great: at the Conquest it was held in royal demesne. The shops are lighted with gas from the extensive works at West Bromwich, three miles distant. The trade consists principally in the manufacture of articles of iron, both cast and wrought, such as screws, hinges, gun-locks, gun-barrels, coach-ironmongery, agricultural implements, apparatus for gas-lights, &c., many of which are prepared for exportation. In the vicinity are numerous mines, yielding a superior kind of coal, which, from its great heat, is admirably adapted for the forges; and a species of iron is here manufactured, termed Damascus iron, of which the best gun-barrels are made; it passes through several processes, and when finished throws up a beautiful figure on the surface of the barrel by some chymical application. The works of Messrs. James Russell and Sons, where wrought-iron gas-tubes, patent machinery, and other articles are manufactured, employ 200 hands. On a small rivulet near the place are an extensive manufactory for edge-tools, and some corn-mills. A branch of the Walsall and Birmingham canal extends to the western extremity of the town; and about a mile from it is the Bescot-bridge station of the Grand Junction railway, which passes through the parish. The market is on Friday; and fairs take place on May 6th and August 3rd, for cattle. The town is governed by a constable chosen at the manorial court held here in October; and a court of requests occurs occasionally, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5. The parish comprises by admeasurement 2096 acres, of which between 300 and 400 are broken up by pits. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 3. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £301; impropiators, Sir E. D. Scott, Bart., and E. T. Foley, Esq. The church, occupying an elevated site, supposed to be that of the ancient castle, and commanding a beautiful prospect, is a fine structure, principally in the later English style, with an octagonal east end, and contains some old wooden seats, and monuments to several families of eminence; it has undergone complete repair, at an expense of £5600, towards which the Incorporated Society gave £500; the organ cost £500, and was the gift of Benjamin Wright, Esq., of Birmingham. Two church districts, named St. James' and St. John's, were formed in 1844, and endowed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Divine service is also performed in a licensed school-room, erected by subscription, in 1837. There are places of worship for Independents, Primitive Methodists, and Wesleyans. William, the first lord Paget, secretary of state to Henry VIII., was a native of the town.

WEDNESFIELD, a township, in the parish and union of WOLVERHAMPTON, S. division of the hundred of OFFLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, 2 miles (N. E. by E.) from Wolverhampton; containing 3168 inhabitants. Edward the Elder, in 911, here defeated the Danes, when two of their kings, two earls, and nine other chiefs, were slain; and there were formerly two barrows on the supposed site of the battle, one of which has been levelled. The township comprises 3326a. 3r. 11p. Coal and iron-stone are plentiful, and three or four mines are at present in operation: locks and keys, and other articles in iron, among which are chain-cables, are manufactured here, the latter branch recently established. The Essington and Wyrley canal, and the Grand Junction railway, run through the township, the Wolverhampton station of the latter being within its limits, and a hotel has lately been built by John Gough, Esq. A pleasure-fair is held on the Monday nearest to the 25th of June. There is a living, which is a perpetual curacy, in the gift of Mr. Gough, with a net income of £136: the tithes have been commuted for £1011. 16. 6., payable to the Duke of Cleveland. The chapel, dedicated to St. Thomas, is a plain brick building, erected in 1750, and enlarged in 1843, to accommodate 885 persons, at the cost of the patron and parishioners, assisted by grants from the Diocesan and Incorporated Societies. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Lady Huntingdon's Connexion.

WEEDON, a hamlet, in the parish of HARDWICKE, union of AYLESBURY, hundred of COTTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM, 2¾ miles (N.) from Aylesbury; containing 428 inhabitants.

WEEDON, or WEEDON-BEC (St. Peter and St. Paul), a parish, in the union of DAVENTRY, hundred of FAWSLEY, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 4 miles (S. E. by E.) from Daventry; containing 2195 inhabitants. This place is supposed by Camden and other antiquaries to have been the Benecenta of the Romans, but that station is now generally referred to Borough Hill, near Daventry. Wulfhere, the first Christian king of Mercia, had a palace here, which, after his death, was converted by his daughter Werburgh into a nunnery, of which she became abbess, and which was destroyed by the Danes in the ninth century. William the Conqueror made a religious establishment at this place a cell or alien priory to the abbey of Bec, in Normandy, whence Weedon is said to have derived the affix to its name. The parish comprises 2000 acres by admeasurement, and is watered by the river Nene, which takes its rise a few miles distant: the village, pleasantly situated in a valley, is divided into Upper and Lower Weedon, of which the latter is partly on the Holyhead road, at its junction with the road from Northampton to Daventry. The London and Birmingham railway passes through the parish, where is a tunnel 418 yards in length; and a first-class station has been established here. Shoes are extensively manufactured, for the sale-shops in London, and for exportation, especially to the West Indies; and many young females are engaged in making lace. Above the village is the royal military depôt, one of the most magnificent establishments of the kind in Europe, consisting of a handsome centre with two detached wings forming the residence of the governor and of the principal officers, and, on the summit of the hill, barracks for 500 men, where troops are always stationed. At the bottom of the lawn, to the south of the governor's house, are eight storehouses and four magazines, capable of containing 240,000 stand of small arms, exclusively of a proportionate quantity of artillery and ammunition. Between the two ranges of building is a cut communicating with the Grand Junction canal, and affording a facility of conveyance for stores to any part of the kingdom; attached to the buildings are shops for artificers of every kind connected with the establishment, and an hospital, with accommodation for forty patients. Courts leet are held occasionally, and a court baron annually; and near Dodford Mill is a spot called Gallows Furlong, where criminals were anciently executed. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11; net income, £180; patron and impropiator, T. R. Thornton, Esq. The tithes, under certain conditions, were commuted for land in 1776; and there are 18 acres of glebe. The church was, with the exception of the tower, taken down and rebuilt in 1825, under the superintendence of the Rev. Mr. Hunt, the incumbent: the parsonage-house occupies the site of the ancient palace of Wulfhere. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans; and a school endowed with about £100 per annum. The Roman Watling-street passes through the parish.

WEEDON-LOYS (St. Peter and St. Mary), a parish, in the union of TOWCESTER, hundred of GREENS-NORTON, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Towcester; containing, with the hamlets of Milthorpe and Weston, 501 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 17. 6.; net income, £462; patrons and impropiators, the Provost and Fellows of King's College, Cambridge. In the neighbourhood is a mineral spring called St. Loy's, or St. Lewis's well.

WEEFORD (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of LICHFIELD, S. division of the hundred of OFFLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, 4 miles (S. S. E.) from Lichfield; containing, with the hamlets of Packington and Swinfen, 426 inhabitants, of whom 276 are in the township of Weeford. This place is supposed to have taken its name from a ford on the line of the Roman Watling-street, called Wayford. Within the parish is the lowe termed Offlow, which gives name to the hundred. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £63; patron, the Bishop of Lichfield; appropriator, the Prebendary of Alrewas and Weeford in the Cathedral.

WEEK (St. Mary), a parish, in the union and hundred of STRATTON, E. division of CORNWALL, 6 miles (S.) from Stratton; containing 788 inhabitants. This place, which appears to have been formerly of more importance than it is at present, is in old records denominated a borough, and the occupiers of certain fields are still called Burgage-holders. The parish is situated on the road from Launceston to Stratton, and comprises 5600 acres, of which 216 are common or waste: stone is quarried for building and for the repair of roads. The surface is undulated, and some of the higher grounds command pleasing views of the surrounding scenery, which is finely varied. Fairs for bullocks and sheep are held on the 29th of July, 15th of September, and the Wednesday before Christmas-day. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £17, and in the gift of Sydney-Sussex College, Cambridge: the tithes have been commuted for £450, and the glebe comprises 84 acres, with a house. The church, situated on elevated ground, is an ancient building with a stately tower. The Wesleyans have a place of worship. A chantry, with a free school, was founded and endowed in the time of Henry VIII., by Dame Thomasine Percival, but was suppressed in the reign of Edward VI.; some portions of the building may be traced, and the well is still remaining. Adjoining the churchyard is the site of an old fortress called Castle Hill.

WEEK, a hamlet, in the parish of SOUTH BRENT, union of AXBRIDGE, hundred of BRENT with WRINGTON, E. division of SOMERSET; containing 72 inhabitants.

WEEK, a tything, partly in the parish of DRAYTON, but chiefly in that of CURRY-RIVELL, union of LANGPORT, hundred of ABDICK and BULSTONE, W. division of SOMERSET; containing 60 inhabitants.

WEEK, or WICK, a tything, in the parish of St. Cuthbert, without the limits of the city of WELLS, union of WELLS, hundred of WELLS-FORUM, E. division of SOMERSET; containing 93 inhabitants.

WEEK, a hamlet, in the parish of Stogursey, union of WILLITON, hundred of CANNINGTON, W. division of the county of SOMERSET; containing 28 inhabitants.

WEEK (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of New Winchester, hundred of Buddlesgate, Kingsclere and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; adjoining the city of Winchester (N. W. by W.), and containing 341 inhabitants. On the boundary of this parish formerly stood the church of St. Anastasia; and another, dedicated to St. Mary, is supposed to have existed in 1300, at Fullfood, in the parish, to which the present church was a chapel. The seal of Ælfric, Earl of Mercia in the tenth century, notorious for his treacheries, was found a few years since in a field, and presented to the British Museum. The parish, which comprises 1000 acres by computation, is traversed by the road from Winchester to Stockbridge, and the Winchester station of the South-Western railroad is situated within it. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 19. 2., and in the gift of the Bishop: the tithes have been commuted for £250, and the glebe comprises one acre. Part of the parish is bounded by the old castle walls of Winchester; the ancient fosse which surrounded the western walls of the city has been filled up, and thirteen houses erected on the site, within this parish. The union workhouse is situated here. In the field opposite the site of the church of St. Anastasia, are some remains of intrenchments thrown up by the royal army, under Lord Hopton, previously to the fatal battle of Cheriton.

WEEK, a tything, in the parish of Bourne, union of Whitchurch, hundred of Evingar, Kingsclere and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 88 inhabitants.

WEEKE-CHAMPFLOWER, county of SOMERSET.—See WYKE-CHAMPFLOWER.

WEEKLEY (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of KETTERING, hundred of CORBY, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. E. by N.) from Kettering; containing 271 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Kettering to Stamford, and comprises 1560*a.* 2*r.* 23*p.*, of which about 264 acres are woodland, and the rest arable and pasture; the soil is marked by several varieties, consisting in some parts of light earth, and in others of clayey admixtures. Boughton House, here, the seat of the Duke of Buccleuch, is a very large ancient mansion in the Elizabethan style, with ceilings splendidly painted, and containing many original portraits of celebrated characters of the reigns of Elizabeth, James I., &c., and other valuable paintings. In the park are some noble cedars, limes, and chesnuts, and fine old elms, disposed in avenues several miles in length, giving to the scenery of this part of the country its distinguishing features. Limestone is found in the parish, and is used for building and the repair of roads. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 0. 5.; net income, £94; patron, the Duke. The tithes were commuted for land in 1807; there is a glebe-house, and the glebe contains 70 acres. The church is in the English style, with a spire, and the interior, which is very neatly furnished, contains monuments to the Montagu family, among which is one to Edward Montagu, Knt., chief justice of the king's bench, who died in 1555. A school is endowed with land producing £17 per annum; and near the south side of the church, is an hospital for seven poor men and two widows, founded and endowed with property in land, of the value of £130 per annum, by Sir Edward Montagu. The remains of Weekley Hall, now converted into cottages, are encompassed by a moat.

WEEL, a township, in the parish of St. JOHN, BEVERLEY, union, and liberties of the borough, of BEVERLEY, E. riding of YORK, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Beverley; containing 133 inhabitants. This township, called in Domesday book Wela, comprises 1075 acres of land, of which a portion was inclosed in 1785, under an act then passed. The abbey of Meux anciently held some property here.

WEELEY (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union and hundred of TENDRING, N. division of ESSEX, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Manningtree; containing 580 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2051 acres, of which 30 are common or waste land; the situation is pleasant, and the soil fertile. Here were formerly extensive barracks. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £12, and in the gift of the Bishop of London: the tithes have been commuted for £578, and the glebe contains 7 acres. The church has an embattled tower built of remarkably large bricks. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a national school has an endowment of £9. 4.

WEELSBY, a hamlet, in the parish of CLEE, union of CAISTOR, wapentake of BRADLEY-HAVERSTOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN; comprising about 1000 acres, and containing 61 inhabitants. This place, which is said to have once contained a village, is included within the limits of the parliamentary borough of Great Grimsby, and is chiefly distinguished as the residence of Richard Thorold, Esq., whose handsome seat, Weelsby House, is situated a short distance south-east of the town of Grimsby.

WEETHLEY (St. James), a parish, in the union of ALCESTER, Alcester division of the hundred of BARCHINWAY, S. division of the county of WARWICK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Alcester; containing 57 inhabitants, and comprising about 583 acres. The living is annexed to the rectory of Kinwarton: the tithes have been commuted for £100.

WEETING, a parish, in the union of THETFORD, hundred of GRIMSHOE, W. division of NORFOLK, 2 miles (N.) from Brandon-Ferry; containing 303 inhabitants. The parish is on the road from London to Lynn, through Brandon, and is bounded on the south by the Lesser Ouse, which separates the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk. Weeting Hall is a beautiful residence, in the park belonging to which are situated the church of All Saints, and the ruins of St. Mary's; the parish contains about 1500 acres of plantation, well stocked with game, and in the Broomhall estate is a fine sheet of water called the Mere, abounding in wild-fowl and fish. A fair for cattle is held at Broomhall, in July. The living comprises the united rectories of All Saints and St. Mary, valued jointly in the king's books at £18. 9. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £470; patrons, the Master and Fellows of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge; the glebe contains 140 acres. There are slight remains of an Augustine priory founded at Broomhall about the time of King John, and granted, by a bull of Clement VII., in May, 1528, to Cardinal Wolsey. Within the park are the ruins of a moated castle; and about two miles on the north-east are "Grimes Graves," with a mound or keep on the east side, the whole covering a space of about fourteen acres. To the south is a dyke called the Devil's ditch; and about half a mile to the eastward of it are the remains of Weeting cross, much resorted to by pilgrims in former times, when visiting the shrine of Our Lady of Walsingham.

WEETON, a township, in the parish of KIRKHAM, union of the FYLDE, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Kirkham; containing 545 inhabitants. It comprises 2824 acres, of which 64 are common or waste land. A fair for cattle and pedlery is held on Trinity-Monday and following day. The tithes have been commuted for £449. 13. 3., of which £386 are payable to the Dean and Chapter of Christ-Church, Oxford, and £51. 19. 11. to the vicar.

WEETON, a township, in the parish of HAREWOOD, Upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, W. riding of YORK, 6 miles (E. N. E.) from Otley; containing 385 inhabitants. It is situated on the north side of the Wharfe, and comprises about 1250 acres: the village is a short distance from the river. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WEETSLEET, or WEETSTED, a township, in the parish of LONG BENTON, union of TYNEMOUTH, E. division of CASTLE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 6 miles (N. by E.) from Newcastle; containing 1003 inhabitants. This township, the most northerly in the parish, comprises 2229*a.* 2*r.* 7*p.*, and is intersected by the great north road from Newcastle to Morpeth. A large colliery was opened at Seaton-Burn, within its limits, by Lord Ravensworth and partners, in 1841-2; and at Wideopen are some extensive quarries of stone. The tithes of corn and hay have been commuted for £365. 11., and those payable to the vicar for £25.— See SEATON-BURN.

WEETWOOD, a township, in the parish of CHATTON, union of GLENDALE, E. division of GLENDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 2 miles (N. E.) from Wooler. It lies to the east of the road between Wooler and Berwick, and upon the north bank of the Till, at a short distance south from Horton Castle, and is delightfully situated. A fair is held at Weetwood bank on Whit-Tuesday, when there are very large shows of cattle, horses, and sheep: servants, also, are hired at this fair.

WEEVER, a township, in the parish of MIDDLEWICH, union, and First division of the hundred, of EDDISBURY, S. division of the county of CHESTER, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Middlewich; containing 191 inhabitants.

WEIGHTON, LITTLE, a hamlet, in the parish of ROWLEY, union of BEVERLEY, Hunsley-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of YORK; containing 198 inhabitants. It lies detached from any high road, and consists chiefly of a long sequestered valley, at the extremity of which is a small village of the same name. The Wesleyans have a place of worship.

WEIGHTON, MARKET (ALL SAINTS), a market-town and parish, in the union of POCKLINGTON, Holme-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of YORK; containing, with Shipton chapelry, 2269 inhabitants, of whom 1947 are in the town, 19 miles (E. S. E.) from York, and 190 (N. by W.) from London. This town, which is situated at the western foot of the wolds, on the river Foulness, and on the road from York to Hull, from which places it is equidistant, is progressively improving, its trade having been considerably increased by the construction of a canal to the Humber. The surface of the parish is undulated, the scenery picturesque, and the soil partly chalk and partly clay. The market is on Wednesday; and fairs are held on May 14th and Sept. 25th, for horses, cattle, and sheep. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 13. 9.; patron and appropriator, the Prebendary of Weighton in the Cathedral of York; net income, £176. The great tithes, and the small tithes of the new inclosures, for the manor of Market-Weighton with Shipton, were commuted for land in 1773, under an inclosure act. The church is an ancient edifice, with a square tower, and stands in the centre of the town. There are places of worship for Independents, Primitive Methodists, and Wesleyans; and a national school built in 1842, at a cost of £600. At Shipton, also, are places of worship for dissenters, and a small school endowed with £8 per annum. Near the town are some tumuli, which have been found to contain human bones, and the remains of ancient armour, supposed to be Danish. Professor Airey, of the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, was born here.

WELBECK, an extra-parochial liberty, in the Hatfield division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Worksop; containing 86 inhabitants, and consisting of 2284 acres. An abbey for Præmonstratensian canons, in honour of St. James, was founded here in 1153, by Thomas le Flemangh, and at the Dissolution had a revenue of £298. 4. 8.

WELBORNE (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union and hundred of FOREHOE, E. division of NORFOLK, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. S. E.) from East Dereham; containing 234 inhabitants, and comprising about 738 acres. The living is a discharged rectory, annexed to that of Yaxham, and valued in the king's books at £5. 18. 4.: the tithes have been commuted for £225; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises $44\frac{3}{4}$ acres. The church is in the early and decorated English styles, with a circular tower.

WELBOURN (ST. CHAD), a parish, in the union of SLEAFORD, Higher division of the wapentake of BOOTHBY-GRAFFO, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Sleaford; containing 512 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £19. 16. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Countess of Buckinghamshire; net income, £493. The tithes were commuted for land in 1780. The church exhibits fine specimens of the early, decorated, and later English styles, and the tower is of very ancient date.

WELBURN, a township, in the parish and wapentake of BULMER, union of MALTON, N. riding of YORK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N.) from Whitwell; containing 502 inhabitants. This place comprises 825 acres, of which 426 are pasture, 317 arable, and 83 woodland: the road from York to Scarborough passes through. Here is a productive limestone-quarry, rented of the Earl of Carlisle, which supplies lime to the neighbourhood for several miles round. A handsome and spacious school, in which divine service is performed every Sunday evening, was built, and is partly supported by the earl. There are places of worship for dissenters.

WELBURN, a township, in the parish of KIRKDALE, union of HELMSLEY, wapentake of RYEDALE, N. riding of York, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Helmsley; containing 131 inhabitants. It comprises about 1100 acres of land. The village is picturesquely situated in the vale of Kirkdale; and about a mile north of it, in this township, stands Kirkdale church, embosomed in woods. John Stockton, in 1839, left £5 per annum for the instruction of children.

WELBURY (ST. LEONARD), a parish, in the union of NORTH-ALLERTON, wapentake of BIRDFORTH, N. riding of YORK, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from North-Allerton; containing 266 inhabitants. The parish comprises an area of 2350 acres, of which the greater portion is the property of the Earl of Harewood, who is lord of the manor; the surface is pleasingly undulated, and the higher grounds command fine views of the Cleveland hills and of the adjacent country. The substratum is a strong clay, of good quality for bricks and tiles, although there is at present but one kiln, employed in the manufacture of the latter. The Wisk, which is here a small stream, flows round a portion of the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 2. 11., and in the patronage of the Lord Chancellor: the tithes have been commuted for £320, and the glebe comprises 63 acres. The church, which was rebuilt about the year 1815, is a small neat edifice, containing 100 sittings. A school is supported by the rector, the Rev. F. Lipscomb.

WELBY, a chapelry, in the parish and union of MELTON-MOWBRAY, hundred of FRAMLAND, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Melton-Mowbray; containing 58 inhabitants. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £90.

WELBY (St. Bartholomew), a parish, in the union of GRANTHAM, wapentake of WINNIBRIGGS and THREE, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, 5 miles (E. by N.) from Grantham; containing 475 inhabitants, and comprising 2491a. 3r. 38p. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 6. 3.; net income, £350; patron, the Prebendary of South Grantham in the Cathedral of Salisbury. The tithes were commuted for land in 1776; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 440 acres. The church, a handsome edifice erected towards the close of the 15th century, is ornamented with a spire supposed to be of much more ancient date. A school established and endowed in 1780, by William Welby, Esq., has also £15 per annum left by a late rector, the Rev. W. Dodwell, and a yearly donation of £11 from the lord of the manor. There are four almshouses for aged women, founded at the same time.

WELCHES-DAM, an extra-parochial liberty, in the union of NORTH WITCHFORD, hundred of SOUTH WITCHFORD, ISLE of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE; containing 187 inhabitants.

WELDON, GREAT (St. Mary), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union of OUNDLE, hundred of CORBY, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 9 miles (N. E. by N.) from Kettering; containing 812 inhabitants, of whom 473 are in the hamlet of Little Weldon. This parish, which comprises 3780a. 1r. 39p., contains some very old freestone quarries. Fairs are held on the first Thursdays in February, May, and November. The market-house, erected at the expense of Viscount Hatton, over which were the sessions-chambers, supported by pillars of the Tuscan order, was pulled down some years since. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8.; net income, £209; patron, the Earl of Winchelsea. There is a place of worship for Independents. In an inclosure called Chapel field, the pavements of a Roman villa, forming a double square, measuring 100 feet by 50, with the foundations of a stone wall, and a great number of coins, were discovered in 1738: higher up the hill are the remains of an ancient town.

WELFORD (St. Gregory), a parish, in the union of NEWBURY, partly in the hundred of KINTBURY-EAGLE, but chiefly in that of FAIRCROSS, county of BERKS, 4 miles (N. W.) from Newbury; containing, with the tythings of Easton, Hoe-Benham, and Weston, and the chapelry of Wickham, 1099 inhabitants, of whom 130 are in Welford tything. The parish comprises 4958a. 1r. 28p., of which about 3504 acres are arable, 737 meadow and pasture, 661 woodland, and 54 waste and roads. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £35. 15. 5., and in the patronage of the Rev. W. Nicholson: the tithes have been commuted for £1353, and the glebe comprises 189½ acres. The church is principally in the decorated English style, with a tower of which the lower part is circular, and the upper square, surmounted by a spire. At the time of the Norman survey, there was a church in the hamlet of Weston.

WELFORD (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of LUTTERWORTH, hundred of GUILSBOROUGH, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $8\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Harborough; containing 1074 inhabitants. The Grand Union canal passes through the parish, which consists of 2931½ acres. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Sibbertoft united, valued in the king's books at £8; net income of Welford, £244, and of Sibbertoft, £462; patron and appropriator, the Bishop of Oxford. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. The premises of the free school were purchased out of funds arising from the church and poor's lands; the annual income is £24. 10.

WELFORD (Holy Trinity), a parish, in the union of STRATFORD-UPON-AVON, partly in the Stratford division of the hundred of BARLICHWAY, S. division of the county of WARWICK, but chiefly in the Upper division of the hundred of DEERHURST, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Stratford; containing, with the hamlet of Brickmarsh, 738 inhabitants, of whom 608 are in the township of Welford. The parish is situated on the river Avon, and comprises 2948a. 16p. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £29. 15. 10., and in the patronage of the Countess Amherst; net income, £442. The tithes were commuted for land and annual money payments, under an inclosure act, in the 39th and 40th of George III.; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 107 acres. The church is principally in the Norman style, with a lofty tower crowned by pinnacles. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WELHAM (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of MARKET-HARBOROUGH, hundred of GARTREE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Harborough; containing 66 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 3. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £98; impropriators, Proprietors of land. Richard Bryan, in 1803, bequeathed £8. 7. 10. to be distributed in bread to the poor; and the rent of a portion of land is applied to the repair of the church.

WELL (St. Margaret), a parish, in the union of SPILSBY, Wold division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Alford; containing 88 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with the vicarage of Claxby united, and in the gift of Bateman Dashwood, Esq.: the tithes of Well, with those of the hamlet of Dexthorpe, and part of Claxby, have been commuted for £408. 16.; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 24½ acres. The church has been rebuilt in the form of an elegant Grecian temple. Near this place, in 1725, two urns, containing 600 Roman coins, were found; and in the neighbourhood are three Celtic barrows, contiguous to each other.

WELL (St. James), a parish, in the union of BEDALE, wapentake of HANG-EAST, N. riding of YORK; containing, with Snape township, 1090 inhabitants, of whom 361 are in the township of Well, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Bedale. This place derives its name from a celebrated well dedicated to St. Michael, which, at all times of the year, is supplied with water by a spring issuing from the middle of the road between Well and Masham. An hospital in honour of St. Michael the Archangel, for a master, two priests, and 24 poor brethren and sisters, was founded here in 1342, by Sir Ralph de Neville, lord of Middleham, and at the Dissolution had a revenue of £42. 12. 3.; it now contains 16 rooms, eight for men and eight for women, the maintenance of whom amounts to about £190 per annum. The parish comprises 6811 acres, of which 250 are woodland, and of the remainder about two-thirds are arable, and one-third grass: limestone is wrought for agricultural purposes; and wool-combing to some extent is carried on. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 13. 7.; net income, £120; patron and impropiator, Charles Chaplin, Esq. The church contains several monuments of the lords of Snape. Thomas Earl of Exeter, in 1605, established a charity called Neville's workhouse, which was converted into schools in 1788, two of which are at Well and two at Snape, one for each sex, supported from the funds, which amount to about £100 per annum.

WELL-HAUGH, a township, in the parish of FALSTONE, union of BELLINGHAM, N. W. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 12 $\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Bellingham; containing 338 inhabitants. It is situated principally on the south side of the North Tyne, and contains the hamlets of Rigg-End, Stanners-burn, and Yarrow. The village is seated near the bank of the river.

WELLAND (St. JAMES), a parish, in the union of UPTON-UPON-SEVERN, Lower division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, Upton and W. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 3 miles (W. by S.) from Upton; containing 489 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2112 acres, of which 1000 are common or waste. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 2. 11., and has a net income of £378; the patronage and impropriation belong to the Crown.

WELLCOMBE (St. NICTAN), a parish, in the union of BIDEFORD, hundred of HARTLAND, Great Torrington and N. divisions of DEVON, 5 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Hartland; containing 293 inhabitants. This parish, situated on the coast of the Bristol Channel, which bounds it on the west, comprises 1551 acres, whereof 448 are common or waste land: the road from Stratton to Bideford passes on the east. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £71; patron, Lord Clinton; impropriator, W. Heddon, Esq. About 9 acres of land purchased by a grant from Queen Anne's Bounty, belong to the benefice. The church is a very small cruciform structure in the Norman style. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WELLESBOROUGH, with TEMPLE-HALL, an extra-parochial liberty, in the hundred of SPARKENHOE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER; containing 76 inhabitants.

WELLESBOURN-HASTINGS (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of STRATFORD-UPON-AVON, Warwick division of the hundred of KINGTON, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 5 miles (E.) from Stratford; containing 1434 inhabitants, of whom 694 are in the township of Wellesbourn-Hastings with Walton, and the remainder in the hamlet of Wellesbourn-Montford. The parish is intersected by the road from Stratford to Kington, and comprises 4548 acres, of which 2855 are in the township of Wellesbourn-Hastings with Walton. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the rectory of Walton-Deville annexed, valued in the king's books at £7. 11. 8.; net income, £422; patron, the Crown; impropriators, Sir J. Mordaunt, Bart., and others. There is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 69 acres. The church is partly Norman, and partly in the early English style, with a tower of later character, and contains a monument to the memory of Sir Thomas le Strange, lord-lieutenant of Ireland in the reign of Henry VI. Schools founded in 1723, by the Rev. Richard Boyse, are endowed with land and houses producing £90. 10. per annum.

WELLHOUSE, a tything, in the parish of HAMPSTEAD-NORRIS, union of WANTAGE, hundred of FAIRCROSS, county of BERKS, 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Newbury.

WELLING, a village, partly in the parish of BEXLEY, hundred of RUXLEY, and partly in that of EAST WICKHAM, hundred of LESSNESS, union of DARTFORD, lathe of SUTTON-AT-HONE, W. division of KENT, 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Crayford. This place, which is of modern origin, is situated on the great road from London to Canterbury and Dovor, and contains some good posting-houses.

WELLINGBOROUGH (ALL SAINTS), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of HAMFORDSHOE, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 10 miles (N. E. by E.) from Northampton, and 67 (N. N. W.) from London; containing 5061 inhabitants. The name is derived from the wells, or springs, that abound here, of which that denominated Red Well was formerly in such repute for its medicinal properties, that in 1626, Charles I. and his queen resided in tents during a whole season, for the purpose of drinking its salubrious water at the source. In 1738, the town was nearly destroyed by fire, and rebuilt on the slope of a hill nearly a mile northward from the navigable river Nene; it consists of several streets lighted and pitched, the principal of them meeting in the market-place, and the houses, erected of red sandstone which abounds in the vicinity, are of modern style and handsome appearance. The chief articles of manufacture are boots and shoes, and bobbin-lace, of which the former was very extensive during the war, and is still considerable, and the latter, though on the decline, employs many females and children: a silk-mill has been recently established. The market was granted by King John, at the request of the monks of Croyland Abbey, the proprietors of the manor, which was possessed by Queen Elizabeth after the Dissolution; it is on Wednesday, and is very considerable for corn. Fairs are held on the Wednesdays in Easter and Whitsun weeks, and October 29th, of which the last is a large one for live-stock. Manorial courts take place in October; and petty-sessions for the division occur every week at the town-hall, which has been recently erected by the feoffees, and is used for vestries and other public meetings.

The parish comprises 4079*a. 1r. 14p.* The LIVING is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £24. 1. 8.; net income, £400; patron and impropriator, Quintus Vivian, Esq. The church is a spacious and handsome structure, combining specimens of the different styles of English architecture, with an elegant tower and spire; on the south side is a Norman door; in the interior are some ancient screen-work and stalls, and the east window is richly ornamented with sculpture and tracery. There are places of worship for Independents, Baptists, the Society of Friends, and Wesleyans. A free grammar school, adjoining the churchyard, was founded in the 2nd of Edward VI., and endowed with the revenue of a guild of the Blessed Virgin formerly attached to the church, and subsequently with an estate at Burton-Latimer, and three-eighths of the rental of 55 acres of land, under the will of Richard Fisher, in 1711; the master receives an income of £130, but has to provide an usher for the lower school, in which are taught reading, writing, and arithmetic. A national school is endowed with one-half of the rental of Fisher's estate, the remaining eighth of which is given to two aged persons. The town estate produces an income of £350. 18., appropriated to general purposes, and the relief of poor inhabitants; and there is also a fund of £53, arising from bequests by Mrs. Anne Glasbrook, in 1790, and others, which sum is annually distributed in bread and money. The union of Wellingborough comprises 27 parishes or places, of which 24 are in the county of Northampton, and 3 in that of Bedford, altogether containing a population of 20,133.

WELLINGHAM (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of MITFORD and LAUNDITCH, hundred of LAUNDITCH, W. division of NORFOLK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Rougham; containing 193 inhabitants. It comprises 1066*a. 3r. 23p.*, of which 888 acres are arable, and 170 pasture and meadow. The living is a discharged rectory, united to the rectory of Tittleshall cum Godwick, and valued in the king's books at £5. 8. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$.: the tithes have been commuted for £265, and the glebe comprises $5\frac{1}{4}$ acres. The church is in the early and decorated styles, with a square tower.

WELLINGLEY with STANCILL and WILSICK, a township, in the parish of TICKHILL, union of DONCASTER, S. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, 2 miles (N. by W.) from Tickhill; containing 59 inhabitants. It formerly belonged to the family of Fitzpaine, one of whom, Robert, gave land here to the monks of Roche, but at what period is now unknown: in 1236, Sir Jordan Fitzpaine was owner of the place, and among subsequent proprietors occurs the family of Warton. The township comprises about 1200 acres of land, set out in three farms.

WELLINGORE (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of SLEAFORD, Higher division of the wapentake of BOOTHBY-GRAFFO, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, 10 miles (S.) from Lincoln; containing 850 inhabitants. The parish is on the road between Lincoln and Grantham, and comprises 2987*a. 2r. 28p.* The village is the last of six from Lincoln known as the Cliff villages, from their site on the edge of the oolitic ridge, which commands an extensive view of Belvoir, the Derbyshire hills, &c.: limestone of inferior quality is quarried for building and for the repair of roads. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Lincoln (the appropriators), valued in the king's books at £11. 10.; net income, £206. The tithes were commuted for land in 1763; the glebe contains 103 acres. The church consists of a nave, aisles, and chancel, with a tower surmounted by a spire. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. The Roman Ermin-street passes about half a mile east of the village.

WELLINGTON (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the hundred of GRIMSWORTH, union and county of HEREFORD, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.) from Hereford; containing 670 inhabitants. The parish consists of 2540 acres, and is situated near the western bank of the river Lugg, and intersected by the road from Leominster to Hereford. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Wellington in the Cathedral of Hereford. The tithes have been commuted for £639, of which £258. 10. 7. are payable to the prebendary, £266. 16. 3. to the vicar, and £112. 1. 2. to the impropriators; there are 49 acres of glebe. Almshouses for six aged men were founded and endowed by Sir Herbert Perrott, in 1682; and there are also three others with a small benefaction.

WELLINGTON (ALL SAINTS), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the Wellington division of the hundred of SOUTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP, 11 miles (E.) from Shrewsbury, and 151 (N. W.) from London; containing, with the hamlets of Arleston, New Dale, and Watling-Street, and the townships of Aston, Hadley, Horton, Ketley, Lawley, and Walcot, 11,099 inhabitants, of whom 6084 are in the town. During the great civil war, this was the first place of rendezvous of Charles I., who, on September 19th, 1642, mustered his forces near the town, and having commanded his military orders to be read, delivered in person the remarkable address mentioned by Clarendon. The town occupies a low station, near the Roman Watling-street, two miles southward from the Wrekin, which rises from the plain to a height of about 1100 feet above the bed of the Severn, embraces an horizon of from 350 to 400 miles in circumference, and is surmounted by an ancient fortification: a part of the parish is bounded by the river Tern. The streets are mostly narrow, but have been much improved, and are now Macadamized, and lighted with gas, and many of the houses are of modern and respectable appearance. There are two valuable springs at Admaston, about a mile and a half from the town, called the Upper and Lower, the former chalybeate, and the other sulphureous; a very comfortable inn and baths have been erected; and the waters having been found highly efficacious, particularly in rheumatic complaints, it has become a favourite watering-place. The mineral productions of the parish, consisting of coal, iron-stone, and limestone, form the basis of its trade, which chiefly consists in the different branches of iron manufacture, especially that of nails: several companies of iron-masters have establishments in the neighbourhood, amongst which are, the Hadley, Ketley, Lawley, and Lilleshall companies. There are also a glass-factory, corn-mills, and malt-kilns; and some business is transacted in timber. The various articles of manufacture and commerce are conveyed by the Shrewsbury and Shropshire canals, which communicate with the navigable river Severn, and the midland counties. The market, granted to Hugh Burnel, in the 11th of Edward I., is on Thursday, on a very extensive scale; and fairs, chiefly for live-stock and butter and cheese, are held on March 29th, June 22nd, September 29th, and November 17th.

The town is under a mayor and constables, and two clerks are chosen to regulate the market: a manorial court takes place in November, at which these officers are appointed. Petty-sessions for the hundred occur weekly; and there is a court of record, for the recovery of debts under £20, on certain days. The living is a vicarage, with the rectory of Eyton-on-the-Wild-Moors annexed, valued in the king's books at £9. 5.; net income, £842; patron, T. Eyton, Esq. The church is a light and elegant modern edifice of freestone. An additional church was erected in 1838, containing 1140 sittings, 740 of which are free; and there is a church at Ketley, which see. Here are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyans. The poor law union of Wellington comprises 11 parishes or places, and contains a population of 19,901. Several curious petrifications of plants and shells are occasionally found in some of the iron-mines in the vicinity. Dr. Withering, author of A Botanical Arrangement of British Plants and some medical treatises, was born here in 1741.

WELLINGTON (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, forming, with the parish of West Buckland, one of the two unconnected portions which comprise the W. division of the hundred of KINGSBURY, in the W. division of SOMERSET, 24 miles (W. S. W.) from Somerset, and 149 (W. S. W.) from London; containing 5595 inhabitants. The town is situated on the main road from Bath to Exeter, and of late years has been much improved, many of the streets having been paved, and a few of the old houses removed. The manufacture of druggetts and serges was formerly carried on to a considerable degree, and still prevails, though on a limited scale. The Grand Western canal, from Bridgwater to Tiverton, passes near the place, and affords much facility for the increase of its trade; and the Bristol and Exeter railway runs through the parish. During the possession of the manor by the bishops of Wells, a charter was obtained for a market and two fairs, of which the former is held on Thursday, principally for corn, and the latter on the Thursdays before Easter and Whitsuntide. The market-house being in a very dilapidated condition, and not affording suitable accommodation, his Grace the Duke of Wellington, lord of the manor, granted a lease for 99 years, and the inhabitants have erected a new edifice, by subscription on shares. The government of the town is in a bailiff and subordinate officers, chosen at the annual court leet held for the manor.

The parish comprises 4710 acres, of which 42 are common or waste land. The living is a vicarage, with West Buckland annexed, valued in the king's books at £15. 10. 2½.; net income, £894; patron, the Rev. W. P. Thomas; appropriator, the Dean of Wells. The church is a handsome edifice, with an embattled tower crowned by pinnacles; and has two sepulchral chapels, in one of which is a splendid monument to the memory of Sir John Popham, Knt., lord chief justice of England in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I., ornamented with a profusion of effigies and carved work. The Rev. Mr. Thomas has erected an elegant chapel, at his own expense, near the west end of the town, which is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyans; also almshouses for six men and six women, founded in 1604, and endowed with land by Sir John Popham; the master and matron to instruct children. The poor law union comprises 24 parishes or places, 19 of which are in Somerset, and 5 in Devon, and contains a population of 21,777. The place confers the titles of Viscount, Earl, Marquess, and Duke, on that distinguished military commander, Arthur Wellesley, Prince of Waterloo: the first created Sept. 4th, 1809; the second, Feb. 28th, 1812; the third, August 18th, of the same year; and the fourth, May 3rd, 1814. At a short distance from the town, a magnificent pillar has been erected by public subscription, in commemoration of the signal victory obtained by his Grace on the plain of Waterloo, in 1815.

WELLOW (St. SWITHIN), a parish in the union of SOUTHWELL, South-Clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 1½ mile (S. E. by E.) from Ollerton; containing 549 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Worksop to Newark, and comprises 956a. 5p., of which upwards of 254 acres are in Wellow Park, a thickly-wooded eminence on the north side of the village; the surface is in general hilly, and the soil clay and loam. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £66; patron, the Earl of Scarborough; appropriator, the Bishop of Lincoln. The church is principally a brick structure, roofed with slate, and was partly rebuilt and thoroughly repaired about the year 1810. Here is a school with a small endowment.

WELLOW (St. JULIAN), a parish, in the union of BATH, hundred of WELLOW, E. division of SOMERSET, 5 miles (S.) from Bath; containing 1018 inhabitants. The hundred of Wellow, with its feudal rights, tenures, and royalties, has for many generations been held by the lord of the hundred of Kilmersdon. The parish is situated between the roads from Bath to Exeter and to Warminster, at the distance of about three miles from each, and comprises 5360 acres; coal-mines are in operation, and the shaft of a new pit has just been sunk at the hamlet of Sherscomb. A railway from the collieries, communicating with the Avon and Kennet and the Radford coal canals, passes through the parish. Cattle-fairs are held in May and October. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £20. 6. 10½.; net income, £380; patron, William C. Keating, Esq.; impropiator, H. G. Langton, Esq. The great tithes have been commuted for £258. 11., and the vicarial for £353. 12.; there is a glebe-house, which has been lately enlarged and thoroughly repaired, and the glebe contains 62 acres. The church is a fine structure in the English style, with an old oak roof, and fittings in excellent preservation. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Among numerous Roman relics discovered in the neighbourhood, a tessellated pavement was found in 1644, another in 1670, and a third in 1685, with altars, pillars, fragments of pateræ, and other vessels. At the extremity of the parish is an immense barrow called Woodeborough; and from another, a smaller one, have been taken several stone coffins.

WELLOW, EAST (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of ROMSEY, partly in the hundred of THORNGATE, Romsey and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, and partly in the hundred of AMESBURY, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTS, 4 miles (W.) from Romsey; containing 713 inhabitants, of whom 241 are in the hamlet. The parish is situated between the two roads from Southampton to Salisbury, and, including the tything of Embley, comprises 2080 acres, of which 478 are common or waste. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5, and in the patronage of W. E. Nightingale, Esq., who, with the family of Hervey, is impropror: the vicarial tithes have been commuted for £245. 5., with a glebe of 23 $\frac{3}{4}$ acres, and the impropriate for £317. 10. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WELLOW, WEST, a tything, in the parish of EAST WELLOW, union of ROMSEY, hundred of AMESBURY, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTS, 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Romsey; containing 421 inhabitants. It comprises 1237*a.* 10*p.*, of which 228 are common or waste land.

WELLS (St. PETER), a sea-port town and parish, in the union of WALSINGHAM, hundred of NORTH GREENHOE, W. division of NORFOLK, 33 miles (N. W. by N.) from Norwich, and 120 (N. N. E.) from London; containing 3504 inhabitants. This place, in the Domesday survey Guella, is situated on a creek of the North Sea, which flows in a circuitous course for nearly two miles to the harbour. The town consists of several narrow streets, partly paved; the inhabitants are amply supplied with water; a subscription library has been established, and there is a theatre neatly fitted up. Races formerly took place, but have been discontinued. The trade consists chiefly in the exportation of wool, flour, grain, and malt; and the importation of coal, timber, deals, tiles, bark, linseed and rapeseed cakes, and tar. The harbour, which has been cleared from the accumulation of sand, and greatly improved under the direction of commissioners, is accessible to vessels of 160 tons' burthen, which at high water can come up to the quay, where at spring tides is twelve feet depth of water. The number of vessels registered as belonging to the port, in 1841, was 64, of the aggregate burthen of 2953 tons; the number of vessels that entered inwards was 386, of which 47 were from foreign ports, and 339 in the coasting trade; the number that cleared outwards was 238, and the duties paid at the custom-house for that year amounted to £596. The custom-house, a neat brick building, is situated on the quay, which is well adapted for facilitating the business of the port; and a coast-guard station has been placed here. Ship-building is carried on to a considerable extent, and many vessels of 200 tons' burthen have been launched from the docks; in 1831, a vessel of 90 tons was built, chiefly of timber planted on the Holkham estate, by the late Earl of Leicester. A fishery affords employment to 16 boats, and a considerable number of men; oysters of very fine quality are taken in abundance, and various other kinds of shell fish. The market, on Saturday, has fallen into disuse; a fair on Shrove-Tuesday is still kept up. Courts leet and baron are held annually by the lord of the manor, at which the steward presides; and the magistrates for the division hold petty-sessions on the first Monday in the month. The parish comprises 2339*a.* 2*r.* 31*p.*, of which 1237 acres are arable, 96 woodland, 172 fresh-marshes, and 833 salt-marshes. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £26. 13. 4., and endowed with an estate at Bale by the Rev. M. Morrey; net income, £620; patron and incumbent, the Rev. J. R. Hopper. The glebe comprises 40 acres, with a good house. The church is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a lofty square embattled tower; the font is curiously sculptured, and there are a very fine brass eagle and some neat monuments. The Society of Friends, Independents, Primitive Methodists, and Wesleyans have places of worship. Christopher Ringar, in 1678, bequeathed land producing £120 per annum, for paying two widows to teach 30 children, and for distribution in meal to poor families; and the Rev. M. Morrey charged the estate at Bale, with which he endowed the living, with the payment of £18 per annum to the necessitous. The produce of £388 new four per cents., the bequest of William B. Elliott, in 1810, is also distributed in bread among the poor, to whom were allotted ten acres of land for fuel, on the inclosure of the parish.

WELLS, a city, having separate jurisdiction, and the head of a union, locally in the hundred of WELLS-FORUM, E. division of SOMERSET, 19 miles (S. W.) from Bath, 19 (S.) from Bristol, and 120 (W. by S.) from London; containing, with that part of the parish of St. Cuthbert which is without the limits of the city, 7050 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the numerous springs with which it abounds, more particularly from St. Andrew's well, the water of which, rising near the episcopal palace, flows through the south-western part of the city: it owes its origin to Ina, King of the West Saxons, who, in 704, founded a collegiate church, which he dedicated to St. Andrew the Apostle. This establishment was subsequently endowed by Cynewulf, one of his successors, with considerable estates in the vicinity, in 766, and continued to flourish till 905, when, in pursuance of an edict of Edward the Elder, for the revival of religion, which, from the frequent incursions of the Danes, had almost fallen into disuse, several new bishops were consecrated by Pligmund, Archbishop of Canterbury, of whom Aldhelm, formerly abbot of Glastonbury, was chosen to preside over Wells, which was then erected into a see, having jurisdiction over the entire county of Somerset. After a succession of twelve bishops, Giso, chaplain to Edward the Confessor, was appointed to the see, to which that monarch gave the extensive possessions of Harold, Earl of Wessex, whom, with his father, Godwin, Earl of Kent, he had banished from the kingdom. Harold, during his exile, made an incursion into this part of Somersetshire, raised contributions on his former tenantry, despoiled the church of its ornaments and treasure, expelled the canons, and converted the revenues to his own use. Giso, on his return from Rome, where he had been consecrated, obtained some compensation for these injuries from the queen, who was Harold's sister; but that prince, on his restoration to favour, procured the banishment of Giso, and, upon his subsequent accession to the throne, resumed all the estates granted by Edward to the church, and greatly impoverished the see. Bishop Giso remained in exile till the Conquest, when he was reinstated; and William, in the second year of his reign, restored to the bishopric all Harold's estates, with the exception of some small portions which had been granted to the monastery of Glastonbury, adding, in lieu of them, two other manors. Giso exerted himself in augmenting the income of his see: he increased the number of canons, over whom he appointed a provost, built a cloister, hall, and dormitory, and enlarged and embellished the choir of the cathedral : these buildings, however, were demolished by his successor, John de Villula, who erected a palace on their site.

This prelate removed the seat of the diocese to Bath, and assumed the title of Bishop of Bath, in which he was followed by his two next successors. Great disputes arising between the inhabitants of the cities, each claiming to be regarded as the head of the diocese, the matter was at length referred to the arbitration of the bishops, who decided that the prelates should take the title of Bishops of Bath and Wells, that their election should be made by an equal number of delegates from both places, and that the ceremony of installation should be performed in both churches. Reginald Fitz-Jocelyne, who was bishop in the reign of Richard I., granted the town a charter of incorporation, and made it a free borough ; and during the captivity of that monarch in Austria, Savaricus, who succeeded Fitz-Jocelyne in the see, and was nearly allied to the emperor, obtained, through his influence, a promise from Richard, as a condition of his restoration, that the abbacy of Glastonbury, then vacant, should be annexed to the see of Bath and Wells : this prelate subsequently removed the seat of his diocese to Glastonbury, and assumed the title of Bishop of Glastonbury. After his death, in 1205, the monks, under his successor, Jocelyne de Walles, petitioned the court of Rome that they might be restored to their ancient government by an abbot, which indulgence they obtained, on condition of their relinquishing to the bishop a considerable portion of their revenue, and Jocelyne assumed the style of Bishop of Bath and Wells, which the prelates of the see have ever since retained. After the death of Jocelyne, disputes arose in the election of his successors, the monks of Bath frequently exercising that right without the concurrence of the canons of Wells ; but an appeal having been made to the pope, the union of the churches appears to have subsequently remained without interruption. At the time of the Reformation, the monastery of Bath was suppressed ; and, though the name of the see was retained, the ecclesiastical authority, and the right of electing the bishops, were vested in the Dean and Chapter of Wells, then constituted the sole chapter of the diocese. The revenue of the monastery of Wells, at the period of its dissolution, was valued at £1939. 12. 8.

The city, which appears to have grown up around the ancient ecclesiastical establishment, and to have flourished in proportion to its prosperity, is pleasantly situated on the south side of the Mendip hills, in a fertile plain lying at their base, and is sheltered from the north winds by that mountainous range of richly-wooded eminences, and open on the south side to an extensive tract of fine meadow land. The houses are well built, and of respectable appearance ; several of them are old, having been erected for ecclesiastical residences, and many are of modern and elegant structure. The grandeur of its cathedral, the beauty of its church, and the character of the conventual buildings, give it an air of peculiar interest. It is divided into four verderies by four principal streets, from which they take their name, and is well paved and amply supplied with water from a public conduit of great beauty, filled by pipes leading from an aqueduct near the source of St. Andrew's well. The environs, which abound with diversified and picturesque scenery, contain many handsome seats, and afford a variety of pleasing walks and rides. Races are held annually a short distance east of the city, beyond the limits of its liberties.

The principal branch of manufacture is the knitting of stockings ; and at Wookey, about two miles distant, are several paper-mills, where, from the excellent quality of the water, paper of the best kind is made. The market-days are Wednesday and Saturday for provisions ; on every fourth Saturday, a large market is held for corn, cattle, and cheese ; and fairs take place on January 6th, May 14th, July 6th, October 25th, and November 30th, for cattle, horses, and pedlery. The market-place, on the east side of the city, is a fine spacious area, on the north side of which is a handsome range of twelve houses of stone, built by Bishop Beckington, for twelve priests, and now inhabited by townsmen ; at the eastern extremity is an ancient gateway, communicating with the Cathedral Close, and, fronting the street, another leading to the episcopal palace, both erected by the same prelate, who intended to rebuild the whole area. Near the site of the old cross, which was taken down in 1780, formerly stood the city conduit, an elegant hexagonal structure in the later English style, erected by Bishop Beckington, in 1450, richly embellished with canopied niches and delicate ornaments, and crowned with a conical dome ; but this being considered an obstruction, it was taken down about 40 years since, and soon afterwards removed to Stourhead, then the seat of Sir R. C. Hoare, Bart., and a very handsome one was erected on the site : in the south-eastern angle is the town-hall and market-house, a plain commodious building. The CHARTER granted by Reginald Fitz-Jocelyne was confirmed by King John, who entrusted the government to a master and commonalty ; and Queen Elizabeth gave the inhabitants a new charter, in the 31st of her reign. The corporation, however, now consists of a mayor, four aldermen, and twelve councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., c. 76 ; the municipal and parliamentary boundaries are co-extensive, and the number of magistrates is six. The freedom is inherited by the eldest son of a freeman, and obtained by servitude. The inhabitants first exercised the elective franchise in the 23rd of Edward I., since which time they have regularly returned two members to parliament ; the right of voting was extended in 1832 to the £10 householders of an enlarged district, comprising 715 acres, and the mayor is returning officer. The assizes for the county are held here every alternate year, and the Epiphany and Easter quarter-sessions annually.

Arms of the Bishopric.

The present ECCLESIASTICAL establishment, as re-founded by Henry VIII., on the dissolution of the monastery, consists of a bishop, dean, precentor, chancellor, three archdeacons, treasurer, sub-dean, 49 prebendaries, four priest-vicars, eight lay-vicars, organist, six choristers, and other officers. The Cathedral, dedicated to St. Andrew, is a magnificent cruciform structure, principally in the early English style, with partial insertions of the decorated and later styles; the foundation was laid by Wiffeline, second bishop of the diocese, and the edifice was completed and improved by Bishop Jocelyne, in 1239. The west front is a striking and superb combination of stately grandeur and splendid embellishment, the whole of it, together with the buttresses by which it is divided into compartments, replete with elaborate sculpture, from the base to the summit, in successive tiers of richly-canopied shrines, containing the statues of kings, popes, bishops, cardinals, and abbots; the mullions of the west window and the lower stages of the western towers are similarly enriched. The canopies of the niches in which these figures are enshrined, are supported by slender-shafted pillars of polished marble, and the intermediate spaces between the several series are filled with architectural ornaments of elegant design and appropriate character. In the upper range of the central compartment are statues of the Twelve Apostles, in a series of lofty niches separated by slender shafts, and in the range immediately beneath them are figures of the hierarchs, below which is a sculptured representation of the Resurrection, in alto-relievo. The entrance, which is through a deeply-recessed arch, is flanked by the western towers, of which the lower stages are comprised in the general design of the front, and the upper, which are wreathed with pierced parapets, are relieved by fine windows, and with lofty canopies rising from the buttresses, and terminating in crocketed finials. The central tower is crowned by a pierced parapet of elegant design, and decorated with lofty angular pinnacles surmounted by vanes, and with smaller pinnacles in the intervals: though of large dimensions, it has an airy appearance, from the proportionate size and elegance of the windows. The Interior displays some specimens of the early English style, which are of unfrequent occurrence, and equally remarkable for simplicity and elegance. Of this character are the nave and transepts: the former is separated from the aisles by clustered columns and finely-pointed arches, above which are a triforium of lancet-shaped arches, and a range of clerestory windows, in which tracery, in the later English style, has been inserted; the roof is finely groined, and the great west window is adorned with ancient stained glass of much brilliancy. The choir is in the decorated style, and of very elegant character, and beyond it is the Lady chapel, both forming parts of one general arrangement, which, for beauty of design, and richness of architectural embellishment, is perhaps unequalled. There are numerous chapels in various parts of the cathedral, some of which are inclosed with fine screens, and in one is an ancient clock, removed from Glastonbury, with an astronomical dial, and a train of figures of knights, in armour, which, by the machinery, are moved round in circular procession. In the south transept is a font of the same date as that part of the building. There are many interesting monuments of the bishops and others who were interred within its walls, among which are, the tomb of Bishop Beckington, in a chapel in the presbytery, with his effigy in alabaster; the gravestone of Bishop Jocelyne in the middle of the choir, marking the spot where an elegant marble monument, bearing his effigy in brass, formerly stood; that of King Ina, who was interred in the centre of the nave, and many others.

The Cloisters form three sides of a quadrangle south of the cathedral: the western range, comprising the school and the treasury, was built by Bishop Beckington, who also began the south side, which was finished by Thomas Henry, treasurer of Wells, and archdeacon of Cornwall; and the eastern range, containing a chapel and a library, was erected by Bishop Bubwith. The Chapter-house is an elegant octagonal structure; the roof, which is finely groined, is supported on a clustered column of Purbeck marble in the centre, and the interior is lighted by windows of handsome design. Beneath is a crypt of good character, with a roof displaying a fine specimen of plain groining, from which a staircase of singular construction leads into the chapter-room, and to several other parts of the adjacent buildings. To the south of the cathedral is the Episcopal Palace, an ancient castellated mansion, surrounded with walls inclosing nearly seven acres of ground, and defended by a deep moat, which is supplied from the water of St. Andrew's well: on the north side is a venerable gateway tower leading over a bridge into the outer court, on the east side of which is the palace, containing several spacious and magnificent rooms, and a chapel. Opposite the entrance are the remains of the great hall, now in ruins, having been demolished in the reign of Edward VI., for the sake of the materials. The Vicar's close was originally built by Walter de Hull, canon of Wells, and archdeacon of Bath, and improved in 1348, by Bishop Ralph de Salopia, who erected a new college for the residence of the vicars and choristers, which he endowed with lands of his own, in addition to what were given by Walter de Hull. It was subsequently enlarged and its endowment augmented, by Bishop Beckington, who erected the gateways, of which that on the east, adjoining the cathedral buildings, has a long gallery communicating with the church and the vicar's close, with a large flight of steps at each end. At the south end is a hall, with a buttery and other conveniences, under which is an arched gateway; at the north end are the chapel and library, and on the east and west sides are handsome ranges of dwelling-houses. This college, the revenue of which, in the 26th of Henry VIII., was £72. 10. 9½., escaped the general Dissolution, and was afterwards re-founded by Queen Elizabeth, who appointed the number of vicars to be not less than fourteen, nor more than twenty. The Deanery is a spacious structure, erected by Dean Gunthorp, in allusion to whose name the walls are ornamented with several guns, carved in stone: in this mansion the founder entertained Henry VII., on his return from the west of England. Near the deanery is the west gate, a plain ancient edifice, forming the principal entrance into the city from Bath.

The city comprises only the in-parish of St. CUTHBERT, which surrounds the cathedral precincts: the several hamlets which are without the limits of the city, extending for seven miles in circuit, form the out-parish of St. Cuthbert. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £33. 13. 6., and in the gift of the appropriators, the Dean and Chapter: the great tithes have been commuted for £1030, and the vicarial for £800. The church is a spacious and handsome structure in the later English style, with a lofty square embattled tower, strengthened by angular buttresses, and crowned with pinnacles, and forming one of the most beautiful specimens in that style. Though of large dimensions, the tower has a degree of lightness from the judicious distribution of its ornaments, and the relief afforded by niches of elegant design; the belfry windows are lofty, and, from the excellence of their composition, give to the tower above the roof the character of a magnificent lantern; the west door, and the large window over it, are also richly embellished. The interior of the church consists of a nave, aisles, and choir, and contains several sepulchral chapels, among which are traces of an earlier style of architecture than that of the main building; the walls are adorned with several ancient monuments and mural tablets. A church has been erected at East Horrington, with 260 sittings; another was built at Coxley, in 1838, by aid of a grant from Her Majesty's Commissioners, containing 264 sittings; and a church was erected at Easton, in 1841, comprising 220 sittings. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyans. The collegiate grammar school contains 26 boys, 8 of whom, choristers of the cathedral, are paid for by the Dean and Chapter. The United Charity School, established in 1654, by Mrs. Mary Barkham, Mr. Adrian Hickes, and Mr. Philip Hodges, the last of whom erected a school-house, is endowed with property producing above £500 per annum.

On the north side of the churchyard is an hospital founded and endowed by Bishop Bubwith, who died in 1424, for twelve aged men, twelve women, and a chaplain, to which six men were added in 1607, by Bishop Still, who augmented the endowment for that purpose: including a previous augmentation by Bishops Beckington and Bourne, the present income is about £400, and the buildings are neat, and comprise separate apartments for each, with a common room, and a small chapel at the east end. Some almshouses in Priest's-row were founded in 1614, by Henry Llewellyn, who endowed them for six aged women; the revenue is about £170 per annum, from which a weekly allowance is also paid to four aged widows not in the houses. An almshouse for four decayed burgesses was established in 1638, by Walter Brick; houses were founded in 1711, by Archibald Harper, who endowed them with property now worth about £70 a year, for five decayed wool-combers; and there are numerous other charitable bequests and funds. The poor law union of Wells comprises 18 parishes or places, and contains a population of 20,611. In the verdery of Southover are the remains of the priory of St. John, instituted in 1206, by Hugh, Archdeacon of Wells, afterwards Bishop of Lincoln, and subsequently augmented by Bishop Jocelyne; the revenue at the Dissolution was £41. 3. 6.; the buildings have been converted into a wool-comber's shop. The neighbourhood, especially on the side of the Mendip hills, abounds with geological interest. Among the eminent prelates of the see have been Cardinal Wolsey and Archbishop Laud; the celebrated historian, Polydore Virgil, was archdeacon in the 16th century; and the learned and pious Dr. George Bull, Bishop of St. David's, was born in the city, in the year 1634.

WELNETHAM, GREAT, a parish, in the union of THINGOE, hundred of THEDWASTRY, W. division of SUFFOLK, 3½ miles (S. E. by S.) from Bury St. Edmund's; containing, with part of the hamlet of Sicklesmere, 514 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 15. 7½.; net income, £314; patron, F. Wing, Esq. Mrs. Mary Green, in 1814, bequeathed a legacy of £200, which was invested in the funds, for the poor.

Here was a priory of Crouched, or Crossed, friars, subordinate to the principal house of that order, near the Tower of London. Numerous remains of Roman antiquities have been dug up. Sir Richard Gipp, Knt., a great collector of Suffolk antiquities, resided and was buried here.

WELNETHAM, LITTLE (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of THINGOE, hundred of THEDWASTRY, W. division of SUFFOLK, 2 miles (S. E.) from Bury St. Edmund's; containing, with part of the hamlet of Sicklesmere, 206 inhabitants, and comprising about 750 acres. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 13. 4., and in the gift of the Marquess of Bristol: the tithes have been commuted for £155, and the glebe comprises 25 acres.

WELNEY, a chapelry, in the parish of UPWELL, union of DOWNHAM, partly in the hundred of WISBECH, ISLE of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, and partly in the hundred of CLACKCLOSE, W. division of NORFOLK, 10 miles (S. W.) from Downham-Market; containing 996 inhabitants, of whom 405 are in the Cambridge portion. The chapel is situated in Cambridgeshire. William Marshall, in 1661, conveyed to 12 feoffees 479 acres of land, one-third part of the rents of which is applied to relieving widows, and apprenticing children, who are provided with clothing, if necessary. As much of the remaining two-thirds as is requisite is appropriated to the repairs of the chapel, and to keeping in order the highways and bridge, and the residue to the establishment and endowment of a free school. The lands supply a revenue of about £1000 per annum. Many Roman coins were dug up in 1718.

WELTON (St. MARY), a parish, in the wapentake of LAWRESS, parts of LINDSEY, union and county of LINCOLN, 6 miles (N. N. E.) from Lincoln; containing, with the hamlet of Ryland, 566 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3610 acres; and the road from Lincoln to Market-Rasen passes through it. Good building-stone is abundant. This place constitutes the endowment of five prebends in the cathedral of Lincoln, called respectively Rivall, Bekall, Brinkhall, Painshall, and Westhall. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 6. 8.; net income, £150; patrons, the five Prebendaries; appropriators, the Dean and Chapter. The church is a neat structure, rebuilt in 1825. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and the sum of £20 per annum, derived from a bequest of John Camm, in 1824, and about £11. 10. a year, chiefly the gift of Earl Brownlow, are appropriated to the relief of the poor. The Countess of Warwick gave £10 per annum for the establishment of a Sunday evening lecture.

WELTON (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of DAVENTRY, hundred of FAWSLEY, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 2 miles (N. N. E.) from Daventry; containing 635 inhabitants, and comprising 1900 acres. The Crick and Welton second-class station on the London and Birmingham railway is situated here; the Grand Junction and Union canals meet at the south-eastern extremity of the parish, and the Watling-street skirts the eastern boundary. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7, and has a net income of £193; it is in the patronage of the Crown, and the glebe contains 100 acres. Charity lands for the indigent poor produce about £120 per annum, of which a small sum is applied to education.

WELTON, a township, in the parish of Ovingham, union of Hexham, E. division of Tindale ward, S. division of Northumberland, $9\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Hexham; containing 59 inhabitants. This place was anciently the seat of King Oswy; and it was here that the Saxon kings Penda and Segebert received the rites of baptism from Finan, Bishop of Lindisfarne. The township comprises 1165 acres, the property of Thomas Wentworth Beaumont, Esq. About two-thirds of the land are arable, and the remainder meadow and pasture; the surface is elevated, and the soil generally strong, and moderately fertile. The Tower, the manorial seat of the ancient family of Welton, is fast going to decay; there are still remaining in tolerable preservation, two handsome rooms lighted with oriel windows. The Hall, the residence of Mr. John Chorlton, is an ancient mansion, which, according to an inscription on the walls, was repaired in 1614. In the village is a flour-mill, driven by water. The tithes have been commuted for £120. The Roman wall passes in the immediate vicinity of the township.

WELTON (St. Helen), a parish, in the union of Sculcoates, wapentake of Howdenshire, E. riding of York; containing, with the chapelry of Melton, 987 inhabitants, of whom 792 are in Welton township, 4 miles (S. E.) from South Cave, and 10 (W. by S.) from Hull, which is the post-town. This parish is situated on the southern declivity of the wolds, and within one mile and a half of the river Humber, of which it commands many beautiful views, as well as of the country around, which is pleasingly diversified with hill and dale. It contains 2632 acres, of which 1732 constitute the township; the surface for the most part is richly wooded, and the soil presents great variety, being composed of chalk, clay, sand, and gravel. The Hull and Selby railway passes within a mile of the village. The living is a vicarage, endowed with the rectorial tithes, valued in the king's books at £25, and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £383. The tithes of the township were commuted for land and a money payment in 1792; the Bishop of Ripon is lord of the rectorial manor, and there is also a small vicarial manor. The church, supposed to have been founded in the reign of William Rufus, consists of a nave, chancel, north aisle, and south transept, with a large embattled tower, rising from the centre, and terminated at the angles by crocketed pinnacles and vanes. It has several handsome mural monuments, and the effigy of a Knight Templar placed upright, but now much mutilated; the east window has beautiful tracery; the nave is separated from the north aisle by two pointed arches resting on octagonal pillars, and the arches between the nave and the transept and chancel are similar, the two pillars in the latter having Norman capitals. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and national schools for boys and girls have been established, and are supported by Mrs. Raikes, of Welton House, and family.

WELTON-IN-THE-MARSH (St. Martin), a parish, in the union of Spilsby, Wold division of the wapentake of Candleshoe, parts of Lindsey, county of Lincoln, 6 miles (E. N. E.) from Spilsby; containing 396 inhabitants. It comprises by admeasurement 2420 acres, about one-fourth of which is wood, and the rest arable and pasture; the soil on the hills rests on chalk, and that in the remainder of the parish on clay. A small pleasure-fair is held on Old Lady-day. The living is a perpetual curacy, valued in the king's books at £14. 8. 9.; net income, £122; patrons and impropriators, P. and M. A. Massingberd, Esqrs. The tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1792. The old church, having fallen down, the present edifice of brick was raised in 1792, partly by subscription and partly by rate. A large tumulus called Castle Hill, is situated in the parish.

WELTON-LE-WOLD (St. Martin), a parish, in the union of Louth, Wold division of the hundred of Louth-Eske, parts of Lindsey, county of Lincoln, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Louth; containing 356 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 12. 1., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £448. The tithes were commuted for land in 1770.

WELWICK (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of Patrington, S. division of the wapentake of Holderness, E. riding of York, 2 miles (S. E. by E.) from Patrington; containing 403 inhabitants. The parish includes the hamlets of Weeton, Welwick-Thorpe, and Ploughland, and comprises 3276 acres. The village is distant about a mile from the north bank of the Humber, and on the road from Patrington to Skeffling. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £93; impropriator, T. Fewson, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land and money payments in 1768. The church is principally in the decorated English style, and contains the remains of a once splendid monument, said to have been removed from Burstall Abbey, and bearing marks of high antiquity. There is a place of worship for a congregation of Wesleyan Methodists.

WELWYN (St. Mary), a parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of Broadwater, county of Hertford, 8 miles (W. N. W.) from Hertford; containing 1395 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the great north road, and comprises 2987a. 2r. 7p., of which about 1815 acres are arable, 540 pasture, and 405 woodland; the surface is hilly, and the soil chiefly loam, resting on gravel and chalk; the river Mimram runs through the grounds, and falls into the Lea at Hertford. The village consists of one principal street, with a smaller leading to Stevenage, and contains several genteel residences. In Mill-lane is a fine chalybeate spring, formerly in considerable repute: there is also an assembly-room. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £21, and in the gift of All Souls' College, Oxford: the tithes have been commuted for £620; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 85 acres. The church, enlarged in 1834, contains over the altar a piece of embroidery, with a suitable inscription, by Lady Betty Young, wife of Dr. Edward Young, author of the Night Thoughts, who was for many years rector, and was buried by the side of his lady, under the communion-table, in 1765. There are places of worship for Huntingdonians and Wesleyans. Dr. Young, in 1760, founded a school, and endowed it with £1500 old South Sea annuities, augmented in 1810 by a bequest of £200 from Daniel Spurgeon; in 1830, the schoolroom was rebuilt upon an enlarged plan, chiefly from the funds of the charity. John Bexfield, in 1570, left land, the rent of which, amounting to £13. 10., is distributed, with other benefactions, among the indigent. The poor law union embraces the parishes of Welwyn, Digswell, and Ayott St. Lawrence and St. Peter, containing a population of 1955.

WEM (ST. PETER AND ST. PAUL), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, partly in the hundred of PIMHILL, but chiefly in the Whitchurch division of the hundred of NORTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP, 11 miles (N. by E.) from Shrewsbury, and 17 $\frac{1}{2}$ (N. W.) from London; containing 4119 inhabitants, of whom 1932 are in the township. It has been conjectured by Horsley, that this place occupies the site of the ancient Rutunium, but there is no authentic account of it prior to the Conquest, at which period William Pandulph, who held 28 manors of Earl Roger de Montgomery, made it the head of a barony, and fixed his residence here; and, on the forfeiture of the estates of Robert de Belesme, son of Earl Roger, for rebellion in the reign of Henry I., Pandulph held it immediately of the crown, and thence became a baron of the realm. After continuing for several generations in this family, and passing through the hands of other proprietors, the barony was, in 1665, purchased by Daniel Wycherley, father of the poet, and by him sold to the unprincipled Judge Jeffreys, who was created Baron of Wem in 1685, being the first who enjoyed that dignity by patent, but at the death of his son the title became extinct. Wem was the first town in the county which declared for the parliament, in 1643, in which year, a party of the king's troops, under Lord Capel, attempted to capture it by storm, but were repulsed by the small garrison, aided, it is said, by the active exertions of the women: in the following year it was reconnoitred by Prince Rupert, who deemed it unworthy of any effort to capture. Under the government of Major-General Mytton, the garrison plundered the possessions of the neighbouring royalists, and the booty brought by them into the town caused it to flourish at that time more than at any antecedent or subsequent period. In 1677, it suffered from a dreadful fire, which consumed the church, market-house, and whole ranges of building, destroying property of the value of upwards of £23,000.

The town, situated in a level district, on the northern bank of the river Roden, and on the road from Shrewsbury to Chester and Liverpool, consists principally of one spacious thoroughfare, called High-street, from which several smaller streets and lanes diverge, and is well supplied with good water: tanning and malting are carried on to a very considerable extent. The Ellesmere and Chester canal skirts the north-western boundary of the parish. The market, granted by King John, in 1205, to be held on Sunday, has since the 24th of Edward III. been held on Thursday; and two minor markets for meat take place on Tuesday and Saturday. The market-house, on the south side of High-street, is a small neat edifice of brick, with stone quoins, commenced in 1702, but not completed until 1728. The fairs are on March 4th and May 6th, for linen-cloth; May 20th and June 29th, for cattle; and September 30th and November 22nd, chiefly for swine. Wem appears to have been incorporated, though at what period the charter was granted is not known; but, from a copy of court roll, dated 9th of Edward VI., it must have been prior to that period. The principal officers are two bailiffs, appointed at the court leet held after Michaelmas, one by the lord's steward, and the other by the borough jury; the burgesses are the holders of burghage tenements, about 80 in number.

The parish comprises 13,455*a.* 33*p.*, of which 8423 acres are arable, 4656 meadow and pasture, 97 woodland, and 277 common recently inclosed; the soil varies considerably, but is generally a stiff marl. The LIVING is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £26. 4. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$.; and in the patronage of the Duke of Cleveland: the tithes have been commuted for £2095, and there are nearly 39 acres of glebe. The church, a spacious edifice with a lofty tower, appears to have been built at an early period, but the subsequent alterations and repairs it has undergone, and which were completed in 1812, have left little of the original style. An elevated spot at the north-west corner of the churchyard, now converted into gardens, is supposed to have been the site of the old castle. There is a chapel of ease at Edstaston, a very ancient structure in the early English style, with a highly-enriched Norman arch. A chapel was erected in 1836, at Newton, on the site of one consecrated in 1665, and is a handsome edifice of brick with dressings of stone, built by subscription, aided by grants from church-building societies. There are places of worship for Baptists and Presbyterians. The free grammar school was established and endowed in 1650, by Thomas Adams, who was born here in 1586, and, becoming a wealthy trader and active magistrate of the city of London, was created a baronet in 1660; the present school premises were erected in 1670, and with subsequent bequests, the gross income is £331. The school enjoys the benefit of two exhibitions founded by Mr. Careswell, and noticed in the article on Bridgenorth. The poor law union of Wem comprises 12 parishes or places, and contains a population of 12,518. Mr. John Ireland, author of Hogarth Illustrated, was born in the parish.

WEMBDON (ST. GEORGE), a parish, in the union of BRIDGWATER, hundred of NORTH PETHERTON, W. division of the county of SOMERSET, 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. W.) from Bridgwater; containing 370 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the east by the navigable river Parret, and by the road from Bridgwater to Dunster on the south; it comprises 2198 acres, of which 590 are arable, and 92 orchards. The upper part of the parish is hilly land, adapted for growing corn; the soil of the lower grounds is alluvial, and very rich pasture, particularly on the banks of the river. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 16. 10.; net income, £612; patron, C. K. K. Tynte, Esq.; impropriator, J. Credland, Esq. The church is a small ancient structure.

WEMBLEY, a hamlet, in the parish of HARROW-ON-THE-HILL, union of HENDON, hundred of GORE, county of MIDDLESEX; containing 232 inhabitants.

WEMBURY (ST. WERBURGH), a parish, in the union of PLYMPTON ST. MARY, hundred of PLYMPTON, Erington and Plympton, and S. divisions of DEVON, 5 $\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Plympton-Earls; containing 616 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the south and west by the English Channel, and on the east by the river Yealm, and comprises 2565 acres, of which 137 are common or waste; the surface is boldly undulated, and the views over the channel and the adjacent country are interesting and extensive. Nearly opposite to the church, from which it is about two miles distant, bearing west-south-west, and at the entrance of Plymouth Sound, is the small island called by mariners the Mew Stone. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £83; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Canons of Windsor, whose tithes have been commuted for £380. The church, situated on the brow of a bold eminence on the shore, is principally in the later English style, with the exception of the north aisle, which is of an earlier period, and substantially built of granite. In the chancel is a curious monument to Sir John Hele, serjeant-at-law in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I.; and in the south aisle is a massive tomb inscribed to the memory of Lady Narborough, and dated 1678. An almshouse for ten people was founded and endowed in 1625, by Sir Warwick Hele.

WEMBORTHY (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of CREDITON, hundred of NORTH TAWTON, South Molton and N. divisions of DEVON, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Chulmleigh; containing 418 inhabitants. The parish is situated nearly in the centre of the county; the surrounding scenery is agreeably diversified, and enlivened with the handsome residence of Eggesford, the seat of the Hon. Newton Fellowes, near which is a circular encampment surrounded by a fosse. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 13. 4., and in the gift of the Rev. P. Johnson and others: the tithes have been commuted for £165. 12., and the glebe comprises 40 acres. The church has been almost entirely rebuilt, at the expense of the Hon. N. Fellowes. Dr. Burton, author of the Pentologia and other learned works, was a native of the place.

WENDEN-LOFTS (St. DUNSTAN), a parish, in the union of SAFFRON-WALDEN, hundred of UTTLESFORD, N. division of ESSEX, 6 miles (W. by N.) from Saffron-Walden; containing 72 inhabitants. This parish, which is supposed to have derived the adjunct to its name from a former proprietor of the manor, is situated in an open country everywhere presenting interesting scenery, and comprises 778a. 10p., whereof 638 acres are arable and pasture, and 139 woodland. The living is a discharged rectory, with the vicarage of Elmdon annexed, valued in the king's books at £9. 10. 10.; net income, £470; patron and impropiator, John Wilkes, Esq. The church is a small edifice, containing some ancient brasses and monumental inscriptions.

WENDENS-AMBO (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of SAFFRON-WALDEN, hundred of UTTLESFORD, N. division of ESSEX, 2 miles (S. W. by W.) from Saffron-Walden; containing 347 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises by computation 1450 acres, appears to have derived its affix from the consolidation of two parishes consequent on the destruction of the parochial church of Little Wenden. The river Cam has its source here. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the rectory of Little Wenden united, valued jointly in the king's books at £17; net income, £165; patron, the Marquess of Bristol. The tithes were commuted for land and a corn-rent in 1814. The church is an ancient structure in the early English style, with a low square tower; the chancel is separated from the nave by a richly-carved screen of oak.

WENDLEBURY (St. GILES), a parish, in the union of BICESTER, hundred of PLOUGHLEY, county of OXFORD, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Bicester; containing 214 inhabitants. It comprises by estimation 1119 acres, of which nearly one-half is pasture and meadow, and the remainder arable. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 9. $4\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £250; patrons, the Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford: the tithes were commuted for land and a money payment, under an act of inclosure in the 39th of George III. The church, with the exception of the tower, which has stood for above 700 years, was rebuilt in 1761. The Rev. Robert Welborne, rector from 1730 to 1764, bequeathed 60 folio volumes as the foundation of a theological library.

WENDLING (St. PETER AND St. PAUL), a parish, in the union of MITFORD and LAUNDITCH, hundred of LAUNDITCH, W. division of NORFOLK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.) from East Dereham; containing 330 inhabitants. This place is of considerable antiquity, and prior to 1267 had an abbey founded by William de Wendling, in honour of the Blessed Virgin, for Præmonstratensian canons, which was suppressed by a bull of Pope Clement, and in 1528 granted to Cardinal Wolsey for the foundation of his colleges, when its revenue amounted to £55. 18. 4.: part of the church was standing till lately, but has been removed for building. The parish comprises about 1500 acres, chiefly arable: the village is pleasantly situated on the road from Swaffham to East Dereham. The living is a perpetual curacy, united to that of Longham; net income, £52; patron, the Earl of Leicester: the church is a neat structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower. At the inclosure, 10 acres were allotted to the poor for fuel.

WENDOVER (St. MARY), a market-town and parish, and formerly an unincorporated borough, in the union of WYCOMBE, hundred of AYLESBURY, county of BUCKINGHAM, 23 miles (S. E. by S.) from Buckingham, and 35 (N. W. by W.) from London; containing 1877 inhabitants. The manor was given by Henry II. to Faramus de Boulogne, and it was subsequently in the possession of the Fiennes; Sir John Molins; Alice Perriers, a favourite of Edward III.; Thomas Holland, Earl of Kent; Edward, Duke of York, in 1338 (between which period and 1564 it was held either by the queen or some branch of the royal family); and Sir Francis Knollys and Catherine his wife. In 1660 it was purchased by the Hampden family, and continued in their possession until the decease of the late lord, when it became the property of the Earl of Buckinghamshire, who sold it to Samuel Smith, Esq., in 1828; it is now the property of Abel Smith, Esq., who represented the borough till its disfranchisement by the act of the 2nd of William IV. The town, situated at the foot of the Chiltern hills, near the entrance to the Vale of Aylesbury, is indifferently built, containing but few good houses; the inhabitants are well supplied with water from wells. Many of the females are engaged in lace-making. A branch of the Grand Junction canal extends to the town, and passes through a reservoir in the neighbourhood, extending over 70 acres. There is a market, granted in 1403, and confirmed in 1464, with two fairs, of which the former is on Monday, and the latter take place on May 13th and October 2nd, chiefly for cattle.

Wendover, which was a borough by prescription, returned members to parliament from the 28th of Edward I. to the 2nd of Edward II., at which period the right ceased, and was unexercised till, after a lapse of more than 400 years, it was restored through the exertions of Mr. Hakeville, a barrister, who, on examining the parliamentary writs in the Tower, in the 21st of James I., discovered that Amersham, Wendover, and Great Marlow, had all sent representatives: Hampden, the patriot, was member for the borough in five successive parliaments. Petty-sessions are held once a fortnight, and courts leet and baron occasionally. The parish comprises 5640*a.* 31*p.*, of which 3787 acres are arable, 1262 meadow and pasture, and 590 woodland. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12. 6. 1., and in the patronage of the Crown, with a net income of £271; impropiator, Abel Smith, Esq., whose tithes have been commuted for £184, and those of the vicar for £46. The church stands about a quarter of a mile from the town. An ancient chapel, dedicated to St. John, was taken down a few years since, to afford a site for an infants' school. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents. Joan Bradshaw, in 1578, left property now producing a rental of £31. 10., half of which is distributed, with £32. 13. arising from other benefactions, among the poor; and William Hill, in 1723, bequeathed an estate now let for £145 per annum, for the support of national schools in the parishes of Bierton and Wendover, and for the distribution of coal to poor men in the above and four other parishes. Roger de Wendover, historiographer to Henry II.; and Richard, Bishop of Rochester, in the reign of Henry III., were natives of the place.

WENDRON (St. WENDRON), a parish, in the union of HELSTON, comprising the borough and market-town of Helston (which has separate jurisdiction), and partly in the W. division of the hundred of KERRIER, W. division of CORNWALL; containing 9160 inhabitants, of whom 5576 are in that portion exclusive of Helston. This parish, which is situated near the coast of the English Channel, comprises about 13,000 acres, of which 3500 are common or waste; it is rich in mineral treasure, and tin and copper mines, within its limits, afford employment to many of the inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, endowed with the rectorial tithes, with the rectory of Helston annexed, valued in the king's books at £26. 19. 4½., and in the gift of Queen's College, Oxford: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £584. 6., and the vicarial for £860. There are places of worship for Baptists, Bryanites, and Wesleyans. On the summit of a hill called Caer Bonalas, is a circle of upright stones, inclosing an intrenchment 35 feet in diameter, in the centre of which are four thin flat stones placed one upon another, the uppermost 19 feet in diameter. On the same hill are two barrows, one of which is inclosed by a wall about five feet high; and between the village and Redruth are nine upright stones called the "nine maidens." Roman coins have been found at a place named Golvaduck Barrow; and at Trehill is an ancient well.

WENDY, a parish, in the union of ROYSTON, hundred of ARMINGFORD, county of CAMBRIDGE, 6¼ miles (N. N. W.) from Royston; containing 151 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with Shingay annexed, valued in the king's books at £5. 10. 10.; net income, £200; patron and impropiator, the Representative of the late Hon. T. Windsor. A school is supported by a rent-charge of £30, given by the late Hon. T. Windsor, who erected the school-house.

WENHAM, GREAT, or COMBUST (St. JOHN), a parish, in the incorporation and hundred of SAMFORD, E. division of SUFFOLK, 8 miles (S. W. by W.) from Ipswich; containing 198 inhabitants, and comprising by admeasurement 1108 acres. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 13. 4.; net income, £211; patron, the Rev. D. C. Whalley.

WENHAM, LITTLE, a parish, in the incorporation and hundred of SAMFORD, E. division of SUFFOLK, 5 miles (S. E. by E.) from Hadleigh; containing 87 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 930 acres, of which the soil is strong and fertile, and the surface flat. The living is a discharged rectory, consolidated with that of Capel St. Mary, and valued in the king's books at £5. 8. 11½.; net income, £250. The church contains memorials of several individuals named Brewes. Here are the remains of an old castellated mansion, the seat of that ancient family, by whom it appears to have been erected in 1569; it has been converted into a granary.

WENHASTON (St. PETER), a parish, in the union and hundred of BLYTHING, E. division of SUFFOLK, 1½ mile (E. S. E.) from Halesworth; containing, with the hamlet of Mells, 1094 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2326*a.* 3*r.* 13*p.*, of which 95 acres are common or waste, and is bounded on the north-east by the navigable river Blythe: the family of Leman had a seat here. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 0. 10., and in the patronage of the Crown; impropiator, the Earl of Gosford. The great tithes have been commuted for £400, and the vicarial for £142; the glebe comprises 8 acres. The church is an ancient structure in the decorated English style, with a square embattled tower, and contains several monuments to the Leman family. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. William Pepyn, in 1562, and Reginald Lessey, in 1563, bequeathed land for the support of a school, which is further supported by subscription.

WENLOCK, LITTLE (St. LAWRENCE), a parish, within the liberties of the borough of WENLOCK, union of MADELEY, S. division of SALOP, 3¼ miles (S.) from Wellington; containing 1091 inhabitants. There are coal and iron mines, and extensive quarries of limestone. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 13. 4, and in the gift of Lord Forester: the tithes have been commuted for £548, and the glebe comprises 12 acres. The church has been enlarged.

WENLOCK, MUCH (HOLY TRINITY), a borough, market-town, and parish, having separate jurisdiction, and the head of a liberty, in the union of MADELEY, S. division of SALOP, 12 miles (S. E.) from Shrewsbury, and 148 (N. W.) from London; containing 2487 inhabitants, of whom 947 are in the township. Of this place, which is of considerable antiquity, the British name was Llan Meilien, or "St. Milburgh's Church;" and in the Monasticism it is denominated Winnica, or "the windy place." Its early importance was derived from the establishment of a convent, about 680, by Milburga, daughter of King Merwald, and niece of Wulfhere, King of Mercia, who presided as abbess, and at her death was interred here. Having been destroyed by the Danes, it was restored by Leofric, Earl of Mercia, in the time of Edward the Confessor, after which it fell into decay. It was rebuilt, or repaired, soon after the Conquest, by Robert de Montgomery, who largely endowed it, converted it into a priory for Cluniac monks, and dedicated it to St. Milburga: at the Dissolution, the revenue was valued at £434. 1. 2. The ruins, which are situated on the south side of the town, are extensive, and present every variety of the most finished specimens of the latest Norman, and the early and decorated English styles. Of the church, the south transept is in the most perfect state: the end and side walls, including the triforium and clerestory windows, are standing, and exhibit the purest specimens of elegant design and elaborate execution; one wall of the north transept also remains, in which is a continuation of the same details. The bases, too, of the four massive piers which supported the tower, and of those that separated the aisles from the nave and choir, are still uncovered by turf, and mark out the ground plan of a cathedral, which for its magnificence and elegant decoration, scarcely had its equal in the kingdom. Three beautiful arches, highly ornamented, form an entrance to the chapter-house, the walls whereof are embellished with successive series of intersecting arches, with clustered columns of exquisite design. Two of the cloisters also remain in a very perfect state; one is of the lighter decorated style, with a lofty ceiling richly groined, and ornamented with slender shafts terminating in corbels on the walls; the other of the more massive, but finished Norman style, with low clustered pillars ranged upon circular plinths.

The town, situated in a pleasant vale, consists principally of one long street from which another diverges at right angles; the houses are in general of brick, and well built, several of them being modern and handsome, with many cottages of stone, having thatched roofs; the streets are macadamized, and the inhabitants are supplied with water by pumps attached to the houses. In the time of Richard II., the place was noted for lime-quarries and copper-mines, of which the former are still extensive, but the latter are not now worked. The market, originally granted to the prior and brethren, is on Monday; and fairs are held on the second Monday in March, and May 12th, for horned-cattle, horses, and sheep, and for hiring servants; July 5th, for sheep; and October 17th and December 4th, for horned-cattle, horses, sheep, and swine. Much Wenlock enjoys many peculiar privileges, with a jurisdiction extending over seventeen parishes. By a charter of incorporation granted by Edward IV., in the seventh year of his reign, confirmed and extended by subsequent sovereigns, the GOVERNMENT was vested in a bailiff, recorder, and an unlimited number of bailiff's peers; but the corporation at present consists of a mayor, six aldermen, and 18 councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76. The borough is divided into three wards, and the number of magistrates is seven; the freedom is obtained by birth after the father has been sworn, and by servitude. The town was the first that possessed the right of parliamentary representation by virtue of a charter from the crown, and the elective franchise was granted in 1478, by Edward IV., when it returned one member; at present it sends two, chosen by the £10 householders of the borough, which comprises an area of 47,589 acres; the mayor is returning officer. A court of requests takes place under the 22nd of George III., for the recovery of debts under 40s.; and manorial courts are held at Easter and Michaelmas, at the latter of which, constables are appointed. The guildhall is an ancient building of timber frame-work, resting on piazzas, and is more remarkable for its antiquity than the beauty of its architecture. Wenlock is the head of a deanery: the living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12. 9. 7.; net income, £180; patron and impropiator, Sir W. W. Wynn, Bart. The tithes were commuted for land in 1773. The church, a venerable structure, with a square tower surmounted by a spire, partakes, in a very remote degree, of the style of the abbey, being partly Norman, and partly decorated English; the interior consists of a chancel, nave, and aisles, separated by clustered piers and obtusely-pointed arches. A small theological library, left by one of the vicars for the use of the clergy, was, about forty years since, extended by subscription into a circulating library for the use of the inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also a free school, endowed with £14. 5. 10. per annum, by the Rev. Francis Southern, and others. Paul Beilby Thompson, Esq., was created Baron Wenlock on the 2nd of May, 1839.

WENN, ST., a parish, in the union of ST. COLUMB MAJOR, E. division of the hundred of PYDER and of the county of CORNWALL, 4 miles (N. E. by E.) from St. Columb Major; containing 725 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church, comprises 3858 acres, whereof 1166 are common or waste; and is intersected in the northern part by the river Camel, a few miles to the south of its influx into the Bristol Channel. Fairs for cattle are held at Tregonetha on April 25th, May 6th, and August 1st. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £16. 6. 8., and in the patronage of W. Rashleigh, Esq.: the church, with the exception of the tower, was rebuilt in 1825. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a school is endowed with £5 per annum.

WENNINGTON (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union of ROMFORD, hundred of CHAFFORD, S. division of ESSEX, 7 miles (S. S. E.) from Romford; containing 281 inhabitants. The parish is bounded by the river Thames, from the banks whereof extends a considerable tract of marsh land; and comprises 1100 acres, of which more than half are pasture, about 16 woodland, and the remainder arable. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8, and in the gift of the Bishop of London: the tithes have been commuted for £420, and the glebe comprises 3 acres. The church is a handsome ancient structure, with a square embattled tower.

WENNINGTON, a township, in the parish of MEL-LING, hundred of LONSDALE, south of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 6½ miles (S. by E.) from Kirkby-Lonsdale; containing 148 inhabitants.

WENSLEY (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of LEYBURN, wapentake of HANG-WEST, N. riding of YORK; containing, with the chapelries of Bolton-Castle and Redmire, and the townships of Leyburn and Preston-under-Scar, 1969 inhabitants, of whom 309 are in Wensley township, 3 miles (N. W. by W.) from Middleham. In the township are 1940 acres, of which 45 are common or waste; it is chiefly the property of Lord Bolton, who is lord of the manor. The river Ure runs through the parish, and is crossed by an ancient bridge, which was erected about the commencement of the fourteenth century, and has been lately widened and repaired, at the expense of the riding. The village, which is well built, is pleasantly situated on the north bank of the river. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £49. 9. 9½.; net income, £1337; patron, Lord Bolton. In the church is some fine screen-work, which is said to have belonged to the abbey of St. Agatha, near Richmond. There is a national school. About three miles north-west of the village are the ruins of Bolton Castle, erected in the reign of Richard II., by Richard, Lord Scroop, high chancellor of England: according to Leland, it consisted of four principal towers, and was eighteen years in building, at a cost of £12,000, with timber brought from Inglewood Forest, in Cumberland, the conveyance of which was the chief cause of the great expense. In one of the towers, Mary, Queen of Scots, was imprisoned for about two years, ending in 1569. Vestiges of an extensive religious building are discernible near the village: about forty years since, large quantities of stone, and some fine specimens of highly-carved Gothic windows, were dug from the ruins; and in sloping a precipitous bank near them, in the spring of 1843, the skeletons of thirty human bodies were removed, and interred below. Near the foot of an ancient yew-tree of immense magnitude, human bones, and those of horses, with various implements of war, were found some years since, in a mass of black earth.

WENSLEY-FOLD, a township, in the parish, union, and Lower division of the hundred, of BLACKBURN, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 1¾ mile (W. by N.) from Blackburn; containing 1047 inhabitants, upwards of 300 of whom are employed in a spinning establishment. It is bounded on the south by the river Derwent.

WENTNOR (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of CLUN, hundred of PURSLOW, S. division of SALOP, 5½ miles (N. E. by E.) from Bishop's-Castle; containing 715 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 6000 acres, of which the substratum is rich in mineral produce; the Bog lead-mines, which are very productive, are in the parish, and there are quarries of stone used chiefly for the road. The village is pleasantly situated, and a few of the inhabitants are employed in a small woollen manufactory. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 2. 11.; net income, £189; patrons, the Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford. The church is ancient. There is a place of worship for Independents; also a school endowed with £100 new four per cents., and a house and garden.

WENTWORTH, or WINGFORD, a parish, in the hundred of SOUTH WITCHFORD, union and ISLE of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, 4½ miles (W. S. W.) from Ely; containing 155 inhabitants. It comprises 1437*a. 3r. 38p.*, of which 1128 acres are arable, and 309 meadow and pasture; the soil is partly clay. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10, and in the gift of the Dean and Chapter of Ely: the tithes have been commuted for £450, and the glebe comprises 28 acres. The church is of the early and decorated English character, with some Norman details, and contains about 100 sittings.

WENTWORTH, a chapelry, in the parish of WATH-UPON-DEARNE, union of ROTHERHAM, N. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, 5½ miles (N. W. by N.) from Rotherham; containing 1497 inhabitants. This township, which comprises 2233*a. 2r. 10p.*, belonged, from a very remote period, anterior to the existence of any authentic records, to a family who adopted for their surname that of the township. The most remarkable member of this family was Sir Thomas Wentworth, the second baronet, celebrated in history as Earl of Strafford, after whose attainder and execution in 1641, his estates and titles were restored to his son William, who, dying without issue in 1695, left his estates to the Hon. Thomas Watson, third son of his eldest sister, Anne, who had married Edward Watson, Lord Rockingham. Mr. Watson, on succeeding to his uncle's property, assumed the name of Wentworth in addition to his own, and, dying in 1723, left an only son, Thomas, who, on the revival of the order of the Bath in 1725, was installed one of the first knights; he was elected a representative for the county of York in the first parliament of George II., and in 1728 was raised to the peerage under the title of Lord Malton. In 1734 he was created Earl of Malton, and in 1746 Marquess of Rockingham, having succeeded to the barony of Rockingham on the death of the Earl of Rockingham, the head of his paternal family, the year preceding. Thomas, Marquess of Rockingham, died in 1750, and was succeeded by his only surviving son, Charles, second marquess, after whose death, in 1782, the estate of Wentworth devolved upon William, the late Earl Fitzwilliam, his nephew, son of his eldest sister, Anne, who had married William the preceding earl.

The ancient mansion of the Wentworth family, originally called Wentworth-Woodehouse, was rebuilt at various times by the first Marquess of Rockingham, who gave it its modern appellation of Wentworth House. The present mansion is a very spacious structure, covering about two acres of ground; the west front towards the gardens, erected by Sir Thomas Wentworth in 1726, is 260 feet in length, partly of stone and partly of brick. The east front towards the park, was built between the years 1740 and 1745, chiefly in the style of Wanstead House; it is 612 feet in length, including the wings, and the central portion or main body of the house, which is 260 feet in length, is embellished with a boldly projecting portico of the Corinthian order, having six lofty columns in the front. The principal apartments are, the saloon, nearly 60 feet square, and 40 feet in height; the dining and drawing room, each 38 feet square, and 24 feet in height; and a gallery 126 feet long, which looks into the gardens: the chapel is 45 feet long, 25 wide, and two stories in height. The house contains a valuable collection of paintings, and many portraits, among which are several by Vandyke of the most eminent characters of the time of Charles I.; and in the saloon, and the museum adjoining it, are some marbles, chiefly copies of the antique statues, collected by the late Marquess of Rockingham.

The grounds are very extensive, and partly appropriated to deer; at the southern extremity is a Doric column, commenced by Lord Rockingham, to commemorate the naval glory of England, and called the Keppel column, from the admiral of that name. On a hill in the north of the park is a pyramidal building erected by Thomas, Marquess of Rockingham, to commemorate the suppression of the rebellion in 1745, and the pacification of Europe by the treaty of Aix la Chapelle in 1748. Nearly opposite to the principal front of the house, and about a mile distant from it, in the park, is a mausoleum, erected by the late Earl Fitzwilliam to the memory of his uncle, the Marquess of Rockingham. This building, which is 90 feet in height, consists of three stories, the lowest of which is of the Doric order, and contains a statue of Lord Rockingham, by Nolken, in the centre; and in four surrounding niches are busts of the Duke of Portland and Mr. Frederick Montague, of Burke and Sir George Savile, of Charles James Fox and Admiral Keppel, and of Mr. John Lee and Lord John Cavendish. The village, which is large and well built, is situated near the western boundary of the park. The chapel is a neat plain structure, of which a great part was rebuilt in the time of William, Earl of Strafford; it contains many monuments to the Wentworths, among which is one to Thomas, Earl of Strafford, and in the cemetery is the family vault of Earl Fitzwilliam, inclosed with an iron palisade. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £125; patron, Earl Fitzwilliam. An hospital for twelve aged persons, and a school for boys at a place called the Barrow, were founded and endowed by the Hon. Thomas Watson Wentworth; and a girls' school and an infants' school have been recently erected by Lord Fitzwilliam.

WEOBLEY (St. Peter and St. Paul), a market-town and parish, the head of a union, and formerly an incorporated borough, in the hundred of STRET福德, county of HEREFORD, 12 miles (N. W.) from Hereford, and 145 (W. N. W.) from London; containing 907 inhabitants, of whom 548 are in the borough, and 359 in Weobley Foreign. This ancient town consists of one principal street on the main road from Hereford to Knighton. The market is on Thursday; and fairs are held on the 9th of May and Oct. 18th, for cattle and hardware. The elective franchise was granted in the reign of Edward I., and renewed by Charles I.; suppressed by Cromwell, restored by Charles II., and withdrawn in the 2nd of William IV. A manorial court is held in October, the jurisdiction of which extends to the recovery of debts under 40s.; and the petty-sessions for the hundred take place here. The parish comprises 3309*a. 2r. 30p.*: there are quarries of good building-stone, and of stone fit only for the roads. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 1., and in the gift of the appropriator, the Bishop of Hereford: the great tithes have been commuted for £358, and the vicarial for £250, with a glebe-house, and 11 acres of land. The church is a spacious structure in the later English style, with an embattled tower surmounted by a lofty spire, and contains many handsome monuments, among which is one to Col. Birch, who distinguished himself in the parliamentary war. There is a small Roman Catholic chapel. A free grammar school was founded in 1655, by William Crowther, citizen of London, and endowed with £20 per annum; he likewise bequeathed £100 to build a school-house. The poor law union of Weobley comprises 26 parishes or places, and has a population of 8478. On the south side of the town are the remains of an ancient castle which was taken by Stephen in the war between him and the Empress Matilda, for whom it had been kept by William Talbot.

WEONARD'S, ST., a parish, in the union of Ross, Lower division of the hundred of WORMELOW, county of HEREFORD, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Ross; containing 644 inhabitants. This place was plundered by the Scottish troopers during the siege of Hereford, in the time of the parliamentary war; and a spot is still called Scot's Brook, where a Scottish soldier, who was taking bread out of the oven, was killed by the woman of the cottage. The parish comprises 4536*a. 3r. 1p.*, of which the greater portion is arable land: there are some quarries of building and flag-stone. The living is annexed, with those of Little Dewchurch, Hentland, and Llangarran, to the vicarage of Lugwardine: the great tithes have been commuted for £456, and the vicarial for £209. The church is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower. There are places of worship for Primitive Methodists and Wesleyans. Treago, an estate in the parish, has belonged to the family of Mynors ever since the Conquest; the mansion is of high antiquity, and of very singular architecture.

WEREHAM (St. Margaret), a parish, in the union of DOWNHAM, hundred of CLACKCLOSE, W. division of NORFOLK, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. W.) from Stoke-Ferry; containing 625 inhabitants. A Benedictine priory in honour of St. Winwaloe, or St. Guenolo, was founded here about the beginning of the reign of John, by the Earl of Clare, as a cell to the abbey of Mounstroll, in France; it was given in 1321 to the abbey of West Dercham, and at the Dissolution had a revenue of £7. 2. 8. The parish comprises 2104*a. 27p.*, of which 893 acres are arable, 877 pasture and meadow, 29 wood, and 297 fenland: the village is on the road from Lynn to Bury St. Edmund's. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Wretton annexed; net income, £109; patron, Edward R. Pratt, Esq., who with the Trustees of G. R. Eyres, Esq., is impropiator. The great tithes have been commuted for £253. 12., and the small for £290. 10.; the tithes of about 200 acres belonging to John Houchen, Esq., of Wereham Hall, and others, have merged in the land. The church, chiefly in the early and later styles, has a square embattled tower, and in the interior are neat memorials to the Adamson, Heaton, Mason, and other families. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. At the inclosure, about 25 acres of land were allotted to the poor for fuel; and the interest of £500 left by Miss Sarah Adamson in 1791, of £300 by Richard Adamson, Esq., in 1800, and £100 by John Whyte, Esq., in 1826, is appropriated to charitable uses. St. Winwaloe's Well still exists in the parish.

WERNETH, a township, in the parish and union of STOCKPORT, hundred of MACCLESFIELD, N. division of the county of CHESTER, 4 miles (N. E. by E.) from Stockport; containing 3904 inhabitants. This place, situated on the right bank of the river Etherow, and upon the edge of Derbyshire, is noticed in the Norman survey as Warnet. The township comprises the hamlets of Gee-Cross and Compstal-Bridge, the former of which takes its name from the ancient family of Gee, who erected here a cross of stone, which has disappeared; it consists of one wide street, half a mile in length, through which passes the road from Stockport to Mottram-in-Longendale. The cotton manufacture, calico-printing, and the making of hats, are extensively carried on; and coal-mines and stone-quarries abound.

Fairs for cattle take place at Gee-Cross, on April 28th and November 20th; and the Peak-Forest canal passes through the township. The tithes have been commuted for £52. A local fund of £50 per annum has been obtained towards the stipend of a curate, and it is in contemplation to erect a church: a schoolroom has been licensed in the mean time for the performance of divine service. There is a place of worship for Unitarians. In the immediate vicinity of Gee-Cross rises the celebrated Werneth Loc, which, though of very considerable height, is inclosed and cultivated to its summit; the hill commands a most extensive and varied prospect.

WERRINGTON (St. Martin and St. Giles), a parish, in the union of LAUNCESTON, hundred of BLACK TORRINGTON, Lifton and N. divisions of DEVON, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Launceston; containing 685 inhabitants. The living is a donative curacy, in the patronage of the Earl of Buckinghamshire, with a net income of £229: the tithes have been commuted for £290.

WERRINGTON, a chapelry, in the parish of PASTON, union and soke of PETERBOROUGH, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Peterborough; containing 629 inhabitants. The interest of £100, bequeathed by John Goodwin in 1755, is distributed among widows.

WERVIN, a township, in the parish of St. Oswald, city of CHESTER, union of GREAT BOUGHTON, Lower division of the hundred of BROXTON, S. division of the county of CHESTER, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Chester; containing 65 inhabitants. The Ellesmere, or Wirrall, canal bounds it on the west.

WESHAM, with MEDLAR, a township, in the parish of KIRKHAM, union of the FYLDE, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (N. by W.) from Kirkham; containing 209 inhabitants.

WESSINGTON, a township, in the parish of CRICH, union of CHESTERFIELD, hundred of SCARSDALE, N. division of the county of DERBY, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Alfreton; containing 530 inhabitants.

WEST ACOMB, county of NORTHUMBERLAND.—See ACOMB, WEST.—And other places having a similar distinguishing prefix will be found under the proper name.

WEST-ACRE (All Saints), a parish, in the union and hundred of FREEBRIDGE-LYNN, W. division of NORFOLK, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Swaffham; containing 490 inhabitants. The parish is the property of A. Hamond, Esq., whose seat, High House, is a handsome mansion in the Italian style, finely situated in a well-wooded park. The river Nar intersects the parish. The living is a donative; net income, £31; patron and impropiator, Mr. Hamond. The church is partly in the early and partly in the later English style, with a square embattled tower, and contains the mausoleum of the Hamond family, and many beautiful monuments to several of its members. A priory of Black canons, in honour of St. Mary and All Saints, was founded here in the time of William Rufus, by Ralph de Toney, and at the Dissolution had a revenue of £308. 19. 11.: the remains of this once celebrated house exhibit specimens of the early and later English styles.

WESTANSWICK, a township, in the parish of STOKES-UPON-TERN, Drayton division of the hundred of NORTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP; containing 200 inhabitants.

WESTBEER (All Saints), a parish, in the union of BLEAN, hundred of BLEANGATE, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, E. division of KENT, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Canterbury; containing 234 inhabitants. It comprises 1158a. 3r. 26p., of which 400 acres are marsh, 200 meadow and pasture, 20 woodland, and the remainder arable. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £274, and the glebe comprises two acres. The Archbishop of Canterbury is appropriator of the great tithes of a district called Rushbourne, which have been exchanged for £90. A piece of land comprising nearly two acres, was left to the parish by an unknown benefactor, for supplying every resident person with a roll of bread, a piece of cheese, and part of 28 gallons of beer annually, which the tenants paid in lieu of rent; but on the demise of the last occupier, the parish took possession, and let the land out in small allotments to the poor at a trifling rent, which has been productive of great benefit.

WESTBOROUGH (All Saints), a parish, in the union of NEWARK, wapentake of LOVEDEN, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, 7 miles (N. W. by N.) from Grantham; containing 250 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in mediety, in the patronage and incumbency of the Rev. R. Hall: the first mediety, with the vicarage of Dry Doddington annexed, is valued in the king's books at £20; net income, £76: the second is valued at £6. 13. 4.; net income, £477. The tithes were commuted for land in 1770.

WESTBOURNE, SUSSEX.—See BOURNE, WEST.

WEST BROMWICH.—See BROMWICH, WEST.

WESTBROOK, a tything, in the parish of BOXFORD, union of NEWBURY, hundred of KINTBURY-EAGLE, county of BERKS, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Speenhamland; containing 209 inhabitants.

WESTBURY (St. Augustine), a parish in the union of BRACKLEY, hundred and county of BUCKINGHAM, 3 miles (E. S. E.) from Brackley; containing 471 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 2500 acres, of which 1000 are arable, 700 meadow and pasture, and 800 woodland. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 17. 1.; net income, £106; patron and impropiator, Benjamin Price, Esq. The church has been enlarged. The rent of an allotment awarded under an inclosure act, in 1764, amounting to about £11 per annum, is distributed among the poor, who have also the right of cutting furze for fuel on the land.

WESTBURY (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of ATCHAM, hundred of FORD, S. division of SALOP; containing, with the chapelry of Minsterley, 2435 inhabitants, of whom 1521 are in the township of Westbury (including Westley and Yockleton townships), $8\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Shrewsbury. The parish comprises about 10,000 acres, of which the soil is chiefly heavy, and well adapted for wheat, with some portions of good barley and turnip land; the surface is chiefly flat, though in parts hilly. The substratum abounds with coal, of which mines are in extensive operation; and lead-ore appears to have been wrought at a very early period. At Snailbeach, where is an extensive mine now at work, a pig of lead has been found, marked with the name of the Emperor Aurelian; and on the adjoining hill called the Stiperstones, a labourer, who a few years since was digging a ditch, struck his spade against a large mass of rock containing lead-ore, within a few feet of the surface; a mine was immediately sunk on the spot, and many labourers were employed for several months in cutting away this single block. Petty-sessions for the division are held during the winter months. The living is a rectory in two portions; Westbury in Dextera Parte, valued in the king's books at £13. 9. 4½, and having a net income of £643; and Westbury in Sinistra Parte, valued at £11. 12. 8½, and having a net income of £556. They are both in the patronage of E. W. S. Owen, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £1055, of which £281. 8. are payable to an impropriator; and the glebe comprises 33 acres. The Rev. John Earl, in 1716, gave land producing about £30 per annum, for teaching children.

WESTBURY (ST. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of WELLS, hundred of WELLS-FORUM, E. division of SOMERSET, 4 miles (N. W. by W.) from Wells; containing 647 inhabitants. It comprises 2968*a. 2r. 26p.*, lying generally at the base of the Mendip hills; the substratum contains limestone of good quality, which is quarried for building and for burning into lime. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Priddy annexed, valued in the king's books at £11. 4. 9½, and in the gift of the appropriator, the Bishop of Bath and Wells: the great tithes have been commuted for £150, and the vicarial for £183; the glebe comprises 12 acres. The church is a plain structure, built partly in the reign of Stephen, and partly in that of Edward IV. A good glebe-house was lately erected.

WESTBURY, a hamlet, in the parish of EAST MEON, union of PETERSFIELD, hundred of MEON-STOKE, Petersfield and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 6¼ miles (W.) from Petersfield; containing 12 inhabitants.

Seal and Arms.

WESTBURY (ALL SAINTS), a borough and parish, forming the hundred of WESTBURY, and the head of the union of WESTBURY and WHORWELSDOWN, Westbury and S. divisions, and Trowbridge and Bradford subdivisions, of WILTS; containing, with the chapelries of Bratton and Dilton, and the township of Leigh, 7588 inhabitants, of whom 3631 are in the town, 24 miles (N. W. by W.) from Salisbury, and 98 (W. by S.) from London. This place is of very great antiquity, and is generally supposed to have been a British settlement, and to occupy the site of the Roman station Verlucio. The name is of Saxon origin, being intended to designate the importance, or relative position of the town: here, according to tradition, was a palace belonging to the West Saxon kings. The town is situated under Salisbury Plain, and consists of three principal streets, irregularly built, branching off towards Frome, Bradford, and East Lavington; the inhabitants are supplied with water from springs, and a small stream which falls into the Avon. The clothing trade formerly flourished here, one house alone employing 1000 persons: the principal manufactures are broad-cloth and kerseymere, there being in and near the town eight factories, and several others within the parish. A considerable quantity of malt, also, is made. The market, now merely nominal, is on Tuesday, for pigs only; and fairs are held on the first Friday in Lent and Whit-Monday, for pedlery; and on Easter-Monday and September 24th, for cattle, horses, and cheese.

A charter of incorporation was granted by Henry IV., and the municipal body consists of a mayor, recorder, twelve aldermen, and burgesses, with subordinate officers, none of them, however, exercising magisterial authority. Courts leet are held by the mayor in November, and by the steward of the lord of the manor in May; and there is also a court of requests, for the recovery of debts under £5, held here and at Warminster alternately, every fortnight, on Tuesday. Two high constables are appointed at the manorial court. The borough constantly returned two members to parliament from the 27th of Henry VI. to the 2nd of William IV., when it was deprived of one, and the right of election was extended to the £10 householders of the entire parish; the mayor is returning officer. A handsome town-hall was erected in 1815, at the expense of the late Sir Manasseh Masseh Lopes, Bart. The parish comprises about 11,530 acres, of which 1700 are downs, 600 woodland, and the remainder arable, pasture, and orchard. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the patronage of the Precentor of the Cathedral of Salisbury (the appropriator), valued in the king's books at £44. 16. 0½; net income, £294. The church is a spacious structure, with a central tower, supposed to have been built about 900 years since; in the interior are several handsome monuments. There are places of worship for Independents, Baptists, and Wesleyans. John Matravers, an opulent clothier of the place, and a member of the Society of Friends, in 1814, gave £1000 to found a free school, and £1000 for clothing women at Christmas. The sum of £17, being the dividends of a bequest of £500 by John Gibbs, in 1772, is appropriated to supplying clothing to six men; and Westbury is entitled every fourth year to about £30, the rent of an estate bequeathed in 1615, by Thomas Ray, for the relief of clothiers. The poor law union of Westbury and Whorwelsdown comprises 10 parishes or places, and contains a population of 13,395. Roman coins have been found in great abundance. William de Westbury, one of the puisne judges of the court of common pleas; and James Ley, Earl of Marlborough, are interred within the church: and Bryan Edwards, historian of the British Colonies in the West Indies; and Dr. Philip Withers, a writer of some eminence about the close of the last century, were natives of the town.

WESTBURY-UPON-SEVERN (ST. PETER AND ST. PAUL), a parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of WESTBURY, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 2½ miles (N. E. by E.) from Newnham; containing 2925 inhabitants. This place is bounded on the east and south by the river Severn, which is here crossed by a ferry to Framilode: it was the scene of some military transactions during the civil war of the 17th century. The parish comprises 8025*a. 2r. 5p.*, of which 290 acres are woodland, and the remainder arable and pasture, in nearly equal portions, with a considerable quantity of orchard and garden ground. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £20. 2. 8½., and in the patronage of the Custos of the College of Vicars-Choral in the Cathedral of Hereford, the appropriators: the great tithes have been commuted for £628, and the vicarial for £291. 11. The church is partly in the decorated and partly in the later English style, with a square embattled tower; over the west door is a crucifix, with the figures of St. Mary and St. John sculptured in stone. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a school is endowed with £10 per annum. The poor law union of Westbury comprises 13 parishes or places, containing a population of 14,619.

WESTBURY-UPON-TRYM (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of CLIFTON, partly in the Lower division of the hundred of HENBURY, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, and partly in the county of the city of BRISTOL, 3 miles (N. N. W.) from Bristol; containing, with the chapelry of Shirehampton, and tything of Bishop-Stoke, 5029 inhabitants, of whom 1707 are in Westbury township. The parish is bounded on the south-west by the river Avon, and comprises by survey 5100 acres of land, of which the substratum abounds with limestone, quarried for building and for burning into lime; the celebrated stone called Cotham stone is obtained, and lead-ore has been found, of which some mines were formerly in operation. About a mile and a half north-east of the village, is a prodigious cavern called Pen-Park Hole. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £630; patron and impropriator, the Rev. Charles Vivian, whose tithes have been commuted for £472, and whose glebe comprises 24 acres. The church is an ancient structure, partly in the early and partly in the later English style, with a square embattled tower, and was formerly collegiate; the chancel was built by Bishop Carpenter. There are chapels of ease at Redland and Shirehampton. The Wesleyans have a place of worship; and a national school is supported. A monastery existed here early in the ninth century, which was refounded near the close of the eleventh; it was dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, and made a cell to the priory of Worcester, but was dissolved in the reign of Henry I. About 1288, it became a college for a dean and canons, in honour of the Holy Trinity; in 1443, it was rebuilt, and its possessions augmented by William Canning, a merchant, and Dr. Carpenter, who held the see of Worcester, and styled himself Bishop of Worcester and Westbury. Its revenue at the Dissolution was estimated at £232. 14.; and the house, which remained till the reign of Charles I., was burned by Prince Rupert, to prevent its falling into the power of the parliament, though some traces of it are still visible in a mansion erected on its site. Wickliffe, prebendary of Aust, and Bishop Carpenter, were natives of this place, and were interred here.

WESTBY, with BASINGTHORPE, a parish, in the union of GRANTHAM, wapentake of BELTISLOE, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, 3¼ miles (N. W.) from Corby; containing 137 inhabitants, of whom 96 are in Westby. There is a place of worship for Roman Catholics.

WESTBY, with PLUMPTONS, a township, in the parish of KIRKHAM, union of the FYLDE, hundred of AMOURNERNESS, N. division of the county of LANCAS-TER, 2½ miles (W.) from Kirkham; containing 643 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £663. 10., of which £590. 10. are payable to the Dean and Chapter of Christ-Church, Oxford, and £71. 6. 8. to the vicar of the parish.

WESTCOTE (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of STOW-ON-THE-WOLD, Upper division of the hundred of SLAUGHTER, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 4 miles (S. E. by S.) from Stow; containing 240 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 1503 acres, of which 450 are arable, 100 wood, and the remainder meadow and pasture; the soil on the hills is a stone brash, and in the lower lands a strong clay. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 7. 3½.; net income, £209; patron and incumbent, the Rev. T. P. Pantin, who is also lord of the manor. The church is an ancient structure, partly in the Norman style. In the register is recorded the marriage of Sir Thomas Littleton, Knt. and Bart., treasurer of the navy in 1682.

WESTCOTE, a hamlet, in the parish of TYSOE, union of SHIPSTON-ON-STOUR, Kington division of the hundred of KINGTON, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 5 miles (S. E. by E.) from Kington; containing 23 inhabitants.

WESTCOTT, a hamlet, in the parish of WADDSDON, union of AYLESBURY, hundred of ASHENDON, county of BUCKINGHAM, 7 miles (W. N. W.) from Aylesbury; containing 303 inhabitants.

WESTEND, a township, in the parish of BURGH-UPON-THE-SANDS, union of CARLISLE, ward, and E. division of the county, of CUMBERLAND.

WESTEND, a hamlet, in the parish of NORTHOLT, union of UXBRIDGE, hundred of ELTHORNE, county of MIDDLESEX; containing 214 inhabitants.

WESTEND, a tything, in the parish of WORPLESDON, union of GUILDFORD, First division of the hundred of WOKEING, W. division of SURREY; containing 341 inhabitants.

WESTENHANGER, or OSTENHANGER (St. THOMAS à BECKET), an ancient parish, now a manor in the parish of STANDFORD, union of ELHAM, hundred of STOUTING, lathe of SHEPWAY, E. division of KENT, 3 miles (N. W.) from Hythe; containing 50 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 12. 6., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church has been long demolished.

WESTERDALE, a parish, in the union of GUISBOROUGH, E. division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, N. riding of YORK, 7½ miles (S. S. E.) from Guisborough; containing 265 inhabitants. The parish comprises 15,930 acres, of which 14,000 are common or waste; it is in the district of Cleveland, in one of the wildest parts of which is the vale, pleasingly sequestered, and watered by the river Esk. The soil is in general dry; the crops are tolerably good, and numerous sheep are depastured upon the adjoining commons. The Yowards were a family anciently resident here, and possessed considerable property. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Stokesley: the tithes have been commuted for £250, and the glebe comprises 11 acres. The church was rebuilt in 1839, by the inhabitants, at a cost of £400, and contains 200 sittings, all free. Some children are instructed in a parochial school, for £15 a year, arising from bequests.

WESTERFIELD (St. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish, in the union of IPSWICH, partly within that borough, and partly in the hundred of BOSMERE and CLAYDON, E. division of SUFFOLK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Ipswich; containing 324 inhabitants, and comprising 1070*a.* 3*r.* 32*p.* The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 10. 7½., and in the gift of the Bishop of Ely: the tithes have been commuted for £350, and the glebe comprises 4 acres. Bridget Collett, in 1662, bequeathed land producing about £10 per annum, in support of a school; and Francis Brooke, Esq., appropriated a moiety of the interest of £300 to provide clothing and books for the scholars, and the other half to purchase coal for the poor.

WESTERGATE, a hamlet, in the parish of ALDINGBOURN, union of WEST HAMNETT, hundred of BOX and STOCKBRIDGE, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of the county of SUSSEX, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Chichester; containing 260 inhabitants.

WESTERHAM (St. MARY), a market-town and parish, in the union of SEVEN-OAKS, hundred of WESTERHAM, lathe of SUTTON-AT-HONE, W. division of KENT, 22 miles (W.) from Maidstone, and 21 (S. S. E.) from London; containing 2162 inhabitants. The name of this town implies its situation on the western border of the county. Two remarkable phenomena, called land slips, occurred here on the southern escarpment of the Sand hill in 1596 and 1756; in the former, nine acres of ground continued in motion for eleven days, and in the latter, two acres and a half, some parts sinking into pits, and others rising into hills. The town stands on the northern declivity of the same formation, and is of neat and clean appearance; about the centre is the market-house. The river Darent rises in the parish, and, after watering the ancient park of Squerries, takes a north-eastern direction. The market, which was granted in the 25th of Edward III. to the abbot of Westminster, who possessed the manor, is on Wednesday; and there is a cattle-fair on May 3rd. The place is within the jurisdiction of a court of requests held for the hundred, for the recovery of debts under £5. The living is a vicarage, with that of Edenbridge annexed, valued in the king's books at £19. 19. 4½.; net income, £608; patron and incumbent, the Rev. Richard Board; impropiators, H. V. Bodicoate, Esq., and others. The church is a large and venerable structure. There is a place of worship for dissenters. Bishop Hoadly and the celebrated General Wolfe were natives of the town; in the church is a simple tablet, with the well-known elegant tribute to the memory of the latter, and in the grounds of Squerries is a pillar, erected for the like purpose.

WESTERLEIGH (St. JAMES), a parish, in the union of CHIPPING-SODBURY, hundred of PUCKLE-CHURCH, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 3 miles (S. W. by W.) from Chipping-Sodbury; containing, with the hamlets of Coal-Pit-Heath, Henfield, Kendalshire, Mayshill, and Nibley, 1776 inhabitants. This place anciently formed part of the parish of Puckle-Church, and was not invested with parochial rights, nor had a church, till the fourteenth century. The parish comprises 4009 acres, of which 577 are common or waste land. Coal is procured in considerable quantities, and is conveyed to Bristol by a railroad, which is worked by horses, and passes through a tunnel 1540 feet in length; it was constructed at an expense of £77,000, is nine miles long, and joins the Avon and Gloucestershire railway. From this place, also, the Bristol and Gloucester railway, worked by locomotive-engines, proceeds to its junction with the Cheltenham and Great Western railway at Standish. The living is united, with that of Abson, to the vicarage of Puckle-Church: the church is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a lofty tower, and a stone pulpit. Sir John Smythe, Bart., in 1715, gave an annuity of £20 in support of schools. Edward Fowler, Bishop of Gloucester, a theological writer of the 17th century, was born here.

WESTERTON, a township, in the new district of COUNDON, parish of ST. ANDREW AUCKLAND, union of AUCKLAND, S. E. division of DARLINGTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Bishop-Auckland; containing 89 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 650 acres, and is situated on a commanding eminence on the road from St. Andrew Auckland to Durham: the village lies a little eastward of the road. There is a circular tower called Westerton Tolly. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £84. 7. 4.

WESTFIELD (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of MITFORD and LAUNDITCH, hundred of MITFORD, W. division of NORFOLK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from East Dereham; containing 138 inhabitants. It comprises 569*a.* 13*p.*, of which 470 acres are arable, and 88 pasture and meadow. The living is a discharged rectory, united to that of Whinbergh, and valued in the king's books at £4. 4. 2.: the tithes have been commuted for £145, and the glebe comprises 20 acres. The church is chiefly in the early English style, with a square tower. At the inclosure, $5\frac{1}{2}$ acres were allotted to the poor for fuel.

WESTFIELD (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of BATTLE, hundred of BALDSLOW, rape of HASTINGS, E. division of SUSSEX, 6 miles (E. by S.) from Battle; containing 866 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the north by the Brede channel, and intersected by the new road from Hastings into Kent; the surface is beautifully diversified with hill and dale, and the scenery is richly embellished with wood. The substratum contains iron-stone and sandstone, and the former was anciently smelted in furnaces erected for the purpose. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11. 6. 8.; net income, £372; patron, the Bishop of Chichester; appropriator, the Bishop of Winchester. The church is in the early English style, with some Norman details, and a low massive tower.

WESTGATE, a township, in the parish of ST. JOHN, NEWCASTLE, union of NEWCASTLE, W. division of CASTLE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND; containing 10,489 inhabitants. It comprises about 112 acres, forming the north-western suburb of the town of Newcastle; and several streets, containing many handsome residences, have lately been erected. Some of the loftiest ground in the vicinity of Newcastle is here.

WESTHALL (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union and hundred of BLYTHING, E. division of SUFFOLK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Halesworth; containing 412 inhabitants. This place was anciently the property of the Bohun family, of whose castellated mansion the south front only is remaining. The parish comprises 2316 acres, of which 125 are common or waste land. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 2. 3½, and in the gift of the appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Norwich: the great tithes have been commuted for £456, and the vicarial for £144; the glebe comprises 82 acres. The church is partly in the decorated and partly in the later style, with a square embattled tower; the entrance from the tower is through a highly-enriched Norman arch, and there are various other interesting details of that style.

WESTHAM (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of EASTBOURNE, lowey and rape of PEVENSEY, E. division of SUSSEX, 6 miles (N. E.) from Eastbourne; containing 770 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the south by the English Channel, comprises by measurement 4478 acres, of which 1376 are arable, 3050 meadow and pasture, and 52 woodland. On the shore are several martello towers, and a coast-guard station; the village is on the road to Battle and Hastings, and near it are the ruins of Pevensey Castle. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £21. 10. 10., and in the gift of the impropiator, the Earl of Burlington: the great tithes have been commuted for £302. 15., and the vicarial for £570; the glebe comprises 1½ acre. The church is partly in the later English style, with a square embattled tower, and partly of earlier date. A national school has been established; and there is an almshouse containing four tenements, called the hospital of St. John, endowed with 30 acres of land, given, it is supposed, by one of the religious societies of Layney and Priest Hawes, the remains of which have been converted into farm-buildings. A girls' school was erected in 1813, for the support of which £20 per annum have been granted from the revenue of the hospital.

WEST HAMPNETT.—See HAMPNETT, WEST.

WESTHIDE, a parish, in the hundred of RADLOW, union and county of HEREFORD, 5½ miles (N. E. by E.) from Hereford; containing 159 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Hereford to Bromyard, and comprises by measurement 1100 acres, of which 365 are arable, 425 meadow and pasture, 60 hop-plantations, and 250 woodland; the soil is generally a reddish clay, producing good crops of wheat; the surface is undulated, and there are quarries of limestone, used chiefly for rough building and for the roads. An extension of the Gloucester and Ledbury canal to Hereford is in progress, and will skirt the parish, where will be a commodious wharf. The Court, formerly the seat of the Monnington family, to whom the manor belonged, is an ancient mansion, originally surrounded with a moat, which is now partly filled up. The living is a rectory, united to that of Stoke-Edith: the glebe comprises about 21 acres. The church is in the early English style, and contains some monuments to the Monningtons.

WESTHORPE (St. Margaret), a parish, in the union and hundred of HARTISMERE, W. division of SUFFOLK, 7¾ miles (N.) from Stow-Market; containing 264 inhabitants, and comprising 1301*a.* 3*r.* 35*p.* The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 18. 1½, and in the gift of the incumbent, the Rev. R. Hewitt, D.D.: the tithes have been commuted for £346, and the glebe comprises 15 acres. The church is an ancient structure in the decorated English style, and contains many handsome monuments, and some remains of stained glass. The Hall, a noble mansion, formerly the residence of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, was taken down about the middle of the last century; his royal consort, Mary, died here in 1533.

WESTINGTON, with COMBE, a hamlet, in the parish of CHIPPING-CAMPDEN, union of SHIPSTON, Upper division of the hundred of KIFTSGATE, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, ½ a mile (S.) from Chipping-Campden; containing 178 inhabitants.

WESTLECOTT, a tything, in the parish of WROUGH-TON, union of HIGHWORTH and SWINDON, hundred of ELSTUB and EVERLEY, Swindon and N. divisions of WILTS; containing 36 inhabitants.

WESTLETON (St. Peter), a parish, in the union and hundred of BLYTHING, E. division of SUFFOLK, 2¾ miles (E.) from Yoxford; containing 897 inhabitants. The parish comprises 6011 acres, of which 982 are common or waste; it is bounded on the south by a stream of which the mouth, in ancient records, is called the Port of Mismere, from a large sheet of water formerly near it. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the rectory of Middleton, annexed to the rectory of Fordley, and valued in the king's books at £8: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £750, and the vicarial for £325. In the chancel of the church are some elegant stone seats.

WESTLEY, a township, in the parish of WESTBURY, union of ATCHAM, hundred of FORD, S. division of SALOP, 10 miles (W. S. W.) from Shrewsbury; containing 88 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £186, equally divided between the rectors of the first and second portions of Westbury.

WESTLEY (St. Thomas à Becket), a parish, in the union and hundred of THINGOE, W. division of SUFFOLK, 2 miles (W.) from Bury St. Edmund's; containing 144 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 1232 acres; the soil is chalk, alternated with gravel, and the surface is undulated, in some parts rising into hills of considerable elevation. The living is a rectory, annexed to that of Fornham All Saints, and valued in the king's books at £9. 15. 5.: the tithes have been commuted for £302. 10., and the glebe comprises 31½ acres. The whole church, of which the tower fell down in 1774, having become completely dilapidated, a new and remarkably handsome edifice was erected in 1837, by the liberal contributions of the Marquess of Bristol, the patrons of the living, and the parishioners.

WESTLEY-WATERLESS (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of NEWMARKET, hundred of RADFIELD, county of CAMBRIDGE, 5 miles (S. S. W.) from Newmarket; containing 194 inhabitants. It comprises about 2300 acres, of which by far the greater part is arable, about 60 acres woodland, and the remainder pasture. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 5., and in the gift of R. Chapman, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £325, and the glebe comprises 19½ acres. The church is an ancient structure in the Norman style, with a circular tower.

WESTMANCOATE, a hamlet, in the parish of BREDON, union of TEWKESBURY, Middle division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, Pershore and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 4¾ miles (N. E.) from Tewkesbury; containing 340 inhabitants, and comprising 871 acres. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

WESTMESTON (St. Martin), a parish, in the union of CHAILEY, hundred of STREET, rape of LEWES, E. division of SUSSEX, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Lewes; containing, with the chapelry of East Chiltington, 533 inhabitants, of whom 262 are in Westmeston hamlet. A charter for a fair on Martinmas-day was granted by Edward II. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £22. 4. 2., and in the gift of G. Courthope, Jun., Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £585, and the glebe comprises 17 acres. The church is principally in the early English style, with a plain Norman arch between the nave and chancel; it contains a rudely-constructed circular stone font, and at the east end of the south aisle is an ancient chapel, the burial-place of the Marten family. At East Chiltington is a chapel of ease. A school is partly supported by an endowment of £577. 15. 7. three per cents. Anthony Shirley, who acquired some celebrity as a traveller and writer, in the time of James I., was born here.

WESTMILL (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of BUNTINGFORD, hundred of BRAUGHIN, county of HERTFORD, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. by E.) from Buntingford; containing 425 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 2000 acres, the principal portion of which is arable; the soil is a chalky clay, and the surface generally flat. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £20, and in the gift of the Earl of Hardwicke: the tithes have been commuted for £540, and the glebe comprises 39 acres. The church is an ancient structure in the later English style. A national school is partly supported by an endowment of £20 per annum by Lord Hardwicke.

WESTMINSTER, MIDDLESEX.—See LONDON.

WESTMORLAND, an inland county, bounded on the north and west by Cumberland, on the south-west and south by Lancashire, on the south-east and east by Yorkshire, and on the north-east by the county of Durham. It extends from $54^{\circ} 11' 30''$ to $54^{\circ} 42' 30''$ (N. Lat.), and from $2^{\circ} 20'$ to $3^{\circ} 12'$ (W. Lon.), and includes an area of 763 square miles, or 488,320 statute acres. There are 10,849 inhabited houses, 875 uninhabited, and 39 in course of erection; and the population amounts to 56,454, of whom 28,213 are males, and 28,241 females. The ancient British inhabitants of the territory included within the limits of this county were of two tribes of the Brigantes, called the Voluntii and the Sistuntii, the former occupying the eastern parts of it, the latter the western. Under the Roman dominion it was included in the division called Maxima Caesariensis; and, at the period of the Saxon heptarchy, it formed part of the extensive and powerful kingdom of Northumbria. From its Saxon conquerors it received the name of West-moringa-land, or land of the western moors, since contracted into Westmorland. The county is partly in the diocese of Chester, and partly in that of Carlisle, in the province of York, but under the act of the 6th and 7th of William IV., c. 77, it will be wholly included in the latter diocese. Chester diocese comprises the barony of Kendal, divided between the two deaneries of Kendal and Kirkby-Lonsdale, both of which extend into the adjoining parts of Lancashire; the barony of Westmorland, forming the remaining portion of the county, is annexed to the see of Carlisle, and constitutes the deanery of Westmorland. The total number of parishes is thirty-two. Its great civil divisions are the two baronies of Kendal and Westmorland, the former including the wards of Kendal and Lonsdale, and the latter, which has in later ages been occasionally styled the “barony of Appleby,” and is often called the “Bottom of Westmorland,” comprising the East and West wards. The county contains the newly-enfranchised borough and market-town of Kendal, the small market-town and sea-port of Milnthorpe, and the market-towns of Ambleside, Appleby, Brough, Burton-in-Kendal, Kirkby-Lonsdale, Kirkby-Stephen, and Orton; two knights are returned to parliament for the shire, and one representative for the borough of Kendal. It is included in the northern circuit: the assizes, and the Easter and Michaelmas quarter-sessions, are held at Appleby, and the Epiphany and Midsummer sessions at Kendal.

The county is in general so mountainous, that the soil of a great portion of it must necessarily for ever remain undisturbed by the plough. The mountains are separated by pleasant and fertile valleys, requiring only a greater number of trees and hedge-rows to complete the beauty of their appearance. The most extensive vales are, that of the Eden, reaching from about ten miles south-east of Kirkby-Stephen, north-westward by Appleby, towards Penrith; and that of Kendal, more particularly southward and westward of that town. Loose masses of rock, of various sizes and descriptions, are scattered over all the lower hills and the champaign parts of the county; and on the southern side of Shap, along the road towards Kendal, different streams, and especially Wasdale-beck, force their passage amidst stupendous blocks of rounded granite. Cross-fell, at the north-eastern extremity of the county, which is the highest of the chain of mountains extending along the eastern borders of Westmorland and Cumberland, rises to the height of 2901 feet above the level of the sea. The other greatest elevations, included wholly or partly within its limits, are Helvellyn, 3055 feet high; Bow-fell, 2911 feet high; Rydal-head, about the same height as the last-mentioned; and the High-street, which is about 2730 feet high, and derives its name from an ancient road that runs along its summit, and on which the people of the neighbourhood have horse-races and other sports, on July 10th. All these mountains command magnificent and extensive prospects, and from Rydal-head are seen Windermere, Elter-water, Grasmere, and Rydal-water.

Many beautiful LAKES adorn the numerous romantic and sequestered dales, and, together with those of Cumberland, have afforded an abundant theme for description, and have been the subjects of some of the finest efforts of landscape painting. The principal of those in Westmorland are, Ullswater, Windermere, Grasmere, Haws-water, Elter-water, Broad-water, and Rydal-water. Ullswater, on the north-western side of the county, and of which the higher part is wholly within the limits of Westmorland, while its lower part is divided between it and Cumberland, is about nine miles long, its breadth varying from a quarter of a mile to two miles; the lower end is called Ousemere; its depth varies from six to thirty-five fathoms. The shores of the lake are extremely irregular, and from its making different bold sweeps, only parts of it are seen at once. The lower extremity is bordered by pleasant inclosures, interspersed with woods and cottages, scattered on the sides of gently rising hills; but, advancing upwards towards Patterdale, the inclosures are of smaller extent, and the hills more lofty and rugged, until their aspect becomes wholly wild and mountainous. In its highest expanse are a few small rocky islands. Place-fell, on the east, projects its barren and rugged base into the lake; and on the west rise several rocky hills, one of which, called Stybarrow Crag, is clothed with oaks and birches: these and the other surrounding hills are furrowed with glens and the channels of torrents, causing remarkable echoes. When the sky is uniformly overcast and the air perfectly calm, this lake, in common with some others, has its surface overspread by a smooth oily appearance, provincially called a keld, which term is also applied to the places that are longest in freezing; it contains abundance of fine trout, perch, skellies, and eels, some char, and a species of trout, called grey trout, almost peculiar to it, which frequently attains the weight of 30lb.

Windermere is ten miles and a half long, and lies on the western border of the county, which it separates, for the greater part of its length, from Lancashire, in which county its lower extremity is wholly included; its breadth is from one to two miles, and its area is computed at 2574 acres, including thirteen islands occupying a space of about 40 acres, the largest of which, called Curwen's, contains 27 acres. The Westmorland margin of the lake is bordered by inclosures rising gently from the water's edge, adorned with numerous woody and rocky knolls of various elevations and sizes; the Lancashire shore is higher and more abrupt, and is clothed with wood, though not to the summit; and a simple magnificence is the chief characteristic of the whole surrounding scenery. Its fisheries, which are rented of the crown, are chiefly for common and grey trout, pike, perch, skellies, and eels, and more especially for char, its most remarkable produce, of which there are two sorts, called, from the difference of their colour, silver and golden char, the former of which is considered the most delicious, and is potted for the London market; great numbers of water-fowl resort to this lake, and to a few of the smaller ones. Grasmere is a particularly beautiful small lake, at the lower end of a valley bearing its name; in the centre of it is a small island, and its head is adorned by the church and village of Grasmere. Haws-water, situated in a narrow vale called Mardale, is about three miles long, and from a quarter to half a mile broad; near the centre it is nearly divided into two by a low inclosed promontory, and the mountains which environ its head are steep, bold, and craggy, but are skirted at their feet by inclosures. On its northern side is Naddle Forest, a steep mountainous ridge in the form of a bow, in the centre of which rises Wallow Crag, a mass of upright rocks; the other portions of its scenery are equally picturesque. The char and trout of the lake are in great esteem; and besides these, it produces perch, skellies, and eels. Elter-water, at the bottom of Great Langdale, which is rather larger than Grasmere, is inferior to none of the smaller lakes in the variety and beauty of its scenery. Broad-water, about a mile above the head of Ullswater, is environed by high and rugged mountains, and is viewed to great advantage from a spot called Hartsop-high-field. Rydal-water, on the course of the Rothay, is shallow, and has several picturesque woody islands; it is about a mile in length. The principal of the smaller lakes, most commonly called tarns, are, Ais-water, a mile south-west of Hartsop, and about a mile northward of which is Angle-tarn; Grisedale-tarn, at the head of Grisedale; Red-tarn, under the eastern side of Helvellyn, and westward of which lie Kepeel-cove-tarn; Red-tarn, and Small-water, at the head of Riggindale, the highest branch of Mardale; Skegges-water, in the mountains between Long Sled-dale and Kentmere; Kentmere, in the valley of the Kent; Sunbiggin-tarn, in the parish of Orton; and Whinfell-tarn, in the parish of Kendal. Along the chain of mountains extending from Cross-fell, in a southern direction, to Stainmore near Brough, a distance of about twenty miles, occurs a singular phenomenon called the Helm Wind, which blows at various times of the year, but most commonly from October to April.

Notwithstanding the inclosures and improvements that have taken place since the commencement of the present century, the CULTIVATED lands hardly amount to one-half of the whole extent of the county. The greater part, amounting to about three-fourths, of the inclosed lands, are always under grass, particularly in high situations; and as the farmers, during the summer months, can keep almost any quantity of cattle on the commons, &c., at a very little expense, their chief object is to get as much hay as possible from their inclosed lands against the approach of winter. There are few counties where, in proportion to their size, more milch cows are kept than in this, and where the produce of the dairy is an object of greater importance: this is chiefly butter, of which great quantities are annually sent to the London market, in firkins containing 56lb. net. Not less than 10,000 Scotch cattle are annually brought to Brough Hill fair, whence great numbers are driven towards the rich pastures of the more southerly portions of England, though many are retained and fattened within the limits of Westmorland. In some parts, considerable tracts are covered with coppices, consisting chiefly of oak, ash, alder, birch, and hazel: these underwoods, particularly in the barony of Kendal, are usually cut every sixteenth year, hardly any trees being left for timber, and their produce converted partly into hoops, which are made in the county, and sent coastwise to Liverpool; and partly into charcoal, which is in demand for the neighbouring iron-works. Timber is chiefly found in the plantations, which are numerous, and, at Whinfield Forest and around Lowther Hall, extensive: the larch is generally the most flourishing tree, though indeed most of the woods spring with a degree of vigour hardly to be expected from the bleak and exposed situations which many of them occupy. The extensive wastes are partly subject to common right, constituting a great part of the value of many farms, to which they are attached, and partly in severalties and stinted pastures. A few of them consist of extensive commons in low situations, possessing a good soil; but by far the greater number is composed of large mountainous tracts, called by the inhabitants fells and moors, which produce little besides a very coarse grass, heath, and fern, provincially called ling and brackens: the soil of these is generally a poor hazel-mould and peat moss. The higher wastes are principally applied to the pasturage of large flocks of sheep, which, during the winter, are all brought down to the inclosures. By the end of April they are sent back to the wastes. Numerous herds of black cattle are likewise seen on the lower commons; a few are of the breed of the county; the rest are Scotch.

The MINERAL PRODUCTIONS, which are various, and some of them valuable, consist chiefly of lead, coal, marble, slate (the finest in England), limestone, freestone, and gypsum; and every part of the county presents an interesting field of study to the geologist. The principal lead mines are those at Dunfell, which are considered to be nearly exhausted; at Dufton, where they are unusually rich; at Eagle Crags, in Grisedale, a branch of the vale of Patterdale; and at Greenside, near Patterdale. A small quantity of this metal is also annually procured in the hills above Staveley, and large loose masses of ore have been found in different other situations: a very rich and productive vein at Hartley ceased to be worked about the commencement of the last century. Copper has been wrought to a limited extent at Limbrig, Asby, and Rayne, and is obtained in small quantities in many other parts. Coal is neither abundant nor of good quality; it is wrought only in the south-eastern extremity of the county, chiefly on Stainmore heath, and in the neighbourhood of Shap: in the vale of Mallerstang a kind of small coal, chiefly used for burning limestone, is procured. Bordering upon the river Kent, about three miles below Kendal, a bed of beautiful white marble, veined with red and other tints, was discovered in 1793, and quarries were immediately opened. Near Ambleside, and between that town and Penrith, is found a marble of a dusky green colour, veined with white; a black sort is obtained near Kirkby-Lonsdale, and another species at Kendal Fell. The western mountains produce vast quantities of slate, all the various kinds of which are used in the surrounding districts for covering the roofs of buildings, while the best of them are conveyed by sea to Liverpool, London, Lynn, Hull, &c., and by land into Cumberland, Northumberland, Durham, and Lancashire. The most general colour is blue, of many different shades, sometimes having a greenish cast; one kind is purple; and another, used to make writing slates, is nearly black: the best sorts are obtained at the greatest depth. The prevailing strata in the southern and eastern parts of the county are limestone and freestone, together with a soft laminous schistus, horizontally stratified. The western and north-western mountains, besides the slate before mentioned, consist of masses of the trap genera, chiefly basalt, commonly called whinstone. Around the head of Windermere, and for some distance eastward of it, lies a stratum of dark grey limestone, which is occasionally burned into lime, or polished for tomb-stones and chimney-pieces. Wasdale Crag is a mass of coarse flesh-coloured granite; and higher up the dale, a greenish-coloured granite, of a finer and harder texture, is found: a very coarse species of granite also appears in many other parts of the county. A vein of red porphyry crosses the road between Kendal and Shap; and at Acorn-bank, near Kirkby, is one of gypsum, which is used for laying floors. In many parts are also detached round pieces of blue rag-stone, of granite, and of a very hard composite stone, called by the masons callierde. In Knipe Scar are found talky fibrous bodies, opaque and of an ash colour, which burn for a considerable time without any sensible diminution. Fossil remains exist only in the strata of the southern and eastern parts of the county: coralloid bodies are very common, some of them beautifully variegated.

The Manufactures are but of minor importance, and consist chiefly of coarse woollen-cloths, called Kendal cottons (supposed to be corrupted from coatings), linseys, knit-stockings, waistcoat-pieces, flannels, and leather. Nor is the commerce extensive: the principal exports are, the coarse cloths manufactured at Kendal, stockings, slates, tanned-hides, gunpowder, hoops, charcoal, hams, bacon, wool, sheep, and cattle; and the imports are, grain, and Scotch cattle and sheep. Much fish from the river and lakes is annually sent to Lancaster and Liverpool, and some even to London. The principal Rivers are the Eden, Eamont, Lowther, Lune, and Kent. The county derives considerable benefit from the Lancaster canal, which, commencing at Kendal, proceeds for some distance parallel with the course of the Kent, and afterwards across that of the Betha, to the vicinity of Burton, where it enters Lancashire, in the southern part of which county it communicates with the Leeds and Liverpool canal, &c.

A singular collection of huge stones, called Penhurock, now nearly destroyed, and a Druidical circle of stones near Oddendale, both in the parish of Crosby-Ravensworth, are supposed to have been British; as likewise are, the rude circle of stones at the head of the stream called the Ellerbeck; that on the waste of Moor-duvock, called the Druid's Cross; that of Mayborough, on a gentle eminence on the western side of Eamont bridge; and that about a mile north-eastward of Shap, called the Druids' Temple. Other relics, also, of this people have been discovered, including several cairns and encampments. Westmorland was traversed by a variety of Roman roads of minor importance, and contained the stations of Vertera, which has been fixed at Brough; Brovacum, at Brougham Castle; Galacum, at the head of Windermere; and another at Natland, the name of which is uncertain. A branch of the great Roman Watling-street ran through it from Stainmore to Brougham Castle, and several parts between Brough and Kirkby-Thore are still tolerably perfect. From this, the Maiden-way branched off at Kirkby-Thore, and passed over the lower extremity of Cross-fell, by Whitley Castle, into Northumberland: the road may still be clearly traced, being uniformly about seven yards broad, and composed of large loose stones. Other vestiges of Roman occupancy are also very numerous, including altars, urns, coins, bricks, tessellated pavements, foundations of buildings, &c., which have been found on the sites of the stations, and elsewhere. There are likewise, a Roman camp, about 100 yards southward of Borrowbridge, in Borrowdale, now called Castle-hows; others, called Castlesteads and Coney-beds, near the station at Natland; and several between Crackenthorpe and Cross-fell; besides Maiden Castle, upon Stainmore, a very strong square fort, about five miles from Brough; and some other remarkable intrenchments. Near Shap is a stupendous monument of antiquity called Carl-lofts, supposed to be Danish, consisting of two long lines of huge obelisks of unhewn granite, with different other masses of the same material, arranged in various forms.

The Religious houses were only the Præmonstratensian abbey of Shap, and a monastery of White friars at Appleby, together with an hospital for lepers near Kirkby-in-Kendal: there are some remains of the abbey of Shap. Remains of more modern fortifications are numerous and extensive, comprising the ruins of the castles of Appleby, Beetham, Brough, Brougham, Bewley, Hlowgill, Kendal, and Pendragon; Arnside tower, Hels-back tower, and several other ancient castellated buildings. Of ancient mansions, the most remarkable specimens are Sizergh Hall and Levens Hall, together with the ruins of Old Calgarth Hall and Preston Hall. Of the more modern seats of the nobility and gentry, those most worthy of notice are, Lowther Castle, the residence of the Earl of Lonsdale, lord-lieutenant of the county; and Appleby Castle, that of the Earl of Thanet, hereditary high sheriff. The small freeholds are very numerous. The inclosed fields are generally small, and are fenced partly by hedges, and partly by stone walls. The inhabitants, owing to their secluded situation, have, until recently, been distinguished for their adherence to several antiquated customs. There are mineral springs of various qualities; the principal being that near the village of Clifton, at which a great number of people assemble on the first day of May, to drink its waters; that called Gonsdike, a little to the south of Rounthwaite, which continually casts up small metallic spangles; Shap wells, much resorted to in the summer season by persons afflicted with scorbutic complaints, and by lead-miners from Alston and Arkingarthdale; the numerous petrifying springs on the borders of the river Kent; and a petrifying well in the cave called Pate-hole. The most remarkable casades on the many mountain streams are, Levens Park waterfall, on the Kent; another on the Betha, below Betham—the Caladupa of Camden; and Gillforth spout, in Long Sleddale, which has an unbroken fall of 100 feet. Pate-hole is a very curious and extensive cavern in a limestone rock near Great Asby, from which, in rainy seasons, powerful streams of water issue. Westmorland gives the title of Earl to the family of Fane; and Baron Vipont of Westmorland is one of the titles borne by the noble family of Clifford.

WESTOE, a township, in the parish of JARROW, union of SOUTH SHIELDS, E. division of CHESTER ward, N. division of the county of DURHAM; containing 13,990 inhabitants. This township, which comprises an area of 1795 acres, is situated on elevated ground commanding fine views of the sea and the adjacent country, with Tynemouth Abbey and other interesting objects. It is the favourite resort of the wealthy merchants and ship-owners connected with South Shields, to which it forms a pleasant suburb, containing within its boundaries the market-place and some of the principal streets of that town; the vicinity is enlivened with numerous handsome mansions and elegant villas. The substratum is chiefly coal, of which, to the south of the chapel, there is an extensive mine in operation belonging to the Messrs. Brandling; and freestone of good quality is also abundant, and quarried to a considerable extent. A chapel was erected in 1818, at an expense of £2400, of which £1000 were given by the Dean and Chapter of Durham, £500 by the trustees of Lord Crewe, and the remainder was raised by subscription. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £220; patrons, Trustees, subject to the approval of the incumbent of St. Hilda; appropriator, the prebendary of the twelfth canonry of Durham, whose tithes have been commuted for £236. 2. Attached, is a national school.—See SHIELDS, SOUTH.

WESTON, a tything, in the parish of WELFORD, union of NEWBURY, hundred of FAIRCROSS, county of BERKS; containing 268 inhabitants.

WESTON, a township, in the parish and union of RUNCORN, hundred of BUCKLOW, N. division of the county of CHESTER, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Frods-ham; containing 626 inhabitants. The Weston canal passes in the vicinity, parallel with the river Mersey. A church has been erected, of which the first stone was laid in the spring of 1841, by Sir Richard Brooke, one of the trustees of the Weaver navigation; it is the first of a number of churches built and endowed by that company for the benefit of the bargemen, and is a handsome edifice in the later English style, with a spire.

WESTON, a township, in the parish of WYBUNBURY, union and hundred of NANTWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 6 miles (E.) from Nantwich; containing 496 inhabitants. A school is partly supported by £10 per annum from Sir J. Delves Brough-ton's charity.

WESTON, a tything, in the parish of STALBRIDGE, union of STURMINSTER, hundred of BROWNSHALL, Sturminster division of DORSET; containing 241 inhabitants.

WESTON (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of HITCHIN, hundred of BROADWATER, county of HERTFORD, 3 miles (S. S. E.) from Baldock; containing 1123 inhabitants, and comprising 4370*a.* 1*r.* 15*p.* A pleasure-fair is held on the 11th of June. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 6. 8.; net income, £197; patron and impropiator, William Hale, Esq. The glebe consists of 179 acres. The church is an ancient structure, of which the tower and chancel are of Norman architecture, and the nave in the later English style: the vicarage-house occupies the site of a religious house, of which the foundations may still be traced. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. The Roman road passes through the parish, and several coins have been found.

WESTON (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of SPALDING, wapentake of ELLOE, parts of HOLLAND, county of LINCOLN, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Spalding; containing 681 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Spalding to Holbeach, and comprises 5403*a.* 11*p.*; the soil is chiefly clay, with a good depth of vegetable mould, and the surface generally level. The living is a vicarage not in charge, in the patronage of the Crown; impropiator, Sir J. Trollope, Bart. The great tithes have been commuted for £970, and the vicarial for £163. 10.; the glebe comprises nearly two acres. The church is a small neat structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WESTON, NORFOLK.—See WESTON-LONGVILLE.

WESTON, a hamlet, in the parish of LOYS-WEEDON, union of TOWCESTER, hundred of GREEN'S-NORTON, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 7 miles (W. by S.) from Towcester; containing 293 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Baptists. A chalybeate spring in the neighbourhood was formerly much esteemed.

WESTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of SOUTHWELL, N. division of the wapentake of THURGARTON, S. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 3 miles (S. E.) from Tuxford; containing 402 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 1660 acres, of which the soil is chiefly clay, and the lands are in good cultivation; it is divided into north and south, situated on the opposite acclivities of a narrow vale in which the Laxton and Egmonton unite, and flow in one small stream to the river Trent. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £19. 2. 11., and in the gift of Earl Manvers, with a net income of £468: the tithes were commuted for 315 acres of land in 1814. The church exhibits specimens of various styles. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Richard Hawksworth, in 1736, bequeathed £50 for erecting a school-house, and £100 towards its endowment.

WESTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of BATH, hundred of BATH-FORUM, E. division of SOMERSET, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. W. by W.) from Bath; containing 2899 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the south by the river Avon, and comprises about 2413 acres, of which 1901 are meadow and pasture, 495 arable, and 15 woodland; the pastures are chiefly grazed by cows kept for the supply of Bath with milk. The upper lands, on the plain of Lansdown, rest on a bed of inferior oolite, and the substratum of the lower is blue lias, which is quarried for burning into lime and for the roads; the quarries contain many fossil remains, among which are bones of the ichthyosaurus. The upper road from Bath to Bristol passes through the parish; and a stream tributary to the Avon has its source in Lansdown Hill, and flows through the village, near which it is crossed by a stone bridge of one arch. The surrounding scenery is finely varied; and near the spot where Sir Bevil Granville fell at the battle of Lansdown, is a monument inscribed to his memory by Lord Clarendon. The river Avon affords facility of communication, and the Great Western railway passes within a mile. Lansdown fair, for cattle, sheep, pigs, cheese, and toys, is held on the 10th of August. The living is a vicarage, endowed with the rectorial tithes, valued in the king's books at £10. 1. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £468. The church, with the exception of the tower, was rebuilt in 1832, and is a handsome structure in the later English style, containing 630 sittings. Another church was erected in 1836; and the chapel attached to Partis' College, noticed in the article on Bath, is also in Weston parish. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Lady Huntingdon's Connexion. Lansdown Plain, which confers the title of Marquess on the Petty family, is chiefly in the parish.

WESTON-SUPER-MARE (St. John), a parish, in the union of AXBRIDGE, hundred of WINTERSTOKE, E. division of SOMERSET, 9 miles (N. W.) from Cross; containing 2103 inhabitants. This parish, which is on the margin of Uphill bay, near the Bristol Channel, has within the last few years more than trebled its population, from the construction of a bathing establishment at Knightstone, since which it has become a fashionable and well-frequented watering-place. The town is beautifully situated under the shelter of Worlebury Hill, which commands an extensive view of the surrounding country, with the range of the Mendip hills: an act of parliament for its improvement, and for paving, lighting, and watching the streets, was passed in 1842. The bathing-house contains commodious apartments for the residence of invalids, and contiguous are furnished lodging-houses for the reception of families, and also several good inns; the establishment comprises also a public reading-room, and may be heated to any required temperature by a steam apparatus detached from the building. Weston is situated immediately opposite to Cardiff on the Welsh coast, and a few of the inhabitants of the parish are engaged in the sprat and herring fishery; cod, whiting, soles, and salmon are taken in considerable numbers. Limestone is quarried for building, for burning into lime, and also for the roads; and the making of bricks is carried on to some extent. A convenient market-house has been recently erected at the expense of Richard Parsley, Esq. The Bristol and Exeter railway passes near the parish; and a branch worked by horses diverges to this place, where a station has been established. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 17. 11., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bath and Wells: the tithes have been commuted for £235, and there is a glebe of nearly 40 acres. The church is a neat edifice, partly rebuilt in 1824, and enlarged in 1837, by Archdeacon Law, the present rector, who also greatly improved and beautified the interior. There are two places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. At Worlebury is a rampart of stones, 20 feet high, with ditches, supposed to have been the last fortified camp of the Romans in this district. A well in the parish possesses the unusual property of being empty at high water, and full when the tide is at its ebb.

WESTON-TURVILLE (St. Mary), a parish, in the union and hundred of AYLESBURY, county of BUCKINGHAM, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Wendover; containing 718 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 9. 2.; net income, £90; patron and impropiator, Lord Clifford. The church is an ancient structure in the later English style, and contains some interesting monuments.

WESTON-UNDERWOOD (St. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of NEWPORT-PAGNELL, hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (W. S. W.) from Olney; containing 438 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the south by the river Ouse, and comprises 1846a. 1r. 31p., of which 60 acres are woodland, and the remainder arable and pasture in nearly equal portions. There is an ancient seat, now uninhabited, of the Throckmorton family, who have also a neat Roman Catholic chapel here, with a handsome residence for the priest. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £51; patron and impropiator, Robert Throckmorton, Esq. The church is a neat structure, built by Sir John Olney in the 14th century. Charles Higgins, in 1792, bequeathed £500, the dividends of which, amounting to £20, are expended in the purchase of clothing for aged women; an annual sum of about £55, arising from bequests, is appropriated to the poor; and there is a small school, endowed by Mr. Throckmorton in 1826. In this pleasant village, Cowper resided for several years during the latter part of his life; and the neighbourhood is supposed to have furnished many of his descriptions of rural scenery.

WESTON-UNDERWOOD, a township, in the parish of STANTON-BY-DALE, union of BELPER, hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, S. division of the county of DERBY, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Derby; containing 284 inhabitants.

WESTON-UPON-AVON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of STRATFORD, partly in the Alcester division of the hundred of BARLICHWAY, S. division of the county of WARWICK, but chiefly in the Upper division of the hundred of KIFTS GATE, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Stratford; containing, with the hamlet of Milcote, 104 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 1489 acres; the river Avon flows here, and is navigable to Tewkesbury. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 14. 7., and has a net income of £84; the patronage and impropiation belong to Countess Amherst. A school is endowed with £15 per annum.

WESTON-UPON-TRENT (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of SHARDLOW, hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, S. division of the county of DERBY, 7 miles (S. E. by S.) from Derby; containing 396 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 1903 acres, of which 15 are woodland, and the remainder arable and pasture in nearly equal portions. There are some quarries, from which was raised the stone for the erection of the new church at Shardlow. The Trent and Mersey canal passes through the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 16. 3.; net income, £594; patron, Sir Robert Wilmot, Bart. The tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1786; the glebe comprises 300 acres, with a house. The church is an ancient structure. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WESTON-UPON-TRENT, a parish, in the S. division of the hundred of PIREHILL, union, and N. division of the county, of STAFFORD, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Stafford; containing 562 inhabitants. The Grand Trunk canal passes through the parish. Extensive salt-works have been established here, the brine for which is raised in the parish of Ingestrie, by means of machinery worked by the waters of the Trent, and is conveyed across that river and under the canal, through pipes, to certain reservoirs, whence it runs into iron pans, is heated, and becomes crystallized for use. The living is a vicarage, in the patronage, alternately, of J. N. Lane and W. Inge, Esqrs, with a net income of £96; impropiator, William Moore, Esq., whose tithes have been commuted for £95, and those of the vicar for £25. There are $12\frac{1}{2}$ acres of impropiate, and $1\frac{1}{4}$ of vicarial, glebe. The church is an ancient structure, with a large tower and spire; it was partly rebuilt in 1685, when the north aisle was taken down, and not restored till 1825, when the chancel was also rebuilt. In 1829, the spire was reconstructed.

WESTON-ZOYLAND (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of BRIDGWATER, hundred of WHITLEY, W. division of SOMERSET, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Bridgwater; containing 1000 inhabitants. This place, which borders on Sedgemoor, was the scene of the last encounter between the king's forces and those of the Duke of Monmouth. The parish is bounded on the south by the navigable river Parret, and comprises 2656a. 2r. 16p. A fair for cattle and agricultural produce is held on the 9th of Sept., and is well attended. The church was enlarged in 1841.

WESTRILL, an extra-parochial liberty, in the union of RUGBY, hundred of GUTHLAXTON, S. division of the county of LEICESTER; containing, with Stormore, 8 inhabitants.

WESTROP, a tything, in the parish of HIGHWORTH, union of HIGHWORTH and SWINDON, hundred of HIGHWORTH, CRICKLADE, and STAPLE, Swindon and N. divisions of WILTS; containing 917 inhabitants.

WEST-ROW, a hamlet, in the parish and union of MILDENHALL, hundred of LACKFORD, W. division of SUFFOLK; containing 1120 inhabitants.

WEST-TOWN, a hamlet, in the parish of BACKWELL, union of BEDMINSTER, hundred of HARTCLIFFE with BEDMINSTER, E. division of SOMERSET; containing 269 inhabitants.

WEST-TOWN, a tything, in the parish of WIVELISCOMBE, union of WELLINGTON, W. division of the hundred of KINGSBURY and of the county of SOMERSET; containing 2984 inhabitants.

WEST-VILLE, a township, in the union of BOSTON, W. division of the soke of BOLINGBROKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN; containing 139 inhabitants. This township, which is not dependent on any parish, was created by act of parliament, in 1812, on the occasion of a very extensive drainage of Wildmore, and the East and West Fens.

WESTWARD, a parish, in the union of WIGTON, ALLERDALE ward below Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, 2½ miles (S. E. by S.) from Wigton; containing, with the townships of Brocklebank, Stoneraise, Rosley, and Woodside, 1311 inhabitants. This place derives its name from its situation in the great forest of Inglewood, of which it formed the western ward, under the charge of the forester. The parish is bounded on the east by the Wampool river, and on the south by the branches of the river Waver, and comprises by measurement 1176 acres, of which nearly 300 are woodland, 180 roads and waste, and the remainder chiefly arable. It abounds with limestone, red freestone, and slate, all of excellent quality, of which there are extensive quarries, affording employment to many of the labouring class; and several seams of cannel and other coal have been found within its limits. The living is a perpetual curacy, net income, £120; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Carlisle: the tithes were commuted for land in 1811. The church is situated on an eminence in the township of Stoneraise. An additional church was erected by subscription in 1840, and is a neat structure in the later English style. In Stoneraise, about a mile and a half to the north of the church, and on the Roman road from Lugovallum (Carlisle) to Volantium or Virosidum (Ellenborough), are the remains of Old Carlisle, a considerable Roman city, which Horsley supposes to have been the Olenacum of the Notitia, where the Ala Herculea and Ala Augusta were posted. Antiquaries, however, differ with respect to the right name of this important station, which, with its appendages, occupied many acres of ground; its site is still over-spread with the ruins and foundations of numerous buildings, fragments of altars, equestrian statues, images, inscriptions, and many other relics. The walls inclosed a quadrilateral area, 170 yards long and 120 yards broad, with obtuse angles, and an entrance on each side, and were surrounded by a double ditch. Near a place called the Heights, in another part of the parish, vestiges of several square and circular intrenchments may be traced, though many of them, since the inclosure of the lands, have been levelled with the surface of the ground. Ilekirk Hall, anciently called Hildkirk, from a hermitage dedicated to St. Hilda, which was granted by John, in the 16th of his reign, to the abbey of Holme-Cultram, is in the township of Stoneraise, and now a farm-house; it was for some time the residence of the celebrated Richard Barwise, a man of extraordinary stature and prodigious strength.

WESTWATER, a tything, in the parish, union, and hundred of AXMINSTER, Honiton and S. divisions of DEVON, 2 miles (N. W.) from Axminster; containing 127 inhabitants. It is situated a little to the east of the river Yarty.

WESTWELL (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of WEST ASHFORD, hundred of CALEHILL, Upper division of the lathe of SCRAY, E. division of KENT, 2½ miles (E. S. E.) from Charing; containing 1082 inhabitants. It is on the road to Folkestone, and comprises 5199a. 1r. 32p., of which 236 acres are waste, 65 road, and the remainder arable and pasture, with a moderate proportion of woodland. The living is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury (the appropriator), valued in the king's books at £13: the great tithes have been commuted for £606, and the vicarial for £333. 15., and the glebe comprises 7 acres. The church is a spacious and elegant structure in the later English style. Here is situated the workhouse of the West Ashford union.

WESTWELL (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of WITNEY, hundred of BAMPTON, county of OXFORD, 2 miles (W. S. W.) from Burford; containing 180 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 3. 9.; net income, £159; patrons, the Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford. The church, situated on an eminence, is in the Norman style; on the north and south sides are circular-arched doorways, with zigzag ornaments; in the nave is a mural monument to Charles Trindor, and on the south side is a recumbent effigy of an ecclesiastic of the time of Elizabeth.

WESTWICK, a hamlet, in that part of the parish of OAKINGTON which is in the hundred of CHESTERTON, union of CHESTERTON, county of CAMBRIDGE, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Cambridge; containing 64 inhabitants. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £100.

WESTWICK, a township, in the parish of GAINFORD, union of TEESDALE, S. W. division of DARLINGTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM, 2 miles (S. E.) from Barnard-Castle; containing 67 inhabitants. It is bounded on the south by the river Tees, over which is a lofty bridge of one arch leading to the parish of Rokeby, and also connecting the counties of York and Durham. The township is the property of the Countess of Bridgewater.

WESTWICK (St. BOTOLPH), a parish, in the TUNSTEAD and HAPPING incorporation, hundred of TUNSTEAD, E. division of NORFOLK, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.) from North Walsham; containing 192 inhabitants. The parish comprises 932 acres, of which 20 are common or waste land; it is chiefly the property of J. Petre, Esq., whose seat, Westwick House, is a splendid mansion, beautifully situated in a park richly wooded and embellished with plantations, and some fine sheets of water. At a short distance from the house, is an obelisk ninety feet high, the summit of which commands a fine view of the sea coast and of the adjacent country. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 13. 9., and in the gift of Mr. Petre: the tithes have been commuted for £171. 11., and the glebe comprises 16 acres. The church is a handsome structure in the decorated and later English styles, with a lofty tower; it has been thoroughly repaired by subscription, and was beautified in 1841, at the expense of the patron.

WESTWICK, a township, in the parish and liberty of RIPON, W. riding of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Boroughbridge; containing 18 inhabitants. It is situated to the south and west of the river Ure, and comprises about 411 acres of land.

WESTWOOD, a township, in the parish of THORNBURY, union of BROMYARD, hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Bromyard.

WESTWOOD, a hamlet, in the parish of SOUTH-FLEET, union of DARTFORD, hundred of AXTON, DARTFORD, and WILMINGTON, lathe of SUTTON-AT-HONE, W. division of KENT; containing 89 inhabitants.

WESTWOOD, a parish, in the union of BRADFORD, forming a detached portion of the hundred of ELSTUB and EVERLEY, locally in that of BRADFORD, Westbury and N. divisions, and Trowbridge and Bradford subdivisions, of WILTS, 2 miles (S. W.) from Bradford; containing 631 inhabitants. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Great Bradford.

WESTWOOD PARK, an extra-parochial liberty, in the Upper division of the hundred of HALFSHIRE, Droitwich and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Droitwich; containing 25 inhabitants, and comprising 730 acres. A priory dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, for six nuns of the order of Fontevrault, was founded in the reign of Henry II., and at the Dissolution had a revenue of £75. 18. 11.

WESTWOODSIDE, a hamlet, in the parish of HAXEY, union of GAINSBOROUGH, W. division of the wapentake of MANLEY, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN; containing 626 inhabitants.

WETHERAL (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of CARLISLE, chiefly in CUMBERLAND ward, but partly in ESKDALE ward, E. division of the county of CUMBERLAND; containing, with the townships of Great Corby, Coathill, Cumwhinton, Scotby, and Warwick-Bridge, 2806 inhabitants, of whom 586 are in Wetheral township, 5 miles (E. by S.) from Carlisle. The Newcastle and Carlisle railway passes through the parish, and is here carried across the river Eden by a bridge, formed of five semicircular arches, each of 80 feet span; its height from the average summer level of the water is $99\frac{1}{2}$ feet, the breadth 25, and the whole length 564. There are quarries of red freestone and alabaster. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Warwick annexed; net income, £108; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Carlisle. The church, situated on an elevated piece of ground adjoining the river, was built in the reign of Henry VIII., and a handsome chapel was attached to it, as a burial-place, by Henry Howard, Esq., in 1791; it contains a beautiful monument to Mrs. Howard, executed by Nollekens. A priory of Benedictine monks, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, St. Mary, and St. Constantine, was founded here by Ranulph de Meschines, in 1088, as a cell to the abbey of St. Mary, at York; at the Dissolution its revenue was estimated at £128. 5. 3. Of the conventual buildings, the gatehouse still remains; and near the site are three ancient cells, called Wetheral Safeguard, or Constantine's Hermitage, excavated in the rock, at the height of forty feet above the river Eden, which flows at its base.

WETHERBY, a market-town and chapelry, in the parish of SPOFFORTH, Upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, W. riding of YORK, $12\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Leeds, 13 (W. by S.) from York, and 194 (N. N. W.) from London on the great north road; containing 1433 inhabitants. The Saxon name of this town, whence the present is obviously deduced, was Wederbi, intended to designate its situation on a bend of the river Wharfe. During the civil war of the 17th century, it was garrisoned for the parliament, and successively repulsed two attacks made upon it by Sir Thomas Glenham. About three miles and a half below it is St. Helen's ford, where the Roman military way crossed the Wharfe. The town consists of several streets of well-built houses, and has of late been greatly improved by the removal of many of the older houses, and the erection of new buildings. Over the river is a handsome stone bridge, and a little above this a weir, formed for the benefit of some mills for grinding corn, and pulverizing bones for manure. There is an extensive brewery. The market is on Thursday; fairs are held on Holy-Thursday and August 5th, and there are fortnight fairs for the sale of cattle. The market-place is spacious and adapted to its purpose. Courts leet and baron are held on Lady-day and Michaelmas-day. The township comprises by measurement 1447 acres, of which 567 are arable, 860 meadow and pasture, and 20 woodland; the surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied. Beilby Grange, the handsome seat of Alexander Brown, Esq., J.P., and Woodhall Park, that of W. L. F. Scott, Esq., are situated near the town. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £101; patron, the Rector of Spofforth: the tithes have been commuted for £246. 7. 8. The chapel, dedicated to St. James, and consecrated on the 1st of February, 1842, was built in lieu of the former small ancient edifice, on a site given by Edwin Greenwood, Esq., of Keighley, at an expense exceeding £4000, raised by subscription, towards which the Ripon Diocesan and the Incorporated Societies granted respectively £300 and £230, and Colonel Wyndham, Richard Fountayne Wilson, Esq., lord of the manor, and Quintin Rhodes, Esq., each £300; Mr. Rhodes also presenting an organ. It is a handsome structure in the early English style, with a square embattled tower crowned by pinnacles, and contains 700 sittings, of which 180 are free. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans.

WETHERDEN (St. Mary), a parish, in the union and hundred of Stow, W. division of SUFFOLK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Stow-Market; containing 515 inhabitants, and comprising 1784 acres. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £371. The church is a handsome structure in the decorated English style, with a square embattled tower; the aisle is ornamented on the outside with numerous armorial-bearings of the owners of the Hall, and many of the Sulyard family are buried in the church. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

WETHERINGSETT (All Saints), a parish, in the union and hundred of HARTISMERE, W. division of SUFFOLK, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Mendlesham; containing, with the hamlet of Brockford, 1065 inhabitants. It comprises about 4000 acres; the soil is generally clay, alternated with loam, and the surface flat. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £33. 9. 2.; net income, £604; patron and incumbent, the Rev. A. Steward. The glebe comprises 64 acres, with a house. The church is a spacious and handsome structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower. The Rev. Richard Hakluyt, compiler of English Voyages, was rector of the parish.

WETHERSFIELD (St. Mary Magdalene), a parish, in the union of BRAINTREE, hundred of HINCKFORD, N. division of ESSEX, 7 miles (N. N. W.) from Braintree; containing 1685 inhabitants. This place is bounded by the river Blackwater, on which are several extensive flour-mills: a pleasure-fair is held in July. The parish comprises 4212a. 2r. 23p., of which 3396 acres are arable, 361 meadow and pasture, 143 garden-ground, 137 woods and plantations, 63 hop-grounds, and 110 roads and waste. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12, and in the patronage of Trinity Hall, Cambridge; appropriator, the Bishop of London, whose tithes have been commuted for £1105, and those of the vicar for £376. There are 51 acres of appropriate glebe. The church is an ancient edifice, with a tower and spire, and contains some interesting monuments. The Independents have a place of worship. Bequests amounting to £45 per annum have been left for education, &c.

WETTENHALL, a chapelry, in the parish of OVER, union of NANTWICH, First division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, S. division of the county of CHESTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Tarporley; containing 274 inhabitants. It comprises 1903a. 3r. 10p., of which 174 acres are arable, 1684 meadow and pasture, and 45 woodland; the soil is generally a stiff clay. The chapel is an ancient structure, containing 120 sittings, of which 20 are free: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £75; patron, the Vicar of Over.

WETTON (St. Margaret), a parish, in the S. division of the hundred of TORMONSLow, N. division of the county of STAFFORD, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Ashbourn; containing 485 inhabitants. The river Manifold runs through the parish, as far as Wetton-mill, then suddenly disappears through the fissures of its limestone bed, and, continuing a subterraneous course for about five miles, emerges within a few yards of the place where the river Hamps reappears in like manner from its channel underground. At Ecton hill is a copper-mine, which was first wrought in the 17th century, and for many years produced a yearly profit of £30,000 to the Duke of Devonshire; but the ore having become scarce, it was given up by his grace some time since, and let to a small company of working miners, who still find a tolerable remuneration for their labours. On the opposite side of the hill was a prolific lead-mine, now exhausted; and there are quarries of excellent marble. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £90; patron, M. Burgoyne, Esq.; impropiator, the Duke of Devonshire. The church was rebuilt in 1820, at a cost of £600, except the tower, which is very ancient. Within the parish is a remarkable cavern of large dimensions, termed Thor's House, in which the Druids, it is believed, sacrificed to their god Thor.

WETWANG (St. Michael), a parish, in the union of DRIFFIELD, wapentake of BUCKROSE, E. riding of YORK; containing, with the chapelry of Fimber, 728 inhabitants, of whom 558 are in Wetwang township, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Great Driffield. The parish comprises by measurement 3900 acres, of which about 2500 are arable, and the remainder meadow and pasture, with a moderate portion of woodland. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the patronage of the Prebendary of Wetwang in the Cathedral of York (the appropriator), valued in the king's books at £9. 7. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £220. The tithes were commuted for land in 1803. The church is an ancient structure; and there is a chapel of ease at Fimber. The Wesleyans have a place of worship; and Sir T. Sykes, Bart., has built rooms for two parochial schools.

WEXCOMBE, a tything, in the parish of GREAT BEDWIN, union of HUNGERFORD, hundred of KINWARDSTONE, Marlborough and Ramsbury, and S. divisions of WILTS; containing 141 inhabitants.

WEXHAM (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of ETON, hundred of STOKE, county of BUCKINGHAM, 2 miles (N. E.) from Slough; containing 175 inhabitants. The parish comprises 715a. 3r. 20p., of which 608 acres are arable, 91 meadow and pasture, and 16 woodland; the soil is partly a deep rich mould, and partly sandy, and the substratum chiefly ragstone; the surface has a gradual elevation, and commands a view of the Epsom downs. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 15., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £200. In the church is a vault in which several of the Godolphin family are interred. The learned Fleetwood, before his elevation to episcopal dignity, was rector of the parish from 1705 to 1708, during which period he published his Chronicon Pretiosum.

WEYBOURNE, NORFOLK.—See WAYBOURNE.

WEYBREAD (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union and hundred of HOXNE, E. division of SUFFOLK, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S. S. W.) from Harleston; containing 771 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 15.; patron and incumbent, the Rev. J. E. Daniel; improPRIATORS, the Landowners. The great tithes have been commuted for £541, and the vicarial for £90; the glebe comprises 8 acres, and there is a glebe-house, which has been greatly improved by the present incumbent. The church is an ancient structure, with a round tower.

WEYBRIDGE (St. Nicholas), a parish, in the union of CHERTSEY, First division of the hundred of ELMBRIDGE, W. division of SURREY, 4 miles (W.) from Esher, and 20 miles (S. W. by W.) from London; containing 1064 inhabitants. This place is bounded on the north by the Thames, where it receives the Wey, which is crossed by a bridge, and thus gave name to the place. The Wey canal commences a little to the westward of the village; and the London and South-Western railway, which passes through the parish, has a station on Weybridge Common. The parish comprises 1320*a*. 1*r*. 36*p*., of which about two-thirds are arable, pasture, and meadow, and one-third woodland. The neighbourhood is adorned with many elegant seats, of which the principal is Oatlands, which was the residence of His Royal Highness the late Duke of York, occupying the brow of an eminence, near a fine sweep of the Thames: a pillar has been erected in the village to the Duchess of York, as a mark of respect to her memory, by the inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 0. 5., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £292. The church is a small neat edifice, and contains several monuments, among which is one to the Duchess, who was interred here. James Taylor, Esq., in 1836, built a Roman Catholic chapel, with a house for the clergyman, near his own residence, at a cost of £2000. Among the various relics of antiquity found here, several curious wedges, or celts, were discovered in 1725, at Oatlands, about 20 feet below the surface of the earth; which circumstance seems to sanction the opinion that Julius Cæsar attacked the Britons at the place now called Coway Stakes, a short distance from his camp at Walton.

WEYCROFT, a tything, in the parish, union, and hundred of AXMINSTER, Honiton and S. divisions of DEVON; containing 56 inhabitants.

WEYHILL (St. Michael), a parish, in the union and hundred of ANDOVER, Andover and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Andover; containing, with the hamlets of Clanville, Nutbin, and part of Appleshaw-Bottom, 375 inhabitants, of whom 86 are in Weyhill hamlet. The parish comprises by measurement 1840 acres, of which about 1660 are arable, 100 pasture and meadow, and 80 woodland. The village is celebrated for a great fair, commencing October 10th, for horses and sheep, of the latter of which it is estimated that more than 140,000 are sold on the first day; it continues on the five following days, and is visited by persons from all parts of the kingdom; cheese, hops, and leather are also sold in considerable quantities. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £26, and in the gift of Queen's College, Oxford: the tithes have been commuted for £496. 18., and the glebe comprises 22 acres. The interior of the church was mutilated by Cromwell's soldiers. Richard Taunton, in 1759, left the interest of £200 to purchase bread for labourers. Chaucer, the poet, had the manor and advowson, which were afterwards given by Charles I. to Queen's College, for services rendered during the civil war.

WEYMOUTH and MELCOMBE-REGIS, a sea-port, borough, and market-town, having separate jurisdiction, and the head of a union, in the Dorchester division of DORSET, 8 miles (S. by W.) from Dorchester, and 129 (S. W. by W.) from London; containing 7708 inhabitants, of which number 2669 are in Weymouth, and 5039 in Melcombe. This borough comprises the towns of Weymouth and Melcombe-Regis, forming opposite boundaries of the harbour, in the conveniences of which they had their origin, and to terminate their mutual rivalry for the exclusive possession of which, they were united into one borough, in the 13th of Elizabeth. Weymouth, which derives its name from its situation at the mouth of the river Wey, is the more ancient, and was probably known to the Romans, as in the immediate neighbourhood there are evident traces of a vicinal way, leading from one of the principal landing stations connected with their camp at Maiden Castle, to the via Iceniana, where the town of Melcombe-Regis now stands. The earliest authentic notice of it occurs in a grant by Athelstan, in 938, wherein he gives to the abbey of Milton "all that water within the shore of Weymouth, and half the stream of that Weymouth out at sea, a saltern, &c." It is also noticed in the Norman survey, with several other places, under the common name of Wai, or Waia, among which it is clearly identified by the mention of the salterns exclusively belonging to it.

The ports of Weymouth and Melcombe, with their dependencies, were, by the charters of Henry I. and II., granted to the monks of St. Swithin, in Winchester, from whom, by exchange, Weymouth passed into the possession of Gilbert de Clare, Earl of Gloucester, who, in the reigns of Henry III. and Edward I., held it with view of frankpledge and other immunities. His successor, Lionel, Duke of Clarence, obtained many privileges for the town, which he made a borough, and which, through his heir, Edward IV., subsequently reverted to the crown, and formed part of the dowry of several queens of England. In the reign of Edward II. it received the staple of wine, and collectors were appointed, in the 4th and 6th years of that reign, to receive the duties. Weymouth, in the 10th of Edward III., had become a place of some importance, and, with Melcombe and Lyme, contributed several ships towards the equipment of that monarch's expedition to Gascony. In the year 1347, it furnished 20 ships and 264 mariners towards the fleet destined for the siege of Calais : in this subsidy, Melcombe, though not mentioned, was probably included. In 1471, Margaret of Anjou, with her son, Prince Edward, landed at this port from France, to assist in restoring her husband, Henry VI., to the throne of England ; and, in the 20th of Henry VII., Philip King of Castile, on his voyage from Zealand to Spain, with a fleet of 80 ships, on board of which was his queen, being driven by a storm on the English coast, put into it for safety. This port, in 1588, contributed six ships to oppose the armada of Spain, and one of the enemy's vessels, having been taken in the English Channel, was brought into Weymouth harbour. Melcombe-Regis, on the north side of the harbour, derived its name from being situated in a valley, in which was an ancient mill ; and its adjunct from its having formed part of the demesnes of the crown. It is not mentioned in Domesday book, being included in the parish of Radipole, which at that time belonged to Cerne Abbey ; but it passed from the monks into the possession of the crown at an earlier period than Weymouth, and, in the reign of Edward I., became the dowry of Queen Eleanor, on which account it obtained many valuable and extensive privileges. In the time of Edward III., it was made one of the staple towns for wool, and flourished considerably ; but, in the following reign, having been burnt by the French, it became so greatly impoverished, that the inhabitants petitioned the king to be excused from the payment of their customs. Edward IV., in order to afford relief, granted them a new charter, conferring the same privileges as were enjoyed by the citizens of London.

In the reign of Elizabeth, the lords of the council, wearied by the continual disputes of these two towns, which were both boroughs, and endowed with extensive privileges, by the advice of Cecil, lord treasurer, united them into one borough by an act of parliament confirmed by James I., under the designation of "The United Borough and Town of Weymouth and Melcombe Regis," from which time their history becomes identified. Weymouth afterwards gradually fell into decay, and suffered greatly during the civil war, having been alternately garrisoned for both parties. In 1644, it was evacuated by the royalists, on which occasion several ships, and a great quantity of arms, fell into the hands of the parliament, who obtained possession of it. The royalists soon afterwards attempted to recover it, but the garrison sustained the attack for eighteen days, and finally obliged them to raise the siege. An additional fort was built in 1645, on the Weymouth side of the harbour, to defend it from the incursions of the Portlanders ; and, four years after, the corporation petitioned for an indemnification for the destruction of their bridge and chapel (the latter, from its commanding situation, having been converted into a fort), and for assistance in the maintenance of the garrison, which application appears to have been disregarded. In 1666, however, a brief was granted to repair the damage ; and, in 1673, another was bestowed for the collection of £3000, to amend the injury which the town had received from an accidental fire, whereby a considerable portion of it had been destroyed. The rise of Poole, which was rapidly growing into importance, the decay of the haven, and the loss of its trade, with various other causes, contributed powerfully to the decline of the town, which, from an opulent and commercial port, had almost sunk into a mere fishing-town, when Ralph Allen, Esq., of Bath, in 1763, first brought it into notice as a bathing-place ; and the subsequent visits of the Duke of Gloucester, and afterwards of George III. and the royal family, with whom it was a favourite place of resort, laid the foundation of its present prosperity.

The town is beautifully situated on the western shore of a fine open bay in the English Channel, and is separated into two parts by the river Wey, which expanding to a considerable breadth, in its progress to the bay, forms a small, but secure and commodious harbour. On the south side is Weymouth, at the foot of a high hill near the mouth of the river ; and, on the north side, Melcombe-Regis, on a peninsula connected with the main land by a narrow isthmus which separates the waters of the bay from those formed by the estuary of the river, called the Backwater. A long stone bridge of two arches, with a swivel in the centre, to admit small vessels into the upper part of the harbour, was erected by act of parliament in the 1st of George IV., and connects the two parts of the town. Since the place has become of fashionable resort for sea-bathing, various handsome ranges of building, and a theatre, assembly-rooms, and other places of public entertainment, have been erected. Among the former, Belvidere, the Crescent, Gloucester-row, Royal-terrace, Chesterfield-place, York-buildings, Charlotte-row, Augusta-place, and Clarence, Pultency, and Devonshire buildings, are conspicuous ; to which may be added Brunswick-buildings, a line of houses at the entrance of the town, and numerous detached villas in the vicinity. From the windows of these buildings, which face the sea, a most extensive and delightful view is obtained, comprehending, on the left, a noble range of hills and cliffs extending for many miles, in a direction from west to east, and of the sea in front, with the vessels, yachts, and pleasure-boats which are continually entering and leaving the harbour. The town, especially on the Melcombe side of the harbour, is regularly built, and consists partly of two principal streets, parallel with each other, intersected by others at right angles ; it is well paved and lighted, under the provisions of an act passed in 1766, and is supplied by a public company, incorporated by another act, with excellent water, conveyed by pipes from the Boiling Rock, in the parish of Preston, a distance of two miles. The houses, excepting such as have been erected for the accommodation of visitors, are in general built of stone and roofed with tiles, and are low and of indifferent appearance.

About a mile to the south-west are the remains of Weymouth, or Sandsfoot, Castle, erected by Henry VIII., in the year 1540, on the threatened invasion of the Pope, and described by Leland as "a right goodly and warlyke castle, having one open barbican." It is quadrangular in form : the north front has been nearly destroyed, the masonry with which it was faced having been removed ; the greater part of the south front fell into the sea in 1837. On this side is a low building, broader than the castle, and flanking its east and west sides. The walls, in some parts, are of amazing thickness, but in a very dilapidated state, and rapidly falling to decay. On the south of the town are the cavalry barracks, a neat and commodious range of building. The Esplanade, the finest marine promenade in the kingdom, is a beautiful terrace 30 feet broad, rising from the sands, and secured by a strong wall extending in a circular direction, parallel with the bay, a mile in length, and commanding an extensive and beautiful view of the sea and the mountainous range of cliffs by which the bay is inclosed. Among the buildings that adorn it is the Royal Lodge, where George III. and the royal family resided while visiting this place, comprising several houses of handsome, though not uniform, appearance. There are several flights of steps, of Portland stone, leading to the sands, to which also is a gently sloping descent from one extremity of the Esplanade to the other: in the centre is the principal public library, elegantly furnished. The assembly and card rooms form part of the royal hotel, a handsome range of building, with commodious stabling and other appendages, and occupying an area 600 feet in length and 250 in breadth, the whole erected at an expense of £6000, advanced on shares of £100 each. The theatre is a neat and well-arranged edifice, handsomely fitted up. Races were established in 1821, which take place in August, and are generally well attended; among the prizes contended for are the queen's plate of 100 guineas, the members' of 50 guineas, and the ladies' and tradesmen's plates. The course, about a mile from the town, is conveniently adapted to the purpose.

About the time of the races, a splendid regatta is celebrated in the BAY, which has a fine circular sweep of nearly two miles, and, being sheltered from the north and north-east winds by a continuous range of hills, the water is generally calm and transparent. The sands are smooth, firm, and level; and so gradual is the descent towards the sea, that, at the distance of 300 feet, the water is not more than five feet deep. Numerous bathing-machines are in constant attendance, and on the South Parade is an establishment of hot salt-water baths, furnished with dressing-rooms and every requisite accommodation. At the south entrance of the harbour are the piers; two new quays have been recently erected, and the harbour has been deepened. Part of the ground over which the sea formerly flowed has been embanked, and is now covered with buildings; and other parts are inclosed with iron-railings, which form a prominent feature on the Esplanade. The bay almost at all times affords ample facilities for aquatic excursions, its tranquil surface being never disturbed, except by violent storms from the south or south-east; yachts and pleasure-boats are always in readiness, the fares of which are under strict regulations. The air is so mild and pure that the town is not only frequented during the summer, but has been selected by many opulent families, as a permanent residence; and the advantages which it possesses in the excellence of its bay, the beauty of its scenery, and the healthfulness of its climate, have contributed to raise it from the low state into which it had fallen, from the depression of its commerce, to one of the most flourishing towns in the kingdom.

The PORT formerly carried on an extensive trade with France, Spain, Norway, and Newfoundland, in the fishery of which last place it employed eighty vessels; but the war with France, after the Revolution, put an end to its commerce with that country; the trade with Newfoundland was, in a great measure, transferred to Poole; and the accumulation of sand in the harbour, operating with other causes, considerably diminished its importance. A few vessels, however, are still engaged in the American and Mediterranean trade, in addition to which there is a tolerable coasting trade. The principal imports are coal, timber, wine, brandy, geneva, tobacco, and rice, for which it was made a bonding port by an order of council in 1817, and the chief exports are Portland stone, pipe-clay, Roman cement, bricks, tiles, slates, corn, and flour; the number of vessels of above fifty tons registered at the port is 56, and their aggregate burthen 6037 tons. Ship-building is carried on to some extent; and many persons are employed in the manufacture of rope, twine, and cordage, and in the making of sails. The quay, on which is the custom-house, a neat and commodious building, is well adapted to the loading and unloading of goods, but, from the accumulation of sand in the harbour, it is not accessible to ships of large burthen. Two post-office steam-packets sail regularly, on Wednesday and Saturday, for Guernsey, Jersey, and the neighbouring islands; and arrangements have been recently made for establishing a communication by steam with Cherbourg, on the coast of France, twice a week. The market-days are Tuesday and Friday: the town is abundantly supplied with fish of every description, with the small mutton from the Isle of Portland, and with provisions of all kinds. which had been distinct boroughs, and had returned members to parliament, the latter since the 8th, and the former since the 12th, of Edward II., were united into one borough, by charter of Elizabeth. The corporation now consists of a mayor, six aldermen, and eighteen councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76, and the number of magistrates is six; the borough is divided into two wards, and the municipal and parliamentary boundaries, including 812 acres, are co-extensive. From its union, it continued to return four members to parliament until the 2nd of William IV., when it was deprived of two; the mayor is returning officer. There is a court of record every Tuesday, for the recovery of debts to any amount. A handsome town-hall, situated in the market-place, has been recently erected, the old one having become dilapidated; and under it are a small prison and watch-house.

Weymouth is a chapelry to Wyke-Regis: the tithes have been commuted for £20. The chapel, dedicated to St. Nicholas, and situated on the top of the hill, long since disappeared, but the site, called Chapel-Hay, is distinctly marked by large stones at the four corners. Under the hill, and nearly adjoining this site, a new church has been built from a design by Mr. P. Wyatt, at the expense of the Rev. George Chamberlaine, rector of Wyke; underneath it are catacombs capable of containing upwards of 1000 bodies. Melcombe, previously to the reign of James I., was a chapel of ease to Radipole, from which it was separated in 1605, when a church was built on the site of the former chapel, and made parochial in 1606: the living is a rectory, with Radipole annexed; valued in the king's books at £11. 5. 5.; net income, £298; patron, W. Wyndham, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, having become greatly dilapidated, an act of parliament was obtained in the 55th of George III., for rebuilding it, which was completed in 1817; it is a neat edifice containing upwards of 2000 sittings, including 500 free sittings purchased by the Rev. G. Chamberlaine, at an expense of £500, for the exclusive use of the poor. The interior is neatly fitted up, and the altar-piece is embellished with a painting of the Last Supper, by Sir James Thornhill. There are places of worship for Independents, Baptists, Wesleyans, and Roman Catholics. Schools have been established; and there are several bequests for education, especially one of £70 per annum, and another of £28, for six boys, left by Mr. Taylor, in 1753. The poor law union of Weymouth comprises eighteen parishes or places, and contains a population of 18,683. At Nottington, about two miles and a half distant, on the Dorchester road, is a mineral spring, the water of which is considered efficacious in scrofula; and about a mile from the town is Radipole Spa, discovered in 1830, by John Henning, Esq. In the centre of the town was a priory of Black canons, dedicated to St. Winifred, and founded by some member of the family of Rogers, of Bryanston: the buildings occupied a quadrangular area of nearly one acre, but have been entirely removed. Five miles from Weymouth is the burning cliff at Holworth, which was first introduced to public notice by Mr. George Frampton, in 1827, and has since attracted the notice of naturalists. Certain masses of septaria, which, when sawn asunder, exhibit beautiful specimens of spar, cornua ammonis, &c., were discovered a few years since in the rear of Melcombe. Thornhill, the celebrated painter, was a native of Melcombe, and represented that borough in parliament in the reign of George I. The late Mr. John Harvey, of Weymouth, projected the plan of a breakwater for Portland Roads, which has been matured and improved by his son, the present postmaster of this place. Melcombe conferred the title of baron on Bubb Doddington, with whom it became extinct; Weymouth gives that of Baron to the family of Thynne.

WHADDON (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of WINSLOW, hundred of COTTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Stony-Stratford; containing, with the hamlet of Nash, 910 inhabitants, of whom 544 are in Whaddon township. A small priory of Benedictine monks, in honour of St. Leonard, was founded in this parish, at Snelleshall, prior to the time of Henry III., by Ralph Martel, and, at the Dissolution, had a revenue of £24. The prior obtained, in 1227, a grant of a market on Thursday, long since disused. Whaddon Hall was once the seat of Arthur, Lord Grey, who was honoured by a visit from Queen Elizabeth, in 1568, then on her Buckinghamshire progress; Spenser, the poet, his lordship's secretary, was frequently here, and it was afterwards purchased and occupied by Browne Willis, the antiquary. An act was passed in 1841, for allotting certain portions of land in the county, in lieu of the common right on Whaddon Chace. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10; net income, £152; patrons and impropiators, the Warden and Fellows of New College, Oxford. A charity school was founded by Mr. Coare, who endowed it with £10 per annum. Dr. Richard Cox, Bishop of Ely, an eminent champion of the Reformation, and one of the principal composers of the Liturgy, was born in the parish in 1499. The place gave the title of Baron, the first conferred upon him, to Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, the favourite of James I. and Charles I.

WHADDON (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of ROYSTON, hundred of ARMINGFORD, county of CAMBRIDGE, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.) from Royston; containing 345 inhabitants. It comprises about 1200 acres; the soil is a productive loam, favourable to the growth of wheat; the surface is generally level, and the river Cam flows through part of the lands. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 2. $3\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Windsor (the appropriators), with a net income of £166. The great tithes have been commuted for £355, and the vicarial for £100; there are 102 acres of appropriate glebe, and one belonging to the vicar.

WHADDON (St. Margaret), a parish, in the Middle division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S-BARTON, union and E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Gloucester; containing 132 inhabitants, and consisting of 692 acres. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £46; patron, J. Pitt, Esq.

WHADDON, a parish, in the union and hundred of MELKSHAM, Melksham and N. divisions of WILTS, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Trowbridge; containing 50 inhabitants. This parish, which is intersected by the river Avon and the Kennet and Avon canal, comprises by computation 420 acres. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 4. $4\frac{1}{2}$., and in the joint patronage of R. and J. Long, Esqrs.: the tithes have been commuted for £92, and the glebe comprises 21 acres.

WHALE, a township, in the parish of LOWTHER, WEST ward and union, county of WESTMORLAND; containing 53 inhabitants.

WHALEY, with YEARDSLEY, a township, in the parish of TAXALL, union and hundred of MACCLESFIELD, N. division of the county of CHESTER, $9\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Stockport; containing 663 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. The Peak-Forest canal passes through the place.

WHALLEY (All Saints), a parish, in the union of CLITHEROE, chiefly in the N. division of LANCASHIRE, but partly in the W. riding of YORK; containing 111,741 inhabitants, of whom 1010 are in the township of Whalley, 4 miles (S. by W.) from Clitheroe. This important parish comprises, in the Higher division of Blackburn hundred, Lancashire, the borough of Clitheroe, the market-towns of Burnley and Colne, the chapelries of Altham, Little Marsden, New-Church in Pendle, and New-Church in Rossendale; the extra-parochial places of Henheads, Heyhouses, and Wheatley-Carr; and the townships of New and Old Accrington, Barley with Wheatley-Booth, Barrowford, Higher and Lower Booths, Briercliffe with Extwistle, Chatburn, Cliviger, Downham, Dunnockshaw, Foulridge, Goldshaw-Booth, Habbergham-Eaves, Hapton, Higham with West-Close Booth, Hallows-Reedley with Filly-Close and New Laund Booth, Huncoat, Ightonhill-Park, Old Laund Booth, Great Marsden, Mearley, Little Mitton, Padiham, Pendleton with Sabden, Read, Rough-Lee Booth, Simonstone, Trawden, Twiston, Whalley, Wiswell, Worsthorpe with Hurstwood, Worston, and Yate with Pickup-Bank. In the Lower division of Blackburn hundred, Lancashire, the parish contains the market-town of Haslingden, and the townships of Little Bowland with Leagram, Church-Kirk, Clayton-le-Moors, and Oswaldtwistle; and in Yorkshire, is the township of Low Bowland-Forest. The parish is about 30 miles in length by 15 in breadth, though but little more than half its ancient extent, which included also the present parishes of Blackburn, Chipping, Mitton, Ribchester, Rochdale, and Slaidburn, which have been separated from it at different times: the rivers Calder and Ribble form a junction at the western extremity. The village is chiefly celebrated for the venerable ruins of its abbey, which exhibit portions in the early, decorated, and later English styles; they are still considerable, and possess much interest. This house was founded in 1296, by Henry Lacy, Earl of Lincoln, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, for monks of the Cistercian order, whose revenue, at the Dissolution, was estimated at £551. 4. 6. There are manufactures of cotton, rope, and nails. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 3. 9.; patron, the Archbishop of Canterbury; impropiators, Earl Howe and Lord Ribblesdale; net income, £145. The church is a large structure, principally in the early English style, of which the chancel is a very fine specimen; the interior contains eighteen ancient stalls, and some considerable remains of good screen-work, brought from the old abbey. There are thirty churches and chapels in different parts of the parish, erected by private individuals, by subscription, and various grants from Royal Bounty, and Her Majesty's Commissioners. The free grammar school, founded by Queen Elizabeth, was rebuilt by subscription in 1725, with a dwelling-house for the master, who receives an annuity of £12. 8. from the crown rents, and another of £4. 14. arising from bequests; it has an interest in thirteen scholarships, founded in Brasenose College, Oxford, by Dr. Nowell, in 1572. There are traces of a Roman road passing through part of the parish.

WHALTON, a parish, in the union and W. division of CASTLE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND; containing, with the townships of Newham, Ogle, and Riplington, 531 inhabitants, of whom 315 are in Whalton township, 6 miles (S. W. by W.) from Morpeth. This barony was conferred by the Conqueror upon Walter Fitz-William, to be held by the service of three knights' fees; it was afterwards possessed by the Fitz-Rogers, Fitz-Roberts, and others, and in the reign of James I. was held by the crown, and was subsequently granted to the Meggison family. A market and fair were once held, agreeably with the right which Robert Fitz-Roger claimed and established in 1294. The parish comprises by measurement 5815 acres, of which 2053 are in the township of Whalton; of the latter, 1291 acres are arable, 583 pasture, and 16 woodland. The whole is well inclosed, its surface undulated, and the soil, which is mostly loam, with a subsoil partly gravel, and in some places clay, is adapted to the growth of wheat and oats; limestone is abundant, and there are quarries of good freestone worked for private use. The village is one of the neatest in the county, hanging beautifully on the edge of a southern slope; it consists of one long street, containing several well-built houses, many of which have ornamented gardens in front, inclosed with palisades, and at intervals are clusters of trees, that much enliven its appearance. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 8. 1½., and in the patronage of Ralph Bates, Esq., with an income of about £800: the glebe comprises 141 acres. The church is a venerable well-built edifice of freestone, and is a pleasing object as approached from the village; it was repaired in 1783, when parapets and pinnacles were added to the tower. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans, and also a Church school. A little to the eastward of the village are the remains of considerable earthworks, supposed to have formed part of a Danish encampment at an early period of history.

WHAPLODE (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of HOLBEACH, wapentake of ELLOE, parts of HOLLAND, county of LINCOLN, 2 miles (W.) from Holbeach; containing, with the chapelry of Whaplode-Drove, 2357 inhabitants, of whom 1614 are in Whaplode township. This parish, which is intersected in the northern part by the river Welland, comprises about 13,440 acres. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £16. 14. 9½., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £309; impropiators, the Trustees of Uppingham school. The church is an ancient structure, with a square tower; the nave is separated from the aisles by circular and clustered columns alternately; it contains the family vault of the Irby family, lords Boston. Elisha and Frances Wilson, in 1708, bequeathed land producing £10 per annum for a school; and there are almshouses for six widows.

WHAPLODE-DROVE, a chapelry, in the parish of WHAPLODE, union of HOLBEACH, wapentake of ELLOE, parts of HOLLAND, county of LINCOLN, 5¼ miles (E. N. E.) from Crowland; containing 743 inhabitants. The district comprises by measurement 1952 acres, chiefly fenny land. A pleasure-fair is held in June. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £380; patrons and impropiators, certain Trustees: the glebe comprises 170 acres, with a house. The chapel dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is a plain neat structure of brick, rebuilt in 1821.

WHARLES, with TREALES and ROSEACRE, a township, in the parish of KIRKHAM, union of the FYLDE, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 2¾ miles (N. E. by N.) from Kirkham; containing 709 inhabitants.

WHARRAM-LE-STREET (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of MALTON, wapentake of BUCKROSE, E. riding of YORK, 6¾ miles (S. E. by E.) from New Malton; containing 135 inhabitants. The parish is on the road between Malton and Beverley, and comprises about 1600 acres: the village, which is small, is pleasantly seated on the acclivities of a valley, near several springs which give rise to two rivulets, one running east, and the other west. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6, and in the gift of the impropiator, Lord Middleton: the tithes have been commuted for £157. 10., and the glebe comprises 3½ acres. The church is a neat edifice, with a tower at the west end.

WHARRAM-PERCY, a parish, in the union of MALTON, wapentake of BUCKROSE, E. riding of YORK; containing, with the townships of Raisthorpe with Birdall, Thixendale, and Towthorpe, 372 inhabitants, of whom 35 are in Wharram-Percy township, 7¼ miles (S. E.) from New Malton. The parish comprises about 8480 acres, of which 1400 are in Wharram-Percy, and form two farms: the village is situated about a mile west of the road between North Grimstone and Wetwang. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11. 13. 4.; net income, £60; patron and impropiator, Lord Middleton. The church stands in a deep and narrow dale between the two farm-houses, and is a neat structure with an embattled tower, partly of Norman architecture, thoroughly repaired in 1829.

WHARTON, a township, in the parish of DAVENHAM, union and hundred of NORTHWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Middlewich; containing 1400 inhabitants. The Grand Junction railway passes through the township. A rent-charge of £75. 1. has been awarded as a commutation for the tithes.

WHARTON, a township, in the parish and union of LEOMINSTER, hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD; containing 93 inhabitants.

WHARTON, a township, in the parish of BLYTON, union of GAINSBOROUGH, wapentake of CORRINGHAM, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Gainsborough; containing 39 inhabitants.

WHARTON, a township, in the parish of KIRKBY-STEPHEN, EAST ward and union, county of WESTMORLAND, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Kirkby-Stephen; containing 55 inhabitants. It comprises 1472 acres, of which 700 are common or waste land. The Hall, once a large quadrangular building, with a tower at each angle, was the princely residence of Philip, the celebrated Duke of Wharton, and his ancestors, but is now occupied as a farm-house. The ancient village was demolished many years since for the enlargement of the park, when the inhabitants settled at Wharton-Dikes. The Hall, with all the estates and manorial rights of the Whartons, is now possessed by the Earl of Lonsdale.

WHASHTON, or WASHTON, a township, in the parish of KIRKBY-RAVENSWORTH, union of RICHMOND, wapentake of GILLING-WEST, N. riding of YORK, 4 miles (N. by W.) from Richmond; containing 133 inhabitants. It comprises about 1200 acres, partly the property of the Craddock family: the village is seated on an acclivity under the eastern verge of the high moors of Arkengarth forest, and about half a mile south-east from Kirkby-Ravensworth.

WHATBOROUGH, a liberty, in the parish of TILTON, union of BILLESDON, hundred of EAST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, 12 miles (E. by N.) from Leicester; containing 11 inhabitants.

WHATCOMBE, a tything, in the parish of FAWLEY, union of WANTAGE, hundred of KINTBURY-EAGLE, county of BERKS, 6 miles (S.) from Wantage; containing 26 inhabitants.

WHATCOTT (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union of SHIPSTON-UPON-STOUR, Brails division of the hundred of KINGTON, S. division of the county of WARWICK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Shipston; containing 182 inhabitants. It is bounded on the north by a small stream which falls into the river Stour, and comprises 863 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 17. $3\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £213; patron, Sir S. Graham, Bart. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1802.

WHATCROFT, a township, in the parish of DAVENHAM, union and hundred of NORTHWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 3 miles (N. W. by N.) from Middlewich; containing 49 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £58. 8. 2.

WHATFIELD (ST. MARGARET), a parish, in the union and hundred of COSFORD, W. division of SUFFOLK,

3 miles (N.) from Hadleigh; containing 394 inhabitants, and comprising 1571a. 22p. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15. 0. 5.; net income, £393; patrons, the Master and Fellows of Jesus' College, Cambridge. The Rev. John Clubb, rector of the parish, published, in 1753, the History and Antiquities of the Ancient Villa of Wheatfield, intended as a satire on antiquaries and conjectural etymologists.

WHATLEY (ST. GEORGE), a parish, in the union and hundred of FROME, E. division of SOMERSET, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Frome; containing, with part of the hamlet of Little Elm, 421 inhabitants. The parish is on the road from Salisbury, through Wells, to Exeter, and comprises by measurement 1168 acres, of which 257 are arable, 864 meadow and pasture, and 47 woodland. The soil is a light calcareous loam, the surface beautifully diversified with hills and valleys, and there are quarries of good mountain limestone, rough whetstone, and of inferior freestone. The village is situated on elevated ground: there is a manufactory of spades, scythes, and reaping-hooks; and the manufacture of woollen-cloth is carried on to a moderate extent. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 17. 1., and in the gift of T. S. Horner, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £226, and the glebe comprises 13 acres. The church is on an eminence separated from the parish of Mells by a deep ravine, the sides of which are clothed with thick woods; it is an ancient structure, chiefly in the later English style, with a square embattled tower crowned by pinnacles. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Independents. Some fine specimens of ennerinite and other fossils are found. On a bold height at the western extremity of the parish are vestiges of a Roman encampment; and in 1838 was discovered what, from the figures of dolphins, is supposed to have been a Roman bath, consisting chiefly of an apartment 30 feet long and 15 feet wide, the floor of which is a finely tessellated pavement in excellent preservation. There is also a smaller apartment, in the centre of which is the head of a female, supposed to be Cybele.

WHATLINGTON, a parish, in the union and hundred of BATTLE, rape of HASTINGS, E. division of SUSSEX, 2 miles (N. by E.) from Battle; containing 279 inhabitants. The surface is beautifully diversified with hill and dale, and the higher grounds command some fine views; the village is situated on the old road to Battle, and the new road from Sedlescomb to St. Leonard's passes through it. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 4. 6., and in the gift of the family of Sackville: the tithes have been commuted for £227. 10., and the glebe comprises 9 acres. The church is an ancient structure in the early English style.

WHATTON. (ST. JOHN OF BEVERLEY), a parish, in the union, and N. division of the wapentake, of BINGHAM, S. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E.) from Bingham; containing, with the township of Aslacton, 956 inhabitants, of whom 532 are in Whatton township. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 6. 8.; net income, £212; patron, G. S. Foljambe, Esq.; impropiators, T. Hall, Esq., and others. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1789. The church is an ancient structure, with a handsome tower surmounted by a spire, and contains an effigy of a Knight Templar in armour, and a monumental tablet in memory of Thomas Cranmer, father of the archbishop, who was born at Aslacton in 1489. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WHATTON, LONG (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of LOUGHBOROUGH, hundred of WEST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Loughborough; containing 842 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 1800 acres; the soil is chiefly a strong clay; the surface is partly flat and partly undulated, and the lower grounds are watered by a small rivulet; the scenery is enriched with wood. About 300 frames are at work in the manufacture of stockings. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £275. The tithes were commuted on the inclosure for 300 acres of land. The church is an ancient structure, with a tower at the eastern extremity of the south aisle; the roof is of oak, beautifully carved. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans.

WHEATACRE (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of LODDON and CLAVERING, hundred of CLAVERING, E. division of NORFOLK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Beccles; containing 176 inhabitants. It is bounded on the north-east by the river Waveney, and comprises by measurement 1147 acres, of which 420 are arable, 653 meadow and pasture, 56 woodland, and 18 waste. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Barnby and the vicarage of Mutford annexed, valued in the king's books at £6. 6. $5\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £660; patrons, the Master and Fellows of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge. The tithes of Wheatacre have been commuted for £208, and the glebe comprises 57 acres. The church is chiefly in the early English style, with a square embattled tower.

WHEATACRE-BURGH.—See BURGH ST. PETER.

WHEATENHURST, or WHITMINSTER (ST. ANDREW), a parish, and the head of a union, in the Lower division of the hundred of WHITSTONE, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Gloucester; containing 391 inhabitants. It is bounded on the north-west by the river Severn, and comprises 1237*a.* 3*r.* 25*p.*; the Gloucester and Berkeley and the Stroud canals pass through the parish, and the village is situated on the road from Gloucester to Bristol. The living is a perpetual curacy, valued in the king's books at £7. 12. $3\frac{1}{2}$., and has a net income of £135; the patronage and impropriation belong to Mrs. Hawkins, whose tithes have been commuted for £266. 10. The glebe comprises $11\frac{1}{2}$ acres. Wheatenhurst poor law union comprises 14 parishes or places, containing a population of 7970.

WHEATFIELD, a parish, in the union of THAME, hundred of PIRTON, county of OXFORD, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.) from Tetsworth; containing 99 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 1000 acres; the soil is generally a fine loam resting, in the higher lands, on a substratum of chalk, and in the lower, of clay. The surface is partly flat and partly undulated, and watered by a small rivulet which separates the parish from those of Adwell and Tetsworth. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 10. 10., and in the gift of the Trustees of C. V. Spencer, Esq.; the tithes have been commuted for £230, and the glebe comprises 30 acres.

WHEATHAMPSTEAD (ST. HELEN), a parish, in the union of ST. ALBAN'S, hundred of DACORUM, county of HERTFORD, 5 miles (N. N. E.) from St. Alban's; containing 1871 inhabitants. The rebellious barons here assembled their forces against Edward II., in 1311, on which occasion two nuncios, sent by the pope, endeavoured to restore peace between the contending parties, when the papal authority was rejected by the former. The parish comprises 4999*a.* 2*r.* 30*p.*, of which 3543 acres are arable, 714 pasture and wood, 473 homesteads and gardens, and 268 common and waste. The St. Alban's races are held on ground called Noman's Land, which extends into this parish. The living is a rectory, with that of Harpenden annexed, valued in the king's books at £42. 1. $10\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £1356; patron, the Bishop of Lincoln. The rectorial tithes have been commuted for £770; the glebe comprises 40 acres, and there is also a rent-charge of £576, payable to the Dean and Chapter of Westminster. The church is an ancient cruciform structure, of early English character, with a central tower, and contains 500 sittings, of which 200 are free; the font is a curious specimen of the early decorated style. There is a place of worship for Independents. James Marshall, in 1719, bequeathed property, the rental of which, now amounting to £184. 15. per annum, is equally divided between the parishes of Wheathampstead and Harpenden, and appropriated to apprenticing children. John Bostock, abbot of St. Alban's, a learned divine and poet in the time of Henry VI., was born here, and was commonly called John of Wheathampstead.

WHEATHILL (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of CLEOBURY-MORTIMER, hundred of STOTTESDEN, S. division of SALOP, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Ludlow; containing 140 inhabitants. This parish, which is on the road from Bridgenorth to Ludlow, comprises by measurement 1424 acres: there is a small quarry of excellent freestone. The village was formerly of more importance, and had a weekly market and an annual fair, granted by charter of Edward I., both of which have been long discontinued. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 5. $7\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the incumbent, the Rev. John Churton: the tithes have been commuted for £201, and the glebe comprises 93 acres. The church is an ancient structure, originally of the Norman style, of which many interesting details are remaining, with additions of later date.

WHEATHILL (ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of WINCANTON, hundred of WHITLEY, W. division of SOMERSET, 4 miles (W. by S.) from Castle-Cary; containing 28 inhabitants. It is on the road from Castle-Cary to Somerton, and comprises about 600 acres, principally in pasture: the springs in the vicinity are strongly impregnated with sulphur. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 5. $2\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of Mrs. Harbin: the tithes have been commuted for £73, and the glebe comprises 27 acres. The church is a small ancient structure; the architecture of which resembles the early English style.

WHEATLEY, with THORNLEY, a township, in the parish of CHIPPING, union of CLITHEROE, Lower division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Clitheroe; containing 507 inhabitants. It is on the banks of a small tributary of the river Ribble.

WHEATLEY, a chapelry, in the parish of CUDDSDEN, union of HEADINGTON, hundred of BULLINGDON, county of OXFORD, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Oxford; containing 997 inhabitants. A post-office has been established in the village. The chapel is dedicated to St. Mary: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £120; patron and appropriator, the Bishop of Oxford. The tithes were commuted for land in 1809. Bishop Moss, in 1811, bequeathed £3000 for the foundation of a national school, and other charitable uses; in pursuance of which, schoolrooms have been provided, and £1500 given by the trustees as a permanent endowment, producing, with subscriptions, £100 per annum. Lady Curzon, in 1692, assigned lands producing £15 per annum, for apprenticing children; Dr. Cyril Jackson, in 1816, gave £166. 13. three per cent. consols., for clothing the poor; and the rental of the town meadow, amounting to £26. 10., is applied to general relief.

WHEATLEY, with LONG SANDAL, a township, in the parish, union, and soke of DONCASTER, W. riding of YORK, 2 miles (N. E. by N.) from Doncaster; containing 279 inhabitants, of whom 156 are in the hamlet of Wheatley. The Hall, the seat of Sir William Bryan Cooke, Bart., is a handsome mansion, with a tastefully-embellished demesne. A school, and almshouses for twelve aged persons, were erected and are liberally supported by the family of Cooke.

WHEATLEY-CARR, an extra-parochial township, in the union of BURNLEY, parish of WHALLEY, Higher division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, N. division of LANCASHIRE, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Colne; containing 53 inhabitants.

WHEATLEY, NORTH (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of EAST RETFORD, North-Clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from East Retford; containing 424 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 2144 acres; the soil is fertile, producing wheat much esteemed for its quality, and there are some quarries of gypsum. The village is pleasantly situated on the south side of the road to Gainsborough. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £3. 18. $11\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the impropiator, Lord Middleton: the great tithes were commuted for £370, and the vicarial for £246. 13., and the glebe comprises 23 acres. The church is an ancient structure, of which the chancel was rebuilt in 1824. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. The Roman road from Doncaster to Lincoln passes through the parish.

WHEATLEY, SOUTH (St. HELEN), a parish, in the union of EAST RETFORD, North Clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from East Retford; containing 41 inhabitants. This parish, which contains 694 acres, is separated from North Wheatley by a rivulet that flows through a deep and narrow valley. The living is a discharged rectory, in the patronage of the Chapter of the Collegiate Church of Southwell, valued in the king's books at £6. 14. 2.; net income, £140. The church is a small structure.

WHEATON-ASTON, a chapelry, in the parish of LAPLEY, union of PENKRIDGE, W. division of the hundred of CUTTLESTONE, S. division of the county of STAFFORD, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Penkridge; containing 706 inhabitants. Fairs for cattle, &c., are held on April 20th and Nov. 1st. The chapel has been enlarged, and 320 free sittings provided, the Incorporated Society having granted £250 in aid of the expense. There are places of worship for Independents and Primitive Methodists.

WHEDDICAR, a township, in the parish of St. BEES, union of WHITEHAVEN, ALLERDALE ward above Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Whitehaven; containing 59 inhabitants.

WHELOCK, a township, in the parish of SANDBACH, union of CONGLETON, hundred of NORTHWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. S. W.) from Sandbach; containing 574 inhabitants. The Grand Trunk canal passes through the parish, and on its banks are commodious wharfs and warehouses. Cotton is manufactured, and there is a brewery; but the chief trade of the place is in salt, of which large quantities are extracted from brine found at the depth of 60 yards, on both sides of the river Wheelock. A district church, dedicated to Christ, has been erected, of which the incumbent has a net income of £150. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £75, and the vicarial for £49. 14. 3. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WHEELTON, a township, in the parish and hundred of LEYLAND, union of CHORLEY, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 4 miles (N. E. by N.) from Chorley; containing 1331 inhabitants.

WHELDRAKE (St. HELEN), a parish, in the wapentake of OUSE and DERWENT, union and E. riding of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Escrick, and $7\frac{1}{2}$ (S. E.) from York; containing, with the township of Langwith, 722 inhabitants, of whom 682 are in Wheldrake township. The parish comprises 4431a. 1r. 19p., chiefly arable land; the surface is level and well-wooded, the hedge-rows being generally planted with thriving oak-trees; the soil is a strong loam, except on the common moor, where it is of a sandy quality. For a considerable distance, the Derwent forms the eastern boundary, but at the south-eastern extremity the parish stretches across the river, where it constitutes a valuable tract of rich meadow land called Wheldrake Ings, which admits of being mown every year without the application of manure. Lord Wenlock is lord of the manor, and owner of about four-fifths of the soil. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £25. 17. $3\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Archbishop of York, with a net income of £430: the tithes were commuted in 1769, for land and a money payment, with the exception of those of Langwith. The church is a large edifice with an ancient stone tower; the nave and chancel, which are of brick, were rebuilt in 1779. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A national school is partly supported by an endowment of £17. 8. per annum, and partly by subscription; and there is a fund for apprenticing children, and for distribution among poor parishioners.

WHELFORD, a hamlet, in the parish of KEMPSFORD, union of CIRENCESTER, hundred of BRIGHTWELLS-BARROW, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER; containing 178 inhabitants.

WHELINGTON, KIRK (St. BARTHOLOMEW), a parish, in the union of BELLINGHAM, N. E. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND; containing, with the townships of Great Bavington, Capheaton, Catcherside, Coldwell, Crogdean, Fawns, Little and West Harle, and West Whelpington, 705 inhabitants, of whom 241 are in Kirk-Whelpington township, 21 miles (N. W.) from Newcastle. In the time of King John, we find Richard de Umfraville making "his whole court at Whelpington" witness to a grant to the monks of Kelso; and the place for some time subsequently continued in the possession of this family, of whom Gilbert, in 1267, obtained from Henry III. liberty to hold a weekly market and annual fair here, which privileges, however, remained in force only for a very short time. The family of Whelpington also had possessions here, of whom one, Robert, was representative of Newcastle in parliament in 1412, 1422, and 1423, and mayor of that town in 1435 and 1438. The parish, exclusively of Capheaton, which is insulated, consists of a tract of land 5 miles from east to west, and 6 from north to south; it is a hilly district, for the most part composed of sheep and dairy farms, and a broad belt of high and heathy moor lies on the west and north sides. The soil is very various, in some places a rich black loam; limestone and sandstone are abundant, and the moors afford an almost inexhaustible supply of peat for fuel. The township consisted wholly of common until 1717, when the lands, 1900 acres, were inclosed: the village is on the north side of the river Wansbeck, which has its source in the parish, and is crossed here by a stone bridge built in 1819. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 3. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Durham, with a net income of £288; the glebe contains 210 acres. The church, which is an ancient structure, with a low tower, has undergone many repairs, and constitutes the remains of a much larger edifice. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the Church of Scotland; and a national school is supported. A spring, the water of which is impregnated with sulphur, has been found efficacious in chronic disorders. In various parts of the parish are traces of circular and rectilinear earthworks, probably thrown up in the border wars, for the protection of cattle from the moss-troopers. Whelpington Tower, now the vicarage-house, was anciently fortified.

WHELPINGTON, WEST, a township, in the parish of KIRK-WHELPINGTON, union of BELLINGHAM, N. E. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 15½ miles (W.) from Morpeth; containing 56 inhabitants. This place has been the property of the Umfravilles, Lisles, Herons, and Milbanks, the last of whom sold it in 1796; it consists of the two lordships of Ray and West Whelpington. The village, at one time considerable, stood proudly on the northern margin of the river Wansbeck, on an elevated plain which slopes gently towards the east, and is defended on all sides by a whinstone precipice: no person has resided here within memory; and Ray has also decreased very much in buildings and population. Horn's Castle, situated on a commanding eminence in the township, has been converted into a farm-house. There are several earthworks within its limits; as is also the Waney Crag, a huge sandstone rock; and the district exhibits many interesting features in natural history.

WHENBY (ST. MARTIN), a parish, in the union of EASINGWOLD, wapentake of BULMER, N. riding of YORK, 2½ miles (S. E. by E.) from Bransby; containing 124 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 1390 acres, of which about two-thirds are arable, and the remainder meadow and pasture; the surface is undulated, and the soil generally a rich clay loam. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 8. 4., and in the gift of the improprator, W. Garforth, Esq.: the great tithes have been commuted for £120, and the vicarial for £105; the glebe consists of 10 acres. The church is an ancient structure, with a square tower. A parochial school is supported by the patron and the vicar.

WHEPSTEAD, a parish, in the union and hundred of THINGOE, W. division of SUFFOLK, 4¼ miles (S. S. W.) from Bury St. Edmund's; containing 681 inhabitants, and comprising about 2789 acres. Plumpton, an ancient house here, is the seat of Lieut.-Gen. Sir Thomas Hammond. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 4. 2.; net income, £468; patron and incumbent, the Rev. T. Image. Thomas Sparke, in 1721, left land now producing an income of about £21, for which ten children are educated; and the parish is entitled to a share of the bequests of Sir Robert Drury and Sir Robert Jarvis, which, together with the interest of £200 given by J. W. Allen, Esq., is distributed among the poor.

WHERSTEAD (ST. MARY), a parish, in the incorporation and hundred of SAMFORD, E. division of SUFFOLK, 2¾ miles (S. by W.) from Ipswich; containing 238 inhabitants. This place is situated on the river Orwell, adjoining the town of Ipswich; and at a very early period there was a small religious foundation, united to the priory of St. Peter and St. Paul, Ipswich. The parish comprises 2019*a*. 1*r*. 20*p*., of which 1466 acres are arable, 277 meadow and pasture, 244 woodland and plantations, 32 gardens and homesteads, and 19 roads; the surface is diversified with hill and dale, and the scenery, especially on the banks of the river, beautifully picturesque. Wherstead Lodge, a handsome mansion, is the seat of Sir Robert Harland, Bart. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown; improprator, Sir Robert. The great tithes have been commuted for £401. 3., and the vicarial for £157. 7.; the glebe comprises 17 acres.

WHERWELL (HOLY CROSS), a parish, in the union of ANDOVER, hundred of WHERWELL, Andover and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 3¼ miles (S. S. E.) from Andover; containing, with the tythings of Fullerton and Westover, 664 inhabitants. This place was distinguished as the site of a Benedictine nunnery founded and amply endowed by Queen Elfrida, about the year 986, in expiation of the murder of Edward the Martyr after the death of his father, Edgar, King of England, her second consort; here she passed the remainder of her life, and the convent, which was dedicated to the Holy Cross and St. Peter, flourished till the Dissolution, when its revenue was returned at £403. 12. 10. The parish comprises 3261 acres, including 40 common or waste, and is intersected by the rivers Test and Ande, which latter falls into the Redbridge and Andover canal; the surface is varied, and richly wooded. A fair for sheep is held on the 24th of September. The living is a vicarage, with those of Bullington and Tufton annexed, valued in the king's books at £14; net income, £301; patron, Colonel Iremonger, as owner of the sinecure rectory, which was a prebend in the nunnery of Wher-well, and is valued in the king's books at £44. 11. 0½. The great tithes of Wherwell have been commuted for £595, and the vicarial for £204; the glebe comprises 5 acres. In one of the recesses of an extensive wood is a stone cross, with the following inscription on its base: "About the year of our Lord DCCCCLXIII, upon this spot, beyond the time of memory called Dead Man's Plack, tradition reports that Edgar (surnamed the Peaceable) King of England, in the ardour of youth, love, and indignation, slew with his own hand his treacherous and ungrateful favourite, Earl Athelwold, owner of this forest of Harewood, in resentment of the earl's having basely betrayed his royal confidence, and perfidiously married his intended bride the beauteous Elfrida, daughter of Ordgar, Earl of Devonshire, after wife to King Edgar and by him mother of King Etheldred the 2nd, which Queen Elfrida, after Edgar's death, murdered his eldest son, King Edward the Martyr, and founded the nunnery of Whorwell."

WHESOE, a township, in the parish of HAUGHTON-LE-SKERNE, union of DARLINGTON, S. E. division of DARLINGTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM, 2½ miles (N. by W.) from Darlington; containing 118 inhabitants. The township comprises 1402 acres, of which 888 are arable, 477 grass land, 7 wood, and 30 roads and waste; the soil is a strong clay. The Stockton and Darlington, and the Darlington and Newcastle Junction, railways, pass through the township. The tithes were commuted in 1838, for £43. 11. 6. Charles Colling, Esq., resided at Ketton House, here, where he contributed much to the improvement of short-horned cattle.

WHESTON, a hamlet, in the parish of TIDESWELL, union of BAKEWELL, hundred of HIGH PEAK, N. division of the county of DERBY, 1¼ mile (W.) from Tideswell; containing 65 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £50. 9., of which £30 are payable to an impropiator, £4. 19. 2. to the vicar, and £15. 9. 10. to the Bishop of Lichfield.

WHETHAM, a tything, in the parish, union, and hundred of CALNE, Chippenham and Calne, and N. divisions of WILTS; containing 200 inhabitants.

WHETMORE, with BURASTON, a chapelry, in the parish of BURFORD, union of TENBURY, hundred of OVERS, S. division of SALOP, 2½ miles (N. N. E.) from Tenbury; containing 223 inhabitants, of whom 24 are in Whetmore township.

WHETSTONE (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union of BLABY, hundred of GUTHLAXTON, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, 5¼ miles (S. S. W.) from Leicester; containing 956 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the north-west by the river Soar, comprises about 2300 acres. Its soil is principally sand alternated with clay, of good quality for brick-making, for which there are some kilns; the surface is generally level. A small number of the population is employed in frame-work knitting. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Enderby: the tithes were commuted for land in 1764.

WHETSTONE, a hamlet and chapelry, in the parishes of FRYERN-BARNET and FINCHLEY, Finsbury division of the hundred of OSSULSTONE, union of BARNET, county of MIDDLESEX, 8 miles (N. N. W.) from London; containing 782 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Bishop of London and of Trustees, with a net income of £120.

The chapel, dedicated to St. John, has had a district assigned to it by the commissioners under the 59th of George III.

WHICHAM (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of BOOTLE, ALLERDALE ward above Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, 10 miles (S. S. E.) from Ravenglass; containing 299 inhabitants. It comprises by admeasurement 6970 acres, of which 2463 are arable, 7 woodland, and about 4500 common and waste; the surface is mountainous, and the substratum contains iron-ore, of which there are extensive works. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 15., and in the gift of the Earl of Lonsdale: the tithes have been commuted for £160, and the glebe comprises 75 acres. An annuity of £16, supposed to have been granted by Queen Elizabeth from the crown revenues of the county, and payable out of the exchequer, is applied towards the support of a grammar school at Churchgate.

WHICHFORD (ST. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of SHIPSTON-UPON-STOUR, Brails division of the hundred of KINGTON, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 6 miles (S. E.) from Shipston; containing, with the hamlets of Ascott and Stourton, 691 inhabitants, of whom 344 are in the township. It is near the southern extremity of the county, on the border of Oxfordshire, and comprises 3007 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £19. 8. 6½.; net income, £623; patron, Earl Beauchamp. The tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1805.

WHICKHAM (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of GATESHEAD, E. division of CHESTER ward, N. division of the county of DURHAM; containing, with the townships of Fellside, Lowside, and Swalwell, 4319 inhabitants, of whom 923 are in Whickham township, 3½ miles (W. S. W.) from Gateshead. The parish comprises about 6000 acres of arable and pasture land in nearly equal portions, with a small quantity of wood: the Derwent divides it from Winlaton, on the west. A coal-mine is in operation; and at Dunston is a large factory for patent anchors, and for alkali. The village, which contains several neat and well-built houses, is pleasantly situated on an eminence overlooking the vales of Tyne and Team to the north and to the east, and commanding also an extensive prospect over the rising grounds across the Tyne. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £20. 8. 11½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Durham, and has a net income of £663. The church, which retains vestiges of considerable antiquity, amidst much of modern repair and alteration, is embellished with a square tower, and consists of a nave, aisles, and chancel; in the interior are eight plain square-edged Norman arches, and a bold chancel arch of the same style. The rectory-house stands at some distance across the road, to the west. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also a school, erected about 1711, by Robert Tomlinson, D.D., incumbent, and supported by various bequests subsequently made by him and others, together with subscriptions and the payments of the children. John Hewett, in 1738, left a small fund for apprenticing children; and about £30 per annum, the produce of benefactions, are distributed among the poor. In the parish is a bed of calcined earth, caused by the English, when pressed by the Scottish army under Leslie, having set fire to their camp, which communicated with a seam of coal that burnt with great fury for some years. The parish register, which commences in 1575, contains many allusions to the plague, and some also to the visitation of the Scottish army, part of which quartered here after the rout at Newburn.—See GIBSIDE, &c.

WHIDHILL, a tything, in the parish of St. SAMPSON, union of CRICKLADE and WOOTTON-BASSETT, borough of CRICKLADE, hundred of HIGHWORTH, CRICKLADE, and STAPLE, Cricklade and N. divisions of WILTS, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Cricklade.

WHILE, or WHYLE, with PUDDLESTONE, a parish, in the union of LEOMINSTER, hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Leominster; containing 277 inhabitants. This place, according to ancient tradition, was formerly a distinct parish, and had a church. The living is a rectory, united to that of Puddlestone.

WHILLYMOOR, a township, in the parish of ARLEDON, union of WHITEHAVEN, ALLERDALE ward above Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Whitehaven; containing 97 inhabitants, and comprising 1889*a. 3r. 15p.* The tithes were commuted for land in 1819. Divine service is performed in a Sunday schoolroom erected in 1840, by subscription, aided by a grant from the National Society.

WHILTON (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of DAVENTRY, hundred of NEWBOTTLE-GROVE, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 5 miles (E. N. E.) from Daventry; containing 401 inhabitants. The parish comprises by survey 916 acres: the old Watling-street, the Grand Junction canal, and the London and Birmingham railway, pass through it. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 16. 3.; net income, £328; patron, William Rose, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land in 1777; the glebe comprises 183 acres. The church, a plain neat structure, was rebuilt a few years since. Jonathan Emery, in 1768, bequeathed £500, and Judith Worsfold £1000 three per cent. consols., producing together £40 per annum, which sum is applied in aid of a national school.

WHIMPLE (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of St. THOMAS, hundred of CLISTON, Woodbury and N. divisions of DEVON, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Ottery St. Mary; containing, with the tything of Strete-Raleigh, 816 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the western road, at about an equal distance from Exeter and Honiton, comprises by measurement 3000 acres. A fair is held on the Monday before Michaelmas-day. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £30, and in the gift of Mrs. Sanders, with a net income of £357: the glebe comprises 60 acres. The church is an ancient structure.

WHINBURGH (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of MITFORD and LAUNDITCH, hundred of MITFORD, W. division of NORFOLK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from East Dereham; containing 209 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road to Wymondham, and comprises 1241*a. 3r. 2p.*, of which 929 acres are arable, 300 pasture and meadow, and about 14 woodland. A weekly market, and a fair on the festival of St. Simon and St. Jude, were granted by Edward I. to Lord Bardolph; but both have been long discontinued. There are some slight remains of an old manor-house, surrounded by a double moat. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Westfield united, valued in the king's books at £6. 18. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £283; patron, Col. Sir W. R. Clayton, Bart. The tithes of Whinburgh have been commuted for £169. 7.; the glebe comprises 21 acres, and there is a rent-charge of £5. 5. payable to the rector of Yaxham. The church is an ancient structure in the early and later English styles, with a square tower on the south side.

WHINFELL, a township, in the parish of BRIGHAM, union of COCKERMOUTH, ALLERDALE ward above Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.) from Cockermouth; containing 132 inhabitants. The improper tithes have been commuted for £14.

WHINFELL, a township, in the parish, union, and ward of KENDAL, county of WESTMORLAND, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Kendal; containing 187 inhabitants.

WHIPPINGHAM (St. MILDRED), a parish, in the liberty of EAST MEDINA, Isle of Wight incorporation and division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Newport; containing 2518 inhabitants. The parish lies on the east side of the navigable river Medina, and is bounded on the north-east by the Motherbank; it contains the populous hamlet of East Cowes, and also Barton's-Village, near Newport, each of which places has an ecclesiastical district assigned to its church. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £19. 1. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £757. The church is a small structure, principally in the later English style, with a tower and spire.

WHIPSNAD (St. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish, in the union of LUTON, hundred of MANSHEAD, county of BEDFORD, 3 miles (S. W.) from Dunstable; containing 211 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1105 acres, of which 184 are common or waste land. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £156.

WHISBY, a chapelry, in the parish of DODDINGTON, Lower division of the wapentake of BOOTHBY-GRAFFO, parts of KESTIVEN, union and county of LINCOLN, 6 miles (S. W. by W.) from Lincoln; containing 63 inhabitants. The chapelry comprises about 1500 acres, of which 600 are moorland, now in course of inclosure under an act passed in 1841. A rent-charge of £161. 15. 4. has been awarded as a commutation for the tithes.

WHISSENDINE (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of OAKHAM, hundred of ALSTOE, county of RUTLAND, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Oakham; containing 831 inhabitants. It comprises about 4230 acres; the surface is pleasingly diversified with hill and dale; the soil is fertile. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 1.; net income, £155; patron, the Earl of Harborough; impropiator, W. Bissill, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1762.

WHISSONSETT (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of MITFORD and LAUNDITCH, hundred of LAUNDITCH, W. division of NORFOLK, 5 miles (S.) from Fakenham; containing 702 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 1322 acres, of which 1005 are arable, 300 meadow and pasture, and 14 woodland: the village is pleasantly situated; and a fair, chiefly for shoes and pedlery, is held on the Wednesday in Whitsun-week. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Horningtoft united, valued in the king's books at £10. 3. 4. ; net income, £714 ; patron, F. R. Reynolds, Esq. The tithes have been commuted for £329, and the glebe comprises 60 acres, with a house. The church is an ancient structure, in the early and later English styles, with a square embattled tower ; in the chancel are several gravestones of grey marble, with brasses bearing the effigies of members of the family of Bozoun. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans.

WHISTLEY-HURST, a liberty, in the parish of HURST, union of WOKINGHAM, hundred of CHARLTON, county of BERKS, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Reading ; containing 992 inhabitants, and comprising 1701a. 3r. 36p.

WHISTON, a township, in the parish and union of PRESCOT, hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (S.) from Prescot ; containing 1586 inhabitants, most of whom are employed in collieries. The Liverpool and Manchester railway passes through the township, by an inclined plane. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £130, and the impropriate for £200, payable to King's College, Cambridge.

WHISTON (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of HARDINGSTONE, hundred of WYMMERSLEY, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Northampton ; containing 66 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 809 acres ; the surface is undulated, and the lower grounds are watered by the river Nene ; the soil is chiefly clay, alternated with gravel, and the substratum is excellent limestone. The living is a rectory, to which a portion of the rectory of Denton is annexed, valued in the king's books at £14. 11. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of Lord Boston : the tithes have been commuted for £250, and there are 4 acres of glebe. The church, built about 1530, by Anthony Catesby, Esq., is remarkable for the beauty of its proportions, and is in the later English style, with a lofty and elegant tower crowned by rich pinnacles ; the font is octagonal, with panelled sides handsomely executed ; in the chancel is a monument to the founder, and there are several to the Irby family, of which one, to the memory of the first Lord Boston and his secretary, is finely executed by Nollekens. There are remains of a moated building said to have been the residence of King John.

WHISTON, a hamlet, in the parish and union of PENKRIDGE, E. division of the hundred of CUTTLESTONE, S. division of the county of STAFFORD, 2 miles (W.) from Penkridge. There is a place of worship for Methodists.

WHISTON, a township, in the parish of KINGSLEY, union of CHEADLE, N. division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Cheadle ; containing 681 inhabitants.

WHISTON (St. JAMES), a parish, in the union of ROTHERHAM, S. division of the wapentake of STRAFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Rotherham ; containing 1020 inhabitants. This place continued a member of the great estate of the lords of Hallamshire till about 1821, when it was sold to the Sitwell family. The parish comprises 2448 acres, nearly the whole in cultivation : the roads from Sheffield to Tickhill and from Rotherham to Mansfield, which latter was formerly one of the great highways to the north of England, intersect each other near the village.

The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10 ; net income, £868 ; patron, the Earl of Effingham : the tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1816. The church, an unpretending building, contains a few memorials ; a gallery has been erected in it. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Francis Mansel, in 1728, bequeathed a rent-charge of £6 ; and Joseph Hammond, in 1794, gave £300, since increased to £443, for teaching children. At Gilthwaite, a hamlet in the parish, a mineral spring was discovered in 1664, which was in repute for some time, but sank into neglect when Mr. George Westby, who had made a large bath and built a house over it, died.

WHISTONES, a tything, in the parish of CLAINES, Lower division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, union, and Worcester and W. divisions of the county, of WORCESTER ; adjacent to the north side of the city of Worcester, and containing 2849 inhabitants. A priory of White nuns in honour of St. Mary Magdalene, was established here before 1255, by a bishop of Worcester, and had a revenue of £56. 3. 7. An hospital, dedicated to St. Oswald, said to have been founded by Bishop Oswald, for a master and poor brethren, existed before 1268, and at the Dissolution was valued at £15. 18. per annum, when it was granted to the Dean and Chapter of Worcester ; it was demolished in the reign of Elizabeth, but after the Restoration was rebuilt by Bishop Fell, who recovered most of its ancient possessions, and it now affords an asylum for twelve men.

WHITACRE, NETHER (St. GILES), a parish, in the union of MERIDEN, Atherstone division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, N. division of the county of WARWICK, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Coleshill ; containing 503 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 1926 acres ; the surface is flat. The soil varies from a stiff clay to a light sand, and is well adapted to the growth of oak, of which there are some fine specimens ; the chief produce is barley, but grain of every kind is abundant, and the meadows and pastures are rich. There are some quarries of good stone, which is used for building generally, and more especially for railway bridges. The river Blythe flows through the parish, and here is a station of the Birmingham and Derby railway. The living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with the rectorial tithes ; net income, £333 ; patron, Earl Howe. The tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1825 ; the glebe comprises about 90 acres. The church is ancient, and has a square tower, and contains a monument to Charles Jennins, Esq., who, in 1775, bequeathed one-third of the interest of £1000 in support of a school. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WHITACRE, OVER (St. LEONARD), a parish, in the union of MERIDEN, Atherstone division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, N. division of the county of WARWICK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Coleshill ; containing 330 inhabitants. This parish comprises about 1375 acres ; the soil is extremely rich, and the substratum contains building-stone of excellent quality, which is extensively quarried. The Atherstone and Coleshill, and the Coventry and Tamworth, roads, intersect each other here. The living is a donative ; net income, £142 ; patron, Earl Digby. The tithes have been commuted for £118. 7., and the glebe comprises 30 acres, with a house. The church, rebuilt about the year 1770, is a handsome structure in the Grecian style, with a tower surmounted by a dome and cupola. A school, for which a good building of stone was erected in 1836, is supported partly by one-half of a rent of £12 per annum, arising from land bequeathed for charitable uses, and of which one-fourth is distributed in Bibles and Prayer-books, and one-fourth among the poor, who have also the interest of £150 regularly divided among them at Christmas.

WHITBECK (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of BOOTLE, ALLERDALE ward above Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, 3 miles (S. S. E.) from Bootle; containing 208 inhabitants. The parish is situated between the mountain of Black-Comb and the sea, and comprises 2170 acres, of which 1680 are arable, 205 meadow and pasture, and 285 woodland; exclusively of about 3000 acres of common or waste. In the mountain is a cavity similar to the crater of a volcano, several hundred yards in diameter and depth; the inside is lined with vitrified and crystallised matter, having at the bottom a fine spring of water. On the west side of the mountain is a cascade, and on the shore a mineral spring, formerly in repute for the cure of gravel and scurvy. Trunks of oak and fir, of an immense size, have been found in the peat mosses, considerably below the surface. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £76, with a glebe of 4 acres, and a house; patron, the Earl of Lonsdale: the tithes have been commuted for £88. 17. The church is a plain structure, of which the chancel was rebuilt about 20 years since, by the patron. An hospital erected by the parishioners in 1632, is endowed with a rent-charge of £24, purchased with the sum of £400 bequeathed by Henry Parke, a native of the place. Here are the remains of three Druidical temples: one, termed Standing-stones, consists of eight massive stones disposed in a circle; Kirkstones, of thirty, in two circles, like Stonehenge; and the third, of twelve stones. There is also a large cairn, encompassed at the base by a circle of huge stones.

WHITBOURNE (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of BROMYARD, hundred of BROXASH, county of HEREFORD, 6 miles (E. by N.) from Bromyard; containing 824 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the east by the river Teme, which separates it from the county of Worcester; and comprises 3056*a.* 33*p.* The Bishop of Hereford is lord of the manor, and his predecessors had a palace here, in which, though now occupied by a tenant, courts leet and baron are periodically held. The river abounds with fish, and the vicinity is much frequented by anglers. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 14. 9½, and in the gift of the Bishop: the tithes have been commuted for £542, and the glebe comprises 35½ acres. The church is partly in the early and partly in the later English style of architecture, and is ornamented with a square embattled tower.

WHITBURN, a parish, in the union of SOUTH SHIELDS, E. division of CHESTER ward, N. division of the county of DURHAM, 3½ miles (N.) from Sunderland; containing, with the township of Cleadon, and part of North Bidick, 1061 inhabitants, of whom 777 are in Whitburn township. This parish, which is bounded on the east by the North Sea, comprises 4184*a.* 1*r.* 13*p.*, and is about three miles square. Coal is found here, but at a considerable depth; and in the north-eastern part are quarries of magnesian limestone, which is used both for building and for agricultural purposes, considerable quantities of it being exported from the Tync. The village, which is equally noted as a fishing and a bathing place, is small, but pleasantly situated on the coast, on the southern inclination of a hill, near a fine sandy bay; it contains several respectable lodging-houses, and the view to the south is cheerful. The Lizard, a high, dry sheep-walk to the north, also commands a prospect of great variety and extent. A curious and handsome brick building, in the Tudor style, was erected here in 1841-2, by Mr. Barns, a principal resident, from a design by Mr. Benjamin Green, and presents a good specimen of the art of ornamental brick-making; the plain walls are of red, and the mouldings, enrichments, and coats-of-arms, in all which it abounds, are of blue, brick, made of a fine bed of clay, leased to Mr. Barns by the corporation of Newcastle. The Brandling Junction, and the Pontop and South Shields, railways, pass through several detached parts of the parish; and the road from South Shields to Sunderland intersects Cleadon.

The LIVING is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £39. 19. 4½, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Durham: the tithes have been commuted for £862. 15., and there is also a rent-charge of £6. 1. 8., payable to the master of Kepier grammar school; the glebe comprises 210 acres, lying in three detached parts of the parish. The church is a neat and ancient edifice, with a nave, chancel, and side aisles, and a good tower; the whole was thoroughly repaired some years since, and portions modernised. The parsonage stands embosomed in a tuft of lofty sycamores, and its sheltered garden contains plants which do not usually flourish in situations so exposed and northerly as those of this county. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also a national school, endowed with £10 per annum by Lord Crewe's trustees. Dr. Triplett, in 1664, bequeathed a rent-charge of £18, since increased to £61, which sum is appropriated to apprenticing boys and girls of the parishes of Whitburn, Washington, and Woodhorn. In the neighbourhood are several springs, the water of which is slightly impregnated with alkaline salt, and was formerly in great request among the inhabitants. On the sea-shore, some copper coins of Constantine, Lucinius, Maxentius, and Maximian, have been discovered; and flexible limestone is found in the quarries. On the beach, near the village, at a very low ebb tide after a storm, some years since, were observed the trunks of large trees, supposed to be the remains of a forest, imbedded in what appeared to have been a clayey soil; and hazel-nuts were also found, scattered among them.

WHITBY, a township, partly in the parish of EASTHAM, and partly in that of STOAK, union, and Higher division of the hundred, of WIRRALL, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 6¼ miles (N.) from Chester; containing 839 inhabitants, of whom 767 are in Eastham. The Ellesmere, or Wirrall, canal passes through the township, and communicates with the river Mersey, where a port with extensive docks and wharfs is about to be formed. Tithe rent-charges have been awarded amounting to £168. 5., of which £111. 10. are payable to impropriators, £35. 15. to the vicar of Eastham, and £21. to the perpetual curate of Stoak.

Arms.

WHITBY (St. Mary), a sea-port, borough, market-town, and parish, and the head of a union, partly in the E. division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, but chiefly in the liberty of WHITBY-STRAND, N. riding of YORK; containing, with the chapels of Aislaby, Eskdaleside, and Ugglebarnby, and the townships of Hawsker with Stainsacre, Newholm with Dunsley and Ruswarp, 11,682 inhabitants, of whom 7383 are in the town, 48 miles (N. N. E.) from York, and 241 (N. by W.) from London. This place, called by the Saxons Streanes-heale, which Bede interprets Sinus Phari, or the bay of the lighthouse; and in the Domesday survey Whitteby, or the white town; owes its origin to the foundation of a monastery here by Oswy, king of Northumbria, in fulfilment of a vow prior to the battle of Winwidfield, in which he defeated and killed Penda, the pagan king of Mercia, who had invaded his territories in 655. The monastery, which was dedicated to St. Peter, and contained an establishment both for monks and nuns of the Benedictine order, was on its completion placed under the superintendence of Hilda, grand-niece of Edwin, a former king of Northumbria, who in 658 came from Hartlepool to assist in its formation, and was made the first abbess; and subsequently Ælfeda, daughter of the founder, in fulfilment of her father's vow, became a nun in the establishment. The monastery, under Hilda, acquired a high degree of celebrity; and in 664, a national synod, at which Oswy presided, was held here for the regulation of some ecclesiastical affairs about which considerable differences at that time prevailed. Several bishops, and many men eminent for learning and sanctity, were educated here; and several cells were founded as appendages to the abbey, during the administration of Hilda, who died in 680, and was succeeded by Ælfeda. In 867, the monastery was destroyed by the Danes, who laid waste the town, and massacred the inhabitants; the abbot is said to have effected his escape, and to have carried with him the relics of St. Hilda to Glastonbury, but so complete was the devastation of the invaders that the monastery remained a heap of ruins till after the Conquest, when the site of the town was granted to Hugh, Earl of Chester, and by him assigned to William de Percy, who in 1074 rebuilt the monastery, which he dedicated to St. Peter and St. Hilda, and endowed with 240 acres of land for Benedictine monks. Its revenues were subsequently augmented by the Earl of Chester, who conferred on it numerous privileges; and notwithstanding the frequent attacks of pirates to which it was continually exposed, the monastery continued to flourish till the Dissolution, when its revenues were estimated at £437. 2. 9.; the site and ruins were granted in the 4th of Edward VI. to John, Earl of Warwick, and, in 1555, were purchased by Sir Richard Cholmley, by whose descendants they are still held. According to tradition, Robin Hood and Little John paid a visit to Richard de Waterville, who was then abbot, and as a proof of their dexterity in archery, shot an arrow each from the summit of the tower to the distance of more than a mile; to commemorate which event, pillars were raised on the spots where the arrows fell, and the inclosures are still called Robin Hood's, and Little John's fields; and about six miles from the town is Robin Hood's bay, where that celebrated outlaw is said to have kept a small fleet to assist his escape in times of emergency.

The TOWN is situated on the shore of the North Sea, at the mouth of the river Esk, which divides it into two nearly equal parts, connected with each other by a handsome bridge, erected on the site of the old draw-bridge, in 1835, at an expense of £10,000, and consisting of four arches, of which one is of cast iron, opening by swivels for the admission of vessels. The houses, partly of brick and partly of stone, are ranged on the bold acclivities on the opposite sides of the river, in streets of which the greater number are narrow, and some inconveniently steep; the approaches, however, have been much improved, and many of the modern buildings are spacious and elegant. The streets are paved under an act of parliament obtained in 1837, repealing an act granted in 1789, and are lighted with gas from works established in 1825 by a company of shareholders, by whom they have been sold to Mr. James Malam. A newsroom, a neat and well-arranged building, was erected in 1814. The assembly-rooms are chiefly appropriated for public meetings, and the occasional delivery of lectures; and the theatre, erected in 1784, and destroyed by fire in 1823, has not been rebuilt. The public baths, on the north pier, a handsome range, three stories high, were erected in 1826, by a proprietary of shareholders; the lower story is fitted up with every accommodation for bathing; the second contains a subscription library, established about the year 1760, and containing more than 7000 volumes, with reading-rooms; and the third story is appropriated as the museum of the Whitby Literary and Philosophical Society, founded in 1823.

About half a mile from the pier is Whitby Spa, a chalybeate spring, of which the water has been analysed by John Murray, Esq., F.A.S., F.L.S., and found to contain muriate of soda, muriate of magnesia, sulphate of lime, and carbonate of iron held in solution by carbonic acid gas; the proportions of the ingredients have not yet been precisely determined, but the water is in high repute for its medicinal and tonic qualities. Mr. Murray has also analysed the water of a spring on the property of Miss Clark, of Bagdale, and, with the exception only of the iron, which he found to be a sub-carbonate, it comprises similar ingredients, producing effects scarcely to be distinguished from the former. These waters, though for some time neglected, are now extensively and successfully administered in all cases in which saline tonics are recommended by the faculty. Many handsome lodging-houses have been erected for the reception of families, and there are also several taverns and hotels for the accommodation of the numerous visitors whom the facilities of sea-bathing, the benefit of the waters, and the beauty of the scenery, attract during the season to this part of the coast. The Environs, in which are some good mansions, picturesque villas, and gentlemen's seats, abound with interest; in the rocks in the vicinity are found fossils and organic remains of almost every species, and in the aluminous strata, especially, petrifications in numerous varieties, of which some cannot easily be assigned to any specific class. Among the most remarkable that have been discovered, are the petrified bones of a crocodile nearly entire, deposited in the museum of the Whitby Philosophical Society. One of the most perfect specimens of the plesiosaurus ever found was discovered in the lias strata, in 1841, and is deposited in the Woodwardian Museum, Cambridge; this fossil measures 15 feet 6 inches in length, and 8 feet 5 inches in breadth across the fore paddles; the head and neck together are 7 feet in length, and the whole in a most entire state of preservation. Ammonites, or snake stones, are obtained in great abundance in every part of the alum-rocks, but more especially at Whitby Scarr; of these there are many different kinds, coiled in spiral folds, and imbedded in stones of elliptical or lenticular form, and of much harder texture than the shells they inclose. The nautilites are also numerous, and many of them curious and beautiful; they are found generally in the lower beds of the lias strata, each of which has its peculiar fossil remains. There are not less than a hundred varieties of multilocular shells.

At the commencement, and during the greater part, of the reign of Elizabeth, the town was small, and inhabited chiefly by fishermen, and its subsequent increase, and ultimate COMMERCIAL prosperity, may be attributed to the discovery of the alum-mines in this part of the coast, towards the end of that reign. The establishment of some alum-works by Mr. Chaloner, at Guisborough, about that time, was attended with so much success, as to excite a spirit of emulation, and works of a similar kind were erected at this place in 1615; and the large quantity of coal necessary for the supply of these works, and the requisite facilities for conveying their produce to distant parts of the kingdom, appear to have laid the foundation of its maritime importance. The great increase in the number of vessels connected with these works, and the abundance of oak-timber in the immediate vicinity, soon afterwards led to the introduction of ship-building, for which the port has ever since maintained a high degree of celebrity; many large and handsome ships have been launched from the docks, and all the vessels which accompanied Captain Cook in his voyage round the world were built at this place. After the peace in 1815, this trade greatly declined; but it has recently revived, and, in 1838, twenty-five vessels, of which nineteen were of more than 100 tons' burthen, were launched from the several building-yards, and nearly the same number in 1839. The ships of Whitby are remarkable for symmetry, strength, and durability, and a very considerable number are employed in the principal trading ports of the kingdom. The manufacture of alum, which formerly constituted the principal trade of the port, and of which great quantities were exported to France, Holland, and many parts of the continent, has been very much diminished, and the chief part now manufactured is sent coastwise to London, Hull, and other towns, for the supply of the home markets: the extensive works at Kettleiness were totally destroyed in 1829, by the falling of the rock beneath which they were situated, but they have been recently rebuilt. The Greenland and Davis' Straits whale-fishery was first established here in 1753, and was for many years an important branch of trade: upon an average, about eight ships were sent out annually, with lucrative success; but about the year 1823, from the insufficiency of the returns, and the frequent loss of vessels employed in the trade, it began to decline, and in 1837 it was totally discontinued. The main business of the port at present consists in the importation of timber from British America, and timber, wooden wares, hemp, and flax, from the Baltic; the foreign export trade is inconsiderable. The coasting trade is very extensive: the principal articles sent coastwise are, the produce of the alum-mines still in operation, freestone, grindstones, whinstone, and iron-stone, from the quarries at Aislaby, Grosmont, and other places, by the Whitby Stone Company, who forward large quantities to London, Hull, Newcastle, Liverpool, and other towns; the chief articles imported are groceries, salt, bones, and coal. The number of vessels registered as belonging to the port is 327, of which 200 are of more than 100 tons, and the aggregate burthen is 51,208 tons. The number of vessels which entered inwards during the year 1841 was 668, and their burthen 33,634 tons; of this number, 43 were from foreign ports, and 625 in the coasting trade. The number which cleared outwards was 248, of the aggregate burthen of 13,537 tons, of which 7 were in the foreign, and 241 in the coasting, trade; and the amount of duties paid at the custom-house, during that year, was £6968. In 1839, the port obtained the privilege of bonding goods, for which spacious warehouses have been appropriated. The jurisdiction of the port extends from Peasholm Beck to Huntcliff Foot, a distance of forty miles. The custom-house, a neat and commodious building, situated in Sandgate, is well adapted to its purpose; and in one of the windows is a portrait of Charles II., in stained glass.

The HARBOUR has been greatly improved at different times. Previously to 1632, the piers were constructed of wood, with a few loose stones; but in the course of that year, the west pier of stone was built under the auspices of Sir Hugh Cholmeley, who raised a subscription of £500 for that purpose; an act of parliament was obtained in 1702, for the improvement of the harbour, and the west pier has been rebuilt on a larger scale, and extended to Hagersgate by a spacious quay, which has been recently extended to the bridge, and forms a noble promenade, nearly half a mile in length to the pier-head. The east pier has also been enlarged, and both are faced, towards the sea, with dressed stones of immense size, weighing nearly six tons each; two inner piers, called respectively the Burges Pier and the Fish Pier, have also been constructed within the harbour, to break the force of the waves, and give greater security to the shipping, within, and several rocks which formerly obstructed the entrance have been removed. At the northern extremity of the west pier is a lighthouse, erected in 1831, after a design by Mr. Francis Pickernell, the present engineer; it is a handsome fluted column of the Doric order, seventy-five feet in height, with an octagonal lantern surmounted by a dome, and surrounded by a gallery, and displaying at night a brilliant light for two hours before, and two hours after, high water. During the day, a flag is displayed on the west cliff, to show when vessels may enter the harbour with safety; and an apparatus near the lighthouse shows, by a revolving index, the depth of water on the bar. At the head of the west pier is a circular battery, formerly mounted with six pieces of cannon; and since the erection of the quay, a battery, in the form of a crescent, with a tower at each end, has been built on the west side of the pier, nearly opposite to the extremity of the quay, called the Scotch Head, behind which are a bomb-proof magazine, and offices for the station of the preventive service. The entrance of the harbour is 276 feet in width between the two outer piers, and 216 between the inner piers; there is also a third entrance, 204 feet wide. The depth of water at spring tides is from 15 to 18 feet, and at neap tides from 10 to 12 feet; and within the inner harbour is sufficient accommodation for a large fleet to ride in safety. There are several wet and dry docks, with slips for ship-building, and numerous yards for boat-building, which is carried on to a very great extent. The manufacture of sail-cloth, for which this place is celebrated, affords employment to a considerable number of persons; there are likewise extensive rope-walks, a large flax-mill erected in 1807, for dressing, spinning, and weaving, but now unoccupied, and the saw and bone mills of Messrs. Chapman and Co., erected in 1836; the making of sails is also carried on very largely. The fishery on the coast, which has been conducted for many years with the most profitable success, is still pursued with advantage, and in consequence of the facility of conveyance into the interior by railway, is rapidly increasing; the principal fish taken are cod, ling, halibut, soles, and haddocks. Salmon and salmon-trout were formerly abundant in the river Esk, and constituted a main part of the trade, but they are now very scarce, and are taken only on the coast by a peculiar mode of fishing, the latter occasionally in considerable quantities. The herring-fishery has been carried on since 1833, chiefly through the exertions of the Whitby Herring Company, established at that time; about 800 lasts are taken annually, of which about one-half are sold to the owners of vessels from the French coast, and of the remainder about 120 lasts are cured for home consumption.

The Whitby and Pickering railway, which was completed in 1836, contributes greatly to the prosperity of the internal trade of the town and neighbourhood, by affording facility of conveyance to the port, for the valuable produce of the quarries in the adjacent districts. To this important work may be attributed the establishment of the Whitby Stone Company in 1836, and of the Brick and Tile Company in 1838. The whole line is twenty-four miles in length, and is worked throughout by horses, with the exception of two inclined planes of about a mile in extent, where it attains its highest summit level, 520 feet above the Whitby terminus; it passes in its course through the beautiful vale of the Esk, and a succession of valleys abounding in richly-diversified and highly-romantic scenery; it was completed at an expense of £130,000, raised by a proprietary of £100 shareholders. The market, granted by charter of Henry VI., is on Saturday, and is plentifully supplied with provisions of every kind; a fair, in honour of St. Hilda, originally granted to the abbot of Whitby, by Henry II., is held on the 25th of August and two following days, and there is a fair on Martinmas-day. Two fairs, also, have been recently established by the Whitby Agricultural Society, one for cattle in August, and the other in October for cheese: premiums are given on these occasions by the society. The local affairs of the town are under the superintendence of commissioners appointed by act of parliament for its improvement, in 1837; and the magistrates of the North riding hold petty-sessions here every Tuesday and Saturday. A court of pleas for the recovery of debts to any amount takes place every third Monday, and a court leet at Michaelmas. The town-hall, rebuilt by Nathaniel Cholmeley, Esq., lord of the manor, in 1788, is a handsome structure of stone, with a cupola surmounted by a dome; there is a small prison for the town and liberty, situated near the battery on the quay. By the act of William IV., cap. 45, the town was constituted an electoral borough, with the privilege of returning a member to parliament; the right of election is vested in the £10 householders of Whitby, Ruswarp, and Hawsker cum Stainsacre, together comprising an area of 5132 acres, and a population of 9975.

The parish comprises about 14,620 acres; the soil is generally fertile, and in good cultivation; the surface is elevated, rising into bold and lofty eminences. The LIVING is a perpetual curacy; net income, £206; patron, the Archbishop of York. The church, situated on the summit and near the verge of a lofty cliff, and to which is an ascent of 194 steps, is of very ancient foundation; some parts of it are apparently of older date than the ruins of the abbey, but it has undergone so many alterations and repairs, that very little of its original character remains. It is a cruciform structure of stone, with a tower at the west end of the nave; it was thoroughly repaired, and the north transept enlarged, in 1823, and is now adapted for a congregation of 2000 persons. An additional church is in contemplation, at an expense of £3500, exclusive of the site, of which sum £700 are proposed to be given by Her Majesty's Commissioners, £500 by the Incorporated Society, and the remainder raised by subscription; it will be a stone structure in the early English style, to contain 1478 sittings, of which 750 are to be free. At Baxtergate is a chapel of ease, erected by subscription in 1778, and containing 800 sittings. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, Primitive Methodists, Seceders from the Scottish Church, Unitarians, and Wesleyans; and a Roman Catholic chapel.

Lancasterian schools have been established since 1810, and national schools built at Aislaby, Sleights, and Fylingdales, in the parish; there are also two infants' schools in Whitby, and a school in connexion with the Roman Catholic chapel. A dispensary was established in 1786, and is well supported: the lying-in charity, instituted in 1808, the Dorcas Society in 1814, a blanket charity in 1827, and a clothing fund in 1835, also administer greatly to the comforts of the poor. The Seamen's Hospital, originally established by voluntary contribution, in 1676, affords a comfortable asylum to forty-two disabled seamen, or seamen's widows; and in 1760, was, by act of parliament, placed under the management of fifteen trustees, annually chosen from the masters and owners of ships, who for its support are empowered to levy a monthly contribution of two shillings from every master, and of one shilling from every seaman belonging to the port, producing together an income of £800 per annum, from which a monthly allowance is paid to each of the inmates, and also to various out-pensioners. There are likewise numerous provident societies, and a savings' bank, in which the amount of deposits exceeds £40,000; and various benefactions have been made for the relief of the poor. The union of Whitby comprises twenty-two parishes or places, containing a population of 20,100. The remains of the ancient abbey are situated near the parochial church, on the summit of a cliff 200 feet above the level of the sea, and, from their exposed situation, have at various times sustained severe injury from storms: the south wall of the nave was blown down, in 1763, to the very foundations; in 1830, the remains of the central tower with its massive columns fell; and in 1839, part of the south wall of the choir was levelled with the ground, so that this once stately and majestic structure is now greatly mutilated. The style is chiefly of the early and decorated English, of which many elegant details are discernible; and such of the windows of the later style as are still entire, are enriched with beautiful and elaborate tracery. The vicinity of the town, and the rocks on the coast, abound with features of interest, and with natural curiosities of every variety, which are described in Young's Geological Survey of the Yorkshire Coast, and his History of Whitby.

WHITCHEBURY, WILTS.—See WHITSBURY.

WHITCHESTER, a township, in the parish of HEDDON-ON-THE-WALL, union of CASTLE ward, E. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Newcastle; containing 66 inhabitants. This place was for many ages the property of the Turpin family, from whom it passed to the Wid-dringtons, whose sole heiress conveyed it by marriage to Lord Windsor; it is at present the property of Spearman Johnstone, Esq., of York, and John Dobson, Esq., which latter gentleman resides at High Seat, a handsome mansion, erected in 1808, on a site commanding an extensive view. The township is situated on both sides of the Roman wall, and on the line of the military road from Newcastle to Carlisle, and comprises about 786 acres, of which two-thirds are arable, and the remainder meadow and pasture; the surface is elevated, and the soil generally a clayey loam. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £19. 1. 2. Within the township is the site of a Roman station, defended on every side by deep ravines; and in a large cairn on Turpin's Hill, were found, in 1771 and 1795, two stone coffins, in one of which were two urns, with copper coins of Domitian, Antoninus Pius, and Faustina.

WHITCHURCH (St. JOHN THE EVANGELIST), a parish, in the union of AYLESBURY, hundred of COTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Aylesbury; containing 930 inhabitants. A market on Monday, and a fair on the festival of St. John the Evangelist, granted in 1245, were formerly held. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 17., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £61. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. John Westcar, in 1833, bequeathed £500, the interest to be appropriated to supplying the poor with clothing.

WHITCHURCH (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of TAVISTOCK, hundred of ROBOROUGH, Tavistock and S. divisions of DEVON, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (S. E.) from Tavistock; containing 918 inhabitants. Walreddon House, here, the property of William Courtenay, Esq., a descendant of the Courtenays, earls of Devon, is an ancient mansion of the time of Edward VI., whose arms in the hall are still in good preservation. Holwell House, also in the parish, was, until within a recent period, the property and residence of the Glanville family, and is now the property of John Scobell, Esq. The Tavistock races are held on Whitchurch Down. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £16. 5. 5.; net income, £195; patron, incumbent, and improprator, the Rev. Peter Sleeman. A chantry chapel was founded in 1300, by the abbot of Tavistock.

WHITCHURCH (St. DUBRITIUS), a parish, in the union of MONMOUTH, Lower division of the hundred of WORMELOW, county of HEREFORD, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Ross; containing 897 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the bank of the river Wye, and on the road from Ross to Monmouth, and comprises about 2000 acres, including an extra-parochial district of a similar name, which consists of 130 acres; the surface is finely diversified, and the soil fertile. In the Great Doward hill are large deposits of rich iron-ore, of a peculiar quality, belonging to R. Blakemore, Esq., who attempted to work it, but relinquished the operations in consequence of the vast expense: limestone, however, is quarried, chiefly for the supply of the adjacent district. The living is a rectory, with that of Ganerew annexed, valued in the king's books at £6. 0. $2\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of Joseph Pyrke, Esq., with a net income of £300, and a good parsonage-house, lately erected by the Rev. G. Pyrke; the glebe comprises 6 acres. The church is chiefly in the decorated style, and is skirted by the Wye. There are places of worship for Independents, Primitive Methodists, and Wesleyans; also a neat national school, with apartments for the master, erected in 1842, by Mr. Blakemore, who subscribes £10 annually towards its support. A tessellated pavement has been discovered, which is supposed to have been part of a Roman bath, and several Roman coins have been found in the neighbourhood. On the slope of the Great Doward is a cave distinguished by the name of Arthur's Hall; and in a meadow is a well called the Dropping Well, of which the waters have a petrifying quality.

WHITCHURCH (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of BRADFIELD, chiefly in the hundred of LANGTREE, county of OXFORD, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Reading; containing 843 inhabitants. It comprises 2180a. 3r. 35p., of which 301a. 3r. 39p. are in the county of Berks, and the remainder in the county of Oxford, are free from tithes, under an act of inclosure. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 2. $8\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £456. The tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents, under the act of inclosure, in the 40th of George III.

WHITCHURCH (St. ALKMUND), a market-town and parish, chiefly in the Whitchurch division of the hundred of NORTH-BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP, but partly in the hundred of NANTWICH, S. division of CHESHIRE, 20 miles (N. by E.) from Shrewsbury, and 160 (N. W. by N.) from London; containing, with the townships of Alkington, Ash Magna and Parva, Black-Park, Broughall, Chinnell, Dodington, Edgeley, Hinton, Hollyhurst, Tilstock, Wirswall, and New and Old Wood-houses, 6373 inhabitants, of whom 3403 are in the town. This place was anciently called Album Monasterium and Blancminster, which have the same signification as its present name, and appear to imply the existence of a monastery, of which, however, there is no account; an hospital was standing here in the reign of Henry III., and was endowed by the lord of the manor with the whole town of Wylnecot, for the relief of the poor at its gate. In 1211, King John assembled his forces here, prior to attacking the Welsh, on which occasion he penetrated to the foot of Snowdon. At the commencement of the civil war of the 17th century, the inhabitants appear to have taken an active part in favour of the king, and to have raised a regiment in support of his cause. Of the foundation and history of the ancient castle, a portion of the ruined walls of which was standing in 1760, nothing is known. The town is situated on elevated ground, in a rich and picturesque country, and contains some neat streets and respectable houses: in its neighbourhood are three fine lakes, called Osmere, Blackmere, and Brown Moss-water, and several brooks, one of which, Red Brook, is the boundary between England and Wales; another separates this county from that of Chester. The trade is principally in malt and hops; shoes are manufactured for the Manchester market, and near the town is an establishment for making oak acid, also several limekilns and brick-ovens. A branch of the Ellesmere canal extends to the town, by means of which boats ply to London and many intervening towns on Saturday, and to Manchester and Shrewsbury. The market is on Friday; and there are fairs on the second Friday in April, Whit-Monday, Friday after August 2nd, and October 28th. A high steward, who superintends the affairs of the town, is appointed by the lord of the manor, and presides at courts baron and leet held in October, at the town-hall, which is the depository for the rolls and archives of the lordship.

The LIVING is a rectory, with Marbury annexed, valued in the king's books at £44. 11. s., and in the patronage of the Countess of Bridgewater; net income, £1458. The church, erected in 1722, on the site of an ancient edifice, is a noble structure of the Tuscan order, built of freestone, with a square embattled western tower; it contains several handsome monuments of the Talbot family, and amongst them an effigy in alabaster of the renowned John Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, who was killed in France, in 1453, and who, for his remarkable prowess, was called the English Achilles. A chapel of ease and parsonage-house were built at Ash in 1835; and a church dedicated to St. Catherine, an elegant structure, built and endowed by Lady Bridgewater, was consecrated August 31st, 1837, having cost upwards of £8000. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Wesleyans, and Unitarians. The free grammar school, situated at Bargates, was founded in 1550, by Sir John Talbot, who was incumbent of the parish, and endowed by him with £200, which was augmented by a bequest from William Thomas in 1662, and others, now, with the original endowment, producing an income of £454. A charity school for children of both sexes, and an almshouse for six decayed housekeepers, were endowed by Samuel Higginson in 1697, and Jane Higginson in 1707, with property now producing about £250 per annum; and there is a school in connexion with the Presbyterians, which was founded and endowed by Thomas Benyon in 1707. The interest of £2200, arising from bequests by Elizabeth Turton in 1794, and others, is distributed among persons in reduced circumstances; and a considerable sum is likewise laid out in bread. In 1828, the late Earl of Bridgewater, who was rector of the parish, bequeathed £2000 for charitable uses. At the northern extremity of the town is an extensive house of industry, built and principally supported from the funds of several bequests left for general purposes of relief. There are some vestiges of a fosse in its vicinity. Whitchurch is the birthplace of Dr. Bernard, chaplain and biographer of Archbishop Usher, and of Abraham Wheelock, a celebrated linguist, who died in 1654.

WHITCHURCH, or FELTON (St. GREGORY), a parish, in the union and hundred of KEYNSHAM, E. division of SOMERSET, 3 miles (N.) from Pensford; containing 416 inhabitants. The name Filton, or Felton, is derived from a very old town situated to the north-west of the present village, in a forest or chace once called Filwood: a church having been erected on the site of an ancient chapel dedicated to St. White, the inhabitants of Filton gradually removed into its vicinity, upon which the new village and the parish assumed their modern designation. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £88; patrons and impropiators, Sir J. Smyth, Bart., and W. G. Langton, Esq.

WHITCHURCH (ALL SAINTS), a parish, the head of a union, and formerly a market-town and representative borough, in the hundred of EVINGAR, Kingsclere and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 12 miles (N. by E.) from Winchester, and 57 (W. S. W.) from London; containing, with the tythings of Charlcott, Priors-Freefolk, Cold

Corporation Seal.

Henley, and Whitchurch-Parsonage, 1741 inhabitants. The town, which is small and irregularly built, is situated on the river Test, on very low ground, under a range of chalk hills. Many of the inhabitants are employed in silk-weaving, and two silk-mills furnish employment to about 100 persons: there are also several corn-mills on the river. A pleasure-fair is held on the third Thursday in June, and there is one on October 19th and 20th, for cattle, pigs, &c. Whitchurch, a borough by prescription, has a corporation consisting of a mayor and bailiff, who do not now, however, exercise any authority: they are chosen, with a constable, at the court leet of the lords of the manor, held in October at the town-hall, a neat building, erected about sixty years since; and another court takes place at the manor farm, in May, under the Dean and Chapter of Winchester, as lords of the manor. It first sent members to parliament in the 27th of Queen Elizabeth, and was deprived of its franchise by the act passed in the 2nd of William IV. The place is within the jurisdiction of the Cheyney Court held at Winchester every Thursday, for the recovery of debts to any amount. The parish comprises about 6450 acres, chiefly arable land. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 12. 8½; net income, £120; patron, the Bishop of Winchester; impropiator, J. Portal, Esq. The church, which is a low and plain structure, with a tower, contains a library, chiefly of theological works, bequeathed by the Rev. William Wood, to which access is obtained by permission of the vicar. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyans. A quantity of clothing and bedding, of the annual value of about £80, is distributed amongst the poor, arising from a bequest made by Richard Wollaston, Esq., in the year 1688. The union of Whitchurch comprises seven parishes or places, and contains a population of 5496.

WHITCHURCH (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of STRATFORD-UPON-AVON, in a detached portion of the Kington division of the hundred of KINGTON, S. division of the county of WARWICK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Stratford; containing 247 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1942*a. 2r. 4p.*, of which 313 acres are common or waste: there are some quarries of stone, used chiefly for mending the roads. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £20. 17. $3\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of J. Roberts West, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £286. 10. 7.; the glebe comprises 68 acres, and there is a parsonage-house. The church is an ancient structure in the Norman style, near which is a mound marking the site of an old castle.

WHITCHURCH-CANONICORUM (Holy Cross), a parish, in the union of BRIDPORT, hundred of WHITCHURCH-CANONICORUM, Bridport division of Dorset, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Charmouth; containing 1581 inhabitants. This parish, which is one of the most ancient and extensive in the county, derives its name from the original dedication of its church to St. Candida, or White, in honour of whom a monastery was founded here, which was called Album Monasterium, and at the time of the Norman survey belonged to the abbey of St. Wandragsil, in Normandy. The grant of a market and fair in the reign of Henry III., was confirmed in the 4th of Edward II. Chideock, in the vicinity, was distinguished for an ancient castle, the residence of the Chideocks and Arundels, which, during the civil war of the 17th century, became a powerful check upon the garrison of Lyme, and was alternately in the possession of the contending parties. Marshwood Vale, an extensive tract in the parish, formerly had two parks, and some stately mansions, of which only the ruins are remaining. The parish comprises 5889 acres, of which 428 are common or waste; the soil of the vale, which principally affords pasture for cattle, is a cold chalky clay, but in the parish generally the soil is deep and fertile; flint, which is much used in building walls, is found on Hadden Hill. Many of the women and children are employed in making fishing-nets. The living is a vicarage, endowed with a portion of the rectorial tithes, with Chideock, Stanton St. Gabriel, and Marshwood annexed, and valued in the king's books at £32. 6. 3.; patron, the Bishop of Bath and Wells; appropriators of the remaining portion of the rectorial tithes, the Dean and Chapter of Wells and of Sarum, in moieties. The tithes have been commuted for £1045, and the glebe comprises 35 acres. The church, originally dedicated to St. Candida, and afterwards to the Holy Cross, is an ancient and handsome cruciform structure in the Norman style, with a tower eighty feet high, and contains some interesting monuments, among which are one to Sir John Jeffery, Knt., with his effigy in armour, and another to one of the Hemley family; the pulpit is curiously carved. A church has been erected at Stanton St. Gabriel, in lieu of an old structure very inconveniently situated; and also at Marshwood, to replace a chapel destroyed by Cromwell. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents.

WHITCHURCH-MAUND, a township, in the parish of BODENHAM, union of LEOMINSTER, hundred of BROXASH, county of HEREFORD; containing 116 inhabitants.

WHITCLIFF, with THORPE, a township, in the parish and liberty of RIPON, W. riding of YORK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S.) from Ripon; containing 186 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 1300 acres, of which about 909 are in the hamlet of Thorpe; the soil is the property of various proprietors. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £198. 0. 1., and the appropriate for £68, payable to the Dean and Chapter of Ripon.

WHITCOMBE, a parish, in the union of DORCHESTER, hundred of CULLIFORD-TREE, Dorchester division of Dorset, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Dorchester; containing 52 inhabitants. It comprises about 690 acres, of which 350 are arable, and 340 meadow and pasture; the soil is a light loam, resting upon chalk. The living is a donative; net income, £13; patron, the Hon. G. L. D. Damer. The church is an ancient structure in the early English style.

WHITECHAPEL, a chapelry, in the parish of KIRKHAM, union of the FYLDE, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Garstang. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £104; patron, the Vicar of Kirkham.

WHITECHAPEL (St. Mary), a parish, and the head of a union, in the Tower division of the hundred of OSSULSTONE, county of MIDDLESEX; adjoining the city of London, and containing 34,053 inhabitants. This populous parish extends in an eastern direction from Aldgate to Mile-End, a continuous line nearly a mile in length, and including Whitechapel High-street and Whitechapel-road, the former a noted market for butchers' meat, and the latter containing numerous manufacturing establishments. On the south side of the road is a long-established bell-foundry. In Fieldgate-street, nearly adjoining, but within the hamlet of Mile-End Old Town, in the parish of Stepney, is a large iron-foundry, to which is attached a manufactory of gun-carriages and wheelwrights' work, which latter department of the concern is in this parish. In Great Garden-street, on the north of the road, is a large brass-foundry; and nearly opposite is a factory for every kind of furnishing ironmongery, smoke and wind-up jacks, scales and scale-beams, and other articles, upon a very extensive scale. Near this extremity of the parish, and partly bordering on that of Bethnal-Green, is the distillery of Mr. Smith, for British spirits and compounds, established in that family for nearly a century; the premises, which have been recently rebuilt on a commodious plan, occupy a large extent of ground, and there are two powerful steam-engines. In Thomas-street are starch-works which have been conducted by the Leschers for half a century; a steam-engine of sixteen-horse power is applied to the grinding of wheat and other purposes connected with the manufactory, and from 800 to 900 hogs are usually fed on the premises. In Osborne-place is a large establishment for the dyeing of woollen-cloth. In a southern direction, the parish extends to Well-Close-square, one-half of which is within its limits; and this portion of it comprises Goodman's-Fields and several spacious and well-built streets, among which are Great Prescott-street, Leman-street, Great and Little Aylie-street, and others, in the neighbourhood of which are numerous establishments for the refining of sugar, which constitutes the principal trade of the place. In Church-lane is the proof-house of the City of London Company of Gun-makers, originally erected by the company, in 1757, and rebuilt in 1818. There are several manufactories of floor-cloth in Whitechapel-road, and some establishments of coach and coach-harness makers, with various other works in different parts of the parish. The Royal Pavilion theatre, on the north side of the road, is a commodious and well-arranged building, with a handsome front and principal entrance between four Ionic pillars supporting a cornice; and in Leman-street is the Royal Garrick theatre, neatly fitted up. A court of requests for the Tower Hamlets, situated in Osborne-street, was established by act of the 23rd of George II., for the recovery of debts under £2, and the power was extended to debts not exceeding £5, by an act of the 3rd of William IV.

The LIVING is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £31. 17. 3½; net income, £868; patrons, the Principal and Fellows of Brasenose College, Oxford. The church, previously to the year 1329, was a chapel of ease to St. Dunstan's, Stepney, the rector of which parish, in that year, made this incumbency a rectory; the ancient building was taken down, and the present church erected of brick, in the year 1673, by private subscription. It has a small tower at the west end, with an illuminated dial, surmounted by a cupola; the interior is handsomely arranged, and the roof, which is partly arched, is supported on Corinthian columns pleasingly disposed. Near the altar is a mural monument by Banks, erected by the parishioners to the Rev. R. Markham, D.D., formerly rector; and in various parts of the church and in the burial-ground are several others. St. Mark's district church, on the Tenter Ground, was erected from funds granted by the Metropolitan Church-building Society, and consecrated in May, 1839; it is a neat edifice of brick in the early English style, with a square tower surmounted by an octagonal spire, and contains 1200 sittings, of which 500 are free. A conditional grant has been made by Her Majesty's Commissioners for the erection of another church; and there are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Wesleyans, and other dissenters. In Little Aylie-street is the German Lutheran church, dedicated to St. George, a neat building with a campanile turret; and in Hooper's-square is a German Calvinistic chapel. The parochial school, originally founded and endowed by the Rev. R. Davenant, rector of the parish in 1680, and handsomely rebuilt in 1818, has an income of £700, arising from subsequent benefactions and annual subscriptions. The free school in Gower's-walk, established in 1806, under the immediate superintendence of the late Dr. Bell, and the first formed on that system, was founded by Mr. William Davis, who erected the building at his own cost, and endowed the institution with £2400 three per cents.: the income, including the profits of a printing-office instituted by the founder for the use of the boys, and the needlework, is about £1200. The Whitechapel Society's Institution in Whitechapel-road was commenced in 1814, in union with the National Society, and is a spacious and neat building of brick, with a cupola at the west end; the schoolroom is internally arranged as a chapel, and consecrated, and two regular services are performed every Sunday by the chaplain and superintendent of the institution, under whose direction the school is conducted. Almshouses were founded and endowed in Whitechapel-road, in 1658, by William Meggs, Esq., for twelve aged widows; the endowment, including subsequent benefactions, amounts to £149 per annum. Eight almshouses, founded by Thomas Baker, Esq., who endowed them for eight widows, form a neat range of building in the Elizabethan style.

The London Hospital here owes its origin to Mr. John Harrison, surgeon, who, having conducted a small establishment of the kind near Upper Moorfields, removed it to Prescott-street, Goodman's-Fields, in the year 1740, under the designation of the London Infirmary; an appropriate building upon a larger scale having been subsequently erected in the Whitechapel-road, the institution was removed to that place in 1758, and the conductors incorporated by the name of the Governors of the London Hospital. The buildings have been progressively enlarged, and are now adapted to the reception of 370 patients; the average number of in-patients is about 320, and of out-patients 7000 annually; and the income, including contributions from public bodies and private subscriptions, is about £9000. The Sailors' Home, or Brunswick Maritime Establishment, is intended for the reception of unemployed sailors belonging to the port of London, to provide them with board and lodging at a moderate charge, and with religious and moral instruction while on shore; to procure for them employment in the navy or merchants' service, and to furnish such as are needy with the necessary outfits for the voyage. The building occupies the site of the late Brunswick theatre, in Well-street, London docks, and has accommodation for 500 men; the first stone was laid in June, 1830. The poor law union of Whitechapel contains a population of 71,758; there are workhouses in Whitechapel and Spitalfields parishes.

WHITEFIELD, with APPERLEY, a hamlet, in the parish of DEERHURST, union of TEWKESBURY, Lower division of the hundred of WESTMINSTER, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 4¼ miles (S. S. W.) from Tewkesbury; containing 420 inhabitants.

WHITEFIELD, EAST and WEST, tythings, in the parish of WIVELISCOMBE, union of WELLINGTON, W. division of the hundred of KINGSBURY and of the county of SOMERSET; the former containing, with the tything of Oakhampton, 197 inhabitants, and the latter 81 inhabitants.

WHITEGATE, or NEWCHURCH (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of NORTHWICH, First division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 3¼ miles (S. W.) from Northwich; containing, with the townships of Darnhall and Marton, 872 inhabitants. During the confinement at Hereford of Prince Edward, afterwards Edward I., while a prisoner in the hands of the barons, the monks of Dore visited and consoled him, in return for which he greatly favoured them, and removed them, about the year 1273, to Darnhall. A few years subsequently to this period, the king, having resolved to build a more commodious abbey on a neighbouring spot, gave it the name of Vale-Royal, and in August 1277 laid the first stone of the new monastery, wherein the monks took up their abode in 1330, at which time £32,000 had been issued from the royal treasury for defraying the expense: the solemnity of the removal was observed with much magnificence, being attended by a great concourse of prelates, nobility, and gentry. At the Dissolution, the revenue was estimated at £518. There are still some small remains of this house in the doorways of the modern mansion that now occupies its site, which, in the great civil war, was plundered and partly destroyed, and is now the seat of Lord Delamere. The parish, which once formed part of the parish of Over, was separated from it in 1541; it is bounded on the north, and partly intersected, by the river Weaver, and comprises 7870 acres, of which 5780 are the property of his lordship. The manufacture of salt is carried on extensively from numerous brine-springs; the river Weaver affords easy communication with Liverpool, and the Grand Junction railway has a station within a short distance. The living is a vicarage; net income, £163; patron and proprietor, Lord Delamere. The church, a neat building of brick, erected about 1740, contains 400 sittings.

WHITEHAVEN, a sea-port, market-town, newly-enfranchised borough, and the head of a union, in the parish of ST. BEES, ALLERDALE ward above Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND 40 miles (S. W.) from Carlisle, and 320 (N. W.) from London; containing 11,854 inhabitants. This place, in the record of a trial between the abbot and monks of St. Mary's at York and the crown, relative to a claim to the wreck of the sea in the manor of St. Bees, is called Whitohaven, and is supposed by some to have derived its name from the light-coloured rocks which surmount the bay. In the reign of Henry I., the manor formed part of the possessions of the monastery of St. Mary near the Walls at York, to which the priory of St. Bees belonged: so late as the time of Elizabeth, the town consisted of only a few small huts inhabited by fishermen. In 1599, the manor of St. Bees was purchased from Sir Thomas Chaloner, Knt., by Gerard Lowther and Thomas Wybergh, Esqrs.; and the whole having come into the possession of Sir John Lowther, Bart., in the year 1644, Whitehaven, under his auspices, advanced rapidly in prosperity. Having obtained from Charles II. a grant of land, which was estimated at 150 acres, lying between high and low water mark, to the extent of two miles northward, Sir John materially improved the harbour, extended the collieries, and erected a mansion near the town, which, aided and improved by the patronage of his family, subsequently created earls of Lonsdale, continued to increase until it has become one of the most populous and flourishing places in Cumberland.

The TOWN is situated on a creek of the Irish Sea, and consists of several spacious well-built streets, intersecting each other at right angles, and paved with pebbles: it is lighted with gas; supplied with water partly from wells, and partly by means of carts, in which it is brought into the town; and watched under the superintendence of police. The ground, on three approaches to it, rises abruptly and precipitously; and the entrance from the north is under a fine arch of red sandstone, with a rich entablature, bearing the arms of the Lowther family. On the south-east is the castle of the Earl of Lonsdale, a quadrangular building, with square projections at the angles, and a circular bastion in the centre, having fine meadow land to the south, and commanding an extensive prospect of the harbour. There is a theatre, erected in 1769, in Roper-street, a handsome and commodious structure; and races are occasionally held in the neighbourhood. The subscription library, formed in 1797, occupies a neat building erected by the Earl of Lonsdale, in Catherine-street, and contains about 3000 volumes: the subscription newsroom is well supplied with newspapers. A mechanics' institute and library, in Lowther-street, was established in 1825; and cold, warm, and shower salt-water baths have been fitted up in a building erected near the old platform. The HARBOUR has always been an object of importance with those interested in the trade of the town, and many great improvements have been effected in it. Several stone piers extend, some in a diverging and some in a parallel direction, into the harbour; and another bends in an angular manner towards the north-west, on which is a battery. A watchhouse and a lighthouse have been built on the pier called the Old Quay, which was constructed in the time of Charles II., or previously, affording protection to the shipping in the harbour, which is capable of sheltering several hundred sail of vessels. At high water, in spring tides, there were formerly about twenty feet of water, and in neap tides about twelve, but at low water the harbour was dry, to remedy which, a new west pier, 20 yards in thickness, has been lately constructed to the north-west; it was commenced in 1824, on a plan by Mr. John Rennie, and the estimated expense was £80,000, but this sum having been found insufficient, the trustees were empowered to borrow £180,000, to complete the undertaking. The harbour was once defended by four batteries, mounting together nearly 100 guns; but, since the termination of the late war, many of the guns have been removed. At the entrance of the harbour are two lighthouses, that already mentioned, and another on the New Quay, which has a revolving light.

Whitehaven is a place of very considerable TRADE, of which coal forms the chief article: in addition to this, it exports lime, freestone, alabaster, and grain; and the imports mainly consist of American, Baltic, and West Indian produce, linen and flax from Ireland, fruit from the Levant, and wine from Spain and Portugal. The most important manufactures are linen, linen-yarn, sail-cloth, checks, gingham, cordage, earthenware, copperas, colours, anchors, and nails; soap and candles are also made, for the West India market and for home consumption. The coal-mines, which are of a magnitude only inferior to those of Newcastle and Sunderland, furnish the principal employment of the inhabitants; some have been sunk to a depth of upwards of 150 fathoms, and extend to a considerable distance under the sea. They are worked by means of shafts formed at great expense, and to some are entrances called Bear Mouths, which, opening at the bottom of a hill, lead through passages, by a steep descent to the bottom of the pit, by which horses are taken into the mines: the coal, after being raised, is carried to the harbour in waggons on railways, aided by the declivity of the ground, and is shipped by means of an inclined plane and wooden spouts called hurries, placed sloping over the quays. A quantity of a very rich iron-ore is sent from the mines here to the iron-works in South Wales. The herring-fishery was formerly carried on to a great extent, but now very few of the inhabitants are employed in it. There are several ship-builders' yards, the ships being distinguished for their durability, and for drawing little water. A patent-slip was erected in 1821, by the Earl of Lonsdale, which will admit vessels of 700 tons, and, with great convenience, four vessels of 150 tons' burthen each, and by which a few men can draw a large vessel into the yard to be repaired. A communication with Liverpool, Dublin, Carlisle, the Isle of Man, Dumfries, Annan, and Garliestown, is maintained by steam-boats, which sail regularly for those places. The number of vessels of above 50 tons registered at the port is 341, and their aggregate burthen, 55,501 tons. The custom-house, erected in 1811, is a commodious structure. There are three markets, on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday, that on Thursday being the principal, and they are all well supplied with provisions: the fair, held on the 12th of August, has nearly fallen into disuse. The market-place is a handsome area, containing a neat market-house, designed by Smirke in 1813, for the sale of poultry, eggs, and dairy produce; and there is another, erected in 1809, at the expense of the Earl of Lonsdale, for fish, of which the supply is good: there are also shambles, called the Low and George's markets, for butchers. The regulation of the affairs of the town and harbour was, by acts of parliament passed in the 7th and 11th of Queen Anne, confirmed by subsequent acts, vested in 21 trustees, of whom seven are chosen by the lord of the manor (himself being one), and the remaining fourteen are elected triennially by ballot; such of the inhabitants as pay harbour-dues, or possess one-sixteenth share of a vessel belonging to the port, and the masters of vessels, being the electors. The constables of the town are nominated by the trustees, and appointed by the justices of the peace, who meet at the public office, in Lowther-street, on Thursday and Saturday, for the despatch of business. By the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, the town was constituted a borough, with the privilege of sending a member to parliament; the right of election is vested in the £10 householders; the borough comprises an area of 1778 acres, and the returning officer is appointed by the sheriff. A court leet is held annually, and a court baron monthly, of which the latter is for the recovery of debts under 40s.

Whitehaven contains three chapels, to which districts have been assigned, and of which the livings are perpetual curacies, in the patronage of the Earl of Lonsdale, who is also impropiator. St. James', on an eminence at the eastern extremity of the town, was rebuilt, in 1753, and is a neat structure with a square tower, surmounted with pinnacles: net income, £200. St. Nicholas' was erected in 1693, and is a plain building of good proportion, with a square tower; the interior is decorated with paintings of the Last Supper, and of Moses and Aaron, by Matthias Reed, an artist of some merit, who came from Holland in the fleet with the Prince of Orange, and settled in this town: net income, £188. The chapel of the Holy Trinity, situated near the southern extremity of the town, at the head of Roper-street, is a plain edifice with a lofty tower: net income, £250. There are places of worship for Presbyterians, Particular Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Wesleyans, Primitive Methodists, and Roman Catholics.

Near St. James's chapel is the Marine school, endowed by Matthew Piper, Esq., with the interest of £2000; the site was given, and the building erected, by the Earl of Lonsdale. The interest of £1000 was bequeathed by Mr. Piper, also, for the purchase of soup, to be distributed during winter, among the poor; and about the commencement of the year 1830, a spacious mansion in Howgill-street was purchased, and fitted up for the purpose of an infirmary, which establishment includes a dispensary and house of recovery. A savings' bank was instituted in 1818, and from the accumulation of interest beyond what was paid to the depositors, a new and elegant edifice has been erected in Lowther-street. The poor law union of Whitehaven contains a population of 29,971. Dean Swift, when a child, resided with his attendant in a house in Roper-street, during the disturbance in Ireland about the time of the Revolution; and Dr. Brownrigg, who, by his publications, first attracted the notice of strangers to the beauties of Keswick and the surrounding scenery, for many years practised as a physician in the town.

WHITEHILL-POINT, a hamlet, in the township of CHIRTON, parish, borough, and union of TYNEMOUTH, E. division of CASTLE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 1 mile (S. by W.) from North Shields. It is on the north bank of the Tyne, projecting into the river, and has three staiths for shipping coal from the Backworth, Earsdon, and Holywell collieries.

WHITEPARISH (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of ALDERBURY, hundred of FRUSTFIELD, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTS, 8 miles (S. E. by E.) from Salisbury; containing, with the extra-parochial liberty of Earldoms, 1277 inhabitants. The parish comprises 6300 acres, of which about 1200 are woods and waste, and the remainder arable, meadow, and pasture; the soil varies, but is principally chalk and clay; the surface is elevated, and in some parts hilly. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 7. 2., and in the gift of the impropiator, Robert Bristow, Esq.: the great tithes have been commuted for £898, and the vicarial for £200. The church is an ancient structure, with a low tower. A free school for boys was founded by James Lynch, in 1639, and endowed by him with lands now let for £40 per annum; the total income is £46. A free school for girls was established in 1722, by the Hitchcock family, who endowed it with property now producing £17 a year.

WHITE-PIT, a hamlet, in the parish of SWABY, union of LOUTH, Marsh division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN; containing 150 inhabitants.

WHITE-ROOTHING.—See ROOTHING, WHITE.

WHITESIDELAW, a hamlet, in the parish of CHOLLERTON, union of HEXHAM, N. E. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 7½ miles (N. N. E.) from Hexham; containing 5 inhabitants.

WHITESTAUNTON (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of CHARD, forming a distinct portion of the hundred of SOUTH PETHERTON, but locally in that of KINGSBURY, W. division of SOMERSET, 3 miles (W. N. W.) from Chard; containing 321 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 1950 acres; the soil is tolerably fertile, and there are quarries of chalk and blue lias, which are burnt into lime for manure. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 2. 11., and in the patronage of Robert James Elton, Esq. : the tithes have been commuted for £215, and the glebe comprises 54 acres, with a house. The church is an ancient structure in the early English style, with a square embattled tower. Robert Somerhays bequeathed £10. 10. per annum for instruction, with £10. 10. for books and for distribution in bread to the poor. Some Roman antiquities have been found, and vestiges of encampments may be traced in the parish.

WHITEWELL, a chapelry, in the parish of WHALLEY, union of CLITHEROE, partly in the W. division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, W. riding of YORK, and partly in the Lower division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, N. division of LANCASHIRE, 7 miles (N. W. by W.) from Clitheroe. This chapelry, which is situated on the river Hodder, comprises about 8000 acres; the surface is boldly varied, and the scenery enriched with wood, and in some parts of mountainous character. The lands are mostly pasture, divided into farms of from 100 to 300 acres; the soil is various, consisting of sand, marl, clay, and peat moss, resting chiefly on limestone, and there is a bed of calamine, but not at present worked. The chapel was erected in 1817, partly by a rate, and partly by subscription, and is a neat structure in the Grecian style, containing 500 sittings; the pulpit is of carved oak, of great antiquity, and very handsome, and there is also an old font. A gallery was erected in 1825, by a grant from the Incorporated Society, and contains 70 sittings, all of which are free. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Whalley; net income, £88. A national school, in which are 60 children, and which is also used as a Sunday school, has been built by subscription. There are some remains of a Roman camp.

WHITFIELD, a township, in the parish and union of GLOSSOP, hundred of HIGH PEAK, N. division of the county of DERNY, 8½ miles (N. by W.) from Chapel-en-le-Frith; containing 3044 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A school-house was erected about 1786, by Joseph Hague, Esq., who endowed it with land and houses of the present annual value of £40; he also left the interest of £1000, to be expended in clothes for 24 poor men and women.

WHITFIELD (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of DOVOR, hundred of BEWSBOROUGH, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, E. division of KENT, 3¼ miles (N. N. W.) from DOVOR; containing 207 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury (the appropriator), valued in the king's books at £5. 18. 8.; net income, £109. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WHITFIELD (St. John the Evangelist), a parish, in the union of BRACKLEY, hundred of KING'S-SUTTON, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 2 miles (N. E. by N.) from Brackley; containing 321 inhabitants. The parish borders on the county of Buckingham, and consists of 1405 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 15.; net income, £258; patrons, the Provost and Fellows of Worcester College, Oxford. A national school is endowed with £6 a year, arising from land purchased with donations.

WHITFIELD, a parish, in the union of HALTWHISTLE, W. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 15 miles (W. S. W.) from Hexham; containing 333 inhabitants. This place was for six centuries the property of the family of Whitfield, to whom the Countess Ada, widow of Henry, Earl of Huntingdon, and mother of William the Lion, King of Scotland, made a grant of it in fee, with the exception of some lands to be held under the convent of Hexham; shortly after which, the family had a grant from that establishment of all Whitfield, except certain portions. In the middle of the last century, it came to the family of Ord, the present possessors, who have greatly contributed to improve the district, and under whose encouragement the highways have been repaired, inclosures made, and plantations formed, and by whom numerous substantial and comfortable farm-houses and cottages have been built. The parish comprises 12,157 acres, of which 6397 are moor, 5300 arable, pasture, and meadow, and 460 wood; it is bounded on the east and south by the parish of Alledale, and on the west and south-west by Alston-Moor, part of this boundary dividing the counties of Northumberland and Cumberland. The inclosed lands lie on the side of the river Allen, which flows on the east, and are hemmed in on the west and south by extensive sheep-walks, and on the north with the woody dell called King's-Wood; towards the river are some tracts of excellent land, chiefly in dairy and grazing farms. The East and West Allen join their streams at Cupola, in the parish, at which place formerly stood large smelting-mills belonging to the London Lead Company, where a great quantity of ore from their mines was smelted. Lead-mines have also been worked in various other places on the estate, and at present some companies are making trials for lead here and at Long Cleugh, with every prospect of success. A new line of road from Alston to Haydon-Bridge has been formed through the parish. Whitfield Hall, rebuilt in 1785, and lately enlarged, is a handsome mansion in the vale of the Allen, and overlooks a fine park interspersed with luxuriant groups of forest trees, and embracing much rural beauty. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of William Ord, Esq., M.P., owner of the parish: the tithes have been commuted for £260, and there is a glebe of 43½ acres. The old church, an humble edifice, was rebuilt in 1784, by the father of the present patron, whose grandfather erected a new parsonage-house about 70 years since; the present structure, which is very substantial, consists of a nave and chancel, with a square tower, and is capable of holding 230 persons. The chancel was rebuilt in 1839, by Mr. Ord, from designs by Mr. John Green, of Newcastle, and is ornamented with painted windows, and has a carved oak roof; it contains a monument to the late William Henry Ord, Esq., M.P., a lord of the treasury under the administration of Earl Grey. Mr. Ord allows a schoolmaster the use of a house and garden, with £20 a year, for teaching children; and a school is conducted on the national plan. At Redmires is a chalybeate spring.

WHITGIFT (St. Mary Magdalene), a parish, in the union of GOOLE, Lower division of the wapentake of OSGOLDCROSS, W. riding of YORK; containing, with the chapelry of Swinefleet, and the townships of Ousefleet and Reedness, 2353 inhabitants, of whom 347 are in Whitgift township, 6 miles (S. E.) from Howden. The parish comprises 6500 acres, of which 6000 are arable, meadow, and pasture, in good cultivation, and 500 moorland and waste; the soil is alluvial, and generally rich.

the surface level, and well watered by the river Ouse, on the banks of which the village is pleasantly situated. A fair is held on the 22nd of July. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £287; patron, N. E. YARBURGH, Esq.; impropiator, Mr. John Ireland. The church is an ancient structure, erected in 1302, on land given by Henry de Laci, Earl of Lincoln. Here are places of worship for Primitive Methodists and Independents, and three endowed schools.

WHITGREAVE, a township, in the parish of ST. MARY and ST. CHAD, STAFFORD, S. division of the hundred of PIREHILL, union, and N. division of the county, of STAFFORD, 3½ miles (N. N. W.) from Stafford; containing 185 inhabitants.

WHITKIRK (ST. MARY), a parish, in the Lower division of the wapentake of SKYRACK, W. riding of YORK, 4 miles (E.) from Leeds; containing, with the township of Thorp-Stapleton, and part of the townships of Seacroft and Temple-Newsom, 2431 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 6450 acres; the soil is fertile, producing excellent grain, and the lands generally are well cultivated; the substratum abounds with coal, of which several mines are wrought with success. The village is pleasantly situated on the road to Selby, and forms part of the township of Temple-Newsom, the parish having no township of its own name. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 5. 7½.; net income, £196, with a good house; patrons and impropiators, the Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge. The church, a spacious and elegant structure in the later English style, with a lofty square embattled tower crowned by pinnacles, is seated on an eminence, and forms a conspicuous and graceful feature in the landscape. On the south side is a sepulchral chapel, containing several handsome monuments to the families of Scargill and Ingram, some of which have finely-sculptured effigies; and also a monument to John Smeaton, builder of the Eddystone Lighthouse, who was a native of Austhorpe, in the parish. There are places of worship for Wesleyans; likewise Sunday schools for both sexes in the village, and national schools at Halton and Seacroft, all built by subscription, and supported in the same way. An endowment of £10 per annum by Richard Brooke, Esq., in 1702, is vested in trustees for the education of six children; and there are various charitable trusts for distribution among the poor, the chief of which is a sum of nearly £2000 given by the late Lady William Gordon, the interest to be divided among the necessitous of the township of Temple-Newsom.

WHITLEY, a tything, in the parish of CUMNER, union of ABINGDON, hundred of HORMER, county of BERKS, 5 miles (W. by S.) from Oxford; containing 22 inhabitants.

WHITLEY, a hamlet, in the parish of ST. GILES, READING, union and hundred of READING, county of BERKS, 2 miles (S.) from Reading; containing 518 inhabitants. The hamlet comprises 2081a. 3r. 25p.; the village is pleasantly situated, and is lighted with gas.

WHITLEY, a township, in the parish and union of TYNEMOUTH, E. division of CASTLE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 3 miles (N.) from North Shields; containing 749 inhabitants. The township comprises 515 acres of arable land, of which the soil is a good loam, and the subsoil clay. Coal, of an inferior quality for household purposes, but excellent for the use of steam-engines, is wrought here, though now nearly exhausted; and a considerable quantity, wrought in the adjoining township of Monkseaton, is raised from a pit near the village, and conveyed by a railway to the lower part of Shields, whence it is exported. Iron-stone abounds in the neighbourhood; and limestone is extensively burned, the produce of a quarry here, interesting to the geologist, as forming the northernmost point of the magnesian limestone stratum which extends from South Shields to near Nottingham. In the lower beds of the formation is contained an abundance of fossil fish, but as the quarry is not worked deep, the specimens are not often exposed; the limestone appears to have been entirely covered by a bed of sulphate of barytes, varying in thickness from a few inches to 27 feet. There are two places of worship for Methodists. The impropriate tithes of a part of the township have been commuted for £124. 6. 9.

WHITLEY, a tything, in the parish, union, and hundred of CALNE, Chippenham and Calne, and N. divisions of WILTS; containing 15 inhabitants.

WHITLEY, a township, in the parish of KELLINGTON, Lower division of the wapentake of OSGOLDCROSS, W. riding of YORK, 5½ miles (W. by S.) from Snaith; containing 372 inhabitants. This place is situated on the road from Selby to Doncaster, and comprises about 1800 acres of land, all made tithe-free at the inclosure in 1793. The Knottingley and Goole canal passes close to the village. There is a place of worship for a congregation of Wesleyans.

WHITLEY-BOOTHES, with BARLEY, a township, in the parish of WHALLEY, union of BURNLEY, Higher division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 4 miles (W. by N.) from Colne; containing 686 inhabitants.

WHITLEY, LOWER, a chapelry, in the parish of GREAT BUDWORTH, union of RUNCORN, hundred of BUCKLOW, N. division of the county of CHESTER, 4¾ miles (N. W. by N.) from Northwich; containing 219 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £108; patron, Sir John Chetwode, Bart.; appropiators, the Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WHITLEY, LOWER, a township, in the parish of THORNHILL, union of DEWSBURY, Lower division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, W. riding of YORK, 3 miles (S. E. by S.) from Dewsbury; containing 1125 inhabitants. There are two scribbling-mills and a tan-yard in the neighbourhood, and a colliery in full operation. The first stone of a church to be dedicated to St. Mary, was laid on the 7th of July, 1842, by Thomas Wheatley, Esq., at whose expense the structure will be erected, on a site given by the Earl of Dartmouth; it will be in the Norman style, and will contain about 400 sittings, the whole free. On this occasion, a mallet and a silver trowel were presented to Mr. Wheatley, by the Dewsbury District Committee of the Ripon Diocesan Society, with an appropriate inscription. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WHITLEY, OVER, a township, in the parish of GREAT BUDWORTH, union of RUNCORN, hundred of BUCKLOW, N. division of the county of CHESTER, 5½ miles (N. N. W.) from Northwich; containing 330 inhabitants.

WHITLEY, UPPER, a township, in the parish of KIRK-HEATON, union of HUDDERSFIELD, Upper division of the wapentake of ABBRIGG, W. riding of YORK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Huddersfield; containing 984 inhabitants. The founder of the ancient family of Beaumont here, was a Knight Hospitaller of St. John of Jerusalem, who received the manor on condition of performing certain military services in the time of Henry III.; and Whitley Hall has ever since been the principal residence of the family, and is now in the possession of R. H. Beaumont, Esq. Grange Hall is the seat of Sir J. L. Kaye, Bart., and both mansions are remarkable for their elegance, and the fine and extensive prospects obtained from them. The township, which is situated on the road from Huddersfield to Wakefield, comprises 1955*a.* 2*r.* 11*p.* of fertile land, and the population is principally employed in agriculture; the surface is varied. Coal and building-stone of good quality are abundant, and extensively wrought.

WHITLINGHAM (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union and hundred of HENSTEAD, E. division of NORFOLK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Norwich; containing 28 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the north by the navigable river Yare, comprises 557*a.* 1*r.* 38*p.*, nearly all arable land; the scenery along the banks of the river is beautifully picturesque. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of E. Lombe, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £123. 15. The church, now dilapidated, is situated on the verge of a lofty precipice near the river, and forms an interesting feature in the landscape.

WHITMORE, a parish, in the union of NEWCASTLE-UNDER-LYME, N. division of the hundred of PIREHILL and of the county of STAFFORD, 4 miles (S. W.) from Newcastle; containing 367 inhabitants. The parish is on the road from Newcastle to Market-Drayton, and comprises 1986*a.* 3*r.* 5*p.*, whereof 250 acres are common or waste, an act for inclosing which was passed in 1841. The Grand Junction railway has one of its principal stations here, where it attains its summit level; the buildings extend 300 feet in length. The village is beautifully situated, and the cottages are kept in neat order, and ornamented with roses and woodbine: Whitmore Hall, with the grounds attached to it, is one of the pleasantest seats in this part of the county. The living is a rectory not in charge, in the gift of Captain Mainwaring: the tithes have been commuted for £280, and the glebe comprises 29 acres. The church is a handsome structure in the later English style.

WHITNAGE, a tything, in the parish of UPLOWMAN, union and hundred of TIVERTON, Cullompton division of DEVON, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.) from Cullompton; containing 80 inhabitants.

WHITNASH (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of WARWICK, Kenilworth division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, S. division of the county of WARWICK, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (S. by E.) from Leamington-Priors; containing 276 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1198 acres, of which 40 are common or waste: the Warwick and Knapton canal passes within half a mile. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 9. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$, and in the gift of Lord Leigh: the tithes have been commuted for £280, and the glebe comprises 77 acres. The church is a very ancient structure, and has undergone frequent repairs.

WHITNELL, a tything, in the parish of EMBORROW, union of SHEPTON-MALLET, hundred of CHEWTON, E. division of SOMERSET; containing 69 inhabitants.

WHITNELL, a tything, in the parish of ST. CUTHBERT, without the limits of the city of WELLS, union of WELLS, hundred of WELLS-FORUM, E. division of SOMERSET; containing 40 inhabitants.

WHITNEY (St. PETER AND St. PAUL), a parish, in the union of HAY, hundred of HUNTINGTON, county of HEREFORD, 4 miles (N. E.) from Hay; containing 237 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the river Wye, comprises 1483*a.* 15*p.*: a considerable traffic in bark and timber is carried on by the Wye, which is navigable, and the road from Brecknock to Hereford passes through the parish. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 8., and in the gift of Tomkyns Dew, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £234, and the glebe comprises 20 acres of profitable land. The church was erected in 1740.

WHITRIDGE, a township, in the parish of HARTBURN, union, and W. division of the ward, of MORPETH, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Morpeth; containing 9 inhabitants. It comprises 197 acres, of which 74 are arable, and the remainder pasture, the property of Sir John Trevelyan, Bart. A colliery was wrought here in 1748. The tithes have been commuted for £10, payable to the lay rector, and £3. 3. to the vicar of Hartburn.

WHITRIGG, with TORPENHOW, a township, in the parish of TORPENHOW, union of WIGTON, ALLERDALE ward below Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, 1 mile (S.) from Torpenhow; containing 315 inhabitants. On a hill called Caer Mot, are the remains of a square double trenchment, intersected by the old road from Keswick to Old Carlisle; near it is a smaller encampment, defended by a rampart and fosse, and there are also the remains of a beacon.

WHITSBURY, or WHITCHBURY (St. LEONARD), a parish, in the union of FORDINGBRIDGE, hundred of CAWDEN and CADWORTH, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTS, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Fordingbridge; containing 186 inhabitants. This parish anciently formed part of the possessions of the priory of Breamore, founded by Baldwin de Redveris in the reign of Henry I., and appears, from discoveries recently made, to have been formerly connected with events of historical importance, the particulars of which are not recorded. It is situated on the highest land between Hants and Wilts, and commands an extensive view of the New Forest, and southward to the sea over a wide tract of most fertile country. The number of acres is 1769, by measurement; the substratum is chalk, and is dug in large quantities, and sent to considerable distances, being accounted to possess a peculiarly fertilizing property. A fair is held on the 17th of November, chiefly for pigs. The living is a discharged vicarage, endowed with the rectorial tithes, valued in the king's books at £5. 13. 4., and in the gift of Captain J. B. Purvis, R.N.: the tithes have been commuted for £300, and the glebe comprises 6 acres, with a house. The church is an ancient structure, situated on an eminence at the extremity of the parish, and the chancel is in the county of Southampton. Within the parish is a Roman encampment, occupying an elevated area surrounded by a trench, and commanding a fine view of Salisbury Cathedral and the castle of Old Sarum. In 1823, a barrow was opened on the estate of Sir Lucius Curtis, Bart.; and traces of a Roman road are discernible towards Clarebury Riggs. Charles Delafaye, Esq., a distinguished secretary of state in the reign of George I., resided and was interred here.

WHITSON, county MONMOUTH.—See WITSTON.

WHITSTABLE (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of BLEAN, hundred of WHITSTABLE, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, E. division of KENT, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Canterbury; containing 2255 inhabitants. The parish lies near the entrance to the East Swale, opposite to the Isle of Sheppy. On the shore, by Tankerton, are several establishments, where considerable quantities of copperas, or green vitriol, are manufactured. Whitstable bay is frequented by a number of colliers, from which Canterbury and the surrounding places are supplied with coal, by means of the Canterbury and Whitstable railway. It is also the station of hoys, which sail to and from London alternately, every week, with goods and passengers. The railway, one of the first constructed in the south of England, is six miles in length, worked by horses, and by fixed engines for raising the trains up the inclined planes. Many boats are employed in the fisheries, Whitstable being a royalty of fishery, or oyster-dredging, appendant to the manor; and for the due regulation of the trade, a court is held on the second Thursday in July. There are fairs on the Thursday before Whitsuntide, near the water side; on Midsummer-day, at Church-street; and on St. James'-day, on Greensted-green, in Whitstable-Street, which is a thriving and populous village, containing shops well stored with every necessary article of consumption for those engaged in the extensive traffic here carried on. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, with a net income of £122; impropiator, T. Foord, Esq., whose tithes have been commuted for £935. The church contains 800 sittings. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. Great quantities of Roman pottery have been found in dredging for oysters round a rock now called the pudding-pan, which is supposed by some to have been the island Caunos mentioned by Ptolemy, though now covered by the sea.

WHITSTONE, a parish, in the union and hundred of STRATTON, E. division of CORNWALL, 7 miles (S. S. E.) from Stratton; containing 466 inhabitants. The parish is situated in the north-eastern part of the county, bordering upon Devonshire, and is intersected by the Bude canal, in its course to Launceston; it comprises 3600 acres, of which 200 are common or waste; and stone is quarried, chiefly for repairing the roads. A fair for cattle is held on the first Thursday in June. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 11. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$, and in the gift of the incumbent, the Rev. J. Kingdon: the tithes have been commuted for £258, and the glebe comprises 30 acres, with a house. The church is a neat structure. There is a meeting-house for Bryanites.

WHITSTONE (St. CATHERINE), a parish, in the union of ST. THOMAS, hundred of WONFORD, Wonford and S. divisions of DEVON, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Exeter; containing 670 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the Falmouth road, and comprises by measurement 4077 acres, of which about 2700 are arable, 570 meadow and pasture, 450 coppice, and 260 orchard and garden ground; the soil is principally clay. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £19. 3. 4., and in the gift of the incumbent, the Rev. Charles Brown: the tithes have been commuted for £616. 16., and the glebe comprises 79 acres. The church is a handsome structure in the later English style, and contains 284 sittings, of which two-thirds are free. John Splatt, in 1753, bequeathed £20 per annum for teaching children, and he also founded almshouses for five people.

WHITTERING (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of STAMFORD, soke of PETERBOROUGH, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Wansford; containing 261 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 0. 10.; net income, £101; patron, the Marquess of Exeter.

WHITTINGHAM, a township, in the parish of KIRKHAM, union of PRESTON, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, N. division of LANCASHIRE, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Preston; containing 691 inhabitants.

WHITTINGHAM (St. BARTHOLOMEW), a parish, in the union of ROTHBURY, N. division of COQUETDALE ward and of the county of NORTHUMBERLAND; containing, with the townships of Callaley with Yetlington, Glanton, Lorbottle, Great Ryle, Little Ryle, and Shawdon, 1896 inhabitants, of whom 681 are in Whittingham township, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Alnwick. This parish, which is in the beautiful vale of the Aln, is about seven miles in length, and from four to five in breadth; the soil varies from a deep rich loam in the centre of the vale to a light sand on the sides and acclivities of the hills by which it is inclosed; a great portion of the land is open, but that under cultivation is fertile and productive. The vale forms a division between the sandstone rock in the south, and the porphyritic hills in the north which compose the range of Cheviot; the whole district abounds in freestone excellent for building; there is also a limestone quarry of moderate quality, and to the north whinstone in abundance. Coal of an inferior kind exists, but it has never been profitably worked. There are several large family mansions in the parish, beautifully situated, which, together with their parks, groves, and plantations, and extensive pleasure-grounds, give a rich appearance to the vale: Eslington House, pleasantly seated on the bank of the Aln, is the residence of the Hon. Henry T. Liddell, member for the northern division of the county of Durham. The great north road from Newcastle to Edinburgh, by Wooler, formerly passed through the village, which is on the banks of the Aln, but now crosses the lower part of the parish by a stone bridge over the river. A fair for cattle, held on August 24th, was some years ago of great resort, but has been latterly much on the decline, and chiefly attended for the hiring of Scotch and Irish reapers. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12. 11. 3., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Carlisle, who are the appropriators; net income, £600. The church, a handsome structure situated in the heart of the vale, with an ancient and lofty tower, has lately been enlarged and repaired, and the tower remodelled. A Roman Catholic chapel is maintained by the ancient family of Clavering, and there is a place of worship for Presbyterians. A school is partly supported by Lord Ravensworth, and Lady Ravensworth allows a mistress £12 per annum, with a house and garden. In the village is a vaulted tower that often afforded refuge and defence to the inhabitants during the border warfare.

WHITTINGTON (St. Bartholomew), a parish, in the union of CHESTERFIELD, hundred of SCARSDALE, N. division of the county of DERBY, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.) from Chesterfield; containing 751 inhabitants. A public-house here is distinguished by the name of the Revolution House, from the adjournment to it of a select meeting of friends to liberty and the Protestant religion, held on Whittington moor early in 1688, at which the Earl (afterwards Duke) of Devonshire, the Earl of Derby (afterwards Duke of Leeds), Lord Delamere, and Mr. John D'Arcy, eldest son of the Earl of Holderness, attended. When the centenary anniversary of that event was commemorated in Derbyshire, in 1788, the committee dined on the preceding day at this house; and on the anniversary, a sermon was preached in the parochial church by Dr. Pegge, the celebrated antiquary, then rector, before the descendants of those illustrious persons, and a large assemblage of the most distinguished families of the county, who afterwards went in procession to take refreshment at the Revolution House, and then proceeded to Chesterfield to dinner. The parish comprises 1573a. 2r. 25p., whereof a considerable portion is uninclosed moor, on which the Chesterfield races are held; clay of good quality for potters is found, and the manufacture of earthenware is carried on to a considerable extent. The Chesterfield canal and the North-Midland railway pass through the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 10. 10.; net income, £302; patron, the Dean of Lincoln. The tithes were partly exchanged for corn-rents, under an act of inclosure, in 1821, and the residue have been commuted for a rent-charge of £183. 6.; the glebe comprises 33 acres. The church is an ancient structure, of which the chancel was rebuilt in 1827. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A free school was founded in 1674, by Peter Webster, who, in 1678, gave £200 to purchase land; and Joshua Webster, in 1681, gave land to be applied for teaching ten children: the annual income is £73. A chalybeate spring was formerly much resorted to, and, for the convenience of visitors, a cold bath was erected in 1769.

WHITTINGTON, a parish, in the union of NORTHLEACH, hundred of BRADLEY, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Cheltenham; containing 231 inhabitants. The parish is near the road from Cheltenham to Northleach, and comprises 1429a. 2r. 1p.; the soil in the lower lands is a clay marl, and on the hills a thin loose mould abounding with clay-stone; the surface is boldly undulated, and the lower grounds are watered by a stream called the Colne, which has its source in the adjoining parish of Sevenhampton. Stone is quarried to a considerable extent, and many of the houses in the town of Cheltenham have been built with it. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the patronage of Walter Lawrence Lawrence, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £305. 14., and the glebe comprises 97 acres. The church is an ancient structure. A parochial school was instituted, and is supported, by a bequest of £1000 by Mrs. Lightbourne, of Sandywell Park.

WHITTINGTON, a parish, in the union of LANCASTER, hundred of LONSDALE, south of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 5 miles (E.) from Burton; containing 425 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 3972 acres, of which 2770 are arable, 947 meadow and pasture, recently inclosed, 153 old woodland, and 100 new plantations. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 9. 9½.; net income, £415; patron, E. Hornby, Esq. William Margison, in 1762, left £1000 for building and endowing a school for the poor.

WHITTINGTON, a hamlet, in the parish of NORTHWOLD, union of THETFORD, hundred of GRIMSHOE, W. division of NORFOLK; containing 178 inhabitants.

WHITTINGTON (St. John the Baptist), a parish, in the hundred of OSWESTRY, N. division of SALOP, 3 miles (E. N. E.) from Oswestry; containing 1919 inhabitants. Lloyd, in his Archæologia, imagines this place to have been celebrated, under the name Drév Wen, or the White Town, by Llywarch Hen, a noble British bard, who flourished about the close of the 6th century; and describes it as the spot where Condolanus, a British chieftain, was slain, in an attempt to expel some Irish invaders. According to the bards, it was subsequently the property and chief residence of Tudor Trevor. After the Conquest it was given to Roger, Earl of Shrewsbury, and, on the defection of his son, Earl Robert, and the confiscation of that nobleman's immense estates, in the reign of Henry I., the castle and barony were granted to the Peverells, from whom they passed to the illustrious race of Fitz-warine, who were lords of the place for nearly 400 years. The castle was a border fortress, and the neighbourhood the frequent scene of battle between the lords retainers and the Welsh; the remains consist of one large tower with traces of four others, and the exterior gateway, which is inhabited by a farmer. The parish comprises by measurement 8158 acres; the soil is various, in some districts a strong clay, in others a loose gravel, and in parts sand and peat moss. The village is pleasantly situated near the Ellesmere canal, on the road from Shrewsbury to Holyhead, and is watered by a brook, which, rising in a neighbouring mountain, and flowing under ground for about a mile, re-appears near the castle, and runs through the village into the river Perry, which pursues its course through the parish, and falls into the Severn near Shrewsbury. The grant of a weekly market and an annual fair, was obtained by Fulk Fitz-warine, lord of the manor in the reign of Henry II., but both have been long discontinued. A court leet and baron is annually held in a modern portion of the castle, rebuilt a few years ago by William Lloyd, Esq., lord of the manor. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £25. 4. 2., and in the gift of Mr. Lloyd: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £285, and the incumbent's for £1041. 8.; the glebe comprises 58 acres. The church was originally built in the reign of Henry II., by Fulk Fitz-warine; the tower was rebuilt in 1740, the chancel in 1785, and the nave and other parts in 1806; the structure is of red brick, and is conveniently arranged. There is a chapel at Frankton, about three miles from the village, which has been licensed by the bishop; and the Brownists and Bryanites have places of worship. Sir Richard Whittington, mayor of London, is by some supposed to have been a native of the place.

WHITTINGTON (St. GILES), a parish, in the union of LICHFIELD, N. division of the hundred of OFFLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Lichfield; containing 799 inhabitants. It comprises 2921 acres, of which 463 are common or waste; the cultivated land is mostly arable, and of level surface. The manufacture of paper is carried on, on a small scale. The Coventry canal passes through the village. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the gift of the impropiator, John Levett, Esq., of Wichnor Park, chief owner of the parish: the great tithes have been commuted for £382. 10., and the small tithes for £159; the glebe comprises 46 acres. The church has a square tower, surmounted by a lofty spire; the body was rebuilt in 1762. About £8 per annum were left for education by an ancestor of Mr. Levett's.

WHITTINGTON, a hamlet, in the parish of GREN-DON, union of ATHERSTONE, Tamworth division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, N. division of the county of WARWICK, 2 miles (N. W.) from Atherstone; containing 109 inhabitants.

WHITTINGTON, a chapelry, in the parish of St. PETER, WORCESTER, union of PERSHORE, Lower division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, Worcester and W. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Worcester; containing 282 inhabitants. The chapel, dedicated to St. Philip and St. James, an ancient structure of wood, with some curious tracery in the windows, was taken down, and a new edifice, of which the first stone was laid on the 25th of July, 1842, has been erected on its site.

WHITTINGTON, GREAT, a township, in the parish of CORBRIDGE, union of HEXHAM, E. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 7 miles (N. E.) from Hexham; containing 200 inhabitants. The township is the property of various persons: the tenants are bound to pay tithe of geese, pigs, &c., or sixpence each in lieu, to the lord of the manor, and to provide six mowers and twelve reapers for one day in each year, to cut the lord's hay and corn, pursuant to the ancient custom of bondage service. The village is situated about a mile and a half east of the road from Corbridge to Bingfield. James Kirsopp, Esq., left £5 a year for education.

WHITTINGTON, LITTLE, a township, in the parish of CORBRIDGE, union of HEXHAM, E. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Hexham; containing 19 inhabitants. It lies a short distance north of the Roman wall, and consists of two farmholds and a few cottages. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £7. 10., and the appropriate for £16, payable to the Dean and Chapter of Carlisle.

WHITTLE, a hamlet, in the district of NEW MILLS, parish of GLOSSOP, union of HAYFIELD, hundred of HIGH PEAK, N. division of the county of DERBY, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Chapel-en-le-Frith; containing 2284 inhabitants.

WHITTLE, a township, in the parish of SHILBOTTLE, union of ALNWICK, E. division of COQUETDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 5 miles (S.) from Alnwick; containing 56 inhabitants. It lies a little east of the road, between Morpeth and Alnwick, and is divided into High and Low Whittle, both set out in farms.

WHITTLE, a township, in the parish of Ovingham, union of HEXHAM, E. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 11 miles (W.) from Newcastle; containing 31 inhabitants. It is the property of Greenwich Hospital, and is situated above a mile north-by-west from Ovingham, upon a dene, the water of which, peculiarly soft and clear, is highly celebrated for whitening linen-cloth. This stream, which in parts runs between woody banks, stretches southward, and joins the Tyne east of Ovington; the scenery near it is romantic, and many picturesque spots are to be found in its course: the dene is celebrated for the number of its different wild flowers. In the vicinity of Whittle is a strong sulphureous spring.

WHITTLE-LE-WOODS, a township, in the parish and hundred of LEYLAND, union of CHORLEY, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 2 miles (N.) from Chorley; containing 2295 inhabitants. There are several valuable mill-stone quarries; and a lead-mine was formerly worked with great success. A district church, in the later English style, was built in 1830, by grant from the Parliamentary Commissioners, at an expense of £2756: the living is a perpetual curacy; patron, the Vicar of Leyland; impropiators, Sir H. Hoghton, Bart., and the family of Silvester; net income, £150. A school erected by subscription in 1769, was endowed by Samuel Croke, in 1770, with the interest of £220.

WHITTLE, WELSH, a township, in the parish of STANDISH, union of CHORLEY, hundred of LEYLAND, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 3 miles (S. W.) from Chorley; containing 149 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £84. 12. 10.

WHITTLEBURY (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of TOWCESTER, hundred of GREENS-NORTON, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Towcester; containing 748 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Towcester to Buckingham, and comprises about 3400 acres, of which 600 are arable, nearly 800 meadow and pasture, and the remainder forest and woodland; the soil is partly gravelly, and partly clay, the chief crops wheat and beans, and the principal timber oak. The living is annexed, with that of Silverstone, to the rectory of Greens-Norton: the tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1797. The church, an ancient structure in the early English style, has been recently restored and repewed, and contains about 500 sittings, of which 260 are free. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also a national school endowed with land producing £14 per annum. Several Roman tiles and ornaments were found under the roots of trees which had been felled in a field belonging to Mr. Cooke, adjoining the churchyard, in 1822; and Roman coins have also been found in high preservation.

WHITTLESEY, a village, and once a market-town, containing the parishes of St. Andrew and St. Mary, which form a union, in the hundred of NORTH WITCHFORD, ISLE of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, 6 miles (E. by S.) from Peterborough; containing 6574 inhabitants. This place, called Witesie in Domesday book, is supposed to have been a Roman station, from the traces of a military way, and the numerous relics of antiquity discovered in the neighbourhood. The village, which is bounded on the north and south by branches of the river Nene, is large and respectable, though its market, held on Friday, has been for some years disused: the market-house still remains. There is a fair for horses on June 13th; and at the Falcon, the principal inn, courts leet and baron occur twice a year; also a court of requests, for the recovery of debts under 40s., on the third Friday in every month. A public library and newsroom have been established by subscription. Adjoining this place, but in the county of Huntingdon, is an expanse of water termed Whittlesey Mere, abounding with a variety of fish, a considerable quantity of which is sent to the metropolis. This lake is $8\frac{3}{4}$ miles in circumference, and is fed by the waters of a large tract of country; its antiquity and importance are shown in Domesday book, and by its having been granted, so early as 664, by the King of Mercia, to his new monastery of Medeshamsted, now Peterborough. In 870 it reverted to the crown; several grants were made of it by different kings, and Charles II., in 1662, conferred on Edward, Earl of Sandwich, the office of keeper of Whittlesey Mere. An act for inclosing waste lands was passed in 1840. The living of St. Andrew's is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £62; impropiators, Earl Waldegrave and others. The church is a handsome structure, with a stately tower crowned by turrets. The living of St. Mary's is a discharged vicarage, valued at £19. 13. 9.; net income, £222; patron and impropiator, the Earl. The church is a fine edifice, with a lofty tower of peculiar elegance, surmounted by a slender enriched spire of good proportions. Another church has been erected, at an expense of £1400, by grant of Her Majesty's Commissioners, on a site given by the Childers family. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Wesleyans, and Calvinistic Methodists; also two endowed schools, one founded in 1735, by Adam Kelfull, and endowed with £27 per annum; and the other in 1815, by John Sudbury, with £20 a year. William de Whittlesey, Archbishop of Canterbury, was born here in 1367.

WHITTLESFORD (St. MARY AND St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of LINTON, hundred of WHITTLESFORD, county of CAMBRIDGE, 7 miles (S. by E.) from Cambridge; containing 579 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 1800 acres, of which 250 are meadow and pasture, 100 woodland, and the remainder arable. The village had formerly a market and a fair. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10; net income, £169; patrons, the Master and Fellows of Jesus' College, Cambridge; impropiator, H. J. Thurnall, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1809. William Westley, in 1723, bequeathed lands now let for £50 a year, for teaching children. At Whittlesford bridge are the remains of an hospital said to have been founded before the time of Edward I., by William Colvill, and dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

WHITTON, a township, in the parish of GRINDON, union of STOCKTON, N. E. division of STOCKTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Stockton; containing 52 inhabitants. The township comprises about 750 acres: the main line of the Clarence railway passes through it. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £11, and the impropriate for £106. 17. 6., payable to Christ's Hospital, Sherburn.

WHITTON, with TRIPPLETON, a township, in the parish of LEINTWARDINE, hundred of WIGMORE, county of HEREFORD; containing 72 inhabitants, of whom 40 are in Whitton.

WHITTON (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of GLANDFORD-BRIGG, N. division of the wapentake of MANLEY, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 11 miles (W. N. W.) from Barton-upon-Humber; containing 217 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, united to the vicarage of Aukborough, and valued in the king's books at £6. 10.

WHITTON, a township, in the parish and union of ROTHBURY, W. division of COQUETDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S.) from Rothbury; containing 82 inhabitants. In 1381, Earl Gilbert Umfraville died possessed of this manor, which his relict conveyed in marriage to the first lord Percy, by one of whose descendants it was given in exchange to the rectory of Rothbury, for the old hall and glebe of that benefice, "which lay intermixed through the demesne of Rothbury." The village is pleasantly situated a short distance west of the road from Rothbury to Rothley. Whitton Tower, formerly a very strong fortress, is a commodious edifice, occupied by the rector of the parish; and near it is a circular observatory, built by the late Dr. Sharp.

WHITTON, a chapelry, in the parish of BURFORD, union of TENBURY, hundred of OVERS, S. division of SALOP, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Tenbury; containing 61 inhabitants.

WHITTON (St. MARY), a parish, in the union and borough of IPSWICH, E. division of SUFFOLK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Ipswich; containing 422 inhabitants, and comprising 1462a. 1r. 9p. The Stow-Market and Ipswich navigation passes through the parish. The living is a rectory, with that of Thurlton annexed, valued in the king's books at £6. 11. $5\frac{1}{2}$.; patron, the Bishop of Ely. The manor and impropriation of Thurlton were granted to Cardinal Wolsey by Henry VIII., and now belong to the Rev. Edward Woolnough: the great tithes have been commuted for £170, and the rectorial for £259; the glebe comprises 39 acres.

WHITTONDITCH, a tything, in the parish of RAMSBURY, union of HUNGERFORD, hundred of RAMSBURY, Marlborough and Ramsbury, and N. divisions of WILTS; containing 135 inhabitants.

WHITTONSTALL, a chapelry, in the parish of BYWELL ST. PETER, union of HEXHAM, E. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 10 miles (S. E. by E.) from Hexham; containing 184 inhabitants. It is situated on the Roman Watling-street, and is the property of Greenwich Hospital. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £45; patrons, the Dean and Chapter of Durham. The chapel, dedicated to St. Philip and St. James, has been rebuilt, and contains about 120 free sittings. The governors of the hospital, of which this place forms part of the endowment, allow £15 a year to a master for teaching children.

WHITWELL (St. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of WORKSOP, hundred of SCARSDALE, N. division of the county of DERBY, $10\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Chesterfield; containing 1157 inhabitants. This place, together with some of the neighbouring villages, has been on the decline since the opening of the Chesterfield canal; but frame-work knitting is still carried on to a small extent. A statute-fair for hiring servants, held on Nov. 1st, is disused. The ancient hall has been converted into a farm-house. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £20. 3. 4., and in the gift of the Duke of Portland; the tithes have been commuted for £642, and the glebe comprises 143 acres. The church has a Norman tower. At Steetly, said to have been at one period a distinct parish, are the remains of an ancient church, exhibiting a fine specimen of the later and more enriched style of Norman architecture; it is an interesting ruin, and is preserved with great care.

WHITWELL, a parish, in the union of AYLSHAM, hundred of EYNSFORD, E. division of NORFOLK, adjoining the town of Reepham; containing 519 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1494a. 18p., of which 1064 acres are arable, 346 meadow and pasture, 24 woodland, 6 buildings and waste, and 52 common land, allotted to the poor for cutting turf; the surface is undulated, and the scenery in many parts picturesque. There are two extensive tanneries. The living is a discharged vicarage, united to the rectory of Hackford. The church, in the same burial-ground as that of Reepham, is an ancient structure in the later English style with a square embattled tower and south transept, and was thoroughly repaired in 1834; it serves also as the church for the parish of Hackford. There is a place of worship for Primitive Methodists.

WHITWELL (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of OAKHAM, hundred of ALSTOE, county of RUTLAND, 7 miles (W. by N.) from Stamford; containing 139 inhabitants. It comprises about 600 acres; the soil is a light loam, alternated with clay; the surface is undulated, and the lower grounds are watered by a small brook which divides the parish from Hambleton. Stone of inferior quality is raised for building and for the roads. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £5, and in the gift of the Representative of the late Sir G. Noel Noel, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £140, and the glebe comprises 54 acres. The church is a small ancient structure. The water of this place is slightly impregnated with iron.

WHITWELL (St. RADEGUND), a parish, in the liberty of EAST MEDINA, Isle of Wight incorporation and division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 8 miles (S. by E.) from Newport; containing 660 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, united, with the vicarage of Godshill, to the rectory of Niton. The church, an ancient structure, built and endowed by De Estur, lord of Gatcomb, contained the chapels of the Blessed Virgin and St. Radegund.

WHITWELL, a township, in the parish, union, and ward of KENDAL, county of WESTMORLAND, 4½ miles (N. by E.) from Kendal; containing, with Selside, 335 inhabitants. This was an extensive common previously to 1825, when it was inclosed by act of parliament.

WHITWELL, a chapelry, in the parish of CATTERICK, union of NORTH-ALLERTON, wapentake of GILLING-EAST, N. riding of YORK, 3 miles (E.) from Catterick; containing 79 inhabitants. It comprises about 490 acres of land, partly the property of the Earl of Tyrconnell, who is lord of the manor. The river Swale pursues its devious course on the west and south.

WHITWELL-HOUSE, an extra-parochial liberty, in the S. division of EASINGTON ward, union, and N. division of the county, of DURHAM, 2¾ miles (E. S. E.) from Durham; containing 173 inhabitants. It lies to the north of Quarrington, adjoining the grounds of Shincliffe, in St. Oswald's parish, and is held by lease under Sherburn Hospital. Among the families that formerly resided here, were those of Brasse and Teasdale. The produce of two coal-mines, respectively A. pit and B. pit, is shipped at Sunderland.

WHITWELL-ON-THE-HILL, a township, in the parish of CRAMBE, union of MALTON, wapentake of BULMER, N. riding of YORK, 5¾ miles (S. W.) from Malton; containing 215 inhabitants. It comprises about 1640 acres of land, late the property of the Graham family, by whom it was sold for 95,000 guineas, to J. Haigh, Esq., whose executors are now lords of the manor. The Hall, a fine mansion built by Mr. Haigh, at an expense of £30,000, is at present occupied by his widow. The village is on the road from York to Malton.

WHITWICK (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of ASHBY-DE-LA-ZOUCH, hundred of WEST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, 5½ miles (E. by S.) from Ashby; containing, with the chaperies of Swanwick and Thringstone, 4286 inhabitants, of whom 2310 are in Whitwick township, and many of whom are employed in the manufacture of hosiery. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 14. 7., and in the patronage of the Crown, in right of the duchy of Lancaster; net income, £179; impropiator, Sir G. Beaumont, Bart. There is a chapel at Thringstone. The Wesleyans have a place of worship; and a Roman Catholic chapel was erected in 1837. The parish receives £20 per annum for the support of a school, £10 for distribution among the poor, and a sum for apprenticing four boys, from funds bequeathed by T. Monks, Esq., to the parish of Austrey, in the county of Warwick; and a boy is apprenticed every fourth year from Lady Beaumont's charity at Coleorton.

WHITWOOD, a township, in the parish of FEATHERSTONE, Lower division of the wapentake of AGRIBRIGG, W. riding of YORK, 4¾ miles (N. W. by W.) from Pontefract; containing 417 inhabitants. It includes the hamlet of Whitwood-Mere, and comprises by computation about 1012 acres of land: the commons were inclosed in 1806. The village is on the south side of the river Calder. There is an extensive manufacture of earthenware at Mere pottery; also large glass-bottle works.

WHITWORTH, a parochial chapelry, partly in the union of AUCLAND, and partly in that of DURHAM, S. E. division of DARLINGTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM; containing, with the township of Tudhoe, 617 inhabitants, of which number 290 are in Whitworth township, 4 miles (N. E. by N.) from Bishop-Auckland. According to the Boldon book, the manor was held by Thomas de Aley, by the service of a quarter of a knight's fee; it was afterwards possessed by the Whytworths and the Nevills, and subsequently by the Shafto family. The parish comprises about 3250 acres: the village is pleasantly situated about three-quarters of a mile south of the river Wear. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Durham, the appropriators; net income, £243. The chapel was originally subject to the vicarage of Merlington; in the cemetery, among other ancient sepulchral memorials, are a monument of a knight in armour, and the effigies of two ladies.

WHITWORTH, a chapelry, in the parish and union of ROCHDALE, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Rochdale. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of Mrs. Langton, Mrs. Hornby, and J. Starky, Esq.; net income, £256. The chapel is dedicated to St. Bartholomew. Twelve children are taught to read for £14. 10. a year, arising from the rents of certain cottages bequeathed by James Starky, in 1724.

WHIXHALL, a chapelry, in the parish of PREES, Whitchurch division of the hundred of NORTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Wem; containing 978 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £152; patron, the Vicar of Prees.

WHIXLEY, a parish, partly in the Lower, and partly in the Upper, division of the wapentake of CLARO, W. riding of YORK; containing, with the townships of Hammerton-Green and Thornville, 946 inhabitants, of whom 594 are in Whixley township, 11 miles (W. N. W.) from York. The parish comprises about 2200 acres, chiefly the property of the trustees of Whixley hospital; the surface is undulated, and the soil rich, producing fine crops of wheat, barley, oats, and turnips. The village, which is large, is neatly built, on the gentle acclivities of a hill, and about half a mile west of the road from York to Boroughbridge. The living is a perpetual curacy, valued in the king's books at £7. 17. 1.; net income, £68; patrons and impropriators, the Governors of the Tancred charities. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1801. The church is an ancient structure in the early and later English styles, with a square embattled tower, and was repaired and repewed in 1817. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Christopher Tancred, Esq., whose family were long seated at the Hall, at his death in 1754, left his house to be converted into an hospital for twelve decayed gentlemen, and endowed it with estates which, in 1815, were let for £2480 per annum. He also assigned to it £1282. 15. three per cent. consols., but directed part of the income to be appropriated for twelve exhibitions, four at Christ's College for divinity, four at Caius College for physic, and four at Lincoln's-Inn for law. The hospital is a spacious and handsome building of brick, consisting of a centre and two wings; in the hall are portraits of the founder and Queen Mary II., and the building contains separate lodging-rooms for the inmates, with spacious dining and drawing rooms for their joint use, and a chapel, in which divine service is performed daily by the chaplain, who has a stipend of £20 per annum: attached to the house are two large gardens, with pleasure-grounds. Each of the inmates has an annual allowance of about £50, which sum includes 1s. 6d. per day for provisions; they are elected on petition, and are generally decayed clergymen and gentlemen, and must be fifty years of age at least previous to admission; they are eligible if born in Great Britain, but must be members of the Church of England. The hospital is under the immediate care of a receiver, and the direction of the governors of Greenwich and Chelsea Hospitals, the master of the Charter-House, the president of the College of Physicians, the treasurer of Lincoln's-Inn, and the masters of Caius and Christ's Colleges, Cambridge; the present warden is Mr. John White, nephew of the historian Gilbert White, of Selborne, Hampshire.

WHIXOE, county of SUFFOLK.—See WIXOE.

WHORLTON, a chapelry, in the parish of GAINFORD, union of TEESDALE, S. W. division of DARLINGTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Barnard-Castle; containing 286 inhabitants. This place formed part of the forfeited estates of the Earl of Westmorland, and was purchased from the commissioners of the crown lands, and the manor subsequently became the property of the Sanderson family. The chapelry is beautifully situated on the river Tees, over which is a handsome suspension-bridge, erected in 1831, after a design by Mr. Green, of Newcastle, and which here connects the counties of Durham and York; the surface is pleasingly varied, and the higher lands command a fine view of the Rokeby grounds and other interesting scenery. The soil near the river is rich and fertile, and in other parts a strong clay; limestone of inferior quality abounds, which is an excellent material for roads; there are also some petrifying springs. The chapel is near the edge of a precipitous cliff overlooking the river: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Gainford: there are 57 acres of glebe. The Independents have a place of worship.

WHORLTON, a township, in the parish of NEWBURN, union and W. division of CASTLE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Newcastle; containing 60 inhabitants. This township, which is divided into East and West Whorlton, comprises about 582 acres, of a strong clay soil yielding good crops of wheat and clover. In West Whorlton is the Hall, the beautiful seat of James Colbeck, Esq., which contains some choice paintings, and the scenery around which is undulated, and very pleasing. The village lies equidistant between the roads from Newcastle to Heddon and to Ponteland.

WHORLTON (HOLY CROSS), a parish, in the union of STOKESLEY, W. division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, N. riding of YORK; containing, with part of the chapelry of Faceby, the township of Potto, and village of Swainby, 798 inhabitants, of whom 505 are in Whorlton township, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Stokesley. The parish is situated at the base of the Cleveland hills, and comprises about 6700 acres, of which 3000 are open hilly moorland, affording rough pasture, and abounding with grouse; 250 wood and plantations; and the remainder arable and pasture in good cultivation. The scenery is pleasingly diversified, and in some points strikingly picturesque; there are some quarries of good building-stone. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £84; patron and impropriator, the Marquess of Ailesbury. The church is an ancient structure, with a square tower on the south side; it contains a monument to a Knight Templar, and is remarkable for a beautiful ivy-tree, which flourishes in the interior. A parochial school is supported by subscription, aided by an annual donation from the marquess. At Scarth, in the parish, a cell of Augustine canons, subordinate to the monastery of Gisburn, was founded by Stephen Meinil, in the time of Henry I. The lofty gateway tower of a castle supposed to have been built in the reign of Richard II., still remains, and bears the arms of D'Arcy, Meynell, and Gray, its ancient possessors; the castle and manor passed in the reign of Charles I., to Thomas Bruce, Earl of Elgin, who was Earl Bruce of Whorlton, ancestor of the present lord, the Marquess of Ailesbury.

WIBSEY, a chapelry, in the township of NORTH BIERLEY, parish and union of BRADFORD, wapentake of MORLEY, W. riding of YORK, 3 miles (S. W. by S.) from Bradford; containing 951½ inhabitants. This chapelry is situated in the heart of an extensive mining district, and includes several collieries, affording employment to a considerable number of the population: the village is on the Bradford and Halifax, and Bradford and Huddersfield roads. The chapel, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, and founded about the year 1606 by the families of Richardson and Rookes, respectively of Bierley and Royds Halls, was enlarged in 1820, at an expense of £500, and again in 1837, at a cost of £2000, by subscription, aided by the profits of a bazaar held in the Exchange buildings at Bradford; it is now a handsome cruciform structure in the early English style, with a tower surmounted by a graceful spire, and contains 1200 sittings, of which 500 are free in consideration of a grant of £300 from the Incorporated Society. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £250, with a residence; patron, the Vicar of Bradford. A church dedicated to St. Paul, has been erected at Buttershaw, at the expense of John Hardy, Esq., one of the proprietors of the Low Moor Iron-works, at a cost of £2500; it was consecrated by the Bishop of Ripon, August 2nd, 1842, and is a handsome structure, in the early English style, with a well-proportioned tower and spire. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of Mr. Hardy, who has endowed it with £100 per annum and a portion of the seat-rents; net income, £150. A residence for the incumbent and a school are about to be erected. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans; also a national school, a spacious building, erected in 1814, at an expense of £1000, by the Low Moor Company, by whom it is chiefly supported. The Rev. John Wilton, in 1669, bequeathed an estate called the Penny-Close Farm, now producing £12 per annum, of which he appropriated £2 to one poor man, and the remainder to the minister.—See BIERLEY, NORTH.

WIBTOFT, a chapelry, in the parish of CLAYBROOKE, union of LUTTERWORTH, Kirby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, N. division of the county of WARWICK, 5½ miles (W. N. W.) from Lutterworth; containing 101 inhabitants, and comprising 792 acres. The old Watling-street and Fosse-way meet at a Roman fort on the Leicestershire boundary, north of this place.

WICHAUGH, a township, in the parish of MALPAS, union of WREXHAM, Higher division of the hundred of BROXTON, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 5½ miles (N. W.) from Whitechurch; containing 30 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £36.

WICHENFORD (St. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of MARTLEY, Lower division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, Worcester and W. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 6¼ miles (N. W. by N.) from Worcester; containing 350 inhabitants. It comprises 2699a. 1r. 33p.; the soil is generally clay, resting on a substratum of deep red marl; the surface is flat, and the lands are watered by several small brooks. The living is a vicarage, endowed with the rectorial tithes, valued in the king's books at £9. 10., and in the gift of the Dean and Chapter of Worcester: the tithes have been commuted for £420. 6., and the glebe comprises 8 acres. The church contains several monuments to the Washbourne family, who were proprietors of the parish, but lost much of their property during the rebellion of Cromwell, for their attachment to the royal cause, in support of which one of its members fought at the battle of Worcester.

WICHLING, county of KENT.—See WITCHLING.

WICHNOR, a chapelry, in the parish of TATENHILL, union of BURTON-UPON-TRENT, N. division of the hundred of OFFLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, 6½ miles (N. E.) from Lichfield; containing 155 inhabitants. This place was honoured by a visit from James I., who held a court at the Hall on the 21st of August, 1621, and again on the 19th of August, 1624, when that monarch dined at Wichnor. The Grand Trunk canal passes through the chapelry, and communicates with the iron-works in the vicinity. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £71; patron, John Levett, Esq. The chapel, dedicated to St. Leonard, is a small structure in the decorated English style, with a low tower. Parties married here are entitled by ancient usage to the same privilege as at Dumnow. Many Roman coins have been found in the neighbourhood, and in the park are vestiges of an encampment.

WICK, a hamlet, in the parish of FYFIELD, union of ANINGDON, hundred of OCK, county of BERKS; containing 42 inhabitants.

WICK and ABSON (St. JAMES), a parish, in the union of CHIPPING-SODBURY, hundred of PUCKLE-CHURCH, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 7¼ miles (E. by N.) from Bristol; containing 794 inhabitants. This place is distinguished as the scene of a memorable victory obtained near Toghill, in the parish, in 1642, by the royalists, commanded by the Marquess of Hertford, over the parliamentarians under Sir William Waller. In this battle was slain the brave Sir Beville Granville, whose son was created Viscount Lansdown and Earl of Bath, and whose descendant erected on Lansdown, near Bath, a monument in commemoration of the event. The village is situated at the foot of a rocky hill rising to the height of more than 200 feet, and consisting of alternate beds of limestone and petrosilex. The parish, which comprises about 2000 acres, abounds with coal, raised in great quantities; and lead-ore is also found. The living is united, with that of Westerleigh, to the vicarage of Puckle-Church. Henry Burrow, in 1718, bequeathed £500 for charitable uses, of which £9 per annum are applied in aid of a school. There is a camp, supposed to be of British origin; and several Roman coins, urns, and bricks, have been dug up in the parish, which abounds with antique remains and natural curiosities.

WICK (St. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of AXBRIDGE, hundred of WINTERSTOKE, E. division of SOMERSET, 8½ miles (N. N. W.) from Axbridge; containing 347 inhabitants. It is on the shore of the Bristol Channel. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Congressbury, to which the church was formerly a chapel of ease.

WICK, with WALTON, a tything, in the parish of DOWNTON, union of ALDERBURY, hundred of DOWNTON, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTS; containing 285 inhabitants.

The parish comprises 2433 acres, of which 187 are common or waste land. Courts leet and baron are held annually; and there is a fair for cattle on May 20th. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 2. $8\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £578; patron, W. Rashleigh, Esq. The village, which is on the road from London to Gosport, is remarkable as the birthplace, in 1324, of the distinguished and munificent prelate, William of Wykeham; and as the residence of Dr. Joseph Warton, the poet, who died here in 1800.

WICKHAM, BISHOP'S, a parish, in the union of WITHAM, hundred of THURSTABLE, N. division of ESSEX, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Witham; containing 544 inhabitants. The parish derives the affix to its name from the appropriation of the manor to the bishops of London, who had formerly a palace here. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 3. 4., and in the gift of the Bishop: the tithes have been commuted for £450, and the glebe comprises 80 acres. The church is a small ancient edifice, with a belfry turret of wood.

WICKHAM, CHILDS (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of EVESHAM, Lower division of the hundred of KIFTSGATE, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Chipping-Campden; containing, with the hamlet of Mircott, 469 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 1860 acres of land, of which the soil is principally clay, and the surface flat. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 16. 10.; net income, £105; patron and incumbent, the Rev. H. Pruen; impropiator, Sir T. Phillips, Bart. The tithes were commuted for land in 1763; the glebe comprises about 75 acres.

WICKHAM, EAST (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of DARTFORD, hundred of LESSNESS, lathe of SUTTON-AT-HONE, W. division of KENT, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Crayford; containing 555 inhabitants. It comprises 2310*a.* 8*p.*, of which 890 acres are arable, 936 meadow, 111 pasture, and 294 wood. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Plumstead. Part of the lands and tithes of the parish was given by the famous admiral, Sir John Hawkins, in the reign of Elizabeth, to the hospital for distressed mariners founded by him at Chatham, to which they still belong. William Forster, in 1727, assigned land in trust, among other purposes, to erect and endow a school, of which the income is £68.

WICKHAM-MARKET (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of PLOMESGATE, hundred of WILFORD, E. division of SUFFOLK, $12\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Ipswich; containing 1400 inhabitants. The village occupies an elevated site, rising from the river Deben, and, as its name implies, was formerly a market-town; it had also a shire-hall, where sessions were usually held, but the building was, a few years since, taken down by the lord of the manor. The road from London to Yarmouth passes through the town. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 16. 8., and has a net income of £208; it is in the patronage of the Crown, and the impropriation belongs to Pemberton's charity at Ipswich. There is a glebe of 32 acres. The church, situated on an eminence commanding a most extensive prospect, is partly in the decorated and partly in the later English style, with an octagonal tower surmounted by a lofty spire, which forms a conspicuous landmark. There is a place of worship for Independents. The old town lands consist of 17 acres, the bequests of several individuals, and the new lands of 23 acres, purchased with a bequest of £300 by Anne Roberts, in 1730, for teaching children; these lands produce £107 per annum, of which two-tenths are appropriated to a school, one-tenth to the apprenticing of children, two-tenths to the repairs of the church, and the residue to the poor. A workhouse for Plomesgate hundred has lately been erected here: the union comprises forty parishes or places, and contains a population of 21,051. Mr. John Kirby, compiler of The Suffolk Traveller, was for some time resident in the parish.

WICKHAM ST. PAUL (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of SUDBURY, hundred of HINCKFORD, N. division of ESSEX, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Halstead; containing 476 inhabitants. The parish is about six miles in circumference; the soil is light, but very fertile in some parts. The village is pleasantly situated, and consists of neat well-built houses, ranged round an extensive green. The living is a rectory, in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, London, valued in the king's books at £9: the tithes have been commuted for £400, and the glebe comprises 20 acres. The church is a neat substantial edifice, with a square embattled tower. The rent of a field of 4 acres, amounting to £11. 10., is given to the poor.

WICKHAM-SKEITH (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union and hundred of HARTISMERE, W. division of SUFFOLK, 2 miles (N. N. W.) from Thwaite; containing 574 inhabitants. It comprises 1768*a.* 2*p.*, of which about 35 acres are roads and waste, and the remainder arable and pasture land in good cultivation. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 8. $1\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of Mrs. Garrard; impropiators, the Landowners. The great tithes have been commuted for £422, and the vicarial for £129. 10.; the glebe comprises 10 acres. The church is a handsome structure, chiefly in the later English style, with a square embattled tower, and a north and south porch.

WICKHAM, WEST (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of LINTON, hundred of CHILFORD, county of CAMBRIDGE, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Linton; containing 572 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £88; patron and impropiator, the Earl of Hardwicke. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1812.

WICKHAM, WEST (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of BROMLEY, hundred of RUXLEY, lathe of SUTTON-AT-HONE, W. division of KENT, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Bromley; containing 651 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2645*a.* 2*r.* 6*p.*; the soil is generally chalk, alternated with gravel and clay; the surface is undulated, and in some parts level, and the scenery is varied. The old manor-house is a quadrangular structure, with towers at the angles. The village was formerly a market-town: a fair for cattle is still held, on Easter-Monday. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 10. 10., and in the patronage of Sir Charles Francis Farnaby, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £495, and the glebe comprises 37 acres, with a house. The church is an ancient structure in the later English style; the chancel windows are beautifully ornamented with stained glass. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. The learned Gilbert West, the friend of Gray, the poet, long resided in the village, where he was visited by Lyttelton and Pitt; he was the author of Poems and Observations on the Resurrection, and translated some of the Odes of Pindar; he was buried here in 1756.

WICKHAMBREUX (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of BRIDGE, hundred of DOWNHAMFORD, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, E. division of KENT, 5 miles (E. by N.) from Canterbury; containing 517 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £29. 12. 6., and in the gift of J. P. Plumtree, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £749. 11., and the glebe comprises 20½ acres. The Rev. John Smith, B.D., in 1756, gave a house and schoolroom for the education of children.

WICKHAMBROOK (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union and hundred of RISBRIDGE, W. division of SUFFOLK, 10 miles (S. E.) from Newmarket; containing 1623 inhabitants. It comprises 4348*a. 2r. 28p.*, of which 130 acres are common or waste. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 6. 10½., and in the patronage of the Crown; impropriator, N. W. Bromley, Esq. The great tithes have been commuted for £52. 15., and the vicarial for £350; the glebe comprises 6 acres. The church is a large and handsome building, containing some good monuments. There is a place of worship for Independents. Mrs. Anne Warner, in 1785, left £400 three per cent. reduced annuities, the dividends of which, together with the rental of the poor's estate and some other bequests, altogether amounting to £30 per annum, are distributed among the poor; and Elizabeth Chinery, by will in 1818, gave £250 three per cents., directing the dividends to be applied to purchasing linen. Some Roman remains have been found.

WICKHAMFORD (ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of EVESHAM, Upper division of the hundred of BLACKENHURST, Pershore and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 2¼ miles (E. S. E.) from Evesham; containing 123 inhabitants. The parish is in the south-eastern part of the county, on the border of Gloucestershire, and consists of 1203*a. 2r.* The living is a discharged perpetual curacy, valued in the king's books at £2. 4. 4½., and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford, the appropriators, whose tithes have been commuted for £234, and £40 are payable to the incumbent. Limestone is obtained in abundance in the neighbourhood.

WICKHAMPTON (ST. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of BLOFIELD, hundred of WALSHAM, E. division of NORFOLK, 4½ miles (S. S. E.) from Acle; containing 139 inhabitants. The railway from Norwich to Yarmouth passes through the parish. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £4, and in the patronage of J. F. Leathes, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £193. 4. 2. The church is an ancient structure in the early and decorated English styles, with a square embattled tower; in the chancel, under richly-decorated arches, are the effigies of Sir William de Gerbridge and his lady. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WICKLEWOOD, a parish, in the incorporation and hundred of FOREHOE, E. division of NORFOLK, 3 miles (W. N. W.) from Wymondham; containing 775 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1500 acres, of which about 20 are water, forming a lake. A market and two fairs, granted by Henry VI., were formerly held here. The living comprises the discharged vicarages of All Saints and St. Andrew, valued in the king's books at £6. 3. 11½., and having a net income of £127; the patronage and impropriation belong to Mrs. Macauley, Mrs. Elizabeth Darby, and Mrs. Mary Kett. The church of All Saints is in the later English style, with a square embattled tower: that of St. Andrew stood in the same churchyard. There is a place of worship for Independents.

At the inclosure, 14 acres of land were allotted to the poor for fuel. The workhouse for the hundred is in the parish.

WICKMERE, a parish, in the union of AYLESHAM, hundred of SOUTH ERPINGHAM, E. division of NORFOLK, 5 miles (N. N. W.) from Aylsham; containing 307 inhabitants. It comprises about 1000 acres, of which 763 are arable, 191 meadow and pasture, and the remainder roads and waste. The living is a discharged rectory, annexed to that of Wolterton, and valued in the king's books at £9; the glebe comprises 37 acres. The church is a handsome structure in the decorated English style, with a circular embattled tower.

WICKTON, a township, in the parish of STOKEPRIOR, union of LEOMINSTER, hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD, 4½ miles (S. E.) from Leominster; containing 72 inhabitants.

WICKWAR (HOLY TRINITY), a market-town and parish, in the union of CHIPPING-SODBURY, Upper division of the hundred of GRUMBALD'S-ASH, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 24 miles (S. S. W.) from Gloucester, and 111 (W.) from London; containing 1125 inhabitants. This town, which consists principally of one spacious and well-built street, is pleasantly situated on the nearest and best road from Bath to Gloucester and the north of England, and is watered by two small streams; the surrounding scenery is highly picturesque, and the air proverbially pure and salubrious. Great improvements have taken place; a new road has been formed to Wotton-under-Edge, by which the distance to that place has been shortened two miles, and the railway from Bristol to Gloucester passes through the parish. The clothing trade was formerly carried on to a considerable extent, but has for some time been discontinued. The market is on Monday; and fairs take place on April 6th and July 2nd, for horses and horned cattle. The town, under a charter granted by Charles I., is governed by a mayor and an indefinite number of aldermen, consisting of all who have served the office of mayor: a manorial court leet is held triennially, in October. The parish comprises by measurement 2307 acres, of which about one-third is arable, and the remainder meadow and pasture; the soil is a stone brash, alternated with clay. An act for inclosing waste lands was passed in 1838. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £18, and in the gift of Lord Ducie: the tithes have been commuted for £430, and the glebe comprises 14½ acres. The church is a spacious structure in the later English style, with a lofty square embattled tower, and contains 436 sittings. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans; also a free school founded in 1683, by Alexander Hosea, a native of the town, who endowed it with property now producing £126 per annum.

WICKWICK, a hamlet, in the parish of FRAMPTON-COTTERELL, union of CHIPPING-SODBURY, Upper division of the hundred of LANGLEY and SWINEHEAD, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER; containing 33 inhabitants.

WIDCOMBE (ST. THOMAS à BECKET), with LYNCOMBE, a parish, in the union of BATH, hundred of BATH-FORUM, E. division of SOMERSET, 1½ mile (S. E. by E.) from Bath; containing 9920 inhabitants. The manufacture of fine woollen-cloth is carried on to a considerable extent: a fair is held on May 14th. The living is a vicarage, annexed to the rectory of St. Peter and St. Paul, Bath: the impropriate and vicarial tithes have been commuted for £260 each. At Holloway, in the parish, John Cantlow, prior of Bath, towards the close of the fifteenth century, erected a small chapel, in honour of St. Mary Magdalene; and adjoining it an hospital for lunatics, which was rebuilt in 1761.

WIDCOMBE, a tything, in the parish of CHEWTON-MENDIP, union of CLUTTON, hundred of CHEWTON, E. division of SOMERSET, 5 miles (S. W. by S.) from Pensford; containing 145 inhabitants. It comprises 705 acres, of which 39 are common or waste. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £35, and the impropriate for £30.

WIDDINGTON (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of SAFFRON-WALDEN, hundred of UTTLESFORD, N. division of ESSEX, 8 miles (N. N. E.) from Bishop-Stortford; containing 377 inhabitants. It comprises 2087*a.* 2*r.* 37*p.*, of which 1375 acres are arable, 337 pasture, and 248 woodland. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £25, and in the gift of W. J. Campbell, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £570, and the glebe comprises 42 acres. The church, a small ancient edifice of stone, partly rebuilt with brick, retains several details of the Norman style.

WIDDINGTON, a township, in the parish of LITTLE OUSEBURN, Upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, W. riding of YORK, 8¼ miles (S. E. by E.) from Borough-bridge; containing 25 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Ouse, which here passes on the north and east; and comprises about 694 acres of land, set out in four farms.

WIDDRINGTON, a parochial chapelry, in the union, and E. division of the ward, of MORPETH, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 8 miles (N. E. by N.) from Morpeth; containing 447 inhabitants. This place was long the seat of the family of Widdrington, of whom many have at various periods greatly distinguished themselves against the Scots, and on other occasions. Sir William Widdrington, in 1642, was expelled from the house of commons for raising forces in defence of Charles I., by whom he was, in the following year, elevated to the dignity of baron; after the battle of Marston Moor, he left the kingdom, when his estates were confiscated by the parliament, but returning in the service of Charles II., he was slain at the conflict of Wigan. William, 4th lord Widdrington, was attainted in 1715, for his share in the rebellion of that year, and his property, to the amount of £100,000, was sold for the public advantage; thus consummating the downfall of a family that had flourished during a space of seven centuries. The ancient castle, which stood in a noble park of 600 acres, was razed to the ground about 60 years since, and the present edifice was built upon its site, but is much out of repair, and now uninhabited.

The district was separated from the parish of Woodhorn, and invested with distinct parochial rights, in 1768; it chiefly belongs to Lord Vernon, and comprises 4902*a.* 1*r.* 30*p.*, mostly tithe-free, and of which a fifth is pasture land. The soil is a strong clay, producing fine crops of wheat and beans, and the surface is generally level, with a gentle elevation towards the village, which commands extensive views in every direction, and the vicinity of which formerly abounded in wood: on the east is the sea. A small colliery is in operation, and there is a quarry of freestone. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the gift of Lord Vernon, with a net income of £67; the impropriation belongs to the Mercers' Company, and the incumbent of Hampstead, London. The chapel so early as 1307 had parochial limits, and was dedicated to St. Edmund, and at the time of the Dissolution, it was called Holy Trinity chapel, from which period until 1768 it continued dependent on Woodhorn; the edifice was repaired by Sir George Warren in 1768, and comprises a nave, chancel, and south aisle, of which the chancel has an oratory or chantry porch projecting from it on the south, lighted by two windows. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians; and a school is supported by Lord Vernon and others. In May 1843, a skeleton, having the teeth perfect, and an urn, were found in ploughing a field.

WIDCOMBE-IN-THE-MOOR (St. Pancras), a parish, in the union of NEWTON-ABBOTT, and forming, with the parish of Buckland-in-the-Moor, a detached portion of the hundred of HAYTOR, locally in that of LIFTON, Teinbridge and S. divisions of DEVON, 5¾ miles (N. W. by N.) from Ashburton; containing 1106 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the west and south by the river Dart, and comprises about 12,800 acres, of which one-half is open common; the soil is light and sandy, and the district is more adapted to the rearing of live-stock than to the purposes of agriculture. The surface is varied, and consists of several valleys on the borders of Dartmoor, inclosed with rugged hills, and watered by three tributary streams which flow into the river Dart. Tin has been found, and there are remains of ancient stream-works of considerable extent; granite is also abundant on the commons. Many of the inhabitants are employed in weaving serges at their own dwellings. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £25. 13. 9.; net income, £268; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Exeter. The church was greatly injured by lightning during the performance of divine service, on Oct. 21st, 1638, when portions of the stone and wood work fell in. There are places of worship for Calvinists and Wesleyans. The last Lord Ashburton of the Dunning family, and the late Gilbert Dyer of Exeter, who collected the most extensive library in the west of England, were natives of the parish.

WIDFORD (St. Mary), a parish, in the union and hundred of CHELMSFORD, S. division of ESSEX, 1½ mile (S. W.) from Chelmsford; containing 362 inhabitants. This parish, supposed to have derived its name from a ford over the river Chelmer, comprises 690*a.* 3*r.* 29*p.*; the soil is rich, and around the village the lands are in a high state of cultivation. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8, and in the gift of the incumbent, the Rev. W. Warner: the tithes have been commuted for £250, and the glebe comprises 20 acres. The church is a small ancient edifice, partly in the early and partly in the decorated English style, situated on the west side of the road from London to Chelmsford.

WIDFORD (St. Oswald), a parish, in the union of WITNEY, Lower division of the hundred of SLAUGHTER, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 1½ mile (E. S. E.) from Burford; containing 45 inhabitants. The parish comprises 564 acres, including 98 common or waste, and is entirely surrounded by the county of Oxford, to which it has been united as regards parliamentary representation. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £3. 14. 2., and in the gift of Lord Redesdale: the tithes have been commuted for £86.

WIDFORD (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of WARE, hundred of BRAUGHIN, county of HERTFORD, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Ware; containing 539 inhabitants, and comprising by measurement 1150 acres. A pleasure-fair is held about the middle of June. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 13. 4., and in the gift of W. P. Hamond, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £290, and the glebe comprises 27 acres. The church has a square embattled tower, with a tall slender spire, and occupies a considerable eminence. There is a rent-charge of £5, applied for teaching three boys; and $13\frac{1}{2}$ acres of land, by an unknown benefactor, producing £18 per annum, and £370 in the $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cents., producing £13 per annum, by Mrs. Mason, have been bequeathed for distribution among the poor.

WIDLEY (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of FAREHAM, hundred of PORTSDOWN, Fareham and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Fareham; containing, with part of the hamlet of Potwell, 607 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1106 acres, of which 59 are common or waste; a very considerable portion is woodland, abounding with timber of stately growth; the soil is fertile, resting on a substratum of chalk, of which there are several pits. The living is a rectory with the vicarage of Wymering annexed, valued in the king's books at £14. 11. $10\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £678; patron, T. Thistlethwaite, Esq. The tithes of Widley have been commuted for £250, and the glebe comprises 11 acres. The church has been enlarged.

WIDMER-POOL (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of BINGHAM, S. division of the wapentake of RUSHCLIFFE and of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 9 miles (S. S. E.) from Nottingham; containing 182 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 2000 acres: the village, situated on the road from Melton to Nottingham, almost equidistant from those towns, has been almost entirely rebuilt, and has a handsome appearance. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 16. $0\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £232; patron, F. Robinson, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land in 1803; the glebe comprises 450 acres. The church, an ancient structure, was, with the exception of the tower and spire, rebuilt in 1831: it was soon afterwards injured by lightning, which damaged the spire and part of the tower, with the roof; but was in 1836 restored, except the spire, by the patron, aided by a grant of £300 from the Incorporated Society. There is a place of worship for Baptists. The parish is bounded on the west by the old Fosse-road; and several Roman coins have been found, among which are a silver one of Adrian, and a copper coin of Claudius.

WIDNESS, with APPLETON, a township, in the parish and union of PRESCOT, hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Warrington; containing 2209 inhabitants. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £160, and the impropriate for £243. 5. 11., payable to King's College, Cambridge.

WIDWORTHY (St. CUTHBERT), a parish, in the union of HONITON, hundred of COLYTON, Honiton and S. divisions of DEVON, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Honiton; containing 257 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Honiton to Axminster, and comprises 1407 acres, of which 205 are common or waste; freestone of good quality for building is quarried, and chalk is burnt into lime for manure. A fair is held at Wilmington on the morrow of St. Matthew's-day. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 16. $0\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the family of Elton: the tithes have been commuted for £200, and the glebe comprises 31 acres. The church, an ancient structure, contains the effigy of a knight in armour, and a fine monument, by Bacon, to the memory of James Marwood, Esq., a liberal benefactor to the parish. Benedictus Marwood, Esq., in 1742, gave £100, and the Rev. Joseph Somaster, in 1770, left £50, to be applied to education; and the latter also left £50, directing the proceeds to be distributed in bread among the poor. In 1831, the Rev. W. J. Tucker, then rector, gave £200 to his successor for similar purposes. Near the church is an old earthwork, and in the north-east part of the parish are vestiges of an ancient intrenchment.

WIELD (St. JAMES), a parish, in the union of ALTON, hundred of FAWLEY, Alton and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 6 miles (W.) from Alton; containing 278 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £64; patron and impropiator, the Earl of Portsmouth. The church is very ancient, and contains a marble monument to Sir Richard Wallop, an ancestor of the earls of Portsmouth.

WIGAN (ALL SAINTS), a parish, borough, and market-town (which has separate jurisdiction), and the head of a union, chiefly in the hundred of WEST DERBY, but partly in the hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER; containing, with the chapeltries of Billinge, Haigh, Hindley, Pemberton, and Upholland, and the townships of Abram, Aspull, Billinge Higher End, Dalton, Ince-in-Makerfield, Orrell, and Winstanley, 51,988 inhabitants, of whom 25,517 are in the town, 18 miles (W. N. W.) from Manchester, and 199 (N. W. by N.) from London. This place is stated by Camden to have been originally called Wibigin. The vicinity is said to have been the scene of some sanguinary battles between the Britons, under their renowned King Arthur, and the Saxons; and the discovery, about the middle of the 18th century, of a large quantity of human bones, and the bones and shoes of horses, over an extensive tract of ground near the town, tends to confirm this opinion. During the great civil war, several battles were fought here by the contending parties, it being the principal station of the king's troops commanded by the Earl of Derby, who was defeated and driven from the town by the parliamentary forces under Sir John Smeaton, early in 1643; and shortly afterwards, in the same year, he was again defeated by Colonel Ashton, who, in consequence of the devotion of the inhabitants to the royal cause, ordered the fortifications of the town to be demolished. From this time Wigan remained tranquil (with the exception of Oliver Cromwell pursuing through it, in 1648, the Scottish army under the Duke of Hamilton, whom he had driven from Preston) until 1651, when the Earl of Derby, having been summoned from the Isle of Man by King Charles II., was again defeated here by a very superior force under Colonel Lilburne. To record the courage and loyalty of Sir Thomas Tildesley, who was slain in this action, a monumental pillar was erected in 1679, by Alexander Rigby, Esq., then high sheriff of the county, on the spot where he fell, at the northern end of the town. In the year 1745, Prince Charles Edward marched through Wigan on his route from Preston to Manchester.

The town is situated on the eastern bank, and near the source, of the river Douglas, and is described by Leland as "a paved town, as big as Warrington, but better builded;" a patent for paving it, and building a bridge over the Douglas, having been granted so early as the 7th of Edward III. The old and greater part of the town consists of irregular streets and mean houses, but many improvements have been made, and two new streets formed, which contain some well-built houses. It is lighted with gas by a company established in 1823, and supplied with water by a company formed under the authority of an act in 1761. The manufacture of calicoes, fustians, and other cotton goods, linens, and checks, and the spinning of cotton-yarn, are extensively carried on; and there are brass and iron foundries, pewter-works, several manufactories for spades and edge-tools, and some corn-mills, on the river. The Douglas, under the authority of an act obtained in 1720, was made navigable to its junction with the Ribble. The Leeds and Liverpool canal passes the town, and by its branches and various communications with Manchester and Kendal on one side, and the North Sea on the other, affords every facility for the conveyance of the manufactures, and of the coal abounding in the neighbourhood, among which is cannel coal. A branch from the Liverpool and Manchester railway, seven miles long, has been formed from Newton to this town, and a line, 17 miles in length, to Preston, has also been recently completed: the Wigan station, comprising offices and waiting-rooms, and all the requisite accommodations for passengers, is a handsome building with a colonnade of the Doric order. A bridge of cast-iron beams, 46 feet long and 36 feet wide, supported on fluted columns of the Doric order, carries the railway over Walgate. The market is on Monday and Friday, that on the latter day being the principal; and there are fairs on Holy-Thursday, June 27th, and Oct. 28th, on which days the commercial hall, a commodious brick building in the market-place, erected in 1816, is open for the use of clothiers.

The first charter of INCORPORATION was granted by Henry III., and the privileges it bestowed were confirmed and augmented by succeeding monarchs; but that under which the corporation acted, previously to the passing of the Municipal act, was conferred by Charles II. The corporation now consists of a mayor, 10 aldermen, and 30 councillors, under the act; the borough is divided into five wards; the municipal and parliamentary boundaries are co-extensive with the township, and the number of magistrates is 21. An act for the recovery of small debts was passed in 1841. The borough first sent members to parliament in the 23rd of Edward I., and again in the 35th of the same reign, after which period the privilege was not exercised until the 1st of Edward VI.; the mayor is returning officer. The corporation are authorized by their charter to try all civil actions, and hold a court of sessions quarterly for felonies not capital, committed within the borough; and petty-sessions for the Warrington division of the hundred take place here. The town-hall was rebuilt in 1720, by the Earl of Barrymore and Sir Roger Bradshaigh, then members for the borough. The gaol is used only for temporary confinement, prisoners being committed to the county gaol.

The parish comprises 26,262 acres, of which 2161 are in the township of Wigan; and of these latter 109 are arable, and 2052 meadow and pasture. The LIVING is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £80. 13. 4.; net income, £3000; patron, the Earl of Bradford. The parochial church is an ancient and handsome edifice. St. George's was erected as a chapel of ease, in 1781, but is now a district church: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £150; alternate patrons, the Owners of pews and the Rector. A church, of which the first stone was laid on the 6th of April, 1840, has been completed at Scholes, at an expense of £3225, raised by subscription, aided by grant from Her Majesty's Commissioners; it is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a tower and spire, and contains 1113 sittings, of which 459 are free. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Roman Catholics, Presbyterians, and Wesleyans; also Roman Catholic chapels at Ashton-in-the-Willows, Brinn, and Writington Hall, in the vicinity. The free grammar school, at Millgate, appears to have been founded in the 16th year of the reign of James I., and the earliest recorded benefaction to it is one of £6. 13. 4. per annum, in 1619, by James Leigh. A considerable increase in the income having arisen from various subsequent donations, an act of parliament was passed in 1812, incorporating fifteen members of the corporation governors of the institution, who appoint a master and an usher; the number of scholars is limited to eighty, and the income exceeds £200 per annum. A Blue-coat school, wherein 40 boys were clothed and instructed, was established in 1773, but a building for a national school having been erected in 1825, the former has been united to it. Schools for children of Roman Catholics are supported by subscription; and there are many bequests for the poor, amounting in the aggregate to a considerable sum. The union of Wigan comprises 20 townships or chapelries, and contains a population of 66,032. A spring was discovered near Scholes Bridge, some years since, the water of which possessed nearly the same medicinal properties as that at Harrogate; and a handsome building was erected for the convenience of persons who wished to drink, or use it for a bath; but it has ceased to be resorted to, the water having lost much of its medicinal virtue, owing, it is supposed, to its being mixed with that of neighbouring coal-pits.

WIGBOROUGH, GREAT (ST. STEPHEN), a parish, in the union of LEXDEN and WINSTREE, hundred of WINSTREE, N. division of ESSEX, 7 miles (S. S. W.) from Colchester; containing 479 inhabitants. This place, which is bounded on the south by a creek of the river Blackwater, called the Verley, was the scene of a great battle, probably with the northern pirates, to whose incursions it was, from its situation, peculiarly exposed; and near the church is a large tumulus, supposed to have been raised over the bodies of those who were slain on that occasion. The parish comprises 2585*a.* 3*r.* 34*p.*, of which 2450 acres are under cultivation, 35 roads and waste, and 100 covered at high water. The village, situated on the road from Maldon to Colchester, was formerly of much greater importance, as is evident from several green lanes still retaining the appellation of streets; and there were once extensive salt-works in the immediate neighbourhood, from which circumstance the hamlet where they were carried on is called Salcot-Wigborough, where a fair is held on the 24th of August. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £18. 17. 6.; net income, £591; patrons, H. Bewes, Esq., and the Rev. William Fookes. The church is on a considerable eminence, commanding extensive views of the sea and adjacent country. There is a place of worship for Independents.

WIGBOROUGH, LITTLE (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of LEXDEN and WINSTREE, hundred of WINSTREE, N. division of ESSEX, 7 $\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Colchester; containing 114 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1157 acres of land in good cultivation, with the exception of 133 acres common or waste, and is bounded on the north by a creek of the river Blackwater, called Mersey channel, and on the south by another called Verley channel. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £10, and in the gift of the Governors of the Charter-house, London: the tithes have been commuted for £220, and the glebe comprises 20 acres. The church is a small ancient edifice with a square tower, romantically situated on the sea-shore.

WIGGENHALL (St. GERMAN'S), a parish, in the union of DOWNHAM, hundred of FREEBRIDGE-MARSHLAND, W. division of NORFOLK, 4 $\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Lynn; containing 625 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the Great Ouse river, and comprises 1275*a.* 1*r.* 34*p.*, of which 543 acres are arable, and 677 meadow and pasture. The surface is flat; a considerable portion lies below high-water mark, and some on a level with the bed of the river, which is confined by lofty banks. The course of the Ouse has been diverted into a new channel, called the Eau-Brink cut, and in several parts, where it was greatly curved, was straightened in 1835, under the direction of commissioners. The village, which is large, is divided by the river into two portions, connected with each other by a bridge of wood. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6, and in the gift of the appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Norwich: the great tithes have been commuted for £281. 5., and the vicarial for £133. 15.; the appropriate glebe comprises 29 acres, and the vicarial 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres, with a house. The church, situated on the east bank of the Ouse, is chiefly in the later English style, with a square embattled tower. There are places of worship for Primitive Methodists and Wesleyans. In this parish was Fitton, the ancient seat of the Howards, afterwards dukes of Norfolk.

WIGGENHALL (St. MARY THE VIRGIN), a parish, in the union of DOWNHAM, hundred of FREEBRIDGE-

MARSHLAND, W. division of NORFOLK, 5 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Lynn; containing 292 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the west by the river Ouse, and comprises 2807*a.* 1*r.* 22*p.*, of which 1043 acres are arable, 1649 meadow and pasture, 5 woodland, and 107 roads, drains, and waste. The village consists of scattered houses, and on the opposite bank of the Eau-Brink cut is the hamlet of Saddle-Bow. The gateway of the ancient Hall, built by the Kerville family, is still remaining. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12. 10., and in the patronage of the Crown: the great tithes have been commuted for £380, and the vicarial for £92. 14.; the glebe comprises 4 acres, with a house, built by the Rev. R. T. Powell. The church is a stately structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower; the nave is lighted by a range of clerestory windows, and there are a fine brass eagle, and an altar-tomb bearing the arms of the Kervilles and Plowdens, with the effigies of a knight in armour, his lady, and two children. Here is a place of worship for Primitive Methodists. The Rev. Robert Eden, rector of Leigh, near Rochford, having bought two farms in Wiggenhall St. Mary, of which he also purchased the impropriate tithes, amounting to £70 per annum, assigned the latter to the vicarage of this parish, in 1842. Hatton Berners, who signed the warrant for the decapitation of Charles I., was buried here.

WIGGENHALL (St. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish, in the union of DOWNHAM, hundred of FREEBRIDGE-MARSHLAND, W. division of NORFOLK, 5 miles (N.) from Downham; containing 775 inhabitants. This place is situated on the Great Ouse river, on the west bank of which was an ancient hermitage dedicated to St. John the Evangelist, which, in 1181, was appropriated by the prior and convent of Reynham, to nuns of the order of St. Augustine, and made subordinate to the monastery of Castle-Acre; it flourished till the Dissolution, when its revenue was valued at £31. 16. 7. The parish comprises 4248*a.* 1*r.* 23*p.*, of which 3198 acres are arable, 738 meadow and pasture, and 128 roads, drains, and water: an act was passed in 1813, for draining and improving the fen lands. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 15. 10., and in the gift of Mrs. Tompson: the great tithes have been commuted for £538. 8., and the vicarial for £253; the glebe comprises 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church is in the later English style, with a square embattled tower; the chancel is separated from the nave by a carved screen, and on the south side are three sedilia of stone. There are places of worship for Baptists and Primitive Methodists.

WIGGENHALL (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of DOWNHAM, hundred of FREEBRIDGE-MARSHLAND, W. division of NORFOLK, 5 miles (S. by W.) from Lynn; containing 112 inhabitants. It is intersected by the Ouse, and comprises 958*a.* 8*p.*, of which 466 acres are arable, 419 meadow and pasture, and 63 roads, drains, and river. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6, and in the patronage of the Crown; impropriator, J. Hall, Esq. The great tithes have been commuted for £152. 10., and the vicarial for £130; the glebe contains 2 acres, with a cottage. The church, which is situated on the east bank of the river, is in the later English style, with a square embattled tower; the south aisle was taken down in 1841.

WIGGESLEY, a hamlet, in the parish of THORNEY, union, and N. division of the wapentake, of NEWARK, S. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Tuxford; containing 92 inhabitants. The tithes were commuted for land in 1813.

WIGGINTHORPE, a hamlet, in the parish of TERRINGTON, union of MALTON, wapentake of BULMER, N. riding of YORK, 9 miles (W.) from Malton; containing 28 inhabitants. It is about a mile north of Terrington.

WIGGINTON (St. BARTHOLOMEW), a parish, in the union of BERKHAMPSTEAD, hundred of DACORUM, county of HERTFORD, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (S. E.) from Tring; containing 635 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1662 acres, of which 294 are waste: the London and Birmingham railway passes to the north-east of the church. Here is an extensive common, which, according to tradition, was the scene of military achievements, not only during the parliamentary war, but even in the time of the Romans; and in support of the opinion, an almost perfect specimen of a Roman camp may still be distinctly traced. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford (the appropriators), with a net income of £69: the tithes have been commuted for £340.

WIGGINTON (St. GILES), a parish, in the union of BANBURY, hundred of BLOXHAM, county of OXFORD, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Deddington; containing 310 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £17. 2. $8\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £290; patrons, the Principal and Fellows of Jesus' College, Oxford. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1795. To the south-east of the church are some vestiges of a Roman villa, extending over a considerable space: on digging here, an octagonal apartment, with a tessellated pavement, was discovered, and to the south-east of it, another of square form, with tesserae of coarse and imperfect character. These apartments were heated by flues under the floor, and some Roman coins were also found.

WIGGINTON, a chapelry, in the parish and union of TAMWORTH, S. division of the hundred of OFFLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N.) from Tamworth; containing, with the hamlets of Coton, Camberford, and Hopwas, 849 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £92; patron, the Vicar of Tamworth. The chapel, dedicated to St. Leonard, a neat structure of brick, was enlarged in 1830, by the addition of a north aisle. Thomas Barnes, in 1717, gave property, of the value of about £5 per annum, in support of a school: Mrs. Taylor and Mrs. Beardsley have bequeathed each £200, half the interest to be appropriated to the augmentation of the curate's stipend, and the other half to the poor.

WIGGINTON, a parish, in the wapentake of BULMER, union and N. riding of YORK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.) from York, on the road to Helmsley; containing 392 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 2040 acres, of which 1200 are arable, and 800 meadow and pasture; the surface is quite flat, and the soil composed in equal portions of a stiff clay and a fine sand. Here is Plainville, the seat of Col. Charles Smith, J.P. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £197. The church is a small and very ancient structure. A national school is supported by the rector.

WIGGLESWORTH, a township, in the parish of LONG PRESTON, union of SETTLE, wapentake of STAINCLIFFE WEST, W. riding of YORK, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Settle; containing 421 inhabitants. The township comprises 4089a. 2r. 2p., divided among several proprietors, of whom the principal is Earl de Grey, lord of the manor; the lands are chiefly arable and pasture, and the soil, though of various quality, is every where such as to encourage improvement. A rent-charge of £53. 17. 3. has been awarded as a commutation for the vicarial tithes, and one of £49. 19. 6., for the improper, payable to the Dean and Chapter of Christ-Church, Oxford. The free school was founded in 1789, by Lawrence Clark, who endowed it with £1136 three per cent. consols., for the instruction in the classics, and in English, of all the children of the township. There is a sulphureous spring, impregnated with iron.

WIGGONBY, a township, in the parish of AIKTON, union of WIGTON, ward and E. division of CUMBERLAND, $4\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. E.) from Wigton; containing 190 inhabitants. Margaret Hodgson, in 1792, left land now let for about £175 a year, in support of a school. Near Down Hall, within the township, is an encampment 60 yards square, planted with fir, and surrounded by a deep ditch.

WIGGONHOLT, a parish, in the hundred of WEST EASWORTH, rape of ARUNDEL, W. division of SUSSEX, 8 miles (N. N. E.) from Arundel; containing 36 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the west by the river Arun, and comprises about 800 acres, the greater portion of which is meadow and pasture; the soil varies from a loamy sand to a retentive clay; the surface, though generally level, is enlivened with a pleasing diversity of scenery. The road from Petworth to Brighton passes through the parish. The living is a rectory, with that of Greatham consolidated, valued in the king's books at £7. 4. $4\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the Hon. Robert Curzon: the tithes have been commuted for £102. 14., and the glebe comprises 9 acres. The church, which is small, was repewed and repaired in 1839, at the expense of the Hon. R. Curzon; the rectory-house was enlarged and altered in 1838 by the incumbent, and is now a spacious residence, in the Elizabethan style. A great number of Roman urns was found, in 1827, of red pottery, beautifully figured; but, from the unprotected situation in which they had been deposited, few of them are in a perfect state. Several coins of the emperors Nero, Vespasian, Claudius, Adrian, and Marcus Antoninus, were also discovered.

WIGHILL (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the W. division of AINSTY wapentake, W. riding of YORK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Tadcaster; containing 237 inhabitants. This parish is on the river Wharfe, and comprises about 1700 acres, of which 740 are arable, 920 meadow and pasture, and the remainder woodland, plantations, and roads. The surface is undulated, and the scenery rich, and agreeably diversified; the soil is various, in some parts clay, and in others sandy loam. Wighill Park, the seat of Edward York, Esq., is a handsome mansion, beautifully situated, and comprehending much interesting scenery. The living is a discharged vicarage, endowed with a portion of the rectorial tithes, and valued in the king's books at £5. 3. $6\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £114; patron and impropiator of the remainder of the rectorial tithes, R. F. Wilson, Esq., who is lord of the manor. The church, which is on an eminence rising from the margin of the Wharfe, is an ancient structure in the Norman style. The eastern part of the chancel has been fully repaired, and a convenient vestry built, within the last three years, at a cost of £333, by the vicar, the Rev. Thomas Jessop, D.D., to whose improvements the Archbishop of York contributed a handsome antique pulpit, which, together with the reading-desk, has been furnished, at an expense of £44, by Mr. York. The western portion of the chancel also, was completely repaired in 1842, at the cost of Mr. Wilson. Two day schools, and a Sunday school, are supported chiefly by Mr. York and Dr. Jessop.

WIGHT, ISLE OF.—See SOUTHAMPTON county.

WIGHTERING, SUSSEX.—See WITTERING.

WIGHTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of WALSINGHAM, hundred of NORTH GREENHOE, W. division of NORFOLK, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Little Walsingham; containing 559 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2932*a*. 14*p.*, of which 2558 acres are arable, 291 pasture, 44 wood, and 37 roads and waste; the surface is varied, and the river Stiffkey flows through the lands. The village is pleasantly situated on the road from Fakenham to Wells, and on the banks of the river are a flour-mill, and a mill for crushing bones for manure. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11. 11. 8.; patron and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Norwich. The great tithes have been commuted for £575, and the vicarial for £230. 10.; the glebe comprises 22 acres. The church is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower: in the churchyard are several ancient tombs. There are some remains of an intrenchment called Crabb's Castle; and, in digging the foundations for the parsonage-house, some skeletons and cannon-balls were discovered.

WIGLAND, a township, in the parish of MALPAS, union of WREXHAM, Higher division of the hundred of BROXTON, S. division of the county of CHESTER, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S. S. E.) from Malpas; containing 240 inhabitants. At Dirtwich, in the township, are brine-springs, from which salt is made: in 1643, the works were destroyed by a detachment of the parliamentary army, but they were soon restored. The tithes have been commuted for £60.

WIGLEY, a tything, in the parish of ELING, union of NEW FOREST, hundred of THORNGATE, Romsey and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 115 inhabitants.

WIGMORE (ST. JAMES), a parish, in the union of LUDLOW, hundred of WIGMORE, county of HEREFORD, 10 miles (N. W. by N.) from Leominster; containing, with the township of Limebrook, 506 inhabitants, of whom 328 are in Wigmore township. This parish, which gives name to the hundred, contains 3450 acres, and is crossed nearly at right angles by the roads from Leominster to Knighton, and from Ludlow to Presteign. Limestone abounds here, and it is supposed that coal may be obtained in the neighbourhood. A court leet is occasionally held; and there are fairs for cattle, sheep, &c., on May 6th and August 5th. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8; net income, £120; patron and appropriator, the Bishop of Hereford. On a commanding elevation, a little westward of the village, are the ivy-mantled ruins of Wigmore Castle, the outer works of which are the most perfect; the massive fragments of the keep occupy the summit of a lofty artificial mound, and present an appearance highly grand. The founder of this once stately edifice is unknown, but it is recorded that Edward the Elder caused it to be repaired. It was taken from Edric, Earl of Shrewsbury, by Ranulph de Mortimer, who came over with the Conqueror, and made it his principal seat. The same nobleman, in 1100, established in the parochial church a small college of three prebendaries, which continued till 1179, when his son Hugh founded, in honour of St. James, a noble abbey for monks of the order of St. Augustine, about one mile distant from the castle, and endowed it so amply that, at the Dissolution, its revenue was estimated at £302. 12. 3. An alien priory, a cell to that of Aveney, in Normandy, is said to have existed at an early period, at Limebrook; and a priory of nuns of the order of St. Augustine was founded there by the Mortimers, some time in the reign of Richard I., and at the suppression was valued at £23. 17. 8. In the neighbourhood are traces of several British encampments, all of which are attributed to Caractacus.

WIGSTHORPE, a hamlet, in the parish of LILFORD, union of OUNDLE, hundred of HUXLOE, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 4 miles (S. by E.) from Oundle; containing 97 inhabitants. Here was once a chapel.

WIGSTON MAGNA (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of BLABY, hundred of GUTHLAXTON, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Leicester; containing 2189 inhabitants. This parish was formerly designated Wigston-Two-Steeple, from its having two churches, one of which, now in a very dilapidated state, is used as a schoolroom. At a place called the Gaol Close, during the war in the reign of Charles I., a temporary prison was erected, to which the prisoners were removed from the county gaol at Leicester: the royal army lay in the vicinity some few days. The village is pleasantly situated on the road between Welford and Leicester, and is chiefly inhabited by persons employed in the manufacture of stockings. The Leicester canal runs through the parish, and an intermediate station on the Midland-Counties' railway has been established here. The parish comprises 2944*a*. 1*r*. 3*p.*; the soil is a strong marly loam, producing excellent wheat and beans, and there are large tracts of luxuriant meadow land. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 8. 9.; net income, £107; patrons, alternately, the Haberdashers' Company, and the Governors of Christ's Hospital, London. The tithes were commuted for land in 1764. There is a place of worship for Independents; also a lunatic asylum, and an hospital for six widows and as many widowers, the latter endowed with £3000 by Miss Clarke.

WIGSTON PARVA, a chapelry, in the parish of CLAYBROOKE, union of LUTTERWORTH, hundred of GUTHLAXTON, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Lutterworth; containing 74 inhabitants. The chapel is dedicated to St. Mary.

WIGTOFT (ST. PETER AND ST. PAUL), a parish, in the union of BOSTON, wapentake of KIRTON, parts of HOLLAND, county of LINCOLN, 11 miles (N.) from Spalding; containing 713 inhabitants. It comprises 5698*a*. 3*r*. 16*p.*, of which about one-half is arable, and the other pasture and meadow; the soil is a rich loam, and the lands are under good cultivation. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Quadring united, valued in the king's books at £11. 5.; net income, £412; patron, the Bishop of Lincoln; impropiator, G. Holland, Esq. The church is an ancient structure of various dates; the lower part of the tower is Norman, with a spire of later English, and the nave and chancel are in the decorated English style, with additions of a later period. A free school was endowed with land producing £56 per annum, by William Blisbury, in 1714; and there are lands worth £24 a year, belonging to the poor.

WIGTON (ST. MARY), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the ward and E. division of CUMBERLAND; containing, with the townships of Oulton, Waverton, and Woodside-Quarter, 6432 inhabitants, of whom 4738 are in the town, 11 miles (S. W. by W.) from Carlisle, and 305 (N. N. W.) from London. Of the early history of this place little is recorded: the barony was given by William de Meschines to Waldeof, Lord of Allerdale, and by him to Odoard, who lived about the period of the Norman Conquest, and assumed the name of De Wigton. The town was burnt by the Scots when they plundered the abbey of Holme-Cultram, in 1322; and during the civil war, in 1648, the van of the Duke of Hamilton's army was quartered here. It consists principally of one spacious street, with a narrower extending transversely at one end of it, containing some handsome well-built houses; it is pitched with pebbles, and supplied with water from wells, the property of individuals, and a public well and pump, erected near the centre of the town. There are a public subscription and a circulating library: races formerly took place in the month of August, but they have been discontinued. The principal articles of manufacture are checks, muslins, and ginghams, which are made to a considerable extent; and a large establishment for calico-printing and dyeing affords employment to many of the inhabitants. Coal is obtained within three miles, and copper-ore within five, of the town. A branch of the Maryport and Carlisle railway was opened to Wigton on May 3rd, 1843. The market-days are Tuesday and Friday, the former only for corn, of which a great quantity is pitched in the market-place. Fairs are held on Feb. 20th, a very large horse-fair; April 5th, for horned-cattle; and Dec. 21st, called Wallet fair, for cattle, butchers' meat, apples, and honey; and there are statute-fairs at Whitsuntide and Martinmas. The county magistrates hold a petty-session every month; and constables are appointed at the court leet and baron of the lord of the manor, which takes place in September.

The LIVING is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £17. 19. 0½.; net income, £162; patron, the Bishop of Carlisle; impropiators, the Landowners. The tithes were commuted for land in 1811. The church, which is said to have been originally erected by Odoard, with materials brought from a neighbouring Roman station called Old Carlisle, and subsequently belonged to the abbey of Holme-Cultram, was taken down in 1788, and the present edifice, a light and handsome building, erected on its site: attached to it is a library for the use of the clergy, presented by Dr. Bray. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, Wesleyans, and Roman Catholics. The free grammar school, at Market Hill, near the entrance of the town, was founded in 1730, by certain of the inhabitants: in 1787, the sum of £1000 three per cent. stock was bequeathed by John Allison to the school; and, in 1798, £355 by Thomas Tomlinson, Esq., who also left £100 for the establishment of a public library: the present income is about £68. The Rev. John Brown, D.D., author of the tragedy of Barbarossa, received his early education in the school. An hospital for six widows of beneficed clergymen or curates of two years' standing, was founded in 1725, by the Rev. John Tomlinson, who endowed it with a rent-charge of £45. 12., to which other benefactions have been added. The poor law union embraces 31 parishes or places, which contain a population of 23,366. About a mile south of Wigton, on an eminence, are the remains of the station Old Carlisle, where a great variety of antiquities has been dug up, consisting of coins, altars, statues, and inscriptions, which prove that the Ala Augusta was stationed here, in the reign of the Emperor Gordian. Ewan Clarke, the well-known Cumberland poet; Joseph Rooke, a distinguished mathematician and philosopher; R. Smirke, R.A., the celebrated historical painter; and Mr. George Barnes, professor of mathematics, were natives of the town.

WIGTON, a township, in the parish of HAREWOOD, Upper division of the wapentake of SKYRACK, W. riding of YORK, 5½ miles (N. by E.) from Leeds; containing 170 inhabitants. This township, including the hamlets of Brandon and Alwoodley-Gate, comprises about 1200 acres, of which the soil is fertile, and the land generally in good cultivation; the village is small, consisting of a few scattered houses, and the surrounding scenery is varied, and in some parts of romantic character. A school is partly supported by subscription. On Black Hill, near the village, urns and ancient coins have been found; and, in 1760, two stone coffins were discovered.

WIKE, county of YORK.—See WYKE.

WIKE, a township, partly in the parish of BARDSEY, but chiefly in that of HAREWOOD, Upper division of the wapentake of SKYRACK, W. riding of YORK, 6¼ miles (N. N. E.) from Leeds; containing 146 inhabitants. This township comprises about 1050 acres, in full cultivation; the surface is of pleasing character, and the village, though small, is neatly built, and of rural aspect. The tithes have been commuted for £110. 13. 6., of which £14. 3. 6. are payable to impropiators, £16. 2. 6. to the vicar of Thorner, £41. 7. to the vicar of Harewood, and £39. 0. 6. to the vicar of Bardsey. A school for the instruction of ten children is supported by an annuity paid to the master by the trustees of Lady Hastings' charity. In 1835, an earthen jar was dug up, containing silver pence of the reigns of Edward I. and II.

WILBARSTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of MARKET-HARBOROUGH, hundred of CORBY, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 4½ miles (S. W. by W.) from Rockingham; containing, with part of the hamlet of Pipewell, 684 inhabitants, of whom 626 are in the township of Wilbarston. The road from Harborough to Stamford intersects the parish, which comprises 2785 acres. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 17. 1.; net income, £187; patrons and impropiators, the family of Watson. There is a place of worship for Independents. Mrs. Catherine Palmer bequeathed £200, partly for educating girls of the parish, and £100 for employing the aged poor in spinning flax, &c.; and some other trifling bequests are distributed in bread and money.

WILBERFOSS (ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of POCKLINGTON, Wilton-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of YORK; containing, with the township of Newton-upon-Derwent, 586 inhabitants, of whom 357 are in the township of Wilberfoss, 8 miles (E.) from York. This place, from the time of the Conquest, was the property of the Wilberforce family, from which was descended the late William Wilberforce, the distinguished philanthropist; but the ancient family mansion and the estate were sold in 1710, and the lands are now divided among several proprietors, of whom Col. George Wyndham is lord of the manor. The parish, which is bounded on the east by the wolds, and partly, on the west, by the Derwent, comprises 2990 acres, of which 1350 are in the township of Wilberfoss; the surface is generally level, and the soil various, but principally a light sandy loam. Good stone for the roads is obtained. The village, which is neatly built, and of rural appearance, is situated on the road from York to Hull, and intersected by a stream called the Foss, which flows into the river Derwent; the inhabitants are chiefly employed in agriculture, and some in the handicraft trades requisite for the supply of the neighbourhood. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £67; patrons and impropriators, Colonel Wyndham, and three others. The church is an ancient structure in the early English style, with a square embattled tower, and was repewed in 1810. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists; also a parochial school for boys and girls, supported by the parents. The poor have nearly ten acres of land, partly allotted at the inclosure, and partly purchased with a bequest of £40 by Mr. John Horsley. A Benedictine nunnery, dedicated to St. Mary, was founded here by Alan de Cattan, prior to the year 1153, and at the Dissolution had a revenue of £28. 8. 8.

The church was erected in 1680, at the expense of Dr. Busby, head master of Westminster school, who endowed it with the rectorial tithes, and gave a library for the use of the vicar, who now receives a stipend in lieu of the rectorial tithes.

WILLENHALL, a chapelry, in the parish and union of WOLVERHAMPTON, S. division of the hundred of OFFLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, 3 miles (W.) from Walsall, on the road to Wolverhampton; containing 8695 inhabitants. This place, at the period of the Norman survey, was called Winehala, the Saxon term for victory, probably from the great battle fought near it in 911. The village began to thrive in the reign of Elizabeth, when, from the extensive mines of iron-stone and coal in the neighbourhood, the iron manufacture was first established here: at present it is noted for its collieries and its flourishing trade in locks, the latter of which it possesses to a greater extent than any other place of its size in Europe. Many other articles of hardware are made, particularly currycombs, gridirons, screws, &c. The township comprises 2050*a.* 3*r.* 17*p.* in nearly equal portions of arable and pasture, the soil of which varies exceedingly. The Tame brook passes through the chapelry; also the Wyrley and Essington canal; and the Grand Junction railway has a station here. Courts leet and baron are annually held; and there is a court of requests on three Mondays in every alternate month, for the recovery of debts under £5. In the neighbourhood are the remains of an old hall, the seat of the maternal ancestors of the Duke of Cleveland. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £300; patrons, the Inhabitants: the tithes, which belong to the duke, have been commuted for £640. The chapel, dedicated to St. Giles, was rebuilt about 1748, and repaired in 1844. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans; and three national and one British school.

Bramston, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £489, and the glebe comprises 31 acres. The church, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a square embattled tower, stands in the same churchyard as that of Willingale-Spain, and the parishes are much intermixed, though quite distinct both as to ecclesiastical and civil concerns.

WILLINGALE-SPAIN (All Saints), a parish, in the union of ONGAR, hundred of DUNMOW, N. division of ESSEX, 6 miles (N. E.) from Chipping-Ongar; containing 207 inhabitants. The parish derives the adjunct to its name from the family of Hervey de Spain, to whom it belonged at the time of the Norman survey: it comprises 1200a. 31p., of which 970 acres are arable, 200 pasture, and 30 wood; the soil is nearly similar to that of the preceding parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown, on the nomination of the Bishop of London: the tithes have been commuted for £322. 12., and the glebe comprises $29\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church has a handsome altar-piece, the gift of William Brocket, Esq.

WILLINGDON, a parish, in the union of EAST-BOURNE, hundred of WILLINGDON, rape of PEVENSEY, E. division of SUSSEX, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from East-Bourne; containing 621 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3822 acres, of which about 600 are common or waste. The village is pleasantly situated on elevated ground, on the road from London to East-Bourne, commanding very extensive views of the surrounding country. Langley Point, with its forts and martello towers on the coast, is in the parish. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12; net income, £67; patrons, the Dean and Chapter of Chichester; impropriators, Inigo Thomas and R. Newman, Esqrs. The glebe consists of about 3 acres, with a small house. The church, principally in the early English style, contains portions of the decorated and later styles, with a square tower, and some interesting monuments to the Parker family. On the downs are several barrows; and in 1825, on lowering the road over Ocklynge, several skeletons were discovered, lying in rows, side by side, with their feet towards the east. Henry Parker, who was secretary to Cromwell, and author of various tracts on religion and politics, was born at Ratton, in the parish.

WILLINGHAM (St. MARY AND ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of CHESTERTON, hundred of PAPWORTH, county of CAMBRIDGE, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from St. Ives; containing 1454 inhabitants. The parish comprises 4663 acres, of which 1638 are common or waste. Much of the cheese which takes its name from the neighbouring village of Cottenham is made at this place, where about 1200 milch cows are usually kept. An act for draining certain fen land and low grounds was passed in 1842. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £18. 8. 1 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Ely: the tithes have been commuted for £670, and there are 80 acres of glebe. On the north side of the chancel of the church is a chapel, in the decorated English style, with a stone roof of singular construction. There is a place of worship for Baptists. A charity school was founded by subscription, in 1593, and an estate purchased for its endowment, which now produces £20 a year; it is further endowed with a rent-charge of £10, bequeathed in 1700, by Dr. Saywell, Master of Jesus' College, Cambridge. An almshouse for four widows, founded in 1616, by William Smith, provost of King's College, Cambridge, is endowed with £18 per annum.

WILLINGHAM, a chapelry, in the parish of CARLTON, union of LINTON, hundred of RADFIELD, county of CAMBRIDGE, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Newmarket. The chapel is dedicated to St. Matthew.

WILLINGHAM (St. HELEN), a parish, in the union of GAINSBOROUGH, wapentake of WELL, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 6 miles (S. E.) from Gainsborough; containing 426 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Lincoln to Gainsborough, and comprises by measurement 2200 acres, of which about two-thirds are arable, and one-third is pasture; the soil is a strong clay. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £18. 6. 8.; net income, £352; patron, the Rev. J. Peel: the tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1779. The church is an ancient edifice, of which all the sittings, except those in the chancel, are free. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WILLINGHAM (St. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of WANGFORD, E. division of SUFFOLK, 4 miles (S.) from Beccles; containing 156 inhabitants. It is computed to comprise 1000 acres. The living is a rectory, annexed to that of North Cove, and valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4.: the tithes have been commuted for £236, and there are 19 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres of glebe, of which 3 belong to the rector, 15 to the rector of Ellough, and 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ to the rector of Sotterley. The church was standing in 1529; but only a very small portion of the edifice now remains.

WILLINGHAM, CHERRY (St. PETER), a parish, in the wapentake of LAWRESS, parts of LINDSEY, union and county of LINCOLN, 4 miles (E. by N.) from Lincoln; containing 111 inhabitants. It comprises 1096 acres, of which the soil is a light clay; the surface forms a gently sloping hill, washed on the south by the river Witham; the lower grounds have been well drained. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4.; net income, £95; patrons and improprators, Messrs. Cöck, Gordon, and Ellis.

WILLINGHAM, NORTH, a parish, in the union of CAISTOR, S. division of the wapentake of WALSHCROFT, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Market-Rasen; containing 210 inhabitants. It comprises about 3000 acres; the soil varies, being in some parts clay, sand, and loam respectively; the surface is generally hilly. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 4. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £69; patron and improprator, Ayscoghe Boucherett, Esq. The glebe consists of about 27 acres, in different parishes.

WILLINGHAM, SOUTH (St. MARTIN), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, E. division of the wapentake of WRAGGOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 5 miles (E. N. E.) from Wragby; containing 296 inhabitants. The parish is computed to contain 2000 acres. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 10. 10.; net income, £389; patron, G. F. Heneage, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land in 1769.

WILLINGTON (St. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the hundred of WIXAMTREE, union and county of BEDFORD, 4 miles (E.) from Bedford; containing 268 inhabitants. The navigable river Ouse bounds the parish on the north. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 17., and in the patronage of the Duke of Bedford, the improprator, whose tithes have been commuted for £300, and those of the vicar for £227; there are 19 acres of glebe. The church is principally in the later English style, and contains some old monuments to the Gostwicke family.

WILLINGTON, a township, in the union of GREAT BOUGHTON, Second division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 3 miles (N. N. W.) from Tarporley; containing 103 inhabitants. The township is deemed to be part of the parish of Whalley, having formerly belonged to the abbey there, though for the performance of ecclesiastical rites the inhabitants resort to the church of St. Oswald, Chester, and pay a portion of the great tithes to the rectors of Wem and Tarvin. There is a place of worship for Unitarians.

WILLINGTON (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of BURTON-UPON-TRENT, hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, S. division of the county of DERBY, 5 miles (N. E.) from Burton; containing 409 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Derby to Burton, and comprises about 1260 acres, the soil of which is of a light quality, chiefly resting upon sand and gravel. The river Trent, over which is a bridge of five arches to Repton, flows through it; the Grand Trunk canal, connecting the Trent and Mersey, intersects the village, and facilities of communication are also afforded by the Birmingham and Derby Junction railway, which has a second-class station here. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 17. 3.; net income, £82; patrons and improprators, the Governors of Etwall Hospital and Repton Grammar School. The tithes were commuted for land in 1766: thirty-six acres, and an allowance from Queen

Anne's Bounty, have been assigned in lieu of the small tithes. The church is partly in the Norman style, with later additions, erected in the 12th century. There are places of worship for Baptists and Ranters.

WILLINGTON, a township, in the parish of BRANCEPETH, N. W. division of DARLINGTON ward, union, and S. division of the county of DURHAM, 4 miles (N.) from Bishop-Auckland; containing 258 inhabitants. It is situated on the north side of the river Wear, and intersected by the great Roman road. The tithes have been commuted for £120. 18. 6. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a school is partly supported by subscription.

WILLINGTON, a township, in the parish of WALLSEND, union of TYNEMOUTH, E. division of CASTLE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 3 miles (W. by S.) from North Shields; containing 1474 inhabitants. This place is situated on the north bank of the river Tyne, and contains some neat houses, among which are those of George Johnson, Thompson Smith, Robert Hood Haggie, and Edward Anderson, Esqrs. Here is a colliery comprising several seams of excellent quality, of which two are worked: one, the high main seam, occurs at a depth of 100 fathoms from the surface, and is used for household purposes, and sent to London as Bell and Company's Wallsend; and the other, which is found at a depth of 40 fathoms below the former, is used only for steam. An explosion took place in this colliery in 1841, by which 31 lives were lost, and the property sustained much damage. An extensive patent ropery belonging to Messrs Haggie Brothers, of Newcastle and Gateshead, has been established here, and there are also copperas-works. Near the river, which affords great facilities for the shipment of coal and other produce, is a corn-mill worked by steam; and at Willington quay is a dock-yard, with a patent-slip for building and repairing ships, the property of Thompson Smith, Esq. The Newcastle and North Shields railway passes through the township, to its station at Howdon, near this place, over the Willington viaduct, 1050 feet in length, consisting of seven wooden arches 120 feet in span, supported on piers and abutments of stone, the whole constructed from the designs of Messrs. Green, of Newcastle, at a cost of £25,000. The channel between Willington quay and Howdon has been greatly deepened and improved by the laying of ballast in the bed of the river, to contract its width, by the corporation of Newcastle. The tithes have been commuted for £356. 2. 10., of which £266. 2. 10. are payable to the 12th prebendary of Durham, and £90 to the curate of Wallsend. There are places of worship for Wesleyans.

WILLINGTON, a hamlet, in the parish of BARCHESTON, union of SHIPSTON-ON-STOUR, Brails division of the hundred of KINGTON, S. division of the county of WARWICK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. S. E.) from Shipston; containing 149 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £199, and there is a glebe of $4\frac{1}{2}$ acres.

WILLISHAM (St. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of BOSMERE and CLAYDON, E. division of SUFFOLK, 3 miles (S. S. W.) from Needham-Market; containing 217 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £56; patrons and improprators, the Trustees of the late T. Myers, Esq. The tithes have been commuted for £246. 15., and there are $4\frac{1}{2}$ acres of impropriate glebe.

WILLITTOFT, a township, in the parish of BUBWITH, union of HOWDEN, Holme-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of YORK, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.) from Howden; containing 53 inhabitants. This place was formerly the residence of the Vavasour family; it is now the property of Colonel George Wyndham, who is lord of the manor, and the land is set out in farms.

WILLITON, a chapelry, in the parish of ST. DECUMAN, union of WILLITON, hundred of WILLITON and FREEMANNERS, W. division of SOMERSET, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Dunster; containing 1318 inhabitants. The chapelry has been made a polling-place for the western division of the county. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Prebendary of St. Decuman's in Wells Cathedral; net income, £53. The chapel is dedicated to St. Peter. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans.

WILLOUGHBY (St. HELEN), a parish, in the union of SPILSBY, Wold division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Alford; containing 661 inhabitants, and including the hamlets of Abbertoft, Asthorpe, Bonthorpe, Butter-Bump, Mawthorpe, Sandfield, Sloothby, and Wytche. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £39. 10. $2\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of Lord Willoughby de Ercsby: the tithes have been commuted for £1020, and the glebe comprises 50 acres. The church contains an altar-tomb, with the recumbent effigy of a Knight Templar. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Anthony Barnes, in 1728, bequeathed land now producing more than £25 per annum, for teaching and apprenticing children.

WILLOUGHBY (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of RUGBY, Rugby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, N. division of the county of WARWICK, 3 miles (S. by E.) from Dunchurch; containing 446 inhabitants. This place, in the neighbourhood of which many Roman antiquities have been discovered, is in Domesday book called Wilbere and Wilebei, from which its present name is derived. It was formerly of much more importance than it is at present, having enjoyed a market and fairs, to which, from the name of a small hamlet in the parish, called Pie Court, probably a court of pie-poudre was attached. The parish is bounded on the east, and partly on the north and south, by the county of Northampton, in which last direction is the river Leam; it comprises 1711 acres, and at the eastern end is intersected by the Oxford canal. The village is situated on the road from London to Holyhead, from which it extends, in a westerly direction, for nearly three-quarters of a mile; the lands in the neighbourhood are fertile and in a high state of cultivation, and the environs abound with pleasing scenery and with various objects of interest. Within the last few years it has been growing into notice from the discovery of some powerful sulphureous and saline springs, the properties of which have been found similar to those at Harrogate. Some neat cottages have been erected as lodging-houses; hot, cold, and shower baths have been constructed, and there is a pump-room for drinking the water, which is efficacious in all cases of scrofula, and in scorbutic and cutaneous diseases. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 4. 4.; net income, £217; patrons and improprators, the President and Fellows of Magdalen College, Oxford. The church is a spacious and neat structure in the later English style, with a low square embattled tower strengthened by angular buttresses; the chancel was rebuilt in 1779, and the church contains several ancient monuments and brasses, among which is an altar-tomb of the family of Clerke. There is a place of worship for Primitive Methodists.

WILLOUGHBY-IN-THE-WOLDS (ST. MARY AND ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of LOUGHBOROUGH, S. division of the wapentake of RUSHCLIFFE and of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 7 miles (N. E. by E.) from Loughborough; containing 569 inhabitants. According to Horsley, this was the Roman station Vernometum, but Gale and Stukeley place Margidunum here. Near it, in the great civil war, an engagement took place, commonly termed the battle of Willoughby Field. The parish, which is situated about two miles distant from the road between Nottingham and Melton-Mowbray, and half a mile south-east of the Fosse Roman road, comprises by measurement 2000 acres, whereof three-fourths are pasture, and the remainder arable; the soil is chiefly a cold clay. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 18. 6½; net income, £87; patrons, W. Melville, Esq., and the family of Garton: the tithes were commuted for land in 1793. The church contains 400 sittings, of which 238 are free. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. In a field called Herings, or Black Field, are traces of an old town, where many coins, pavements, and other relics of antiquity have been found; and in the centre of the village stands a cross, the shaft consisting of one entire stone, fifteen feet high, resting on four steps. There is a tumulus called Cross Hill, where an annual revel is held.

WILLOUGHBY, SCOTT (ST. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of SLEAFORD, wapentake of AVELAND, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, 3 miles (N. W. by N.) from Falkingham; containing 22 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road between Grantham and Donington, and comprises 560 acres, of which 220 are arable, 330 grass, and 10 woodland. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 1. 3., and in the gift of Earl Brownlow; net income, £160. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1795; the glebe comprises 4 acres. The church is a neat small edifice, entirely rebuilt about 20 years since.

WILLOUGHBY, SILK (ST. DENIS), a parish, in the union of SLEAFORD, wapentake of ASWARDHURN, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, 2 miles (S. S. W.) from Sleaford; containing 227 inhabitants. This parish, in 1494 termed North Willoughby, received the adjunct Silk from the circumstance of a hamlet, anciently called Silkby, being about that period added to it. The manor, previously to the year 1337, was possessed by Sir William Armynt, at first keeper of the privy seal and vice-chancellor to Edward II., and afterwards lord chancellor and bishop of Norwich; and it remained in the family until 1662. The parish comprises by measurement about 2500 acres, and is situated on the road from Sleaford to Falkingham. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 8. 1½, and in the gift of the Earl of Dysart: the tithes have been commuted for £625, and the glebe consists of 11½ acres, with a house. The church is a handsome structure, with a well-proportioned tower and spire; the body is principally in the decorated English style, and the chancel, of later date, contains three stalls, some fine screen-work of wood, and fragments of ancient stained glass in the east window; the font is a rare specimen of the true Norman style of interweaving arches. Some tumuli are visible.

WILLOUGHBY-WATERLESS (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of LUTTERWORTH, hundred of GUTHLAXTON, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, 6 miles (N. N. E.) from Lutterworth; containing 348 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement about 1100 acres: the Midland-Counties' railway runs at the distance of about a mile and a half. The manufacture of stockings affords employment to about twenty-five families. The living is a rectory, with the vicarage of Peatling Magna united in 1729, valued in the king's books at £11. 11. 3.; net income, £347; patron and incumbent, the Rev. John Miles; impropiator of Peatling Magna, J. R. Swindall, Esq. There are 46 acres of glebe, with a house. The church is a plain edifice.

WILLOUGHBY, WEST, a hamlet, in the parish of ANCASTER, union of GRANTHAM, wapentake of LOVEDEN, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN; containing 67 inhabitants.

WILLOUGHTON (ST. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of GAINSBOROUGH, W. division of the wapentake of ASLACOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 8½ miles (E. by N.) from Gainsborough; containing 581 inhabitants. An alien priory, a cell to the abbey of St. Nicholas at Angiers, is said to have existed here. Roger de Buslei and Simon de Canci, in the time of Stephen, gave a moiety of the church, and the greater part of the town, to the Knights Templars, who had a preceptory here, which from that order came to the Hospitallers, and, at the Dissolution, had a revenue of £219. 19. 8. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 4. 2.; net income, £192; patrons, alternately, King's College, Cambridge, and the Earl of Scarborough, the latter of whom is impropiator. The tithes were commuted for land in 1768. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WILLS-PASTURES, an extra-parochial liberty, in the union of SOUTHAM, Southam division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, S. division of the county of WARWICK; containing 13 inhabitants, and comprising 146 acres.

WILLSWORTHY, a hamlet, in the parish of ST. PETER TAVY, union of TAVISTOCK, hundred of LIFTON, Tavistock and S. divisions of the county of DEVON, 6 miles (N. E. by N.) from Tavistock; containing 91 inhabitants. It is a little to the east of the road between Oakhampton and Tavistock.

WILMINGTON (ST. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of DARTFORD, hundred of AXTON, DARTFORD, and WILMINGTON, lathe of SUTTON-AT-HONE, W. division of the county of KENT, 1 mile (S.) from Dartford; containing 845 inhabitants, and comprising 1782 acres. The celebrated Earl of Warwick, in the reign of Edward IV., resided at the manor-house in the village, which is remarkable for the beauty of its situation. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 17. 6.; net income, £340; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Rochester. The church occupies the summit of a hill near the high road, and has a handsome spire steeple.

WILMINGTON (ST. MARY AND ST. PETER), a parish, in the union of EAST-BOURNE, hundred of LONG-BRIDGE, rape of PEVENSEY, E. division of SUSSEX, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Hailsham; containing 314 inhabitants. A Benedictine priory, a cell to the abbey of Grestein, in Normandy, was founded here in the time of William Rufus, and, at its suppression, was valued at 240 marks per annum, and sold by licence of Henry IV. to the Dean and Chapter of Chichester, to whom it was confirmed by Henry V., towards founding a chantry of two priests in the cathedral. The parish is on the road from Lewes to East Bourne, and comprises by measurement 1744 acres: the village is situated on the north-east declivity of the South Downs, on an elevated site commanding extensive views, especially from the vicarage-house. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8, and in the gift of the impropriator, the Earl of Burlington: the great tithes have been commuted for £65, and the vicarial for £51. 16.; the glebe comprises 4 acres. The church is principally in the early and decorated styles, and consists of a nave and chancel, with small chapels on the north and south sides, and a small tower surmounted by a spire; in the churchyard is a fine yew-tree, six yards in circumference at two feet from the ground. Some portions of the priory have been converted into a farm-house, one of the rooms in which exhibits a groined roof; the gateway still remains. Wilmington gives the title of Baron to the Marquess of Northampton.

WILMSLOW (ST. BARTHOLOMEW), a parish, in the union of ALTRINCHAM, hundred of MACCLESFIELD, N. division of the county of CHESTER, 8 miles (N. W. by N.) from Macclesfield; containing, with the townships of Bollin-Fee, Chorley, Fulshaw, and Pownall-Fee, 4973 inhabitants. This parish comprises by measurement 7050 acres, of which the soil is red and grey marl; the pasture land is rich, and the arable also highly productive, and the surface undulated. It is situated on the road from Manchester to Birmingham, and is intersected by the small river Bollin, on the bank of which, about a quarter of a mile to the east of the church, is Bollin Hall. On the same river are two cotton-mills and one silk-mill, of which the former at Styal, afford, on the average, employment to 400 persons. The railway from Manchester to Crewe runs through the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £32. 15.; net income, £955; patron, Thomas Joseph Trafford, Esq. The church is a handsome and very ancient structure in the decorated and later English styles, with a square tower; it comprises a nave, chancel, and two aisles, of which the east end of one and the west end of the other are inclosed as sepulchral chapels, for the families of Dunham and Trafford. Near the altar are brasses with inscriptions to Sir Robert Booth, of Dunham, and Douce Venables his wife, and the figure of a divine, with an inscription to Henry Treffort, rector, 1537. In the north chapel are two altar-tombs sunk in the wall, on which are two figures representing the Newtons, of Newton and Pownall; and there is also a chapel of more recent date, in which are several tombs of the family of Leigh, of Hawthorn Hall, near Wilmslow. The Wesleyans, Calvinistic Methodists, Quakers, and Unitarians, have places of worship. A workhouse was established about 1780, on Lindon common; and land now producing more than £200 per annum, was assigned for its support. There are some remains of an ancient chapel, forming part of a farm-house.

WILNCOTE, a hamlet, partly in the parish of OLD STRATFORD, hundred of BARLICHWAY, Stratford division, and partly in the parish of ASTON-CANTLOW, hundred of HEMLINGFORD, Birmingham division, of the county of WARWICK; containing 415 inhabitants. It is on the west bank of the Stratford and Avon canal. A chapel of ease, dedicated to St. Andrew, was consecrated in 1841.

WILNE (ST. CHAD), a parish, in the union of SHARDLOW, hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, S. division of the county of DERBY, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Derby; containing 2057 inhabitants. It includes the liberties of Draycott and Wilne-Church, the hamlet of Hopwell, the parochial chapelry of Breaston, and part of Risley. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Sawley: the tithes were commuted for land in 1763. The workhouse of the Shardlow union is situated here.

WILNE, CHURCH, a liberty, in the parish of WILNE, union of SHARDLOW, hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, S. division of the county of DERBY; containing 223 inhabitants.

WILNE, FAR, or GREAT, a township, in the parish of ASTON-UPON-TRENT, union of SHARDLOW, hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, S. division of the county of DERBY; containing 263 inhabitants.

WILNECOTE, a chapelry, in the parish and union of TAMWORTH, Tamworth division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, N. division of the county of WARWICK, 2 miles (S. E. by S.) from Tamworth; containing 718 inhabitants. This chapelry, sometimes called Willowencote, using the Saxon adjective from Willow, comprises by measurement 1005 acres, chiefly pasture land. Collieries and brick lime-kilns have been established of late; and here is a station of the Birmingham and Derby railway. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £90; patron, the Vicar of Tamworth. The chapel, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, was rebuilt in 1821, by subscription, aided by a grant from the Incorporated Society.

WILPESHIRE, a township, in the parish, union, and Lower division of the hundred, of BLACKBURN, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Blackburn; containing 281 inhabitants.

WILSDEN, a township, and, with ALLERTON, a district parish, in the union of BRADFORD, wapentake of MORLEY, W. riding of YORK, 5 miles (N. W.) from Bradford; containing, exclusively of Allerton, 2684 inhabitants. This township is divided into the Lower and Upper divisions, the former including part of the ancient manor of Allerton, and the latter the Hallows or Hallas estate, Manuels, Birchin-Lee, and a small portion of Cullingworth; it comprises by measurement 2607 acres, chiefly the property of Mrs. Sarah Ferrands, who is lady of the manor. The lands are distinguished as the old and new cultivations, the old separated into small farms, and the new greatly extended and improved by the growth of the worsted manufacture; the soil is various, but principally adapted to dairy purposes, and the arable land to the production of oats. The neighbourhood abounds with coal, of which several mines are in operation, and with freestone of good quality, which is extensively quarried, and with which the inhabitants are supplied from one of the quarries for building free of expense. The scenery is strikingly bold and romantic, and in the north-eastern part beautifully picturesque, embracing towards Bingley an extensive and richly-diversified prospect. At Manuels is a stream of water rising from numerous springs, and discharging about 400 gallons per minute, which belongs to the New Water-works' Company at Bradford, for the supply of that town; and on Harden Beck is a picturesque cascade called the Hallas Lumb, falling from two several heights of five and fifteen feet, and from its partial concealment by precipitous and thickly-wooded rocks, having a singularly romantic appearance.

The village, which is chiefly of modern origin, consists of a long line of detached and irregularly-built houses, stretching along the northern acclivity of an eminence rising from Harden beck; the inhabitants are chiefly employed in the worsted manufacture, which is carried on to a very great extent, and for which there are not less than eleven mills and factories. A mechanics' institution has been established, for which a neat building was erected in 1827. The church (St. Matthew), erected near the village, in 1823, by the Church Commissioners, at an expense of nearly £10,000, was consecrated on the 1st of November, 1826; it is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower crowned by pinnacles, and contains 1400 sittings, of which 600 are free. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Bradford; net income, £150. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans; also an infants' school connected with the Church, and Sunday schools belonging to the dissenting congregations.

WILSFORD (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of SLEAFORD, wapentake of WINNIBRIGGS and THREE, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, 4½ miles (W. S. W.) from Sleaford; containing 429 inhabitants. A Benedictine priory, a cell to the abbey of Bec, in Normandy, was founded in the reign of Stephen, and, at the suppression of alien houses, was settled upon the abbey of Bourn, in this county, and at the Dissolution granted to Charles, Duke of Suffolk. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10; net income, £500; patron and incumbent, the Rev. C. Brackenbury. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1774. The church has a tower and spire, and exhibits an admixture of the early and decorated English styles: the font, which is octagonal, with concave sides, is of later date.

WILSFORD (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of AMESBURY, hundred of UNDERDITCH, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTS, 1¼ mile (S.W. by W.) from Amesbury; containing, with the tything of Lake, 123 inhabitants, of whom 49 are in Wilsford hamlet. The parish is bounded on the east by the river Avon; the soil is generally a light loam, and the lands are chiefly arable, with a portion of good water meadow. The ancient manor-house of Lake is a remarkably fine specimen of the Elizabethan style. The living is a vicarage, with that of Woodford consolidated, in the patronage of the Prebendary of Wilsford and Woodford in the Cathedral of Salisbury, the appropriator; net income, £185.

WILSFORD-DAUNTSEY (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of PEWSEY, hundred of SWANBOROUGH, Devizes and N. divisions of WILTS, 4½ miles (W. S. W.) from Pewsey; containing, with the tything of Manningford-Bohun, 587 inhabitants, of whom 304 are in Wilsford-Dauntsey township. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 17. 11.; net income, £242; patron and impropiator, the Master of the Hospital of St. Nicholas, Salisbury.

WILSHAMSTEAD (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of REDBORNSTOKE, union and county of BEDFORD, 4 miles (S. by E.) from Bedford; containing 763 inhabitants. The parish is divided by the road between Bedford and Luton, which runs nearly north and south. It comprises 3014*a.* 1*r.* 30*p.*, exclusively of ground occupied by cottages and gardens; the eastern side is the better portion of the land, bearing turnips, and being easily convertible; the soil of the western portion is more heavy, but produces good wheat, beans, peas, barley, &c. The female cottagers are employed in the making of bone-lace. The living is a vicarage, endowed with one-third of the rectorial tithes, and valued in the king's books at £9. 9. 7.; net income, £280; patron, Lord Carteret; impropiators of the remainder of the rectorial tithes, J. C. Crook, Esq., and another. The tithes were commuted for 269*a.* 2*r.* 28*p.* of land in 1809, and there is a good parsonage-house, almost entirely built by the incumbent, in 1816. The church is supposed to have been erected about the time of Henry VII.; the tower fell down on Sunday, April 11th, 1742, probably shaken by the ringing of the bells. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a small school is endowed with land producing £8 per annum. Samuel Richardson, master of Emanuel College, Cambridge, was born here in 1698; and the Rev. John Gay, author of Prefatory Observations to King's Origin of Evil, and who died in 1745, was vicar.

WILSICK, with STANCILL and WELLINGLEY, a township, in the parish of TICKHILL, union of DONCASTER, S. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, 6 miles (S. by W.) from Doncaster; containing 59 inhabitants. This place, styled in Domesday book Wilseunice, was formerly owned, at least in part, by the family of Fitzpaine, of whom Jordan Fitzpaine gave lands here to the monks of Roche; and the canons of Nostel also held some property here. The manor has passed through the hands of various proprietors within the last century and a half. The township comprises about 1200 acres, set out in three farms.

WILSTHORPE, a hamlet, in the parish of SAWLEY, union of SHARDLOW, hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, S. division of the county of DERBY; containing 56 inhabitants.

WILSTHORPE, a chapelry, in the parish of GREAT-FORD, union of STAMFORD, wapentake of NESS, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, 5 miles (N. W.) from Market-Deeping; containing 70 inhabitants.

WILSTONE, a hamlet, in the parish of TRING, union of BERKHAMPSTEAD, hundred of DACORUM, county of HERTFORD; containing 386 inhabitants.

WILSTROP, a township, in the parish of KIRKHAMMERTON, E. division of AINSTY wapentake, W. riding of the county of YORK, 7½ miles (W. by N.) from York; containing 86 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Nidd, and comprises by computation 1120 acres; the village consists of scattered houses. The tithes have been commuted for £8, payable to the perpetual curate of Hammerton.

WILTON, a hamlet, in the parish of HALE, union of WHITEHAVEN, ALLERDALE ward above Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND; containing 72 inhabitants.

WILTON (St. JAMES), a parish, in the union of THETFORD, hundred of GRIMSHOE, W. division of NORFOLK; 4 miles (W.) from Brandon-Ferry; containing, with Hockwold, 949 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the south by the Lesser Ouse, which separates it from the county of Suffolk; it comprises by measurement 2600 acres. The living is a discharged vicarage, united to the rectory of Hockwold, and valued in the king's books at £6. 7. 6. The church is in the decorated and later styles, and consists of a nave and chancel, separated by a handsome carved screen; it has a massive embattled tower, surmounted by an octangular spire of freestone. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Near the church is an ancient cross.

WILTON, or WELTON, a tything, in the parish of MIDSUMMER-NORTON, union of CLUTTON, hundred of CHEWTON, E. division of SOMERSET, 8½ miles (S. W.) from Bath; containing 1480 inhabitants.

WILTON (St. GEORGE), a parish, in the union of TAUNTON, hundred of TAUNTON and TAUNTON-DEAN, W. division of SOMERSET; containing, with the hamlets of Galmington and Shurford, 799 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Rev. E. T. Halliday, with a net income of £104: the tithes have been commuted for £225. 8., and there are nearly 6 acres of inappropriate glebe. The church, which has been enlarged, was formerly a chapel to the vicarage of St. Mary Magdalene, in Taunton, to which town Wilton forms an extensive suburb. The house of correction, capable of containing 175 prisoners, is situated here. There was formerly an hospital, built by one of the bishops of Winchester.

Corporation Seal.

WILTON (St. MARY), a borough and parish, having exclusive jurisdiction, the head of a union, and formerly a market-town, locally in the hundred of BRANCH and DOLE, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTS, 3 miles (W. by N.) from Salisbury, and 85 (W. S. W.) from London; containing, with the tything of Bulbridge, and part of the hamlet of Ditchampton, 1698 inhabitants. This town, which derives its name from the river Wily, is of great antiquity, and is supposed by Baxter to have been the Caer-Guilo, or capital of the British prince, Caroilius, and subsequently a seat of the West Saxon kings. It was a place of importance for several centuries preceding the Norman Conquest, possessing an eminent religious establishment, and giving name to the county; and it had also a mint. Wilton is stated by Camden and other writers to have been originally called Ellandune, and the scene of a sanguinary battle fought between Egbert, king of the West Saxons, and Beorwolf, the Mercian king, in which the latter was defeated; but later writers have controverted this opinion, and the engagement is now thought to have occurred at a place named Ellen- dune, in another part of the county. A battle took place here in 871, between King Alfred and the Danes, in which the latter, though ultimately successful, were obliged to sue for peace. The celebrated MONASTERY was commenced in the year 800, by Wulstan, Earl of Wiltshire, who, having defeated Ethelmund, the Mercian king, established a chantry, or oratory, and repaired the old church of St. Mary at Wilton, which had been destroyed by the Danes, and placed in it a college of Secular priests. About thirty years after Earl Wulstan's death, his widow, Alburga, sister to King Egbert, induced that monarch to convert the oratory into a priory of thirteen sisters, of which she was the first prioress, and hence Egbert has been commonly reputed its founder. Immediately on granting peace to the Danes, King Alfred, at the solicitation of his queen, Ealswitha, built a nunnery on the site of the palace, and transferred to it the thirteen sisters of the priory, adding to them an abbess and twelve nuns; his successors were great benefactors to the establishment, particularly Edgar, who enlarged its buildings and augmented its revenue; his natural daughter, Editha, having been abbess, and, after her death, being canonized, became its patron saint. Editha, daughter of Earl Godwin, and queen of Edward the Confessor, who was educated in the nunnery, rebuilt it in a magnificent manner with stone, it having been originally constructed of wood; and Matilda, queen of Henry I., was also brought up in it, under her aunt, the abbess Christina. Early in the tenth century, Wilton became the seat of the diocese of Wiltshire, and continued so during the lives of eleven successive bishops, the last of whom, Hermannus, having been also appointed to the see of Sherborne, united the two bishoprics, and removed to Old Sarum, where he founded a cathedral, which was the seat of the see until its transfer, in 1217, to Salisbury. After the Conquest, the town continued to flourish until the year 1143, when King Stephen took possession of it, intending to convert the nunnery into a place of defence; but being surprised by Robert, Earl of Gloucester, with the troops of the Empress Matilda, who set fire to the town on all sides, the king was obliged to flee, leaving behind his troops and baggage. Wilton recovered from this disaster; but in the succeeding reign it began to decline, in consequence of the foundation of New Sarum or Salisbury, and the change in the direction of the great western road, which quickly followed. Its monastic institution, however, continued of importance until the Dissolution, when it was granted to Sir William Herbert, afterwards Earl of Pembroke, its revenue being at that time estimated at upwards of £600. A house of Black friars, and two hospitals, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene and St. John, also existed here at the period of the Dissolution. Wilton was visited by Queen Elizabeth, in Sept. 1579, and it became the residence of the court, for a short time, in October, 1603.

The town, consisting principally of two streets which cross at nearly right angles, is situated in a broad and fertile valley, near the confluence of the rivers Nadder and Wily, and is partially paved, and well supplied with water. The manufacture of carpets, for which Wilton has been so much celebrated, was introduced by a former earl of Pembroke, who brought over workmen from France for that purpose, this being the first place in England where the manufacture was commenced; and the making of carpets at Axminster having been recently discontinued, the splendid articles called after that town are now produced at Wilton. Fancy cloth waist-coatings also formed, at one time, a considerable branch of trade, but this is nearly extinct. Fairs are held on May 4th and Sept. 12th, the former for cattle and sheep, and the latter one of the largest sheep-fairs in the west of England, the number sold often exceeding 100,000. Wilton is a borough by prescription, its ancient rights and franchises having been confirmed by charters of various monarchs, from the time of Henry I. to that of Henry VI.: it is governed by a mayor, recorder, high steward, five aldermen, and an unlimited number of burgesses, appointed occasionally by the corporation, with a town-clerk, two serjeants-at-mace, and four constables. On Oct. 13th, a court leet of the lord of the manor is held at the town-hall, an ancient plain brick building, which was repaired and improved a few years since, by the corporation. The mayor and recorder are justices of the peace, with exclusive jurisdiction. The borough first sent members to parliament in the 23rd of Edward I., and continued to do so without interruption, till the passing of the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, since which it has returned only one, elected by the £10 householders of an enlarged district comprising an area of 32,150 acres: the mayor is returning officer.

The LIVING is a rectory, with that of Bulbridge and the vicarage of Ditchampton united, valued in the king's books at £12. 16. 3.; net income, £450; patron, the Earl of Pembroke. The church, lately erected in lieu of the ancient edifice, is a handsome structure in the modern Norman style of architecture, and consists of a nave, two side aisles, and a chancel, with a square tower 120 feet in height. The central entrance forms an open recessed porch, within a rich archway, and the interior is remarkable for its chasteness and beauty; the whole was completed in 1843, at the expense of the Hon. Sidney Herbert. At Nether Hampton, in the parish, is a chapel of ease; and the Independents and Methodists have each a place of worship. The free school, situated in North-street, was founded in 1714, under the will of Walter Dyer, who, in the year 1706, had bequeathed £600, of which part was expended in the erection of premises, to which additions have been made at different times, by the trustees; and the residue, with a legacy of £1000 Bank stock, producing by accumulation £2090, from Richard Uphill, in 1716, was laid out in an estate at East Knoyle. The rental amounts to £120 per annum, and the school is also entitled to the interest of £1000, part of a sum of £4200 three per cent. consols., bequeathed in 1775, by Robert Sumption, for various purposes. Of the remainder of Mr. Sumption's bequest, the interest of £1000 is given in marriage-portions to young women, and that of £2000 appropriated to the benefit of five men and as many women. There are also several minor benefactions; and in 1816, Thomas Mease gave to the high steward and corporation, on the death of his wife, £4000 Navy five per cents., to be applied to charitable purposes. The union of Wilton comprises 22 parishes or places, and contains a population of 10,327. The hospital of St. John, supposed to have been founded by Hubert, who was bishop of Salisbury in 1189, and archbishop of Canterbury in 1193, is endowed for a master, or prior, who is a clergyman, nominated by the Dean of Salisbury, and two poor men and two women, chosen by the prior. The tenements are falling into decay, and the pensioners are lodged in an adjoining cottage; but the chapel has been repaired and enlarged, at the expense of the prior, and divine service is now performed every Sunday evening and every alternate Friday evening, by a chaplain appointed by the prior, who receives a stipend of £44. On the site of the celebrated nunnery, Sir William Herbert, to whom it was granted, commenced the erection of that princely pile now the residence of his descendants, the earls of Pembroke, designed by Holbein and Inigo Jones, and containing a collection of paintings, statues, and various antiquities, not excelled by any in the kingdom. In this mansion the distinguished Sir Philip Sidney, whose sister Mary was the celebrated Countess of Pembroke, composed his heroic romance of Arcadia.

WILTON, a tything, in the parish of GREAT BEDWIN, union of HUNGERFORD, hundred of KINWARDSTONE, Marlborough and Ramsbury, and S. divisions of WILTS; containing 284 inhabitants.

WILTON (St. CUTHBERT), a parochial chapelry, in the union of GUISBOROUGH, E. division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, N. riding of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Guisborough; containing 361 inhabitants. This chapelry, situated on the road from Stockton to Redcar, is bounded on the north by the river Tees, and comprises 3401 acres, of which 200 are woodland, and of the remainder, nearly two-thirds are arable, and about one-third grass. The soil is in part a strong clay, and in the southern portion a lighter mould, and the surface is here more elevated and picturesque, with marine views of great extent: there are some thriving plantations, and about 250 acres of moorland. Good freestone is quarried for building purposes. Here was formerly a monastery, and at the west end of the village is Wilton Castle, recently built upon the site of the ancient baronial castle of the Bulmers, who possessed it for many generations, till Sir John Bulmer, Knt., was attainted of high treason, when his estates were confiscated. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £117; patron, Sir J. H. Lowther, Bart.: the tithes were commuted for land in 1800. The church is an ancient structure, with a square tower. There is a place of worship for Independents at Lazenby; and a parochial school is supported by subscription, aided by a gift of £20 per annum from the Lowther family. On the higher hills near the castle is a fine waterfall, and there are numerous tumuli on Wilton moor.

WILTON, a chapelry, in the parish of ELLERBURN, PICKERING lythe and union, N. riding of YORK, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Pickering; containing 216 inhabitants. The township comprises about 2060 acres of land, chiefly the property of Lord Hotham, who is lord of the manor: the village is on the road from Allerston to Thornton, and equidistant from each, and in its vicinity are the ruins of an ancient Hall, formerly a seat of the Cholmley family. There are a small chapel of ease, a place of worship for Wesleyans, and a school, built in 1836.

WILTON; BISHOP (St. EDITH), a parish, in the union of POCKLINGTON, Wilton-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of YORK; containing, with the township of Bolton, and that of Youlthorpe with Gowthorpe, 792 inhabitants, of whom 592 are in the township of Bishop-Wilton with Belthorpe, 4 miles (N.) from Pocklington. This place derives its affix from the residence here of Archbishop Neville: at the time of the Domesday survey, it had a church and a priest, and the manor was held by the see of York. The parish is situated on the road between Bridlington and York. In the township are 4214a. 1r. 3p., of which 3010 acres are arable, 1003 pasture, and 200 woodland; the soil is clay, mixed with gravel; the scenery around is very beautiful, and the village appears as if embosomed in an amphitheatre. There is a small iron-foundry. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 3. 6½.; net income, £148; patron and impropiator, Sir Tatton Sykes, Bart.: the tithes for the township were commuted for land and a money payment in 1769. The church is an ancient structure of various styles, with a square tower, and spire; on one of the windows are painted the arms of the Nevilles. There are places of worship for Methodists; and a parochial school. Of the palace built in the reign of Edward IV. by Archbishop Neville, there are no vestiges; but the moat which encompassed it still remains. On the wolds are some tumuli.

WILTSHIRE, an inland county, bounded on the north and north-west by Gloucestershire, on the west by Somerset, on the south-west and south by Dorset, on the south-east and east by Hampshire, and on the north-east by Berks. It extends from 50° 55' to 50° 42' (N. Lat.), and from 1° 30' to 2° 22' (W. Lon.), and comprises an area of 882,560 statute acres, or about 1379 square miles. There are 50,879 inhabited houses, 2138 uninhabited, and 253 in progress of erection; and the population amounts to 258,733, of whom 128,240 are males, and 130,493 females. A large portion of the county was occupied, in the time of Cæsar, by the Belgæ: the Hedui inhabited the north-western parts of it, and the Carvilli another district; and the Cangi are also supposed, either at this period or soon after, to have possessed some territory within its northern limits. On the second invasion of the Romans, during the reign of the Emperor Claudius, in the year 44, the Belgæ were found to have subdued nearly the whole, which they held as far north as the rude barrier of the Wansdyke, beyond which the Cangi are, by some writers, thought to have preserved their dominion. Under the Roman government, Wiltshire was comprised in the division called Britannia Prima. After the withdrawal of the Roman forces, Cerdic, the founder of the kingdom of the West Saxons, who had been engaged in an arduous warfare, for upwards of 20 years, with the Romanized Britons near the place of his landing, on the coast of Hampshire, at last penetrated into this territory, in the year 520, but was defeated in a great battle by the British hero Arthur, and the Saxons did not return hither for upwards of 30 years. In 554, Cenric, son of Cerdic, and his successor in the sovereignty of Wessex, advanced with his army towards Sorbidunum, or Old Sarum, and defeated a British army opposed to his progress near that place, of which he immediately after took possession. Four years subsequently another decisive battle was fought, at "Beranbyrig," or Barbury Castle, near Marlborough, in which the Britons were again routed, and Wiltshire shortly became incorporated in the kingdom of Wessex.

It derives its name from Wilton, which, for a long period anterior to the Norman Conquest, and for a considerable time after that event, was its principal town, and still continues the county town. Wiltshire was, till lately, wholly in the diocese of Salisbury, province of Canterbury; but by the act of the 6th and 7th of William IV., cap. 77, the deaneries of Cricklade and Malmesbury have been annexed to the diocese of Gloucester and Bristol. It forms the two archdeaconries of Sarum and Wilts, the former comprising the deaneries of Amesbury, Chalk, Potterne, Salisbury, Wilton, and Wily, and the latter those of Avebury, Cricklade, Malmesbury, and Marlborough: the total number of parishes is 295. For purposes of civil government it is divided into the hundreds of Alderbury, Amesbury, Bradford, Branch and Dole, Calne, Cawden and Cadworth, Chalk, Chippenham, Damerham (North and South), Downton, Dunworth, Elstub and Everley, Frustfield, Heytesbury, Kingsbridge, Kinwardstone, Malmesbury, Melksham, Mere, Potterne and Cannings, Ramsbury, Selkley, Swanborough, Underditch, Warminster, Westbury, Whorwelsdown, and Highworth, Cricklade, and Staple. It contains the city of Salisbury; the borough and market towns of Calne, Chippenham, Cricklade, Devizes, Malmesbury, Marlborough, and Westbury; the borough of Wilton; and the market-towns of Amesbury, Great Bradford, Hindon, Market-Lavington, Melksham, Mere, Swindon, Trowbridge, Warminster, and Wootton-Bassett. By the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, the county was divided into the Northern and Southern divisions, each empowered to send two members to parliament; two citizens are returned for Salisbury; two representatives for each of the boroughs of Chippenham, Cricklade, Devizes, and Marlborough; and one each for Calne, Malmesbury, Westbury, and Wilton. The county is included in the Western circuit: the Lent assizes are held at Salisbury, and the summer assizes at Devizes; the quarter-sessions are held at Devizes in the winter, at Salisbury in the spring, at Warminster in the summer, and at Marlborough in the autumn. The county gaol is at Fisherton-Anger, the county house of correction at Devizes, and the bridewells at Devizes and Marlborough.

The form of the county is nearly an ellipse, the transverse diameter of which bears north and south. It is common to consider it as separated into North and South, by a line passing through it from east to west, at or near Devizes; but the natural division is into South-east Wilts and North-west Wilts, by an irregular line extending from the confines of Berkshire, near Bishopston, south-westward; to those of Somerset, near Maiden-Bradley. South-east Wilts, containing nearly 500,000 acres, thus comprehends, and is almost entirely occupied by, the whole of the Wiltshire Downs, with their intersecting valleys, forming the western division of the ranges of chalk hills which occupy so great a portion of Hampshire, and a smaller extent of Berks. At a distance, this portion of the county presents the appearance of a large elevated plain; but on a nearer approach its surface is found to be broken by numerous and frequently extensive valleys, and to possess an almost constant series of gentle eminences, but no where a mountainous elevation: the declivities on one side of some of the ridges are very abrupt, while on the other they sink gently, in irregular gradation, sometimes into a perfect flat. The two grand divisions of the chalk hills are into Marlborough Downs, being those to the north of the Kennet and Avon canal, and Salisbury Downs, or Plain, consisting of nearly all the county southward of that line: these great districts are separated by the vale of Pewsey, and the only difference in their general appearance is, that the eminences of the former are more abrupt and elevated than those of the latter. The most extensive level prevails around Stonehenge, where the scenery is peculiarly tame. On Marlborough Downs are scattered many of the singular masses of stone called "grey wethers," and, when broken, "Sarsden-stones," or, by contraction, "Sarsons." The principal valleys display scenes of rich meadow and arable lands, adorned with seats, villages, and occasionally woods, and are traversed by streams of excellent water, of which those descending from Salisbury Plain take a direction towards Wilton and Salisbury. The North-western division of the county presents a remarkably different appearance, being a rich tract of vale land, extending from the base of the Downs to the northern and western confines of the county, and generally so flat that few deviations from the ordinary level are perceptible: approaching the Cotswold hills of Gloucestershire, however, the surface becomes gradually more elevated. This low plain is so well wooded, that, when viewed from any of the surrounding hills, it appears like a vast plantation. The most remarkable eminences in the county, and some of those which command the finest prospects, are, Beacon Hill, near Amesbury, which rises to the height of 600 feet above the level of the sea; Bidcombe Hill, near Maiden-Bradley; Codford Hill; the high grounds near Standlinch House; Old Sarum Hill, 339 feet high; and Westbury Down, 775 feet high.

The courses of crops are very various; in the South-eastern district the red wheat is most commonly produced. Barley is a favourite crop in the chalk district, but hardly in any other part of the county: a few peas and beans are grown in the north-western parts of the county: rye is often sown as spring food for sheep, but is seldom suffered to stand for a corn crop. Turnips are extensively cultivated on the chalky and stone-brash soils: rape, or cole-seed, is grown to a great extent on the Downs; as also are vetches in this and in the north-western district. Potatoes are much cultivated, particularly on the rich sands adjoining the chalk. The grass lands of the north-eastern district are of the richest quality, and are partly occupied by dairies, and partly in the fattening of cattle. The cheese, which is the only produce of the numerous dairies, excepting the poor kind of butter made from the whey, is well known and much esteemed under the name of "North Wiltshire." Bordering on the streams of the Downs are continued narrow tracts of meadow land, under an excellent system of irrigation, which became general about the commencement of the last century: the quantity is estimated at about 20,000 acres. With the grass lands of Wiltshire may be classed its spacious downs, which are unclosed, and subject to common rights; and though a portion of them is always under tillage, yet by far the most extensive tracts are covered with a fine native sward, affording food to no less than 500,000 sheep and lambs during the summer and autumn.

Wiltshire was anciently well wooded, but its present

Woodlands are of comparatively small extent. Different parts near its border are occupied by valuable woods, generally in a thriving condition, though much injured by cattle, to which they are common. The only forest still remaining in a well-wooded state, is that of Saver-nake, the property of the Earl of Ailesbury, which is about sixteen miles in circumference, and situated to the south-east of Marlborough. Cranborne Chace occupied a long narrow tract on the extreme southern verge of the county, and contained six lodges, with walks appropriated to each, the whole under the care of a ranger deputed by Lord Rivers, as lord of the chace; but it has lately been disfranchised, his lordship receiving an annual payment from the owners of the woods in it, and the lands adjoining. Vernditch Chace, belonging to the Earl of Pembroke, adjoins the latter on the east, and is now nearly all under cultivation. Grovely Forest, generally called Grovely Woods, also belongs to Lord Pembroke, and occupies a long narrow tract of the high ground between the valleys of the Nadder and the Wily. The ancient fortress of Penchett, or Ponselt, near Salisbury, is now better known as Clarendon Park and Woods, the property of Sir F. H. Bathurst. The wastes are comparatively trifling, and consist chiefly of small marshy commons, most of them in the north-western part of the county, where are also a few small heaths.

The Mineral productions are of little importance. The chalk, forming the substratum of nearly all the extensive south-eastern district, is, in some places, extremely hard, though more frequently of a soft marly texture; the finest kind is found at Sidbury Hill, which furnishes a supply to several of the western counties. Sandstone is obtained in the low grounds both of North and South Wilts: the "corn-grate" is frequently found in masses so thin as to be employed in the roofing of houses; it is also used for building and paving: a more regular stratified sandstone occurs under the sandy surface at Swindon, and is in much request for paving, for cisterns, and for tombstones. The inferior kind of limestone, found in the county between Highworth and Clack, is used only for making and repairing roads. On the western side of the county, bordering on Somersetshire, are numerous and extensive quarries of a fine kind of freestone; and those at Box, near Bath, are among the most celebrated in the vicinity of that city, and produce a great variety of fossil shells and other marine exuviae. Near Wootton-Bassett, in the blue clay, and near Grittleton, in the freestone strata, other singular fossil remains are found. The freestone quarries at Chilmark, Tisbury, and that neighbourhood, are extensive, and the stone is of a very superior quality.

The Manufactures are of considerable extent and importance, particularly that of woollen goods. At Salisbury great quantities of flannel were made till within the last twenty years, and also fancy woollens; but the manufacture has gradually declined, and a very small quantity of flannel and linsey is now made. This city has also a manufacture of cutlery and steel goods of great excellence. Wilton has a manufacture of carpets and of kerseymere and linsey; and Bradford, Trowbridge, Westbury, and all the adjacent towns and villages, from Chippenham to Heytesbury inclusive, carry on extensive woollen manufactures, chiefly of superfine broad-cloth, kerseymere, and fancy cloths. At Mere and in its vicinity is a manufacture of linen, chiefly dowlas and bed-ticking; and at Aldbourn is one of cotton goods, chiefly fustians and thicksets. The manufacture of silk has been introduced at Devizes; and the parishes of Stourton and Maiden-Bradley, and others in their vicinity, participate to a small extent in the neighbouring linen manufacture of Dorset, and the silk manufacture of Bruton, in Somersetshire. Ale of a superior quality is brewed in some parts of the county, and a considerable quantity of it is sold in London, under the names of "Wiltshire" and "Kennet" ale. The commerce consists chiefly in the exportation of the agricultural and manufacturing produce: of the former there is a considerable surplus, principally wheat, barley, fat-cattle, calves, sheep, hogs, and cheese, part of which is taken to the London market, and the rest to Bath, Bristol, and the eastern parts of Somerset. Wiltshire, besides supplying its own woollen manufactures with the raw material, also sends a quantity to other counties. The principal imports are the ordinary articles of merchandise, coal, and cows for the supply of the dairy districts.

The rivers and streams are very numerous, and all of them rise either within the county, or near its borders; the principal are the Isis, or Thames, the Lower Avon, the Kennet, and the Salisbury, or Wiltshire and Hampshire Avon, not one of which is navigable within its limits. The Kennet and Avon canal crosses the centre of the county from west to east, and connects the navigation of the Lower Avon with that of the Kennet and the Thames; the act of parliament for its formation was obtained in 1794, and several others for the alteration of the course originally designed for it, and for the raising of additional funds, were afterwards passed. The line was not completed and opened until the end of the year 1809. The Wilts and Berks canal, branching from the Kennet and Avon at Semington, about two miles to the west of Devizes, passes northward, by Melksham, to the vicinities of Chippenham and Calne, to each of which towns it has a short branch: the act for its formation was passed in 1795, but the work experienced many delays. The North Wilts canal, executed under an act obtained in 1813, begins in the Wilts and Berks canal near Swindon, and terminates in the Thames and Severn canal at Weymoor Bridge, in the parish of Latton, being eight miles and three furlongs in length. The Thames and Severn canal crosses only the northern extremity of the county, passing the northern bank of the Isis, and near the town of Cricklade. The Great Western railway enters the county a little to the east of Stratton St. Margaret's, and running to the north of Swindon, and by Wootton-Bassett, Chippenham, and Corsham, quits it a little beyond the last-named town. At Swindon, the Cheltenham and Great Western Union railway joins the Great Western line, entering the county at Poole-Keynes, near the head of the river Thames.

The county contained the Roman stations of Sorbiodunum, at Old Sarum; Verlucio, in the vicinity of Heddington; and Cunetio, a little to the east of Marlborough: this people had also several other permanent settlements in Wiltshire, particularly at Easton-Grey, Wanborough, near Heytesbury, and Littlecot. The principal Roman road that traversed it was a continuation of the Julia Strata, which, entering from Bath, proceeded north-eastward, by Medley and Spye Park, to the station of Verlucio, and thence by Colston and across the river Kennet to that of Cunetio, beyond which it stretched across the eastern confines of the county. The Fosse-way branched from the Julia Strata at Bath-Ford, and passed by Banner Down, Easton-Grey, and across the turnpike-road between Tetbury and Malmesbury, to Cirencester, in Gloucestershire: another great road entered from Cirencester, and passed south-eastward by Cricklade to Wanborough, at which latter place it separated into two branches, one proceeding by Baydon, towards Speen, in Berkshire, and the other by Ogbourne, Mildenhall, Manton, and Chute Park, towards Winchester. Sorbiodunum was connected with other stations by three roads, one of which ran by Bemerton, Stratford St. Anthony, and Woodyates-Inn, towards Dorchester; another by Ford, Winterslow, Buckholt Farm, and Bossington, towards Winchester; and the third by Porton and Idmiston, towards Silchester, in the north of Hampshire. The Ridge-way, extending north-eastward from Avebury into the adjoining county of Berks, is also mentioned by Whitaker as a Roman road. Wiltshire is distinguished for remarkably numerous traces (chiefly in its south-eastern districts) of the nations which successively occupied it during the earlier periods of history. Of these, the stupendous monument of Stonehenge, two miles westward of Amesbury, and that of Avebury, about five miles to the west of Marlborough, are entitled to primary notice. The vast earthwork of the Wansdyke is conjectured by some to have been the northern boundary of the Belgæ, and supposed to have intersected the whole county, from the north of Somerset to the north of Hampshire: though in the greater part of its course it can be distinctly traced only in detached spots, yet, throughout the range of hills to the south and west of Marlborough, it is still tolerably entire, and in one place is conspicuous, in a bold and connected line, for the distance of ten or twelve miles. The sepulchral mounds called barrows, or tumuli, are abundant, more particularly around Stonehenge and Avebury: the most remarkable is Silbury Hill, near Avebury. There is a cromlech at Clatford-Bottom, near the village of Clatford, and another at Littleton-Drew. The Roman roads may yet be distinctly traced in several places; and the Ridge-way is clearly visible on the high chalk ridge extending north-eastward from Avebury into Berkshire.

The encampments, which are very numerous, vary in the period of their formation, in their size, shape, and mode of construction, and in the peculiarities of their situations. Some of them are undoubtedly the work of British tribes and of the Belgæ, and others of successive invaders, the Romans, the Saxons, and the Danes. The largest and most noted are, the vast fortifications of Old Sarum, inclosing an area of nearly thirty acres, the foundations of the walls of which are still visible; Chidbury Camp, to the north-west of Tidworth, including seventeen acres; and Vespasian's Camp, as it is commonly called, to the westward of Amesbury, inclosing an area of thirty-nine acres. There are many others nearly equal in extent, and scarcely less interesting to the antiquary, evidently formed for purposes of military defence; and there is a variety of other earthworks spread over Salisbury Plain and Marlborough Downs, the uses of which are unknown; some of them are considered the sites of British villages, others as denoting places consecrated to religion. Many less vestiges of antiquity, such as tessellated pavements, coins, urns, &c., of the Romans, and fragments of sculpture, daggers, shields, gold and silver ornaments, and a great variety of other articles of British, Saxon, Danish, or Norman manufacture, have been discovered at different periods. The number of Religious houses, including colleges and hospitals, was about fifty-seven; and there are remains of the abbeys of Kingswood, Laycock, and Malmesbury; of the priory of Bradenstoke; and of the nunnery of Kingston St. Michael. There yet exist extensive remains of the ancient castles of Castle-Combe, Devizes, Farley, Ludgershall, Malmesbury, Marlborough, and Wardour. Amongst the principal of the numerous seats of the nobility and gentry, the most splendid are, Bowood, the residence of the Marquess of Lansdowne, lord-lieutenant of the county; Charlton House, that of the Earl of Suffolk; Stowerhead, of Sir H. R. Hoare, Bart.; Longleat, of the Marquess of Bath; Tottenham Park, of the Marquess of Ailesbury; Wardour Castle, of Lord Arundel; Castle, Wilton House, of the Earl of Pembroke; Longford, of the Earl of Radnor; and Corsham House, of Lord Methuen. There are a chalybeate spring at Chippenham, a chalybeate and saline aperient spring near Melksham, and mineral springs of different other qualities at Heywood, Holt, and Middle Hill Spa, near Box. Wiltshire gives the inferior title of Earl to the Marquess of Winchester.

WILY (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of WILTON, hundred of BRANCH and DOLE, Hindon and S. divisions of WILTS, 6 miles (S. E. by E.) from Heytesbury; containing, with the tything of Deptford, 508 inhabitants. The parish is on the high western road, and comprises 2277*a.* 1*r.* 20*p.*, of which 1165 acres are arable, 1100 meadow and pasture, and scarcely one acre woodland; the soil is a black loam, on a substratum of chalk. The village is pleasantly situated, and contains the Deptford inn, which is capable of affording accommodation to the most distinguished families. A large sheep-fair is held on the 4th of October. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £21. 14. 2., and in the gift of the Earl of Pembroke: the tithes have been commuted for £535, and the glebe contains 10½ acres. Elizabeth Mervyn, in 1581, bequeathed 7½ bushels of wheat and 100 ells of linen and cloth, to be provided by the possessor of her estates, on Good-Friday, and distributed among the poor of Wily, Steeple-Langford, Upton, Padworth, and Tisbury; and Christopher Willoughby, in 1678, gave £200 for the poor of Wily and Marlborough. About a mile from the village is a large British encampment called Badbury-Rings or Wily Camp, which occupies a point of down projecting from the principal ridge, and incloses an area of more than seventeen acres; and two miles from Deptford inn is Yarnbrough Castle, a Roman encampment.

WIMBISH (All Saints), a parish, in the union of SAFFRON-WALDEN, hundred of UTTLESFORD, N. division of ESSEX, 4¼ miles (E. S. E.) from Saffron-Walden; containing 983 inhabitants. The parish, including the hamlet of Thunderley, is about sixteen miles in circumference, and the scenery is much enriched with trees of stately growth. The living is a vicarage, with that of Thunderley united in 1425, valued in the king's books at £8; patron and incumbent, the Rev. J. Raymond. The rectory is a sinecure, valued at £12; patron and incumbent, the Rev. J. Dolignon. The tithes of the rector have been commuted for £560; those of an impropriator for £195; and of the vicar for £275; there are 162 acres of appropriate glebe, and 7 of vicarial. The church is an ancient structure of stone, with a tower of brick replacing the original one, which had fallen down.

WIMBLEDON (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of KINGSTON, W. division of the hundred of BRIXTON, E. division of SURREY, 7 miles (S. W.) from London; containing 2630 inhabitants. The name of this place, anciently written Wymbandune, Wymbaldon, and Wymbledon, is supposed to have been derived from one of its early proprietors. The principal feature in the parish is Wimbledon Park, which comprises 922 acres, and contains a sheet of water covering a space of about forty acres; it is one of the finest in the county, and comprises some very stately trees, especially ever-green oaks and cedars, one of the latter of which measures, at two feet from the ground, nineteen feet in circumference. In the pleasure-grounds is a curious sarcophagus, besides several blocks of marble taken from the French during the war, and which were presented to the late Earl Spencer, then first lord of the admiralty, and are said to have been brought from Pompeii for Buonaparte. The common is surrounded by seats of the nobility and gentry, and exhibits at the south-west angle a circular encampment with a single ditch, including a surface of seven acres; the trench is very deep and perfect. It is said to mark the site of a battle fought in 568, between Ceawlin, King of the West Saxons, and Ethelbert, King of Kent, in which the latter was defeated, and his two generals, Oslac and Cnebban, slain. At the north-east angle of the common is the village, consisting of one street, containing many respectable houses; and in detached situations are numerous handsome seats and pleasant villas. A little to the north of the encampment is a well, the water of which has never been known to freeze. The London and South-Western railway passes through the parish, and about half a mile from the church is an intermediate station. The mills of the English Copper Company are in the parish; and there are also works for the printing of calico. A pleasure-fair is held on the first Monday after Lady-day, and the two following days.

The LIVING is a perpetual curacy; net income, £170; patrons, the Dean and Chapter of Worcester, as appropriators of the rectory, which is valued in the king's books at £35. 2. 11. The church, a neat structure in the Grecian style, situated about a quarter of a mile north of the village, was erected in 1787, on the site of an edifice which had fallen into decay; on the south side is Cecil chapel, an ancient building, in which are several portions of mail armour and monuments, one an altar-tomb of black marble to the memory of Sir Edward Cecil. In the east window are some remains of painted glass representing the arms of the families of Leeds, Salisbury, Dorset, &c.; and in the churchyard are several handsome mausoleums and monuments, including one to the memory of G. S. Newton, R.A., a painter of considerable merit. There is a place of worship for Independents; also five almshouses erected in 1839, by subscription, and endowed with the interest of £1000, the profits of a fancy-fair held in the grounds of Wimbledon House, belonging to Mrs. Marryat, which are laid out with excellent taste. On digging in the grounds of Belvidere House, in 1838, to make space for an artificial piece of water, two fine figures of white marble, as large as life, were discovered several feet below the surface, one representing Summer, and the other Winter. It is said that Catherine Parr, after the death of Henry VIII., occupied a house in the village, now a large school for young gentlemen; and the celebrated Lord Burleigh is reported to have resided here, and planted the magnificent avenue of elms on the common. Judge Park, also, lived many years in the parish, and the inhabitants have erected a monument in the church to his memory.

WIMBLINGTON, a hamlet, in the parish of DODDINGTON, union and hundred of NORTH WITCHFORD, ISLE of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, 4 miles (S.) from March; containing 1099 inhabitants. It comprises 7590 acres, of which 26 are common or waste. The village is well-inhabited, and situated upon the road which leads from the villages of Chatteris and Doddington to the town of March; it is very nearly in the centre of the poor law union of North Witchford. The tithes have been commuted for £2068. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also a school, erected in 1817, and endowed with lands of which the rental is £144 per annum.

WIMBOLDSLEY, a township, in the parish of MIDDLEWICH, union and hundred of NORTHWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Middlewich; containing 106 inhabitants. The Grand Junction railway passes through the township. Lea Hall was for a considerable period the residence of the celebrated physician, Dr. Fothergill, who died in 1780.

WIMBORNE (ALL SAINTS, or ALLHALLOWS), a parish, in the union of WIMBORNE and CRANBORNE, hundred of CRANBORNE, Wimborne division of DORSET, $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile (N.) from Wimborne St. Giles; containing 175 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, united in 1732 to that of Wimborne St. Giles, and valued in the king's books at £9. 4. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$. The church, which appears to have been formerly the mother church to St. Giles, was pulled down in 1733.

WIMBORNE (ST. GILES), a parish, in the union of WIMBORNE and CRANBORNE, hundred of WIMBORNE ST. GILES, Wimborne division of DORSET, 5 miles (S.) from Woodyates; containing 475 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3970a. 8p., of which 1704 acres are arable, 1033 meadow and pasture, 362 woodland, 705 down and common, and 57 homesteads and gardens; the soil is light, resting on a substratum of chalk. The living is a rectory, with that of Wimborne All Saints united, valued in the king's books at £12. 13. 4., and in the gift of the Earl of Shaftesbury: the tithes have been commuted for £527. 8., and the glebe comprises 107 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church, rebuilt in 1732, on the union of the livings, is a neat structure in the Grecian style, with a tower crowned by an open balustrade, and surmounted at the angles with ornamental urns; it is near the seat of the Earl of Shaftesbury, and is the burial-place of the family. There are almshouses for eleven people, founded in 1624, by Sir Anthony Ashley, Bart., and endowed with a large farm.

WIMBORNE-MINSTER

(ST. CUTHBERGA), a market-town and parish, and the head of the union of WIMBORNE and CRANBORNE, in the hundred of BADBURY, Wimborne division of DORSET, 26 miles (E. N. E.) from Dorchester, and 101 (S. W. by W.) from London; containing, with the tythings of Holt and Leigh, and the manor of Kingston-Lacy, 4326 inhabitants. This place, which is of very remote antiquity, was in the time of the Romans of considerable importance as a station to their camp at Badbury, and by them was denominated Vindogladia, or Ventageladia, terms descriptive of its situation near to, or between, two rivers. The Saxon appellation of Vinburnan, whence the present name is obviously deduced, is of similar import; and the epithet of Minster, from its ancient monastery, is added as a term of distinction. Some have supposed this to have been the scene of the battle between Kearl, Earl of Devon, and the Danes, in 851, in which the latter were defeated; but Bishop Gibson states this to have happened at Wenbury, in Devonshire, with which he endeavours to identify Wicganbeorche, the place where, in the Saxon Chronicle, it is stated to have occurred. About the commencement of the tenth century, Edward the Elder, in the beginning of his reign, being opposed by Ethelwald, son of his uncle Ethelbert, who aspired to the crown, encamped at Badbury, with a considerable army, and advanced upon Wimborne, where Ethelwald had fortified himself with a small force, which he captured, after an ineffectual resistance from the latter. But the principal cause of its celebrity was a nunnery, founded previously to 705, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary, by St. Cuthberga, daughter of Cenred, and sister of Ina, both kings of the West Saxons, which, about the year 900, being destroyed by the Danes, was subsequently converted into a house for Secular canons, whose revenue, at the Dissolution, was valued at £131. 14. The foundress became an inmate of the nunnery, where she died, and was buried in the church, of which she was made the tutelar saint. The town is situated in a fertile vale, near the confluence of the rivers Stour and Allen, on the main road from London to Poole; the streets are irregular, and the houses in general of mean appearance. At its eastern extremity, the Allen divides into two branches, over which are two bridges. Leland thus describes it: "the town is yet meatly good, and reasonably well inhabited; it hath bene a very large thing, and was in price in the tyme of the West Saxon kinges. Ther be in and about it diverse chappelles, that in tymes paste were, as I have learnid, parochie chirchis of the very town of Wimburne." And in another place he says: "the soile about Wimburn-Minstre self is very good for corn, grasse, and woodde." The town-hall, which formerly stood near the square, long since fell into decay: it occupied the site of St. Peter's chapel, sometimes styled the king's free chapel, which, having been neglected soon after the Reformation, was, with the cemetery, containing about one acre of ground, vested in the corporation, and their successors in fee, for the erection of a town-hall, the residue of the profits to be applied towards the maintenance of the choristers in the church. The market is on Friday; and fairs take place on the Friday before Good-Friday, and on September 14th, each for two days, for horses and cattle. Constables are appointed at the manorial court held at Michaelmas.

On the establishment of the Secular canons, when the nunnery was destroyed by the Danes, the church became collegiate, and a royal free chapel, exempt, by letters of Edward II., in the eleventh year of his reign, from all ordinary jurisdiction, imposition, &c. In Leland's time the society consisted of a dean, four prebendaries, five cantuarists, three vicars, and four secondaries. On the Dissolution of the college, its possession lapsed to the crown; and Elizabeth, in the fifth year of her reign, on re-establishing the school, appointed twelve of the inhabitants governors, whom she incorporated, with a common seal, and to whom she granted the tithes of the parish, and other endowments of the college and school. In the reign of Charles I., the governors having surrendered these possessions, the king re-granted them in full, on condition of their providing the necessary officers for the service of the church and the school, with all ecclesiastical jurisdiction within the parish, and power to appoint the official and registrar of the peculiar court. Three incumbents are elected by the governors, who serve the church in rotation weekly; they also appoint three clerks, an organist, three singing-men, and six singing-boys. The church, commonly called the MINSTER, is a large cruciform structure, with a quadrangular tower rising from the intersection, and another at the west end, the former in the Norman style, the latter in the later English; the east window is in the early English style. A tempest destroyed the spire about 1600, and it has not been replaced. The chancel and choir are approached from the nave by a flight of steps, and are supported by pillars: in the choir are sixteen stalls, with canopies of carved oak. Very extensive repairs and restorations have been effected during the last few years, which have greatly increased the splendour of this interesting edifice. Five stained glass windows have been put up in the choir, of which the three at the east end were presented by Mr. Bankes, the one on the north side of the altar by the Earl of Devon, and the opposite one, on the south, by the Duke of Beaufort. St. Cuthberga is supposed to have been entombed in the wall of the chancel: here also was King Ethelred's tomb, of which the brass plate fixed in the floor is all that remains. On the south side of the choir is an altar-tomb, with the effigies of the Duke and Duchess of Somerset, the parents of Margaret, Countess of Richmond, mother of Henry VII.; and on the opposite side is a similar tomb, but without figures, to the memory of Gertrude, Marchioness of Exeter, mother of the unfortunate Edward Courtenay, last earl of Devonshire. In the south aisle is a monument, with an armed recumbent figure, to Sir Edmund Uvedale, Knt., dated 1606. At Holt is a chapel; and there are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyans; also a Roman Catholic chapel at Stapehill, in the vicinity.

The free grammar school, originally established by Margaret, Countess of Richmond, in 1497, was re-founded by Queen Elizabeth, in 1563. St. Margaret's hospital, of ancient and obscure foundation, consists of seven good tenements for five men and two women; and in a chapel attached, divine service is occasionally performed. A second hospital, called Courtenay's, situated at the east end of the town, was built pursuant to the will of Gertrude, Marchioness of Exeter, bearing date 1557; there are six almspeople. At Pamphill, in the parish, are a school and almshouse, founded pursuant to the will of Roger Gillingham, dated July 2nd, 1695; the schoolmaster receives £20, and each of the almspeople £5 per annum. The poor law union of Wimborne and Cranborne comprises 24 parishes or places, and contains a population of 15,949. This is supposed to be the birthplace of Matthew Prior, the statesman and poet, who was educated at the grammar school. The Duke of Monmouth, after his escape from the battle of Sedgemoor, is stated to have been arrested in a small inclosure called Shagsheath, near this place; but this is doubted by some, who are of opinion that his capture was effected near Ringwood. Badbury Camp, a circular intrenchment, surrounded by three ramparts, inclosing an area of eighteen acres, is in the vicinity: Roman coins, urns, and a sword, were dug up in 1665.

WIMBOTSHAM (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of DOWNHAM, hundred of CLACKCLOSE, W. division of NORFOLK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. by E.) from Downham-Market; containing 582 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 2020 acres, of which 1393 are arable, 472 pasture and meadow, and 58 woodland: the village is situated on the road to Lynn, and the river Ouse flows up to one extremity of the parish. The living is a discharged rectory, annexed to the vicarage of Stow-Bardolph, and valued in the king's books at £5. 6. 8.: the tithes have been commuted for £378. 11., and the glebe comprises 9 acres. The church is chiefly in the Norman style, with later additions; the chancel is separated from the nave by a handsome Norman arch, and the north and south entrances have enriched arches of the same character. The poor have one-third of £60, the rent of 100 acres allotted under the act for draining Downham.

WIMESWOULD (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of LOUGHBOROUGH, hundred of EAST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Loughborough; containing 1270 inhabitants. The parish comprises nearly 3500 acres, of which the soil is generally clay, though in some parts sand and gravel; the surface is gently undulated. There are quarries of blue lias of an inferior kind, and gravel of excellent quality is raised for the roads. The village is pleasantly situated, and watered by a brook; the population is partly employed in the manufacture of cotton stockings and elastic worsted hose, and many children in working patterns on net-edgings. A market and a fair, granted by Edward III., have long been discontinued. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9; net income, £191; patrons and proprietors, the Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge. The tithes were commuted for land in 1757; the glebe comprises 78 acres, with a small house. The church is a handsome structure in the decorated and later English styles, with a square embattled tower, formerly surmounted by a lofty crocketed spire, which was destroyed by lightning. There are places of worship for Baptists, Primitive Methodists, and Wesleyans.

WIMPOLE (ST. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of CAXTON and ARRINGTON, hundred of WETHERLEY, county of CAMBRIDGE, 6 miles (S. E. by S.) from Caxton; containing 464 inhabitants. This place, which is on the road from Royston to Huntingdon, is remarkable as the residence of the Earl of Hardwicke, whose magnificent seat, Wimpole Hall, splendidly embellished, and surrounded by a beautiful demesne, was visited by Her Majesty and Prince Albert in October 1843. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £18, and in the gift of the Earl: the tithes have been commuted for £567, and the glebe comprises one acre. The church, which has been enlarged by fitting up a private chapel with seats, contains various monuments to the Yorke family, including one to the memory of Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, who died in 1764, and was interred here.

WINCANTON (ST. PETER AND ST. PAUL), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of NORTON-FERRIS, E. division of SOMERSET, 34 miles (E.) from Taunton, and 108 (W. by S.) from London; containing 2296 inhabitants. This place, which is of very great antiquity, was anciently called Wyndcaleton, and derived that name from its situation on the windings of the river Cale, by which it is bounded on the west. At a very early period it was the scene of many sanguinary conflicts between the Britons and Saxons, and subsequently of numerous encounters between the latter and the Danes, who made frequent irruptions into this part of the country. During the parliamentary war, some of the earliest engagements between the contending parties took place in the immediate vicinity of this town, in which, according to Burnet's History of his own Times, was shed the first blood in the Revolution of 1688; though some state this to have occurred at Cirencester. In 1747, it suffered material injury from an accidental fire that destroyed a considerable portion of the town, to which calamity may be attributed the uniform appearance it afterwards assumed.

The town is pleasantly situated on the western declivity of a hill rising gently from the river Cale, and consists principally of four regular streets, containing some well-built houses. The environs abound with interesting scenery, and on the south is an uninterrupted view of the fine Vale of Blackmore, extending for many miles: the land is extremely fertile, and within a short distance of the town are several gentlemen's seats. The manufacture of linen and bed-ticking was formerly carried on to a considerable extent, but within the last few years has greatly declined: a branch of the silk manufacture has been introduced. The market is on Wednesday, and is well supplied with corn, cattle, cheese, and butter; the fairs are on Easter-Tuesday and September 29th. The town is divided into the Borough and the Tything; two constables for the former are annually appointed at the manorial court, and a court leet for the hundred is also held annually, at which a tything-man is chosen for the latter. The parish comprises by measurement 4130 acres: there are quarries of stone for building and for mending the roads. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £123; joint patrons, U. G. H. T. and I. Messiter, Esqrs., as owners of the rectory: the tithes have been commuted for £490, and the glebe comprises 45 acres. The church, a spacious and neat edifice, with a square embattled tower, was enlarged in 1835. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, and Independents; also a national school. Various charitable bequests have been made for distribution among the poor. The union of Wincanton comprises 39 parishes or places, 37 of which are in the county of Somerset, and two in that of Dorset, and contains a population of 21,286. At Stavordale, the north-eastern extremity of the parish, a small priory of Augustine canons, dedicated to St. James, is said to have been built by Sir William Zouch, which, in the 24th of Henry VIII., was annexed to the priory of Taunton: the remains, especially the richly-groined roof and some portions of the chapel, are in good preservation. The Earl of Ilchester, among his other inferior titles, takes that of Baron Stavordale from this place. At Horwood, about a mile south-east of the town, are two mineral springs, resembling in their properties those at Cheltenham. An urn, containing several Roman coins, was discovered in the parish many years since. Sir James Dyer, chief justice of the court of common pleas in the reign of Elizabeth, was a native of Wincanton.

WINCEBY (ST. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of HORNCastle, hundred of HILL, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 2½ miles (N. W. by N.) from Bolingbroke; containing 70 inhabitants, and consisting of 842*a.* 3*r.* The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 0. 2½, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £205. 5., and the glebe comprises 29 acres. The church is an ancient structure. A battle was fought here during the parliamentary war, in which the king's troops were defeated.

WINCH, EAST (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union and hundred of FREEBRIDGE-LYNN, W. division of NORFOLK, 5½ miles (S. E. by E.) from Lynn; containing 440 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 2530*a.* 3*r.* 27*p.*, of which about 1800 acres are arable, 541 meadow and pasture, 69 woodland, and the remainder common, roads, and waste. The village is on the road from Lynn to Norwich. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8; patron and incumbent, the Rev. Geo. Edw. Kent; impropiators, the Landowners. The residue of the impropriate tithes, of which the chief had been exchanged for land, have been commuted for a rent-charge of £3. 10., and the vicarial for £184; the glebe comprises 14 acres. The church is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower; in the east window of the chancel are the arms of Vere and Howard, and on the north side is the ancient chapel of St. Mary, the burial-place of the latter family. At the inclosure, 80 acres of common were allotted to the poor; and there are 29¾ acres of land, producing £42 per annum, for the repair of the church, and the relief of the poor, given by Robert Astey, in 1607. Near Grancourt House, formerly the seat of Sir William Howard, who purchased the manor in the reign of Edward the First, are some slight remains of a religious house.

WINCH, WEST (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of FREEBRIDGE-LYNN, W. division of NORFOLK, 3 miles (S. by E.) from Lynn; containing 415 inhabitants. It is bounded on the west by the navigable river Nar, and comprises 1208*a.* 1*r.*, of which 437 acres are arable, 542 meadow and pasture, and 210 common and waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £324, and the glebe consists of 21 acres. The church is an ancient structure in the early and decorated English styles, with a square embattled tower.

WINCHAM, a township, in the parish of GREAT BUDWORTH, union of NORTHWICH, hundred of BUCKLOW, N. division of the county of CHESTER, 2 miles (N. E. by E.) from Northwich; containing 650 inhabitants.

WINCHCOMB (St. Peter), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the Lower division of the hundred of KIFFSGATE, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 15½ miles (N. E. by E.) from Gloucester, and 95 (W. N. W.) from London; containing 2613 inhabitants. This place, which is of equal antiquity and importance, was formerly called Wincelcumb (from the Saxon Wincel, a corner, and comb, a valley), descriptive of its situation in a nook or corner of the vale, of which its modern name is obviously a contraction. During the heptarchy, if not the metropolis of the kingdom of Mercia, it was at least the residence of some of the Mercian kings, of whom Offa founded a nunnery here in 787. Cenulph, who succeeded to the throne of that kingdom, after the death of Egferth, Offa's son, who survived his father only a few months, had a palace here, and, in 798, laid the foundation of the stately abbey, for 300 monks of the Benedictine order, which he endowed with an ample revenue, and dedicated with unusual splendour to the Blessed Virgin Mary. After the conclusion of the ceremony, which was conducted by Wulfred, Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by twelve other prelates, in the presence of the king himself, Cuthred, King of Kent, Sired, King of the East Saxons, ten dukes, and the flower of the Mercian nobles, Cenulph, leading to the high altar his captive, Ethelbert Pren, the usurper of the kingdom of Kent, whom he had made prisoner, generously restored him to his liberty without fine or ransom. Cenulph, in the year 819, was buried in the abbey which he had founded, where also the remains of his son and successor, Kenelm, were deposited; the latter was at length canonized, and the numerous pilgrimages made to his shrine greatly augmented the revenue of the monastery, which was subsequently re-dedicated to the Virgin Mary and St. Kenelm. It was afterwards in the possession of Secular priests, and had almost fallen into decay, when Oswald, Bishop of Worcester, in the year 985, reformed its discipline, recovered the lands of which it had been deprived, and restored to it the Benedictine monks, who held it till the Dissolution. This was a mitred abbey, the first summons of the abbot to parliament now on record being in 1265: its possessions were numerous, for, at the period of the Norman survey, no fewer than nineteen manors were annexed to it, independently of Winchcomb itself; but the monks, having opposed the Conqueror, were by him deprived of many of their lands. At the Dissolution the revenue was £759. 11. 9. The building is reported to have been exceedingly magnificent, and the establishment so prosperous at one period, that it is said to have been "equal to a little university." Very few traces of it, however, remain, but the memorial is preserved in the name of part of a hamlet, which is still called the Abbey demesnes.

Of the civil history of the place few particulars are recorded: the town appears to have been walled, and to the south of the church was an ancient fortress, or castle, which, according to Leland, having fallen into decay, and the ruins being overspread with ivy, gave the name of Ivy Castle to a spot now occupied only by a few cottages and gardens. WINCHCOMB is situated in a beautiful vale, at the northern base of the Cotswold hills, by which it is sheltered nearly on every side, and is watered by the little river Isbourne, which flows close to it on the south-east; it consists principally of three streets, extending in a long line from east to west, with North-street and a few smaller ones branching from them. The houses are in general low and of indifferent appearance, and from its being but little of a thoroughfare, the place preserves an air of seclusion and tranquillity, and has that venerable character which denotes an Anglo-Saxon town; it is abundantly supplied with excellent water from wells and springs. The cultivation of tobacco, which is said to have been first planted here after its introduction into the kingdom, in 1583, was for a considerable time a source of much profit to the inhabitants; but in the 12th of Charles I., that trade being restrained, the plantations were neglected. The principal branches of manufacture at present carried on are those of paper and silk, the former of which there are in the neighbourhood two large mills, and one for the latter; there is also a tanyard on a moderate scale. The market is on Saturday: fairs are held on the last Saturday in March, May 6th, and July 28th, for horses, cattle, and sheep; and two fairs take place at Michaelmas for the hiring of servants. Previously to the time of Canute, Winchcomb, with a small surrounding district, was a county of itself; and in the reign of Edward the Confessor the town was made a borough.

The LIVING is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £3. 4.; net income, £134; patron, Lord Sudeley; improprators, several proprietors of land. The tithes were commuted for laud in 1812. The church, partly erected by Abbot William, in the reign of Henry VI., and completed at the expense of the parishioners, munificently assisted by Ralph Boteler, Lord of Sudeley, is a spacious and handsome structure in the later English style, with a lofty square embattled tower crowned by pinnacles; the walls are embattled, and strengthened by buttresses, also terminating with pinnacles; the south porch, of which the roof is elaborately groined and highly enriched, is a beautiful specimen of the style. At Gretton is a chapel of ease. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans. A free grammar school was established in 1522, by Henry VIII., who endowed it with £9. 4. 6. per annum, which was afterwards confirmed by Queen Elizabeth: the school, after being long continued in a house belonging to the corporation, was united to a grammar school subsequently founded by Lady Frances Chandos, for which she erected a school-house in St. Nicholas'-street, endowing it with certain lands and tenements; the income, arising from nearly 20 acres of land, is £45. A school for teaching children to read was instituted by George Townsend, Esq., who endowed it with £5 per annum, as a salary for the master (since increased to £20 by the trustees), and also left funds for apprenticing the children, with whom a premium of £15 is given. There are likewise various bequests for the poor. The union of Winchcomb comprises 30 parishes or places; of which 27 are in the county of Gloucester, and 3 in that of Worcester, and contains a population of 10,000. There are two mineral springs in the parish, one a strong saline, the other chalybeate, and nearly similar to that of Cheltenham. In addition to the abbey of St. Mary, previously noticed, were a church dedicated to St. Nicholas, in the east part of the town, of which there are no remains, and an ancient hospital. About half a mile from the town are the beautiful remains of the magnificent castle of Sudeley, formerly belonging to the Botelers, lords of Sudeley, and which is noticed in the article on Sudeley-Manor. Tidenham of Winchcomb, Bishop of Worcester, and physician to Richard II., is supposed to have been a native of the town; and Dr. Christopher Mercet, an eminent naturalist and philosopher, was born here in 1614.

WINCHELSEA (St. Thomas the Apostle), a borough and parish, having separate jurisdiction, and formerly a market-town, in the union of RYE, locally in the hundred of GUESTLING, rape of HASTINGS, E. division of SUSSEX, 74 miles (E. by N.) from Chichester, and 66 $\frac{3}{4}$ (S. E.) from London; containing 687 inhabitants. The ancient town, which is supposed to have derived its name from its bleak and exposed situation near the Camber Point, was a place of considerable importance in the time of the Romans, but was destroyed by an inundation, about the close of the 13th century. The present town, which is at the distance of a mile and a half from the sea, was built upon an eminence well adapted to prevent a similar accident, in the reign of Edward I., who gave land for the purpose, and contributed largely towards its erection. The site, originally called Higham, was, by the munificence of that monarch, surrounded with walls and defended by three strong gates, which formed the principal entrances, and are still in good preservation. In the reign of Henry III., Winchelsea and Rye were annexed to the cinque-ports, but more as appendages than equal ports, being members of Hastings; in the different charters granted to these towns, they are invariably styled "ancient towns." The new town was invested with the same privileges as the old, and, enjoying all the benefits of the cinque-ports, it rapidly acquired a considerable degree of commercial importance. The inhabitants joining in the rebellion of Simon de Montfort, Edward I., after the defeat of the rebels at Evesham, advanced to this town, which he took by storm, but, on the submission of the insurgents, restored to them their privileges. In the reign of Edward III. it sustained material injury from the French, who, having landed on this part of the coast, burnt a portion of it; and it was subsequently plundered by the Spaniards, in the time of Richard II. But it experienced the greatest injury from the retiring of the sea, about the close of Elizabeth's reign, by which its harbour was destroyed, and its trade annihilated. The town occupies a space nearly two miles in circumference, divided into squares by streets intersecting each other at right angles, probably after the plan of the ancient town. The manufacture of cambric was introduced in 1760, but was soon discontinued, and a subsequent attempt to establish a factory of Italian crape was attended with no better success. A fair is held on May 14th, for cattle. An extensive mackerel-fishery is carried on in a detached portion of the parish, situated on the coast to the eastward of Rye, where is a coast-guard station for one officer and 12 men. The Royal Military canal commences at Cliff-End, and passes by the town parallel with the shore, till it enters the sea at Shorne-cliff, near Hythe.

According to the ancient charter, the government is vested in a mayor and twelve jurats, who are justices of the peace within the ancient town and its liberties, and hold quarterly courts of session for the borough, and also petty-sessions, when requisite. The borough received the elective franchise in the 42nd of Edward III., from which period till the 2nd of William IV. it continued to return two members, but was disfranchised by the act then passed, and joined to the borough of Rye. Jointly with Hastings, it sends canopy-bearers on the occasion of a coronation, these two places being entitled to every third turn, in common with the other cinque-ports. The court-house is an ancient building, of which the lower portion forms the gaol for the borough. The parish comprises about 800 acres. The LIVING is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4.; net income, £278; patrons, the Trustees of Sir W. Ashburnham, Bart. The choir, the only remaining portion of the ancient church, a magnificent cruciform structure, is now appropriated as the parochial church, and presents an elegant specimen of the early and decorated English styles; on the south side are some stalls and a piscina of beautiful design, and there are several splendid monuments, including three supposed to be memorials of Knights Templars, cross-legged and in armour, of which one, in particular, is hardly excelled by any in the kingdom. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. In addition to the church of St. Thomas were once two parochial churches dedicated respectively to St. Leonard and St. Giles. The remains of antiquity still visible are, the ruins of Camber Castle, erected by Henry VIII., a circular fortress with a round tower, which was the keep; the ancient gates of the town; and the interesting ruins of a monastery of Grey friars founded by Edward II., of which there are some fragments of its church dedicated to the Virgin Mary, forming a picturesque object embosomed in trees. On the site of the ancient cloisters, a handsome mansion in the early English style of domestic architecture, was erected in 1820, by Richard Stileman, Esq., the proprietor.

Robert, Archbishop of Canterbury, who died in 1313, was a native of the town. Winchelsea gives the title of Earl to the family of Finch.

WINCHENDON, NETHER (St. Nicholas), a parish, in the union of AYLESBURY, hundred of ASHENDON, county of BUCKINGHAM, 4 miles (S. by W.) from Waddesdon; containing 291 inhabitants. It comprises about 1560 acres, of which one-half is arable, and the remainder meadow and pasture. The living is a perpetual curacy; patron, Sir W. B. Cave, Bart.

WINCHENDON, UPPER (St. Mary Magdalene), a parish, in the union of AYLESBURY, hundred of ASHENDON, county of BUCKINGHAM, 6 miles (W. by N.) from Aylesbury; containing 218 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 1197 acres, of which the soil is generally a light and mellow mould. The living is a donative, valued in the king's books at £7. 17.; net income, £60; patron and impropiator, the Duke of Marlborough.

WINCHESTER, a city, having separate jurisdiction, and the head of a union, locally in the hundred of BUDLESGATE, Winchester and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, of which it is the capital, 63 miles (S. W. by W.) from London; containing, with the soke liberty, 10,732 inhabitants. This place, called by the ancient Britons Caer Gwent, from the whiteness of its chalky soil, was the Venta Belgarum of Ptolemy and Antoninus; and, on its subsequent occupation by the Saxons, it obtained the appellation of Wintan-Ceaster, from which its present name is derived. It was probably first inhabited by the Celtic Britons, who emigrated from the coasts of Armorica, in Gaul, and came to this part of the island, finding well-watered valleys, fertile plains, and shady forests, adapted to their support, and suited to the exercise of their religious rites. Here they fixed their chief residence, and continued in undisturbed possession till within a century prior to the Christian era, when they were expelled by a tribe of the Belgæ, who, after having established themselves on the southern coasts, concentrated their forces, and advancing into the country, made this one of their principal settlements. Among the several towns which were called Venta, this became the most important, and, prior to the Roman invasion, was the capital of the Belgian territory in Britain: it retained its pre-eminence till it fell under the power of the ROMANS, who, having achieved the conquest of this portion of the island, under Vespasian, made it one of their principal stations. In the year 50, Ostorius Scapula fortified all the cities of the Belgæ between Anton, or the Southampton river, and the Severn, and placed garrisons in them, as a defence from the frequent assaults of the Britons, who were ever on the alert to surprise the enemy, and to recover the towns of which they had been deprived. The fortifications of this station may be still discerned in various places; and on Catherine Hill, within a mile of the present city, are vestiges of a Roman camp. Two Roman temples are said to have been erected near the site of the present cathedral, one consecrated to Apollo, and the other to Concord; and, among other evidences of Roman occupation, sepulchres have been recently discovered without the walls of the city to the north, east, and west. Carausius and Alectus, who assumed the imperial purple in Britain, are said to have fixed their residence in this place, where their coins have been discovered in greater profusion than in any other part of the kingdom. Soon after the establishment of Christianity in the island, a monastery was founded here, of which Constans, son of Constantine, was one of the brethren; but being allured by his father from his devotional retirement, to take the command of the forces in Spain, he was, by the revolt of his general, made prisoner, and afterwards put to death.

After the departure of the Romans from Britain, Vortigern, who had previously exercised authority over the western part of the island, being elected king, in order to defend it from the incursions of the Picts and Scots, who were making continual depredations, made Winchester the metropolis of the kingdom, and it was subsequently the residence of his successors. On the invasion of Britain by the SAXONS, under Cerdic, and the defeat of the united Britons in the New Forest, it became the capital of the Saxon kingdom of Wessex, and the residence of the conqueror, who was crowned King of the West Saxons. Cerdic having, in conjunction with his son Cenric, spent several years in extending his dominions and in giving security to his conquests, died, and was buried here in 534: during his government, the monastery was converted into a Pagan temple, and appropriated to the service of the Saxon deities. In 635, St. Birinus, whom Pope Honorius had sent into Britain, to propagate the Christian faith in those parts of the island which were still in Pagan darkness, met with a favourable reception from Cynegils, who, in conjunction with his son Cwichelm, was then king of the West Saxons. Cynegils, by the persuasion of Oswald, King of Northumbria, who afterwards espoused his daughter, Kineburga, was baptized at York; and, in the following year, his son Cwichelm and many of his subjects were converted to Christianity, which from that time began to flourish in this part of the island. Cenwahl, the second son, succeeding to the throne after the death of his elder brother, the people again relapsed into Paganism, under a prince who refused to acknowledge the new religion; but on his conversion to Christianity and baptism by St. Birinus, Cenwahl, in 643, completed a cathedral, which he dedicated to St. Birinus, St. Peter, and St. Paul, and founded, and amply endowed, a monastery near the site. About ten years after the death of St. Birinus, who was buried at Dorchester, Cenwahl divided the see into two portions, assigning the northern part of his kingdom to Dorchester, and the southern part to Winchester, to the cathedral of which latter place the remains of St. Birinus were removed, by Hedda, the fifth bishop. Egbert, who succeeded to the throne of Wessex, in 800, after many severe struggles for empire, obtained the sovereignty of all the other kingdoms of the heptarchy, of which he was crowned sole monarch, in the cathedral of Winchester, in 827, in the presence of a wittenagemote, or great assembly of the people. This union of the kingdoms greatly promoted the importance of Winchester, which, from being the capital only of Wessex, became the metropolis of the kingdom. Ethel- wolf, who succeeded Egbert, dated his charter from this city in 855, for the general establishment of tithes, which was signed in the cathedral, by himself, by Burhred, King of Mercia, and Edmund, King of the East Angles (his tributary vassals), and by the chief nobility and prelates.

About this time the city seems to have been in a flourishing condition, and a commercial guild was established in it, under royal protection, at least a century earlier than in any other part of the kingdom. During the reigns of Ethelwolf and Ethelbald, St. Swithin, a native either of the city or of the suburbs, presided over the see: by his advice the latter monarch inclosed the cathedral and the cloisters with a wall and fortifications, to defend them from the predatory attacks of the DANES, who, at this period, were beginning to make frequent incursions upon this part of the coast, and who, in the succeeding reign, having landed in considerable numbers at Southampton, advanced to Winchester, where they committed the most barbarous outrages. On retiring to their ships, however, they were attacked, routed with great slaughter, and dispossessed of the immense quantity of plunder which they had taken in the city. About the year 872, after repeated battles fought with varied success, in which Ethelbert was assisted by his younger brother Alfred, a band of those rapacious pirates assaulted the city, in which they made dreadful havoc; the cathedral was greatly damaged, and the ecclesiastics were inhumanly massacred. After the victory subsequently obtained over them by Alfred, Winchester was restored to its former importance, and again became the seat of government; and Alfred, who had fixed his chief residence here, ordered a general survey of the country to be made and deposited in the archives of the city, which was thence called the Codex Wintoniensis. This monarch founded a monastery on the north side of the cathedral, for his chaplain, St. Grimbald, intending it also as a place of interment for himself and family; but dying before it was completed, he was buried in the cathedral, from which his remains were subsequently removed, and deposited in the new minster. In the time of Athelstan six mints were established in the city, for coining as many different kinds of money; and during this reign, the legendary battle between Guido, Earl of Warwick, and a Dane of gigantic stature, named Colbrand, is said to have taken place in a meadow near the city, on a spot of ground still called Danemark.

In the reign of Edgar, a law was made to prevent frauds arising from the diversity of measures in different parts of the kingdom, and for the establishment of a legal standard measure to be used in every part of his dominions; the standard vessels made by order of that monarch were deposited in this city, from which circumstance originated the appellation "Winchester measure:" the original bushel is still preserved in the guildhall. In this reign, St. Ethelwold, a native of Winchester, who presided over the see, partly rebuilt the cathedral, which, on its completion in the following reign, he re-consecrated, in the presence of King Ethelred, Dunstan, Archbishop of Canterbury, and the principal nobility and prelates of the kingdom; and included in the dedication the name of St. Swithin, whose remains, buried at his own request in the churchyard, were removed and re-interred in the cathedral under a magnificent shrine, which had been prepared for that purpose by King Edgar. After the partition of the kingdom between Edmund Ironside and Canute, the latter, having obtained the entire sovereignty, divided it into four parts, three of which he entrusted to the government of subordinate rulers; but reserving the fourth and most important under his own administration, he fixed his seat of government at Winchester, and greatly enriched the cathedral, to which, after the memorable reproof of his courtiers at Southampton, for their flattery, he presented his regal crown, depositing it over the high altar, and making a vow never to wear it more. This monarch here held a general assembly of the nobility, in which he enacted laws for the government of the kingdom, and for the preservation of the royal forests and chases. On the death of Hardicanute, in 1041, Edward the Confessor was crowned with great pomp and splendour in the cathedral, to which he granted an additional charter, and ordered a donation of half a mark to the master of the choir, and a cask of wine and 100 cakes of white bread to the convent, as often as a king of England should wear his crown in that city. During this reign, Queen Emma, his mother, by her own desire, to vindicate her innocence of the crime of incontinence, with which she had been aspersed, underwent the trial of the fiery ordeal in the cathedral, without, as is stated, receiving the smallest injury. In gratitude for her deliverance, she enriched the possessions of the church with nine additional manors; the same number was added by Bishop Alwyn, her kinsman and her asserted paramour, and the manors of Portland, Weymouth, and Wyke, were given on this occasion by the king. The first great seal of England was, in the course of this reign, made and kept in the city.

At the time of the CONQUEST, William fixed his principal residence at Winchester, which he made the seat of government, and built a strong castle at the southwest extremity of the city, in order to keep his new subjects in awe. Here he enacted most of his laws, and framed political measures for the security of his government, among which were the institution of the Curfew, and the general survey and estimate of the property of his subjects, called the Roll of Winchester, or Domesday book, a probable imitation, or enlargement, of the Codex Wintoniensis of Alfred. Though he occasionally resided in London, which was growing into importance, and more especially during the latter part of his reign, yet he invariably celebrated the festival of Easter in this city. In 1079, Walkelyn, a relation of the Conqueror, and bishop of the see, began to rebuild the cathedral and the adjoining monastery; for which purpose he obtained from the king a grant of timber from the woods in the vicinity: the building was completed in 1093, and dedicated, with great pomp, in the presence of all the bishops and abbots in the kingdom. On the death of Walkelyn, in 1098, William Rufus, who was crowned here, seized upon the bishopric, and held it till the year 1100, when, being killed while hunting in the New Forest, his body was brought into the city on the following day, in a cart belonging to a charcoal-maker, and interred in the centre of the choir of the cathedral: the lineal descendants of this man, whose name was Purkis, still pursue that occupation in the same place, which is within a few hundred yards of the spot where the monarch fell. On the death of Rufus, his elder brother Robert being then on a crusade, HENRY, his younger brother, hastened to Winchester; and having made himself master of the royal treasure, he, in the presence of the reluctant nobles, drew his sword, and secured his pretensions to the crown by seizing and placing it upon his head. In this year he espoused Matilda, daughter of Malcolm III., King of Scotland, who had assumed the veil in the monastery of St. Mary, in this city, but had not taken the vows; by which marriage the royal Saxon and Norman lines were united; and on the birth of a son, in the following year, he conferred many additional privileges on the inhabitants. In the same year also a dreadful fire broke out, which destroyed the royal palace, the mints, the guildhall, a considerable portion of the city, and many of the public records. Henry, by the advice of Roger, Bishop of Sarum, ordered a general meeting of the masters of the several mints to assemble at Winchester, on Christmas-day in 1125, to investigate the state of the coin, which had been generally debased throughout the kingdom; and after due examination they were, with the exception of three of the Winchester mintmasters, found guilty of gross fraud, and each punished by the loss of his right hand. About the same time, Henry, to prevent frauds in the measurement of cloth, ordered a standard yard, of the length of his own arm, to be made and deposited here with the standard measures of Edgar.

Winchester at this time appears to have attained its highest degree of prosperity: it was the seat of government, and the residence of the monarch; and the royal mint, the treasury, and the public records were kept here: it had also a magnificent royal palace, a noble castle erected by the Conqueror, and another not less considerable, which was subsequently built as an episcopal palace for the bishops, with various stately public buildings, and numerous mansions for the residence of the nobility and gentry connected with the court. It had three royal monasteries, exclusively of inferior religious houses; a splendid cathedral, in which many of the monarchs of England had been crowned, and were interred; and a vast number of parochial churches, of which Stowe relates that not less than forty were destroyed in the war between Stephen and Matilda. The population was great, and its suburbs, in every direction, extended a mile further than they do at present. It was the general thoroughfare from the eastern to the western parts of the kingdom; it had a considerable manufactory for woollen-caps, and enjoyed an extensive commerce with the continent, from which it imported wine, in exchange for its manufactures; and it was a place of great resort for its numerous fairs, which were frequented by persons from various parts of the country. On the death of Henry I., the city suffered greatly in the war which followed in the reign of STEPHEN, who having seized into his own hands the episcopal palaces throughout the kingdom, a synod was held here, to protest against the injustice of that measure, and to concert means of obtaining redress: at this meeting it was resolved that the assembled prelates should prepare an address, and send a deputation to the king, who then resided at the palace of Winchester, which was accordingly done; but the king, without paying the least attention to it, left the city and departed for London.

At this conjuncture, the Empress Matilda landed on the coast of Sussex, to dispute Stephen's title to the throne, and the royal castle of Winchester was secured by a party in her interest; but, through the influence of Henry de Blois, brother of the king, who was then bishop of the see, the city was preserved in its allegiance to Stephen. On the subsequent captivity of the king, who was made prisoner in the war, and the acknowledgment of Matilda's claim to the crown by the greater part of the kingdom, the bishop abandoned the cause of his brother; and having gone out with a solemn procession of his clergy, to meet the empress at Magdalene Hill, conducted her and her partisans into the city with great ceremony. The public opinion beginning, however, to change in favour of the captive king, and the haughtiness of the empress having excited much disgust, the bishop commenced putting his castle of Wolvesey into a state of defence, and had scarcely completed its fortifications, when it was closely invested by the forces of Matilda, under the command of Robert, Earl of Gloucester, her natural brother, and her uncle, David, King of Scotland. A considerable body of Stephen's party having taken up arms, marched to the relief of the bishop: the armies on both sides were numerous and well appointed, and the city suffered dreadful havoc from their hostilities, which were carried on in the very centre of it, for several weeks, with the utmost acrimony. The king's party ultimately succeeded in confining their opponents within the limits of the royal castle; but, having previously spread a report of Matilda's sickness and death, the garrison obtained a truce for her interment, and placing her in a coffin, she was carried out through the army and escaped in safety to Gloucester. In the mean time, the Earl of Gloucester, with the King of Scots, taking advantage of the truce, made a sally from the castle; but being pursued, the earl was taken prisoner at Stockbridge, and subsequently exchanged for the captive monarch. Stephen, immediately on his liberation, repaired to Winchester, and began to strengthen the fortifications of the castle by the addition of new works; but, while engaged in that undertaking, an army which had been newly raised in the adjoining counties, marched against him, and he was compelled to abandon his design, and save himself by flight. During the war, the bishop held a synod here, by an act of which it was decreed, that ploughs should have the same privilege of sanctuary as churches; and a sentence of excommunication was issued against all who should molest any person employed in agriculture. On the conclusion of the war, during which nearly one-half of the city was destroyed, the treaty between Stephen and Henry, the son of Matilda, the terms of which had been agreed upon at Wallingford Castle, was ratified at Winchester, by general consent.

Henry II., on his accession to the throne, was crowned here with his queen Margaret, and held a parliament in 1172; and here also, in 1184, his daughter, the Duchess of Saxony, gave birth to a son, named William, from whom the illustrious house of Hanover is supposed to have sprung. This monarch conferred many privileges upon the city, among which was that of being governed by a mayor and a subordinate bailiff: during his reign a calamitous fire, which began in the mint, destroyed the greater part of the town. On the death of Henry, his son, Richard I., surnamed Cœur de

Lion, having secured the royal treasure in this city, was crowned in London; but, on his ransom from the captivity into which he had subsequently fallen, in returning from the crusades, he had the ceremony of his coronation performed with great pomp in the cathedral of Winchester. In 1207, King John held a parliament here, in which he imposed a tax of one-thirteenth part on all moveable property; and in the same year his queen gave birth to a son, who, from the place of his nativity, was surnamed Henry of Winchester. In the year following, in consideration of 200 marks paid down, and an annual payment of £100, that monarch granted the inhabitants a charter of incorporation, confirming all previous privileges; and, on his subsequent submission to the pope, he received absolution in the chapter-house of the monastery from sentence of excommunication, which had been pronounced against him by the legate of Pope Innocent III. HENRY III., during his minority, kept his court here, under the guardianship of the Earl of Pembroke, and, after the death of that nobleman, under that of Peter de Rupibus, Bishop of Winchester. The residence of the king contributed materially to restore Winchester to the importance it had enjoyed previously to the war between Stephen and Matilda; but this advantage was greatly diminished by the numerous bands of lawless plunderers in the city and its vicinity, with which many of the inhabitants, and even members of the king's household, were connected. The depredations committed by these associations for the purpose of rapine were at length suppressed by the firmness and resolution of the king, but not till after thirty of the offenders had been brought to trial and publicly executed. During the war between this monarch and the barons, the city experienced considerable devastation, and suffered severely from the violence of both parties, who alternately had possession of it. After the battle of Evesham, the king held several parliaments here, in which all who had borne arms against him were attainted: but, with the exception of the Montfort family, none of these attainders were carried into execution, and the highest penalty inflicted did not exceed five years' rent of the forfeited estates. The celebrated trial of John Plantagenet, Earl of Surrey, took place here, for the murder of Alan de la Zouch, chief justice of Ireland, whom that nobleman killed on the bench in Westminster Hall, on being summoned before him to give evidence of the tenure by which he held his estates; on his oath, and on that of twenty-four compurgators, that he did not strike the judge from preconceived malice, the earl was acquitted, and fined 1200 marks. Edward I. also held several parliaments at Winchester, in one of which the celebrated ordinances, afterwards called the Statutes of Winchester, were passed: but the royal residence for the greater part was transferred to London, which, having risen into higher importance, had now become the metropolis of the kingdom; and Winchester, which hitherto had held the first rank among the cities of the empire, began to decline. Towards the end of his reign, this monarch, offended at the escape of a foreign hostage, who had been confined in the castle under the custody of the mayor, deprived the city of all its privileges, which were subsequently restored. Soon after the death of Edward II., a parliament was held here by Queen Isabel and Mortimer, in which Edmund of Woodstock, Earl of Kent, was arraigned, on a charge of high treason, and condemned to death.

Edward III. having made Winchester a staple for the sale of wool, the merchants erected large warehouses for conducting that lucrative trade, and the city began to recover its commercial importance; but its progress was interrupted by the destruction of Portsmouth and Southampton, in 1337, by the French, who were, however, repulsed from this city, and the following year by the plague, which ten years afterwards raged violently in the neighbourhood, and ultimately by the removal of the staple to Calais in 1363. During this reign, Bishop Edington, who was treasurer and chancellor to the king, commenced rebuilding the nave of the cathedral, which was completed by his successor, William of Wykeham, who, for his skill in architecture, was employed by Edward III. to superintend the erection of part of Windsor Castle. Richard II. and his queen visited Winchester in 1388; and, in 1392, that monarch removed to it his parliament from London, which was then suffering a suspension of its privileges under the king's displeasure. The marriage of Henry IV. with the Dowager Duchess of Bretagne was solemnized in the cathedral, by Bishop Wykeham, in 1401; and on the death of that prelate, Henry, afterwards Cardinal Beaufort, son of John of Gaunt, was by that monarch appointed to the see. Here Henry V. gave audience to the French ambassadors, whose insolence on that occasion led to the invasion of France, which soon followed. Henry VI. was a great benefactor to the city, which he frequently visited; and in 1449 he held a parliament here, which continued to sit for several weeks. In the course of this reign, however, its trade and population so greatly declined, that, in petitioning the king for the renewal of a grant conferred by his predecessor in 1440, the inhabitants represented that 997 houses were deserted, and seventeen parochial churches closed. Bishop Waynfleet having succeeded to the see, that monarch honoured the ceremony of his installation with his presence; and in the following reign, the queen of Henry VII. resided in the castle, where she gave birth to a son, whom, to conciliate the Welsh, the king named Arthur, in honour of the British hero of that name. In 1522, Henry VIII., in company with his royal guest, Charles V., spent several days in the city; on this occasion the celebrated round table, at which the renowned King Arthur and his knights used to dine, and which was preserved in the castle, was newly painted, and an inscription placed beneath it, in commemoration of the royal visit.

The Dissolution of monasteries, which took place during this reign, and the demolition of many of the religious establishments, completed the downfall of this once splendid and opulent city, and reduced it to a mere shadow of its former grandeur. On the accession of Mary, some transient gleams of returning prosperity revived, for a time, a hope of restoration: the marriage of that queen with Philip of Spain was solemnized in the cathedral, and several of the estates which had been alienated during the former reigns were restored to the see; but the real importance of Winchester had subsided, and; in a charter obtained for it from Elizabeth, through the solicitation of Sir Francis Walsingham, it is described as "having fallen into great ruin, decay, and poverty." At the commencement of the PARLIA-MENTARY WAR, Sir William Waller took possession of the castle for the parliament; but towards the close of the year 1643, it was retaken and garrisoned for the king, by Sir William, afterwards Lord Ogle, and the city was appointed the general rendezvous of the army then forming in the west for the re-establishment of the king's authority. Fortifications were at that time constructed round it, and more especially on the east and west sides, where vestiges of the intrenchments are still discernible; but the vigilance and activity of Waller disconcerted the enterprise, and on the subsequent defeat of Lord Hopton's party on Cheriton Down, he obtained possession of the city without difficulty. The castle, notwithstanding, held out for the king; and on the retreat of the parliamentarians to join the forces of the Earl of Essex, who was then laying siege to Oxford, the city also fell into the hands of the royalists. After the battle of Naseby, Cromwell was sent with an army to reduce Winchester, which, after being repeatedly summoned, refused to surrender, and the siege was immediately commenced. The garrison made a resolute defence, but after a week's resistance capitulated on honourable terms; the castle was immediately dismantled, and the works blown up; the fortifications were demolished, together with the bishop's castle of Wolvesey, and several churches and public buildings. The wanton violence of the parliamentary troops was manifested in defacing the cathedral, destroying its monuments, violating the tombs, and in the indiscriminate insult offered to the relics of the illustrious dead, whose bones were scattered about the church; the statues of James and Charles, at the entrance of the choir, were thrown down, and the communion plate and other valuables belonging to the church were carried away. After the Restoration, the king chose Winchester for his residence during the intervals of his absence from London, and purchased the remains of the ancient castle, on the site and with the materials of which he began to erect an extensive and magnificent palace. The example of the king was followed by many of his nobility, who began to build splendid mansions, and Winchester once more exhibited signs of retrieving its distinction; but the death of Charles, before the completion of these works, put an end to those flattering prospects. Queen Anne, after her accession to the throne, paid a visit to the city, accompanied by Prince George of Denmark, on whom the royal palace of Charles II. had been settled at the time of his marriage, in the event of his surviving the queen, his consort.

The CITY is pleasantly situated on the eastern acclivity of an eminence rising gradually from the river Itchen, which is navigable to Southampton; and consists of one spacious regular street passing through the centre, intersected at right angles by several smaller streets, extending in a parallel direction for about half a mile through the breadth of the city, which is nearly the same as its length. Extensive hills, or downs, encircle it on the east and west. The principal parts of the city are within the limits of the ancient walls, which were of flint, strongly cemented with mortar, and defended by turrets at short intervals. The chief entrances from the suburbs were through four ancient gates, of which only the West Gate is remaining, and, though it has undergone considerable alteration, still retains much of its ancient character: the other gates were removed by the commissioners appointed in 1770, by act of parliament; for the general improvement of the city. Over the Itchen, of which several branches intersect the town, is a handsome and substantial bridge of stone. At a small distance beyond the West Gate, an obelisk has been erected, on the spot where the people of the neighbouring country used to deposit their provisions, for the supply of the city during the time of the plague, the inhabitants leaving the stipulated sum for payment, to prevent any communication of the contagion. In the centre of the High-street is the city cross, forty-three feet high, an elegant pyramidal structure in the later English style, consisting of three successive stages, richly ornamented with open arches, canopied niches, and crocketed pinnacles, erected by the fraternity of the Holy Cross, instituted by Henry VI.: in one of the niches of the second stage is a figure supposed by some to be that of St. John the Evangelist, but, more probably, by others, to be that of St. Lawrence, to whom the church near the spot is dedicated. The houses are in general substantial and well built, and many of them possess an appearance of great antiquity; the city is paved, lighted with gas, and amply supplied with water of excellent quality.

A public subscription library has been established in High-street, within the last few years; and the upper floor of the butchers' market, which had been used as a watch-house, has been taken down, and a building for a mechanics' institution erected on the site. The theatre, in Gaol-street, a neat building handsomely fitted up, is occasionally opened by the Southampton company of comedians; and miscellaneous concerts and balls are held in St. John's rooms, in which also the general winter assemblies and subscription concerts usually take place. Hot, cold, vapour, and shower baths have been erected in High-street, for the use of the inhabitants. Races are held in July, on Worthy Down, about four miles from the city. On the site of the ancient castle is the unfinished palace of Charles II., now called the King's House, which, had it been completed according to the original design, would have been one of the most spacious and magnificent palaces in Europe; the front is 328 feet in length, and the principal story contained a splendid suite of state apartments. The building has been converted into an extensive and handsome range of barracks for the district, capable of containing 2000 men, with spacious grounds for exercise. The trade was formerly considerable for the manufacture of woollen caps, but at present there is only an extensive factory for sacking, and a very little business is carried on in wool-combing. A canal to Woodmill, about two miles above the Itchen ferry, near Southampton, supplies the town with coal and the heavier articles of merchandise; and a station on the London and South-Western railway is situated near the western extremity of the city. The market-days are Wednesday and Saturday, the latter for corn. The market-house, erected in 1772, is a handsome building, in every respect adapted to its use: the new corn-exchange, built in 1838, at the north end of Jewry-street, affords excellent accommodation, and is a considerable ornament to the town. The fairs are on the first Monday in Lent, August 2nd, September 12th, and October 24th, for horses and pedlery; the first and last take place in the city, and the two others on the hills immediately adjoining; the September fair, which is held on St. Giles's hill, is a very large cheese-fair.

Winchester received its first regular charter of INCORPORATION from Henry II., in 1184, twenty-two years before London was incorporated; and among other privileges conferred by that monarch, was the superintendence of the kitchen and laundry of the kings at the ceremony of their coronation. This charter was confirmed and extended by succeeding sovereigns, and remodelled by Queen Elizabeth; but the corporation now consists of a mayor, six aldermen, and 18 councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76. The borough is divided into three wards; the municipal and parliamentary boundaries are co-extensive, and the number of magistrates is nine. The city first exercised the elective franchise in the 23rd of Edward I., since which time it has regularly returned two members to parliament: the right of election was extended in 1832, to the £10 householders of an enlarged district, comprising by estimation 715 acres; the mayor is returning officer. The recorder holds quarterly courts of session for all offences not capital; a court of record also occurs four times in the year for the recovery of debts to any extent, and petty-sessions take place twice a week. The Cheyney court, so called from its having been anciently held under an oak (chêne), which makes its origin revert to the time of the Druids, is an ancient court of the bishops, held weekly for the determining of actions, and the recovery of debts to any amount: its jurisdiction extends over all places which ever belonged to the see of Winchester, or the convent of St. Swithin, including 100 parishes, tythings, and hamlets, in the county of Southampton, some of which are 30 miles distant from the city. The town-hall, a handsome structure in the Grecian style, and of the Doric order, was built in 1713, on the site of an edifice erected on the foundation of one burnt down in 1112; the front is decorated with a well-executed statue in bronze of Queen Anne, which was given to the corporation by George Brydges, Esq., who represented the city in seven successive parliaments. In the muniment-room, over the west gate of the city (formerly the armoury), are preserved the public records of the city, the original Winchester bushel, made by order of King Edgar, the standard yard of Henry, and the standard measures of succeeding sovereigns, with various other remains of antiquity. The assizes and general quarter-sessions for the county are held in the chapel of the old castle, which has been converted into a county-hall, and appropriately fitted up for the purpose. The building is 110 feet in length: at the east end is suspended the celebrated round table, attributed to the renowned King Arthur, but which, with greater probability, is said to have been introduced by King Stephen, with a view to prevent disputes for precedence. It is made of oaken planks, and is eighteen feet in diameter, and ornamented with a figure of King Arthur, and the names of his knights, as collected from the romances of the times, in the costume and characters of the reign of Henry VIII.; in several parts it is perforated by bullets, probably by Cromwell's soldiers, while in possession of the city. An extensive common gaol for the county was erected in Gaol-street, in 1778, upon the principle recommended by the philanthropist Howard: the county bridewell, a spacious structure in Hyde-street, was built in 1786.

The origin of the DIOCESE may be traced to the early part of the seventh century, when Cynegils, the first Christian king of the West Saxons, having been converted by St. Birinus, resolved to make his capital the seat of a bishopric, and began to collect materials for building a cathedral, which was afterwards accomplished by his son, Cenwahl, in 646. The establishment having been dispersed by the Danes, in 867, Secular priests were substituted the year following, who remained till 963, when Ethelwold, by command of King Edgar, expelled them, and supplied their place with monks of the Benedictine order from Abingdon: these kept possession of it without molestation, and it continued to flourish, enriched with royal donations and ample endowments, till the Dissolution, at which time its revenue amounted to £1507. 17. 2. It was afterwards refounded by Henry VIII., for a bishop, dean, chancellor, twelve prebendaries, two archdeacons, six minor canons, ten lay clerks, eight choristers, and other officers. The jurisdiction of the see extends over the greater part of the counties of Hants and Surrey, with the Isle of Wight, and the islands of Jersey, Guernsey, Alderney, and Sark; the Bishop has the patronage of the two archdeaconries, the chancellorship, canonries, and 62 benefices; with a revenue of £10,500. The Dean and Chapter have the patronage of the minor canonries and 19 benefices, with a revenue of £10,600, divided into 14 shares, of which the dean has two, and each of the canons one share; one of the canonries has been suspended, and the proceeds transferred to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners' fund for the augmentation of small livings.

The CATHEDRAL, situated in an open space near the centre of the city, towards the south-east, and originally dedicated to St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. Swithin, was, upon the establishment of the present society by Henry VIII., dedicated to the Holy and Undivided Trinity. It is a spacious, massive, and splendid cruciform structure, chiefly in the Norman style, with a low tower rising from the centre, richly ornamented in its upper stages. The original building, as erected by Bishop Walkelyn, in 1079, was one of the most magnificent specimens of the Norman style in the kingdom; it was enlarged by Bishop Edington, and a considerable part was rebuilt by the celebrated William of Wykeham, who, adopting the later English, which prevailed in his time, endeavoured to make the original style conform to that model. By this means the character of the architecture has been materially changed, though from its extent, and the loftiness of its proportions, it retains, notwithstanding the discrepancy of some parts, an air of stately grandeur, and displays many features of great beauty. The principal parts of the original structure are, the transepts, in which the chief alteration is the insertion of windows in the later style; and the tower, which preserves its original character. The west front is an elegant composition in the later English style, comprising three highly-enriched porches of beautiful design. Some part of the eastern portion is in the finest character of the early English, with occasional insertions of later date, particularly the clerestory windows of the choir; and in other parts of the building are various specimens of the early English at different periods, all remarkable for the excellence of their details. In a few instances are found small portions of the decorated, merging into the later English, of which, in various parts of the building, there are progressive series, from its commencement to the period of its utmost perfection. The Interior, from the amplitude of its dimensions, and the loftiness of its elevation, is strikingly impressive: the nave is separated from the aisles by a long range of massive circular columns, twelve feet in diameter, and of proportionate height, which, in order to make them assimilate with the pointed arches that have been introduced within the circular Norman arches, have been cased with clustered pillars, and embellished with appropriate ornaments. In some of the intervals between the columns, which are two diameters in width, are various chantry and sepulchral chapels. The roof is elaborately groined, and richly ornamented with delicate tracery, embellished with the armorial-bearings and devices of John of Gaunt, Cardinal Beaufort, and Bishops Waynfleet and Wykeham, which are continued along the fascia, under the arches of the triforium. The transepts, in which are several chapels and altars of exquisite beauty, are in the original Norman style; the central part is separated from the aisles by massive circular columns and arches, rising in successive series, and with varied ornaments to the roof. The west aisle of the south transept has been partitioned off for a chapter-house; and at the extremity of the north transept is a beautiful Catherine-wheel window. At the eastern extremity of the nave a flight of steps leads into the choir, through a beautiful screen lately erected; and on each side of the entrance are niches containing ancient bronze statues of James I. and Charles I.

The choir, which includes the lower stage of the central tower, is early English, with some insertions, and is lighted by a handsome range of clerestory windows, in the later style: the original roof of the tower is concealed by an embellished ceiling, in the centre of which is an emblematical representation of the Trinity, with an inscription. The vaulting is supported by ribs springing from four busts of James I. and Charles I., in alternate succession, dressed in the costume of their times, above each of which is a motto, and, among various other ornaments, are the initials and devices of Charles I. and his queen, Henrietta Maria, with their profiles in medallions. The roof of the choir, from the tower to the east end, is richly groined, and adorned with a profusion of armorial-bearings, devices, and other ornaments, exquisitely carved and richly painted and gilt; among them are the armorial-bearings of the houses of Tudor and Lancaster, and those of the sees of Exeter, Bath and Wells, Durham, and Winchester, over which Bishop Fox, who superintended this work, successively presided. From the altar to the east window, the em-bellishments are emblematical of Scripture history; and among them are the instruments of the Crucifixion, and the faces of Pilate and his wife, and of the high priest and others; the whole of which embellishments have been judiciously renewed during the recent repairs of the edifice. The east window is of excellent proportion and design, and is embellished with remains of ancient stained glass of rich hue: the subjects are chiefly the Apostles and Prophets and some of the bishops of the see, with appropriate symbols and legends. Many of the figures were mutilated by the soldiery, when they defaced the cathedral, at which time also the painted glass generally was destroyed; the fragments that remain bear ample testimony to their original merit. The bishop's throne, prebendal-stalls, and pulpit, are excellent specimens of tabernacle-work of appropriate character; the altar, in front of which is a beautiful tessellated pavement, is adorned with a painting, by West, of Christ raising Lazarus from the Dead. Behind the altar, and separating it from the Lady chapel, is a finely-carved stone screen of beautiful design, elaborately enriched with canopied niches and other appropriate ornaments; the statues, which formerly filled the niches now vacant, were destroyed by Cromwell's soldiers. On each side of the altar, separating the presbytery from the aisles, are partitions of stone divided into compartments, and richly ornamented with arches, and with shields of armorial-bearings and other devices: above the several compartments are placed six mortuary chests, richly carved and gilt, and surmounted by crowns, containing the bones of several of the Saxon kings and prelates, which were collected and deposited in them by Bishop Fox. In the south aisle of the choir is the sumptuous chapel, or chantry, of Bishop Fox, which, for its richness and minutely elaborate ornaments, is perhaps unequalled, either in the multiplicity of its parts, or in the fidelity of its details: in a niche under one of the arches is a recumbent figure of the founder, wrapped in a winding-sheet, with the feet resting on a skull; the roof is finely groined, and embellished with the royal arms of the house of Tudor, richly emblazoned, and with the armorial-bearings of the bishop, and the pelican, his favourite device. In the north aisle of the choir is the sepulchral chapel of Bishop Gardiner, an unsightly mixture of the later English and Grecian styles, and in a greatly dilapidated state. Behind the altar is a chapel, in which was kept the magnificent shrine of St. Swithin, the costly gift of King Edgar, said to have been of silver, richly gilt, and profusely ornamented with jewels. The Lady chapel, on each side of which is a smaller chapel, terminates the eastern extremity of the cathedral: it was built by Bishop de Lucy, and enlarged and beautified by Priors Hunton and Silkstede, whose initials and devices are worked into the groinings of the roof; the portrait of the latter, with his insignia of office, is still visible over the piscina, and on the walls are traces of paintings in fresco, representing subjects of scriptural, profane, and legendary history, now in a very imperfect state.

The magnificent chantry of Cardinal Beaufort, of Purbeck marble, is a highly-finished structure, in the later English style, and abounds with architectural beauty of the highest order; and the roof, which is delicately groined, and enriched with fan-tracery of elegant design, is supported on slender clustered columns of graceful proportion. It contains the tomb of the founder, on which is his effigy in a recumbent posture, in his robes as cardinal; and at the upper end of the chantry, inclosing the altar, are some beautiful canopied niches, crowned with crocketed pinnacles, from which the statues were taken by the parliamentary soldiers. Bishop Waynfleet's chantry is in the same style, and of equal beauty with that of Cardinal Beaufort's, and, from the attention paid to it by the trustees of his foundation at Magdalen College, is kept in good repair; it contains the tomb of the bishop, on which is his effigy in his pontificals, in the attitude of prayer. There are various other chapels in this spacious and extensive pile, among which are, that of Bishop Langton, containing some fine carvings in oak, his tomb stripped of all its ornaments; and that of Bishop Orleton, of whom no memorial is preserved. Of this chapel, the roof is vaulted, and profusely ornamented with the figures of angels: on the north side is the tomb of Bishop Mews, a distinguished adherent to the cause of Charles I., who after having served as an officer in the royal army, entered into holy orders, and was promoted to the see of Winchester. Underneath the high altar, and formerly accessible by a stone staircase leading from that part of the cathedral called the "Holy Hole," as being the depository of the remains of saints, are vestiges of the ancient Norman crypt built by Ethelwold; the walls, pillars, and groining are in their original state, and remarkable for the boldness and simplicity of their style. A new crypt, in the later style, has been built underneath the eastern end of the Lady chapel. Among the monuments, in addition to those in the sepulchral chapels, is the tomb of William Rufus, in the centre of the choir, of grey marble, raised about two feet above the surface of the pavement; also the tombs of Hardicanute; Earl Beorn, son of Ertrith, sister of Canute; Richard, second son of William the Conqueror; Bishops Peter de Rupibus, Henry de Blois, Hoardly, Willis, and other distinguished prelates; Sir John Clobery, who assisted General Monk in planning the restoration of Charles II.; Sir Isaac Townsend, knight of the garter; the Earl of Banbury; Dr. Joseph Warton; Izaak Walton, and numerous other eminent persons. The whole length of this magnificent cathedral is 545 feet, from east to west, and the breadth along the transepts, 186; the mean breadth of the nave is 87, and that of the choir 40: the height of the tower is 140 feet, and its sides are 50 feet broad. The great cloisters, which inclosed a quadrangular area 180 feet in length, and 174 in breadth, were destroyed in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. On the east side of the quadrangle is a dark passage, which led to the infirmary and other offices belonging to the ancient monastery; and to the south of it is a doorway, that formerly led to the chapter-house, the site of which is now occupied by the Dean's garden, in the walls of which are some of the pillars and arches yet remaining. The refectory is now divided into two stories; under it are two kitchens, the roofs of which are vaulted in the Norman style, and supported on a single central column, still preserved. The Prior's hall and some other apartments now form the deanery; and other remains of the conventual buildings may be traced in the gardens of the prebendal houses, which occupy what is termed the Cathedral Close, an extra-parochial district.

Winchester comprises the PARISHES of St. Bartholomew, which is partly in the Soke liberty, and contains 776; St. Lawrence, the mother church, 310; St. Mary Kalendar, 867; St. Maurice, 1770; St. Peter Colebrook, 616; and St. Thomas, within the city, 3071 inhabitants; and the parishes of St. Faith, St. John, St. Michael, St. Peter Cheesehill, St. Martin Winnall, and St. Swithin, within the Soke liberty, containing together 3361 inhabitants. The living of St. Bartholomew's is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £82. The church, in Hyde-street, is supposed to have been originally appropriated to Hyde Abbey. The living of St. Laurence's is a discharged rectory, valued at £6. 5., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £56. The church, situated in the square, is an ancient structure, with a lofty square tower, and consists only of one large aisle, into which, on taking possession of his see, the bishop makes a solemn entry. The living of St. Mary Kalendar's is a rectory, united to that of St. Maurice, and valued at £7: the church has been destroyed. The living of St. Maurice's is a rectory, to which those of St. Mary Kalendar, St. Peter Colebrook, St. George, and St. Mary Wood, are united, valued at £6. 7. 6.; net income, £145; patron, the Bishop. The church, in High-street, formerly the chapel of an ancient priory, has been rebuilt by subscription, aided by a grant of £500 by the Incorporated Society. The living of St. Peter Colebrook is a rectory, united to that of St. Maurice, and valued at £3. 4. 2.: the church has been destroyed, as also have those of St. George and St. Mary Wood, the livings of which are valued, the former at £3. 5. 8., and the latter at £2. The living of St. Thomas's is a discharged rectory, with that of St. Clement united, valued at £13. 17. 8½.; net income, £145; patron, the Bishop. The church is an ancient structure in the Norman style, with a low tower; the interior consists of a nave and one aisle, separated by massive circular columns. The church of St. Clement has been demolished. The living of St. Faith's is a sinecure rectory, annexed to the mastership of the hospital of St. Cross, which is extra-parochial, and in the chapel of which the parishioners attend divine service, the church of St. Faith having been demolished for more than two centuries. The living of St. John's is a perpetual curacy, with the rectory of St. Peter's Southgate united; net income, £82; patron, the Bishop. The church is in the Norman style, with a massive tower and turret, and consists of a nave and two aisles, separated by massive circular columns: the church of St. Peter's Southgate has been destroyed. The living of St. Michael's is a discharged rectory, valued at £5. 17. 11.; net income, £104; patron, the Bishop. The church, which, with the exception of the ancient tower, has been rebuilt, is a handsome edifice in the later English style, and consists of a spacious nave and chancel. The living of St. Peter's Cheesehill is a discharged rectory, valued at £14. 9. 9½., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £94. The church is a neat plain structure, with a tower. The living of St. Swithin's is a discharged rectory, valued at £6. 6. 10½., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £65. The church, which is over a postern called King's Gate, was formerly used as the church for the servants employed in the great priory of St. Swithin. The living of St. Martin's Winnall is a rectory, valued at £5; net income, £170; patron, the Bishop. The church, rebuilt in 1786, consists of one aisle and a small tower. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyans. A Roman Catholic chapel, in the later English style, dedicated to St. Peter, was erected in 1792, in St. Peter-street, and is richly ornamented: at the entrance of the walk leading to it is an ancient Norman portal, which was removed from the church of St. Mary Magdalene's hospital. Nearly opposite is a convent, a large and handsome brick edifice, called the Bishop's House, consisting of Benedictine nuns removed from Brussels. There is a new public cemetery to the south-west of the city, containing 7 acres, laid out in gravel-walks and plantations; a low wall separates the consecrated portion from that appropriated to dissenters, in each of which is a small chapel.

WINCHESTER COLLEGE holds a pre-eminent rank among the public literary institutions of the kingdom, and from a very early period has been distinguished as a seat of preparatory instruction. A grammar school had been established prior to the commencement of the twelfth century, on the site of which, in 1387, Bishop Wykeham, who received his early education in it, erected the present magnificent college, which he amply endowed for a warden, ten Secular priests, who are perpetual fellows, three priests' chaplains, three clerks, sixteen choristers, first and second master, and seventy scholars, intending it as a preparatory seminary for his foundation of New College, Oxford, which he had completed the year before. Under the influence of salutary regulations, the college continued to flourish till the time of the Dissolution, when its revenue amounted to £639. 8. 7.; and it was held in such estimation, that it obtained a special exemption from the operation of that general measure. The buildings, which were completed in 1393, occupy two spacious quadrangles; the entrance into the outermost is through a noble turreted gateway, under a finely-pointed arch; and on the opposite side of this quadrangle is a gateway leading into the second court, above which is a tower ornamented in front with three beautiful niches, enriched with canopies and crocketed pinnacles. The buildings surrounding the inner quadrangle are principally in the later English style, of which they exhibit an elegant specimen. The grand hall and the chapel occupy the south side; the former is lighted by a range of windows enriched with tracery; the roof is finely arched, and the beams, which are handsomely ornamented, are supported by ribs springing from corbels decorated with coloured busts of kings and bishops. In the centre of this side is the stately tower of the chapel, surmounted with turrets and crowned with pinnacles, the work of a later period than the building by Wykeham, and said to have been erected by the Warden Thurbern. The entrance into the chapel is by a vestibule, the ceiling of which is elaborately enriched, and in which are placed the ancient stalls, removed from the chapel, in 1681, by Dr. Nicholas, and some ancient brasses. The interior is beautifully arranged; the windows are enriched with tracery, ornamented with paintings of kings, saints, prelates, and nuns; and in the great east window is a representation of the Genealogy of Christ, the Crucifixion, and the Resurrection; the altar is embellished with a painting of the Salutation, by De Moine, presented to the college by the late head-master, Dr. Burton. The schoolroom is a plain brick building, erected in 1687, at an expense of £2600: over the entrance is a statue of Bishop Wykeham, presented to the college by Mr. C. G. Cibber, which has been injudiciously painted and gilt. To the south of the chapel are the cloisters, inclosing a quadrangular area 132 feet square, and apparently of the date of the 15th century; they contain many ancient brasses, and in the centre of the inclosed area is a chantry chapel, erected by Mr. John Fromond, a liberal benefactor to the foundations of Bishop Wykeham. This building, the ceiling of which is strongly vaulted, is now appropriated as the college library, and contains a select and valuable collection of works, and a small museum of natural curiosities. The other sides of the quadrangle are composed of the houses and apartments of the warden, fellows, the head and second masters, and other members of the establishment; and contiguous to the college is a spacious quadrangular building, for the residence of gentlemen commoners not on the foundation, of whom the number is very considerable. The college, chapel, and school, were completely repaired in 1795. A visitation is held in July, by the warden and two of the fellows of New College, Oxford, at which there is an examination of the candidates for the vacant fellowships in that college; there are several scholarships and exhibitions for such as fail in obtaining fellowships in New College; and there is also a superannuated fund belonging to the establishment, founded by Dr. Cobden, Archdeacon of London, in 1784. In this noble institution many eminent prelates and literary characters have received their early education; among whom were, Sir Thomas Brown, Sir Thomas Wootton, Sir Thomas Ryves; the poets Otway, Philips, Young, Somerville, Pitt, Collins, War-ton, and Hayley; and others distinguished for their genius and acquirements.

Christ's Hospital was established in 1586, by Peter Symonds, Esq., who endowed it with lands producing more than £420 per annum, for the support of six unmarried men above 50 years of age, and for the maintenance and education of four boys. There are two exhibitions, of £10 per annum each, tenable for four years, to Oxford and Cambridge, and with such as do not obtain them an apprentice-fee of £10 is given, on their leaving the hospital. The Hospital of St. Cross, about a mile south of the city, and beautifully situated on the bank of the river Itchen, was founded in 1132, by Bishop Henry de Blois, brother of King Stephen, who endowed it for the residence and maintenance of a master, steward, four chaplains, thirteen clerks, seven choristers, and thirteen poor brethren, and for the daily entertainment of 100 of the most indigent men of the city, who dined together in a common hall, called the "hundred menne's hall." Bishop Wykeham, on his appointment to the see of Winchester, in 1366, finding that the revenue of the hospital was misapplied, succeeded, after a tedious litigation, in re-establishing the institution according to the intention of the founder. At the suppression of monasteries its revenue was valued at £184. 4. 2.: it was exempted from dissolution, but suffered materially during the war in the reign of Charles I.: the present establishment consists of a master, chaplain, steward, and thirteen brethren. The buildings formerly occupied two quadrangular areas, but the south side of the inner quadrangle has been taken down: the entrance gateway, erected by Cardinal Beaufort, is a good specimen of the later English style, surmounted by a lofty tower. In the inner court is the church of St. Cross, an ancient and interesting cruciform structure, comprising a series of styles, passing, by gradual and almost imperceptible transitions, from the Norman to the early and decorated English styles: the low tower rising from the centre is Norman. The groining of the roof of the interior towards the east is replete with ornaments of Norman character; and that of the western part, which appears to have been the work of Beaufort, is embellished with shields of the armorial-bearings of the cardinal, Bishop Wykeham, and of the college. The west front is an elegant composition in the early English style, with appropriate embellishments; and the west window, of five lights, is richly ornamented with painted glass, representing the figures of various saints, and emblazoned with armorial devices; over the stalls in the choir are sculptured figures of the most conspicuous subjects of Scripture history. Among the funeral monuments are, an ancient brass in memory of John de Campden, the friend of Wykeham, and a modern mural tablet to Wolfran Cornwall, speaker of the house of commons. The living is a perpetual curacy, with the rectory of St. Faith's annexed, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The remaining buildings of the hospital include the apartments of the brethren; the refectory; and the master's apartments, which are spacious and commodious.

The County Hospital, or infirmary, in Parchment-street, the first institution of the kind established in the kingdom, was founded in 1736; the buildings comprise a centre and two wings, and are in every respect well adapted to the purposes of the institution. St. John's Hospital, now called St. John's House, in High-street, is a very ancient establishment, said to have been founded in the year 933, by St. Brinstan, Bishop of Winchester, and to have become the property of the Knights Templars, upon the suppression of which order it was re-founded, by permission of Edward II., for sick and lame soldiers, pilgrims, and necessitous wayfaring men, who had their lodging and other necessaries for one night, or longer, in proportion to their wants. After the Dissolution, the site and remains were given to the corporation, who converted the great hall into a public room, in which meetings of the corporation, and public assemblies and concerts are held. The hall is elegantly fitted up, chiefly by a donation of £800 from the late Colonel Bridges, and is embellished with a portrait of that gentleman, and a full-length portrait of Charles II., in his robes of state, painted by Sir Peter Lely, and presented to the corporation by that monarch: in an adjoining room, called the council-chamber, are the city tables, recording a brief chronological account of its principal historical events. In an inner court of the northern part of the hospital are the almshouses founded in 1558, by Ralph Lamb, who endowed them for the support of six widows. By a decree of the court of chancery, the management of this charity has been transferred from the corporation to 12 trustees; and the funds having greatly increased, an extensive building on the opposite side of the street has been erected, in which 18 additional inmates are lodged, who receive the same alms as those in the original establishment. The ancient chapel of the hospital, which had been used as a school-room, has been renovated, and restored to its original use, after being re-consecrated by the bishop, and a regular chaplain has been appointed. Near the cathedral are almshouses founded in 1672, by Bishop Morley, for the residence and support of ten clergymen's widows; and there are various funds for charitable uses, among which is Sir Thomas White's charity, for loans without interest to young tradesmen. The poor law union of New Winchester comprises 33 parishes or places, and contains a population of 20,452.

Among the ancient MONASTIC INSTITUTIONS, in addition to those already described, was HYDE ABBEY, originally the new minster founded by Alfred the Great, adjoining the site of the present cathedral, which, by way of distinction, was thence called the Old Minster. The foundation, after the death of Alfred, was completed by his son, Edward the Elder, and placed under the superintendance of St. Grimbald, who established a fraternity of canons regular, who were afterwards expelled by Bishop Ethelwold, and replaced by monks of the order of St. Benedict. Alwyn, the eighth abbot in succession from St. Grimbald, was uncle of Harold, and, with twelve of his monks, assisted that monarch at the battle of Hastings, in which he was slain with his brethren. In resentment of this, William the Conqueror treated the New Minster with the utmost rigour, seized upon its revenue, and would not allow a new abbot to be appointed. About three years after, however, he permitted an abbot to be chosen, and restored some of the abbey lands, giving others in exchange for the remainder. The nuisances which had arisen from the stagnation of the stream of water brought, in its immediate vicinity, to supply the fosse which had been dug round the castle erected by the Conqueror, and its contiguity to the Old Minster, induced the fraternity to build a new abbey at a greater distance, and the present edifice was erected on a spot near the north wall of the city, called Hyde meadow, from which it took its name. Into this the remains of Alfred, his queen Alswitha, his sons Ethelred and Edward the Elder, Elfeda, Ethelhida, and King Edwy, were removed and re-interred. In the contest between Stephen and Matilda the abbey was burnt to the ground by the fire-balls, thrown from Wolvesey Castle, but was rebuilt, with greater magnificence, in the reign of Henry II., and the abbot was invested with the privilege of a seat in parliament. It continued to flourish till the Dissolution, at which time its revenue was £865. 1. 6.: it was soon after demolished, and very small portions of the monastic buildings at present remain, among which are, the tower of St. Bartholomew's church, some of the offices, and part of a large barn, with one gateway containing a regal head in the groining of the arch. On the site of the abbey, a new bride-well has been erected, in digging the foundations of which many stone coffins, chalices, patins, rings, busts, capitals of ancient columns, and other fragments of sculpture, were found; of these, the most interesting is a stone inscribed "Alfred Rex, 881," in Saxon characters.

The Abbey of St. Mary was founded by Alswitha, wife of Alfred, and, after the king's death, was the place of her retirement. Edburga, daughter of Edward the Elder, became abbess; and in the reign of Edgar, the convent was amply endowed by Bishop Ethelwold, who prescribed for the observance of the nuns the more severe rules of the order of St. Benedict. Many Saxon ladies of royal and noble lineage were sisters in this establishment, in which Matilda, wife of Henry I., received her education. The original buildings were destroyed in the war during the reign of Stephen, and restored in the following reign by Henry II., who was a liberal benefactor. At the time of the Dissolution, its revenue was £179. 7. 2.; it remained for a few years after that period, when its abbess and eight of the nuns received small pensions, and the rest of the inmates were dispossessed: the only visible remains are in a large modern mansion, which has been partly built with the materials of the abbey. In the meadow of St. Stephen, near the Bishop's palace of Wolvsey, was a college, established in 1300 by Bishop Pontoys, which he dedicated to St. Elizabeth, a daughter of the King of Hungary, and endowed for a provost, six chaplains, priests, six clerks, and six choristers: its revenue at the Dissolution was £112. 17. 4. A monastery, dedicated to St. James, was founded in the abbey churchyard by John, or Roger, Inkpenne, who, in 1318, endowed it for a warden and several priests. In the churchyard of St. Maurice was the fraternity of St. Peter; and in that of St. Mary Kalendar, a college, the revenue of which was granted to the corporation, in the reign of Philip and Mary. The hospital of St. Mary Magdalene was an ancient building, situated on Magdalene Hill, and supposed to have been erected and endowed by one of the bishops, about the close of the twelfth century; but in 1665, the king ordered the inmates to be removed to the city of Winchester, and the old hospital buildings, being in a state of ruin, were taken down, and six tenements, with three rooms each, were built in St. John's parish, in the East Soke. The institution consists of a warden and four brothers and four sisters, and the annual income of the charity amounts on an average to about £154. There were also convents of Augustine, Carmelite, Dominican, and Franciscan friars, the sites of which were, after the Dissolution, granted to the college. Among the illustrious and eminent natives of the city were, Henry III.; Eleanor, youngest daughter of Edward I., who died in her infancy; and Prince Arthur, eldest son of Henry VII., who died at Ludlow, and was buried in the Cathedral of Worcester. Winchester gives the title of Marquess to the family of Paulet.

WINCHFIELD (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of HARTLEY-WINTNEY, hundred of ODIHAM, Odiham and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 2 miles (S. by W.) from Hartford-Bridge; containing 317 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1220 acres of inclosed land, besides 211 acres of waste; the surface is flat, and the soil in some parts loamy, and in others a strong clay, producing good wheat and beans. The Basingstoke canal has a wharf here; and the Winchfield and Hartley-Row station of the London and South-Western railway is within the limits of the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 16. 10½.; net income, £247; patron, the Rev. H. E. St. John. There is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 50 acres. The church is an ancient edifice, and has three Norman arches; the pulpit bears the date 1634.

WINCHMORE-HILL, a chapelry, in the parish, union, and hundred of EDMONTON, county of MIDDLESEX, 8 miles (N.) from London. The chapel, dedicated to St. Paul, and consecrated in 1828, was erected at an expense of about £5000, of which sum £3843 were granted by the Parliamentary Commissioners, and the remainder raised by subscription. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyans; and a national school. Dr. Fothergill, an eminent physician, and a member of the Society of Friends, was buried here.

WINCLE, a chapelry, in the parish of PRESTBURY, union and hundred of MACCLESFIELD, N. division of the county of CHESTER, 5½ miles (S. E. by S.) from Macclesfield; containing 455 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £116; patron, the Vicar of Prestbury. The chapel was erected about 1642.

WINDER, a township, in the parish of LAMPLUGH, union of WHITEHAVEN, ALLERDALE ward above Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, 5¼ miles (E. by S.) from Whitehaven; containing 107 inhabitants. The tithes were commuted for land in 1819, under an inclosure act.

WINDER, LOW, a township, in the parish of BARTON, WEST ward and union, county of WESTMORLAND, 5¼ miles (S. by W.) from Penrith; containing 16 inhabitants. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for a rent-charge of £2. 18. 10., and the vicarial for £1. 0. 8.

WINDERMERE (St. Martin), a parish, in KENDAL ward and union, county of WESTMORLAND, 9 miles (W. N. W.) from Kendal; containing, with the townships of Applethwaite and Undermilbeck, the chapelry of Troutbeck, and part of Ambleside, 2498 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the beautiful lake anciently called Wynandermere, which is twelve miles in length, about one in breadth, and forty fathoms deep. The lake is studded with many picturesque islands, the principal of which, Belle Isle, is richly wooded, and adorned with an elegant circular mansion in the Italian style: in the centre of the island formerly stood Holm House, which was besieged for the parliament by Col. Briggs, who, on the siege of Carlisle being raised, was obliged to abandon it. On Lady Holm, a smaller island, was once a chapel dedicated to the Virgin Mary. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £24. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the family of Le Fleming; net income, £253. The church, in the village of Bowness, is a simple and venerable edifice, of which the east window of stained glass formerly belonged to Furness Abbey: there are several curious memorials of the Philipson family, once the owners of Rayrigg, Calgarth, and the Island; and among the monuments of modern date, is an elegant one designed by Flaxman, to the memory of Bishop Watson, the learned author of the Apology for the Bible, &c.—See BOWNESS and WESTMORLAND.

WINDFORD (St. Mary and St. Peter), a parish, in the union of BEDMINSTER, hundred of HARTCLIFFE with BEDMINSTER, E. division of SOMERSET, 7 miles (S. W. by S.) from Bristol; containing, with the tythings of Felton and Redghill, 852 inhabitants, of whom 262 are in Windford tything. The parish is situated near the road from Bristol to Bridgwater, and comprises 2992 acres by computation, of which 596 are arable, 2141 meadow and pasture, and the rest common, &c. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £21. 12. 11., and in the gift of Worcester College, Oxford: the tithes have been commuted for £480; there is a glebe-house, and the glebe contains 108 acres. The church was rebuilt in 1797, with the exception of the tower, which is ancient and handsome. There are two small schools, with endowments.

WINDLE, a township, in the parish and union of PRESCOT, hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 1 mile (N.) from St. Helen's; containing 6918 inhabitants. It comprises 2907 acres, of which 40 are common or waste. A church here has been enlarged so as to accommodate 2000 persons. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £315. 9., payable to King's College, Cambridge. A school is endowed with £545, invested in turnpike-road trusts; two others are supported by the trustees of Sarah Cowley's charity; and a fourth, for the reception of children of Roman Catholics, is maintained by an annual donation of £30.

WINDLESHAM (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of CHERTSEY, First division of the hundred of WOKEING, W. division of SURREY; containing, with the hamlet of Bagshot, 1899 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 9. 7., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £404. The church, in the early English style, has been recently enlarged. There is a chapel of ease at Bagshot; also a small place of worship for Baptists, and a national school endowed with £175 three per cents., bequeathed by the Rev. Edward Cooper, late rector. Hool Mill, in the parish, erected by an abbot of Chertsey, in the reign of Edward III., is subject to a permanent rent-charge of £8 in support of the poor; and there are almshouses for six men and women, erected by James Butler, Esq. The parish contains numerous chalybeate springs.

WINDLESTON, a township, in the new district of COUNDON, parish of ST. ANDREW AUCKLAND, union of AUCKLAND, S. E. division of DARLINGTON ward, S. division of the county of DURIAM, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Bishop-Auckland; containing 215 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 1250 acres, and has been long the property of the Eden family, of whom Sir Robert Johnson Eden, Bart., rebuilt Windleston Hall about fifteen years since. The village lies to the west of the road from Aycliffe to Ferryhill. Sir Robert also built a school in the township and endowed it with £15 per annum; it is in connexion with the National Society of London.

WINDLEY, a township, in the parish of DUFFIELD, union of BELPER, hundred of APPLETREE, S. division of the county of DERBY, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Derby; containing 234 inhabitants. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for a rent-charge of £63. 13. 4., and the vicarial for £6.

WINDRIDGE, a ward, in the parish of ST. STEPHEN, union of ST. ALBAN'S, hundred of CASHO, or liberty of ST. ALBAN'S, county of HERTFORD, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W. S. W.) from St. Alban's; containing 411 inhabitants.

WINDRUSH (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of NORTHLEACH, Lower division of the hundred of SLAUGHTER, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Northleach; containing 313 inhabitants, and comprising by computation 1500 acres. The living is a discharged vicarage, united to that of Sherborne in 1776, and valued in the king's books at £5: the tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1777.

WINDSOR, NEW (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a borough, market-town, and parish, having separate jurisdiction, and the head of a union, locally in the hundred of RIPPLESMERE, county of BERKS, 20 miles (E. by N.) from Reading, and $22\frac{1}{2}$ (W. by S.) from London; containing, with the castle, 7887 inhabitants. This place owes its origin to a more ancient town about two miles distant, called by the Saxons, from the winding course of the river Thames, Windleshora, of which the present name, Windsor, is an abbreviation. The first authentic notice of that town, which had been the residence of the Saxon kings, occurs in an ancient charter of Edward the Confessor, granting it, with all its appendages, to the monks of Westminster, in whose possession it remained till the Conquest. William, soon after his establishment on the throne, struck with the beauty of its situation on the bank of the Thames, and the peculiar adaptation of the surrounding country to the pleasures of the chase, procured it from the monastery of Westminster, in exchange for some lands in the county of Essex, and made it his occasional residence while pursuing the diversion of hunting. On a hill in the neighbourhood, that monarch erected a fortress, where he held his court in 1070; and, two years afterwards, he assembled there a synod of the nobility and prelates, in which the question of precedency between the sees of Canterbury and York was discussed, and decided in favour of the former. Around this fortress he laid out extensive parks, enlarged the boundaries of the neighbouring forest, and enacted severe laws for the preservation of the game. Old Windsor continued to be the royal residence of William and his successors till 1110, when Henry I., having partly rebuilt and considerably enlarged the fortress which his father had erected, by the addition of a suite of apartments, converted it into a palace, in which he occasionally resided and kept his court. From this time the importance of the ancient town began to decline; and subsequently a new town arose in the immediate vicinity of the castle, which was distinguished by the appellation of New Windsor. In the treaty of peace between Stephen and Matilda, the castle is referred to by the name of "Mota de Windsor;" and after the death of Stephen, Henry II. held a council here, in 1170. When Richard I. embarked on his expedition to the Holy Land, the castle became the residence of the Bishop of Durham, to whom, in conjunction with the Bishop of Ely, that monarch had entrusted the administration of the government in his absence. King John, during his contest with the barons, resided in the castle, which was at that time considered the next strongest fortress after the tower of London: it was ineffectually besieged by the barons, to whom, in the succeeding reign, it was ceded by treaty; but in the following year it was surprised and taken by the king, who made Windsor the principal rendezvous of his forces. Henry III. erected a barbican, and strengthened the fortifications and outworks of the castle, which, during the baronial wars in that monarch's reign, was alternately taken and retaken by the contending parties, till Prince Edward finally obtained possession and held it for his father. On the succession of that prince to the throne, the castle was frequently the place of his residence, and four of his children were born at Windsor, which was likewise the favourite retreat of his queen Eleanor. Edward III., who was also born here, rebuilt the royal palace on a more extensive and magnificent scale, enlarged the castle with additional towers, erected the keep, and, near it, a tower of high elevation, named Winchester tower, after William of Wykeham, Bishop of Winchester, whom that monarch had made superintendent of his buildings. The same sovereign erected the collegiate chapel of St. George, in which he established a dean and twelve canons; also the magnificent hall of St. George, as a banqueting-house for the knights of the royal order of the garter, of which he was the founder; and he surrounded the whole with a strong wall and rampart, faced with stone and encompassed with a moat. While this monarch occupied the throne, two sovereigns were prisoners in the castle at the same time, viz. John of France, and David of Scotland, the latter of whom he had captured, after the reduction of that country. Edward IV. enlarged and partly rebuilt the collegiate chapel, the choir of which was vaulted by Henry VII., who also erected the lofty pile of building adjoining the state apartments in the upper ward. Henry VIII. added materially to the buildings by the erection of the prebendal houses and the gateway leading into the lower ward. Edward VI. and Queen Mary both made Windsor their residence; and, among other improvements, constructed a fountain in the centre of the upper quadrangle, from which the whole of the castle was supplied with water. Elizabeth, after her accession to the throne, resided occasionally in the palace, to which she added some buildings next the Norman gateway, and that part adjoining the buildings of Henry VII. which is called Queen Elizabeth's gallery; and she also raised the noble terrace on the north side of the castle, commanding a beautiful view of Eton College, and an extensive prospect over the vale of the Thames.

During the civil war, the castle, which had received several additions in the reign of Charles I., was seized and garrisoned by the parliament, who, notwithstanding an attack of Prince Rupert, in 1642, to regain possession of it for the king, retained it in their hands till the conclusion of the war. After the Restoration, Charles II. repaired the injuries it had suffered, and greatly embellished the interior; and James II. and William III. ornamented the state apartments with a splendid collection of paintings. In almost every succeeding reign this interesting structure continued to receive additional embellishment; and, in the reign of George III., the alterations and additions were conducted on a larger scale, and with a stricter regard to the restoration and preservation of the original character of the building, than in that of any of his predecessors since the time of Edward III. In the reign of George IV., the varied attractions of Windsor induced that monarch to make it his principal residence; and, under the influence of a correct and refined taste, which duly appreciated the merits and the beauty of the ancient English style, a design was formed for the enlargement and decoration of the castle, of which a considerable part was accomplished under his immediate superintendence. For carrying this into effect, various sums, amounting to £771,000, were granted by parliament for the buildings alone, and, among the different plans which were submitted for the purpose, that of Mr. Jeffrey Wyatt was, on the approbation of His Majesty, adopted by government. Under this design, several parts of the old building which had been injudiciously engrafted on the main edifice were entirely removed; and portions of freehold land within the park, belonging to private individuals, were purchased, and made to conform, in their appearance, with the varied beauty of the grounds. The height of the buildings throughout the castle was increased by an additional story; several new towers were erected, windows of lofty dimensions and of appropriate character generally inserted, and some splendid gateway entrances from the principal approaches formed in a style of commensurate grandeur; which, with subsequent improvements, have rendered this interesting structure, with its appendant gardens, parks, and pleasure-grounds, pre-eminently adapted to the purposes of a royal residence.

The CASTLE occupies more than twelve acres of ground, and comprises the upper, lower, and middle wards. The principal approach is from the Little, or Home, Park, through a lofty gateway, flanked on one side by the York, and on the other by the Lancaster, tower, both stately and massive structures, 100 feet high, crowned with projecting battlements supported on corbels. This gateway, which ranges in a line with the noble avenue of stately elms in the Great Park, called the Long Walk, was erected by George IV., whose name it bears; the first stone was laid by that sovereign on the 12th of Aug. 1828, when His Majesty was pleased to change the name of the architect from Wyatt to Wyatville, upon whom he subsequently conferred the honour of knighthood. It is a noble and stately structure, and forms an entrance of correspondent grandeur into the UPPER WARD, a spacious quadrangle, to which are also entrances through St. George's gateway at the southwest, leading from the town, and the ancient Norman gateway at the west, from the middle and lower wards. On the north side of this quadrangle are the state apartments, which are open to the inspection of the public; on the east, Her Majesty's private apartments; on the south side apartments for Her Majesty's visitors; and on the west the round tower, or keep, to the front of which has been removed, from the centre of the quadrangle, an equestrian statue in bronze of Charles II., in the Roman costume, on a marble pedestal ornamented with sculpture. The approach to the State Apartments is by a superb vestibule, portioned into three parts by ranges of finely-clustered columns and gracefully-pointed arches, in the most finished character of the later English style; the roof is elaborately groined, and decorated with fan-tracery of elegant design; in the walls are four larger and three smaller niches for the reception of statues, richly canopied and highly embellished with architectural ornaments of beautiful character. The Grand staircase, divided in the centre by a broad landing-place, is defended with a balustrade of bronze, with massive pedestals, and capitals of polished brass, and lighted by an octagonal lantern 100 feet high from the pavement; the roof is delicately ornamented with fan-tracery depending from the centre, and ending with the royal arms, encircled by the garter. At the termination of the grand staircase is the queen's Drawing-room; over the folding-doors are the royal arms in artificial stone, and on each side are shields of arms of several of the British monarchs, supported by angels. The internal decorations of this apartment are of the most superb character; the ceiling is beautifully painted in compartments, representing the Restoration of Charles II., the Labours of Hercules, and other subjects, and bordered with flowers and fruit, and ornaments richly gilt. The mirrors, chandeliers, and furniture, are in a corresponding style of elegance; a choice selection of paintings, by the first masters, is finely displayed, and the embellishments are disposed with the most refined taste, and on a scale of the most splendid magnificence. The Audience-chamber, of which the ceiling bears an allegorical representation of the Re-establishment of the Church of England, is decorated with hangings of blue silk richly embroidered; the chair and canopy of state are superb, and there is a collection of paintings, chiefly historical, representing the victories of Edward III., painted by West, and the first installation of the knights of the order of the garter, in which more than 100 figures are finely grouped. The Presence-chamber, and indeed the whole suite of these state apartments, are in a style of correspondent grandeur.

The New Ball-room is finished in the most elaborate style of Louis XIV.; the walls and ceiling are panelled in compartments, highly ornamented and richly gilt. In the larger panels of the walls are some superb specimens of tapestry, most exquisitely worked, representing the history of Jason and the Golden Fleece; the colours are singularly vivid, and at the same time so softened by the skilful combination of light and shade, as to have all the force and delicacy of the finest painting. In the intermediate panels are six mirrors, of large dimensions and great brilliancy. A pair of elegant folding-doors, panelled and ornamented to correspond with the walls, opens into St. George's Hall, a spacious apartment, appropriated as a banquet-room for the knights of the order of the garter; it is nearly 200 feet in length, and of proportionate width and elevation. The lofty arched ceiling is supported on beams springing from corbels decorated with shields, on which are emblazoned the arms of the original knights; and is divided into thirteen compartments, subdivided into panels of bold design, containing nearly 700 shields, with the arms of the knights up to the present time. At the east end, under a canopy, is the throne of Her Majesty, who is the sovereign of the order, at the back of which are Her Majesty's arms, and on each side those of twelve preceding sovereigns, richly carved and emblazoned, and also those of Edward III. and the Black Prince. The mantel-piece is a massive and elegant piece of workmanship of Dove marble, sculptured in flowers and foliage, with the initials of George IV. In the Guard Chamber have been deposited, on pedestals erected for the purpose, under canopied niches, suits of ancient armour, the coats of mail of John, King of France, and David, King of Scotland, with other military trophies; on other pedestals, busts of the Duke of Wellington and the Duke of Marlborough, and on a pedestal formed of the frustum of the mast of the Victory, the bust of Admiral Lord Nelson. In the Waterloo chamber, a magnificent apartment, 100 feet in length, 46 wide, and 45 high, and lighted by a lantern, have been arranged the portraits of the various sovereigns, popes, cardinals, ministers of state, ambassadors, generals, and others connected with the prosecution of the war on the continent, and in the negotiation of the late peace, painted for George IV. by Sir Thomas Lawrence, at an expense of more than £36,000, paid from the privy purse.

The entrance to Her Majesty's Private Apartments is in the south-east angle of the quadrangle, through a handsome hall, from which is an ascent by a double staircase of great architectural beauty, lighted by a double lantern of elegant design, into a corridor 500 feet in length, communicating with Her Majesty's apartments on the east, and with the visitors' apartments on the south. The ceiling of this gallery is panelled in compartments, with delicate tracery richly gilt, and the walls are decorated with paintings by the most eminent masters of the old and modern schools; the furniture is of the most sumptuous character, and the whole, enriched with every architectural ornament which the later style has combined, has an air of costly grandeur. The private apartments consist of a dining-room, drawing-room, smaller drawing-room, and library, with bedrooms, dressing-rooms, boudoir, and various other apartments. These rooms are most splendid; they are decorated with every ornament that ingenuity can devise, or wealth purchase, and lighted with superb oriel windows, enriched with tracery, which not only give an air of impressive beauty to their internal grandeur, but add greatly to the external embellishments of the castle. The rooms for Her Majesty's servants occupy the lower and higher stories of the palace. In front of the private apartments is a parterre, 400 feet in length and of equal breadth, surrounded by a broad terrace rampart wall with bastions; in the area are numerous statues finely sculptured, and under the terrace on the north side is an orangery, 250 feet in length, the front of which forms a long series of finely-pointed arches with tracery.

The MIDDLE WARD comprises the Round tower, or keep, which was formerly the residence of the constable, whose office was both of a military and a civil nature. In his military character he was entrusted with the command of the castle, and with the custody of every thing contained in it, assisted by a lieutenant-governor, or deputy, who possessed equal authority during his absence: in his civil capacity, he was judge of a court of record having jurisdiction over the precincts of the forest, which extends $77\frac{1}{2}$ miles in circumference; but that office is now vested in a steward, assisted by a janitor, who is keeper of the prison, though no process has issued from it for many years. The Round Tower, which is of very spacious dimensions, has been raised 32 feet higher than its original elevation, and is crowned with a projecting machicolated battlement, supported on massive corbels and arches, and surmounted on the eastern part of the circumference by a newly-erected turret, on the summit of which the royal standard is displayed during Her Majesty's presence at the castle. The lower part of the tower is surrounded by a rampart, in which are embrasures for seventeen pieces of cannon: the ascent to it is by a flight of 100 stone steps. The roof of the staircase is supported by corbels, consisting of busts of kings, knights, angels, and other figures, many of which are in good preservation; at the summit of the staircase is a large piece of cannon, pointed at the entrance through an aperture in the wall ; and from the rampart a strong arched gateway, grooved for a portcullis, leads into the main tower, formerly appropriated to the reception of state prisoners of high rank. The LOWER WARD or quadrangle, into which is an entrance leading from the town through Henry the Eighth's gateway, flanked with two lofty massive towers, comprises the collegiate chapel of St. George, beyond which, on the north side, are the houses of the dean, canons, minor canons, and other officers of the college, and various towers, among which are those of the Bishop of Winchester, who is prelate, and the Bishop of Salisbury, who is chancellor, of the order of the garter ; a tower, formerly belonging to garter king at arms, of which a small portion only remains ; and a store tower. Apartments have been also fitted up in this ward for the commanding officer and officer on guard, who, though subordinate to the constable, or governor of the castle, has the command of a company of the royal foot guards, always on duty here. In an apartment in the deanery, called the garter-room, the arms of the sovereign and knights companions of the order are emblazoned ; and an ancient screen is decorated with the arms of Edward III., and of the several sovereigns and knights companions of the order from its original foundation. This apartment is at present used as a robing-room on days of installation.

The COLLEGIATE CHAPEL OF ST. GEORGE has a chapter, which is also a corporation, consisting of a dean and 12 canons, possessing the patronage of 7 minor canonries, and 55 benefices, with one other alternately ; the establishment likewise embraces 10 choristers, a steward, treasurer, and several other officers. The nominal net revenue is £19,380, but the amount, on an average of 7 years, does not exceed £10,212 per annum : four of the canonries have been suspended, and the proceeds transferred to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The minor canons have an allowance of £60 each, and free residences, and 7 livings are appropriated to them by the chapter. The edifice was, as before observed, originally built by Edward III., on the site of a smaller chapel erected by Henry I., and dedicated to Edward the Confessor ; it was considerably enlarged by Edward IV., materially enriched by Henry VII., and repaired, restored, and greatly embellished by George III., who expended £20,000 in its improvement. Very extensive alterations and embellishments were also effected between the months of May and October, 1843, when many portions were carefully restored, and inferior coatings removed ; a large quantity of stained glass of the most splendid description was introduced ; numerous parts of the edifice were emblazoned with the arms of knights of the garter and distinguished families, under the superintendance of Willement, and this magnificent structure now presents an appearance grand in the extreme, amply testifying the great value of the changes so tastefully and liberally made. It is a beautiful cruciform structure in the purest character of the later English style, of which it displays one of the finest specimens in the kingdom ; the transepts project in an octagonal form from the main building, and at the extremities of the aisles are lateral octangular projections, forming sepulchral chapels. Pierced parapets of elegant design are principally the external embellishments, and buttresses crowned with square embattled turrets. The Interior is finely arranged ; the walls are panelled throughout in one general design, of which the windows, enriched with tracery, and divided by battlemented transoms, form an integral part. The Nave is separated from the aisles by seven pointed arches and piers of peculiar beauty, adapted to the contrast of light and shade with singular effect ; its roof and that of the choir are elaborately groined, embellished with fan-tracery of beautiful design, and splendidly decorated with shields of armorial-bearings and heraldic devices, highly emblazoned. It is lighted by an elegant range of clerestory windows, which are continued round the transepts ; and the great west window, which occupies the whole of the western extremity above the entrance, is enriched with tracery, and adorned with ancient stained glass of unrivalled brilliancy. The Choir, in which the installation of the knights takes place, and of which the general arrangement is, with the exception of the roof being more enriched with fan-tracery, similar to that of the nave, is separated from it by a screen of artificial stone, from the manufactory of Coade, of appropriate character and beautiful design, ornamented with several devices illustrative of the order of the garter. On each side are the stalls of the sovereign and knights companions of the most noble order of the garter, enriched with historical and emblematical carvings, and with the names and heraldic honours of the knights emblazoned ; the curtains and cushions are of blue velvet with gold fringe, and on the canopies of the several stalls are deposited the sword, helmet, mantle, and crest of the knights, above which are their banners of silk, with armorial-bearings and heraldic honours. The stall of the sovereign, whose banner is of velvet mantled with silk, and considerably larger than that of the knights companions, is on the right hand of the entrance. The other stalls, originally 25 in number, and increased to 31, occupy the north and south sides of the choir. The Altar is embellished with a painting of the Last Supper, by West, which is considered to be one of the best productions of that artist ; and the wainscot surrounding the presbytery is richly ornamented with the arms of Edward III., Edward the Black Prince, and those of the knights who originally composed the order, finely carved. In the east window is a beautiful painting, on glass, of the Resurrection, in three compartments, executed by Jarvis and Forrest, from a design by West, at an expense of £4000 ; and in the windows on the north and south sides of the altar are the arms of the sovereign, and of the several knights companions who subscribed to defray that expense. The east window of the south aisle is adorned with a painting, on glass, of the Angels appearing to the Shepherds, and in the west window is one of the Nativity ; the west window of the north aisle is ornamented with a painting of the Adoration of the Magi, and at the eastern extremity is a chapter-room, forming an approach to the royal closet on the north side of the altar.

The various monumental Chapels are separated from the aisles by screens of appropriate character, and in the south transept is a modern font of good design. At the east end of the north aisle are deposited the remains of Edward IV., over whose tomb is a black marble slab, on which is the inscription "Edward IV. and his Queen, Elizabeth Widville : " an elegant monument of iron, beautifully wrought, and representing a pair of gates between two antique towers, of elaborate design, which formerly covered the tomb, has been removed to the choir on the north side of the altar. In the opposite aisle, near the choir, were deposited the remains of Henry VI., brought from Chertsey, in Surrey, by order of Henry VIII. Near the ascent to the altar is the entrance to the Royal vault, in which were interred the remains of Henry VIII., and his queen, Jane Seymour; and of Charles I., whose coffin was opened by order of George IV., while Prince Regent, when the remains were found in a very perfect state, the countenance being as fresh as at the time they were interred. In a small chapel at the east end of the south aisle are the monuments of Edward, Earl of Lincoln, and Richard Beauchamp, Bishop of Salisbury, first chancellor of the order of the garter. In the same aisle is a small chantry, erected in 1522, by John Oxenbridge, a canon, and a benefactor to the chapel; adjoining which is King's, or Aldworth, chapel, probably erected by Dr. Oliver King, Bishop of Bath and Wells, whose remains are interred in it. Opposite to this chapel are some panels of oak, on which are carved the arms and devices of Prince Edward (son of Henry VI.), Edward IV., and Henry VII., whose portraits, in full length, are painted on the panels. Near the centre of the aisle is the chapel of Sir Reginald Bray, in which he is interred; and at the west end is the Beaufort chapel, containing the monuments of Henry Somerset, Duke of Beaufort, of white marble, elegantly decorated with sculpture; and of Charles Somerset, Earl of Worcester, and his lady, Elizabeth: on this tomb are the effigies of the earl, dressed in the habit of the order, and of his lady in her robes of state. In the centre of the north aisle is Rutland chapel, in which is an alabaster monument to the memory of Sir George Manners, Lord Roos, and Lady Anne, his wife, niece to Edward IV.: on the tomb are the figures of Sir George in armour, and his lady in her robes of state, and round it are the effigies of their children. In this chapel, in which Sir Thomas Syllinger and his wife, Anne, Duchess of Exeter, and sister of Edward IV., were also interred, is a beautiful marble tablet to the memory of Major Packe, killed at the battle of Waterloo, in which he is represented as being raised from the field by a brother officer, finely sculptured in alto-relievo. In the same aisle, near the choir, is the chapel of St. Stephen, decorated internally with paintings illustrative of the life and death of that martyr: this chapel was erected by Elizabeth, widow of Lord William Hastings, whose remains were deposited in it after his decapitation by Richard III. In the south aisle of the choir is the chapel of St. John the Baptist, similarly decorated with paintings illustrative of his history. At the south-west corner of the church is Urswick's chapel, founded by Dr. Christopher Urswick, Dean of Windsor, who contributed greatly, with Sir Reginald Bray, to the completion of the church; it contains the cenotaph of the Princess Charlotte, beautifully executed in white marble, by Mr. Matthew Wyatt. There are several other chapels; and, in various parts of this imposing and elegant structure, numerous interesting and highly-admirable specimens of magnificent decoration and costly embellishment.

At the east end of the collegiate chapel is a chapel erected by Henry VII., as a place of interment for himself and his successors; but that monarch afterwards changing his purpose, it remained in a neglected state till the reign of Henry VIII., when Cardinal Wolsey, by permission of the king, began to erect a splendid tomb, the design of which exceeded in magnificence that of Henry VII., in Westminster abbey. The cardinal died before it was completed, and was buried in Leicester Abbey; and the unfinished sepulchre was destroyed in the parliamentary war. James II. converted the building into a chapel, and employed the artist Verrio to ornament the walls and ceiling with paintings; but the populace, excited by the public performance of the Roman Catholic rites, furiously assailed the building, destroying the windows and interior decorations; and in this ruined state it remained till George III. ordered it to be repaired, and constructed within it a royal mausoleum, in which George III. and IV., and William IV., with several members of the royal family, have since been interred. In clearing away the ground for this purpose, the workmen discovered two coffins in a stone recess, in one of which were the remains of Mary, daughter of Edward IV. and Elizabeth Widville, and in the other, those of their third son, George, Duke of Bedford; the remains of both were re-interred in the same tomb with those of their parents. The chapel above the mausoleum, or crypt, is intended as a chapter-house for the order of the garter; it is lighted by a fine range of windows with tracery, which surround the building, and form a beautiful group at the east end, which is hexagonal; the west end is ornamented with a large window of elegant design.

The palace is situated in GROUNDS which are exceedingly attractive: it is surrounded on all sides, except the west, by a spacious and noble Terrace, above 2500 feet in extent, faced with a strong rampart of hewn stone, and having, at convenient intervals, easy slopes leading down to the park. The smaller park, which is also called the Home Park, immediately on the north-north-east and south sides of the castle, is about four miles in circumference, and was inclosed by William III. with a brick wall. Immediately under the terrace, on the east side of the castle, is a beautiful lawn, laid out in shrubberies and walks, called the Slopes, and extending on the east side of the park, from the north terrace to the Adelaide Lodge; the grounds are beautifully diversified with forest trees and sylvan scenery. On the opposite side of the road is Frogmore Lodge, which was purchased by Queen Charlotte; the gardens and pleasure-grounds are tastefully laid out, and contain many interesting objects, among which is a hermitage, designed by the Princess Elizabeth, and which was perfected by Mr. J. Wyatt; it is situated on the margin of a beautiful piece of water. In the interior is an elegant apartment, in which are, the effigy of an infant reposing on a cushion, and a monumental tablet to the memory of the Princess Charlotte, in which the countenance of the princess, and the representation of her infant, are exquisitely sculptured. The Long Walk, extending from the upper quadrangle of the castle into the Great Park, is continued in a direct line for three miles, forming a noble avenue of double rows of elms, 77 yards wide, and, at the opposite extremity, ascending a hill of considerable elevation, on which the first stone of a monument in honour of his royal father was laid by George IV., in 1829; the monument consists of a colossal statue in bronze, 25 feet high, by Westmacott, placed on a pedestal 40 feet high, forming a conspicuous object from the castle. Near this spot is Cumberland Lodge, the residence of the late Duke of Cumberland. The Great Park, eighteen miles in circumference, abounds with forest scenery of great beauty, and is agreeably diversified with hill and valley, and with wood and water. Virginia Water, issuing from a valley commencing near the back of Cumberland Lodge, after winding for several miles through the varied scenery of the park, expands towards the south-east into a beautiful lake, more than a mile in length and of considerable breadth, bounded by a verdant lawn surrounded with extensive plantations of various kinds of trees, and terminated by a fine cascade, a view of which is obtained from a bridge on the high road over the rivulet formed by the waste water of the lake, and running into the Thames near Chertsey. On the margin of the lake, an elegant temple and a fishing gallery, of very light and beautiful design, have been erected: there is also a noble and magnificent ruin, consisting of numerous ancient columns of marble brought from the ruins of Corinth, and classically arranged and reconstructed by Sir Jeffrey Wyatville. The grounds are planted with shrubs and flowers, and laid out in pleasant walks; the surface of the lake is enlivened with pleasure-boats and with several beautiful models of ships, among which is an elegant model of the Euryalus frigate, presented by Captain Inglis. After its partial restoration and improvement, George IV., on the 9th of December, 1828, took possession of the castle, which, from the extent and grandeur of its buildings, the richness of the surrounding scenery, diversified with hills and vales enlivened by the frequent windings of the Thames, and the peaceful waters of its inland lake; the luxuriant woodlands within its inclosures, and the majestic forest in the vicinity; must unquestionably be regarded as one of the most spacious and magnificent palaces in Europe.

The Town is pleasantly situated on the acclivities of the hill on which the castle is built, and consists of six principal streets, intersected by several smaller; it is well paved, lighted with gas, and amply supplied with water; the houses are in general of brick, and of respectable appearance, and several in the more modern part are handsome and well built. The approach from Datchet is strikingly beautiful; and at the other extremity is an elegant iron bridge of three arches, resting on piers of granite, the first stone of which was laid in 1822, by the late Duke of York, connecting the town with Eton, on the opposite side of the Thames. Considerable improvements have lately been made, among which are, the removal of the ancient edifices of lath and plaster, and the erection of some ranges of building fronted with stone, in which the materials of the lodges that were taken down for the improvement of the castle have been used: among the more recent erections are, York Place, Brunswick Terrace, and Augusta Place. On the west side of High-street is a meadow comprising more than two acres, called the Bachelors' Acre, which has been from time immemorial appropriated to the commonalty of the borough for their amusements. It is bounded on the east and south sides by a high bank; on the summit is a broad terrace, at the end of which is an obelisk, with inscriptions on the pedestal, commemorative of the fiftieth anniversary of the accession of George III., and of the visit of Her Majesty and the Princesses, upon that occasion, to partake of the old English fare provided for the assembled populace. The barracks, for 1000 infantry, form a commodious range of building, erected in 1795, and enlarged to their present extent in 1803: the cavalry barracks, about half a mile from the town, on the road to Winkfield, are handsomely built, and occupy an open, healthy, and pleasant situation. The theatre, in Thames-street, a small convenient building, erected in 1815, at an expense of £6000, advanced on transferable shares, is open during the Ascot races and the vacations at Eton. A public library, in Castle-street, is well supported; and there is also a subscription circulating library. Windsor, though possessing the advantages of a navigable river, and other favourable circumstances, among which may be reckoned a station on the Great Western railway at Slough, about two miles distant, has no particular branch of manufacture, and the trade is almost confined to what is necessary for the supply of the inhabitants: it is indebted equally for its origin and its continued prosperity to the erection of the castle, and to its selection as a royal residence. It has, however, long been celebrated for the quality of the ale brewed here, of which considerable quantities are sent to London and other towns. The market-days are Wednesday and Saturday, the latter chiefly for corn, which is pitched in the market-place; and the fairs are on Easter-Tuesday, July 5th, and Oct. 24th. A commodious market-place has been constructed for the sale of butchers' meat and other provisions: the area underneath the guildhall is appropriated to the use of the corn-market.

Seal used by the Corporation for general purposes.

The inhabitants were first incorporated in the fifth of Edward I., from which time this was the county town till 1314, when Edward II. transferred that distinction to Reading. The charter was extended and confirmed in various successive reigns; but the corporation at present consists of a mayor, six aldermen, and eighteen councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76. The borough is divided into two wards, and the municipal and parliamentary boundaries, which comprise 2625 acres, are co-extensive; the mayor, late mayor, and recorder, are justices of the peace, and the number of other magistrates is six. Quarterly courts of session are held for all offences not capital. The borough first exercised the elective franchise in the 30th of Edward I., and sent members to parliament till the 14th of Edward III., from which time it discontinued till the 25th of Henry IV., but since that period it has regularly returned two members; the mayor is returning officer. The guildhall, a spacious and handsome building in High-street, erected in 1686, is supported on columns and arches of Portland stone, and ornamented at the north end with a statue of Queen Anne, and at the south with one of Prince George of Denmark; the chamber in which the public business of the corporation is transacted, is decorated with portraits of all the sovereigns from James I. to Queen Anne, of George III. and his queen, and George IV., and with those of Prince Rupert, Archbishop Laud, and some others. The common gaol and house of correction for the borough was rebuilt at the expense of George III.

The LIVING is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £15. 3. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £400; impropiator, Frederick Walpole Keppell, Esq. The church is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a lofty square embattled tower crowned by pinnacles, erected in 1822, upon the site of an edifice which, having become greatly dilapidated, was taken down in 1820: the expense amounted to £14,040, towards defraying which, George III. contributed £1050, and the Incorporated Society for building churches £750; £4000 were raised by subscription, and the remainder by a rate on the inhabitants. The interior is elegantly arranged: the altar is embellished with an excellent painting of the Last Supper, found in one of the chantries in St. George's chapel, where it is supposed to have been secreted during the parliamentary war, and, after having been restored to its place over the altar of that chapel, presented to this church by George III., in 1788. The screen is of oak, richly carved, to correspond with two massive chairs presented by the Princess Augusta; and the rail which surrounds the chancel, is elaborately carved with beautiful devices of pelicans feeding their young, and with fruit and foliage, thought to be the work of the celebrated Gibbons, and formerly belonging to the chapel of St. George. Under small arches at the east end of the church, are the royal closets, fitted up with crimson drapery; and the corporation seat is ornamented with tabernacle-work, and surmounted by an enriched canopy. There are several ancient monuments, among which may be noticed the sarcophagus of Chief Justice Reeve, with busts of himself and his lady, by Schemacker; that of Edward Jobson and Eleanor his wife, with their effigies, and those of their ten children, in the costume of the 16th century; and others, which were carefully preserved on taking down the old church. The first stone of a military church was laid by Prince Albert, on the 4th of April, 1842, on a site presented by Mr. Bedborough; the edifice is of white brick and Bath stone, and is cruciform, in the early English style, having two large transepts, and a beautiful tower and spire, together 148 feet in height. Three sides of the interior are fitted up with extensive galleries, of which those in the transepts are for the military, and that at the west end for the children; and the body of the edifice is laid out with richly-carved oak benches, affording 1000 sittings, for the inhabitants of Windsor and Clewer. The expense of building, about £10,000, has been raised chiefly by subscription, towards which Her Majesty contributed £200, and Prince Albert 100 guineas. There are places of worship for Independents, Wesleyans, and Baptists.

On the north side of the church is a charity school, established in 1705, and which has an income, arising from several benefactions vested in the funds, and an annual payment of £24. 15. from the exchequer, amounting to £167, which sum is increased by subscription and collections after charity sermons; the school-house was erected by means of £500 bequeathed by Theodore Randue, Esq. A ladies' charity school was established in 1784, by subscription, under the patronage of Queen Charlotte; the income, arising from endowments, is £56. Another school is endowed for twelve boys; a national school is supported by subscription, and there are funds left by Mrs. Barker and Mr. Marrat, for teaching children, and by Mr. Panton, for the endowment of a Sunday school. Archbishop Laud bequeathed £50 per annum to the parish, to be employed for two following years in apprenticing five boys; and, every third year, in giving marriage portions to three maidens: this charity has been augmented, with a bequest of £1000 by Mr. Randue, with which, increased by £250 added by his executors, an estate has been purchased, yielding a rental of £128. 13. An hospital for eight men and women was founded in 1501, and endowed in 1510, by Mr. Thomas Brotherton, and by Mr. Richard Gallis in 1666, with funds now producing £102. 16. per annum; the almshouses were rebuilt in 1702, on an enlarged scale, and the number of inmates has been augmented to twelve. An almshouse for twelve women, founded by a bequest of Henry Franklyn, in 1575, and situated in Park-street, is supported from monies vested in the parish. Near the Pitfields, now called the Bachelor's Acre, four almshouses were founded in 1687, by Mr. Richard Reeve, who endowed them with funds from which the inmates receive £10 per annum. A college for seven indigent gentlemen, situated in Datchet Lane, and called "Travers's College for Naval Knights of Windsor," was founded by a bequest made by Samuel Travers, in 1724, settling upon each of the inmates £60 per annum; the endowment was augmented in 1805, by a bequest of Lieutenant Robert Brathwaite, and the whole income now amounts to £564. Mrs. Phebe Thomas, in 1821, bequeathed funded property from the proceeds of which twelve widows receive £10 per annum each. There are also numerous bequests for apprenticing children, and for other charitable purposes. The union of Windsor comprises six parishes or places, and contains a population of 20,502.

Near the Long Walk, in the park, some labourers discovered a mineral spring, which was fast growing into repute; but the crowds of persons who frequented it proving a great annoyance, it was closed up. Among the illustrious natives of Windsor were, John, eldest son of Edward I., who died in his infancy, and was interred at Westminster, in 1273; Eleanor, eldest daughter of the same monarch, who was born in 1266, and married by proxy, to Alphonso, King of Arragon, who died before the consummation of the marriage (she was afterwards married to Henry, Earl of Burg, in France, from whom the house of Anjou and the kings of Sicily are descended, and died in 1298); Margaret, third daughter of Edward I., born in 1275, and married to John, second duke of Brabant, from whose son, John, the third duke, the dukes of Burgundy were descended; Mary, the sixth daughter of the same monarch, born in 1279, who, when ten years of age, entered a nunnery at Amesbury, in the county of Wilts; Edward III., William, the sixth son of Edward, who died in his infancy; and Henry VI. Her present Majesty gave birth to the infant Duke of York at the castle, on the 6th of August, 1844. Windsor confers the title of Earl upon the family of Stuart, marquesses of Bute.

WINDSOR, OLD (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of WINDSOR, hundred of RIPPLESMERE, county of BERKS, 2 miles (S. E. by S.) from New Windsor; containing 1600 inhabitants. Prior to the Conquest, this place is said to have been the residence of several Saxon kings, but after the improvements made by Henry I. in the fortress erected at New Windsor by William the Conqueror, it speedily lost its original importance. The parish comprises 4349a. 2r. 17p., of which about 3000 acres are comprehended in Windsor Great Park; it is beautifully situated on the river Thames, which affords facility of communication with Oxford and London, and within four miles of the Slough station of the Great Western railroad. A pleasure-fair is annually held. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £270; impropiator, the Rev. G. Isherwood. The church is a very ancient structure: in the churchyard are several tombs of noble individuals and distinguished characters. There is a chapel in the Great Park, a royal donative, built by George IV. for the accommodation of his household, and now used for the gentry, tenants, and keepers connected with the royal domains. At Sunning-hill-dale is a church dedicated to the Holy Trinity, which was consecrated in October, 1840, the building and endowment cost about £3000; the number of sittings is nearly 400, and the edifice is an exact model of the Lombardo-Gothic style, and the first of the kind erected in England. A parochial school (now an almshouse), and four cottages with gardens attached, were erected in 1797, and endowed with land, which is divided into allotments, and let to 40 poor persons. Here is the Onslow and Jubilee school of industry, founded by a bequest of £23 per annum by Lady Onslow for teaching gardening and agriculture to boys during one-half of the day, and instructing them during the other half on the national plan, and also for preparing girls for creditable service. The workhouse for the Windsor union is situated here. The Roman road from Silchester passes through the parish.

WINDY-NOOK, an ecclesiastical district, in the parish of JARROW, union of GATESHEAD, E. division of CHESTER ward, N. division of the county of DURHAM, 2 miles (S.) from Gateshead; containing 2009 inhabitants. This district, which was separated from the chapelry of Heworth in 1843, occupies an elevated situation, and abounds with wildly romantic scenery. The substratum is chiefly freestone of excellent quality, of which there are numerous quarries; the produce is chiefly formed into grindstones, for which the place has long been celebrated. An extensive pottery for common earthenware has been established; and there are also two windmills, and a mill driven by water. The church, consecrated on the 25th of August, 1842, and dedicated to St. Alban, was erected at an expense of £880, of which £200 were a grant from Her Majesty's Commissioners, £175 from the Incorporated, and £75 from the Diocesan Society, and the remainder raised by subscription; it is a neat structure in the early English style, with a campanile turret, and the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Incumbent of Heworth. A national school, built in 1842, is supported by subscription.

WINESTEAD (St. GERMAN), a parish, in the union of PATRINGTON, S. division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESSE, E. riding of YORK, 9 miles (E. S. E.) from Hedon; containing 139 inhabitants. The parish is nearly in the centre of the peninsula of Holderness, and consists of about 2000 acres, of which two-thirds are arable, and one-third under grass, among the latter of which are interspersed above 200 acres of wood; the surface is undulated, and the soil a strong fertile clay. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12, and in the patronage of Mrs. Hildyard, of Winestead Hall; net income, £247. The church is an ancient building, surrounded by stately trees: in front of the pulpit is a monument with a recumbent statue in armour, to the memory of Sir Robert Hildyard. A school is supported by Mrs. Hildyard. The celebrated Andrew Marvel, M.P. for Hull in the time of Charles I., was born here, March 31st, 1621, during the incumbency of his father.

WINFARTHING (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of GUILTCROSS, hundred of DISS, E. division of NORFOLK, 4¼ miles (N. by W.) from Diss; containing 696 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £12, and in the gift of the Earl of Albemarle: the glebe contains about 31 acres. The church is in the early and decorated styles, with an embattled tower. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists. The poor have 82 acres of land, of which 60 were allotted at the inclosure, when 23 were also assigned to the church.

WINFIELD, a township, in the parish and hundred of WROTHAM, union of MALLING, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, 5 miles (S.) from Wrotham.

WINFORD-EAGLE (St. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of DORCHESTER, hundred of TOLLERFORD, Dorchester division of DORSET, 1½ mile (S. W.) from Maiden-Newton; containing 133 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 1789 acres, of which 500 acres are arable, 130 woodland, and the remainder meadow and pasture; the soil is fertile, resting on a substratum of gravel. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Toller-Fratrum: the inappropriate tithes have been commuted for £6. 10., and the vicarial for £150. The church, erected in 1840, is a handsome structure in the later English style, containing 150 sittings, of which 130 are free. On Fernham down are several barrows, in one of which seventeen urns, containing bones and ashes, have been discovered. Dr. Thomas Sydenham, the eminent physician, was born here in 1624.

WINFORTON (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of KINGTON, hundred of HUNTINGTON, county of HEREFORD, 6 miles (N. E. by E.) from Hay; containing 178 inhabitants, and comprising 1020 acres. A railroad from Hay to Kington passes through the parish, which is beautified by the windings of the river Wye. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 6. 8., and in the gift of the Rev. William Domvile: the tithes have been commuted for £255, and the glebe contains 15¾ acres. A school was endowed in 1812, by the late Mr. Freeman, with £12 per annum, and a house and garden.

WINFRITH-NEWBURGH (St. CHRISTOPHER), a parish, in the union of WAREHAM and PURBECK, hundred of WINFRITH, Wareham division of DORSET, 9 miles (W. by S.) from Wareham; containing 963 inhabitants. This is a very extensive and ancient parish, giving name to the hundred, and formerly belonged to the family of Newburgh, who had a seat here, of which there are no traces. Near the hamlet of Brome-hill, a rivulet, tributary to the Frome, is crossed by three bridges, erected in 1769, at the joint expense of Edward Weald and James Frampton, Esqrs. The living is a rectory, with West Lullworth annexed, valued in the king's books at £23. 14. 4½.; net income, £440; patron, the Bishop of Salisbury. Two-thirds of the great tithes of corn, wool, and lambs, belong to the vicar of Chipping-Campden, in the county of Gloucester. The church has a fine Norman doorway and an embattled tower; the nave is covered with lead.

WING (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of LEIGHTON-BUZZARD, hundred of COTTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM, 2½ miles (S. W. by W.) from Leighton-Buzzard; containing, with the hamlets of Ascott, Burcott, Crafton, Littleworth, and Wingberry, 1274 inhabitants, of whom 808 are in Wing township. The parish is situated near a branch of the river Ouse, and comprises 5600 acres by admeasurement, of which 4000 are pasture, 1520 arable, and 80 woodland; the Grand Junction canal, and the London and Birmingham railway, run along the eastern boundary of the parish, and the road from Oxford to Cambridge through the village. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £18. 16. 3.; net income, £338; patron and improprator, Samuel Jones Loyd, Esq. The church is a remarkably fine structure, containing about 400 sittings. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also an hospital founded in 1596, by Lady Pelham, widow of Sir William Dormer, for eight persons, and endowed by her with property producing, with a bequest of Sir William Stanhope in 1772, an income of £72. A fund of about £20, arising from bequests, is, with £10. 15., under the charity of Thomas Pratt, of Wingrave, annually distributed in great-coats and other clothing. A Benedictine priory, a cell to the monastery of St. Nicholas, at Angiers, in France, was founded at Ascott, in the parish, by the Empress Maud, and after the suppression, came to Cardinal Wolsey.

WING (ST. PETER AND ST. PAUL), a parish, in the union of UPPINGHAM, hundred of MARTINSLEY, county of RUTLAND, 3½ miles (N. E.) from Uppingham, near the road to Oakham; containing 302 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1044a. 3r. 6p., of which the surface is hilly, and the soil in general a good red earth. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 5. 5., and in the patronage of the Crown, with a net income of £340: there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 195 acres.

WINGATE-GRANGE, an ecclesiastical district, in the union of EASINGTON, S. division of EASINGTON ward, N. division of the county of DURHAM, 1 mile (W. by S.) from Castle-Eden, and 6½ miles (E. S. E.) from Durham; containing in the township 2625 inhabitants. This district was separated from the parishes of Castle-Eden and Kelloe, for ecclesiastical purposes, in 1842, after the erection of a church in 1840; it is about two miles in length, from east to west, and one mile in average breadth, comprising an area of nearly 1700 acres, of which 1200 are arable and pasture in nearly equal portions, 360 woodland and plantations, and the remainder sites of buildings, roads, and waste. The soil is generally of a clayey kind, varying in fertility on different lands: those portions of it which are naturally of inferior quality have been, within the last few years, greatly improved by draining and the use of lime.

The substratum is chiefly magnesian limestone, which is quarried for burning into lime, and for building purposes; coal abounds on the lands of Wingate and Wingate-Grange, and on the latter Lord Howden and others opened a mine in 1838, and, in the course of the following year, discovered a rich bed called the "Caradoc Wallsend" coal, which is sent by railway to Hartlepool. The Wingate branch of the Hartlepool railway terminates at the colliery; and the Hartlepool, Clarence, and Great North of England Junction railway passes through the southern portion of the district. Since the establishment of the colliery, the village of Wingate-Grange, containing more than 400 houses, has been built; and an iron-foundry was established in 1841, near the line of the Junction railway, within the district, but, from its proximity to the Trimdon colliery in the adjoining parish, it has been called the Trimdon foundry. The church was built by subscription, at an expense of £1300, of which £300 were given by the owners of the colliery; it is a neat structure in the early English style, and the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Bishop of Durham, with a net income of £150. The improper tithes have been commuted for £184. 17. 11., payable to Christ's Hospital, Sherburn, and the vicarial for £43. 16. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists. A school, for which an appropriate building was erected by subscription, is supported by the colliery company, and attended by about 300 children; and an infants' school is maintained by the incumbent of Castle-Eden.

WINGATES, a township, in the parish of LONG HORSLEY, union of ROTHBURY, W. division of the ward of MORPETH, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 6 miles (S. E. by S.) from Rothbury; containing 175 inhabitants. This place was anciently part of the possessions of Gospatrick, Earl of Durham, from whom it passed to the families of Merlay, Sommerville, and Thornton; it is now the property of R. Trevelyan and H. P. M. Witham, Esqrs. The land, with the exception of that near the village, is of very indifferent quality, a poor thin soil resting upon a retentive clay, and altogether unsheltered by woods or plantations; the substratum contains ironstone, which appears to have been formerly wrought, and there are seams of coal and limestone in operation to a limited extent. The village is situated on elevated ground, and consists chiefly of two farm-houses, and some low thatched cottages extending from east to west. About a mile to the north of it is a mineral spring, discovered about 60 years since, which, on being analysed, was found to contain, in one pint, 6 grains of pure sal martis, 15 of alum, and 9 of ochreous earth. The late Walter Trevelyan, Esq., soon after its discovery, erected a large bath of stone, and conveyed to it the water from the spring, for the use of invalids affected with scrofula, other cutaneous eruptions, and debility, in the cure of which it was found powerfully efficacious, either when taken internally or used for bathing. The present proprietors, also, have raised plantations, and ornamented the grounds surrounding the baths, which have been inclosed; but the want of lodging-houses confines the benefits of the water to the inhabitants of the immediate neighbourhood.

WINGBERRY, a hamlet, in the parish of WING, union of LEIGHTON-BUZZARD, hundred of COTTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM; containing 25 inhabitants.

WINGERWORTH, a parish, in the union of CHESTERFIELD, hundred of SCARSDALE, N. division of the county of DERBY, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Chesterfield; containing 484 inhabitants. It comprises about 3000 acres, the surface of which is hilly, and the soil a good loam. The Ikeneld-street passes through the parish, in which large quantities of coal, iron-stone, and freestone, are obtained. The Hall was taken possession of and garrisoned for the parliament, in 1643; the present large and elegant mansion was erected in 1728. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Dean of Lincoln (the appropriator), with a net income of £77: the tithes have been commuted for £245, and £34 are payable to the incumbent, who has $14\frac{1}{2}$ acres of glebe; 30 acres belong to the Dean. There is a Roman Catholic chapel; and a school is partly supported by an endowment of £19 per annum. On Stoned edge cliff are several basins and two seats, excavated in the rock. The brass head of a catapulta was found a few years since on the Roman road.

WINGFIELD, a hamlet, in the parish of CHALGRAVE, union of WOBURN, hundred of MANSHEAD, county of BEDFORD; containing 160 inhabitants.

WINGFIELD (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union and hundred of HOXNE, E. division of SUFFOLK, 3 miles (N.) from Stradbroke; containing 668 inhabitants. Michael, first earl of Suffolk, in the eighth of Richard II., built a castle here, of which the south front still remains, and the west side has been converted into a farm-house: the ruins, which are surrounded by a moat, are situated about a quarter of a mile north-west of the church, and are now the property of Lord Berners. A college was founded on the south side of the church by the will of Sir John Wingfield, in 1362, for a provost and nine priests, but all that remains is the west side of the quadrangle, now used as a farm-house; it was valued at the surrender in 1534, at £50. 3. $5\frac{1}{2}$. per annum. The parish comprises 2442 acres, of which 87 are common or waste. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £150; patron and appropriator, the Bishop of Norwich, whose tithes have been commuted for £700, and whose glebe contains about three-quarters of an acre. The church, which is a spacious and handsome structure, made collegiate in 1362, is chiefly in the decorated style, with an embattled tower; the nave and chancel are lighted with clerestory windows, and there are considerable remains of stained glass. In the chancel, of which the architecture is highly enriched, are some superb monuments of the De la Poles; one to the memory of Michael, second earl of Suffolk, one to William, Duke of Suffolk, another to his son, and one to John, Duke of Suffolk. There were formerly also monumental brasses to the ancient family of Wingfield, but they have all disappeared. John Trower, in 1515, left an estate producing £50 per annum, for the repair of the church, and the relief of the poor.

WINGFIELD, NORTH (St. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of CHESTERFIELD, hundred of SCARSDALE, N. division of the county of DERBY, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Chesterfield; containing, with the hamlet of Pilsley, and the townships of Claylane, Stretton, Tupton, and Woodford, 3144 inhabitants, of whom 250 are in North Wingfield township. The Roman Ikeneld-street may be traced in the parish; and at Clay Cross, the North-Midland railway is carried through a tunnel 1760 yards long, 22 feet wide, and 26 feet high, the expense of constructing which is stated to have been above £100 per lineal yard. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £21. 6. 3.; net income, £772; patron, G. H. Barrow, Esq. The church is a large handsome structure, at a distance from the village. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WINGFIELD, SOUTH (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of BELPER, hundred of SCARSDALE, N. division of the county of DERBY, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.) from Alfreton; containing 1188 inhabitants. The manor-house, now an extensive and interesting ruin, was a splendid edifice, erected by Ralph, Lord Cromwell, treasurer in the reign of Henry VI., and was afterwards, for several generations, one of the principal seats of the earls of Shrewsbury: Mary, Queen of Scots, while in the custody of George, the sixth earl, passed some months here, in 1569, and was also here in Nov. and Dec. 1594. At the commencement of the parliamentary war, it was garrisoned for the parliament; but being taken by the Earl of Newcastle, towards the close of the year 1643, was then made a royal garrison; in 1644 it sustained a siege, but surrendered to the parliament in August, and in 1646 was dismantled. In 1774 a considerable part of the mansion was pulled down, to build a modern house near it with the materials. The village is large, and possesses a considerable and increasing trade in the weaving of stockings, for which there are about 200 frames in operation: a part of the population, also, is employed in obtaining coal. The North-Midland railway passes through a short tunnel in the parish. The living is a discharged vicarage, endowed with the rectorial tithes, and valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4.; net income, £324; patron, the Duke of Devonshire: the tithes were commuted for land in 1776. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Samuel Newton, in 1683, gave £200 for charitable uses, with which some lands were purchased, now producing £33 per annum, £17 of which are applied for teaching children. An estate called Strelley's, at Okerthorpe, in the parish, is let for £55 a year, whereof £20 were directed by the donor to be applied for apprenticing two boys, and £10 for exhibitions for two scholars at the university.

WINGFORD.—See WENTWORTH.

WINGHAM (St. MARY), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union of EASTRY, hundred of WINGHAM, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, E. division of KENT, 9 miles (S. E.) from Canterbury; containing 1129 inhabitants. This place, situated on the road from Canterbury to Sandwich, in a neighbourhood abounding with genteel residences, was formerly part of the ancient possessions of the see of Canterbury, to which it was granted in the early part of the heptarchy; and in the 36th of Henry III., Archbishop Boniface obtained for the inhabitants the grant of a market. The archbishops had a palace here, in which they frequently resided, and entertained several of the kings of England on their way to and from the continent; but the manor was exchanged for other lands by Cranmer, in the reign of Henry VIII. The Wingham hops are considered the best grown in the county. An horticultural society, of which Lady Bridges is patroness, was established in Aug. 1835, and is well supported; and considerable fairs for cattle are held on May 12th and Nov. 12th.

The petty-sessions for the division also take place here. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £114; patron, N. Bridges, Esq.; impropiator, W. Greville, Esq., whose tithes have been commuted for £1368. The church, built originally in the early English style, contains portions, subsequently added, in the decorated and later English. There is a place of worship for Independents. Sir James Oxenden, Bart., in 1686, founded a free school, and endowed it with £16 per annum. A college for a provost and six canons in the church was founded in 1286, by John Peckham, archbishop, and at the Dissolution had a gross revenue of £208. 14. 3½., and was granted by Edward VI. to Sir Henry Palmer: on or near its site, a stone coffin and some other relics of antiquity have been found. William de Wingham, Bishop of London, and chancellor in the reign of Henry III., was a native of the parish.

WINGRAVE (St. PETER AND St. PAUL), a parish, in the union of AYLESBURY, hundred of COTTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM, 5½ miles (N. E.) from Aylesbury; containing, with the hamlet of Rowsham, 814 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 9. 7., and in the patronage of the Countess of Bridgewater; net income, £98; impropiator, O. Oldham, Esq. There is a place of worship for Independents. At Rowsham was formerly a chapel. Thomas Pratt, in 1615, bequeathed property now producing a rental of £35, to be distributed among the poor of the parishes and hamlets of Wingrave, Wing, Mentmore, Cheddington, Bettlow, and Aldwick; and there is some property, known as Bailey's House Gift, let for £17. 10. per annum, applied to repairing the church.

WINKBOURN, a parish, in the union of SOUTHWELL, N. division of the wapentake of THURGARTON, S. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 4 miles (N.) from Southwell; containing 144 inhabitants. The parish once belonged to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, to whom the town was granted by Adam Tyson, soon after the institution of their order; and Henry Hosatus gave to the order the church, which gift was confirmed by King John. The manor, rectory, and church were conveyed by a grant of Edward VI. to William Burnell and Constance his wife, in lieu of the rectory and lands at Beachworth, in Surrey, which they had surrendered to Henry VIII.; and a spacious brick mansion, with stone facings, was erected on the site of the religious establishment, about the close of the 17th century, and is now used as the family residence of the proprietor of the parish. The living is a donative, in the patronage of P. Pegge Burnell, Esq. The church is a large ancient edifice. A school, endowed with £30 per annum and a house and garden, was founded by William Burnell, Esq., in 1738.

WINKFIELD (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of EASTHAMPSSTEAD, hundred of RIPPLESMERE, county of BERKS, 5½ miles (S. W. by W.) from New Windsor; containing 2178 inhabitants. This parish, pleasantly situated on the road from London, through Windsor Forest, to Reading, comprises 9878a. 18p., and contains the course on which the celebrated Ascot races are held, a beautifully smooth surface, formed by William, Duke of Cumberland, and recently much improved. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 5. 10.; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Salisbury. The great tithes have been commuted for £661, and the vicarial for £390; there is a parsonage-house, and the appropriate and vicarial glebes contain, respectively, 18¾ and 26½ acres. There is a place of worship for Independents. The Earl of Ranelagh, in 1710, built a chapel on Winkfield Plain, in which service is daily performed, and attached to which is a free school for twenty-two boys, and another for twenty-two girls, and endowed them with property in Ireland. In 1715, Thomas Maule, Esq., bequeathed £500; in 1783, Thomas Hatch, who had been educated here, £500; and in 1809, John Tow left £500 four per cent. stock, in augmentation of the income, which altogether amounts to upwards of £350 per annum.

WINKFIELD (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union and hundred of BRADFORD, Westbury and N. divisions, and Trowbridge and Bradford subdivisions, of WILTS, 2 miles (W. S. W.) from Trowbridge; containing 305 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 16. 5½., and in the patronage of the Rev. John Hall and others: the tithes have been commuted for £255, and £20 are payable to the rector of Farleigh-Hungerford; the glebe contains 20½ acres. There is a monument in the church, erected by his pupils to the memory of the Rev. Edward Spencer, who was for forty-three years rector, and died in 1819, in the 80th year of his age.

WINKLEY, or WINCKLEIGH (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of TORRINGTON, hundred of WINKLEY, South Molton division, (except the tything of Loosbear, which is in the Black Torrington and Shebbear division,) and N. division of DEVON, 6½ miles (S. W.) from Chulmleigh; containing 1650 inhabitants. This parish forms a distinct hundred, to which it gives name; the new road from Torrington to Exeter passes through it, and the scenery is agreeably enlivened with the grounds of Winkley Court. A fair for cattle is held on the Monday after July 7th; and courts leet and baron annually. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £21. 8. 9.; net income, £215; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Exeter. There is an endowed almshouse, called Gidley's, for widows.

WINKSLEY, a chapelry, in the parish of RIPON, Lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, W. riding of YORK, 4¾ miles (W.) from Ripon; containing 211 inhabitants. The township comprises about 600 acres of cultivated land, chiefly the property of Lord Grantley, who is lord of the manor. The chapelry includes the township of Grantley: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £68; patrons, the Dean and Chapter of Ripon. The chapel, dedicated to St. Oswald, a small ancient structure with a tower, has been enlarged.

WINKTON, a tything, in the parish, union, and hundred of CHRISTCHURCH, Ringwood and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 2½ miles (N. W. by N.) from Christchurch; containing 928 inhabitants.

WINLATON (St. PAUL), a parish, in the union of GATESHEAD, E. division of CHESTER ward, N. division of the county of DURHAM, 5 miles (W. S. W.) from Newcastle-upon-Tyne; containing 5326 inhabitants. This parish, formed in 1833 out of Ryton, comprises the townships of Winlton and Chopwell, and consists of about 9000 acres, of which the chief part is arable, with about 2000 acres of woodland; the soil is a strong clay, producing excellent crops of wheat. Considerable seams of coal are found in both townships, of which the principal are situated to the east, at a depth of from 20 to 50 fathoms, the strata rising towards the west, where they approach the surface. The proprietors of the mines in Winlaton township are its lords, and the lessees are the Marquess of Bute, George Heppel Ramsay, Esq., J.P., and J. Cowen, Esq.: the mines in Chopwell belong to the marquess, who works his own coal, and to the crown, whose lands here are to the extent of 1000 acres. The coal throughout the parish is thought to be of the best kind for making coke, and its freeness from sulphur renders it valuable for smelting iron, and for smiths' use; about 100,000 tons are annually raised by the marquess and Mr. Ramsay, who have extensive coke-ovens at Derwent-Haugh, whence it is shipped to almost all countries. There are excellent freestone quarries, and also some superior fire-clay, great quantities of which are made into fire-bricks for furnaces and gas and other works, for which purpose Mr. Ramsay and Mr. Cowen have large premises.

The place has been long famous for its manufacture of iron and steel goods of every description, from an anchor of the largest size to the minutest article. About the year 1690, Sir Ambrose Crowley removed hither from Sunderland, and established iron-works, to which the village, occupying an elevated site between the rivers Tyne and Derwent, owes its rise; he afterwards extended them to Swalwell and Winlaton-Mill, and they have been carried on of late years by Crowley Millington, Esq., and partners, the chief owners there. In the village are now several iron-factories, where anchors, chain-cables, pumps, and cylinders for steam-engines, are made, as also edge-tools, spades, hinges, patten-rings, nails, &c.; the principal are conducted by Messrs. Laycock, Cowen, Thompson, Bagnall, Hurst, and seven others, who employ, when in full trade, about 1000 men and boys. On the bank of the Tyne are works for refining lead, and at Blaydon is a wharf for embarking the produce, the property of T. W. Beaumont, Esq. The Newcastle and Carlisle railway passes through the parish, and divides at Blaydon, one branch crossing the Tyne to Newcastle, and another proceeding to Gateshead; there is also a magnificent suspension-bridge across the Tyne, in the parish, built in 1829-30, by subscription, and connecting the counties of Durham and Northumberland, and the whole district, by a good road, with Newcastle. A chapel was built in 1705, on the site of an ancient one said to have been demolished in 1569; but having been suffered to go to ruin, a spacious school-room was erected in 1816, on the spot, in which divine service was occasionally performed by the rector of Ryton, until a church was built. The living is a rectory, in the patronage of the Bishop of Durham: the tithes have been commuted for £347, and the glebe consists of 22 acres, with a good house. The church, consecrated September 9th, 1828, is in the early English style, with a square tower and pinnacles, and contains 800 sittings, of which 400 are free; it was erected at an expense of £2300, the Church Commissioners contributing one-half, the Incorporated Society £400, and the rest being raised by subscription. There are places of worship for Wesleyans, Presbyterians, Primitive Methodists, and Methodists of the New Connexion; and four parochial schools, all in connexion with the National Society, are supported by subscription. Park, on the bank of the Derwent, the seat of Sir T. J. Clavering, Bart., is a sulphureous spring, much resorted to.

WINMARLEIGH, a township, in the parish and union of GARSTANG, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 2 miles (N. W.) from Garstang; containing 257 inhabitants. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £150. 0. 11½.

WINNALL, a parish, in the union of NEW WINCHESTER, hundred of FAWLEY, Winchester and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (N. N. E.) from Winchester; containing 113 inhabitants. This is a small parish, north of the road to Alresford, and east of the river Itchin. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £5, and in the gift of the Bishop of Winchester: the tithes have been commuted for £170.

WINNERSH, a liberty, in the parish of HURST, union of WOKINGHAM, hundred of SONNING, county of BERKS; containing 547 inhabitants, and comprising 1777a. 27p.

WINNINGTON, a township, in the parish of GREAT BUDWORTH, union of NORTHWICH, Second division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 1 mile (N. W.) from Northwich; containing 321 inhabitants. It is situated on the banks of the Weever, over which is a stone bridge.

WINNINGTON, a township, in the parish of MUCKLESTON, union of MARKET-DRAYTON, N. division of the hundred of PIREHILL and of the county of STAFFORD, 4½ miles (N. E.) from Drayton; containing 208 inhabitants.

WINNOW, ST., a parish, in the union of BODMIN, hundred of WEST, E. division of CORNWALL, 2½ miles (S. E.) from Lostwithiel; containing 1056 inhabitants, and comprising 5000 acres. The great London road passes through the parish; and the navigable river Fowey runs on the west and south, and is crossed by a bridge, on the road from Bodmin to Plymouth, at Resprin. Stone is quarried for building and the repair of roads. A fair is held at Bridgend on the 12th of January. The living is a vicarage, with the chapel of Nighton, in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Exeter (the appropriators), valued in the king's books at £5: the great tithes have been commuted for £416, and the vicarial for £297. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. On Beacon Hill, a square battery was constructed by the royalists, a short time before the capitulation of the army of the parliament, in 1644.

WINSKALES, a township, in the parish of WORKINGTON, union of COCKERMOUTH, ALLERDALE ward above Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, 2½ miles (S. E.) from Workington; containing 111 inhabitants. The tithes were commuted for land in 1809.

WINSCOMBE (ST. JAMES), a parish, in the union of AXBRIDGE, hundred of WINTERSTOKE, E. division of SOMERSET, 2 miles (N. by W.) from Axbridge; containing, with the hamlet of Woodborough, 1436 inhabitants. The parish comprises 4140 acres, of which 467 are common or waste land. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £16. 2. 11.; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Wells. The great tithes have been commuted for £200, and the vicarial for £250: the appropriate and vicarial glebes contain, respectively, 125½ acres, and 1¾ acre. The church is a handsome structure, with a stately tower crowned by pinnacles. Symons Cardinbrook, in 1761, gave the residue of his estate to be applied for teaching poor children; the schoolroom was erected by subscription, aided by about £60 from this bequest; the permanent annual income is £15.

WINSFORD, county of CHESTER.—See OVER.

WINSFORD (St. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish, in the union of DULVERTON, hundred of WILLITON and FREEMANNERS, W. division of SOMERSET, 5 miles (N. by W.) from Dulverton; containing 581 inhabitants. The parish comprises 8656 acres, including 2035 common or waste, and is situated on the river Exe, which forms its boundary for 6 or 7 miles. Iron-ore is abundant, and there are indications of its having been formerly wrought to a great extent; common stone, of the slate species, is quarried for roads and for building rough walls. A cattle-fair is held on the 20th of August. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £14. 13. 9., and in the gift of Emanuel College, Cambridge: of the impropriate tithes, $\frac{1}{4}$ belongs to Sir T. D. Acland, Bart., $\frac{1}{4}$ to the poor of the parishes of King's-Brompton, Kingston, and Bishop's-Lydeard, and $\frac{1}{2}$ is appropriated for exhibitions at St. Mary's Hall, Oxford. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £130, and the vicarial for £370; there is a glebe-house, and the glebe comprises $92\frac{3}{4}$ acres. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WINSHAM, a parish, in the union of CHARD, and forming one of the four detached portions which constitute the E. division of the hundred of KINGSBURY, W. division of SOMERSET, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Chard; containing 999 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the new road from Taunton and Chard to Bridport: there are quarries of freestone and flint, the material of which is used for building. The manufacture of woollen-cloth was formerly carried on to a considerable extent, but has been lately greatly diminished: a pleasure-fair is held on the Thursday in Whitsun-week. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £14. 13. 4.; net income, £287; patron, the Dean of Wells; impropriator, H. H. Henley, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £139. 10. The church is an ancient structure, with a tower rising from the centre: in the belfry is a representation of the Crucifixion of Our Saviour, considered to be perfectly unique. Sir Matthew Holworthy, in 1680, gave premises, producing about £6 per annum, which sum is applied towards instruction in a national school erected in 1818.

WINSHILL, a township, in the parish and union of BURTON-UPON-TRENT, hundred of REPTON and GRESLEY, S. division of the county of DERBY, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (E. N. E.) from Burton; containing 377 inhabitants.

WINSKILL, a township, in the parish of ADDINGHAM, union of PENRITH, LEATH ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Penrith; containing, with the township of Hunsonby, 191 inhabitants.

WINSLADE (St. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of BASINGSTOKE, Basingstoke and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 3 miles (S. by E.) from Basingstoke; containing, with the tything of Kempshott, 169 inhabitants, of whom 100 are in Winslade hamlet. The parish is situated on the road from Basingstoke to Alton, and comprises 1448 acres, of which 743 are arable, 351 meadow and pasture, 312 wood, and 30 waste, &c.; the land under tillage produces good barley and turnips, and rests on a substratum of chalk. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 12. 1., and in the gift of Lord Bolton: the tithes have been commuted for £204. 14. 6.; there is a glebe-house, and the glebe comprises 12 acres. The church contains 110 sittings.

WINSLEY, with SNITTERTON, a hamlet, in the parish of DARLEY, union of BAKEWELL, hundred of WIRKSWORTH, S. division of the county of DERBY, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Matlock; containing 604 inhabitants.

WINSLEY, a chapelry, in the parish of GREAT BRADFORD, union and hundred of BRADFORD, Westbury and N. divisions, and Trowbridge and Bradford subdivisions, of WILTS, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W.) from Bradford; containing 2269 inhabitants. The chapel is dedicated to St. Nicholas. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WINSLEY, a hamlet, in the chapelry of HARTWITH, parish of KIRKBY-MALZEARD, union of PATELEY-BRIDGE, Lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, W. riding of YORK, 3 miles (W. N. W.) from Ripley; containing, with Hartwith, 1138 inhabitants. This place and Hartwith form a township, which includes the hamlets of Summer-Bridge, Braisty-Wood, Brimham, and New Laiths; the lands are the property of various persons, of whom Lord Grantley is lord of the manor.

WINSLOW (St. LAWRENCE), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of COTTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Buckingham, and 50 (N. W.) from London; containing, with Shipton hamlet, 1434 inhabitants. This town, which is of considerable antiquity, having been given by King Offa to the abbey of St. Alban's, so early as 794, is situated on the brow of a hill, and consists of three principal streets regularly built and of neat appearance; the houses are chiefly of brick; water is amply supplied from wells. The land in the vicinity is extremely fertile, and in a high state of cultivation: the white poppy was so successfully grown here, in 1821, as to produce 60lb. of opium, worth at least £75, from four acres, and 143lb., in the next year, from eleven acres; for which, on both occasions, the prize of 30 guineas was awarded by the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce. The market, granted by charter of Henry III., is on Thursday; a small quantity of corn is pitched in the market-house. Fairs are held on February 18th, March 20th, Holy-Thursday, August 21st, September 22nd, and November 26th, for cattle; and on the Thursday before Old Michaelmas-day, and the first and second Thursdays following, are statute-fairs. The parish comprises 1900 acres by admeasurement, of which 310 are arable, 1570 pasture, including homesteads, and 20 woodland. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11. 5. 10., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £185; impropriator, W. S. Lowndes, Esq.. The church is a spacious and venerable structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower at the west end, and has been repewed. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyans. A school was founded and endowed by Joseph Rogers, in 1724, with property now producing an income of £30; and coal and bread are annually distributed among the poor to the amount of about £35, derived from bequests. The union comprises 17 parishes or places, containing a population of 8376.

WINSLOW, a township, in the parish and union of BROMYARD, hundred of BROXASH, county of HEREFORD, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Bromyard; containing 424 inhabitants, and comprising 2832 acres. The tithes have been commuted for £490, of which £210 are payable to the first, and £55 to the second, portionist of Bromyard, and £225 to the vicar; there is a glebe of 8 acres.

WINSON, a chapelry, in the parish of BIBURY, union of NORTHLEACH, hundred of BRADLEY, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 5 miles (N. W.) from Fairford; containing 202 inhabitants, and comprising about 1300 acres by admeasurement, chiefly arable land. The chapel is dedicated to St. Michael.

WINSTANLEY, a township, in the parish and union of WIGAN, hundred of WEST-DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Wigan; containing 681 inhabitants. The township comprises 1866 acres, of which 600 are arable, 900 meadow and pasture, 100 woodland, and the remainder common and waste. A rent-charge of £203. 9. has been awarded as a commutation for the tithes.

WINSTER, a market-town and chapelry, in the parish of YOULGRAVE, union of BAKEWELL, hundred of HIGH PEAK, N. division of the county of DERBY, 6 miles (S. S. E.) from Bakewell, and 145 (N. N. W.) from London; containing 1005 inhabitants. This small town is situated on the road from Ashbourn to Bakewell, about midway between the river Derwent and the Cromford and High Peak railway; it is badly supplied with water, which in dry seasons is only to be procured at the distance of a mile. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in lead-mines, which occupation was once much more extensively carried on; the market on Saturday, is very indifferently attended, and four fairs formerly held annually have also declined. Winster is within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s. The chapelry comprises 1049*a.* 1*r.* 24*p.* The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £104; patrons, the Inhabitants; impropiator, the Duke of Devonshire: the tithes were partly commuted for land, under inclosure acts, in 1763 and 1809. In 1702, Mrs. Anne Phermey and Mrs. H. Fenshaw bestowed one-fourth of the tithes of corn and hay in the township on the minister; and about 50 acres of land belong to the benefice. The chapel, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, which was partly in the Norman style, with a tower nearly covered with ivy, has just been taken down and another edifice erected. The Primitive Methodists and Wesleyans have each a place of worship. Thomas Eyre, Esq., in 1717, bequeathed £20 per annum for instruction; and an annuity of £5 was left in 1718, by Robert Moore, for the same purpose. In the neighbourhood are several barrows, in one of which, opened in 1768, two glass vessels were found, containing some clear, but green-coloured water, also a silver bracelet, glass beads, and other trinkets.

WINSTER, a chapelry, in the parish, union, and ward of KENDAL, county of WESTMORLAND, 7 miles (W.) from Kendal; containing, with the township of Undermilbeck, which is in the parish of Windermere, 1033 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £61; patron, the Vicar of Kendal. The chapelry once formed part of that of Crook, and the inhabitants still contribute towards the repairs of the chapel there.

WINSTON (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of TEESDALE, S. W. division of DARLINGTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM, 10 miles (W. by N.) from Darlington, on the road to Barnard-Castle; containing 293 inhabitants. The whole of the parish, which comprises about 3150 acres, belongs to Lady Bridgewater. The village is situated on an elevation rising from the northern bank of the river Tees, which is crossed by a handsome stone bridge of one arch, 111 feet in the span, built in 1764. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 18. 1½., and in the gift of the Bishop of Durham: the tithes have been commuted for £411. 17., of which £385. 10. are paid to the rector, £25. 14. to Trinity College, Cambridge, and 13*s.* to the vicar of Gainford; the glebe contains 29½ acres. The church is a small ancient fabric, chiefly of early English character: the churchyard is shaded by venerable elms, beneath the branches of which a noble prospect of Raby opens to the north. The parsonage, with its beautiful gardens laid out in hanging terraces, joins the church on the east, and commands one of the richest views of the Tees; the wild range of the Richmondshire hills bounds the horizon to the south and west. Lord Crewe left the interest of £70 for educational purposes.

WINSTON (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of BOSMERE and CLAYDON, hundred of THREDLING, E. division of SUFFOLK, 1 mile (S. S. E.) from Debenham; containing 399 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 3. 9.; net income, £169; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Ely. There is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains about 32 acres. The church is chiefly in the early English style, with an embattled tower.

WINSTONE (St. BARTHOLOMEW), a parish, in the union of CIRENCESTER, hundred of BISLEY, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 6 miles (N. W. by N.) from Cirencester; containing 262 inhabitants. It comprises 1400 acres by admeasurement: stone is quarried for building. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 10., and in the patronage of J. W. Lyon, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £190; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 80 acres. The Baptists have a place of worship. The ancient Ermin-street passes through the parish.

WINTERBOURNE, a chapelry, in the parish of CHIEVELEY, union of NEWBURY, hundred of FAIRCROSS, county of BERKS, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Newbury; containing 337 inhabitants, and comprising 2084*a.* 26*p.* The chapel is dedicated to St. James: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £530, and the vicarial for £200, and there is a glebe of 16½ acres. A school is endowed with £10 per annum.

WINTERBOURNE (St. MARTIN), a parish, in the union of DORCHESTER, hundred of GEORGE, Dorchester division of DORSET, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Dorchester; containing 422 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3474 acres, of which 100 are common or waste. A market, granted by Henry III., was formerly held here; and a fair is still kept on St. Martin's-day. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 15.; net income, £73; patron, the Bishop of Salisbury; impropiator, H. Sturt, Esq. The church has a neat embattled tower crowned with pinnacles. In this parish is Maiden Castle, one of the strongest and most extensive Roman camps in the west of England, which, according to Ptolemy, was the castra æstiva of the garrison of Dunium, afterwards called Durnovaria, the capital of the Durotriges; it consists of a treble ditch and rampart, inclosing an irregular oval area of 44 acres, but the entire work covers 115½ acres. There are two very intricate entrances, that at the east end being defended by five, and that at the west end by six, ditches and ramparts. Near the former passes the vicinal road leading from Dorchester to Weymouth, and to the latter extends a branch from the Via Iceniana, which passes about a mile north of the camp. The summit commands a prospect of barrows stretching for many miles along the tops of the hills to the southward.

WINTERBOURNE (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of CLIFTON, Upper division of the hundred of LANGLEY and SWINEHEAD, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 6 miles (N. E. by N.) from Bristol; containing 3151 inhabitants. This parish, situated on the road from Bristol to Oxford, is watered by the small river Frome, and comprises by admeasurement 3202 acres. There are numerous quarries, the stone from which is used for building and the repair of roads; and between 300 and 400 persons are employed in a manufactory for hats. Fairs, chiefly for farmers' live-stock, are held in the spring and in October. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £27. 7. 6.; net income, £1187; patrons, the President and Fellows of St. John's College, Oxford. The church is supposed to have been built in the reign of Henry II. A church was erected at the large hamlet of Frenchay, in the chapelry of Hambrook, in 1836, which has since been amply endowed; and a portion of the parish having been assigned to it ecclesiastically, it is now an independent rectory. There are places of worship for Wesleyans, Independents, the Society of Friends, and Unitarians.

WINTERBOURNE-ABBAS (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of DORCHESTER, hundred of EGGERTON, Dorchester division of DORSET, 4¾ miles (W.) from Dorchester; containing 206 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with that of Winterbourne-Steepleton united, valued in the king's books at £13. 17. 6., and in the gift of Lincoln College, Oxford: the tithes have been commuted for £240; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 88¾ acres. The stream called the South Winterbourne, which runs through the parish, rises about a mile west of this place, in the vicinity of an ancient British temple, consisting of nine rude stones of unequal height, placed in a circular form, the diameter of which is 28 feet. Half a mile to the westward are the remains of a cromlech, and there are several other erect stones in the vicinity. The neighbourhood is supposed to have been the scene of some remarkable action, from the great number of tumuli scattered about in different directions.

WINTERBOURNE-ANDERSTON, county of DORSET.—See ANDERSTON.

WINTERBOURNE-BASSET (St. CATHERINE), a parish, in the union of MARLBOROUGH, hundred of SELKLEY, Marlborough and Ramsbury, and N. divisions of WILTS, 7 miles (N. W.) from Marlborough; containing 275 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2000 acres, and is situated on the road from Bath through Devizes to Swindon; the soil near the village is a good loam, and on the rise of the hills chalk appears, with its usual mixture of flints. Some property formerly possessed by the Baskervilles has descended to Lord Holland. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £18. 9. 7., and in the gift of Magdalen College, Oxford: the tithes have been commuted for £674. 15.; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 80 acres. The church is a small ancient edifice, with a neat tower, containing portions of the early and later English styles; there is a handsomely carved font, and one of the aisles is ornamented with a singularly elegant window; the chief monuments are those of the family of Baskerville, who long resided here. Among various Druidical remains are, a double circle of rude stones, a barrow surrounded with large stones, and the supposed site of houses once occupied by Archdruids.

WINTERBOURNE-CAME (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of DORCHESTER, partly in the hundred of CULLIFORD-TREE, and partly within the liberty of FRAMPTON, Dorchester division of DORSET, 2 miles (S. E. by S.) from Dorchester; containing, with the hamlet of Cripton, 157 inhabitants, of whom 140 are in Winterbourne-Came hamlet. This parish is situated on the road from Dorchester to Wareham, and comprises 1500 acres, of which 500 are arable, 600 pasture, and 400 woodland; the soil rests upon chalk and gravel. The living is a rectory, to which that of Winterbourne-Farrington was united in 1751, valued jointly in the king's books at £15. 5.; net income, £251; patron, the Hon. G. L. D. Damer. The church was erected about the year 1640. Here was anciently a small Benedictine nunnery, supposed to have been a cell to the abbey of Caen, in Normandy.

WINTERBOURNE-CLENSTONE (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of BLANDFORD, hundred of COOMBS-DITCH, Blandford division of DORSET, 4¼ miles (S. W.) from Blandford-Forum; containing 96 inhabitants. This parish was anciently more populous and of much greater importance than it is at present, and contained three churches, the livings of which were rectories. A little to the south of the church, on the side of a hill, commences Coombs-Ditch, which gives name to the hundred, and where the courts were formerly held; it is thought by Dr. Stukeley to have been a long rampart and ditch of the first colony of the Belgæ. The parish is situated about two miles from the road between Salisbury and Dorchester, and comprises 1357a. 2r. 29p., of which about 274 acres are arable, 447 meadow and pasture, and 335 woodland; the soil rests upon chalk and flint, and is in some parts clay, and in others a thin loam. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 18. 1½., and in the gift of E. M. Pleydell, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £199. 10.; there is a glebe-house, and the glebe contains 2½ acres. The church, rebuilt in 1839, at the expense of the lady of the manor, is a cruciform structure in the early English style, and is larger than the ancient edifice by the addition of a chancel and north transept; a gallery has also been erected, and the building is ornamented with a spire, and an elegant east window of stained glass.

WINTERBOURNE DANTSEY or DANNERY (St. EDWARD), a parish, in the union of AMESBURY, hundred of ALDERBURY, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTS, 4 miles (N. E. by N.) from Salisbury; containing 166 inhabitants, and comprising about 1550 acres. The living is a perpetual curacy, lately in the patronage of the Prebendary of Chute and Chisenbury in the Cathedral of Salisbury, which prebend is now suspended, and in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; net income, £58. The impropriation belongs to Miss M. A. Skinner.

WINTERBOURNE, EARLS (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of AMESBURY, hundred of ALDERBURY, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTS, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Salisbury; containing 221 inhabitants, and comprising about 1612 acres. The living is a perpetual curacy; till lately in the patronage of the Prebendary of Chute and Chisenbury in the Cathedral of Salisbury, who was appropriator; net income, £34. The tithes have been commuted for £470, and the glebe contains 137 acres. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Near the village is an ancient earthwork called Chlorus Camp, or Figbury Ring, from its circular form, including an area of about 15 acres.

WINTERBOURNE-FARRINGDON, or St. GERMAN'S, formerly a parish, now claiming to be extraparochial, in the union of WEYMOUTH, hundred of CULLIFORD-TREE, Dorchester division of DORSET, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Dorchester. The living, a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 3. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$., was in 1751 united to the rectory of Winterbourne-Came.

WINTERBOURNE-GUNNER, or CHERBOROUGH (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of AMESBURY, hundred of ALDERBURY, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTS, 4 miles (N. E. by N.) from Salisbury; containing 144 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1506 acres, of which 286 are common or waste land. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 16. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the incumbent, the Rev. C. J. Colman: the tithes have been commuted for £214; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains $7\frac{1}{2}$ acres.

WINTERBOURNE-HERRINGSTONE, county of DORSET.—See HERRINGSTONE.

WINTERBOURNE-HOUGHTON (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of BLANDFORD, hundred of PIMPERNE, Blandford division of DORSET, 4 miles (W. S. W.) from Blandford-Forum; containing 304 inhabitants. In the reign of Edward II., this place belonged to Hugh le Despenser, on whose execution at Bristol it escheated to the crown. It comprises about 2000 acres, of which about 750 are down and pasture, 500 woodland, and the rest arable; the surface is very hilly, and the soil chalk, thickly set with flints; good barley is produced, and large flocks of sheep are depastured. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 13. 4., and in the patronage of Mrs. Michel: the tithes have been commuted for £180; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains about 100 acres. The church is an ancient structure, remarkable only for the remains of the original rood-loft, which are still in good preservation. Considerable quantities of spar are found in some coppices within the parish.

WINTERBOURNE-KINGSTON (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of BLANDFORD, hundred of BEER-REGIS, Wareham division of DORSET, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. W.)

from Blandford-Forum; containing 567 inhabitants. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Beer-Regis; impropriators, E. M. Pleydell, Esq., and others, whose tithes have been commuted for £410, and those of the vicar for £120. 17. 6.

WINTERBOURNE-MONKTON, a parish, in the union of DORCHESTER, hundred of CULLIFORD-TREE, Dorchester division of DORSET, 2 miles (S. W. by S.) from Dorchester; containing 91 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8; net income, £157; patron, the Earl of Ilchester. An alien priory subordinate to the priory of West, or de Vasto, of the order of Cluny, is said to have existed here before the 15th of John.

WINTERBOURNE-MONKTON (St. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish, in the union of MARLBOROUGH, hundred of SELKLEY, Marlborough and Ramsbury, and N. divisions of WILTS, 7 miles (W. N. W.) from Marlborough; containing 251 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 2000 acres; the surface is flat, and the soil in general light. The living is a discharged vicarage, united in 1747 to that of Avebury, and valued in the king's books at £5: the tithes were commuted for land in 1813; the glebe contains 90 acres.

WINTERBOURNE-STEEPLETON (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of DORCHESTER, hundred of UGGSCOMBE, Dorchester division of DORSET, 4 miles (W. by S.) from Dorchester; containing 189 inhabitants. It comprises 1783 acres, of which 565 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, united to that of Winterbourne-Abbas, and valued in the king's books at £10. 4. 7. The church, situated in the middle of the parish, is covered with lead, and has a tower surmounted by a stone spire, which, and that at Iwerne-Minster, are the only spires in the county.

WINTERBOURNE-STOKE (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of AMESBURY, hundred of BRANCH and DOLE, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTS, 9 miles (N. W. by N.) from Salisbury; containing 328 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Amesbury to Hindon and Shaftesbury, and comprises 3500 acres of down land, forming a part of Salisbury Plain, and entirely appropriated to the depasturing of sheep; the soil is incumbent on chalk and flint. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11. 2. 8.; patron and impropriator, Lord Ashburton. The great tithes have been commuted for £131. 9., and the vicarial for £220; a rent-charge of £95 is paid to the Dean and Chapter of Sarum, and the glebe contains between 2 and 3 acres. The church is a fine ancient structure in the cathedral style, with a handsome tower, and has been recently repaired and repewed, and the chancel rebuilt, at a cost of £350, raised by subscription. On the downs are barrows, and traces of an ancient encampment.

WINTERBOURNE-STRICKLAND, a parish, in the union of BLANDFORD, hundred of PIMPERNE, Blandford division of DORSET, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Blandford-Forum; containing 383 inhabitants, and comprising 2215a. 3r. 18p. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 6. 3.; net income, £367; patron, the Hon. H. D. Damer. There is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains about 60 acres. The church, situated nearly in the centre of the parish, has an embattled tower crowned with pinnacles, and was repaired about 1716. Quarrelston House, an ancient quadrangular building, formerly the seat of the Binghamams, has been, for the greater part, pulled down at different times within the last half century.

WINTERBOURNE-WHITCHURCH (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of BLANDFORD, hundred of COOMBS-DITCH, Blandford division of DORSET, 5 miles (S. W.) from Blandford-Forum; containing 541 inhabitants. It comprises 2866a. 3r. 37p., of which about 1390 acres are arable, 1198 pasture, and 258 woodland. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 16. 10½; patron, Bishop of Salisbury; impropiators, E. M. Pleydell and H. C. Compton, Esqrs. The tithes have been commuted for £95. The church is a long narrow edifice, with a south transept, and a low embattled tower rising from the intersection, and contains a curious ancient font. The Rev. Samuel Wesley, father of John and Charles Wesley, who founded the sect of Methodists, and author of several poems on religious subjects, was born here during the incumbency of his father, who was ultimately ejected for nonconformity.

WINTERBOURNE-ZELSTONE (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of BLANDFORD, hundred of RUSHMORE, Blandford division of DORSET, 8 miles (S. by E.) from Blandford-Forum; containing 222 inhabitants. This parish, which is said to have taken its name from a stream, or bourne, that runs through it only in winter, comprises 823½ acres, the surface whereof is in general level, and the soil rests on gravel. Buttons are made to a considerable extent by females, and are sent to Blandford for sale. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 11. 3., and in the gift of J. J. Farquharson, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £239. 18.; there is a glebe-house, and the glebe contains 32½ acres. The church is ancient, and has a lofty embattled tower. There is a place of worship for Primitive Methodists.

WINTERBURN, with FLASBY, a township, in the parish of GARGRAVE, union of SKIPTON, E. division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, W. riding of YORK, 7 miles (N. W. by N.) from Skipton; containing 140 inhabitants. It is situated on the east side of the Aire, and intersected by a stream, a tributary of that river. There is a place of worship for Independents.

WINTERINGHAM (All Saints), a parish, in the union of GLANDFORD-BRIGG, N. division of the wapentake of MANLEY, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 7½ miles (W.) from Barton-upon-Humber; containing 694 inhabitants. This place, which is situated on the line of the Roman Ermin-street, was formerly of considerable importance; and about half a mile east of the present Winteringham, stood the town Ad Abum, which, according to Stukeley, was ploughed up at the close of the 17th century, when many curious relics of antiquity were discovered. The estates were anciently held by the Marmions, one of whom, in the reign of Edward II., obtained a charter for a market here, which was, however, discontinued a long time since. The parish is tolerably extensive, and the village, which is long and straggling, occupies a bold acclivity, on the south side of the Humber, of which and its northern bank pleasing views may be had, together with prospects of the more distant parts of Yorkshire: two-thirds of the land are arable, and the rest grass, with a little wood. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £28, and in the gift of the Rev. F. R. Read, with a net income of £657: about 300 acres of land have been awarded in lieu of tithes, under an inclosure act. The church is a neat edifice, chiefly in the Norman style, and consists of a nave, aisles, and chancel, with a chapel on the north side. There are places of worship for Independents, Wesleyans, and Primitive Methodists; and a national school. A bequest amounting to £16 per annum, made by Thomas Boothby in 1682, is distributed among widows; and £13, left by various donors, are yearly given in money and coal to the poor. Henry Kirke White was for some time at school here.

WINTERSETT, a township, in the parish of WRAGBY, wapentake of STAINCROSS, W. riding of YORK, 5½ miles (S. E. by E.) from Wakefield; containing 167 inhabitants. It comprises about 1170 acres, set out in farms, the property of Sir E. Dodsworth, Bart., and occupied by various persons. The village is distant about a mile and a half south-west from Wragby.

WINTERSLOW (All Saints), a parish, comprising East and West, in the union, and partly in the hundred, of ALDERBURY, and partly in the hundred of AMESBURY, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTSHIRE; containing 838 inhabitants. East Winterslow is 7¼ miles (N. E. by E.), and West 6½ (E. N. E.), from Salisbury. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £18. 13. 4.; net income, £784; patron, the Rev. H. E. Fryer. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also a school on the national plan, endowed with a small portion of the poor's estate, the remainder of which, about £28 per annum, is distributed among the poor. A man and woman from the parish are entitled to £10 per annum each, charged upon the rectorial tithes of Pitton and Farley, under the will of John Thistlethwaite, who died in 1724. Near Winterslow-Hut are three barrows, in one of which was discovered, a few years since, an arched vault constructed of rude flints wedged together, and inclosing two large sepulchral urns inverted, which were found to contain ashes enveloped in linen of a very fine texture, burnt bones, beads of red amber, a metal pin, and a two-edged lance-head of brass, with hair of a beautiful brown colour, and other relics, supposed to have been those of some illustrious British female. The Roman road from Salisbury to Winchester passes through the parish.

WINTERTON (All Saints), a small market-town, and a parish, in the union of GLANDFORD-BRIGG, N. division of the wapentake of MANLEY, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 8¼ miles (W. S. W.) from Barton-upon-Humber; containing 1373 inhabitants. This place, which is of some antiquity, is situated about half a mile west of the Ermin-street, and, from the discovery of various remains, appears to have been well known to the Romans. It occupies a salubrious position on the eastern side of one of the Wold hills, about two miles south of the Humber; a corn-market, established some years since, takes place every Wednesday; and fairs for cattle are held on the Tuesday before Palm-Sunday, and September 23rd. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8, and in the gift of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £82, and there is some land attached to the benefice. The church, a spacious cruciform structure in the Norman and early English styles, with a tower, was greatly injured during the civil war in the time of Charles, but was afterwards restored, and has recently been thoroughly repaired: the church land consists of about 3 acres. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Independents. Some bequests have been left at different periods for the relief of the poor and the instruction of children; and in 1841 a national school was erected on the north side of the church, at a cost of about £400, raised by subscription, aided by the National Society and the Treasury. The antiquities above alluded to were found in 1747, and comprised three highly curious tessellated pavements discovered at the foot of the hill on the Cliff farm, some Roman bricks, the foundations of walls, and other interesting relics; and on the Northlands farm a well, thought to have been constructed by the Romans, was opened a few years since. A petrifying spring, called Holy well, was once much resorted to on account of its medicinal properties.

WINTERTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the EAST and WEST FLEGG incorporation, hundred of WEST FLEGG, E. division of NORFOLK, $8\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Yarmouth; containing 588 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1266a. 2r., of which 450 acres are arable, and the rest pasture, sand-hills, &c.; it is situated on the sea-coast, and about 200 persons are employed in a fishery. A lighthouse has been erected on an eminence south-east of the village, an hexagonal tower seventy feet high, lighted with patent argand lamps and reflectors. The place had formerly a market and a fair, which have been long disused. The living is a rectory, with that of East Somerton annexed, valued in the king's books at £20. 13. 4.; net income, £478; patron, J. Hume, Esq. There is a parsonage-house, erected by the incumbent, the Rev. J. Nelson, and the glebe contains about 30 acres. The church is chiefly in the later style, with a tower 140 feet high, which serves as a landmark for mariners; the roof of the nave is supported by tiers of columns of chesnut wood, inserted in bases of brick; the entrance on the south is by a handsome porch. At the inclosure, 40 acres were allotted to the poor for fuel. Several large bones were found on the cliff in 1665, one of which, supposed to be that of a man's leg, was three feet two inches in length, and weighed 57lb. Winterton gives the title of Earl to the Turnour family.

WINTHORPE (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of SPILSBY, Marsh division of the wapentake of CANDLESHOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 11 miles (E. by N.) from Spilsby; containing 273 inhabitants. It is about a mile from the sea-coast, and comprises 2281a. 4p. The living is a discharged vicarage, united, in 1729, to that of Burgh-in-the-Marsh, and valued in the king's books at £8; the glebe contains 2 acres.

WINTHORPE (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union and N. division of the wapentake of NEWARK, S. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. N. E.) from Newark; containing 225 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 635 acres, the soil whereof is light and sandy. The village, which is picturesque and well built, is on a richly-wooded eminence on the banks of the Trent; and Winthorpe Hall, an elegant mansion, is surrounded by extensive grounds and beautiful plantations. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 11. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £170; patron, John Handley, Esq. The church, situated in the highest part of the village, was rebuilt of brick, with the exception of the south wall, in 1779. The Fosse-road passes through the parish.

WINTNEY, HARTLEY.—See HARTLEY-WINTNEY.

WINTON, a township, in the parish of KIRKBY-STEPHEN, EAST ward and union, county of WESTMORLAND, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (N. N. E.) from Kirkby-Stephen; containing 358 inhabitants. The township comprises 3383 acres, of which 1800 are common or waste: the village is large, and the houses are well built and of handsome appearance. A free school, erected by subscription, in 1659, is endowed with £14. 8. a year. John Langhorne, D.D., translator of Plutarch, and author of Fables of Flora and other works; his brother William, who assisted in the translation; and Richard Burn, LL.D., the eminent law-writer and historian, were natives of this place, and received the rudiments of their education at the school.

WINTON, a township, in the parish of KIRBY-SIGSTON, union of NORTH-ALLERTON, wapentake of ALLERTONSHIRE, N. riding of YORK, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from North-Allerton; containing 112 inhabitants. It comprises about 1340 acres, and includes the hamlets of Hallikeld and Stank, which are the property of the Earl of Harewood: a branch of his lordship's family was formerly seated at Stank Hall, now a farmhouse. The village is on the road from North-Allerton to Stokesley.

WINTRINGHAM (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union of MALTON, wapentake of BUCKROSE, E. riding of YORK, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Malton; containing, with the chapelry of Knapton, 603 inhabitants, of whom 339 are in the township of Wintringham. This parish is situated on the river Derwent, and comprises 8480 acres, of which 5740 are in the township of Wintringham, and, with the exception of the large farm of Linton, exclusively the property of Sir George Strickland, Bart., who is lord of the manor. The greater portion is arable, and the remainder principally sheep-walks, with plantations chiefly of ash and fir trees; the soil near the river is clay, alternated with sand, but towards the south the land rises into wolds of fertile and chalky soil. The surface is diversified with numerous small streams, and the village is situated at the foot of the wolds, on the road from Scarborough to York, consisting mostly of one long street of ancient houses, built of stone and covered with thatch. The living is a donative, in the patronage of Sir George Strickland: the church is in the early English style, with a square embattled tower surmounted by a tall and graceful spire. At Knapton is a chapel of ease. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; and a school is supported in the village. The farm of Linton, the property of Sir Tatton Sykes, was anciently the site of a monastic cell subordinate to the abbey of Scarborough.

WINWICK (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of OUNDLE, partly in the hundred of LEIGHTONSTONE, county of HUNTINGDON, and partly in that of POLEBROOK, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 7 miles (S. E.) from Oundle; containing 373 inhabitants, of whom 207 are in the Huntingdon portion. This parish is situated about 4 miles from the road between Oundle and Huntingdon, and comprises 1800 acres by computation, of which 400 are pasture, 5 acres wood, and the rest arable: the Northamptonshire portion consists of 959 acres. The soil is clayey. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 16. 10.; net income, £66; patron and proprietor, Lord Montagu. The church contains about 300 sittings, of which half are free. Sarah Ruff, in 1721, bequeathed an estate, the rent of which, amounting to £20 per annum, is distributed among the poor.

WINWICK (St. OSWALD), a parish, in the union of WARRINGTON, hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER; comprising the borough of Newton-in-Mackerfield, the chapelry of Lowton, and the townships of Ashton-in-Mackerfield, Culcheth, Golborne, Haydock, Houghton with Middleton and Arbury, Kenyon, and Southworth with Croft; and containing 18,148 inhabitants, of whom 545 are in the township of Winwick with Hulme, 3 miles (N.) from Warrington. Between the village of Winwick and the town of Newton is an elevated piece of ground called Redbank, from its having been, in 1648, the scene of an obstinately-contested battle between Oliver Cromwell and the Scots, when the latter were defeated with terrible slaughter. Considerable manufactures of cotton, fustian, locks, hinges, and various other articles, are carried on. Southworth Hall, in the parish, once belonged to the Roman Catholic college of Stonyhurst, and part of it is still used as a chapel by professors of that religion. At Parkside, also in the parish, the North-Union railway joins the Liverpool and Manchester railway; and on the south side of the latter is a station, likewise used by the Grand Junction company, whose line branches from the Liverpool and Manchester. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £102. 9. 9½.; patron, the Earl of Derby; net income, £3616. The church is an ancient edifice with a lofty spire, said to be coeval with the establishment of the Christian religion in the country. A church was consecrated at Croft, on the 14th of November, 1833. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also a free grammar school founded in 1618, by Gualter Legh, Esq., who endowed it with an annuity of £10, which by benefactions has been augmented to £34: the schoolroom was built by Sir Peter Legh. In observance of a custom for some time established, the rector pays the rental of their cottages for six industrious tenants.

WINWICK (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of DAVENTRY, hundred of GUILDSBOROUGH, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 8¾ miles (N. N. E.) from Daventry; containing 165 inhabitants. The parish is intersected by the Grand Union canal, and comprises 2011 acres by measurement, about 300 of which are arable, and the rest pasture; the soil is clay and sand, the former greatly predominating. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Lincoln: the tithes have been commuted for £475; the glebe contains 100 acres. The church is in the early English style, with the exception of the tower, and contains about 100 sittings. There are the remains of an old mansion, which have been converted into a farm-house; the gateway is a curious antique structure.

WIRKSWORTH (St. MARY), a market-town and parish, in the union of BELPER, chiefly in the hundred of WIRKSWORTH, but partly in that of APPLETREE, S. division, and partly in that of HIGH PEAK, N. division, of the county of DERBY; containing 7891 inhabitants, of whom 4122 are in the town, 13 miles (N. N. W.) from Derby, and 139 (N. W. by N.) from London. This place, formerly written Wircesworth, Werchestworde, Wyrksworth, is of very great antiquity, and is supposed to derive its name from valuable lead-works in the neighbourhood, which, by an inscription on a pig of lead found in 1777, appear to have been worked so early as the time of the Emperor Adrian, at the commencement of the 2nd century; and the Saxons subsequently carried on mining operations here on an extensive scale. In 1714, Eadburga, abbess of Repton, to which abbey Wirksworth then belonged, sent hence to Guthlac, patron saint of Croyland abbey, a leaden coffin; and in 835, Kenwara, another abbess of Repton, granted her estate at Wercesworde to Humbert, on condition that he gave annually lead worth £15 to Archbishop Ceolnoth, for the use of Christ-Church at Canterbury. In Domesday book Wirksworth is described as the property of the crown, having a church, a priest, and three lead-mines; and it remained so until King John, in the fifth year of his reign, granted it to William de Ferrers, in whose family it continued until the attainer of his descendant, Robert, in the time of Henry III., by which monarch it was, in 1265, given to his son, Edmund, Earl of Lancaster, and the manor has since that period constituted a part of the possessions of the duchy of Lancaster.

The town is situated in a valley nearly surrounded with hills, at the southern extremity of the mining district, and is supplied with water brought by pipes from the hills on its eastern side. The chief employment of the inhabitants arises from the lead-mines, but some of them are also engaged in the cotton manufacture; and there are, in the town and its immediate neighbourhood, three establishments in which common hinghams are made, and others for the productions of hosiery, hats, tape, silk, and for wool-combing. The Cromford canal, and the Cromford and High Peak railway, commence in the parish; the former about a mile and a half north of the town, near where it crosses the river Derwent, by means of an aqueduct; and the latter about half a mile north. The mines and miners of the neighbourhood are governed by ancient customs, confirmed by a commission of inquiry in 1287; and all disputes and offences are determined at the Barmote courts, held twice a year before the steward, in the moot-hall, a handsome stone building, erected in 1814, by the Hon. Charles Bathurst, then chancellor of the duchy. In this hall is deposited the ancient brass dish, the standard from which those used for measuring the ore are made, which must be brought to be corrected by it, at least twice a year, by all the miners. The code of laws and regulations by which these courts are governed is very similar to that in force in the mining districts of the duchy of Cornwall: one remarkable custom is, that each person has the privilege of digging and searching for lead-ore in any part of the king's field, which, with a few exceptions, comprehends the whole wapentake; and should he discover a vein of lead, he has a right to work it, and erect buildings necessary for that purpose, without making any compensation to the owner of the land. A market on Wednesday, and an annual fair for three days, were granted by Edward I., in 1305, to Thomas, Earl of Lancaster: Tuesday is now the market-day, for provisions generally; and there are fairs on Shrove-Tuesday, Easter-Tuesday, May 12th, July 8th, Sept. 8th, and the third Tuesday in November, for cattle, the last being also a statuté-fair. The town is governed by a constable and headborough; and a petty-session is held by the county magistrates, on Tuesday in each week. There is a court of requests, established under an act in 1839. Two courts baron, at Easter and Michaelmas, and a court leet at Easter, occur for the king's manor, under the lessee of the crown; and a court is held for the rectorial manor, under the Dean of Lincoln, as appropriator. There is also a manor within the parish, which has no courts, called the Holland, or Richmond, manor, granted in 1553, by the crown, to Ralph Gell, Esq.

The parish comprises 14,022*a. 3r. 20p.*, and includes the chapelries of Alderwasley and Cromford; the townships of Ashley-Hay, Biggin, Hopton, Ible, and Idridge-hay with Allton; and the hamlets of Callow, Ivonbrook-Grange, and Middleton. The LIVING is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £42. 7. 8½.; net income, £164; patron and appropriator, the Dean of Lincoln. The church is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a square tower supported in the centre by four large pillars, and contains some ancient monuments. At Cromford, Alderwasley, and Middleton, are chapels, the two former of which have been built and endowed by individuals, and the latter by subscription. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyans. The free grammar school, adjoining the churchyard, was established and endowed by Anthony Gell, Esq., of Hopton, in 1576, and has been rebuilt in the English style, at an expense of about £2000; the income is upwards of £250 per annum. The school, in common with those of Ashbourn and Chesterfield, is entitled, next after the founder's relatives, to two fellowships and two scholarships at St. John's College, Cambridge, founded by the Rev. James Beresford, vicar of this parish, who died in 1520. Almshouses for six men, near the school, were also founded and endowed by Anthony Gell; Elizabeth Bagshaw, in 1797, left £2000 three per cent. consols., for the poor, the dividends of which amount to £56 per annum; and there are many other small donations and bequests, producing together a considerable sum. In 1736, a quantity of Roman coins was discovered; and spars, fluors, &c., have been found in great variety in the neighbourhood. There were also some mineral springs, but they have been destroyed by draining the mines.

WIRSWALL, a township, in the parish of WHITCHURCH, union and hundred of NANTWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 5½ miles (E. S. E.) from Malpas; containing 91 inhabitants. The Chester canal passes along its western boundary. A rent-charge of £70 has been awarded, as a commutation for the tithes.

WISBECH (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of WISBECH, ISLE of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, 3 miles (N. W.) from Wisbech St. Peter; containing, with the chapelry of Guyhirn, 1931 inhabitants. The parish comprises 9483*a. 1r. 5p.* of arable and pasture land in nearly equal portions; 186 acres are common or waste. The living is annexed to the vicarage of St. Peter. The church is principally in the later English style, with a large square tower. At Guyhirn is a neat chapel, built in 1666, of which the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar. A school is endowed with 21 acres of land.

WISBECH (ST. PETER AND ST. PAUL), a sea-port, borough, market-town, and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of WISBECH, ISLE of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, 43 miles (N.) from Cambridge, and 94 (N. by E.) from London; containing 8530 inhabitants. This place is of great antiquity, and is noticed in a charter by which, in 664, Wulfhere, son of Peada, King of the Mercians granted to the abbey of Medehamstead, now Peterborough, "the lands from Ragwell, 5 miles to the main river that goeth to Elm and to Wisbece." In the Norman survey it is mentioned under the same appellation, which it retained till the reign of Edward I., from which period till the time of Henry VI. it was invariably written "Wysebeche." The name is supposed to be derived from the river Ouse, then called the Wise, and from the Saxon "bec," signifying either a running stream or a tongue of land at the confluence of two rivers, which, previously to the diversion of their streams, was descriptive of its situation at the confluence of the Ouse with the river Nene. From the date of Wulfhere's charter, little is recorded of the history of this place till the year 1000, when the manor is said to have been given to the abbot and convent of Ely, by Oswi, and Leofede, daughter of Brithnod, the first abbot, on the admission into that monastery of their son Ailwin, afterwards bishop of Elmham. William the Conqueror, in the last year of his reign, erected a strong castle here, which he placed under the command of a governor, styled a constable, with a strong garrison, to keep the refractory barons in submission, and to check the ravages of the outlaws, who made frequent incursions from the neighbouring fens into the upland parts of the county. In 1190, Richard I. granted to the tenants of Wisbech Barton Manor exemption from toll in all towns or markets throughout England, which privilege was confirmed by King John, who, in 1216, visited the town, and is supposed to have taken up his residence in the castle, on leaving which that monarch attempting to cross the wash at an improper time, lost all his carriages, treasure, and regalia. The greater part of the town, together with the castle, was destroyed in 1236, by an inundation of the sea, but was soon afterwards restored; and the castle subsequently falling into dilapidation, Bishop Morton, towards the close of the 15th century, erected on its site another of brick, which became an episcopal palace of the bishops of Ely. In the reign of Elizabeth, the castle was appropriated to the confinement of state prisoners, and during the protectorate of Cromwell it was purchased by Thurloe, afterwards his secretary, who made it his occasional residence. Upon the restoration, it again reverted to the bishops of Ely; but it was sold in 1793, and all remains of it have disappeared in the recent improvements of the town, which is at present the most flourishing place in the Isle of Ely.

The town is situated on both sides of the river now called the Nene, over which is a handsome stone bridge of one elliptical arch, 72 feet in the span; the streets are regularly formed, the houses in general well built, and on the site of the ancient castle, which was purchased by an architect and taken down in 1816, a crescent of more than 50 houses has been erected; the town is paved, and lighted with gas. From the late improvement in the system of draining, a great portion of previously unproductive land in the vicinity has been brought into a high state of cultivation, and on every side are seen fertile corn-fields and luxuriant pastures. A permanent literary society was established in 1781, who have a library containing more than 3000 volumes; and there is also a theological library, in which are many valuable works of the most eminent of the old divines. Here are a reading-room, and a neat theatre; assemblies are held in rooms appropriately fitted up, and a commodious building has been erected, in which are hot, cold, and sea-water baths, furnished with dressing-rooms and every requisite appendage. About a century since, the principal articles of TRADE were, oil, for the preparation of which there were seven mills in the town; and butter, of which not less than 8000 firkins were sent annually to London. The importance of the place as a sea-port has much increased of late years, and the trade has been greatly augmented; the main exports are corn, rape-seed, long wool (of which great quantities are sent to the clothing districts in Yorkshire), and timber, which is brought hither from the county of Northampton; and it is now one of the principal places of export for wheat in the kingdom: the chief imports are wine, deals, and coal. The navigation of the river above the town was, many years since, greatly improved by a straight cut from Peterborough, forming a communication with the upland country, and supplying Peterborough, Oundle, and Northampton with various commodities; and below the town, very extensive works have been executed by the commissioners of the Nene-Out-fall, which have greatly benefited the drainage of large tracts of land in the neighbourhood, and made the navigation to the sea perfect: vessels of large burthen now approach the town, and load and unload at the quay and granaries. In 1839, the tonnage duties were paid on 97,119 tons; the number of vessels of above 50 tons registered at the port is 56, and their aggregate burthen 5200 tons. In 1794, a canal was cut from the river at Wisbech to the Old Nene at Outwell, and thence to the Ouse at Salter's-Lode Sluice, opening a way to Norfolk, Suffolk, and the eastern counties. A packet arrives from Peterborough every Tuesday and Friday, and departs every Wednesday and Sunday morning. The market is on Saturday; and there are fairs on the Saturday before Palm-Sunday, and the Saturday before Lady-day, for hemp and flax; also a considerable horse-fair on the Thursday before Whit-Sunday, numerously attended by the London dealers; and a large cattle-fair on August 12th, at which 3000 head of cattle have been brought for sale. The market and fairs are held by the corporation on lease from the Bishop of Ely, who is lord of the manor. The market-place is a spacious open area.

The guild of the Holy Trinity, established in 1379, being found at the time of the Dissolution to have supported a grammar school and maintained certain piers, jetties, and banks, "against the rage of the sea," was in 1549 restored by Edward VI., who also gave the inhabitants a charter of incorporation, which was renewed by James I. in 1611, and confirmed by Charles II. in 1669. The corporation, however, at present consists of a mayor, 6 aldermen, and 18 councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76; the borough is divided into two wards; the mayor and late mayor are justices of the peace, and the number of other magistrates is 3. The quarter-sessions for the Isle of Ely take place here and at Ely alternately; petty-sessions for the division are held here, and there is a court of requests for debts under 40s. The town-hall is embellished with the town arms, a painting of Edward VI., and portraits of Dr. Jobson, the late vicar, who was a considerable benefactor to the town, and Thomas Clarkson, the strenuous advocate of Negro Emancipation. The shire-hall is annexed to the gaol, which was rebuilt in 1807.

The parish comprises 5750*a.* 3*r.* 12*p.*, of which about 2887 acres are arable, and 2792 pasture. The LIVING is a vicarage, with Wisbech St. Mary annexed, valued in the king's books at £26. 13. 4.; patron, the Bishop of Ely; appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Ely. The great tithes of the two parishes have been commuted for £1840, and the vicarial for £2175; the appropriate glebe contains 15½ acres, and the vicar's 51½. The church is a spacious ancient structure, partly Norman, but chiefly in the decorated English style, with a lofty square embattled tower in the later style; it has two naves under one roof, divided in the centre by a beautiful range of light clustered pillars with pointed arches, and from their respective aisles by low massive pillars and circular Norman arches; the north aisle of the chancel is in the decorated style, and there is a fine window of the same character at the west end of the south aisle of the nave. A handsome chapel of ease, of octagonal form, was erected in 1828, on the opposite side of the river, in the old market, at an expense of £9364, raised by subscription among the inhabitants, to meet a liberal offer of Dr. Jobson, who conveyed in fee a real estate of more than £5000 in value, as an endowment for the minister, to whom the rents and profits are given in perpetuity: the chapel was open for divine service on January 13th, 1831, and contains about 1100 sittings, of which 300 are free; the preferment is in the gift of Trustees, and the net income is £200. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Johnsonians, Wesleyans, Presbyterians, and Unitarians. The free grammar school is of very ancient foundation, and the appointment of a master, in 1446, by the guild of the Holy Trinity, is still on record; its original endowment has been augmented by bequests from Thomas Parke and John Crane, Esqrs., for increasing the master's stipend, which, including perquisites, amounts to £200 per annum. Belonging to the school are four by-fellowships, of £10 per annum each, founded at Peter-House, Cambridge, by T. Parke, in 1628; and two scholarships for youths of Wisbech, originally of £8, which are now worth £70 per annum each: Archbishop Herring, the present Bishop of Kildare, and Thomas Clarkson, were educated at the school. There is a national school endowed with lands, the produce of which amounts to £55 per annum. A fund for lending money to tradesmen, free of interest, was bequeathed by John Crane, in 1652, which was increased by a gift of £300 from William Holmes; and there are several almshouses for the poor, and many valuable charities. The union of Wisbech comprises 22 parishes or places, of which 13 are in the county of Norfolk, and 9 in that of Cambridge, and contains a population of 31,484. There was anciently an hospital dedicated to St. John the Baptist, of which no traces are now discernible.

WISBOROUGH-GREEN (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of PETWORTH, partly in the hundreds of ROTHERBRIDGE and WEST EASWRITH, but chiefly in the hundred of BURY, rape of ARUNDEL, W. division of SUSSEX, 10 miles (W. by S.) from Horsham; containing 1807 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the north by the county of Surrey, and comprises 8276 acres by admeasurement, of which 1220 are pasture and meadow, 4423 arable, and the remainder wood and waste. There are several feeders to the river Arun, in the parish, which is also intersected by the Arun and Wey canal. The village is pleasantly situated on the road from Billinghamurst to Petworth; and fairs are held in it on the 16th of July and 20th of November, for horses, cattle, sheep, and pigs. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 18. 0½., and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Wisborough in the Cathedral of Chichester, whose tithes here have been commuted for £1171, and those of the vicar for £440; the former has 19½, and the latter 4, acres of glebe. The church is principally in the early English style, with a tower surmounted by a lofty shingled spire, which forms a conspicuous object for many miles round; it contains some monuments to the Napper and King families. At Loxwood-End, in the parish, is a chapel; and there is a place of worship for Independents. The workhouse has been appropriated for the children of the union.

WISBY, county of LINCOLN.—See WHISBY.

WISSETON, or WYESTON, a township, in the parish of CLAYWORTH, union of EAST RETFORD, North-Clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 5 miles (E. S. E.) from Bawtry; containing 133 inhabitants, and comprising about 930 acres. The tithes have been commuted for £242. 15., and there is a glebe of 12½ acres. The hamlet of Drakeholes, or Drakelow, partly in this township, and partly in the parish of Everton, is one of the depôts for the Chesterfield and Trent canal, which passes by through a tunnel 250 yards in length, in cutting which many coins of Constantine, and human bones were found. Wiseton Hall, a handsome mansion consisting of a centre and two wings, is pleasantly situated on an eminence, with a lawn of 30 acres in front, interspersed with beautiful clumps of trees, and commanding fine and extensive views of the surrounding country.

WISHAW (St. CHAD), a parish, in the union of ASTON, Birmingham division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, N. division of the county of WARWICK, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Sutton-Coldfield; containing 266 inhabitants. This parish, with the hamlet of Moxhul, comprises 1196 acres, the property of Mr. Noel, with the exception of a few small freeholds; the surface is well wooded, and partly undulated, the soil extremely fertile, and the scenery embraces pleasing views of the surrounding country. The London and Liverpool road, the Birmingham and Tamworth road, and the Birmingham and Derby railway, run through the parish; and the Birmingham and Fazeley canal also passes close to Wishaw. Moxhul Hall, built about the 14th century, is a substantial house standing in a park of 150 acres; it contains some ancient portraits of the Noel and Hacket families. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 5., and in the patronage of the Folliet and Jesson families; net income, £370. The church is an ancient structure in the early English style, with a square tower. Lady Hacket, in 1710, gave £100, directing the interest to be applied to teaching children; and a parochial and Sunday school is supported by Mr. Noel.

WISHFORD, GREAT (St. GILES), a parish, in the union of WILTON, hundred of BRANCH and DOLE, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTS, 6 miles (N. W.) from Salisbury; containing 358 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Salisbury to Bath, and comprises 1610*a.* 3*r.* 11*p.*, of which about 900 acres are arable, 649 pasture, and 61 woodland: the river Wily runs through the parish, the soil of which is in general chalky. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £17. 10. 7½., and in the gift of the Earl of Pembroke: the tithes have been commuted for £430; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 17½ acres. The church, which was repaired, and the gallery enlarged, in 1829, contains an ancient monument to Thomas Bonham, Esq., lord of the manor, who is represented in the habit of a pilgrim, lying at full length; also a beautiful monument to Sir Richard Grobham, dressed in armour. Sir Richard Howe, Bart., in 1728, established a free school, and endowed it with tithes which now produce £74 per annum. Sir R. Grobham, in 1628, founded an almshouse for four aged men, and endowed it with property now worth £78 a year; and a fund for apprenticing children, amounting to about £10. 10. per annum, was bequeathed by Daniel Oland, in 1735.

WISHFORD, LITTLE, a tything, in the parish of SOUTH NEWTON, union of WILTON, hundred of BRANCH and DOLE, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTS, 3 miles (N. N. W.) from Wilton.

WISLEY, a parish, in the union of GUILDFORD. Second division of the hundred of WOKING, W. division of SURREY, 2½ miles (N. by E.) from Ripley; containing 155 inhabitants, and comprising by computation 1050 acres. The living is a discharged rectory, with the vicarage of Pyrford annexed, valued in the king's books at £40. 19.; net income, £210; patron, the Earl of Onslow. The church is an ancient edifice in the early English style.

WISPINGTON (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of HORNCastle, S. division of the wapentake of GARTREE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 4 miles (W. N. W.) from Horncastle; containing 84 inhabitants, and comprising 1194 acres by computation. The living is a discharged vicarage; patron and impropriator, C. Turnor, Esq. The great tithes have been commuted for £70, and the vicarial for £140; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 70 acres in this parish, and 30 in Stickney.

WISSETT (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union and hundred of BLYTHING, E. division of SUFFOLK, 1½ mile (N. W.) from Halesworth; containing 470 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2240*a.* 1*r.* 14*p.*, of which 52 acres are common or waste. The living is a perpetual curacy; patron and impropriator, Sir E. C. Hartopp, Bart. The great tithes have been commuted for £452. 10., and those of the perpetual curate for £90. The church is chiefly in the later English style, with a circular tower, and the entrances on the north and south are through richly-decorated Norman doorways.

WISTANSTOW (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of CHURCH-STRETTON, partly in the hundred of PURSLOW, but chiefly in that of MUNSLOW, S. division of SALOP, $9\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Ludlow; containing, with the township of Cheney-Longville, 1051 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £18; net income, £764; patron, the Earl of Craven.

WISTASTON (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of NANTWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Nantwich; containing 355 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 0. 3., and in the gift of J. W. Hammond, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £200; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains $4\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church was rebuilt in 1826. About £15 per annum, the rent of an estate purchased with bequests by Ann Ball, in 1604, and others, is distributed among poor parishioners.

WISTERSTON, a chapelry, in the parish of MARDEN, hundred of BROXASH, union and county of HEREFORD, 7 miles (N. by E.) from Hereford; containing 28 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £48; patron, W. Vale, Esq.; improPRIATOR, James Beebee, Esq.

WISTON, or WISSINGTON (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of SUDBURY, hundred of BABERGH, W. division of SUFFOLK, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Colchester; containing 252 inhabitants. It comprises 1485a. 2r. 34p., and is bounded on the south by the river Stour. The living is a vicarage, endowed with the rectorial tithes, valued in the king's books at £4. 19. $4\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £442; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains $1\frac{1}{4}$ acre. The church has a rich and very curious Norman door, with a north entrance in the same style; the chancel is separated from the nave by an enriched arch.

WISTON (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of THAKEHAM, hundred of STEYNING, rape of BRAMBER, W. division of SUSSEX, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. N. W.) from Steyning; containing 341 inhabitants. The southern portion of the parish has a magnificent sweep of down land, which rises in one place to an elevation of 820 feet, commanding most extensive views; and its beautiful plantations render it conspicuous from distant parts, and confer upon it an interesting and picturesque appearance. Wiston House, a mansion in the Elizabethan style, erected by Sir Thomas Shirley about 1576, has lately been taken down, and rebuilt by the present proprietor, Charles Goring, Esq., with the exception of the ancient baronial hall, a noble apartment exhibiting a finely-grained timber roof. The park, the surface of which is undulated, contains some stately forest-trees, and is well stocked with deer. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 13. 4., and in the gift of Mr. Goring: the tithes have been commuted for £436, and a rent-charge of £64 is paid to Magdalen College, Oxford; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains $3\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church, situated in the park, is chiefly in the decorated style, and consists of a nave, chancel, and south aisle, at the east end of which is a sepulchral chapel; there are monuments to Sir William Shirley, Sir Thomas Shirley and his wife, and several of the Gorings.

WISTOW (ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of ST. IVES, hundred of HURSTINGSTONE, county of HUNTINGDON, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Ramsey; containing 490 inhabitants, and comprising 2332a. 3r. 7p. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 17. $8\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £354; patron, R. G. Woodruff, Esq. There is a glebe-house, and the glebe contains 38 acres.

WISTOW (ST. WINSTON), a parish, in the union of BILLEDON, hundred of GARTREE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Leicester; containing 296 inhabitants. On the night previous to the battle of Naseby, King Charles I. slept at Wistow Hall, in this parish, which is now the seat of Sir Henry Halford, son of the late Sir Henry Halford, Bart., G.C.B., the distinguished physician, who died in 1844. The house was considerably enlarged, and the grounds were laid out with much taste, by the late proprietor, at an expense of £20,000: in the library is a splendid clock, ornamented with a bust of George IV., studded with diamonds, and valued at 600 guineas, which, shortly after the decease of that monarch, was presented by six members of the Royal family to Sir Henry, as a tribute to his skill and assiduity as their physician. The church is $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile from the road between London and Leicester, by Welford, and about a mile from that through Market-Harborough; and the Leicester Union canal runs through the parish. There is only one house in Wistow, with the exception of the Hall, and two tenements belonging to servants of the establishment; but in the chapelry of Newton-Harcourt, situated in the parish, are numerous small dwellings, and about 40 or 50 stocking-frames are at work. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 18. 4.; net income, £92; patron and improPRIATOR, Sir Henry Halford. The tithes were commuted for land in 1771. The church was repaired and beautified by the late baronet, who erected a burial-place adjoining, in which are interred the remains of the late Lady Halford, Mr. Justice Vaughan, and other relatives. There is a chapel of ease at Newton-Harcourt.

WISTOW (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of SELBY, Lower division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, W. riding of YORK, 3 miles (N. W. by N.) from Selby; containing 756 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2900 acres, the surface of which is flat, and the soil loam: the river Ouse passes within half a mile. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the patronage of the Prebendary of Wistow in the Cathedral of York (the appropriator), valued in the king's books at £8; net income, £221: the tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1776. The church is an ancient structure, with a tower. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists. A school is endowed with £5 per annum; and here is a charity for apprenticing boys, the annual value of which is £24, founded by Archbishop Montaigne.

WISWELL, a township, in the parish of WHALLEY, union of CLITHEROE, Higher division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 3 miles (S. by E.) from Clitheroe; containing 775 inhabitants. The extension of the manufacture in spinning cotton-thread, and the weaving and printing of calico, have caused a considerable increase in the population of the township within the last few years.

WITCHAM (St. MARTIN), a parish, in the hundred of SOUTH WITCHFORD, union and ISLE of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Ely, on the road to Chatteris; containing 502 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 11. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £100; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Ely. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WITCHAMPTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of WIMBORNE and CRANBORNE, hundred of CRANBORNE, Wimborne division of DORSET, 5 miles (N. by W.) from Wimborne; containing 461 inhabitants. The parish is situated a little on the west of the road from Wimborne to Cranborne, and comprises by admeasurement 1462 acres, chiefly arable, the surface of which is undulated, and the soil in some parts a gravelly loam, and in others a black earth, resting principally on chalk and flint. The grounds are intersected by the rapid river Allen, which turns a paper-mill giving employment to about 27 persons. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 12. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of H. C. Sturt, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £269. 10.; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 20 acres. The church is a large handsome edifice in the later English style, with a square tower, which is the only remaining part of the ancient fabric erected in the 14th century. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Remains exist of an old monastery once subordinate to the abbots of Crawford, and now converted into a barn.

WITCHFORD (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the hundred of SOUTH WITCHFORD, union and ISLE of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Ely; containing 561 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Ely (the appropriators), valued in the king's books at £9. 18. 9.: the great tithes have been commuted for £421. 13., and the vicarial for £134; the appropriate and vicarial glebes contain respectively 21 and 22 acres.

WITCHINGHAM, GREAT (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of St. FAITH, hundred of EYNSFORD, E. division of NORFOLK, 2 miles (S.) from Reepham; containing 624 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2153*a.* 3*r.* 7*p.*, of which 1577 acres are arable, 448 meadow and pasture, and 63 woodland; the surface is undulated, and the views from the higher grounds are interesting. The Hall is a handsome mansion of brick, in the Elizabethan style; and there are some remains of the old hall, built by John Norris, Esq., founder of the Norrisian professorship of Cambridge. The hamlet of Lenwade is on the road from Norwich to Fakenham, and near the river Wensum, on which is an extensive flour-mill. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the rectory of Little Witchingham annexed, valued in the king's books at £4. 17. 11.; patrons and impropiators, the Warden and Fellows of New College, Oxford. The great tithes have been commuted for £488. 12., and the vicarial for £250; the glebe comprises 34 acres, with a good house, lately rebuilt by the Rev. William Howard. The church is a handsome structure, chiefly in the later English style, with a lofty square embattled tower. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. John Britton, Bishop of Hereford, who died in 1275, and Sir William Wychingham, judge of the common pleas in 1363, were natives of the parish.

WITCHINGHAM, LITTLE (St. FAITH), a parish, in the union of St. FAITH, hundred of EYNSFORD, E. division of NORFOLK, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Reepham; containing 45 inhabitants. It is situated on a surface of high table land, and comprises about 730 acres, of which 80 are pasture, and the remainder arable: the road from Norwich to Reepham runs through. The living is a rectory, annexed to the vicarage of Great Witchingham, and valued in the king's books at £5: the glebe contains $7\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church is chiefly in the early style, with a square tower.

WITCHLING (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of HOLLINGBOURN, hundred of EYHORNE, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Lenham; containing 124 inhabitants, and comprising 1318*a.* 2*r.* 20*p.* The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 1. 8.; net income, £158; patron, the Rev. Edwin Bosanquet.

WITCOMB MAGNA (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of CHELTENHAM, Upper division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S-BARTON, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Painswick; containing 179 inhabitants. The parish is situated among the Cotswold hills, and contains 918 acres. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 6. 8., and in the gift of Sir W. Hicks, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £132, and the glebe comprises one acre. Near the foot of Cooper's Hill, on a delightful spot in the parish, the remains of a Roman villa, with a sacarium, baths, &c., were discovered in 1818, the walls of which, to the height of nearly six feet, are remaining, some of them covered with stucco painted in panels of different colours, elegantly ornamented with ivy leaves. Several of the apartments were paved with red sandstone, others with beautiful mosaic work, and in many of them have been found fragments of columns, and cornices of white marble, numerous coins, domestic utensils, and other relics.

WITCOMBE, a hamlet, in the parish of MARTOCK, union of YEOVIL, hundred of MARTOCK, W. division of SOMERSET: containing 59 inhabitants.

WITCOMBE, LITTLE, a hamlet, in the parish of BADGEWORTH, union of CHELTENHAM, Upper division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S-BARTON, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER; containing 210 inhabitants.

WITHAM (St. NICHOLAS), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of WITHAM, N. division of ESSEX, 8 miles (N. E. by E.) from Chelmsford, and 37 (N. E. by E.) from London; containing 3158 inhabitants. The original erection of the town, or at least that part of it which is situated on Cheping Hill, is attributed to Edward the Elder, about the commencement of his reign; and the place was subsequently in the possession of the Knights Templars, who had a preceptory at Cressing, three miles distant. Some consider this to have been the Roman station Canonium of Antoninus, which opinion receives confirmation from the quantity of Roman bricks in the walls of the church, and from coins of different emperors that have been discovered in levelling the fortifications. There are remains of a circular camp, defended by a double vallum, yet visible in the vicinity of the town. A mansion here, formerly the property of the Earl of Abercorn, has been repeatedly honoured by the presence of royalty; George II. rested at it in his progress to and from his Hanoverian dominions, and Queen Charlotte, consort of George III., was received here on her first arrival in England. The town, which is pleasantly situated near the confluence of a small stream called the Braine, with the river Blackwater, on the main road from London to Colchester, is of respectable appearance, and consists principally of one long street, lighted with gas, paved, and amply supplied with water from wells. The market, granted by Richard I., and kept originally at Cheping Hill, from which it was removed by Richard II., is on Tuesday; and fairs take place on the Monday before Whit-Sunday, June 4th, and September 14th. The county magistrates hold petty-sessions for the division every Tuesday; and manorial courts occur as occasion requires, at which constables and other officers are appointed.

The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £22. 0. 7½., and in the gift of the appropriator, the Bishop of London: the great tithes have been commuted for £820, and the vicarial for £285, and a rent-charge of £75 is paid to an impropiator; there is a handsome parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 102¼ acres. The church, situated at Cheping Hill, about half a mile north of the town, is a spacious and handsome edifice with a tower of brick, in the later English style, and contains many ancient monuments, and a large tomb erected in the reign of Elizabeth, to the memory of Judge Southcote and his lady, by whose effigies it is surmounted. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, and Roman Catholics; also a national school supported partly by the rent of a house conditionally bequeathed in 1630, by Dame Catherine Barnardiston. Two almshouses on Cheping Hill, for four widows, were endowed by Thomas Green, Esq., in 1491, with a farm in Springfield, let for £80 a year; and an almshouse for two widows was founded in the reign of Charles I., by means of a bequest from George Armond, Esq. Others established by Matthew Harvey, Esq., are occupied by nine persons; and there are five, for ten widows, endowed in 1687, with a farm at Goldhanger, and another at Fairstead, and having an income of £165 per annum. Dr. Warley, amongst other benefactions, in 1719, left £100 in aid of a school; and C. Barnardiston bequeathed a similar amount to be distributed in bread and fuel. The poor law union of Witham comprises 17 parishes or places, and contains a population of 15,407. There is a mineral spring in the neighbourhood, which was formerly in great repute.

WITHAM-FRIARY (St. Mary), a parish, and formerly an extra-episcopal liberty, in the union and hundred of FROME, E. division of SOMERSET, 5½ miles (S. S.W.) from Frome; containing, exclusively of Charterhouse-on-Mendip, which is in the hundred of Wintersoke, 581 inhabitants. Here was anciently a nunnery; and subsequently, in 1181, a monastery, said to be the first establishment of Carthusians in England, was founded by Henry II., in honour of the Blessed Virgin, St. John the Baptist, and All Saints, and at the Dissolution had a revenue of £227. 1. 8.; the ruins were taken down in 1764, and a farm-house now stands upon the site. About 4000 acres were originally possessed by the Wyndham family, and a splendid residence was built here by the Earl of Egremont, who died in 1763; but the manor is now the property of the Duke of Somerset. The parish is intersected by the river Frome, and comprises 5414 acres, of which 878 are arable, 3441 pasture, and upwards of 1000 woodland and plantations. The subsoil is in general a blue or whitish clay, under which are veins of soft limestone, which is burnt into lime; and in some places are found layers of hard stone, with shells imbedded in it, which is well adapted for building. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £106; patron, the Duke of Somerset. The church, supposed to have been either the chapel or a portion of the ancient friary, has an arched groined roof, with a semicircular chancel, and being in a very dilapidated state, was thoroughly repaired and enlarged in 1828, when a new tower was built. A neat parsonage-house was erected in 1830, near the village, and a capacious schoolroom has been built by the Duke of Somerset.

WITHAM, NORTH (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of GRANTHAM, wapentake of BELTISLOE, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, 1½ mile (S. by W.) from Colsterworth; containing 300 inhabitants, of whom 246 are in the township of North Witham. The parish comprises 2000 acres, of which 1400 are in the hamlet of Lobthorpe; the river Witham runs through the lordship; the surface is rather hilly, and the soil in general rests on clay. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 19. 2.; net income, £300; patron, Viscount Downe: there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains about 100 acres. The sum of £55, arising from bequests, is annually distributed among the poor.

WITHAM-ON-THE-HILL (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of BOURNE, wapentake of BELTISLOE, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, 4¼ miles (S.W.) from Bourne; containing, with the hamlets of Lound, Manthorpe, and Toft, 573 inhabitants, of whom 235 are in Witham township. The parish comprises 4365 acres, of which about 300 are woodland, and of the remainder three-fourths are arable, and one-fourth pasture; the soil is exceedingly various, and embraces sand and clay, with numerous admixtures and modifications; the substratum is oolite, under which in some parts is freestone, but at too great a depth for use. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 1. 0½.; net income, £107; patron and impropiator, General Johnson. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1813. The church is a handsome cruciform structure, with north and south aisles, and a modern tower at the end of the south transept; the south aisle is in the later Norman style; the north aisle is early English, and at the west end of the edifice is a window in the later English style. The Wesleyans have a place of worship. The charitable bequests of the parish amount to more than £300 per annum.

WITHAM, SOUTH (St. John the Baptist), a parish, in the union of GRANTHAM, wapentake of BELTISLOE, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, 3¼ miles (S. by W.) from Colsterworth; containing 506 inhabitants. It comprises about 1600 acres, the surface of which is hilly, and the soil clay; the river Witham has its source here. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £3. 12. 11.; net income, £120; patron, Lord Huntingtower. The glebe contains about 150 acres. A preceptory of Knights Templars existed here so early as 1164, and afterwards came into the hands of the Hospitallers.

WITHCALL (St. MARTIN), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, Wold division of the hundred of LOUTH-ESKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Louth; containing 90 inhabitants. It comprises about 2650 acres of land, the greater part of which is arable, in a high state of cultivation; the soil is light loam, resting on limestone. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 16. 10., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £516. The church contains accommodation for about 40 persons.

WITHCOTE, a parish, in the union of BILLEDSON, forming, with the parishes of Cold-Overton and Somerby, a detached portion of the hundred of FRAMLAND, locally in that of EAST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, 5 miles (W. S. W.) from Oakham; containing 30 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises 734 acres by admeasurement, is situated on low ground, and surrounded by small irregular hills, covered with a smooth verdant surface. The Hall has been thoroughly repaired by the Rev. Henry Palmer, and enlarged with an additional wing: the stone employed, of which the grand staircase is entirely made, is a grey limestone, found in the parish, beneath a stratum of brown stone, at a small distance from the surface. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 9. 4½.; net income, £133; patron, the Rev. H. Palmer. The church is a small handsome structure in the English style, with an embattled roof, ornamented with a pinnacle at each angle, and a turret for a bell on the west; on the sides of the altar are marble monuments to the Johnson and Palmer families, and Sir Geoffrey Palmer, Bart., attorney-general to Charles II., lies buried in the church. On the south-western extremity of the parish may be traced the foundations and embankments of Solay or Sawley Castle, a place of great importance when destroyed in the baronial wars, and supposed to have been built by the Basset family.

WITHERIDGE (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of SOUTH MOLTON, hundred of WITHERIDGE, South Molton and N. divisions of DEVON, $8\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Chulmleigh; containing 1399 inhabitants. This is a decayed borough and market-town. A fair for cattle is held on June 24th; and there are still great markets on the Wednesday after Sept. 21st, and the first Wednesday in November. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £23. 10. 5.; patron, incumbent, and improprator, the Rev. W. P. Thomas. The impropriate and vicarial tithes have each been commuted for £350; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 100 acres. The church has a stone pulpit highly enriched. Richard Melhuish, Esq., in 1799, gave £500 stock, the dividends arising from which are applied to instruction. William Chapple, the antiquary, who died in 1755, was born here.

WITHERINGTON, a tything, in the parish of DOWNTON, union of ALDERBURY, hundred of DOWNTON, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTS; containing 14 inhabitants.

WITHERLEY (St. PETER), a parish, in the hundred of SPARKENHOE, S. division of the county of LEICESTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (E. by S.) from Atherstone; containing, with the hamlet of Atterton, 509 inhabitants, of whom 425 are in Witherley township. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 2. 3½.; net income, £500; patron and incumbent, the Rev. J. Roberts. The church has one of the finest spires in the county, 156 feet high. The old Watling-street, which here separates Leicestershire from Warwickshire, crosses the river Anker at Witherley bridge; and in the parish is Mancetter, the site of the great Roman station Man-duessedum.

WITHERN (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, Wold division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 5 miles (N. N. W.) from Alford; containing, with the hamlet of Stain, 435 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the road from Louth to Alford, and comprises 2415a. 1r. 13p., was formerly a seat of the Fitzwilliams, and a large moated area is still pointed out as the spot on which their mansion stood. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £18. 10. 2½., and in the gift of Robert Vyner, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £484, and the glebe contains 48 acres. The church is a brick edifice, erected about the year 1813, on the site of the old structure, at a cost of £1400. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. George Stovin, in 1726, bequeathed £100, the interest of which, with £6. 6. per annum derived from land, is applied to teaching and partly clothing children, who assemble in a school-house built about 40 years since by the late Robert Vyner, Esq.

WITHERNSEA, a chapelry, in the parish of HOLLYM, union of PATRINGTON, S. division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, E. riding of YORK, 19 miles (E. by S.) from Hull; containing 126 inhabitants. It comprises about 950 acres of land, upon which the sea encroaches nearly two yards every year, and is the property of Sir T. A. C. Constable, Bart., who is lord of the manor: the village is long and straggling, and is situated near the sea cliff, about five miles north-east of Patrington. The tithes were commuted for land and annual money payments in 1793. The chapel, dedicated to St. Nicholas, and now in ruins, was apparently the remains of a magnificent building, probably the church of a priory which existed here in the reign of John, a cell to the abbey of Albemarle, in France.

WITHERNWICK (St. ALBAN), a parish, in the union of SKIRLAUGH, N. division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, E. riding of YORK, 11 miles (N. E. by N.) from Hull; containing 456 inhabitants. This place, sometimes written Whit-thorn-wick, is mentioned in the Domesday survey; and in the year 1115, the church and tithes of the village were given by Stephen, Earl of Albemarle, to the abbey of St. Martin, Albemarle. It comprises 2601 acres, of which 1720 are arable, 850 pasture, and 31 woodland: the village, situated on an eminence, is large and well built. The living is a discharged rectory, in the patronage of the Prebendary of Holme in the Cathedral of York, valued in the king's books at £6. 7. 1.: the tithes of the township were commuted for land and annual money payments in 1802. The church, a small edifice, consists of a nave, south aisle, and chancel, with a square tower of indifferent character; it presents several indications of ancient workmanship, but has been much mutilated by repairs, and the chancel is the only portion of the building that has escaped injudicious alteration. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WITHERSDALE (St. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish, in the union and hundred of HOXNE, E. division of SUFFOLK, 4 miles (S. E. by E.) from Harleston; containing 184 inhabitants, and comprising by computation 750 acres. The living is a discharged rectory, annexed to the vicarage of Fressingfield, and valued in the king's books at £6. 16. 8.: the tithes have been commuted for £221. 10., and the glebe contains 28 acres. The church is a small edifice, without either tower or spire.

WITHERSFIELD (St. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of RISBRIDGE, W. division of SUFFOLK, 2 miles (N. W. by N.) from Haverhill; containing 640 inhabitants. It comprises 2514 acres by admeasurement, and is situated at the south-western corner of the county, on the road from Haverhill to Linton. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 17. 1.; net income, £465; patron, G. T. W. H. Duffield, Esq.

WITHERSLACK, a chapelry, in the parish of BETHAM, union and ward of KENDAL, county of WEST-MORLAND, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Milnthorpe; containing 489 inhabitants. A fishery in the river Belo, which passes through the chapelry, belongs to the Earl of Derby, who holds his manorial court at the Derby Arms, on the second Tuesday after Trinity: the ancient Hall has been converted into a farm-house. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £93; patrons, the Trustees of Barwick's charity. The chapel, dedicated to St. Paul, was built and endowed in 1664, by Dr. John Barwick, a native of this place, and Dean of St. Paul's, London, who bequeathed the impropriate rectory of Lazonby, to which his brother, Peter Barwick, Esq., M.D., added an estate near Kirk-Oswald, to provide an annuity of £26 to the curate for teaching 40 children, one of £4 for repairing the chapel, and another of £10 for placing out apprentices and as a marriage portion to maidens. These allowances have been considerably augmented by the increased value of the lands, which now let for about £400 a year; and the treasurers were enabled, in 1824, to erect a girls' school. About a mile from the chapel, a chalybeate spring was discovered, and named Holy Well, in 1656; but it has since disappeared.

WITHERSTONE, a parish, in the union of BEAMINSTER, hundred of EGGERTON, Bridport division of DORSET, 5 miles (E. N. E.) from Bridport; containing 41 inhabitants. This ancient parish, now almost depopulated, pays rates to Poorstock, the church having been suffered to go into decay soon after the Reformation. The living is a sinecure rectory, valued in the king's books at £2. 13. 4., and in the gift of the Earl of Dorchester: the tithes have been commuted for £100. 9.

WITHIEL (St. UVELL), a parish, in the union of BODMIN, E. division of the hundred of PYDER and of the county of CORNWALL, 5 miles (W. by S.) from Bodmin; containing 468 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2740 acres, of which 370 are common or waste; it formerly belonged to the priory at Bodmin, of which establishment was Prior Vyvyan, who founded the church of Withiel. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10, and in the gift of Sir R. R. Vyvyan, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £320, and the glebe comprises 60 acres. The church, which contains an ancient font enriched with sculpture, was repaired and repewed in 1820, by the late rector; and a gallery and organ were erected in 1831, by the Rev. V. F. Vyvyan, the present incumbent. At the entrance to the rectory-house is one of the ancient crosses with which this part of the country abounds. Several sepulchral urns have been dug up at different times in various parts. Sir Beville Grenville, a distinguished royalist commander during the eventful civil war of the 17th century, was born at Brynn, in the parish.

WITHIELL-FLOREY (St. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish, in the union of WILLITON, hundred of TAUNTON and TAUNTON-DEAN, W. division of SOMERSET, 7 miles (N. E.) from Dulverton; containing 113 inhabitants. It comprises 2485 acres, of which 1125 are common land. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £59; patron, Sir T. B. Lethbridge, Bart. The tithes have been commuted for £155.

WITHINGTON (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of NORTHLEACH, hundred of BRADLEY, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 6 miles (W.) from Northleach; containing 818 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the river Colne, comprises about 7000 acres; the soil is generally a stone-brash; the surface is hilly, and the scenery pleasing. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £30; net income, £686; patron, the Bishop of Worcester. The tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1813; the glebe comprises about 1100 acres. The church is a cruciform structure, principally in the Norman style, but partly of later date: among the monuments is a handsome one to the memory of Sir John How, his wife, and nine children, in a small cross aisle on the south side of the church, the burial-place of the family. The Rev. W. Osborn, D.D., who held the living, bequeathed £100 for apprenticing children, and John Rich, Esq., gave £100 for the same purpose; and there are other benefactions for the use of the poor. A Roman pavement was discovered in the parish, in 1811, a part of which was deposited in the British Museum.

WITHINGTON (St. PETER), a parish, in the hundred of BROXASH, union and county of HEREFORD, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Hereford; containing, with Preston-Wynne chapelry, 817 inhabitants, of whom 648 are in the township. The parish consists of 2950 acres, of which 2087 are in the township; it is intersected by the road from Bromyard to Hereford, and by a branch of the river Froome. The Gloucester and Hereford canal was opened to Withington, in Feb. 1844. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Preston-Wynne annexed, valued in the king's books at £5. 1.; net income, £250; patron, the Dean of Hereford, who, with the Chapter, is appropriator. The Baptists have a place of worship; and there is a charity school for girls with a small endowment.

WITHINGTON, a township, in the parish of MANCHESTER, union of CHORLTON, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 4 miles (S.) from Manchester; containing 1277 inhabitants.

WITHINGTON (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of ATCHAM, Wellington division of the hundred of SOUTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Shrewsbury; containing 219 inhabitants.

It comprises about 1100 acres: the Shrewsbury canal passes through. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £80; patron and appropriator, the Rector of Upton Magna. There is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 35 acres. The church is a plain brick edifice, with a very ancient chancel.

WITHINGTON, LOWER, a township, in the parish of PRESTBURY, union and hundred of MACCLESFIELD, N. division of the county of CHESTER, 7 miles (N. N. W.) from Congleton; containing 782 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Tunsted, a hill in the township, is supposed, from its Saxon etymology, viz., the place of a town, to have been the site of an ancient ville of some consequence.

WITHINGTON, OLD, a township, in the parish of PRESTBURY, union and hundred of MACCLESFIELD, N. division of the county of CHESTER, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Congleton; containing 191 inhabitants.

WITHNELL, a township, in the parish and hundred of LEYLAND, union of CHORLEY, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 5 miles (N. E. by N.) from Chorley; containing 1705 inhabitants. It comprises 3543 acres, of which 802 are common or waste. A district church has been lately built, towards the expense of which the Incorporated Society granted £300; it contains 786 sittings, of which 436 are free, and the living is a perpetual curacy, with a net income of £120.

WITHYBROOK (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of FOLESHILL, Kirby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, N. division of the county of WARWICK, 8 miles (N. E. by E.) from Coventry; containing, with the hamlet of Hopsford, 307 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2483 acres, the surface of which is flat, and the soil loam: the Oxford canal passes through. The living is a discharged vicarage, annexed to that of Monk's-Kirby, and valued in the king's books at £8. 6. 8.; the glebe contains 45 acres.

WITHYCOMBE (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of WILLITON, hundred of CARHAMPTON, W. division of SOMERSET, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Dunster; containing 318 inhabitants. The parish is situated about a quarter of a mile from the road between Dunster and Taunton, and comprises 1787*a. 2r. 31p.*, of which 592 acres are common or waste: limestone is quarried, and burnt for manure. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 11. $5\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of T. Hutton, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £241, and the glebe contains 7 acres. The church is a small edifice. There is a Druidical circle, formed of rude stones, not far from which are two cairns.

WITHYCOMBE-RAWLEIGH, a parish, in the union of ST. THOMAS, hundred of EAST BUDLEIGH, Woodbury and S. divisions of DEVON; containing, with part of the town of Exmouth, 1192 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the west by the navigable river Exe, and comprises 1882 acres, of which 240 are common or waste: the manor was formerly held by the tenure of finding the king, whenever he should hunt in Dartmoor, two good arrows stuck in an oaten cake. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of East Budleigh: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £200, and the vicarial for £210; the glebe comprises 4 acres. A portion of the ancient church was taken down about 1745, and a new edifice erected about half a mile from Exmouth.

WITHYHAM (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of EAST GRINSTEAD, hundred of HARTFIELD, rape of PEVENSEY, E. division of SUSSEX, 9 miles (E. S. E.) from East Grinstead; containing 1607 inhabitants. The parish comprises 7913*a. 2r. 26p.*, of which 3000 acres are arable, 2814 meadow and pasture, 1536 woodland, and 562 common and waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £25. 5. 5.; net income, £717; patron, the Earl Delawarr. The church, which is principally in the later English style, was rebuilt in 1624, by Richard, Earl of Dorset, who was interred here. A chapel of ease dedicated to St. John, in the early English style, was consecrated on the 23rd of July, 1839; the cost was defrayed by the rector, lord of the manor, and some of the parishioners.

WITHYPOOLE (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of DULVERTON, hundred of WILLITON and FREEMANNERS, W. division of SOMERSET, 7 miles (N. W.) from Dulverton; containing 251 inhabitants. It is watered by the river Barle, and comprises 3574 acres, of which 1671 are arable, pasture, and woodland, and the remainder common. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Hawkridge: the tithes have been commuted for £161, and the glebe contains 30 acres. The church is a plain edifice, with a tower.

WITLEY (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of HAMBLEDON, Second division of the hundred of GODALMING, W. division of SURREY, 4 miles (S. W. by S.) from Godalming; containing 1483 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Godalming to Petworth, and comprises 6324 acres, of which 3150 are arable, 900 pasture, 1100 wood, and 1174 waste; the land is elevated, and a telegraph has been erected, which forms one of the stations on the Portsmouth line. A pleasure-fair is held on the 23rd of April. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Thursley annexed, valued in the king's books at £17. 15. 10.; net income, £182; patron and incumbent, the Rev. J. Chandler; impropiators of Witley, J. Leech, Esq., and the Rev. J. Chandler; impropiator of Thursley, J. Knowles, Esq. The church is a cruciform structure, principally in the early English style, with a central tower surmounted by a spire, and contains monuments to the Chandler and Webb families, and some ancient brasses with Norman details. A chapel of ease dedicated to St. John the Evangelist, has been built at Milford, by subscription. There is a place of worship for Calvinists.

WITLEY, GREAT (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of MARTLEY, Lower division of the hundred of DODDINGTREE, Hundred-House and W. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Worcester; containing, with the hamlet of Redmarley, 381 inhabitants, of whom 325 are in the township of Great Witley. The parish is intersected by the roads from Worcester to Ludlow, and from Staffordshire into Herefordshire, and comprises about 2500 acres. Pure limestone is burnt for the purposes of building and agriculture, and inferior limestone is quarried for the repair of roads. An abundant supply of water is obtained from the Abberley and Woodbury hills, which are composed of ferruginous or basaltic gravel. Witley Court, until recently the seat of the Foley family, and now, by purchase, the property of Lord Ward, is a spacious and elegant mansion, beautifully situated in a park, which abounds with picturesque scenery, and of which a part, formerly belonging to a religious house, pays no tithes. Part of the female population is employed in making gloves for the manufacturers of Worcester. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 6. 3., and in the gift of Lord Ward: the tithes have been commuted for £400; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe contains 30 acres. The church, which adjoins the mansion of Witley Court, is an elegant structure, erected in the early part of the last century, by the first lord Foley and his widow, to the former of whom it contains a superb monument by Rysbrach; the windows, painted by Price in 1719, and the ceiling by Verrio, were brought from the chapel at Canons, when that princely mansion of the Duke of Chandos was taken down. Fossils of various descriptions are found in the pure limestone, and some bivalves in the argillaceous stratum. On the crown of Woodbury Hill are the remains of a British camp, which is supposed to have been also the station occupied by Owen Glendower in his war with Henry IV.

WITLEY, LITTLE, a chapelry, in the parish of HOLT, union of MARTLEY, Lower division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, Worcester and W. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Stourport; containing 243 inhabitants, and comprising 995 acres. The chapel is dedicated to St. Michael.

WITLINGHAM, NORFOLK.—See WHITLINGHAM.

WITNESHAM (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of WOODBRIDGE, hundred of CARLFORD, E. division of SUFFOLK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Ipswich; containing 543 inhabitants, and comprising 1996*a.* 21*p.* The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £18. 13. 4.; net income, £463; patrons, the Master and Fellows of St. Peter's College, Cambridge. In 1820, on removing some earth, the skeleton of a man in armour, with his horse, supposed, from the steel cap by which his head was defended, to have been buried during one of the civil wars, was exposed to view. The family of Meadows, from a branch of which the present Earl Manvers is descended, have had a seat here since the time of Richard III. Bishop Latimer was instituted to the rectory in 1538, and held it till 1554.

WITNEY (St. Mary), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of BAMPTON, county of OXFORD; containing, with the chapelry of Hailey, and the hamlets of Crawley and Curbridge, 5707 inhabitants, of whom 3419 are in the town, 11 miles (W. by N.) from Oxford, and 65 (W. N. W.) from London. This place, anciently called Whitney, was of some importance prior to the Conquest, and was one of the manors given to the monastery of St. Swithin, at Winchester, in the reign of Edward the Confessor, by Bishop Ailwyn, in gratitude for the deliverance of Queen Emma, mother of that monarch, from the reputed fiery ordeal which she underwent in the cathedral of that city, in vindication of her innocence of a charge of incontinence. In the reign of Edward II., solemn tournaments were held here, between Henry Bohun, Earl of Hereford, and Aymer de Valence, Earl of Pembroke, who was a great benefactor to the town; in the fifth year of that reign, the place was made a borough, and returned two members to parliament, from which, however, it was released, on petition of the inhabitants, in the 33rd of Edward III. The town is situated on the road from London to Cheltenham and Gloucester, and on the river Windrush, a stream abounding with trout and cray-fish, much resorted to by students from Oxford, and over which a substantial stone bridge of three arches was erected in 1822; it consists principally of two streets, containing neat well-built houses, and has a clean and respectable appearance. The environs are pleasant, and varied with hill and dale.

Witney has long been celebrated for its staple manufacture of blankets, which have been invariably regarded as superior, both in texture and colour, to all others: the latter quality is attributable to the peculiar properties of the water of the Windrush. The weavers were incorporated in the tenth year of the reign of Anne, under the designation of "the Master, Assistants, Wardens, and Commonalty of Blanket-Weavers inhabiting in Witney, in the county of Oxford, or within twenty miles thereof;" and at that time the manufacturers had 150 looms in full operation, affording occupation to more than 3000 persons, and consuming weekly about 200 packs of wool. The charter continued in force for some years, and under its provisions the company enacted laws; but, in process of time, it was found to interfere with improvements in the manufacture, and having become incompatible with the interests of the trade, as at present conducted, it has nearly fallen into disuse. The number of persons now employed averages only about 1000, although the quantity of wool consumed annually, which is 10,000 packs, is nearly the same as formerly; the reduction in the number of hands having been occasioned by the use of machinery. Rough coatings, webbings, horse-girthing, tilting for barges and waggons, felting for paper-makers, and mops, are likewise made, to a considerable extent: the glove trade affords employment to a small number of persons; and wool-stapling, as connected with the manufactures of the town, is carried on: there is also a good trade in malt. The market is on Thursday; a market recently established for cattle and sheep is held on the last Thursday in each month; and fairs take place on the Tuesday in Easter-week, Holy-Thursday, July 10th, the Thursday after September 8th, the Thursday before October 10th, and December 4th. The town is within the jurisdiction of the county magistrates; and two bailiffs, assisted by two constables and other officers, are appointed by the jury at the court leet, annually: a court baron is held twice in the year by the Duke of Marlborough, as lessee under the Bishop of Winchester. A handsome blanket-hall was erected in 1721: the town-hall is a neat stone building, with a piazza for the use of the market; and the market-cross, in the market-place, near the town-hall, was erected in 1683, and repaired in 1811.

The parish is co-extensive with the manor, and comprises 7084*a.* 35*p.*, of which 4368 acres are arable, 1785 grass, and 556 wood. The LIVING comprises a rectory and a vicarage, united in the 9th of Charles I., into one benefice, by the designation of the rectory, with a reservation of the dues and fees of each, as if separate; the rectory is valued in the king's books at £47. 9. 4½, and the vicarage at £9. 12. 6.; patron, the Bishop of Winchester. The tithes have been commuted for £1714, and there is a glebe-house with land adjacent, besides a glebe-farm of 124 acres at Curbridge. The church is a spacious and elegant cruciform structure in the early, decorated, and later English styles, with a square central tower having octagonal turrets at the angles, and surmounted by a lofty spire, panelled in compartments, and richly ornamented. The nave is separated from the aisles by handsome piers and finely-pointed arches, and is lighted by a range of clerestory windows of the later style; the transepts are large, and the western, which is in the decorated style, is lighted by an elegant window of seven lights; the chancel, which is small, is in the early English style, and lighted with windows of delicate tracery. There are several monumental effigies in the transepts, and many ancient tombs in various parts of the church, and in the chancel a piscina of elegant design. In each of the hamlets of Hailey, Curbridge, and Crawley, is a chapel, the first built in 1761, the second in 1836, and the last in 1837; and there are places of worship for Independents, the Society of Friends, and Wesleyans. The free grammar school, in Church Green, was established under an act of parliament in 1664, by Henry Box, Esq., a native of the town, and citizen of London, who endowed it with a rent-charge of £63; the buildings comprise a spacious schoolroom, with a library, dwelling-house for the master, and a large play-ground in front. A free school was founded in 1723, by Mr. John Holloway, who endowed it with lands producing about £135 per annum, for sons of journeymen weavers; and the same benefactor erected almshouses for six widows of blanket-weavers, and assigned to them land worth £85 a year. Mr. William Blake, in 1693, endowed a school with £26 per annum. Some ancient almshouses, on Church Green, were taken down, and six substantial houses erected, in 1795, by the feoffees of the charity estates; these are at present let to tenants, and the rents distributed among the poor. Six neat almshouses for aged and unmarried women were erected in 1828, by Mr. Townsend, and are endowed with about six shillings per week each; and there are also several charitable bequests for distribution. The union of Witney comprises forty-two parishes or places, forty of which are in the county of Oxford, and one in each of the counties of Berks and Gloucester; and the whole contains a population of 22,963. The Roman Akeman-street passes near the town.

WITSTON, or WHITSON, a parish, in the union of NEWPORT, division of CHRISTCHURCH, hundred of CALDICOT, county of MONMOUTH, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Newport; containing 108 inhabitants. It comprises 842 acres, the surface of which is flat, and the soil clay. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 7. $8\frac{1}{2}$., and in the alternate patronage of the Chapter of Llandaff and the Provost of Eton College, owners of the great tithes; net income, £180. The church, according to tradition, belonged to Portown, a place in the neighbourhood swallowed up by the sea at some remote period.

WITTENHAM, LITTLE (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of WALLINGFORD, hundred of OCK, county of BERKS, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Wallingford; containing 125 inhabitants, and comprising 869a. 2r. 19p. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £17. 10.; net income, £400; patron, the Rev. J. Hilliard. The church contains monuments to the Dunche family. Sinodun Hill, in the neighbourhood, is surrounded by an ancient intrenchment supposed to be British, and to have been afterwards occupied by the Romans, Roman antiquities being found occasionally.

WITTENHAM, LONG, or EARLS (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of WALLINGFORD, hundred of OCK, county of BERKS, 4 miles (S. W.) from Abingdon; containing 580 inhabitants. It is bounded on the north by the Isis, and comprises 2168a. 2r. 22p. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12. 12. 6.; net income, £166; patrons and appropriators, the Rector and Fellows of Exeter College; Oxford: the tithes were commuted for land in 1809. Funeral urns and other Roman antiquities are found.

WITTERING, EAST, a parish, in the union of WEST HAMPNETT, hundred of MANHOOD, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of SUSSEX, 6 miles (S. W. by S.) from Chichester; containing 261 inhabitants. This parish, bounded on the south by the English Channel, comprises 1000 acres, most of which are arable. From the mouth of Chichester Harbour to the extremity of Selsey Hill, a distance of nearly eight miles, the sea has absorbed a very considerable portion of the prebendal manor of Bracklesham; and the bay thus formed, called Bracklesham Bay, affords at low water a delightful ride upon the sands, which are particularly firm and level, occasionally interspersed with patches of soft clay, in which beautiful fossil shells are found. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 16. 8.; net income, £190; patron, the Bishop of Chichester. The church is an ancient structure, with a Norman font, and a fine south doorway in that style, highly enriched. There was formerly an endowed chapel at Bracklesham, annexed to the vicarage by Bishop Shirborne, in 1518.

WITTERING, WEST, a parish, in the union of WEST HAMPNETT, hundred of MANHOOD, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of SUSSEX, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Chichester; containing 575 inhabitants. This place was visited in 477, by Ella, a Saxon adventurer, who, with his three sons, landed here and defeated the Britons drawn up to oppose him; and on the shore is a spot still called Ella-nor-point. It was the occasional residence of the bishops of Chichester from the thirteenth to the sixteenth century, when the episcopal palace, now called Cakeham Manor Place, became the property of the Ernley family; the ancient mansion has partly disappeared, and the remainder has been converted into a farm-house. Bishop Shirborne, induced by the beauty of the sea view, bounded by the Isle of Wight, built a lofty hexagonal tower of brick, which is still remaining, and from the summit of which most extensive and magnificent prospects are obtained. The parish is bounded on the south by the English Channel, and on the west by the mouth of Chichester harbour, and comprises 2500 acres by computation, of which 2000 are arable, 30 woodland, and the rest pasture. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 3. 4.; net income, £165; patron and appropriator, the Prebendary of Wittering in the Cathedral of Chichester. The church is an ancient edifice combining various styles of English architecture, with a tower on the north side, and contains some specimens of carving in oak in the pews, and three stalls in the chancel; also a very fine Norman font of cylindrical form, and a monument of Caen stone, with effigies of William Ernley and family, richly sculptured in bass-relief, and carved representations of the Resurrection and the Salutation of the Virgin. A few years since, several coins of the Emperors Constantine, Valentinianus, and others, were found.

WITTERSHAM (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of TENTERDEN, hundred of OXNEY, lathe of SHEPWAY, E. division of KENT, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Tenterden; containing 998 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, valued in the king's books at £15. 8. $6\frac{1}{2}$: the tithes have been commuted for £730; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 17 acres. The church has portions in various styles. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also a national school supported from land purchased by the Rev. W. Cornwallis, in 1820.

WITTON, a parochial chapelry, included in the parish of GREAT BUDWORTH, union and hundred of NORTHWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile (E.) from Northwich; containing 3338 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £168; patron, Edward Greenall, Esq. The chapel, dedicated to St. Helen, is a noble and spacious structure in the later English style, with an embattled tower. The free grammar school, adjoining the cemetery, was founded in 1588, by Sir John Deane, who endowed it with a salt-work at Northwich, and certain houses and lands in other parts of the county, which property now produces an income of about £270; the school-house, rebuilt about a century since, is a substantial structure of brick and stone, with a commodious suite of apartments, occupied by the master.

WITTON, or WYTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of St. IVES, hundred of HURSTINGSTONE, county of HUNTINGDON, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from St. Ives; containing 257 inhabitants. The living is annexed to the rectory of Houghton. The river Ouse passes through the parish.

WITTON, a township, in the parish, union, and Lower division of the hundred, of BLACKBURN, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 2 miles (W. N. W.) from Blackburn; containing 1073 inhabitants. The township comprises about 650 acres, and extends along the northern bank of the Derwent. A district church, dedicated to St. Mark, has been erected here, of which the living is a perpetual curacy, with a net income of £150.

WITTON (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union and hundred of BLOFIELD, E. division of NORFOLK, 5 miles (E.) from Norwich; containing 162 inhabitants. The parish comprises 580 acres of land, chiefly arable, traversed by the road and railway from Norwich to Yarmouth, and bounded on the south by the navigable river Yare. The living is a discharged rectory, consolidated, with that of Brundall, with the rectory of Little Plumstead, and valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4.: the tithes have been commuted for £242; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 17 acres.

WITTON (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the TUNSTEAD and HAPPING incorporation, hundred of TUNSTEAD, E. division of NORFOLK, 4 miles (E. by N.) from North Walsham; containing 280 inhabitants. It comprises 1744 acres by admeasurement, of which 172 are woodland, 94 pasture, 96 park, and the rest arable. Witton Hall, a seat of Lord Wodehouse, is a large quadrangular mansion of white brick, situated on an eminence in a well-wooded park, and commanding a fine view of the sea and the intermediate country. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 13. $1\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the appropriator, the Bishop of Ely: the great tithes have been commuted for £262. 13., and the vicarial for £120; the glebe contains $7\frac{1}{4}$ acres. The church is in the early and decorated English styles, with a circular tower lately erected by Lord Wodehouse. John Norris, in 1777, bequeathed £855 three per cent. consols., directing £10 of the dividends to be appropriated for education, £10. 10. to the vicar for extra duty in Lent, and the remainder to the poor; and a fund of £21 per annum, the produce of bequests from Richard Drake in 1649, and Robert Anison, is distributed among the poor, who also receive in coal the produce of $9\frac{1}{2}$ acres allotted at the inclosure.

WITTON, EAST, a parish, in the union of LEYBURN, wapentake of HANG-WEST, N. riding of YORK, 10 miles (W. by S.) from Bedale; containing 624 inhabitants, of whom 327 are in Witton Within, and 297 in Witton Without. This parish comprises 7730 acres, of which 4280 are in the former division; the surface is diversified with hills and dales, and from a hill called Witton Fell, within a mile and a half of the village, is obtained one of the most picturesque and extensive views in the county. A considerable portion of the southern part of the parish is lofty and hilly moor, but the remainder good arable, meadow, and pasture, with a due proportion of woodland and plantations. The substratum is rich in mineral produce, containing mines of coal and lead, the former indifferent, and the latter very superior; freestone is also abundant, and of good quality for grindstones. The village is on the road from Leyburn to Ripon, near the confluence of the rivers Cover and Ure, and consists chiefly of one long and wide street of neatly-built houses. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 3. $6\frac{1}{2}$., and has a net income of £93, of which £5 are paid out of abbey lands by the Marquess of Ailesbury, who is patron and impropiator, and the remainder arises from glebe purchased by private donations and with Queen Anne's Bounty. The church, a handsome structure in the later English style, for the erection of which the walls of the ancient church, dedicated to St. Ella, were taken down to furnish materials, was completed in 1812, at the expense of the marquess, in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the accession of George III., and was dedicated to St. John the Evangelist; but the old churchyard is still retained as a place of sepulture. A school, now in connexion with the National Society, was built in 1817, by the marquess, by whom it is chiefly supported. About a mile to the east of the village, and romantically situated in Wensley dale, are the ruins of Jervaulx Abbey, founded for monks of the Cistercian order, by Akarius, in the 12th century, and of which, at the Dissolution, the revenue was returned at £455. 10. 5. These interesting remains have lately been cleared from the briars and rubbish by which they were concealed, the transepts and choir of the church, and the chapter-house, are now plainly apparent, and in tolerable preservation. Several of the tombs and stone coffins have been brought to light, and the tessellated pavement of the nave was also discovered, in a seemingly perfect state, but, on exposure to the air, it rapidly crumbled into dust.

WITTON-GILBERT (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of CHESTER-LE-STREET, W. division of CHES-

TER ward, N. division of the county of DURHAM, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Durham; containing 1243 inhabitants. This place, which takes its distinctive affix from Gilbert de la Ley, its proprietor in the reign of Henry II., was formerly a portion of the parish of St. Oswald in the city of Durham, from which it was separated in 1423; and in 1593, the ancient rectory of Kimblesworth, of which the church had fallen into decay, was united with Witton-Gilbert. The parish comprises about 2535 acres, of which 1083, being church lands, are tithe-free; of the remainder, 886 are arable, 536 meadow and pasture, and 30 woodland and plantations. The surface is varied, and the scenery in some parts enlivened with the windings of the Browney, and abounding with features of romantic character. The village is on the north bank of the river, and is large, and neatly built. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the gift of the appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Durham: the tithes have been commuted for £301. 11. The church is a small neat structure, without a tower, and consists of a nave and chancel separated by a screen of oak rudely carved. Jane Furney bequeathed lands now producing £12 per annum, for the instruction of children; and a national school is supported by subscription. An hospital for five lepers was founded by Gilbert de la Ley, but the only memorial now remaining is a pointed window in a farm-house occupying the site. On an eminence within a rapid sweep of the Browney, are the ruins of Beaufort, or Bear Park, consisting of the shattered and roofless walls of the ancient chapel, and of some adjacent buildings. The house and chapel were founded by Prior Bertram, in the 13th century, as a place of retreat for himself and successors, and had suffered great injury at various times from warlike movements, but their ruin was most probably completed by the Scottish army, during their possession of Durham, in 1641 and 1644.

WITTON-LE-WEAR (St. Philip and St. James), a parish, in the union of AUCKLAND, N. W. division of DARLINGTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM, 5 miles (W. N. W.) from Bishop-Auckland; containing 1017 inhabitants. The parish is intersected by the road from West Auckland to Corbridge, and comprises by computation 5060 acres, of which 2677 are in the township, the latter in the proportion of 1221 acres of arable, 1210 grass land, 186 wood, and 58 roads and waste. The surface is much diversified, and a ridge extends from west to east, with slopes to the north, and a steeper descent to the narrow river-vale on the south; the soil is chiefly sharp, gravelly, and alluvial, in some parts loam, and to the north a poor clay. The village is situated on the southern acclivity of an eminence rising from the north bank of the Wear, which is crossed by a bridge; the scenery around is of great beauty, and on the south bank of the stream is Witton Castle, skirted on the west by the narrow dell of the Lyn burn, with its rocky fall, which joins the Wear a little below the bridge. This castle, built about 1410, was formerly the baronial mansion of the lords d'Eure, many of whom signalized themselves in the border warfare; it is a large oblong edifice, with towers and turrets, and a handsome gateway entrance in the Norman style, recently added by Sir W. Chaytor. In the great civil war it was held by Sir William D'Arcy for the king, and was besieged and taken by the parliamentarians, under Sir Arthur Haslerigg: the castle and estate have been lately sold by Sir W. Chaytor to D. Maclean, Esq., M.P. for Oxford, for nearly £100,000. In North Bedburn township is Harperley Park, the seat of George Hutton Wilkinson, Esq., by whom it has been recently enlarged, and around which are many thriving plantations. Good coal abounds in the neighbourhood, at a moderate depth, and from the south side of the river large quantities are exported. Sandstone, which is in general the substratum, is quarried for building purposes, and blue lias for the roads; and at Witton Park pit is a manufactory for fire-bricks and draining-tiles. A railway at Etherley, three miles to the south, communicates with Stockton, Hartlepool, and Darlington, at which last place it meets the Great Northern railway; and another line is in course of construction, which will pass about $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile to the east of the village, and which is intended to convey the coal, lime, and lead of the Wolsingham and Stanhope districts to the railways in the east and south of the county. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage and impropriation of Mr. Maclean, with a net income of £94: the church, an ancient structure, is in the early English style, but much disfigured by incongruous alterations and repairs. A school was endowed in 1766, with £8 per annum; and the interest of £110. 16. 6., the amount of various benefactions, is distributed among the poor.

WITTON, LONG, a township, in the parish of HARTBURN, union, and W. division of the ward, of MORPETH, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 8 miles (N. by W.) from Morpeth; containing 135 inhabitants. This township comprises 2246 acres, wholly the property of Sir John Trevelyan, Bart.; about 692 acres are arable, 1484 meadow and pasture, and the remainder woodland and plantations; the northern district is chiefly uninclosed moor, but the soil in the other parts is fertile. Long Witton Hall, an ancient mansion with modern additions by its late proprietors, the Swinburne family, is finely situated; and the village stands on an elevated ridge on the road from Morpeth to Elsdon, and consists chiefly of irregularly-scattered houses. The tithes have been commuted for £57 payable to the impropriator, and £56 to the vicar of Hartburn. In a wood are three chalybeate springs rising from a thick stratum of sandstone rock, and containing sulphur and alumine; they are called Our Lady's Wells, and were formerly held in great reputation.

WITTON, NETHER (St. Giles), a parish, in the union, and W. division of the ward, of MORPETH, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Morpeth; containing, with the townships of Coat-yards, Ewesley, Healey with Comb-Hill, Nunykirk, Ritton-Coltpark, and Ritton-Whitehouse, 464 inhabitants, of whom 295 are in Nether Witton township. The manor anciently belonged to Gospatrick, Earl of Durham, who gave it in marriage with his only daughter, Julian, to Ranulph de Merlay, from whom it passed to Roger de Somerville, Lord of Wichenor, in the county of Stafford. In the 14th century, it became the property of Roger de Thornton, who built the ancient baronial tower, and, dying in 1429, was succeeded by his son, whose daughter and heiress conveyed it by marriage to George, Lord Lumley, of Lumley Castle. The estate subsequently became again the property of the Thornton family, of whom James left two daughters, who, as coheireses, conveyed it by marriage to the Trevelyans and Withams, whose descendants are at present its proprietors. The surface is pleasingly varied, and the scenery enriched with extensive tracts of woodland abounding with stately trees of oak and larch. The manor-house, a handsome mansion of white freestone, erected in the 17th century, and now in the occupation of R. Trevelyan, Esq., is beautifully situated in tastefully-embellished grounds; it is said to have been visited by Cromwell in the summer of 1651, and to have been the hiding-place of Lord Lovat, after his flight from the field of Culloden. The village, which was anciently a market-town, is in a fertile vale, and consists chiefly of detached cottages with gardens neatly laid out; it is intersected by the river Font, over which a substantial bridge of stone was erected in 1837. Upon the village cross, is the date 1698, which is most probably the time when the present village was built. A large cotton manufactory was erected here by the late Walter Trevelyan, Esq., in 1786, but the speculation did not succeed, and the works were soon abandoned; it was subsequently let for a woollen manufactory, which prospered for a few years, but soon afterwards declined, though part of the building is still occupied in the manufacture of flannel, and the spinning of yarn by machinery driven by water. The living, from a remote period, was a stipendiary curacy under the vicar of Hartburn; but, on the demise of the late vicar in 1833, it was erected into a separate incumbency, and endowed with £400 from Queen Anne's Bounty, to meet a gift of £70 per annum from the vicar. The church, of which the nave was rebuilt a few years since, is a neat plain structure; in the 14th century, it contained a chantry in honour of St. Nicholas, and also a chantry dedicated to St. Giles, which was granted by Edward VI. to the school of Morpeth. The parsonage-house was built in 1834.

WITTON-SHIELDS, a township, in the parish of LONG HORSLEY, union, and W. division of the ward, of MORPETH, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 7 miles (N. W. by W.) from Morpeth; containing 13 inhabitants. Among the proprietors of this place, occur the families of Ogle, Prestwick, Thornton, Trevelyan, and Witham. The township comprises about 418 acres of land, divided from Stanton by a brook which has woody banks, and runs into the Wansbeck. The improper tithes have been commuted for £40. 11., and the vicarial for 3s. A strong tower erected in 1608, by Sir Nicholas Thornton, has been converted into a Roman Catholic chapel.

WITTON, UPPER, a hamlet, in the parish and union of ASTON, Birmingham division of the hundred of HEM-LINGFORD, N. division of the county of WARWICK, 3½ miles (N. by E.) from Birmingham; containing 157 inhabitants.

WITTON, WEST, a parish, in the union of LEY-BURN, wapentake of HANG-WEST, N. riding of YORK, 4½ miles (W.) from Middleham; containing 494 inhabitants. The parish includes the hamlet of Swinethwaite, and comprises by computation 5140 acres of land, the property of Lord Bolton, Sir William Chaytor, Bart. (lord of the manor), and several smaller proprietors. The village, which is large and pleasant; is on the south side of Wensley dale, on the road from Middleham to Aysgarth: the river Ure passes at a short distance on the north. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £103; patron and impropiator, Lord Bolton. The church is a small building, supposed to have been erected in the reign of Henry I.: from the churchyard is a delightful view over the dale. There is a place of worship for Roman Catholics; and a national school has been established. On an eminence called Penhill, are vestiges of an ancient castle formerly belonging to Ralph Fitz-Randal.

WIVELISCOMBE (St. Andrew), a market-town and parish, in the union of WELLINGTON, and forming, with the parishes of Ash-Priors, Bishops-Lydiard, and Fitzhead, one of the two unconnected portions which constitute the W. division of the hundred of KINGS-NURY, W. division of SOMERSET, 28 miles (W.) from Somerton, and 155 (W. by S.) from London; containing 2984 inhabitants. This place is of considerable antiquity, but neither its origin nor the etymology of its name can be traced with certainty: conjecture has deduced the latter from the Saxon Willi or Vili, signifying many, and Combe, a deep ravine or dell. The town occupies a gentle eminence, in an extensive valley inclosed by lofty hills, which suddenly break into deep ravines; the houses are in general neat and well built, and, by the removal of several of the more ancient, the streets have been widened, and the general appearance of the town greatly improved. The inhabitants are supplied with water conveyed by pipes from a spring on Mawndown, a hill about a mile distant. A considerable woollen manufacture is carried on, but not to so great an extent as formerly; the articles consist chiefly of slave-clothing for the West India markets, swan-skins for the Newfoundland fishery, and blankets for the home trade; the number of persons regularly employed varies from 800 to 1000. The markets are on Tuesday and Saturday, at the former of which, the principal, a great deal of business is transacted in corn, &c.; a great market for prime oxen, of the North Devon breed, considered to be the largest in the west of England, is held on the last Tuesday in February, and fairs take place on May 12th for oxen and other cattle, and September 25th for sheep.

The town is under the superintendence of a bailiff and portreeve, with ale-tasters and other officers, all of whom are chosen at a court leet held annually: it is said to have been formerly a parliamentary borough, and that it was relieved from the elective franchise on petition. The parish includes the tythings of Croford, Langley, Nunnington, Oakhampton, West-Town, and East and West Whitefield; comprising 5790 acres, of which 78 are common or waste land. The LIVING is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Prebendary of Wiveliscombe in the Cathedral of Wells (the appropriator), valued in the king's books at £27. 0. 10.; net income, £300. The church is a very handsome edifice in the ancient English style, erected a few years since, at an expense of £6000, raised on the security of the parochial rates, to be paid off in twenty years, aided by a general subscription, and a grant of £500 from the Incorporated Society, for which 460 free sittings have been provided. There is a place of worship for Independents; also an infirmary established in 1804. In the parish are two ancient encampments; the one on an eminence at a place called Castle, of a circular form and very perfect; the other at Courtneys, square, and evidently of Roman origin. There are also some remains of an old episcopal palace, particularly an archway leading into the workhouse, and the kitchen, which is nearly entire. In digging for the foundation of the new church, it was discovered that the tower of the former had been erected upon the foundations of a more ancient building; and a variety of Roman and Saxon coins was also found, together with some Nuremberg counters, used by the monks in their calculations on the abacus.

WIVELSFIELD (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of CHAILEY, partly in the hundred of STREET, rape of LEVES, and partly in that of BURLEY-ARCHES, rape of PEVENSEY, E. division of SUSSEX, 4 miles (S. E.) from Cuckfield; containing 732 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2765 acres, of which 70 are common or waste: the London and Brighton railway passes through. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £94; patron and impropiator, R. Tanner, Esq., whose tithes have been commuted for £423. The church is principally in the early English style. There is a place of worship for Independents. The late Countess of Huntingdon resided here, and the Rev. Mr. Romaine frequently visited the place.

WIVENHOE (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of LEXDEN and WINSTREE, Colchester division of the hundred of LEXDEN, N. division of ESSEX, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Colchester; containing 1599 inhabitants. The village is situated on the Colne river, and much shipping belongs to the port: it has a regular custom-house establishment, with a commodious quay, whence the noted Colchester oysters are shipped for the London and other markets. The greater portion of the male population are employed in the oyster and other fisheries, and as pilots through the intricate navigation of the eastern coast. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £10, and in the gift of N. C. Corsellis, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £440, and the glebe comprises 29 acres. The church, which has been enlarged, is an ancient structure in the early English style, with a square embattled tower. There is a place of worship for Independents. In 1718, Mr. Feedham left £50 (at the inclosure exchanged for land), directing the proceeds to be employed in clothing widows of sailors.

WIVERTON HALL, with a demesne of 1002 acres of land, an extra-parochial liberty, in the county of NOTTINGHAM, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Bingham. This district, the soil of which is rich, is bounded on the east by the river Smithe.

WIVETON (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of WALSINGHAM, hundred of HOLT, W. division of NORFOLK, $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile (W. by S.) from Cley; containing 240 inhabitants. It comprises 1018a. 34p., of which 717 acres are arable, 211 pasture, and 89 wood and heath. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £15, and in the patronage of Lady Listowel: the tithes have been commuted for £212, and there are 33 acres of glebe. The church is a handsome edifice, chiefly in the later style, with a square embattled tower; the font is handsomely sculptured, and the nave is lighted with clerestory windows. Ralph Greenaway, in 1529, bequeathed property, now consisting of the rectorial tithes of Briston, with a barn and a rood of land, and £1141. 11. three per cent. consols., the whole producing an income of £264, for the repair of the church, a weekly distribution of bread and money among the poor, and a Sunday school.

WIX, or WEEKS (St. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of TENDRING, N. division of ESSEX, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Manningtree; containing 808 inhabitants. It comprises 3090 acres, which, with the exception of about 20 of pasture, and the same quantity of wood, are all arable land in good cultivation. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £120; patron, the Rev. R. J. Scott. The church is a small edifice, built of the ruins of a structure which had gone to decay. A Benedictine nunnery in honour of the Virgin Mary, was founded here in the time of Henry I., by Walter Mascherell and others, and, at its suppression, was valued at £92. 12. 3., and granted to Cardinal Wolsey, towards erecting and endowing his intended colleges.

WIXFORD (St. MILBURG), a parish, in the union of ALCESTER, Stratford division of the hundred of BARLICHWAY, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 2 miles (S.) from Alcester; containing 121 inhabitants, and comprising 505 acres. The living is annexed to the rectory of Exhall: the tithes were commuted for land and money payments in 1767.

WIXOE, a parish, in the union and hundred of RISBRIDGE, W. division of SUFFOLK, 12 miles (N. W. by N.) from Halsted; containing 164 inhabitants, and comprising by admeasurement 610 acres. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 13. $1\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of J. P. Elwes, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £200, and the glebe comprises 12 acres. The church has a handsome Norman doorway on the south side.

WOBURN (St. MARY), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of MANSHEAD, county of BEDFORD, 15 miles (S. W. by S.) from Bedford, and 42 (N. W. by N.) from London; containing 1914 inhabitants. This town, which, having suffered severely from fire in the year 1595, and again in 1724, has been almost entirely rebuilt, occupies a gentle eminence on the main road from London to Leeds, and consists of four broad and handsome streets that intersect each other at right angles. The approaches to it, both from the north and the south, are kept in excellent repair, and have been recently embellished by two ornamental houses corresponding in architectural character with the market-house, in the centre of the town, an oblong edifice in the Tudor style, erected by the late Duke of Bedford in 1830, from designs by Mr. Blore. The sides of this building have each four cloister arches filled with iron-work; at the east end is a neat arched doorway, over which is an oriel window, and the north-east angle has a square tower, with a spiral roof of lead surmounted by a vane. The lower part of the building is principally appropriated to the use of the butchers of the town and neighbourhood; and the upper story comprises a splendid apartment for the manorial courts, and for the use of the county magistrates, who hold a petty-session for the hundred on the first Friday in every month. The market is on Friday; and fairs are held on Jan. 1st, March 23rd, and Oct. 6th: the spring fair is noted for an abundant supply of horses and cattle. The manufacture of thread-lace formerly constituted a principal branch of business, but of late has been entirely discontinued, and some attempts have been made to introduce that of plat from Tuscan straw, as a more healthy and advantageous occupation for the children of the poor. Assemblies, respectably attended, occasionally take place during the winter months. The town is singularly neat and improving; and the beauty of its site is greatly enhanced by the evergreen woods in its immediate vicinity, which were planted by John, fourth duke of Bedford, and occupy 200 acres in extent. Near the market-house is a fountain, or reservoir, in the Tudor style, for supplying water in case of fire, erected at the expense of the late duke.

The LIVING is a donative curacy; net income, £251; patron and improprator, the Duke of Bedford. The church, erected by Robert Hobbs, last abbot of Woburn, presents a singularly beautiful appearance, being nearly covered with ivy. Its old quadrangular embattled tower, terminating in pinnacles and surmounted by a cupola, which formerly stood detached from the main building, was taken down and rebuilt in the later English style, from the lower stage, in 1830, by the Duke of Bedford, under the superintendence of Mr. Blore, and was then joined to the north aisle by a vestry-room and gallery above. It rises to the height of 90 feet, and is surmounted by an octagonal stone lantern; at each angle is a lofty pinnacle, panelled and crocketed, with a finial, and the lantern has eight ornamented arches, supporting the roof, which rises spirally with crockets to a handsome finial. The interior of the church contains a curious alabaster monument of the Stanton family, consisting of twelve figures in the attitude of prayer, besides some other ancient sepulchral memorials; a fine altar-piece of the Nativity, by Carlo Maratti, was presented by the late Duke of Bedford, and he also adorned the building with a new window of five lights, with enriched and cinquefoil arched mullions, and the upper part embellished with stained glass, and with figures of the Evangelists and four of the Patriarchs. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. Adjacent to the church, and now corresponding with it in architectural character, is a free school established in 1582, by Francis, second earl of Bedford; in 1808, the Duke of Bedford increased the original endowment to £50 per annum, and in 1825, a similar school for girls was founded under the patronage of the duke and duchess. Twelve almshouses were founded in 1672, and endowed by John, fourth duke, for the residence and maintenance of 24 widows. The poor law union of Woburn comprises 16 parishes or places, and contains a population of 11,282.

In the immediate vicinity of the town is WOBURN ABBEY, with its noble and extensive park, the seat of his grace, which occupies the site of a Cistercian abbey founded in 1145, by Hugh de Bolebec, the revenue of which, at the Dissolution, was valued at £430. 13. 11.; the site, with a great part of the lands, was granted in 1549, by Edward VI., to John, first earl of Bedford. In the middle of the last century the abbey was almost entirely rebuilt by Flitcroft, after which considerable enlargements were made under the superintendence of the late Mr. Henry Holland, who erected also the principal entrance to the park from London, a handsome façade decorated with Ionic three-quarter columns, surmounted by the ducal arms and crest. The abbey, which is approached from this entrance through an extent of rich park scenery and by the margin of an artificial lake, occupies the four sides of a quadrangle, and comprises various suites of apartments magnificently furnished, and adorned with paintings by the most celebrated masters, and a collection of upwards of 280 portraits of distinguished family and other characters. The library, 56 feet in length by more than 23 in breadth, is stored with the most splendid illustrative and other works, of the highest class. The principal state-rooms are in the west front, which is of the Ionic order; the private apartments adjoin the library on the south, having immediately before them a terrace arranged as an ornamental flower-garden. A covered arcade conducts from the private apartments to the sculpture gallery, formed by the munificent taste of the late duke, 138 feet long by 25 wide, in which, amongst valuable works of art by ancient sculptors, are deposited some of the finest productions of Chantrey, Westmacott, and Thorvaldsen; the celebrated group of the Graces, by Canova; and the magnificent Lanti or Bedford Vase. The pleasure-grounds contain many objects of great attraction, and the park abounds with fine timber, and is well stocked with red and fallow deer: the oak-tree on which Hobbs, the last abbot of Woburn, was hanged, pursuant to the mandate of Henry VIII., is still pointed out. In 1572, Queen Elizabeth made a journey to the mansion; and in 1645, when Charles I. visited the Earl of Bedford, the overtures of the parliamentary commissioners were privately submitted to him here, prior to being offered to him formally in public.

WOKEFIELD, a tything, in the parish of STRATFIELD-MORTIMER, union of BRADFIELD, hundred of THEALE, county of BERKS; containing 112 inhabitants, and comprising 500*a.* 3*r.* 23*p.*

WOKEING (St. PETER), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union of GUILDFORD, First division of the hundred of WOKEING, W. division of SURREY, 3 miles (W. by N.) from Ripley; containing 2482 inhabitants. This was one of the royal demesnes of Edward the Confessor, and was afforested in 1154, by Henry II., whose successor gave it to Alan, Lord Basset; but in the reign of Edward II., it belonged to the Despenchers, and on their attainder was given, by Edward III., to Edmund of Woodstock, from which time it had various distinguished owners till the time of Edward IV., who, it is recorded, kept Christmas at his royal palace here, in 1480. Henry VII. repaired and enlarged it, for the residence of his mother, Margaret, Countess of Richmond, who died here; Henry VIII. used it as a retreat, where he sometimes entertained Wolsey, and on one of these occasions, in September, 1551, that prelate was first informed, by a letter from the pope, of his elevation to the dignity of cardinal. James I. granted Wokeing to Sir Edward Zouch, but, in the reign of Charles I., it again belonged to the crown, and was bestowed on Barbara, Duchess of Cleveland; it subsequently passed, by purchase, through various hands, to Richard, Lord Onslow, an ancestor of the Earl of Onslow, its present proprietor. There are now no remains of the palace, except its foundations and the guard-room; the Zouches having removed the greater part of the building, to erect a mansion at Hoe Place, in the neighbourhood. Sutton Place, a fine specimen of the style of building which prevailed in the sixteenth century, was erected in 1529, by Sir Richard Weston; a great part was burned, during a visit of Queen Elizabeth, and the remainder, consisting of the south-west side and north-east front, continued in a ruinous state till 1721, when it was repaired and embellished by John Weston, Esq.; the front has been lately taken down. The parish comprises 10,000 acres by computation, and is intersected by the Basingstoke canal, and the London and South-Western railway, the latter of which has one of its principal stations within a mile. The village is situated on the river Wey, and there are a paper-manufactory and a brewery; it has a fair on Whit-Tuesday, and courts leet and baron are held annually. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11. 0. 5.; net income, £234; patron, the Earl of Onslow; impropiators, H. Halsey, Esq., and others. The vicarial tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1803. The church is partly in the early and partly in the decorated English style, and contains some brasses and a few monuments. An additional church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, was consecrated June 24th, 1842. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents, and a Roman Catholic chapel. In a field near the village is a lofty circular tower, supposed to have been a lighthouse to guide over the heath to the palace; and there was formerly a religious house at Homitage.

Corporation Seal.

WOKINGHAM (ALL SAINTS), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, situated partly in, and forming a detached portion of, the hundred of AMESBURY, Wokingham and S. divisions of WILTS, but chiefly in the hundred of SONNING, county of BERKS, 7 miles (E. S. E.) from Reading, and 32 (W. S. W.) from London; containing 3342 inhabitants, of whom 470 are in the Wiltshire portion. This place, situated within the prescribed limits of Windsor Forest, is of triangular form, and consists of several streets irregularly built, meeting in a central area; water is obtained from wells in abundance; the atmosphere is considered particularly salubrious, and the inhabitants are remarkable for longevity. The manufacture of silk, gauze, and shoes, and the malting and flour trades, are the prevailing branches of business. The market, which is on Tuesday, is one of the most noted in the kingdom for its supply of poultry; the fairs are on April 23rd, June 11th (both of little importance, and not regularly held), October 11th, and November 2nd, chiefly for cattle. The government of the town, under a charter possessed from time immemorial, is vested in an alderman, seven capital burgesses, a high steward, recorder, and town-clerk; and the alderman, high steward, and recorder, are justices of the peace, with exclusive jurisdiction. The corporation hold half-yearly courts of session for minor offences, and this being the only town in the forest, all the forest courts take place here; manorial courts occur as occasion requires, and petty-sessions are held on the first and third Tuesdays in the month, for the Wokingham, or Forest, division of the county. The town-hall, which is over the market-house, is an ancient building in the centre of the town, repaired about 15 years since, at an expense of £1100, defrayed by subscription.

The parish comprises 8249 acres, of which 689 are common or waste. The LIVING is a perpetual curacy; net income, £153; patrons, the family of Jacob; appropriator, the Dean of Salisbury. The church is an ancient structure. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans; also a free school supported by the proceeds of various bequests amounting to £31. 15., and by voluntary contributions. Eight almshouses near the church, founded and endowed by John Weston, in 1451, are occupied by sixteen men and women, who receive a small allowance of fuel; and at Luckley-Green, about a mile from the town, is an hospital established in 1665, by Henry Lucas, Esq., for sixteen pensioners and a master. Attached to the hospital, which is a handsome brick building, erected at an expense of £2320, is a chapel, with a residence for the minister, who is the perpetual curate of the parish. Archbishop Laud bequeathed £50 per annum, to be expended every third year in portioning maidens, and for the two other years in apprenticing boys. Mr. Staverton left a house in Staines, the rental of which, £20, is distributed, with the produce of some other bequests, in money, coal, and clothing. The poor law union of Wokingham comprises 16 parishes or places, 14 of which are in Berks; and 2 in Wilts, the whole containing a population of 12,803. Dr. Thomas Goodwin, who was raised to the see of Bath and Wells, was a native of the town, and received the elements of his education in the free school: in the chancel of the church is a monument to his memory, with an inscription written by his son, who was Bishop of Hereford.

WOLFERLOW (ST. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of BROMYARD, hundred of BROXASH, county of HEREFORD, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Bromyard; containing 116 inhabitants, and comprising 1453 acres. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 4. 9., and in the gift of Sir T. E. Winnington, Bart.: the vicarial tithes have been commuted for £209. 16.

WOLFHAMCOTE (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union of RUGBY, Southam division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, S. division of the county of WARWICK; $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Daventry; containing 432 inhabitants. This parish, situated on the border of Northamptonshire, from which it is separated by the river Leam, at its eastern boundary, comprises 3730 acres; and the Oxford canal passes through it, the rateable annual value of which property in the parish is £2974. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12. 18. 2.; net income, £73; patron, Lord Hood: the glebe contains 34 acres. The church is supposed to have been built about 300 years since. The Wesleyans have a place of worship. In sinking a well some years ago, a vault containing several urns and coins was discovered.

WOLFORD, GREAT (ST. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of SHIPTON-UPON-STOUR, Brails division of the hundred of KINGTON, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 4 miles (S. by W.) from Shipton; containing 585 inhabitants, of whom 311 are in the township. This parish, situated on the borders of Gloucestershire, and bounded on the north by a branch of the river

Stour, comprises 2679 acres. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8; net income, £131; patrons and appropriators, the Warden and Fellows of Merton College, Oxford. A church capable of containing about 500 persons, has been erected on the site of the former, which, having become dilapidated, was taken down in 1833.

WOLFORD, LITTLE, a hamlet, in the parish of GREAT WOLFORD, union of SHIPSTON, Brails division of the hundred of KINGTON, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 3 miles (S.) from Shipston; containing 274 inhabitants, and comprising 1324 acres, of which 339 are common or waste. Here is an old mansion, which is now, and has long been, in the possession of the Ingram family, and part of which is known to have existed so early as the reign of King John.

WOLLASTON (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of CHEPSTOW, forming, with that of Tidenham, a detached portion of the hundred of WESTBURY, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from CHEPSTOW; containing 1022 inhabitants. At the time of the Norman survey, William, Count D'Eu, who, after a judicial combat at Salisbury, was executed for high treason, was lord of the principal part of this place, which was afterwards granted to the family of the Clares, who gave to Tintern Abbey the manor and church, together with several granges stretching across the parish from the river Wye to the Severn. The parish, towards the Wye, is bounded by a range of limestone hills, and towards the Severn by a rich vale of red marl; it is intersected by the road from Gloucester to Chepstow, and comprises by estimation 3160 acres. The living is a discharged rectory, with Alvington and Lancaut consolidated, valued in the king's books at £13. 11. 5., and in the gift of the Duke of Beaufort: the tithes have been commuted for £327. 12.; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises $46\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church is a small cruciform edifice, partly in the Norman style.

WOLLASTON (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of WELLINGBOROUGH, hundred of HIGHAM-FERRERS, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 3 miles (S. S. E.) from Wellingborough; containing 1120 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the east by a portion of the county of Bedford, and intersected by the road from Bedford to Wellingborough; it comprises 2812 acres. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Irchester annexed, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8.; net income, £440; patron, the Rev. W. W. Dickens: the tithes were commuted for land and annual money payments in 1788. The church is a handsome cruciform structure, with a stately tower rising from the intersection, and surmounted by a spire. There are places of worship for Independents, Baptists, and Wesleyans. The sum of £10. 8. per annum, the produce of bequests, is distributed in bread among the poor.

WOLLASTON, a chapelry, in the parish of ALBERBURY, union of ATCHAM, hundred of FORD, S. division of SALOP, 9 miles (W.) from Shrewsbury; containing 427 inhabitants. The parish is situated near the Severn, on the road between Shrewsbury and Welshpool, from which towns it is equidistant; the substratum contains lead-ore, of which some mines are in operation, and there are quarries of good building-stone. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £95; patron, the Vicar of Alberbury; impropiators, the Warden and Fellows of All Souls' College, Oxford. The chapel, dedicated to St. Michael, is a neat structure, erected about the year 1720. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. The chapelry contains numerous mineral springs, of which one is chalybeate; and the remains of a Roman encampment. Thomas Parr, who died at the age of 152, was born here.

WOLLASTON, a township, in the parish of OLD SWINFORD, union of STOURBRIDGE, Lower division of the hundred of HALFSHIRE, Stourbridge and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER; containing 578 inhabitants.

WOLLATON (St. LEONARD), a parish, in the union of BASFORD, S. division of the wapentake of BROXTOW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 3 miles (W.) from Nottingham; containing 574 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Nottingham to Derby, and comprises 2066 acres. Coal-mines have been wrought from time immemorial, and are still in operation: water conveyance is afforded by the Nottingham canal, which runs through the middle of the parish. Wollaton Hall, the ancient seat of the Willoughbys, is a spacious and lofty edifice in the Elizabethan style, built in 1588, by Sir Francis Willoughby, entirely of freestone, which was brought from Ancaster, in the county of Lincoln, in exchange for coal obtained on the estate; the mansion, which is one of the most beautiful specimens of its peculiar style, is in fine preservation, and is the property of Lord Middleton, the present representative of the family. The living is a discharged rectory, with a perpetual curacy of Cossal annexed, valued in the king's books at £14. 2. 6., and in the gift of his Lordship: the tithes have been commuted for £794. 10., and the glebe contains about 7 acres. The church contains several monuments to the Willoughbys, among which are, a very beautiful one to Richard, who died in 1471, and one dated 1528 to Henry, father of Sir Hugh Willoughby, who, with his crew, was frozen in the North Sea in 1554, in an attempt to discover a north-east passage to China.

WOLLESCOTT, a township, in the parish of OLD SWINFORD, union of STOURBRIDGE, Lower division of the hundred of HALFSHIRE, Stourbridge and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER; containing 1110 inhabitants.

WOLLEY (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of BATH, hundred of BATH-FORUM, E. division of SOMERSET, 3 miles (N.) from Bath; containing 89 inhabitants, and comprising 365*a.* 3*r.* 39*p.* The living is a rectory, annexed to that of Bathwick.

WOLSELEY, a hamlet, in the parish of COLWICH, S. division of the hundred of PIREHILL, union, and N. division of the county, of STAFFORD; containing 133 inhabitants. The village is situated at the junction of the London, Liverpool, and Chester roads, where is a large inn and posting-house: the Hall is the property of Sir Charles Wolseley, Bart.

WOLSINGHAM (St. MATTHEW), a market-town and parish, in the union of WEARDALE, N. W. division of DARLINGTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM, 10 miles (W. N. W.) from Bishop-Auckland, 16 (W. S. W.) from Durham, and 259 (N. N. W.) from London; containing 2086 inhabitants. This town, which is irregularly built, is pleasantly situated in the narrow, but exceedingly picturesque, vale of the Wear, on the north bank of the river, and near the point where it receives the united streams of the rivulets of Thornhope and Wascrow. There are manufactures of linen, woollen-cloth, edge-tools, and implements of husbandry, in which, and in the neighbouring coal, lead, and lime works, a great portion of the population is employed. Workmen are also engaged in mining for iron-stone, which is supposed to be in considerable abundance; and should the result of their operations be satisfactory, it is in contemplation to erect works in the immediate vicinity of the town; and a railway is proposed from the extensive limestone-works at Frosterley, to join the Bishop-Auckland line near Witton-le-Wear. The market and fairs are held by grant from the Bishop of Durham, the former on Tuesday, and the latter on May 12th and October 2nd, for cattle and all sorts of merchandise. Petty-sessions are held every Tuesday; and a court leet and baron, under the bishop, as lord of the manor, takes place twice a year, at which debts under 40s. are recoverable. In 1824, a town-hall, of stone, was erected in the centre of the market-place, and in it is a spacious newsroom.

The parish is divided into the four constaberies of Wolsingham, Wolsingham-Park, and East and South Wolsingham, and comprises 24,157*a. 2r.*, of which 4000 acres are arable, 12,000 meadow and pasture, 1000 woodland, 6786 common uninclosed, and 371 roads and waste: the extensive moors in the neighbourhood abound in game. The LIVING is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £31. 13. 4., and in the gift of the Bishop: the tithes have been commuted for £900, and the glebe comprises 12 acres, with a house. The church, situated on rising ground to the north-west of the town, is an ancient and neat plain edifice, with a low tower, and has a font of Weardale marble, beautifully variegated with petrifications of shells, &c. There are places of worship for Baptists, Primitive Methodists, and Wesleyans. The grammar school, founded in 1613, with a residence for the master, was rebuilt in 1786, by subscription (Bishop Edgerton and Dr. Sharp, archdeacon of Northumberland, a trustee of Lord Crewe's charity, being the principal contributors), upon a piece of waste granted by the bishop and the landowners of the parish, by whom it was endowed with 16 acres of land; and 7½ acres were added on the inclosure of the moor. Bequests have been made to this school, of £30 by the Rev. William Nowell, in 1782; £100 by Jonathan Wooler, in 1789; and £100 by George Wooler, in 1826. A school for 40 girls is supported by Miss Wilson and Mrs. Wooler; and nearly 200 children receive instruction at the Church and Methodist Sunday schools. The poor of Wolsingham are periodically relieved by the interest of various benefactions, amongst which are bequests of £200 each, left by the Rev. W. Nowell and the Rev. Robert Gordon, and an annual sum of £18, produced from land purchased with the bequests of Messrs. Markindale, Aisley, and others. Contiguous to a field called Chapel Walls, are the remains of an extensive building surrounded by a moat, supposed to have been the manor-house of the Bishop of Durham. Henry Pudsey, nephew to Bishop Pudsey, contemplated the erection of a religious institution at Baxtonford, in Wolsingham-Park, the intended site for which is marked by a quantity of stone collected for the purpose; but the design was abandoned. There are several chalybeate springs; and about two miles east of Wolsingham, on Bradley estate, is a sulphureous spring.

WOLSTAN (ST. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of RUGBY, partly in the Kirby, but chiefly in the Rugby, division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, N. division of the county of WARWICK, 5½ miles (E. S. E.) from Coventry; containing, with the hamlets of Brandon, Bretford, and Marston, 1137 inhabitants. It is intersected by the river Avon, and partly bounded on the south by the road from Coventry to Daventry; there are 4579 acres of land, and the London and Birmingham railway passes through the parish, in which is the Brandon station. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £15. 10., and in the patronage of Mrs. Scott: the church is a large cruciform structure. There is a place of worship for Baptists. An alien priory, a cell to the abbey of St. Peter super Divam, in Normandy, was founded here soon after the Conquest, and, at its suppression, granted by Richard II. to the Carthusian priory at Coventry. On the southern bank of the Avon are vestiges of a Roman encampment.

WOLSTANTON (ST. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of WOLSTANTON and BURSLEM, N. division of the hundred of PIREHILL and of the county of STAFFORD; containing 16,575 inhabitants, of whom 1175 are in the township, 1½ mile (N. by E.) from Newcastle-under-Lyme. This parish is divided into the North and South sides or divisions, embracing upwards of 10,000 acres, and including the townships of Brieryhurst, Chatterley, Chell, Chesterton, Knutton, Oldcott, Ranscliffe, Stadmerslow, Thursfield, Tunstall, and Wedgwood, all separately described. There are numerous factories of china and earthenware, collieries, brick and tile works, &c.; and several blast-furnaces have been lately established for smelting iron-ore, by Thomas Kinnersly, Esq. The Grand Trunk canal passes through the parish on its summit level, and leaves it northwardly through two parallel tunnels, which run under Harecastle Hill. Sir Nigel Gresley's canal, also, extending from the Ape-dale collieries and iron-furnaces to Newcastle, runs through the west part of the parish. The LIVING is a vicarage, in the gift of the impropiator, Ralph Sneyd, Esq.: the impropriate rectory is valued in the king's books at £32. 3. 9.: the tithes have been commuted for £500. The church is an ancient structure, in which is a curious monument to the memory of Sir William Sneyd, of Bradwell, with others to members of the same family: being seated on an eminence, its lofty spire forms a conspicuous feature in this part of the country. There are several dissenters' places of worship. The union of Wolstanton and Burslem comprises those two places, and contains a population of 32,669.

WOLSTONE, a chapelry, in the parish of UFFINGTON, union of FARRINGDON, hundred of SHRIVENHAM, county of BERKS, 5¼ miles (S. by E.) from Great Farringdon; containing 337 inhabitants. The chapel is dedicated to All Saints.

WOLVERTON (ST. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of AYLISHAM, hundred of SOUTH ERPINGHAM, E. division of NORFOLK, 4¼ miles (N. N. W.) from Aylsham; containing 43 inhabitants. The parish comprises 660 acres, of which 340 are arable, 253 pasture, and 60 wood and plantation. Wolverton Hall, the seat of the Earl of Orford, was commenced in 1727, after the destruction of an ancient mansion by fire, and completed in 1741, by Horatio, second Baron Walpole, from designs by Ripley; it is a brick building with quoins, chimneys, &c., of Portland stone, and is elegantly fitted up, and contains a fine collection of paintings. On its south side is a bold terrace, adjacent to which is a tastefully laid-out garden, sloping to the margin of an extensive lake, the whole forming one of the most imposing specimens of park scenery in the county. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Wickmere annexed, valued in the king's books at £8, and in the gift of the Earl: the tithes of the two parishes have been commuted for £550, and the glebe contains 35 acres. The church is supposed to have been rebuilt by John de Wulterton.

WOLVERHAMPTON (St. PETER), a market-town, borough, and parish, and the head of a union; comprising the market-town of Bilston, in the N. division of the hundred of SEISDON; the townships of Featherstone, Hatherton, Hilton, and Kinvaston, in the E. division of the hundred of CUTTLESTONE; and Bentley, Pelsall, Wednesfield, and Willenhall, in the S. division of the hundred of OFFLOW; S. division of the county of STAFFORD; the whole containing 70,370 inhabitants, of whom 36,382 are in the town, 16 miles (S.) from Stafford, and 123 (N. W.) from London. This place, which is of considerable antiquity, was called Hanton or Hamton prior to the year 996, when Wulfrana, sister of King Edgar, and widow of Aldhelm, Duke of Northampton, founded a college here, for a dean and several prebendaries, or Secular canons, and endowed it with so many privileges that the town, in honour of Wulfrana, was called Wulfran's Hamton, of which its present name is a corruption. The college, under the same government, continued till the year 1200, when Petrus Blesensis, who was then dean, after fruitless attempts to reform the dissolute lives of the brethren, surrendered the establishment to Hubert, Archbishop of Canterbury; and it was subsequently annexed by Edward IV. to the deanery of Windsor. In 1258, the town obtained from Henry III. the grant of a market and a fair, from which time no circumstance of historical importance occurs till 1590, when a considerable part of it was destroyed by a fire that continued burning for five days. In the parliamentary war, Charles I., accompanied by his sons, Charles, Prince of Wales, and James, Duke of York, visited Wolverhampton, where he was received with every demonstration of loyalty by the inhabitants, who, in aid of the royal cause, raised a liberal subscription, towards which Mr. Gough, ancestor of the learned antiquary of that name, contributed £1200. Prince Rupert, in 1645, fixed his head-quarters in the town, while the king was encamped at Bushbury; and, immediately after the battle of Naseby, Charles marched into it, and quitted the day following.

The town is situated on an eminence, in a district abounding with mines of coal, iron, and limestone, and consists of several streets diverging from the market-place to the several roads from which they take their names. Among the improvements effected, is a new entrance on the east from Bilston, constructed by the Holyhead trust, and which, by means of a street crossing the town, nearly in a direct line, communicates on the west with Salop-street, leading towards Shrewsbury.

The houses are in general substantial, and neatly built of brick, and many of them are modern and handsome, but in the smaller streets are dwellings of more ancient appearance; the town is irregularly paved, lighted with gas, and at present supplied with water by wells sunk to a great depth in the rock on which it is built, though water-works have been just established, by a company having a capital of £20,000. A public subscription library was founded in 1794, which contains more than 10,000 volumes, and for which a neat and commodious building was erected in the year 1816, when a newsroom was added: over the library is a suite of rooms in which assemblies and concerts take place. A new theatre was built in 1844, and is well arranged for the purpose: prior to the erection of the old theatre, the celebrated Mrs. Siddons, and her brother, J. P. Kemble, performed in the town-hall, since taken down, where they first developed those talents which procured for them so distinguished a reputation. Races are held in August, in an extensive area near the town on which an elegant stand has been erected.

The MANUFACTURE of the finer steel ornaments, which was formerly carried on extensively, and brought to the highest perfection, in this town, has given place to the heavier articles of steel and iron, of which the principal are, smiths' and carpenters' tools of every description, files, nails, screws, gun-locks, hinges, steel-mills, and machinery; locks, for the making of which the place has long been celebrated; furnishing iron-mongery and cabinet brasses, with every branch of the iron manufacture; and brass, tin, Pont-y-Pool; and japanned wares in great variety. The Chillington works consist of four blast-furnaces, forge, mill, &c., producing 400 tons of finished iron per week, in railway-bars, nail-rods, sheet-iron, boiler-plates, and other articles, and affording employment to upwards of 1000 hands. The Shrubbery works for the manufacture of boiler-plates and all other descriptions of best iron, were established in 1824, and are carried on by a firm who also conduct the Bradley works near Bilston, erected by the late John Wilkinson, Esq.: in both concerns, from 300 to 500 tons of iron are manufactured weekly, in which about 650 men are regularly engaged. The Priestfields works, for the smelting of pig-iron, and for castings of every description, are also very extensive; and the Wolverhampton tin-plate manufactory, established in 1837, employs about 350 men, producing weekly from 1000 to 1500 boxes of tin-plates, which are of high repute in the market. There are likewise extensive chemical-works for the manufacture of oil of vitriol, aqua-fortis, and other preparations connected with medicine and manufactures: the chemical-works of Messrs. Mander Weaver and Co. have been established since 1773. Rowley ragstone is found in the coal-mines in the parish, frequently in large masses, sometimes penetrating the thick stratum of coal at a depth of 300 to 400 feet from the surface. The Birmingham canal, which forms a junction with the Staffordshire and Worcestershire canal, runs close to the town, on the west and north, where it is joined by the Essington and Wyrley canal, which terminates here, and affords facility of conveyance to every part of the kingdom. The Grand Junction railway, also, passes within a mile of the town, near which a first-class station has been established on the line, which is carried through a tunnel 200 yards in length; a railway, likewise, is projected from the town to Shrewsbury, distant 30 miles. The market-days are Wednesday and Saturday, and the fair, which continues for eight days, the first being for cattle, commences on July 10th: the market-place is a large area. The town is within the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, who hold petty-sessions for the north and south divisions almost daily. By the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, it was constituted a borough to return two members to parliament, to be elected by the £10 householders of a district consisting of the townships of Wolverhampton, Bilston, Wednesfield, Willenhall, and Sedgley, and comprising 18,604 acres: the constable of the manor of the deanery is returning officer. A court of requests, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5, is held every fourth Friday, under an act passed in the 48th of George III.

The township of Wolverhampton contains 2930a. 3r. 12p., exclusively of the ground on which the town is built. The collegiate chapter consists of a dean and five (till lately seven) non-resident prebendaries, with a net revenue of £641, received by the dean, who is likewise Dean of Windsor, to which office this deanery is permanently attached; each of the prebendaries has a separate revenue from his prebend. The LIVING is a perpetual curacy; net income £193; patron, the Dean: those tithes payable to the Duke of Cleveland have been commuted for £715. The church, built in the reign of Edward III., and formerly one of the king's free chapels, to which many immunities were granted, is a spacious cruciform structure, partly in the early decorated, but principally in the later English style, with a handsome square embattled tower rising from the centre, the upper part of which is a very fine specimen of the later style; it has been lately repewed by subscription. The piers and arches of the nave and transepts, if not of the early English, are of that style merging into the decorated; the pulpit, of one entire stone, is adorned with sculpture; and an octagonal font, of great antiquity, supported on a shaft the faces, of which are embellished with the figures of St. Anthony, St. Paul, and St. Peter, in bass-relief, is richly ornamented with bosses, flowers, and foliage. In the chancel, which is in the Italian style, are, a fine statue of brass, erected in honour of Admiral Sir Richard Leveson, who commanded under Sir Francis Drake against the Spanish Armada, and a monument to the memory of Colonel John Lane, the protector of Charles II. after the battle of Worcester: in what was anciently the Lady chapel is an alabaster monument to John Lane and his wife, the former represented in armour. In the churchyard, which is inclosed with a handsome iron palisade, is a column twenty feet high, divided into compartments, highly enriched with sculpture of various designs, supposed to be either of Saxon or Danish origin. Near its south-western angle is a large vault, the roof of which is finely groined, and supported on one central pillar; the walls are three yards in thickness, and on both sides of the doorway are slight vestiges of sculpture; the interior is in good preservation. It appears to have been the basement story of some edifice, probably connected with the monastery of Wulfrana, the exact site of which has not been ascertained.

The living of St. John's is a perpetual curacy; net income, £200; patron, the Earl of Stamford and Warrington. The church, which was erected at an expense of £10,000, including £1000 given by the patron, and was consecrated in 1760, is an elegant structure in the Grecian style, with a handsome tower surmounted by a lofty and finely-proportioned spire; the prevailing character is a mixture of the Ionic and Corinthian orders. A pleasing and appropriate effect is produced from the arrangement of the interior, and the altar is ornamented with a good painting of the Descent from the Cross, by Barney, a native of the town. In this church is the celebrated organ built in the 17th century, for the Temple church, London, by Harris, the competitor on that occasion of Schmidt; it was purchased for the cathedral of Christ Church, Dublin, where it remained until about 50 years ago, when it was sold for £500, and set up in this edifice, and is now in course of reparation. St. George's district church, of the Grecian-Doric order, with a tower and spire, was erected in 1830, at an expense of £10,325, towards which the inhabitants subscribed £3400; it contains 2300 sittings, of which 1200 are free; and the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £155; patron, the Dean. St. Paul's church was built in 1835, and the living is a perpetual curacy, of which the patronage is vested in the Rev. W. and Mrs. Dalton, at whose expense the edifice was chiefly erected and endowed; it is capable of accommodating about 1400 persons, and more than one-third of the sittings are free. St. Mary's church, built in 1842, at a cost of £10,000, including the parsonage, at the sole expense of Miss Hinckes, of Tettenhall-Wood, is in the early English style, with a square tower surmounted by a Flemish spire, and has 1000 sittings, of which 400 are free; it contains a superb altar-piece of carved oak, and in the eastern window, of stained glass, are representations of the Descent from the Cross and the Resurrection. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of Miss Hinckes, who has endowed it with the interest of £1000, and has also presented a splendid communion-service. Another church, dedicated to St. James, was built by subscription in 1843: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of certain Trustees, and endowed with the interest of £1054, three per cents. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Wesleyans, Methodists of the New Connexion, Unitarians, Irvingites, and Roman Catholics.

The free grammar school was founded under letters-patent of Henry VIII., in 1513, by Sir Stephen Jenyns, Knt., a native of the town, and lord mayor of London in 1508, who endowed it with estates in the parish of Rushoe, in the county of Worcester, producing an income, aided by other benefactions, of about £1170 per annum; the building was erected in 1713, by the Merchant Tailors' Company, London. Sir William Congreve; John Abernethy, and John Pearson, advocate-general of India, were educated at the school. The Blue-coat charity school, for 100 boys and 50 girls, who are educated and clothed, is an ancient establishment, with an endowment purchased with benefactions, and producing more than £240 per annum. Two miles on the Sedgley road is situated Sedgley Park school, established in 1761, for the education of Roman Catholic children on an economical scale; it is under the direction of a president and vice-president, assisted by teachers. National schools, and a British and an infant school, are supported by subscription; and a dispensary, a handsome and commodious building, was erected in 1826. There are numerous charitable bequests for the poor. The union of Wolverhampton includes only a portion of the parish, comprising, with the town itself, the three chapelries of Bilston, Wednesfield, and Willenhall, and containing a population of 68,412.

WOLVERLEY, a township in the parish of WEM, Whitchurch division of the hundred of NORTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP; containing 91 inhabitants. It is situated near the road from Wem to Ellesmere, west-north-west from the former town.

WOLVERLEY (ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of KIDDERMINSTER, partly in the Upper division of the hundred of HALFSHIRE, but chiefly in, and forming a detached portion of, the Lower division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, Kidderminster and W. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 2 miles (N. by W.) from Kidderminster; containing 2091 inhabitants. The parish comprises 5532 acres, of which the surface is diversified with hill and dale, and the soil is light, resting on red sandstone: there is a very extensive establishment for the manufacture of iron, tin-plates, and wire, called the Cookley Iron-Works. The Staffordshire and Worcestershire canal, and the river Stour, pass through the parish. Lea Castle, a noble mansion here surrounded by 550 acres enriched with plantations of oak and other timber, has been purchased of John Knight, Esq., by John Brown, Esq., who has much improved the property. The living is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Worcester (the appropriators), valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8.; net income, £250. The great and small tithes were partly commuted in 1775, and a commutation of the former has taken place under the late act, for £811, and of the latter for £39; there is a glebe-house, and the glebe contains 8½ acres. The church is a neat edifice of brick, on an elevated site commanding beautiful views of the valley of the Stour. The Wesleyans have a place of worship at the village of Cookley. William Seabright, in 1620, bequeathed property in and near London, now producing a rental of £633, to establish a free grammar school, and for other purposes. In 1829, it was determined, in consequence of the improved state of the funds, to extend the charity, in furtherance of which the school premises were re-erected, and now constitute a handsome range of buildings in the later English style, comprising a Latin school in the centre, a spacious schoolroom at each wing, one for boys and the other for girls, and adjoining residences, with gardens attached. The sum of £3 per annum is paid to each of seven parishes for distribution in bread; and the trustees expend annually about £30 in clothing, and £15 in coal, for the poor of Wolverley. John Smith, in 1823, bequeathed £600 for founding an afternoon lectureship, about one-fourth of the interest to be applied to the relief of superannuated husbandmen and widows. John Baskerville, the eminent printer, was born here in 1706.

WOLVERSHELL, a hamlet, in the parish of BULKINGTON, union of NUNEATON, Kirby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, N. division of the county of WARWICK; containing 9 inhabitants.

WOLVERTON (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of POTTERS-PURY, hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, 1 mile (E. N. E.) from Stony-Stratford; containing 1261 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises upwards of 1000 acres, is situated nearly half way between London and Birmingham, and contains one of the principal depôts for locomotive-engines and goods of the London and Birmingham railway. The buildings, which have a frontage on the Grand Junction canal, are 221 feet wide by 315 deep, occupying the sides of a quadrangular area in the centre, which measures 216 feet by 127, and has a central gateway 13 feet above the rails, and two side entrances. Several streets are formed round the building, consisting of houses in the occupation of the numerous workmen employed; and a first-class station for passengers is situated on the south side of a bridge over the railway. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 3. 9.; net income, £38; patrons and improprators, the Trustees of the late Dr. Radcliffe, who are owners of the Wolverton estate. An additional church, for the railway station, has been erected here by the Trustees, at an expense amounting, with the parsonage, to about £5000; they also provided the site, and allow £100 per annum towards the stipend of the minister, for whose endowment the railway company raised £2000. The edifice is well fitted up, and was consecrated May 28th, 1844.

WOLVERTON (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union and hundred of FREEBRIDGE-LYNN, W. division of NORFOLK, 7 miles (N. N. E.) from Lynn; containing 165 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the east by the road from Lynn to Wells, and comprises 2714a. 3r. 29p., of which about 460 acres are arable, 998 pasture and meadow, 368 salt-marsh, 697 heath and warren, and 162 woodland: the strata afford good building-stone. A wall was erected by the late Major Hoste, at a cost of £1800, against the encroachment of the sea. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12, and in the patronage of John Motteux, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £260, and the glebe comprises 22 acres. The church consists of a nave, chancel, and side aisles, with an embattled tower; on the south side of the chancel are three stone stalls and a piscina.

WOLVERTON (ST. CATHERINE), a parish, in the union and hundred of KINGSCLERE, Kingsclere and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 1½ mile (E.) from Kingsclere; containing 208 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Basingstoke to Kingsclere, and comprises 1439 acres by computation, of which 772 are arable, 276 pasture, 223 wood, and 88 common; the soil consists in general of clay, resting on chalk alternated with heavy loam, but in some parts is wet and sandy, and well adapted to the growth of timber. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 2. 8½., and in the patronage of the Duke of Wellington: the tithes have been commuted for £290, and the glebe contains 80 acres. The church is an ancient edifice cased with brick, with a tower built about 1717, and contains 170 sittings, of which 120 are free. A rent-charge of £16 was bequeathed by Sir John Browne, for the poor.

WOLVERTON (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of STRATFORD-UPON-AVON, Snitterfield division of the hundred of BARLICHWAY, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 4 miles (W. S. W.) from Warwick; containing 162 inhabitants, and comprising 1110 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 10. 7½.; net income, £300; patron and incumbent, the Rev. Benjamin Wintrop. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1826; the glebe contains 194 acres.

WOLVES-NEWTON (St. THOMAS à BECKET), a parish, in the union of CHEPSTOW, division of TRELLECK, hundred of RAGLAN, county of MONMOUTH, 7½ miles (N. W. by W.) from Chepstow; containing 224 inhabitants. It is situated near the road from Chepstow to Usk, and comprises 2675 acres by admeasurement, of which about two-thirds are arable, and 251 acres woodland; the soil is a clay, producing excellent wheat, and there is some very fine oak-timber. Stone is quarried for building. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 2. 8½., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £244; there is a glebe-house, and the glebe contains 23 acres. The church is an ancient structure, and accommodates about 110 persons. There is a place of worship for Independents. On an eminence is an oblong encampment called Gaer Vawr, the most extensive in the county; and a small circular one is situated not far from it, named Cwrty Gaer.

WOLVEY (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the Kirby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, N. division of the county of WARWICK, 4 miles (S. by E.) from Hinckley; containing 923 inhabitants. This parish is bounded on the north-east by the great Watling-street, which separates it from the county of Leicester; and comprises by measurement 3407 acres, chiefly arable, with a small portion of meadow, and about 30 acres of plantation. One-fourth of the soil is light, having been formerly heath-land; the remainder is heavy, and more suitable for wheat, and the whole is generally of level surface, lying in a hollow. The parish is intersected by the roads from Rugby to Hinckley, and from Leicester to Coventry, as well as by the river Anker, here a very narrow stream, which takes its rise about one mile above the village: part of the population is engaged in weaving stockings and ribbons. Little Copston, now called Smockington, in the parish, situated on the line of the Watling-street, was formerly a considerable village, and had a chapel. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 6. 5½.; net income, £206; patrons, the Bishop of Lichfield and James Smith, Esq. There is a parsonage-house, and the glebe consists of 101 acres. The church is an ancient structure, with windows in the early English style, and the entrance at the south door is a mixture of the pointed arch, and the circular of the Norman style: in the interior are two tombs, each having recumbent figures, one of Sir Thomas de Wolvey, as a Knight Templar, and his lady, dated 1330; and the other, at the east corner, of Sir Thomas Astley and his wife, dated 1603. There is a place of worship for Baptists; and 50 children are educated by means of a recent endowment.

WOLVEY-HILLS, an extra-parochial place, in the hundred of SOUTH WITCHFORD, union and ISLE of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE; containing, with Wolvey-Holes, 18 inhabitants.

WOLVISTON, a chapelry, in the parish of BILLINGHAM, union of STOCKTON, N. E. division of STOCK-

TON ward, S. division of DURHAM county, 4½ miles (N. by E.) from Stockton, on the road to Sunderland; containing 588 inhabitants. The church of Durham probably held lands here under ancient grants of the manor and the church of Billingham; and other portions, extending in time to nearly the whole vill, were acquired by purchase or exchange from various proprietors. The chapelry comprises upwards of 4000 acres, of which the soil is chiefly a sound clayey loam, well adapted for wheat and beans, with fertile patches peculiarly suited to the culture of potatoes and turnips; about two-thirds of the whole are under tillage; the scenery is pleasing, and the views embrace the Tees bay, near Redcar, and the Cleveland hills for many miles. The Clarence, and the Stockton and Hartlepool railways pass about a mile and a quarter from the village, at which point the Billingham station is fixed; and about four miles further to the eastward is Port-Clarence, where is the terminus of the Clarence railway. There are a tillery, a brickyard, and a pottery on a limited scale. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Durham, with a net income of £250; the tithes, now vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, have been commuted for £337. 16.; there is a glebe of 60 acres in portions of land variously situated, and in 1849 a farm near Billingham, of 60 acres, will become the property of the incumbent, who meanwhile has a grant from the commissioners of a yearly sum equivalent to its value. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is a neat structure of stone, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a handsome tower, and was enlarged in the year 1830, by the addition of 190 sittings, of which 130 are free. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also a school on the national plan, built, with a house for the master, in 1836, and capable of admitting 120 scholars, of whom 20 are gratuitously taught. In 1838, a handsome brick building was erected in the village by the Marchioness of Londonderry, containing twelve apartments, two for each of six aged persons, chiefly widows.

WOMBLETON, a township, in the parish of KIRKDALE, union of HELMSLEY, wapentake of RYEDALE, N. riding of YORK, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Helmsley; containing 337 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 1040 acres, chiefly the property of Lord Feversham: the village is south of the road from Helmsley to Kirkby-Moorside, from the latter of which places it is distant south-west about three miles. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. John Stockton, in 1839, left £10 per annum for the instruction of children.

WOMBOURN (St. BENEDICT), a parish, in the union, and S. division of the hundred, of SEISDON, S. division of the county of STAFFORD, 4 miles (S. W. by S.) from Wolverhampton; containing, with the liberties of Orton and Swindon, 1808 inhabitants, of whom 1220 are in the township. The parish comprises about 4000 acres of a light loamy soil, generally good, and remarkable for the early produce of corn and vegetables; the scenery, interspersed with extensive garden and nursery grounds, is very picturesque, and well wooded. The common was inclosed in 1816, and brought into tolerable cultivation. The Staffordshire and Worcestershire canal passes for four miles and a half through the parish. The Wood House, a noble mansion in the Elizabethan style, the property of Thomas Shaw Hellier, Esq., is situated in a beautiful vale, and occupied by William Chinner, Esq. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Trysull annexed, valued in the king's books at £12. 12. 8½., and in the patronage of certain Trustees: the impropriate tithes of Wombourn have been commuted for £194, and the vicarial for £93. 13.; there is a parsonage-house, and a glebe of 36½ acres. The church is a fine structure in the early English style, with a square tower surmounted by a graceful spire; it was enlarged and thoroughly repaired in 1841, at a cost of £1500, and contains 600 sittings, of which 193 are free. In the interior is an elegant monument by Chantrey, in memory of R. B. Marsh, Esq.

WOMBRIDGE (St. Mary and St. Leonard), a parish, in the union of WELLINGTON, Wellington division of the hundred of SOUTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP, 3 miles (E.) from Wellington; containing 2057 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the Roman Watling-street, and comprises 677 acres, consisting of arable and pasture land, the soil of which is dry and sandy, and the surface hilly. The Shrewsbury, Shropshire, and Marquess of Stafford's, canals form a junction in the parish, which is also intersected by several railways communicating with the extensive coal and iron mines at Ketley and in the neighbourhood, which have been worked for centuries, though the most considerable iron-works were established here in 1818. At Oaken-Gates a small customary market is held. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of William Charlton, Esq., as lord of the manor; net income, £82. The church is a brick edifice, built on the site of a structure which fell into ruins in 1760. The Wesleyans have a place of worship. There are slight remains near the church of a priory of Black canons, founded in the reign of Henry I., by William Fitz-Alan, which at the Dissolution had a revenue of £72. 15. 8.

WOMBWELL, a chapelry, in the parish of DAREFIELD, N. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, 4 miles (S. E. by E.) from Barnsley; containing 1169 inhabitants. This chapelry, which is situated on the road from Barnsley to Wath-upon-Dearne, and intersected by the Dearne and Dove canal, comprises about 410 acres of woodland; the prevailing scenery is pleasing and the soil fertile. Sir George Wombwell is lord of the manor, James Remington, Esq., the chief proprietor, and Netherwood Hall is the residence of John Garland, Esq. The chapel, an ancient structure, with a tower, and having lancet windows, was enlarged a short time since by the addition of a south aisle and a gallery, at a cost of £500, when 222 new sittings were provided, of which 100 are free, the Incorporated Society having granted £100 in aid of the expense. The tithes have been commuted for £740, payable to the rector, and Trinity College, Cambridge. A school at Hemingfield is supported by a grant of £15 per annum from the trustees of Mr. George Ellis's charity, who also pay £5 for instruction in a school at Wombwell. The town lands, comprising 15 acres, produce £22 per annum, appropriated partly to the poor rate and partly to the distribution of coal.

WOMENSWOULD (St. Margaret), a parish, in the union of BRIDGE, hundred of WINGHAM, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, E. division of KENT, 6½ miles (S. E.) from Canterbury; containing 275 inhabitants. It comprises 1413*a. 1r. 32p.*, of which 897 acres are arable, 104 pasture, and the remainder waste, with the exception of 4 acres of hop-grounds. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to that of Nonington. There are several handsome monuments in the church, some of which, to the Montessor family, are by Chantrey.

WOMERSLEY (St. Martin), a parish, in the Lower division of the wapentake of OSGOLDCROSS, W. riding of YORK; containing, with the townships of Cridling-Stubbs, Little Smeaton, and Walden-Stubbs, 921 inhabitants, of whom 392 are in Womersley township, 5 miles (E. S. E.) from Pontefract. This place comprises between 5000 and 6000 acres, the soil of which embraces sand, loam, and clay. On the southern bank of the river Went, which runs through the parish, are quarries of fine limestone, whence a railroad formerly passed over the stream, ran through the township of Little Smeaton, and met the new line of navigation made by the Aire and Calder Company: the road from Doncaster, by Askerne, to Pontefract, passes through the village. Womersley Park is the seat of Lord Hawke, who is lord of the manor. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 11. 5½.; net income, £258; patron and impropriator, Lord Hawke: the glebe contains 188 acres. The church is a handsome structure with a lofty spire, situated on an eminence in the centre of the parish. Neat national schools have been erected, on a site given by Lord Hawke, at an expense defrayed by liberal grants from the parent institution in London, and the York Diocesan Society, aided by voluntary contributions. At Walden-Stubbs is an ancient Hall, once the seat of a family of the name of Shuttleworth, now occupied as a farm-house.

WONASTOW, or WEONASTOW (St. Wonnow), a parish, in the hundred of SKENFRETH, union, division, and county of MONMOUTH, 2 miles (W. S. W.) from Monmouth, on the road to Abergavenny; containing 165 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the south and west by the river Trothey, and consists of about 1650 acres, the surface being boldly undulated, and the higher grounds presenting some fine views; the soil is a loamy clay. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 15. 5.; net income, £95; patron and impropriator, Sir W. Pilkington, Bart. The church, consisting of a nave and chancel, is in the early English style, and is most picturesquely situated in the grounds of Wonastow House, a portion of which was erected in the reign of Henry VIII.

WONERSH (St. John the Baptist), a parish, in the union of HAMBLEDON, First division of the hundred of BLACKHEATH, W. division of SURREY, 3 miles (S. S. E.) from Guildford; containing 1213 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the road from Guildford to Brighton, and comprises 4388 acres by admeasurement, of which 2495 are arable, 585 meadow, 507 wood, and the rest common; the surface is hilly towards the eastern boundary, and flat in the opposite direction; the soil is partly clay, but the larger portion is sand, in which iron-stone abounds. The Wey and Arun canal passes through the parish. In the village is a mill for dressing leather, which affords employment to forty persons. Charles II. after his restoration, granted a market and fair to be kept at Shimley-Green, in the parish; but the former has fallen into disuse, and the latter dwindled to a small pleasure-fair held on the 11th of June. The manor-house of Tangle, originally a hunting-box of King John's, was, in 1585, converted into a residence for the family of Sir Francis Duncombe. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £15. 1. 3., and in the patronage of Lord Grantley, the impropiator, whose tithes have been commuted for £700, and those of the vicar for £176. 13. 8. The old church, with the exception of the north wall and tower, was rebuilt in 1795, and is picturesquely situated in Wonersh Park, the seat of his lordship: at the east end of the north aisle is the family vault, in which is interred Judge Chapple, whose daughter married Sir Fletcher Norton, speaker of the house of commons for 12 years, and raised to the peerage in 1782, by the title of Lord Grantley, Baron of Markenfield. There are two places of worship for Independents.

WONSTON, or WONSINGTON (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of NEW WINCHESTER, hundred of BUDDLESGATE, Winchester and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 5 miles (S.) from Whitchurch; containing, with the chapelry of Sutton-Scotney, 786 inhabitants. The parish comprises 5229*a.* 37 32*p.*, of which 4835 acres are arable, 186 meadow, 93 woodland, and the remainder waste; the surface is varied, and the soil rests on chalk. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £46. 15. 7½.; and in the gift of the Bishop of Winchester: the tithes have been commuted for £1150, and the glebe comprises 20 acres. The church, burnt down in 1714, and rebuilt, was repewed and beautified in 1829, at an expense of £750, defrayed by the Rev. Mr. Dallas, the present incumbent, when 169 additional sittings were obtained; it has a fine window of painted glass, presented by the Hon. and Rev. Augustus Legge, 31 years rector of the parish. A national and an infants' school are supported by the rector, who has a printing-press, from which are issued religious publications for the poor. Another school is endowed with £7. 16. per annum.

WOOBURN (ST. PAUL), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union of WYCOMBE, hundred of DESBOROUGH, county of BUCKINGHAM, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Beaconsfield; containing 1830 inhabitants. A rivulet rising at West Wycombe, flows through the parish, turning in its course several paper, mill-board, and flour mills; and many of the female inhabitants are employed in the manufacture of bone-lace. The market, which was held on Friday, and a fair on the festival of the translation of St. Edward, were granted by Henry VI.; but they have been long disused, and fairs now take place for horses, cattle, and sheep, on May 4th and November 12th. Wooburn House occupies the site of a noble palace, formerly the residence of the bishops of Lincoln. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12; net income, £138; patron and impropiator, James Dupré, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1802. The church is a stately edifice in the later English style, with a very handsome tower and a curiously-carved font, and contains some monuments to the Bertie and Wharton families, of whom Philip, Lord Wharton, in 1694, gave a rent-charge of £22. 10., to be paid to the vicar for an evening lecture every Sunday. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. The sum of £27. 10., the rental of an allotment of 28 acres of land under an inclosure act, and of a piece of meadow called the Church estate, is principally distributed among the poor.

WOOD, or WOODCHURCH, a ville, and member of the cinque-port liberty of DOVOR, in the union of the ISLE OF THANET, locally in the hundred of RINGSLOW, or the ISLE OF THANET, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, E. division of KENT, 3 miles (S. W. by W.) from Margate; containing 233 inhabitants. Here are the ruins of a chapel of ease to the vicarage of Monkton; it was dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene.

WOODALE, or DEEPPALE, a hamlet, in the township of CARLTON-HIGHDALE, parish of COVERHAM, union of LEYBURN, wapentake of HANG-WEST, N. riding of YORK, 6 miles (N. E.) from Kettlewell. It belongs chiefly to Messrs. Robinson, and the tithes are the property of the Church. The Quakers had formerly a burial-place here, in which graves are still visible.

WOODBANK, or ROUGH-SHOTWICK, a township, in the parish of SHOTWICK, union of GREAT BOUGHTON, Higher division of the hundred of WIRRALL, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 5½ miles (N. W.) from Chester; containing 75 inhabitants. The appropriate tithes have been commuted for £23, payable to the Dean and Chapter of Chester.

WOODBASTWICK (ST. FABIAN AND ST. SEBASTIAN), a parish, in the union of BLOFIELD, hundred of WALSHAM, E. division of NORFOLK, 8 miles (N. E. by E.) from Norwich; containing 283 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the north by the navigable river Bure, over which is a ferry, and comprises, exclusively of roads, 2163*a.* 27*p.*; 1389 acres are arable, with the exception of a small portion of grass land; 391 are rough marshes, turf-grounds, &c., 115 woods and plantations, 72 heath, and 151 water, the last comprehending several lakes. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the rectory of Panxworth annexed, valued in the king's books at £6; patron and impropiator, J. Cator, Esq. The great tithes have been commuted for £292. 3., and the vicarial for £143. 6.; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 26 acres. The church is partly in the early and partly in the decorated English style, with a square embattled tower, which was raised in 1840, when the edifice was thoroughly repaired and newly pewed at the expense of the patron.

WOODBOROUGH (ST. SWITHIN), a parish, in the union of BASFORD, S. division of the wapentake of THURGARTON and of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 7 miles (N. E. by N.) from Nottingham; containing 801 inhabitants. It comprises 1800 acres by computation, of which the surface is undulated, and the soil in some parts loamy, and in others a wet heavy clay: the Doverbeck, a considerable stream turning several mills, runs through the parish. The stocking-frame was invented here by William Lee, in 1528, and about 150 of them are usually at work in the village. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Collegiate Church of Southwell (the appropriators), valued in the king's books at £4; net income, £93. The tithes were commuted for 252 acres of land in 1798, and the glebe contains 52 acres, of which 37 are in the parish of Lambley. The church has a fine Norman doorway, and the east window exhibits some remains of ancient stained glass. The Wesleyans and Baptists have each a place of worship. A free school was built, and endowed with about 66 acres of land, in 1739, by Mr. Wood, and enlarged by the Rev. Richard Oldacres, the master, in 1763; the premises have just been rebuilt.

WOODBOROUGH, a hamlet, in the parish of WINSCOMBE, union of AXBRIDGE, hundred of WINTERSTOKE, E. division of SOMERSET; containing 275 inhabitants.

WOODBOROUGH (St. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish, in the union of PEWSEY, hundred of SWANBOROUGH, Everley and Pewsey, and N. divisions of WILTS, 4 miles (W.) from Pewsey; containing 426 inhabitants. This parish is situated in a valley, near the Kennet and Amesbury road, and comprises 1015*a.* 3*r.* 13*p.*, the surface of which is flat, and the soil chiefly sand and clay. The Kennet and Avon canal passes through the parish, on the banks of which is Honey-street wharf: a considerable trade in timber and coal is carried on, and a great number of canal boats and barges are built. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10, and in the gift of G. H. W. Heneage, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £294. 12., and the glebe comprises 70 acres. The church was erected about the year 1670, and contains 200 sittings. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WOODBRIDGE (St. MARY), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of LOES, E. division of SUFFOLK, 7½ miles (E. N. E.) from Ipswich, and 76½ (N. E. by E.) from London; containing 4954 inhabitants. This town is of considerable antiquity, for, in the time of Edward the Confessor, the prior and convent of Ely had possessions here, and their successors still hold the manor of Kingston: the name is thought to be a corruption of Wodenbryge, from the Saxon god Woden. Towards the termination of the 12th century, a priory of Augustine canons was founded here, by Ernaldus Rufus and others, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary, the revenue of which, at the Dissolution, was valued at £50. 3. 5.: a house built on the site by one of the Seckfords, now in the possession of the Carthew family, still retains the name of the Abbey. In 1666, upwards of 327 inhabitants died of the plague, and were buried, according to tradition, at Bearman's Hill, in the vicinity. The town is pleasantly situated on the north side of the river Deben, on the direct road from London to Yarmouth, and occupies the slope of a hill surrounded by beautiful walks; it consists of two principal streets, a spacious square called Market Hill, and several narrow streets and lanes, and is paved, lighted, and amply supplied with water; the atmosphere is highly salubrious, and the general appearance of the place neat and respectable. From the summit of the hill is a commanding view of the river to its influx into the sea. A small theatre was built in 1813; and concerts are held occasionally. During the war, barracks were erected on the high ground about half a mile north-west of the town, with accommodation for 750 cavalry and 4165 infantry; but they were pulled down on the restoration of peace.

The TRADE mainly consists in the exportation of corn, flour, and malt, and in the importation of coal, timber, foreign wine, spirits, porter, grocery, drapery, and ironmongery. The shipping of late years has greatly increased; the number of vessels of above fifty tons now registered at the port is twenty-seven, and their aggregate burthen 4030 tons. Vessels sail weekly to London, and many others are employed in trading with Newcastle, Hull, and the Continent; one or two sail direct to Liverpool, from which place they bring back salt, and there is a small trade to the Baltic for timber. A manufacture of salt, of peculiarly fine quality, was formerly carried on, and there was a brisk business in ship-building; but both have declined. The Deben, near its mouth, forms the haven of Woodbridge, from which it is navigable for vessels of 120 tons to the town: on its bank are two excellent quays. The market is on Wednesday, for corn, cattle, and provisions; and fairs occur on April 5th and October 23rd. The quarter-sessions for the liberty of St. Ethelred, and the hundreds of Colneis, Carlford, Loes, Plomesgate, Wilford, and Thredling, are held here; and petty-sessions take place every Wednesday. The sessions-hall, under which is the corn-market, in the centre of the Market Hill, erected in 1587, by Thomas Seckford, Esq., master of the court of requests, has recently undergone some extensive repairs, and is a handsome and lofty edifice of brick. On an adjacent eminence is the bridewell, rebuilt in 1804.

The parish comprises upwards of 1200 acres. The LIVING is a perpetual curacy, to which the inappropriate rectory was annexed in 1667, by Mrs. Dorothy Seckford; patron and incumbent, the Rev. T. W. Salmon, whose tithes have been commuted for £329. The church was built by John, Lord Seagrave, in the reign of Edward III., and the tower and north portico in that of Henry VI.: on the north side of the chancel is an elegant private chapel, erected in the time of Elizabeth, by Thomas Seckford, Esq., in which, over the family vault, is a tomb, probably to his memory. The north portico is adorned with sculpture, in relief, representing the conflict of St. Michael and the Dragon. The tower is stately and magnificent, and, like the church, is constructed of dark flint intermixed with freestone, and, towards the upper part, formed into elegant devices; the summit is crowned with battlements, having finials at the angles, which are surmounted by vanes, and decorated in the interval with badges of the Four Evangelists. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyans. The free grammar school, in Well-street, was founded in 1662, by Mrs. Seckford and others, and is endowed with property producing about £37 per annum. Almshouses were erected in 1587, by Thomas Seckford, for the residence of thirteen unmarried men, with another house for three women, to attend them as nurses, and were endowed with an estate in the parish of Clerkenwell, London, which, in 1767, produced an income of £568 per annum, and now yields about £3000: new and handsome houses have been recently erected. There are, besides, different benefactions, amounting to about £150 a year, for the benefit of the poor. The union of Woodbridge comprises forty-six parishes or places, and contains a population of 23,015. Various relics of antiquity, especially fragments of warlike instruments, have been occasionally found in the vicinity. Christopher Saxton, the publisher of the first county maps, was a native of this place, and servant to Thomas Seckford, Esq., mentioned above, who resided in a mansion at Great Bealings, about a mile and a half distant, and under whose patronage the plans were published, in 1579, and dedicated to Queen Elizabeth.

WOODBURY, a hamlet, in the parish of GAMLINGAY, union of CAXTON and ARRINGTON, hundred of LONGSTOW, county of CAMBRIDGE; containing 34 inhabitants.

WOODBURY (St. SWITHIN), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union of ST. THOMAS, hundred of EAST BUDLEIGH, Woodbury and S. divisions of DEVON, 3 miles (E. by S.) from Topsham; containing 1933 inhabitants. The parish comprises 7304 acres, of which 734 are common or waste: the navigable river Exe bounds it on the west. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £150; patrons and appropriators, the Custos and College of Vicars Choral in the Cathedral of Exeter. The church contains some ancient monuments, among which is one to Chief Justice Sir Edmund Pollexfen. A school, in connexion with the National Society, is supported by endowments amounting to about £37 per annum. There is an ancient earthwork called Woodbury Castle, an inclosure of irregular form, deeply intrenched, on the edge of a lofty hill commanding a beautiful prospect.

WOODBURY, a tything, in the parish of ROMSEY-EXTRA, union of ROMSEY, hundred of KING'S-SOMBOURN, Romsey and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 293 inhabitants.

WOODCHESTER (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of STROUD, hundred of LONGTREE, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Stroud; containing 908 inhabitants. This place is supposed to derive its name from having been the site of a Roman station, which, from numerous relics of antiquity found here, appears to have been the residence of the proprætor, or perhaps of the Emperor Adrian. The village is on an eminence forming part of a range of hills which inclose a beautiful and fertile vale. Spring Park is a splendid residence finely situated, and combining a variety of picturesque scenery; and the Priory, an old mansion near the church, also forms a pleasing object in the landscape. The manufacture of woollen-cloths is carried on extensively, and in the neighbourhood of the village not less than eight mills are in constant operation. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10, and in the gift of Lord Ducie: the tithes have been commuted for £265; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 30 acres. The church contains a fine monument to the memory of Sir George Huntley. There is a place of worship for Baptists. Robert Bridges, in 1722, bequeathed £500, of which the produce, £50 per annum, is appropriated to the clothing and apprenticing of boys; six schools are endowed with £10 a year each, and two with £12. Among the antiquities that have been found are, foundations and ruins of buildings, fragments of statues, stags' horns, glass, pottery, coins of the Lower Empire, a coin of Adrian, one of Lucilla, and a noble tessellated pavement, of which an engraving was exhibited to the Society of Antiquaries by Samuel Lysons, Esq., F.S.A., who published an elaborate account of these relics in 1797.

WOODCHURCH (Holy Cross), a parish, in the union, and Lower division of the hundred, of WIRRALL, S. division of the county of CHESTER; containing, with the townships of Arrow, Barnston, Landican, Noctorum, Oxton, Pensby, Prenton, Thingwall, and part of Irby, 1409 inhabitants, of whom 114 are in Woodchurch township, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Great Neston. This parish, like many others in the hundred of Wirrall, probably abounded with oak-trees, though at present there is but little of that species of timber in the neighbourhood. The pews of the church, and the wood-work in most of the older buildings, are of split oak; and the name of the place appears to be descriptive of the situation of the church either in, or contiguous to, a wood. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £25. 9. 2., and in the patronage of Mrs. Ellen King, in whose family the advowson has remained for some centuries; net income, £827. The church, though internally modernised, is a very ancient structure, in the Norman style, and contains an old font embellished with emblematical sculpture. William Gleave, Esq., alderman of London, in 1665, left £500 for the erection and endowment of a free school, of which the master has an income of £57. 15. per annum; and there are several charitable bequests, the interest of which is distributed in bread to the poor.

WOODCHURCH (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of TENTERDEN, hundred of BLACKBOURNE, Lower division of the lathe of SCRAY, W. division of KENT, 4 miles (E. by N.) from Tenterden; containing 1278 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, valued in the king's books at £26. 13. 4.: the tithes have been commuted for £682, and the glebe comprises 15 acres. The church is partly in the early and partly in the later English style, with a tower surmounted by a spire, and contains numerous ancient monuments. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WOODCOMBE, a hamlet, in the parish of MINEHEAD, union of WILLITON, hundred of CARIAMPTON, W. division of the county of SOMERSET; containing 96 inhabitants.

WOODCOT, a township, in the parish of WRENBURY, union and hundred of NANTWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Nantwich; containing 36 inhabitants. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £14, and the vicarial for £4. 7. 10., payable to the vicar of Acton.

WOODCOTE, a liberty, in the parish of SOUTH STOKE, union of WALLINGFORD, hundred of DORCHESTER, county of OXFORD, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Wallingford; containing 502 inhabitants. Here is a chapel dedicated to St. Leonard. Mrs. Susannah Newman, in 1715, devised a messuage called Gastons, and several parcels of land comprising about 22 acres, for the support of a school; the master resides in the house, and receives about £10 per annum.

WOODCOTE, a chapelry, in the parish of SHERIFFHALES, union of NEWPORT, Newport division of the hundred of SOUTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP, 3 miles (S. E. by S.) from Newport; containing 140 inhabitants.

WOODCOTS, a tything, in the parish of HANDLEY, union of WIMBORNE and CRANBORNE, hundred of SIXPENNY-HANDLEY, Wimborne division of DORSET; containing 215 inhabitants.

WOODCOTT, a parish, in the union of KINGSCLERE, hundred of PASTROW, Kingsclere and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 5 miles (N. N. W.) from Whitchurch; containing 100 inhabitants. The living is a donative; net income, £20; patrons and improprators, the Trustees of the late E. Temple, Esq.

WOODCOTT, a tything, in the parish of UPHAM, union of DROXFORD, hundred of BISHOP'S-WALTHAM, Winchester and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 20 inhabitants.

WOOD-DALLING (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of AYLSHAM, hundred of EYNSFORD, E. division of NORFOLK, 3 miles (N. by W.) from Reepham; containing 560 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2444a. 1r. 11p., of which 1571 acres are arable, 658 pasture and meadow, and 12 woodland. The Hall, now a respectable farm-house, was built in 1582, by one of the family of Dalling, who, during a long period, held the estate. The living is a discharged vicarage, annexed to the rectory of Swanington, and valued in the king's books at £8. 8. 4.: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £436, and the vicarial for £38. 9.; there is a glebe-house, and the impropriate and vicarial glebes contain respectively 112 and 56 acres. The church comprises portions of the early, decorated, and later English styles, with a lofty embattled tower, and contains several memorials to members of the Bulwer family. The Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists have each a place of worship.

WOOD-DITTON, county of CAMBRIDGE.—See DITTON, WOOD.—And other places having a similar distinguishing prefix will be found under the proper name.

WOOD-EATON (Holy Rood), a parish, in the union of HEADINGTON, hundred of BULLINGTON, county of OXFORD, 4 miles (N. N. E.) from Oxford; containing 62 inhabitants. It comprises 627a. 1r. 12p., of which 315 acres are pasture, 275 arable, and 34 wood: there are good stone-quarries. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 0. 10., and in the gift of Richard Weyland, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £149; there is a parsonage-house, and the glebe comprises 10 acres. John Collins, a distinguished mathematician, was born here in 1624.

WOODEN, a township, in the parish of LESBURY, union of ALNWICK, E. division of COQUETDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 4½ miles (S. E. by E.) from Alnwick; containing 28 inhabitants. The village is a short distance from the coast of Alnmouth bay, and about a mile south of Lesbury.

WOODEND, a hamlet, in the parish of BLAKESLEY, union of TOWCESTER, hundred of GREEN'S-NORTON, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 5½ miles (W. by N.) from Towcester; containing 272 inhabitants, and comprising 1659 acres.

WOODFORD, a township, in the parish of PRESTBURY, union and hundred of MACCLESFIELD, N. division of the county of CHESTER, 6 miles (S. by W.) from Stockport; containing 564 inhabitants.

WOODFORD (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of WEST HAM, hundred of BEACONTREE, S. division of ESSEX, 8 miles (N. E. by N.) from London; containing 2777 inhabitants. This parish, so called from the ford in the wood, or forest, where is now Woodford-Bridge, is about three miles in length and two miles in breadth, comprising 1752 acres of fertile land, of which the chief portion is meadow and pasture; 396 acres are common or waste. Woodford-Bridge is a beautiful posting-village, situated on the confines of Epping Forest, on the road from London to Newmarket; the houses are in general detached, and irregularly arranged on the undulated declivities of a rising ground, skirted at the bottom by the river Roden, finely interspersed with trees, and disclosing at intervals mansions of a superior character, which are principally occupied by wealthy merchants of the metropolis. In different parts of the parish are some extensive views into the counties of Essex and Kent. A nearer communication with the metropolis has been recently opened, by the construction of a road from the highest part of the village, near the Castle inn, which passes through the forest into the Lea Bridge road. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 12. 1., and in the gift of the Hon. W. T. L. P. Wellesley: the tithes have been commuted for £670, and the glebe comprises 15 acres. The church, erected on the site of a former edifice, in 1817, at an expense of nearly £9000, defrayed partly by subscription, and partly by a rate, is situated in the lowest part of the village, on the west side of the London road, and is an elegant edifice in the ancient English style, with a square embattled tower. The aisles are separated from the nave by six pointed arches carried up to the roof, which is of open wood-work, and surmounted in the centre by an octangular lantern tower; the east window is of stained glass, and divided into three compartments, containing figures of Our Saviour, the Four Evangelists, St. Peter, and St. Paul; and there are some good monuments. In the churchyard is a splendid Corinthian column of marble, about forty feet in height, erected to the memory of the family of Godfrey, which flourished many years in Kent; also a tomb with a column entirely covered with ivy, of picturesque appearance, and a remarkably fine old yew-tree. An episcopal chapel has been built; and there are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. At Woodford Wells is a mineral spring.

WOODFORD (All Saints), a parish, in the union of DAVENTRY, hundred of CHIPPING-WARDEN, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 7½ miles (S. S. W.) from Daventry; containing, with the hamlets of West Farndon and Hinton, 846 inhabitants, and comprising 2654a. 3r. 33p. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 10., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £275; improprators, the Rev. Sir H. Dryden, Bart., and G. Hitchcock, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land and money payments, under inclosure acts, in 1758 and 1760; and under the recent Tithe act, a commutation has taken place for a rent-charge of £65. There is a place of worship for Moravians; and a Sunday school is endowed with £6 per annum. Peter Grey, in 1577, bequeathed an estate now producing an income of £55, which sum is expended in coal for the poor. At Hinton is a mineral spring.

WOODFORD (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of THRAPSTONE, hundred of HUXLOE, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 2 miles (S. W. by W.) from Thrapstone; containing 680 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Thrapstone to Wellingborough and Northampton, and comprises 2148a. 1r. 2p., of which 1136 acres are meadow and pasture, 339 arable, 51 wood and plantations, and 441 forest, river, and roads: the village occupies rising ground on the northern bank of the river Nene, and about half of the population is employed in making shoes. The living is a rectory in united mediocities, valued jointly in the king's books at £22. 9. 7.; net income, £497; patron, Lord St. John. The tithes were commuted for land in 1760; the glebe contains 360 acres, and there are two glebe-houses, one of which, lately built, is occupied by the rector. The church is supposed to have been erected about the 13th or 14th century. In the neighbourhood are three tunuli, near which have been found Roman tiles, fragments of tessellated pavement, an urn, and two small coins of the Lower Empire.

WOODFORD, a hamlet, in the parish of MONKSILVER, union of WILLITON, hundred of WILLITON and FREEMANNERS, W. division of SOMERSET; containing 20 inhabitants.

WOODFORD (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of AMESBURY, hundred of UNDERDITCH, Salisbury and Amesbury, and S. divisions of WILTS, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Salisbury; containing 489 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the east by the river Avon, and comprises by computation about 3000 acres, the soil of which is a light loam. Here was formerly a palace of the bishops of Salisbury, but no traces of it are now visible. Charles II., after the battle of Worcester, was concealed in Heale House, in the parish, which was at that time the residence of the Hyde family. The living is a vicarage, consolidated with that of Wilsford, and valued in the king's books at £13. 10.: the inappropriate tithes have been commuted for £640, and the vicarial for £180. The church contains 118 free sittings, the Incorporated Society having granted £15 in aid of the expense.

WOODFORD-GRANGE, an extra-parochial liberty, in the S. division of the hundred of SEISDON and of the county of STAFFORD; containing 14 inhabitants.

WOODGARSTON, a tything, in the parish of MONK'S-SHERBORNE, union of BASINGSTOKE, hundred of CHUTELEY, Basingstoke and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Basingstoke; containing 111 inhabitants.

WOODGREEN, an extra-parochial liberty, in the union of RINGWOOD, N. division of the hundred of NEW FOREST, Ringwood and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 3 miles (N. E. by E.) from Fordingbridge; containing 400 inhabitants.

WOODHALL (ST. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of HORNCastle, S. division of the wapentake of GARTREE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Horncastle; containing 307 inhabitants. This parish, along the western extremity of which the river Witham takes its course, comprises 1880 acres. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13; net income, £70; patron and appropriator, the Bishop of Lincoln. The tithes were commuted for land in 1767. The church is a modern structure, with an old tower surmounted by a spire. The Presbyterians have a place of worship. There is a mineral spring, with baths, hotel, and other accommodations for visitors; the water resembles that of Cheltenham, but has a larger portion of iodine than any other spring in England. It contains, in an imperial gallon; of chloride of magnesium, gr. 11. 3; chloride of calcium, 26. 7; of sodium, 1517; sulphate of soda, 2. 1; bicarbonate of soda, 6; iodine, 0.55; bromine, 8. 35; and of potash, a trace: its specific gravity is 1016.

WOODHALL, with BRACKENHOLME, a township, in the parish of HEMINGBROUGH, union of HOWDEN, wapentake of OUSE and DERWENT, E. riding of YORK, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Howden; containing 77 inhabitants. It lies in the vale of the Derwent: the village is situated about a mile north-east of Hemingbrough.

WOODHALL, a hamlet, in the parish of HARTHILL, union of WORKSOP, S. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Rotherham; containing 183 inhabitants. It is situated a mile westward of Harthill; and at a short distance from it is the farmstead of Pennyholme, which stands in the three parishes of Harthill; Treeton, and Wales, though the boundaries are undefined.

WOODHAM, a hamlet, in the parish of WADDESdon, union of AYLESBURY, hundred of ASHENDON, county of BUCKINGHAM, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Aylesbury; containing 39 inhabitants.

WOODHAM, a township, in the parish of AYCLIFFE, union of SEDGefIELD, S. E. division of DARLINGTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM, 7 miles (E. S. E.) from Bishop-Auckland; containing 207 inhabitants. This place was honoured by a visit from James VI. of Scotland, on his route to take possession of the crown of England; he halted here for a short time, and was present at the celebration of a horse-race. The township comprises 3705 acres, chiefly arable land, and the soil generally of very poor quality: the Clarence railway passes through. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £86. 11. 8., and the appropriate for £27. 11. 8., payable to the Dean and Chapter of Durham.

WOODHAM-FERRIS (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of CHELMSFORD, S. division of ESSEX, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Danbury; containing, with part of the hamlet of Bicknacre, 895 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the south by the river Crouch, derived its name from its situation in a thickly-wooded district, and its adjunct from the noble family of Ferrers, to whom the lands chiefly belonged at the time of the Norman survey. It comprises 3725 acres, of which 40 are common or waste. About a mile from the church is Edwin Hall, a handsome mansion erected by Edwin Sandys, Archbishop of York. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £28. 13. 4., and in the gift of Sir B. W. Bridges, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £950, and the glebe contains $3\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church is an ancient edifice, with a tower of brick, and contains an elegant monument to the memory of Cecilia, wife of the archbishop. At Bicknacre was a hermitage, which was superseded by a priory of Black canons founded and endowed by Maurice Fitz-Jeffrey, in consideration of certain sums of money due from him to Henry II.; it was dedicated to St. John the Baptist, and being almost deserted in the time of Henry VII., was then annexed to St. Mary's Spital, London.

WOODHAM-MORTIMER (ST. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of MALDON, hundred of DENGIE, S. division of ESSEX, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Maldon; containing 308 inhabitants. This parish, called in some documents Little Woodham, derives its present adjunct from the family of Mortimer, to whom it anciently belonged. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the family of Wigg: the tithes have been commuted for £340, and the glebe comprises 45 acres. The church has a richly-carved altar-piece. In the marshes near Crouch river are several barrows.

WOODHAM-WALTER (ST. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union of MALDON, hundred of DENGIE, S. division of ESSEX, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Danbury; containing 537 inhabitants. It is separated from the hundred of Witham by the river Chelmer, and is amply supplied with water from numerous springs; the lands are well cultivated, and the scenery beautifully diversified. An ancient mansion called the Fort, is said to have been for some time the residence of Queen Elizabeth, during the reign of Mary. The village, called Brook-Street, from a stream which flows through the parish, consists of a few good houses. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 13. 1½.; net income, £437; patron, the Rev. L. Way. The church is a neat edifice in good repair, and has in the chancel some remains of ancient stained glass.

WOODHAY, EAST (St. MARTIN), a parish, in the union of KINGSCLERE, hundred of EVINGAR, Kingsclere and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 5 miles (S. W. by W.) from Newbury; containing 1408 inhabitants. This parish is situated at the north-western extremity of the county, immediately under the Hampshire hills, and comprises 4966a. 29p., of which the surface is ornamented with numerous clumps of trees, and the soil is rich, resting on clay in some places, and in others on chalk. In addition to a small village adjacent to the church, the parish contains the two large villages of East-End and North-End, and is traversed by the road from Newbury to Andover. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Ashmansworth annexed, valued in the king's books at £21. 6. 0½., and in the gift of the Bishop of Winchester: the tithes have been commuted for £1021. 14.; there is a glebe-house, and the glebe comprises 43¾ acres. The church, rebuilt at the expense of the parishioners, in 1823, contains a handsome monument to the Goddard family, who were long settled here. Bishops Hooper, Ken, and Louth, were formerly rectors. The Independents and Primitive Methodists have each a place of worship. There was once a palace belonging to the bishops of Winchester.

WOODHAY, WEST (St. LAWRENCE), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union of HUNGERFORD, hundred of KINTBURY-EAGLE, county of BERKS, 6 miles (S. E.) from Hungerford; containing 131 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1407 acres, of which 788 are arable, 384 meadow, pasture, and down, 169 wood, and 65 furze, waste, &c. Here is a mansion, built in 1636, by Inigo Jones, from the drawing-room of which is a view of Windsor Castle, 36 miles distant. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 4. 3.; net income, £230; patron, the Rev. John Sloper. The church, which is in the Norman style, and celebrated for its beautiful brick-work, was rebuilt at the expense of William Sloper, Esq., great-grandfather to the present patron, to whom the parish belongs.

WOODHEAD, a chapelry, in the parish of MOTTRAM-IN-LONGDENDALE, union of ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE, hundred of MACCLESFIELD, N. division of the county of CHESTER, 13¼ miles (E. N. E.) from Stockport. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £85; patron, the Bishop of Chester. The chapel is a neat structure. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists.

WOODHORN (St. MARY), a parish, in the union, and E. division of the ward, of MORPETH, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 8 miles (E. N. E.) from Morpeth; containing, with the chapelry of Newbiggin, and the townships of Cresswell, Ellington, Hurst, Linmouth, North Seaton, and Woodhorn-Demesne, 1618 inhabitants, of whom 168 are in the township of Woodhorn. This place anciently formed part of the barony of Hugh de Balliol, and subsequently belonged to the families of de Valence, Denton, Widdrington, and others. The parish is nearly five miles in length from north to south, and about two miles and a half in breadth, and is bounded on the east partly by the sea; the soil is generally fertile, and the grounds about Woodhorn and Woodhorn-Demesne are esteemed the finest grazing land in the county. In the township are 1294 acres. The village, situated on a fertile plain within a mile of the sea, consists of some well-built houses and numerous cottages; and the road from Newbiggin to Morpeth branches off from it in one direction by Bothal and Pegsworth, and in another by Longhirst, forming two lines of streets, of which the latter is much the longer. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £21. 15. 7½.; net income, £650; patron, the Bishop of Durham. The rectory was granted to the priory of Tyne-mouth, and is now the property of the Mercers' Company, London, and the incumbent of Hampstead. The church is a very ancient structure in the Norman style, consisting of a nave, aisles, and chancel, and a tower, on the outside wall of which are the armorial-bearings of the Widdringtons and Ogles, with a male figure in the attitude of prayer. There is a chapel of ease at Newbiggin. The Rev. Dr. Triplet, in 1640, bequeathed a rent-charge of £3, for clothing and apprenticing children; and the Viscountess Bulkeley, in 1826, bequeathed £500, invested in the purchase of £642, three per cent. consols., of which the dividends are appropriated for distribution among the poor at Christmas.

WOODHORN-DEMESNE, a hamlet, in the parish of WOODHORN, union, and E. division of the ward, of MORPETH, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 8 miles (E. N. E.) from Morpeth; containing 15 inhabitants. This property formerly was part of the estates of Lord Widdrington, and was subsequently purchased by the York Building Company of London, on whose failure to complete the contract, it was sold under a decree of chancery, in 1750, to the Cresswell family. The hamlet comprises 303 acres of meadow and pasture land of luxuriant fertility, and the mansion-house is finely situated in grounds tastefully laid out, and commands an extensive view of the sea. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £5. 11. 8., and the impropriate for 5s.

WOODHOUSE, a chapelry, in the parish and union of BARROW-UPON-SOAR, hundred of WEST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, 3 miles (S. W.) from Loughborough; containing, with Alderman-Haw, 1309 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £73; patron, the Vicar of Barrow. A rent-charge of £65 has been awarded, as a commutation for the tithes. The chapel is dedicated to St. Mary. A church has been erected at Woodhouse-Eaves, in Charnwood forest, which was consecrated on the 5th of Sept., 1837, and contains 400 free sittings, the Incorporated Society having granted £350 in aid of the expense. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Thomas Rawlins, in 1691, granted several pieces of land, for the support of a school, for distribution among the poor of this chapelry and that of Quorndon, and for apprenticing children of both places; the estate, at the inclosure of Charnwood forest, in 1829, was enlarged to 72 acres, and now produces about £230 per annum. There is also a bequest of £13 per annum, for apprenticing a boy in London, and another of £5. 10. for the poor.

WOODHOUSE, a township, in the parish of SHILBOTTLE, union of ALNWICK, E. division of COQUETDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Alnwick; containing 23 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £75. 7. 3., of which £75. 4. are payable to the vicar, and 3s. 3d. to the clerk, of the parish.

WOODHOUSE, a hamlet, in the parish of SUTTON-UPON-DERWENT, union of POCKLINGTON, Wilton-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of YORK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (E.) from Sutton; containing 46 inhabitants. It comprises 1069 acres of fertile land, set out in farms, and is the property of the crown: two small rivulets pass on the east and west.

WOODHOUSE-HALL, an extra-parochial liberty, in the union of WORKSOP, Hatfield division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, N. division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Worksop; containing 12 inhabitants, and consisting of 321 acres.

WOODHOUSES, a township, in the parish of MAXFIELD, S. division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, N. division of the county of STAFFORD, 4 miles (N. W. by W.) from Ashbourn; containing 25 inhabitants.

WOODHURST (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of St. IVES, hundred of HURSTINGSTONE, county of HUNTINGDON, 4 miles (N.) from St. Ives; containing 449 inhabitants. The living is united, with that of Old Hurst, to the vicarage of St. Ives: the tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1796. A fund of £10. 5. per annum, the rent of five acres of land, is distributed among the poor.

WOODKIRK, YORK.—See ARDSLEY, WEST.

WOODLAND, a tything, in the parish, union, and hundred of CREDITON, Crediton and N. divisions of DEVON; containing 301 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £200, payable to the Dean and Canons of St. George's chapel, Windsor.

WOODLAND, a chapelry, in the parish of IPPLEPEN, union of NEWTON-ABBOTT, hundred of HAYTOR, Teignbridge and S. divisions of DEVON, 1 mile (E. by S.) from Ashburton; containing 206 inhabitants. It comprises by admeasurement 1600 acres, of which 50 are pasture, 100 woodland, and the remainder arable and water-meadows; the soil is very light. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Parishioners, with a net income of £56; appropriators, the Dean and Canons of Windsor, whose tithes have been commuted for £200. The church, in the later English style, was built in the reign of Henry VIII., and contains 250 sittings, of which 50 are free.

WOODLAND, a township, in the parish of COCKFIELD, union of TEESDALE, S. W. division of DARLINGTON ward, S. division of the county of DURHAM, 6 miles (N. W.) from Staindrop; containing 243 inhabitants. It comprises 2658a. 1r. 27p. of land, of which the soil is generally cold and poor; coal is obtained in the neighbourhood, and a basaltic dyke runs through the township, the stone of which is admirably adapted to the repair of roads. The tithes have been commuted for £83. 14. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WOODLAND, a chapelry, in the parish of KIRKBY-IRELETH, union of ULVERSTONE, hundred of LONSDALE, north of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $8\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Ulverstone; containing, with Heathwaite, 331 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £68; patrons, the Landowners. The chapel was built in 1689, and repaired in 1822.

WOODLAND, a hamlet, in the parish of ISLE-ABBOT'S, union of LANGPORT, hundred of ABDICK and BULSTONE, W. division of SOMERSET; containing 56 inhabitants.

WOODLAND-EYAM, a township, in the parish of EYAM, union of BAKEWELL, hundred of HIGH PEAK, N. division of the county of DERBY; containing 226 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £70.

WOODLEIGH (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of KINGSBRIDGE, hundred of STANBOROUGH, Stanborough and Coleridge, and S. divisions of DEVON, 3 miles (N.) from Kingsbridge; containing 269 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1975 acres, of which 240 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £22. 8. 4.; net income, £392; patron, the Rev. R. Edmonds. The church contains an altar-tomb representing the Resurrection of Our Saviour.

WOODLESFORD, with OULTON, a township, in the parish of ROTHWELL, union of WAKEFIELD, Lower division of the wapentake of AGRIBIGG, W. riding of YORK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Leeds; containing 1789 inhabitants. The village is pleasantly situated on the south bank of the river Aire, and near the North-Midland railway, which has a station here. A great part of the labouring population is employed in extensive and valuable stone-quarries; there are manufactories of paper and earthenware, and about 40 hands are employed at the brewery of Henry Bentley, Esq., established in 1840. The dissenters have a place of worship, and a day and Sunday school in connexion with it.

WOODLEY, with SANDFORD, a township, in the parish and hundred of SONNING, union of WOKINGHAM, county of BERKS, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Reading; containing 823 inhabitants. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £767. There is a Roman Catholic chapel; and a school is supported by subscription.

WOODMANCOTE, a tything, in the parish of NORTH CERNEY, union of WINCHCOMB, hundred of RAPSGATE, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 5 miles (N. by W.) from Cirencester; containing 256 inhabitants.

WOODMANCOTE, a parish, in the union of STEYNING, hundred of TIPNOAK, rape of BRAMBER, W. division of SUSSEX, 6 miles (N. E. by E.) from Steyning; containing 378 inhabitants. The road from London to Brighton, by way of Horsham, runs through the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 1. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £482, and the glebe comprises 18 acres. The church is principally in the early English style.

WOODMANCOTT, a hamlet, in the parish of BISHOP'S-CLEEVE, union of WINCHCOMB, hundred of CLEEVE, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Winchcomb; containing 372 inhabitants.

WOODMANCOTT (St. James), a parish, in the union of BASINGSTOKE, hundred of MAINSBOROUGH, Winchester and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 8 miles (S. W.) from Basingstoke; containing 93 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 1396 acres, of which 889 are arable, 338 woodland, 25 meadow, 117 open downs and furze common, and 18 homesteads; the soil is various, but chiefly a strong clay, and the surface hilly. The living is annexed to the rectory of Brown-Candover: the tithes have been commuted for £168. 10., and the glebe comprises 8 acres. The church is a neat structure; the churchyard was consecrated in 1838, previously to which the parishioners were interred at Andover.

WOODMANCOTT, a tything, in the parish and union of WEST BOURNE, hundred of WESTBOURNE and SINGLETON, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of SUSSEX; containing 94 inhabitants.

WOODMANSEY, with BEVERLEY-PARK, a township, in the parish of ST. JOHN, union, and liberties of the borough, of BEVERLEY, E. riding of YORK, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Beverley; containing 429 inhabitants, of whom 222 are in Woodmansey. The township comprises 2910a. 2r. 3Sp., of which 386 acres are in Woodmansey, and the remainder in Beverley-Park, which extends to the suburbs of Beverley; the soil is various, and the surface well-wooded. In the hamlet of Beverley-Park are two quarries of excellent chalk, of which the best whiting is made, and which is also burnt for lime. The river Hull, which is navigable, passes near the township, and has a commodious landing-place for coal, lime, and gravel; on its banks are some mills, and there are also other large flour-mills in the township. The district of Beverley-Park was anciently part of the demesnes of the archbishops of York, who had a mansion here called the Old Hall, now a farm-house. There is a small chapel subordinate to the minster of Beverley, erected in 1827, upon ground given by George Sumner, Esq., and in which divine service is performed on Sunday afternoon.

WOODMANSTERNE (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of CROYDON, First division of the hundred of WALLINGTON, E. division of SURREY, 5 miles (E. by S.) from Epsom; containing 269 inhabitants. This parish, also called Woodmanstone or Woodmansthorpe, comprises by measurement 1553 acres, of which 1099 are arable, 196 meadow and pasture, 118 woodland, and 91 downs; the surface is elevated, and the scenery richly embellished with wood, and enlivened with several pools of water, one of which, near the church, is named Mere Pond. In the grounds of the Oaks, formerly an inn, but converted into a hunting-seat by the late Gen. Burgoyne, is an old beech-tree, remarkable for its boughs having grown fast to one another. Shortes House, in the parish, is a very ancient building, with curiously-carved wainscotting. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £11. 7. 6., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £301. The church is a small neat edifice.

WOODNESBOROUGH (St. Mary), a parish, in the union and hundred of EASTRY, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, E. division of KENT, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (W. S. W.) from Sandwich; containing 792 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2922 acres, of which 29 are common or waste. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 0. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Rochester: the tithes have been commuted for £350. The church is principally in the decorated English style. On Woodnesborough Hill is a lofty artificial mound, supposed by some to have been either the place where the Saxon idol Woden was worshipped, or the burial-place of Vortimer; whilst others state it to be the Woodnesbeorth of the Saxon Chronicle, and the scene of the battle between Celred and Ina, kings of Mercia and the West Saxons, in 715. A fine gold coin, bearing on one side the figure of an armed warrior, and on the other that of Victory, was found here in 1514.

WOOD-NORTON, a parish, in the union of AYLHAM, hundred of EYNSFORD, E. division of NORFOLK, 7 miles (N. W.) from Reepham; containing 325 inhabitants. The living comprises the united rectories of All Saints and St. Peter, with the rectory of Swanton-Novers annexed, valued in the king's books at £7. 12. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £709; patrons, the Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford. The church of All Saints, rebuilt in 1700, is in the later English style, with a square embattled tower; on the south side of the chancel is a piscina; the font is of Norman character. The church of St. Peter is a ruin. At the inclosure, 20 acres were allotted to the poor.

WOODRISING (St. Nicholas), a parish, in the union of MITFORD and LAUNDITCH, hundred of MITFORD, W. division of NORFOLK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Hingham; containing 129 inhabitants. The manor was formerly the property of the Southwell family, of whom Sir Richard was chancellor to Edward VI., and Sir Robert secretary for Ireland in the reign of Charles II.: it is now the property of John Weyland, Esq., who resides at the Hall, a handsome mansion erected on the site of the old manor-house, and surrounded by a small park. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 18. 4., and in the gift of Mr. Weyland: the tithes have been commuted for £250, and the glebe comprises 17 acres, with a good house, erected in 1839. The church is an ancient structure in the decorated English style, with a tower in ruins, and covered with ivy; there is an altar-tomb, under a canopy, with the effigy of Sir Robert Southwell, in armour.

WOODROW, a tything, in the parish, union, and hundred of MELKSHAM, Melksham and N. divisions of WILTS; containing 429 inhabitants.

WOODSEAVES, a township, in the parish and union of DRAYTON-IN-HALES, Drayton division of the hundred of NORTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP; containing 268 inhabitants.

WOODSETTS, a township, in the parish of ANSTON, union of WORKSOP, S. division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, W. riding of YORK, 4 miles (N. W. by W.) from Worksop; containing 181 inhabitants. This place, which is situated on the confines of the county of Nottingham, comprises 838 acres, including part of Lindrick common; the lands are interspersed with wood, and the scenery is pleasing. A church dedicated to St. George the Martyr, to which has been assigned a district comprising the township of Gilding-Wells, and the extra-parochial district of Waling-Wells, was erected here at an expense of £1000, by subscription, aided by a grant of £150 from the Incorporated Society, and was consecrated on the 24th Sept. 1841, by the Archbishop of York; it is a neat structure, with a campanile turret, and contains 189 sittings, of which 129 are free. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Chancellor of the Cathedral of York, and endowed with the tithes of Gilding-Wells (commuted for £100 per annum) by the joint liberality of the Chancellor, as lessor of the tithe, and of H. G. Knight, Esq., of Firbeck, as the lessee. A school for girls is supported by subscription.

WOODSFIELD, a hamlet, in the parish of POWICK, union of UPTON-UPON-SEVERN, Lower division of the hundred of PERSHORE, Upton and W. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 5½ miles (S. S. W.) from Worcester; containing 40 inhabitants. Here are the remains of a chapel formerly dependent upon the church of Great Malvern.

WOODSFORD, a parish, in the union of DORCHESTER, hundred of WINFRITH, Dorchester division of DORSET, 5½ miles (E.) from Dorchester; containing 158 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the north by the river Frome, comprises about 1700 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 9. 9½., and in the gift of H. C. Sturt, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £250, and the glebe comprises 7 acres. The church is a small structure with a low tower. Upon the river are the remains of a castle built by Guido de Brient, of a quadrangular form, one side of which has been converted into a farm-house, a very lofty building; the principal entrance was on the west, where is still an ancient staircase, and in the southeast corner is another, both pierced with narrow apertures for arrows, or small arms. The offices on the basement story are all vaulted with stone; above is an apartment called the Queen's room, with the vestiges of a chapel, and around the whole are traces of a moat.

WOODSIDE, a township, in the parish of WESTWARD, union of WIGTON, ALLERDALE ward below Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, 2 miles (N. W. by N.) from Temple-Sowerby; containing 415 inhabitants. The rivers Eden and Eamont unite their streams here. The tithes were commuted for land in 1811.

WOODSIDE, a township, in the parish and union of SHIFFNALL, Shiffnall division of the hundred of BRIMSTREE, S. division of SALOP, 3 miles (S. S. E.) from Shiffnall; containing 360 inhabitants.

WOODSIDE-QUARTER, a township, in the parish and union of WIGTON, ward and E. division of CUMBERLAND, 3 miles (E. by N.) from Wigton; containing 745 inhabitants. A school is partly supported by the interest of £3000 raised by subscription.

WOODSIDE-WARD, a township, in the parish of ELSDON, union of ROTHBURY, S. division of COQUETDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 1½ mile (N.) from Elsdon; containing 124 inhabitants. It lies on both sides of the Keenship burn, and contains by measurement 6467 acres, of which about 215 are arable, 41 woodland, and the remainder pasture; much of the scenery is of romantic beauty, and the outline of the hills is very fine. A little north of High Carricks, coal was worked in 1810, in pits about ten fathoms deep, but much interrupted by dykes; limestone, also, crosses the road from High Carricks to Headshope, on the south side of which place it breaks out in grassy knolls. There are still a few peel houses remaining, and until recently other antiquities existed, including a cairn, removed before 1810 from the High Carricks ground.

WOODSTOCK, NEW, a borough and market-town, having separate jurisdiction, and the head of a union, locally within the liberty of the city of Oxford, county of OXFORD, 8 miles (N. N. W.) from Oxford, and 62 (W. N. W.) from London; containing 1412 inhabitants. This place is of Saxon origin, and was called by that people Vudestoc, signifying a woody place. It appears to have been chosen, at an early period, as an abode of royalty, and the manor-house, as it was called, is supposed to have been built upon the site of a Roman villa. Alfred the Great resided here whilst translating Boethius: Ethelred held a council, or parliament here, and made several of the statutes enumerated by Lambard, in his collection of Anglo-Saxon laws; and it was a favourite residence of Henry I., who in a great measure rebuilt the place, surrounded the park with a wall, and stocked it with wild animals. In the reign of Henry II., Woodstock became celebrated as the residence of the Fair Rosamond, whose romantic adventures are so interwoven with the history of that monarch: Henry here received Rhys, Prince of Wales, when he, in 1163, came to do homage. Edmund of Woodstock, the second son of Edward I., was born here in 1130; as were also Edward the Black Prince, and Thomas of Woodstock, sons of Edward III. Henry VII. added considerably to the buildings of the palace, particularly the front and the principal gate-house, which was for some time the place of confinement of Queen

Seal and Arms.

Elizabeth, during the reign of her sister Mary: on her accession to the throne, Woodstock was occasionally selected as her residence, and the town was distinguished by her favours. During the civil war of the 17th century, the palace was besieged and much damaged, the furniture was sold, and the building allotted by Cromwell to three of his partisans, two of whom sold their shares in 1652; the third portion, consisting of the gate-house and some adjoining buildings, was suffered to remain, and, after the Restoration, was converted into a dwelling-house by Lord Lovelace, who resided here for several years; it was, however, finally taken down by Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough, and the only indications of its site are two fine sycamore-trees in Blenheim Park. The manor and honour continued in the crown until the reign of Queen Anne, when it was granted to the celebrated Duke of Marlborough, for whom a splendid mansion was erected, at the expense of the nation, and called Blenheim (which article see), after the scene of one of his victories, as a recompense for his great military and diplomatic services.

The town is very pleasantly situated on an eminence, on the eastern bank of the Glyme, an expansion of which forms the lake in Blenheim Park, and afterwards joining the Evenload in the vicinity, both fall into the Isis; the streets are clean and spacious, and the houses, which are mostly built of stone, are generally large and handsome. The making of gloves is the principal branch of trade, and, although fluctuating, is carried on to a considerable extent. The manufacture of various articles of fine steel has very much decayed since the rise of Birmingham and Sheffield: those made here formerly brought very high prices, from the beauty of the workmanship and the brightness of the polish, and are remarkable from having been generally manufactured of old nails of horse-shoes, formed into bars. Queen Elizabeth, among other privileges, granted a wool-staple, of which there are no remains, and a market to be held on Friday, but the principal market-day is Tuesday. There are fairs on Tuesday after Feb. 2nd, April 5th, Tuesday at Whitsuntide, Aug. 2nd, Oct. 2nd (a great mart for cheese), Tuesday after Nov. 1st, and Dec. 17th. The place, which has long been a borough by prescription, was incorporated in 1453, by Henry VI., whose charter was confirmed and enlarged by succeeding monarchs, the last of whom, Charles II., granted that under which the corporation now acts; the members are in number twenty-five, viz., five aldermen, from among whom a mayor is annually chosen, a high steward, and a recorder, assisted by seventeen common-councilmen, and a town-clerk. The borough, which originally comprised only 45 acres, was always privileged to send two representatives to parliament, though the right was only exercised without interruption from the 13th of Elizabeth to the 2nd of William IV., when it was deprived of one, and the privilege of voting was extended to the £10 householders of an enlarged district, which comprises 21,712 acres: the mayor is returning officer. The corporation, as lords of the manor, hold a court leet annually. The town-hall is a handsome stone building, erected about the year 1766, by the Duke of Marlborough, after a design by Sir William Chambers.

Woodstock, though for all civil purposes a parish, and by far the more populous, is only a CHAPELRY to the rectory of Bladon: a parsonage-house was erected here by Bishop Fell, in which the rector may optionally reside. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, was principally rebuilt in 1785, on the site of a chantry founded by King John. In the original part of the building, which forms the south side of the chapel, is a round-headed doorway of early Norman architecture, composed of red stone, ornamented with chevron work; and in the interior are three massive columns supporting pointed arches, with capitals having various grotesque sculptures of the human countenance. The more modern portion of the structure has been erected in a style no way corresponding with this ancient part, but it has a tower of good proportions. The Particular Baptists and Wesleyans have each a place of worship. The free grammar school was founded and endowed in 1585, by Richard Cornwall, a native of the town, and further endowed in 1616, by Thomas Fletcher, with rent-charges of £12. Eight boys and eight girls are instructed and clothed, under the benefaction of the Rev. Sir Robert Cocks, Bart., formerly rector of Bladon with Woodstock, now producing upwards of £60 per annum; the remainder of the endowment being given as apprentice fees with the boys when leaving the school. Almshouses for six widows were built near the southern entrance of the town, in 1793, by the late Duchess of Marlborough; and there are various bequests for the benefit of the poor, which are distributed amongst them in money, clothing, &c. In the Rolls of the reign of Henry III., mention is made of an almshouse, built near the king's manor, which Tanner thinks may be the same with the hospital of St. Mary the Virgin and St. Mary Magdalene, for which a protection was granted to beg, by patent of the first of Edward III. The union of Woodstock comprises 31 parishes or places, and contains a population of £13,390. Roman coins, especially of Constantine, are occasionally dug up within the limits of the borough; and the Akeman-street-way, an ancient Roman road, passes through the northern part of Blenheim park. Chaucer, the father of English poets, resided, and is said by some to have been born, here. Woodstock gives the title of Viscount to the Duke of Portland.

WOODSTONE (St. AUGUSTINE), a parish, in the union of PETERBOROUGH, hundred of NORMAN-CROSS, county of HUNTINGDON, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (S. W. by W.) from Peterborough; containing 262 inhabitants, and comprising 1027*a. 3r. 15p.* The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 11. 3.; net income, £342; patron, R. J. Tompson, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1809. John and Mary Walsham, in 1723, gave property now producing an income of £47, for the establishment of a school, and other charitable purposes.

WOODTHORPE, a township, in the parish of NORTH WINGFIELD, union of CHESTERFIELD, hundred of SCARSDALE, N. division of the county of DERBY, 4 miles (S.) from Chesterfield; containing 292 inhabitants.

WOODTHORPE, a hamlet, in the parish and union of LOUGHBOROUGH, hundred of WEST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S.) from Loughborough; containing 85 inhabitants.

WOODTHORPE, a hamlet, in the parish of STRUBBY, union of LOUTH, Wold division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN; containing 55 inhabitants.

WOODTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of LODDON and CLAVERING, hundred of LODDON, E. division of NORFOLK, 5 miles (N. W.) from Bungay; containing 567 inhabitants. It comprises 2124*a.* 3*r.* 16*p.*, of which 1583 acres are arable, and 541 meadow and pasture. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the gift of the Rev. A. Suckling: the tithes have been commuted for £615, and the glebe comprises 27 acres, with a house. The church is chiefly in the decorated English style, with a circular tower of earlier date, surmounted by an octagonal turret, and has some handsome monuments to the Suckling family. There are places of worship for Primitive Methodists and Wesleyans.

WOOD-WALTON.—See WALTON, WOOD.

WOODYATES, EAST, a hamlet, in the parish of PENTRIDGE, union of WIMBORNE and CRANBORNE, hundred of CRANBORNE, Wimborne division of DORSET; containing 93 inhabitants.

WOODYATES, WEST, an extra-parochial liberty, in the union of WIMBORNE and CRANBORNE, hundred of WIMBORNE ST. GILES, Wimborne division of DORSET, 5½ miles (N.N.W.) from Cranborne; containing 14 inhabitants. On the neighbouring downs are numerous barrows, also a vast rampart and fosse, termed Grimes-ditch, crossed by the Roman road from Dorchester to Old Sarum.

WOOKEY (ST. MATTHEW), a parish, in the union of WELLS, hundred of WELLS-FORUM, E. division of SOMERSET, 1¼ mile (W.) from Wells; containing, with the tything of Yarley, and part of Wookey-Hole, 1187 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the patronage of the Subdean of Wells (the appropriator), valued in the king's books at £12. 15. 10.: the great tithes have been commuted for £212, and the vicarial for £299. 5.; the glebe comprises 5 acres. In the side of the Mendip hills, about a mile and a half from the village, is a curious cavern termed Wookey-Hole, the approach to which is surrounded by scenery extremely wild and picturesque: the entrance is very narrow, but within are several spacious apartments, one of them resembling the interior of a church, the roof and sides of which are encrusted with concretions of most fantastical form, while on the floor are other large petrifications, formed by the water dropping from above. Beyond it is a smaller cavity, and this leads to a third, the diameter of which is about 120 feet, its roof cylindrical, and its bottom composed of a fine sand, on one side of which runs a very cold and pure stream of water, the primary source of the river Axe.

WOOKEY-HOLE, a tything, partly in the parish of WOOKEY, and partly in the parish of ST. CUTHBERT, without the limits of the city of WELLS, union of WELLS, hundred of WELLS-FORUM, E. division of SOMERSET; containing 132 inhabitants.

WOOL (HOLY ROAD), a parish, in the union of WAREHAM and PURBECK, liberty of BINDON, Wareham division of DORSET, 6 miles (W. by S.) from Wareham; containing 505 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 2100 acres, of which 1700 are arable, meadow, and pasture, and 400 heath; the soil of the cultivated land is fertile. From a copious spring at the head of the parish, issues a stream that flows through the village into the river Frome. A fair for cattle and general traffic is held on the 14th of May. The living is an-nexed to the vicarage of Coombe-Keynes. The church is an ancient structure, partly Norman, and partly in the early English style, with a massive tower; the pulpit hangings, though much decayed, are embellished with portraits of the Twelve Apostles, worked in embroidery with gold and silver thread enriched with beads. Nearly half a mile to the south, are the remains of Bindon Abbey, founded in 1172, by Robert de Newburgh and Matilda his wife, in honour of the Virgin Mary, for monks of the Cistercian order, whose revenue, at the Dissolution, was £229. 2. 1. Of part of the ruins, a building of corresponding character has been erected on the spot, by the proprietor, Joseph Weld, Esq., of Lulworth Castle; the site is beautifully laid out, and is much frequented by parties of pleasure.

WOOLARD, a hamlet, partly in the parish of COMPTON-DANDO, but chiefly in that of PUBLOW, union of CLUTTON, hundred of KEYNSHAM, E. division of SOMERSET; containing 191 inhabitants.

WOOLASCOTT, a township, in the parish of ST. MARY, SHREWSBURY, hundred of PIMHILL, N. division of SALOP; containing 23 inhabitants.

WOOLAVINGTON (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of BRIDGWATER, hundred of WHITLEY, W. division of SOMERSET 4 miles (N. E.) from Bridgwater; containing 448 inhabitants, and comprising by measurement 1735 acres. Stone of good quality is quarried for building, and for the roads; the best is a blue lias, which is much esteemed. A cattle-fair is held on the 18th of October. The living is a vicarage, endowed with a portion of the rectorial tithes, with Puriton annexed, and valued in the king's books at £11. 7. 11.; net income, £352; patrons, the Dean and Canons of Windsor, the appropriators of the remainder of the rectorial tithes. The glebe comprises 36 acres, and there is a good house, built by the present incumbent. The church has a small sepulchral chapel attached. There are places of worship for Wesleyans; and a national school.

WOOLBEDING, a parish, in the union and borough of MIDHURST, hundred of EASEBOURNE, rape of CHICHESTER, W. division of SUSSEX, 1½ mile (N. W.) from Midhurst; containing 311 inhabitants. The parish is intersected by the river Rother, and comprises about 2300 acres, of which 767 are arable, 250 meadow and pasture, 517 woodland, and the remainder waste; the surface is undulated, and the scenery pleasingly varied. Near the conservatory of Woolbeding House is a bronze fountain, removed from the quadrangle at Cowdray; and near it is a remarkable tulip-tree, the trunk of which is eight feet in girth, at a height of three feet from the ground. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 0. 10., and in the patronage of the Hon. Mrs. George Ponsonby: the tithes have been commuted for £280, and the glebe comprises 27 acres. The church is in a very sequestered spot; in the chancel window is some ancient stained glass, from the priory of Mottesfont, in Hampshire.

WOOLBOROUGH (ST. JAMES), a parish, in the union of NEWTON-ABBOTT, hundred of HAYTOR, Teignbridge and S. divisions of DEVON, 5 miles (W. S. W.) from Teignmouth; containing, with the town of Newton-Abbott, 2609 inhabitants. The parish is on the road from London to Plymouth, about half a mile on the south of the river Teign, and comprises by computation 1600 acres: limestone is extensively quarried for building, and burning into lime. The living is a donative; net income, £235; patron and improprator, the Earl of Devon. The church, situated about a mile from Newton-Abbott, has an inscription on the outside of the south aisle bearing date 1516, but the other portions of the structure are considered to be much more ancient; there is some fine screen-work across the nave and aisles, and a monument to the memory of Sir Richard and Lady Lucy Reynell; the chancel underwent great improvement a few years since, and a handsome altar-piece of stone has been erected.—See NEWTON-ABBOTT.

WOOLCOMBE, a tything, in the parish of PORTBURY, union of BEDMINSTER, hundred of PORTBURY, E. division of SOMERSET; containing 15 inhabitants.

WOOLDALE, a township, in the parish of KIRKBURTON, union of HUDDERSFIELD, Upper division of the wapentake of AGRIBIGG, W. riding of YORK, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Huddersfield; containing 4806 inhabitants. This place was anciently called Wolves-dale, from its abounding with those animals. The manufacture of woollen-cloth is carried on extensively. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends and Unitarians. A school was built with the proceeds of a legacy, and by subscription, on a site given by the Duke of Leeds, and a house for the master was erected, also by subscription, in 1821.

WOOLER (St. Mary), a market-town and parish, in the union, and E. division of the ward, of GLENDALE, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $16\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Berwick-upon-Tweed, 18 (N. W.) from Alnwick, 45 (N. N. W.) from Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and 318 (N. N. W.) from London; containing, with the township of Fenton, 1874 inhabitants. This place occupies the eastern declivity of the Cheviot hills; and near it is the village of Humbleton, celebrated for the memorable victory gained by Percy, Earl of Northumberland, in the reign of Henry IV., over a Scottish army of 10,000 men, under the command of Earl Douglas: the engagement occurred on a plain within a mile north-west of the town, where a stone pillar has been erected, commemorative of the event. A great part of the town was destroyed by fire in 1722, since which period it has not made any considerable advances towards improvement. It consists of several streets diverging from the market-place in the centre, and is indifferently paved, and supplied with water from a fountain erected at the public expense; a good trout-stream flows through the lower part of it, and falls into the river Till. The houses are mostly old, and the general appearance of the place is unfavourable; but the situation, though mountainous, is extremely salubrious, and the town was formerly much resorted to by invalids, for whose use many goats were kept. There is a branch of the North of England bank; a public subscription library is well supported, and a mechanics' institute was established in 1827. The market is on Thursday; fairs are held on May 4th and October 17th, for horses, cattle, and sheep; and on the third Tuesday in May a general fair takes place on Weetwood Bank, a mile and a half distant from the town. The lord of the manor holds a court leet and baron within three weeks after Easter.

The LIVING is a vicarage, endowed with a portion of the rectorial tithes, valued in the king's books at £5. 8. $1\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Durham; improprator of the remainder of the rectorial tithes, the Earl of Tankerville. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £404. 16., and the improprator for £54; there are 56 acres of glebe. The church, rebuilt in 1765, on the site of an ancient structure destroyed by fire, is a neat edifice, recently enlarged by the addition of 500 sittings, and occupies an eminence commanding an extensive and richly-varied prospect. There are places of worship for Burghers and Presbyterians; also a Scottish Relief church, and a Roman Catholic chapel. Mrs. Chisholme, many years since, bequeathed the sum of £100, for the instruction of six poor children; but this bequest appears to have been lost through the insolvency of the party in whom it was vested, in the last century. There are national schools, rebuilt in 1839, on a part of the glebe. The Glendale union, of which Wooler is the head, comprises 45 parishes and places, and contains a population of 14,000 persons. On a circular mount near the town are the remains of a tower, apparently of Norman origin. There are also many intrenchments in the vicinity, of which the most remarkable is Humbleton Hugh, circular in form, with a large cairn on the summit; the sides of the hill are formed into terraces, about twenty feet broad, of which there are three successive tiers, which, being filled with soldiers, presented a formidable resistance to any assailing force.

WOOLFARDISWORTHY, a parish, in the union of BIDEFORD, hundred of HARTLAND, Great Torrington and N. divisions of DEVON, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Bideford; containing 988 inhabitants. This parish, which reaches to the sea-coast, comprises about 6000 acres: stone of good quality for building is extensively quarried, and shipped from Bideford to various places. The village, which extends into the adjoining parish, is chiefly inhabited by fishermen, who are also employed in carrying sand from the shore for the use of farmers in dressing the lands; there is also a fishing-hamlet in the parish, situated on the same bay as Clovelly, and where a commodious quay might easily be formed. Two fairs for cattle are annually held. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £91; patron and improprator, William Cole Loggin, Esq., whose tithes have been commuted for £470, out of which £20 are payable to the incumbent, who has about half an acre of glebe, and 16 acres of land, with a glebe-house, recently erected. The church has an enriched Norman doorway and font, and contains a monument to the Cole family. There are places of worship for Primitive Methodists and Wesleyans.

WOOLFARDISWORTHY (Holy Trinity), a parish, in the union of CREDITON, hundred of WITHEBRIDGE, South Molton and N. divisions of DEVON, 6 miles (N. by W.) from Crediton; containing 220 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 19. $4\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £258; patron and incumbent, the Rev. John Hole. Berry Castle, an ancient Roman encampment, is in the parish.

WOOLFERTON, a township, in the parish of RICHARD'S-CASTLE, union of LUDLOW, hundred of MUNSLOW, S. division of SALOP, 3 miles (S. E.) from Ludlow; containing 60 inhabitants. The Stourport canal passes through the township.

WOOLHAMPTON (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of NEWBURY, hundred of THEALE, county of BERKS, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Newbury; containing 491 inhabitants. The parish comprises 684*a*. 17*p*., and the navigable river Kennet flows through it. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 17. 6., and in the patronage of the Rev. Miles L. Halton: the tithes have been commuted for £200, and there are 32 acres of glebe. The Roman Catholics have a chapel.

WOOLHOPE (St. George), a parish, in the union of LEDBURY, hundred of GREYTREE, county of HEREFORD, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Ledbury; containing, with the townships of Buckenhill and Putley, 813 inhabitants, of whom 568 are in Woolhope township. The parish consists of 4129 acres. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 12. 8½.; net income, £326, with 20 acres of glebe, and a good house; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Hereford. A school is endowed with £6 per annum.

WOOLLAND, a parish, in the union of STURMINSTER, hundred of WHITEWAY, Sturminster division of DORSET, 5 miles (S.) from Sturminster-Newton; containing 124 inhabitants, and comprising about 1020 acres. The living is a donative, in the patronage of G. C. Loftus, Esq.; net income, £35. The church was rebuilt in 1745, a little to the westward of the ancient site. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WOOL-LAVINGTON, EAST and WEST, a parish, in the borough and union of MIDHURST, hundred of ROTHERBRIDGE, rape of ARUNDEL, W. division of SUSSEX, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Petworth; containing 418 inhabitants. The parish is pleasantly situated at the base of the northern acclivity of the downs, and comprises 2530*a*. 1*r*. 14*p*., of which 957 acres are arable, 312 meadow and pasture, 380 wood, and 859 common, down, and waste. The downs are here extremely beautiful and picturesque, including the hanging woods in Wool-Lavington Park, and most extensive views over the Weald; the cultivated lands are widely detached, some portions of the parish being nine miles distant from each other. The present mansion in the park was built by the late John Sargent, Esq., the intimate friend of Hayley, the poet, and himself author of several elegant poems. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9, and in the patronage of Mrs. Sargent: the tithes have been commuted for £210, and the glebe comprises 17 acres. The church is a neat structure in the early and later English styles.

WOOLLEY, a tything, in the parish of CHADDLEWORTH, union of WANTAGE, hundred of KINTBURY-EAGLE, county of BERKS, 6 miles (W.) from East Ilsley; containing 61 inhabitants.

WOOLLEY (St. Mary), a parish, in the hundred of LEIGHTONSTONE, union and county of HUNTINGDON, 5 miles (N. E. by N.) from Kimbolton; containing 79 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 9. 2., and in the gift of J. Cockerell, Esq.; the tithes have been commuted for £110, and the glebe contains 2 acres. The church has a western tower, crowned with a handsome cupola.

WOOLLEY, a chapelry, in the parish of ROYSTON, wapentake of STAINCROSS, W. riding of YORK, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Barnsley; containing 418 inhabitants. The chapelry is situated on the road from Wakefield to Barnsley, and comprises 2569*a*. 14*p*., of which 1339 acres are arable, 836 meadow and pasture, 353 woodland, and 40 roads and waste. Coal is found, though not wrought; and there are quarries of good building-stone, in which are curious fossils. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £220; patron, G. Wentworth, Esq. A rent-charge of £370 has been awarded as a commutation for the appropriate tithes, payable to the Archbishop of York. The chapel, dedicated to St. Peter, is an ancient structure, with a tower; the windows are decorated with stained glass, and there are some monuments to the Wentworth family. Sixteen children are instructed for £16. 7. per annum, arising from land bequeathed by Nicholas Burley, and the interest of £140, the amount of various benefactions; and schools are supported by Mrs. Wentworth and Mrs. Robinson.

WOOLLOS, ST., a parish, in the union and division of NEWPORT, hundred of WENTLLOOG, county of MONMOUTH; adjacent to the western side of the town of Newport, and containing, with that place, 13,766 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Bettws annexed, valued in the king's books at £7. 3. 11½., and in the gift of the appropriator, the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol: the great tithes have been commuted for £281, and the vicarial for £200.

WOOLMINSTONE, a tything, in the union of CHARD, hundred of CREWKERNE, W. division of SOMERSET; containing 71 inhabitants.

WOOLPIT (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of STOW, hundred of THEDWASTRY, W. division of SUFFOLK, 6 miles (N. W. by W.) from Stow-Market; containing 942 inhabitants. This place is situated on the road from Ipswich to Bury St. Edmund's, and was formerly a market-town. The parish, which comprises 1898*a*. 1*r*. 17*p*., is celebrated for a remarkably fine vein of brick-earth, and the white bricks made here are in great estimation. One of the largest horse-fairs in England is held here, on September 16th, and a large fair for bullocks on the 18th and 19th. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 18. 9., and in the patronage of Mrs. L. Flood Page; net income, £350. The church is partly in the decorated and partly in the later English style, with a tower surmounted by a light and graceful spire, and has a very beautiful porch; the chancel window is embellished with stained glass, inserted by the late rector, the Rev. Spencer Cobbold. There are places of worship for Primitive Methodists and Plymouth Brethren. An image of the Virgin Mary was much visited here before the Reformation, and a well called Our Lady's Well is still held in great repute for its medicinal properties.

WOOLS, a tything, in the parish of ROMSEY-EXTRA, union of ROMSEY, hundred of KING'S-SOMBORN, Romsey and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON; containing 155 inhabitants.

WOOLSCOTT, a hamlet, in the parish of GRAND-BOROUGH, union of RUGBY, Southam division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, S. division of the county of WARWICK; containing 171 inhabitants.

WOOLSINGTON, a township, in the parish of DINNINGTON, union, and W. division of CASTLE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Newcastle; containing 74 inhabitants, and comprising about 636 acres. The lands anciently belonged to Tynemouth priory, and in the reign of Elizabeth were possessed by the Jennison family. This township, lately in the parish of Newburn, and five others taken from the parish of Ponteland, have been formed by act of parliament into the parish of Dinnington, which see.

WOOLSTANWOOD, a township, in the parish, union, and hundred of NANTWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Nantwich; containing 64 inhabitants. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £37.

WOOLSTASTON, a parish, in the union of CHURCH-STRETTON, hundred of CONDOVER, S. division of SALOP, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Church-Stretton; containing 84 inhabitants. It comprises about 800 acres; the scenery is wild, and in some parts romantically picturesque. The living is a rectory, in the gift of W. Whitmore, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £143, and the glebe comprises 7 acres. The church is a plain ancient structure. On an eminence called Castle Hill, are some remains of an entrenchment.

WOOLSTHORPE (St. JAMES), a parish, in the union of GRANTHAM, wapentake of WINNIBRIGGS and THREE, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Grantham; containing 674 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 1920 acres, of which 845 are arable, 915 meadow and pasture, and 150 woodland; the soil is generally clay, alternated with red loam. The small river Devon, and the Nottingham and Grantham canal, pass through the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 2. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £191; patron, the Duke of Rutland. The church is a small edifice, erected on the site of an ancient chapel, about the close of the last century; the tower of the old church, said to have been destroyed in the parliamentary war, is still remaining in the churchyard, situated about a quarter of a mile distant from the present church.

WOOLSTHORPE, a hamlet, in the parish of COLSTERWORTH, union and soke of GRANTHAM, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN; containing 266 inhabitants.

WOOLSTON, a hamlet, in the parish of NORTH CADBURY, union of WINCANTON, hundred of CATSASH, E. division of the county of SOMERSET, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.) from Castle-Cary; containing 110 inhabitants.

WOOLSTONE (St. MARTIN), a parish, in the union of TEWKESBURY, forming a detached portion of the Lower division of the hundred of DEERHURST, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 5 miles (W. N. W.) from Winchcomb; containing 78 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 787 acres, and contains some quarries of stone fit for the roads: the village is pleasantly situated on the acclivity of a hill. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the Earl of Coventry: the tithes have been commuted for £153, and the glebe comprises 32 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The church was rebuilt in 1499.

WOOLSTONE, with MARTINSCROFT, a township, in the parish and union of WARRINGTON, hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Warrington; containing 548 inhabitants. The township comprises 1234 acres, of which 313 are common or waste land. There is a Roman Catholic chapel.

WOOLSTONE, a tything, in the parish of St. MARY, SOUTHAMPTON, union of SOUTH STONEHAM, hundred of MAINSBRIDGE, Southampton and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. E. by E.) from Southampton; containing 77 inhabitants.

WOOLSTONE, GREAT (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of NEWPORT-PAGNELL, hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.) from Newport-Pagnell; containing 94 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the east by a branch of the river Ouse, and comprises about 500 acres: the village is pleasantly situated on the bank of the river, and the inhabitants are chiefly employed in the making of lace. The Grand Junction canal passes through the parish. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 16. 1.; net income, £157; patron, J. C. Neild, Esq. The church, a handsome edifice in the later English style, was built in 1832, at the expense of T. S. I. Baily, Esq., of Shenley House, the former structure having fallen into decay; it forms an interesting feature in the view from the neighbourhood.

WOOLSTONE, LITTLE (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of NEWPORT-PAGNELL, hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, 3 miles (S.) from Newport-Pagnell; containing 115 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the east by a branch of the river Ouse, and intersected by the Grand Junction canal, comprises about 600 acres. The inhabitants are partly employed in the making of lace. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 6. 1., and in the patronage of the Crown, with a net income of £102: the glebe comprises 14 acres, with a house. The church, which had become dilapidated, has been thoroughly repaired. There is a small portion of land, bequeathed by a former rector, the rent of which is appropriated to the apprenticing of a boy yearly.

WOOLSTROP, a hamlet, in the parish of QUEDGLELEY, Middle division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S-BARTON, union, and E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 5 miles (S. W. by W.) from Gloucester; containing 46 inhabitants.

WOOLTON, LITTLE, a township, in the parish of CHILDWALL, union of PRESCOT, hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Prescott; containing 1018 inhabitants.

WOOLTON, MUCH, a chapelry, in the parish of CHILDWALL, union of PRESCOT, hundred of WEST DERBY, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Prescott; containing 2216 inhabitants. The chapel, a handsome structure in the Grecian style, was erected by subscription in 1826, and has recently been enlarged. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £170; patron, the Vicar of Childwall. The tithes of this place, with those of Kingswall, have been commuted for £180. 5., of which £145 are payable to the Bishop of Chester, and £35. 5. to the vicar. There is a Roman Catholic chapel.

WOOLVERCOTT (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of WOODSTOCK, hundred of WOOTTON, county of OXFORD, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Oxford; containing 470 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £80; patrons and impropiators, the Warden and Fellows of Merton College, Oxford. The church, situated on the bank of the Isis, contains, in a sepulchral chapel on the north side, a stately monument to the family of Walter, of whom David was high sheriff of the county, and commanded a regiment of horse under Charles I.; in the parliamentary war. A Benedictine abbey, in honour of the Virgin Mary and St. John the Baptist, was founded in the hamlet of Godstow, in 1138, by a pious lady called Editha, and at the Dissolution had a revenue of £319. 18. 8. Henry II. was a great benefactor to it, and within its walls Fair Rosamond was interred.

WOOLVERSTONE (St. MICHAEL), a parish, in the union and hundred of SAMFORD, E. division of SUFFOLK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Ipswich; containing 246 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the east by the navigable river Orwell, and comprises 951*a*. 2*r*. 30*p*. The Hall, the seat of Archdeacon Berners, is a spacious and elegant mansion, delightfully situated in an ample park, on the bank of the river. The living is a discharged rectory, consolidated with the rectory of Erwarton, and valued in the king's books at £5. 8. 9.: the tithes have been commuted for £230, and the glebe consists of 30 acres. The church, which is in the park, has been recently restored and beautified.

WOOLVERTON (St. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union and hundred of FROME, E. division of SOMERSET, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Frome; containing 158 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the river Frome, comprises about 700 acres; the soil is thin and light, but in the meadows on the banks of the river of richer quality; the surface has a gentle ascent from the stream towards the west, and the higher grounds command some pleasing views. The living is a discharged rectory, consolidated with that of Road, and valued in the king's books at £7. 1. 3.

WOOLWICH (St. MARY MAGDALENE), a market-town and parish, in the union of GREENWICH, hundred of BLACKHEATH, lathe of SUTTON-AT-HONE, W. division of KENT, 8 miles (E. by S.) from London; containing 25,875 inhabitants. This place, originally a small fishing-town, unnoticed by any of the earlier Kentish historians, owes its present importance, among other causes, to its situation on the river Thames, which in this part is nearly three-quarters of a mile broad, and of sufficient depth, at the lowest state of the tide, for ships of the largest burthen. In the reign of Henry VII., a ship of war of 1000 tons was built here, which that monarch named the "Harry Grace de Dieu;" but it does not appear that any regular establishment for ship-building was formed previously to the time of Henry VIII., who constructed a royal dock-yard here, which was enlarged by Queen Elizabeth, and has continued progressively to increase in every succeeding reign. The "Sovereign of the Seas," the largest ship that had ever been built in England, was launched from this yard in the reign of Charles I.: this ship, of 1637 tons' burthen, carried 176 guns, and was richly ornamented with carving and gilding; from which circumstance, combined with the destructive efficacy of its heavy ordnance in the war with the Dutch, it obtained from that people the appellation of the "Golden Devil." In the reign of George I., the cannon for the board of ordnance was cast in a foundry situated in Moorfields, which having been destroyed by an explosion, occasioned by dampness in the moulds at the time of pouring in the liquid metal, the establishment was removed to Wool-wich, and placed under the superintendence of Mr. Andrew Schalch, a native of Schaffhausen, in Switzerland, who, travelling for improvement, visited the foundry in Moorfields at the time when preparations were in progress for casting several pieces of ordnance on the day following, in the presence of many of the nobility, general officers, and a large concourse of people: Mr. Schalch, who had obtained permission to inspect the process, minutely examined the preparations, and instantly perceiving the improper state of the moulds; warned the surveyor-general of the ordnance, and the superintendent of the foundries, of the lurking danger; and they, sensible of the justness and importance of his apprehensions, retired with their friends and all whom they could persuade to accompany them, in time to escape the effect of the explosion, by which several lives were lost, and many of the workmen dreadfully burnt and mangled. The board of ordnance, subsequently finding this gentleman duly qualified, authorised him to choose a commodious situation within twelve miles of the metropolis, for the erection of a new foundry; and, after having visited several places, he selected the Warren at Woolwich for that purpose. The first specimens of ordnance cast under his superintendence being highly approved of, he was appointed master-founder, which office he held for nearly sixty years, with so much skill and attention that, during this long period, not a single accident occurred. This circumstance may be considered the origin of the present arsenal, the establishment of which, with the augmentation of the artillery, whose head-quarters were fixed here, the institution of the Royal Military Academy, and various other foundations, has raised the town to a degree of importance, as a grand naval and military depôt, without a parallel in any empire of the world.

The town is situated on elevated ground rising gradually from the south bank of the Thames, on the opposite side of which, in the county of Essex, is a detached part of the parish; it consists of one main street, extending nearly a mile parallel with the river, from which numerous other streets branch off in various directions, and is partly included in the parish of Plumstead. The houses in that part of it which may be considered the principal thoroughfare are of ancient appearance, occasionally interspersed with substantial and well-built dwellings; but the other streets consist of modern houses, principally erected for the accommodation of the artificers and labourers employed in the dock-yard, arsenal, and other public works. The upper part of the town, towards the common and the Charlton road, is elevated and pleasant, and contains several ranges of handsome modern houses: the environs abound with rich woodland scenery, agreeably diversified with the windings of the Thames, sometimes seen in pleasing combination, and at others in striking contrast. The town is partially paved under the superintendence of commissioners annually chosen under the provisions of an act of parliament passed in the 47th of George III.; it is lighted with gas by a company established by act of parliament, and amply supplied with water from the works of the Kent Water Company.

The public buildings are all on a scale of vast extent, and most of them in a style of magnificence corresponding with the importance of the purposes to which they are applied. The DOCK-YARD commences near the village of New Charlton on the west, and stretches nearly a mile along the bank of the river to the east; the breadth varies from one to two furlongs; the principal entrance is through a stone portal, of which the piers are ornamented with anchors sculptured in stone. On the left hand, within the walls, is a house for a commissioner, and on the right are the houses belonging to the principal officers of the yard. Beyond these is the Smithery, a spacious and lofty building, in which are, a steam-engine of 20-horse power, which works two large lift-hammers, weighing nearly four tons each, and one of 14-horse power, working three tilt-hammers, of less weight: there is another steam-engine, of 14-horse power, for blowing the fires throughout the smithery, and there are several blast-furnaces for converting scrap iron into pigs, and a machine for rolling iron. Knees, keelsons, breast-pieces, and all other iron-work connected with ship-building, are manufactured here, and also anchors of the largest size, great numbers of which are kept in readiness for supplying the royal navy. There are two dry docks, one of which is double, for the repairing of vessels; also several slips, in which ships of war of the largest dimensions are built, under lofty sheds lighted from the roof. An extensive building was recently erected as an engineering foundry, and for the manufacture of steam-engine boilers and the requisite machinery for the steam-vessels, now built here, some of which are of very great tonnage. A capacious basin, 400 feet long, and 290 feet in mean breadth, was excavated some years since, capable of receiving ships of the first class, the entrance into which from the river is by a caisson of larger dimensions; the embankment is secured by strong sloping walls of brick, coped with massive blocks of stone. A new graving dock was opened on July 17th, 1843; the basin is of solid granite, 300 feet in length at the top of the water, and 245 at the bottom, and 80 feet wide above, the width gradually diminishing, like the length, as the basin deepens; it is filled by the river tide, or by a steam-engine situated a few hundred yards from the basin. Many difficulties were encountered during the progress of the work, which occupied more than seven years, and was completed at a cost of £80,000, exclusively of the steam-engine and other expenses defrayed subsequently to the opening; and on the whole, the undertaking is one which reflects great credit on the engineer, Mr. Walker, and will prove eminently beneficial to the public service. The line of wharfage is very extensive and of proportionate breadth: there are a mast-pond, a boat-pond, and several mast and boat houses, also ranges of timber-sheds, storehouses of every kind upon the largest scale, a mould-loft, and every requisite arrangement for the purposes of the establishment. Many fine first and second rate ships, and others of smaller dimensions, of which there are always several upon the stocks, have been built here. In the eastern part of the town was, until recently, the rope-yard, a range of building, three stories high, and about 1080 feet in length, in which ropes of various sizes, cordage for rigging the ships, and cables, were made; but this establishment has been removed from Woolwich, and its site is now covered with houses forming Beresford-street.

To the east of the site of the rope-yard is the ROYAL ARSENAL, under the controul of the master-general and the honourable board of ordnance: this magnificent establishment comprises within the boundary walls more than 100 acres, and, including the canal, 142, the greater part of which is in the adjoining parish of Plumstead. The principal entrance is through a spacious and lofty central gateway for carriages, with smaller entrances on each side; the inner piers are ornamented with small piles of shot, and the outer piers, which are loftier, are surmounted by mortars and piles of shells. Nearly opposite the entrance is a range of handsome houses, appropriated to the commandant of the garrison, the field-officers of the royal artillery, and the principal officers attached to some of the departments; the chief of which are, the inspector of artillery's department, the royal carriage department, the royal engineers' department, the storekeeper's department, superintendent of shipping, and the royal laboratory. In addition to these are immense store-houses, forming a grand national depôt of warlike stores, of every description, for the naval and military departments of the service. On the right hand of the entrance is a range of buildings used, till within the last few years, as an academy for part of the gentlemen cadet company, in connexion with the Royal Military Academy, but now occupied partly as store-rooms and partly as dwelling-houses. On the left hand is a handsome guard-house, with a portico of four columns of Portland stone, beyond which is the royal Brass-foundry, erected by Vanbrugh, a spacious and lofty building of red brick, ornamented with stone and roofed with slate, which is perforated for ventilation: over the entrance are the royal arms, carved in stone, above which is a neat cupola. It contains three large furnaces for casting brass ordnance only, the largest of which will melt eighteen tons of metal at one time: to avoid all danger of explosion, the moulds are heated to a considerable degree before the metal is allowed to run into them. To the east of the foundry are appropriate workshops for boring and engraving the cannon. East of these are the workshops of the Carriage department, for the construction and manufacture of gun-carriages for naval and land service, and of all carts, ammunition-waggons, and other carriages used in the ordnance department; in these shops are steam-engines applied to the working of circular and other saws for converting timber, and machinery of ingenious construction for planing wood, and for turning wood and metal. In a line with this range is the Engineer department, under the direction of which are the erection and repair of all buildings belonging to the board of ordnance within a limited distance of Woolwich. To the north-west of the foundry is the Laboratory, in which are made up blank and ball cartridges for small arms, cartridges for cannon of all descriptions, grape and case shot, and all combustible articles; a variety of other important duties relating to the naval and military service are performed, and a powerful hydraulic press has been recently introduced for making leaden bullets by pressure, instead of casting them as formerly.

A line of wharfage, with a commodious quay, accessible to ships of large burthen, extends for many hundred yards along the bank of the Thames, on which is also a spacious and magnificent range of STORE-HOUSES, occupying three sides of a quadrangle, the area of which is filled with vast quantities of shot and shell of every size, in quadrangular and pyramidal piles, and duly numbered. The buildings are of light brick, with quoins, cornices, pilasters, and pediments of stone, and handsomely embellished with appropriate ornaments; the central range, comprising three stories, is connected with the wings, which are two stories high, by arched portals of stone forming the entrances into the quadrangle, and surmounted with balustraded corridors, communicating with the principal stories of each range. In the basement story of the main range are deposited general stores for the naval service; in the second are the harness and other equipments for the royal horse-artillery; and in the upper story, stores of different descriptions. The east wing is appropriated to the reception of stores for garrison and field services, with a large assortment of nails and other necessaries; and the west contains the stores and various implements used by the sappers and miners, and those for making intrenchments and constructing fortifications, among which are sandbags, axes, shovels, spades, barrows, grates for heating shot, and numerous other articles, and an extensive collection of samples of materials, and patterns of implements, with which the several articles furnished to the Board of Ordnance are compared, before they are received into the depôt. On the ground-floors of these store-rooms are iron tram-roads, upon which carriages constructed for the purpose, once put in motion, will run, when heavily loaded, from one extremity to the other, for the conveyance of stores to the wharf. To the east and west of the principal buildings are smaller quadrangular ranges of store-houses, of one and two stories in height: in both of these, the ranges parallel with the river are of one story, and are appropriated as repositories for carriages. In the lower story of the eastern range are stores of oil and cement, and in the upper, a general repository of stores of various kinds; the lower story of the western range is for the reception of carriages, and the upper is the depôt of clothing, for the royal artillery and for the sappers and miners; and in the centre of each of these smaller quadrangles are painters' shops. There are also warehouses in different parts of the inclosure. To the south of the principal quadrangle are immense quantities of iron ordnance of various calibre, placed on iron skidding, and ranged in double files, extending many hundred yards in length, and, with small intervals between the rows, spreading over several acres of ground: large quantities of iron carriages for guns, and beds for mortars, are placed at the extremity and around the space occupied by the ordnance, and numerous mortars of the largest calibre are disposed in various parts of the ground.

The arsenal is bounded on the south-east by a canal, 35 feet broad, on the banks of which are wooden buildings for the manufacture of the Congreve rockets, under the superintendence of the officers of the royal laboratory; and towards the south-eastern extremity of the boundary wall is pleasantly situated, on the road to Plumstead, the house appropriated to the residence of the storekeeper and paymaster. A little to the west is a saw-mill, worked by a steam-engine of 20-horse power, for sawing trees and rough timber into planks of any required thickness, to which the saws, fixed in frames and worked perpendicularly with great efficacy, can be adjusted at pleasure; there are also circular and other saws, with machinery of a very ingenious description, for turning and other purposes, all under the direction of the officers belonging to the royal carriage department. At a short distance from the royal arsenal, on the road to Woolwich common, are the Barracks for the sappers and miners, a substantial and commodious range, capable of receiving from 250 to 270 men. Adjoining these is the grand Depôt of field train artillery, consisting of a central building appropriated as offices for the director-general of the field train, and other officers of the department, and five spacious sheds, averaging each 300 feet in length, in which are deposited, in double files, an immense number of guns, mounted on field carriages, and supplied with a due proportion of stores and ammunition, in readiness at a minute's notice for immediate service. To the south of the depôt is the Ordnance hospital, a handsome building, containing apartments for a resident surgeon and apothecary, and other officers, and for the servants of the establishment, and wards for the reception of 700 patients, a medical library, and other requisite offices; it is under the superintendence of the director-general and medical staff of the garrison, from which all the ordnance medical establishments abroad are supplied.

The BARRACKS for the royal FOOT and HORSE ARTILLERY form a spacious and splendid pile of building, of which the chief front, facing the common, is 340 yards in length. The main entrance is through a central portal of three arches, divided by lofty columns of the Doric order, supporting pedestals surmounted with military trophies; and above the central arch are the royal arms, finely sculptured in stone. The building, which is of light brick, ornamented with Portland stone, consists of six principal ranges, connected by four lower buildings, in front of which are colonnades of the Doric order, surmounted by balustrades: on the second range, on the east side of the entrance, is a handsome cupola, in which is a clock; and on the corresponding building on the west side, is a similar cupola, with a wind-dial. The chapel, which is neatly fitted up, contains 1000 sittings, and is regularly opened for divine service; the library and reading-room are well supplied with works of general literature and periodical publications. The mess-room is a splendid apartment, 60 feet in length, 50 feet wide, and of proportionate height, and has at one end a circular recess, in which is a music gallery, and at the other, a handsome range of windows looking upon the common: from the ceiling, which is ornamented with groining above the cornice, three cut-glass chandeliers are suspended, and the whole arrangement is in the style of an elegant assembly-room. Attached to it is a suite of apartments, comprising a drawing-room of appropriate character, with retiring and ante rooms. In this suite of rooms the officers of the garrison give frequent balls to the gentry of the vicinity; and, in 1830, they had the honour of entertaining King William IV. and Queen Adelaide, who accompanied His Majesty on his visit to review the royal artillery. The principal entrance forms an avenue, 220 yards in length, and terminates with a handsome arched portal, dividing the buildings into two spacious quadrangles, round which are the stabling and barracks for the horse-artillery; and at the extremity of the east quadrangle is a riding-school of elegant design, near which is a large brick building used as a racket-court by the officers of the garrison. The whole establishment is arranged for the accommodation of from 3000 to 4000 men.

The Parade, in front of the barracks, is about 60 yards in breadth, adjoining the common, which, in this part, is a fine level lawn, appropriated for the exercise of the foot-artillery. In the centre of the Parade are ranged several beautiful pieces of artillery, mounted on carriages of bronze, richly chased and ornamented. Among these is a very large piece of ordnance taken at the siege of Bhurtpoor, in the East Indies, and presented by the captors to the King of England; it is mounted on a splendid carriage of bronze. The breech, which is of unusually large proportion, rests upon the shoulders of a lion couchant, beautifully executed. One side of the carriage is ornamented with a view of the citadel of Bhurtpoor in a medallion, and the other bears an inscription commemorative of its capture; the wheels are solid, with a face of Apollo, or the sun, forming the nave, and the beams of the sun the radii. The more remote part of the common is appropriated to the exercise of the horse-artillery. At a short distance to the north of the artillery barracks are those for the Woolwich division of marines, a plain and irregular building, with accommodation for about 450 men, adjoining which is an hospital for seamen and marines. Adjoining the field to the west of the artillery barracks is the REPOSITORY, for the exercise and general instruction of all persons belonging to the artillery, occupying an extensive piece of ground, tastefully laid out in parterres and walks leading to the several buildings. Nearly opposite to the entrance are the modelling-rooms for the use of the officers and men, in which are models, and drawings of projected improvements in the construction of gun-carriages and implements of war, and in which various mechanical experiments are performed for that purpose. In a shed adjoining them are preserved the funeral car of Napoleon, brought from St. Helena; a travelling oven used by the French army in their campaigns under Buonaparte, and some other curiosities; and in various parts of the ground are numerous pieces of brass ordnance, of different kinds, taken from the enemy, among which are, two captured at the battle of Malplaquet, with three barrels each, and several others of very singular construction. The ground, which is in many places unequal and precipitous, rising abruptly from several pieces of water, by which it is intersected, is made available for the practice of the artillery corps in the construction of bridges of pontoons, for transporting artillery across rivers, in the managing of gun-boats, and in the more difficult and arduous exercises of their duty. Heavy pieces of artillery are manœuvred under every possible disadvantage of situation, lowered down deep declivities, and raised up precipitous heights, by a variety of contrivances; and in some parts of the ground are intrenchments of earth and batteries of turf, which are thrown up by the students for their improvement in the art of fortification. On the north of the entrance is the rotunda, or model-room, a spacious circular apartment, 115 feet in diameter, originally erected in the gardens of Carlton Palace by George IV., when Prince Regent, for the entertainment of the allied sovereigns, on their visit to this country after the peace of 1814, and presented by that monarch to the garrison. It contains a variety of ancient armour and military trophies, a vast number of beautiful and well-finished models of machinery, with apparatus for military and naval warfare, a most interesting collection of models of all the royal dock-yards, the lines and fortifications of Portsmouth, the breakwater at Plymouth, &c. &c. &c.

On the south-west part of the common is the Veterinary hospital for the horse-artillery, under the controul of the commandant, and the immediate superintendance of a veterinary surgeon and assistants; this building, which is well adapted to its use, is situated in the parish of Charlton, and between it and the repository are 50 cottages, neatly built of brick, containing two apartments each, for the accommodation of 100 married soldiers. At the south-eastern extremity of the common, opposite to the artillery barracks, is the Royal Military Academy, established in 1741, originally for the instruction of officers and men belonging to the military department of the ordnance, but now appropriated exclusively to gentlemen cadets, the number of whom varies from 100 to 140. The buildings form a spacious pile, partly in the early English, and partly in the Elizabethan, style, and include a central range with angular octagonal towers crowned with domes; containing on the basement story the entrance-hall and schoolrooms, and, in a central situation between them, an apartment originally intended for the inspector, but used only as a receptacle for stores, and as a place from which hot air is distributed for warming the building: above these is the grand hall, in which the public examinations are held. The centre is connected, by corridors, with two wings in the Elizabethan style, with turrets at the angles, and containing the apartments for the residence of the cadets: behind the central range is the refectory, a spacious hall with a lofty timber-framed roof, lighted by windows of appropriate character, adjoining which are the kitchen and domestic offices. On the east side of the common are the houses of the professors, and some handsome ranges of building, including the quarters of the field-officers of the garrison, and several private residences.

There is no TRADE except what is requisite for the supply of the inhabitants, nor any particular branch of manufacture carried on. The intercourse with the metropolis is great, and is facilitated by steam-boats on the river, by carriages direct, and by vans which run to Greenwich, whence the distance is traversed in the course of about ten minutes by the railway. Hulks are moored off Woolwich, for the reception of convicts whose sentence of transportation is commuted for hard labour at home, and who are employed in the dock-yard, arsenal, and public works. The market is on Friday; and, under the provisions of the local act before mentioned, markets are also held on Wednesday and Saturday. By the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, Woolwich was incorporated within the limits of the new borough of Greenwich. The town is within the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, who hold their sittings every Monday and Friday at the King's Arms hotel; and a petty-session for the division takes place at the Green Man, at Blackheath, on the first Thursday in every month. The court of requests for the hundred of Blackheath, and other places in the county of Kent, is held at the Crown and Anchor tavern, every alternate Friday, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5. The LIVING is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 12. 6.; net income, £740; patron, the Bishop of Rochester. The church was rebuilt by act of parliament passed in the 5th of George II., at an expense of £6500, towards defraying which £3000 were appropriated from the grant of Queen Anne for building fifty new churches, and the remainder raised by contributions of the inhabitants. It is situated on an eminence overlooking the dock-yard and the river, and is a neat building of brick with a square tower, ornamented with copings and cornices of stone; the interior, in which several standards taken from the enemy are deposited, is lofty and well arranged, and the galleries are supported on Ionic columns of good proportion. In the churchyard are numerous monuments to officers of the royal artillery, among which is one to the memory of Lieutenant-General Williamson, whose wife was lineally descended from Robert II., King of Scotland. The Ordnance chapel, on the road to Plumstead, a plain commodious building, and the chapel in the barracks, are additional episcopal edifices, to which chaplains are appointed by the Board of Ordnance. A chapel of ease has been erected on the site of the late rope-yard; and near the entrance of the Arsenal is a proprietary chapel, erected by subscription in 1838, in the Grecian style, with a handsome Ionic portico of six columns supporting a triangular pediment. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Wesleyans, Welsh Methodists, and Arminian Bible Christians; also a Scottish church, and a Roman Catholic chapel. Mrs. Mary Wiseman, in 1758, bequeathed £1000 South Sea annuities, for educating and clothing orphan sons of shipwrights of the dock-yard, and for apprenticing them to the same business: the property, by accumulated savings, now produces £86 per annum. Mrs. Withers, in 1750, bequeathed £600 Old South Sea annuities, of which £100 were to be laid out in building a schoolroom, with an apartment for a mistress, who was to receive the dividends on the remainder, for instructing 30 girls maintained in the workhouse; and she gave the further sum of £600, in the same funds, to augment the salary of the mistress, on condition of her teaching as many children, nominated by the rector, as would make up the number to 30, when so many might not be at any time in the workhouse. An almshouse for five aged widows was founded about the year 1560, by Sir Martin Bowes, who endowed it with a portion of the produce of lands and tenements vested for charitable uses in the Company of Goldsmiths, London, by whom the almshouses were rebuilt in 1771; and there are several other bequests for charitable purposes.

WOOPERION, a township, in the parish of EGLINGHAM, union of GLENDALE, N. division of COQUETDALE ward and of NORTHUMBERLAND, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Wooler; containing 77 inhabitants. It is situated a little to the west of the road between Wooler and Morpeth, and is a small village for labourers, which was much improved some years since, when the old thatched cottages disappeared, and were replaced by neater buildings, covered with blue slate. The township comprises about 925 acres, of which 50 are pasture, 20 woodland, and the remainder arable, mostly turnip soil, the whole the property of W. Burdon, Esq., of Hartford. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £109. 11., and the vicarial for £57. 9.

WOORE, a chapelry, in the parish of MUCKLESTON, union of DRAYTON, Drayton division of the hundred of NORTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP, 7 miles (N. N. E.) from Drayton; containing 372 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £50. The chapel, dedicated to St. Leonard, and to which a district has been assigned, is a handsome structure in the Grecian style, erected in 1830, and contains 600 sittings. There is a national school; and about 30 children are taught in a Sunday school, for an annuity of £10, the bequest of William Elkins in 1593, to which has been added one of £5, left by Randolph Woolley in 1615.

WOOTHORPE, a hamlet, in the parish of St. MARTIN, STAMFORD-BARON, union of STAMFORD, soke of PETERBOROUGH, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 6 miles (N. W. by N.) from Wansford; containing 68 inhabitants. A small Benedictine nunnery dedicated to St. Mary, existed here in the time of Henry I., and was united in the reign of Edward III. to the convent of Our Lady St. Mary and St. Michael, at Stamford-Baron.

WOOTTON (St. MARY), a parish, in the hundred of REDBORNESTOKE, union and county of BEDFORD, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Bedford; containing 1122 inhabitants. It comprises about 3400 acres, of which the soil is chiefly a strong clay, well adapted for wheat, and the surface varied, but in no part attaining to any considerable elevation. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and has a net income of £236; the patronage and impropriation belong to Lady Payne. The church contains numerous monuments to the Monoux family. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WOOTTON (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of ABINGDON, hundred of HORMER, county of BERKS, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Abingdon; containing 344 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 1400 acres, of which 700 are arable, 640 meadow and pasture, and 60 woodland. It was formerly a chapelry in the parish of Cumner, but was separated early in the last century. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to that of South Hinksey. Jane Mayo, in 1747, bequeathed to the incumbent and wardens, in trust for the poor, a close called the Farm, or Church-close, the proceeds to be distributed yearly at Christmas.

WOOTTON, a hamlet, in the parish of St. MARY-DE-LODE, GLOUCESTER, Upper division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S-BARTON, union, and E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, $\frac{2}{3}$ of a mile (E. by S.) from Gloucester; containing, with Wootton-Ville, extra-parochial, 1001 inhabitants, and comprising about 60 acres. The tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1796.

WOOTTON (St. MARTIN), a parish, in the union of DOVOR, hundred of KINGHAMFORD, lath of St. AUGUSTINE, E. division of KENT, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Canterbury; containing 157 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from London to Dovor, and comprises by measurement 999 acres; the surface is finely varied, and the scenery embellished with wood. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 10. $2\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the Representatives of Sir J. W. H. Brydges, Knt.: the tithes have been commuted for £260, and the glebe comprises 16 acres, with a house. The church is in the early English style. Sir Samuel Egerton Brydges, Bart., who died in 1837, was a native of the place.

WOOTTON (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of GLANDFORD-BRIGG, N. division of the wapentake of YARBOROUGH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 5 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Barton-upon-Humber; containing 529 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 2766 acres of fertile land, situated between two ranges of the wolds; two-thirds of the surface are arable, and the rest almost entirely grass; stone is quarried chiefly for the roads. Wootton House, the residence of Leadbetter Uppleby, Esq., is a neat mansion, built in 1800, with well-wooded grounds; and the village occupies a pleasant site, and is embellished with a pool of water, covering about an acre of ground. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 18. 4., and in the gift and incumbency of the Giffard family; net income, £203; impropiator, Lord Yarborough. The tithes were commuted for land in 1767, when 135 acres were awarded to the incumbent. The church is a plain ancient edifice, with a square tower. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists. Mr. John Faulding, of Burnham, in the parish of Thornton-Curtis, bequeathed, in 1727, a cottage for a school-house, and endowed the same with a rent-charge of £5, payable out of certain lands in this parish, directing that the master should be appointed by the ministers of Elsham, Claxby, and Wootton. There is also a rent-charge of 40s., payable out of a parcel of land consisting of about four acres, vested by purchase in Lord Yarborough, which sum is likewise received by the school-master.

WOOTTON (ST. GEORGE THE MARTYR), a parish, in the union of HARDINGSTONE, hundred of WYMMERSLEY, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Northampton; containing 793 inhabitants, and comprising 1915 acres. The workhouse of the Hardingstone union is situated in this parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £21. 15.; net income, £300; patrons, the Rector and Fellows of Exeter College, Oxford. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1778. The rent of four acres, awarded under an inclosure act, and now let for about £7 per annum, is appropriated to the support of a Sunday national school; and there are some trifling bequests for the poor.

WOOTTON (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of WOODSTOCK, hundred of WOOTTON, county of OXFORD, 2 $\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Woodstock; containing 1129 inhabitants. The parish lies on the banks of the river Glym, and comprises about 4000 acres, chiefly arable land, with a small portion of meadow and pasture. At Old Woodstock, and in other parts of the parish, the manufacture of gloves is carried on. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15. 2. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of New College, Oxford, with a net income of £783: the tithes were commuted for land in 1769, and under the recent act for a rent-charge of £259. 10. 6.; there are 56 acres of glebe. The church is partly in the Norman style, but principally of later date. Charles Parrott, in 1785, bequeathed £2300 India annuities, now producing about £90 per annum, for the maintenance, education, and apprenticing of twelve boys; and in 1835 a school-house was built. Another school was endowed by the Rev. Lancelot C. Lee, for clothing and teaching six girls. Numerous vestiges of Roman occupation have been discovered at various times; and on Chaldon Hill are the remains of an exploratory camp, near which passes the old Roman road, Akeman-street.

WOOTTON (ST. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of BASINGSTOKE, hundred of CHUTELEY, Basingstoke and N. division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 4 $\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Basingstoke; containing 845 inhabitants. The parish is intersected by the London and South-Western railway, and comprises 1133*a.* 1*r.* 13*p.*, of which 20 acres are pasture, 53 woodland, 14 roads and waste, and the remainder arable. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 2. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £211; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Winchester. The church, which is very ancient, has a Norman doorway, with pillars and arches of the same character, and several windows in the early English style, and contains a handsome marble monument to Sir Thomas Hooke, Bart., and several to the family of Wither.

WOOTTON (ST. EDMUND), a parish, in the liberty of EAST MEDINA, Isle of Wight division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 4 miles (N. E.) from Newport, and equidistant from Ryde; containing 51 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 1023 acres, of which 688 are arable, 180 pasture, and 154 woodland; it is bounded on the north by the Motherbank, and on the east by an inlet of the sea, across which is a narrow causeway called Wootton bridge, upwards of 900 feet in length, on the road from Ryde to Newport. On an eminence south of the bridge is Fern Hill, the seat of Samuel Sanders, Esq., a curious edifice with a lofty handsome tower, having somewhat the appearance of a church; it was erected by the late Thomas Orde Powlett, Lord Bolton, when governor of the island, and commands a noble prospect of Spithead, and the adjacent parts of Hampshire. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 16. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £240; patron and incumbent, the Rev. R. W. White. The church is in the Norman style; there is a grave-stone to the memory of Sir William Lisle, master in chancery, and father of John Lisle, the regicide. At Wootton farm was formerly an ancient oak of remarkably large dimensions, being 47 feet in girth.

WOOTTON, a township, in the parish of ECCLESHALL, union of STONE, N. division of the hundred of PIREHILL and of the county of STAFFORD; containing 144 inhabitants. The township is situated about a mile south of Eccleshall, and is included within the limits of Horsley quarter of the parish; it is on the road from Eccleshall to Newport, in Shropshire, and near it is a high paved road which Dr. Plot considered to be a Roman via vicinalis. The tithes have been commuted for rent-charges amounting to £81. 15. 11., of which 11*s.* 11*d.* are payable to the vicar, and £81. 4. to the Bishop of Lichfield.

WOOTTON, a township, in the parish of ELLASTONE, S. division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, N. division of the county of STAFFORD, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Ashbourn; containing 223 inhabitants. The township comprises about 1500 acres of land: the villgae is small, and is situated a mile and a half from the village of Ellastone, on the road from that place to Cotton, and under the limestone mountain called Weaver Hill, one of the loftiest in the neighbourhood, and abounding in a variety of minerals. Wootton Lodge is a handsome mansion, built by Inigo Jones, and occupies an elevated site on Weaver Hill: Rousseau spent about eighteen months at the Lodge.

Seal and Arms.

WOOTTON-BASSETT (ALL SAINTS), a market-town and parish, and formerly a representative borough, in the union of CRICKLADE and WOOTTON-BASSETT, hundred of KINGSBRIDGE, Swindon and N. divisions of WILTS, 36 miles (N. by W.) from Salisbury, and 87 (W.) from London; containing 2990 inhabitants. This place, which appears to have been originally of greater importance than it is at present, was, at the time of the Norman Conquest, called Wodeton, from wode, a wood, and tun, a town: about a century after that period, it became the property of the noble family of Bassett, from whom it derived the adjunct to its name. The town is pleasantly situated on elevated ground, commanding extensive and pleasingly diversified prospects of the surrounding country, which is extremely fertile and in a high state of cultivation; it consists principally of one street, nearly half a mile in length, the houses in which are in general indifferently built and of mean appearance. The manufacture of broad-cloth, which was formerly carried on, has entirely ceased, and there is now no trade beyond what is requisite for the supply of the inhabitants. The Wilts and Berks canal passes within half a mile to the south of the town, and the Great-Western railway has an intermediate station here. The market is on Tuesday; and fairs, formerly six in number, but now reduced to two, are held on the Mondays next after the feasts of Pentecost and St. Bartholomew.

The town received its earliest charter of incorporation in the reign of Henry VI., under which, renewed by Charles II., in the 31st year of his reign, the government is vested in a mayor, two aldermen, and twelve capital burgesses, assisted by a town-clerk and subordinate officers. The borough first exercised the elective franchise in the 25th of Henry VI., from which time it regularly returned two members to parliament till it was disfranchised by the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45. The LIVING is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12, and in the gift of the impropriator, the Earl of Clarendon: the great tithes have been commuted for £585. 10., and the vicarial for £485, with a glebe of 92 acres. The church is an ancient structure, in cleaning the south wall of which, some years since, a curious painting was discovered of the murder of Thomas à Becket, executed in a rude style. There is a place of worship for Independents; also a free school founded in 1688, by Richard Jones, and endowed with lands now producing about £25 per annum. An hospital dedicated to St. John, which formerly existed here, was, during the reign of Henry IV., granted and united to the priory of Bradenstoke, in this county. The old manor-house has been converted into a farm-house. At a short distance below the town is a mineral spring, possessing the same properties as that of Cheltenham, and much used by those residing in the neighbourhood, though not generally known.

WOOTTON-COURTNEY (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of WILLITON, hundred of CARHAMPTON, W. division of SOMERSET, 4 miles (S. W.) from Minehead; containing 418 inhabitants. This parish, which takes the adjunct from the Courtney family, who formerly held the manor, is situated in a valley between the heights of Grabhurst and Dunkery, which latter has an elevation of 1668 feet above the sea; it comprises 3119 acres, of which 1436 are common or waste. At the base of Dunkery is a mine of iron-ore in active operation; there are also quarries of red sandstone for building and for the roads, and of limestone, in which crystals are found. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 8. 9., and in the patronage of Eton College: the tithes have been commuted for £270, and the glebe comprises 113 acres, with a house. The church is a handsome structure in the later English style. Richard Montague, afterwards Bishop of Chester and of Norwich, was rector of this parish.

WOOTTON-FITZPAIN, a parish, in the union of BRIDPORT, hundred of WHITCHURCH-CANONICORUM, Bridport division of DORSET, 4 miles (N. E. by N.) from Lyme-Regis; containing 432 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 1679 acres, of which 64 are common or waste; the soil is chalky, and the substratum abounds with flints and gravel, the former used for building and draining, and the latter for the roads. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 15., and in the patronage of James Drew, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £250, and there is a glebe-house, with about half an acre of land.

WOOTTON-GLANVILLE (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of CERNE, hundred of BUCKLAND-NEWTON, Sherborne division of DORSET, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Sherborne; containing, with the tything of Wootton-Newland, 342 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1665a. 2r. 26p., whereof about 153 acres are arable, 258 waste (of which more than half is being brought into cultivation), 76 woodland, and the remainder meadow and pasture; the soil is generally a deep clay, interspersed occasionally with chalk, and gravel; and sandstone, in which fossils are embedded, is found. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12, and in the gift of the incumbent, the Rev. J. Wickens: the tithes have been commuted for £315, and the glebe comprises 22 acres. The church is principally in the decorated style, with a low embattled tower of later date; in the windows are some fragments of ancient stained glass. It was repaired and newly-pewed in 1741, and contains an altar-tomb with a recumbent figure; also several monuments and inscriptions. John Churchill, grandfather of the great Duke of Marlborough, resided in the parish.

WOOTTON, LEEK (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of WARWICK, Kenilworth division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 3 miles (N.) from Warwick; containing 360 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the road from Coventry to Warwick, comprises 2033 acres of good land, the most part in grass, and picturesquely situated, and well wooded. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 12. 1.; net income, £300, with a glebe-house; patron and impropriator, Lord Leigh. The tithes have been commuted for land under an act of inclosure. The church was erected in 1792, at the sole expense of the Hon. Mary Leigh, and was enlarged and beautified in 1843, at a cost of £400; the chancel is in the decorated style, and the windows are ornamented with painted glass, the central one representing Our Saviour. A communion service of silver-gilt was presented in the reign of James I. by the Duchess Dudley, who also gave 50 acres of land in augmentation of the benefice. There is a parochial school endowed with £16 per annum.

WOOTTON, NORTH, a parish, in the union and hundred of SHERBORNE, Sherborne division of DORSET, 2 miles (S. E. by S.) from Sherborne; containing 84 inhabitants. It comprises 619*a. 2r.*: stone of inferior quality is quarried for the roads. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £51; patron, Earl Digby; impropiator, Robert Gordon, Esq. The church was anciently a chapel of ease to the vicarage of Sherborne.

WOOTTON, NORTH (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union and hundred of FREEBRIDGE-LYNN, W. division of NORFOLK, 3½ miles (N. by E.) from Lynn; containing 210 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the west by the Lynn channel, comprises 1843*a. 2r. 6p.*, whereof 297 acres are arable, 1167 meadow and pasture, 37 woodland, and 302 common; the soil is gravel, interspersed with clay and marl; the surface is undulated. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10, and in the gift of the impropiator, Col. Howard: the great tithes have been commuted for £62, and the vicarial for £200; the glebe contains 1½ acre. The church is a small structure in the early English style, repaired in 1834.

WOOTTON, NORTH, a parish, in the union of WELLS, hundred of GLASTON-TWELVE-HIDES, E. division of SOMERSET, 4 miles (W. S. W.) from Shepton-Mallet; containing 375 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 2000 acres; the soil is chiefly a clayey loam, and the lower lands are watered by two small rivulets. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Pilton: the tithes have been commuted for £99 to the Precentor of the Cathedral of Wells, and £50 to the Vicar. The church is a neat plain building.

WOOTTON-RIVERS (ST. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of PEWSEY, hundred of KINWARDSTONE, Everley and Pewsey, and S. divisions of WILTS, 3 miles (N. E.) from Pewsey; containing 470 inhabitants. It comprises 1179*a. 2r. 34p.*, of which 1036 acres are arable, 75 meadow and pasture, and 32 woodland; the soil is principally sand alternated with clay, the surface in some parts hilly, and the scenery diversified. The Kennet and Avon canal passes through the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 10. 5., and in the alternate patronage of St. John's College, Cambridge, and Brasenose College, Oxford; but it must be given to one who has been a scholar at either from Lancashire. The tithes have been commuted for £390, and the glebe comprises 49½ acres. The church is a small structure in the decorated English style, with an east window of three lights, beautifully enriched with tracery.

WOOTTON, SOUTH (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of FREEBRIDGE-LYNN, W. division of NORFOLK, 2¼ miles (S. W. by W.) from Castle-Rising; containing 151 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1258 acres, of which 320 are arable, 537 meadow and pasture, 5 woodland, and 290 common and waste; the soil is in some parts gravelly, and in others clay; the low lands are protected from the sea by an embankment. The village is on the road from Lynn to Wells, and the parish is bounded on the west by the Lynn channel. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £226. The church is an ancient cruciform structure in the early and decorated English styles, with a square embattled tower; on the south side of the chancel are three sedilia of stone, a piscina, and an altar-tomb to Sir James Thomas Winde, and on the north the mausoleum of the Hamonds, of Swaffham; the font is of Norman character, and there is a piscina in the south transept.

WOOTTON-UNDER-WOOD (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of AYLESBURY, hundred of ASHEN-DON, county of BUCKINGHAM, 7 miles (N. by W.) from Thame; containing 265 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 2000 acres, of which the soil is a strong clay, and the surface flat: the village is pleasantly situated within a mile of Dorton Spa. Wootton House, an elegant mansion belonging to the Duke of Buckingham, built after the model of the old Buckingham Palace, at Pimlico, is in a park richly embellished with wood, and diversified with a beautiful lake studded with picturesque islands. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £69; patron, the Duke; appropriator, the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church was repaired a few years since, when a spire of wood, covered with copper, was added to the tower: in the Grenville chapel, or south aisle, which was built in 1343, a columbarium has been constructed by his grace, for the interment of his family.

WOOTTON-WAWEN (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union of STRATFORD, Henley division of the hundred of BARLICHWAY, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 1½ mile (S.) from Henley-in-Arden; containing, with the chapelries of Henley and Ullenhall, 2303 inhabitants, of whom 619 are in Wootton-Wawen township. The parish is situated on the river Alne, and comprises 8518*a. 3r. 15p.*, of which 4100 acres are meadow and pasture, 3655 arable, 546 woodland, and about 216 roads and waste; the surface is varied. Wootton Hall was formerly the seat of the family of Smythe, one of whom was Lord Carrington, who, at the battle of Edge-Hill, bravely redeemed the royal standard, as is recorded on his monument in Christ-Church, Oxford. The Dowager Lady Smythe, the lineal descendant and heiress of the family, resided in the mansion till her decease in 1831, when the estate descended to her only son, Sir Edward J. Smythe, Bart., of Acton-Burnell, Salop, the present proprietor. Over the front entrance of the hall are finely executed, in relief, the arms of Lord Carrington; and adjoining it is an elegant Roman Catholic chapel, of the Grecian-Doric order, erected by the late Dowager Lady Smythe, in 1814. The Stratford and Avon canal passes through the parish. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11. 9. 7.; net income, £379; patrons, the Provost and Fellows of King's College, Cambridge; impropiators, Charles Mills and John Phillips, Esqrs. The tithes were partly exchanged in 1775, for 91 acres of land, valued at £136. 10. per annum, and the residue have been commuted for rent-charges of £198 payable to the college, £383 to the impropiators, and £106. 11. to the vicar; the glebe comprises 20 acres. The church is principally in the later English style, with a handsome tower between the nave and chancel, of which the lower part was built in the Anglo-Saxon era; the south door is in the early English, and part of the south aisle in the decorated style. At the east end of the north aisle is a desk, in which are chained some expositions, by various authors, on the four gospels, presented to the church at an early period after the Reformation. At Ullenhall is a chapel of ease, and there are endowed chapels at Henley and Bearley; also a place of worship for Baptists at Henley. A Benedictine priory was founded here as a cell to the abbey of Conches, in Normandy, to which abbey the church of St. Peter, with some lands in this place, had been given by Robert de Tonei, otherwise Stafford, son of Robert de Tonei, standard-bearer of Normandy, and confirmed by his descendants: at the Dissolution of alien priories, the revenue was first granted by Richard II. to the priory of St. Anne, near Coventry, and afterwards by Henry VI. to King's College.

Arms.

WORCESTER, a city, and county of itself, having exclusive jurisdiction, and the head of a union, locally in the county of WORCESTER, of which it is the capital, Worcester and W. divisions of the county, 111 miles (N. W. by W.) from London; containing 25,401 inhabitants. This place, which is unquestionably of great antiquity, is, under the name of

Caer Guorangan, enumerated by Nennius in his catalogue of cities belonging to the Britons, by whom, from the advantages of its situation near a fordable part of the river Severn, and on the confines of a thick forest, it was selected as a place of strength and security. On the expulsion of that people by the Romans, it was, with other British towns, retained by the conquerors; and, if not one of their principal stations, as some (judging from the Roman roads in the vicinity appearing to concentrate here) have supposed, it was very probably one of those fortresses which the prætor Ostorius erected on the banks of the Severn, to secure his conquests on that side of the river. It came again, on the departure of the Romans from Britain, into the possession of its ancient inhabitants, from whom it was taken, in 628, by Penda, King of Mercia, whose son Wulfhere, on his accession to the throne of that kingdom, appointed Osric his viceroy over the province of Huiccia, including the counties of Worcester and Gloucester, with part of Warwickshire, and forming a portion of the kingdom of Mercia. Osric, either repairing the Roman fortress, or erecting another in this city, which by the Saxons was called Wigornaceastre, made it his residence, and fortified it as a frontier against the Britons, who had retreated into the territories on the other side of the Severn. Sexulf, Bishop of Mercia, founded here the first Christian church within his diocese, which he dedicated to St. Peter; and in the reign of Ethelred, that monarch having resolved to divide the kingdom of Mercia into five separate dioceses, Osric prevailed upon him to establish one of them at Wigornaceastre, the metropolis of his province: in 679, Bosel was consecrated first bishop, by the style of Episcopus Huiciorum, and invested with full authority to preside over the ecclesiastical affairs of the province of Huiccia or Wiccia. From the death of Osric nothing is recorded, either of the province or of the city, till the time of Offa, in one of whose charters Uhtred, a Wiccian prince, is styled Regulus et Dux propriae gentis Huiciorum (ruler and duke of his own people the Huiccii), and his brother Aldred is described as Subregulus Wigorniae civitatis, lieutenant of the city of Worcester, by licence of King Offa. After the union of the kingdoms of the heptarchy, Alfred the Great appointed Duke Ethelred, a Mercian prince, to whom he gave his daughter Elfreda in marriage, to the government of Mercia; and in 894, Ethelred and Elfreda rebuilt the city, which had been destroyed by the Danes. Soon after this, Wærfred, Bishop of Worcester, desirous of defending the city and the cathedral from the future attacks of these rapacious invaders, obtained from Ethelred a grant of one moiety of the royal dues, with which he repaired the ancient seat of the Huiccan viceroys, and erected several fortresses around the cathedral, of which the only one now remaining is Edgar's tower. In 1041, a tax imposed by Hardicanute excited an insurrection of the citizens, who having seized the collectors, after endeavouring to shelter themselves in Edgar's tower, and put them to death, the king, to punish this outrage, sent an army to Worcester, and the inhabitants, abandoning the city, retired to the river island Bevere, in which they fortified themselves, determined to hold out to the last extremity. The forces of Hardicanute, having plundered and set fire to the town, attacked the inhabitants in their place of refuge; but were so vigorously repulsed that, after repeated fruitless attempts to dislodge them, the general was compelled to grant honourable terms of capitulation, and the inhabitants returned to their city, and repaired it.

Soon after the Conquest, a royal castle was erected here, of which Urso d'Abitot, who accompanied William into England, was appointed constable, and made sheriff of the county. He extended the buildings of the castle, and, to the great annoyance of the monks, infringed upon the site of the cathedral, the outer ward having occupied what is now the College Green. In 1074, Roger, Earl of Hereford, Ralph de Guader, Earl of East Anglia, and other powerful barons, entered into a conspiracy against the Conqueror, and invited aid from Denmark; but their design having been discovered, they were obliged to enter the field before the expected succour arrived; and Bishop Wulstan, Urso d'Abitot, and Agelwy, abbot of Evesham, assisted by Walter de Lacey, assembled a body of troops to guard the passes of the Severn, intercepted their progress, and terminated the rebellion. The inhabitants, in 1088, having embraced the cause of William Rufus, the reigning monarch, Bernard de Neumarché, Lord of Brecknock, Osborn Fitz-Richard, Roger de Lacey, Ralph de Mortimer, and other partisans of his elder brother Robert, assembled a large force, and assaulted the city; on which occasion Bishop Wulstan armed his tenants, and retiring into the castle, with the citizens and their wives and children, animated the garrison to a resolute defence. The assailants set fire to the suburbs; but more intent upon plunder than prudent in securing their ground, they spread themselves over the open country, for the sake of pillage; and the garrison, taking advantage of the opportunity, sallied from the castle, and advancing upon them suddenly, while in the act of ravaging the bishop's lands at Wick, captured or killed 500 men, and put the rest to flight. In 1113, the greater part of the city was destroyed by fire, which nearly consumed the cathedral and the castle: this calamity is supposed to have been inflicted by the Welsh, who at that time had resolved on the entire devastation of the English marches.

In the reign of Stephen, William de Beauchamp, constable of the castle, having joined Matilda, incurred the resentment of that monarch, who deposed him from his government, and appointed in his place Waleran, Count of Meulant, whom he created Earl of Worcester. Matilda, in 1139, having gained several advantages in various parts of the kingdom, and greatly increased the number of her partisans, marched from Gloucester with a considerable force, and arriving before Worcester, laid siege to it; but before her arrival, the inhabitants had deposited every thing valuable in the cathedral, and made the necessary preparations for defending their city: the assailants attacked it on the south side, but being repulsed, they renewed the attack on the north side, and, gaining an entrance, set fire to it in several places. Having succeeded in obtaining possession of the castle, William de Beauchamp was reinstated in his government by Matilda, and his appointment was subsequently confirmed by her son, Henry II. In 1149, Stephen, to punish the inhabitants for the assistance which they had given to his opponent, took the city and burnt it: but the castle having been strengthened with additional fortifications, resisted all his attempts, and Eustace, his son, having subsequently invested it without success, again set fire to the city in revenge. Worcester, which was so frequently the victim of intestine war and of accidental calamity, was fortified by Hugh de Mortimer against Henry II.; but on the approach of that monarch to invest it, Mortimer on his submission, received pardon, and the city escaped damage. In 1189, it was almost totally destroyed by an accidental conflagration; and in 1202 it again suffered a similar calamity, when the cathedral and adjacent buildings were consumed, but the walls not being demolished, the injury was speedily repaired.

In the contest between King John and the barons, the latter having obtained the aid of Louis, Dauphin of France, the inhabitants adhered to their cause, and, opening the gates of the place, received William Mareschall, son of the earl of Pembroke, as governor of the castle for the Dauphin, in 1216; but Ranulph, Earl of Chester, with a body of the royal forces, took that fortress by surprise, and afterwards obtained possession of the city. The inhabitants were made prisoners, and compelled by torture to discover their treasures; the soldiers of the garrison, who had taken sanctuary in the cathedral, were forcibly dragged out; the church and convent were plundered; and a fine of 300 marks was imposed upon the inhabitants, for the payment of which they were obliged to melt down the precious metals with which the shrine of St. Wulstan was enriched. In the course of the same year, that king was buried in the cathedral of the city. In 1217, the outer ward of the castle, which was contiguous to the cathedral, was granted to the monks for the enlargement of their close, by the earl of Pembroke, guardian to the young king, after which time the earls of Worcester ceased to reside in it; the inner ward, comprising the citadel and keep, was alone kept up as a fortress for the protection of the city. In 1218, Bishop Sylvester obtained from Henry III. the grant of a fair for four days, in honour of St. Wulstan, to commence on the festival of St. Barnabas. During the reign of this monarch, a tournament was celebrated here, in the year 1225, in which all who took part were subsequently excommunicated by Bishop Blois. A great part of the city, in 1233, was destroyed by an accidental fire, which greatly damaged the buildings of the cathedral. In 1263, Robert Ferrers, Earl of Derby, Peter de Montfort, son of Simon de Montfort, Robert, Earl of Leicester, and others of the confederate barons, laid siege to the city, which they took after several assaults; they spared the church, but plundered the houses of the inhabitants and put several Jews to death. After the battle of Lewes, in which Henry III. was made prisoner, that monarch was brought by the Earl of Leicester to Worcester, whence, together with his son, Prince Edward, he was removed to Hereford Castle; the latter, having made his escape, repaired hither, where he assembled an army, with which he defeated the earl and the confederated barons in the celebrated battle of Evesham. In 1299, the street leading to the suburb of St. John's was destroyed by an accidental fire, that also burnt down the wooden bridge over the Severn, which was afterwards replaced with one of stone. The city, in 1401, was plundered and partly burnt by the forces of Owain Glyndwr, in his repeated attacks upon the English frontiers in the reign of Henry IV., against whom he maintained a desultory warfare for a considerable time; but the king advancing against him, drove him back into Wales, and retiring after his victory to Worcester, took up his residence in the city, whence, after disbanding his army, he withdrew privately to London. In the reign of Edward IV., Queen Margaret, after the defeat of her party at the battle of Tewkesbury, and the subsequent murder of her son, was taken from a convent near that town, into which she had retired the day after the battle, by Lord Stanley, and brought before the king, who was then at Worcester. The Duke of Buckingham, in 1484, having raised an army of Welshmen to oppose the claim of Richard III. to the throne, a sudden inundation of the Severn impeded their progress and disconcerted the enterprise; and after the battle of Bosworth Field, in which that monarch was slain, Worcester was seized for Henry VII.: several of the partisans of Richard were made prisoners here, and beheaded at the high cross, and a fine of 500 marks was paid to the king for the redemption of the city. In 1486, Sir Humphrey Stafford and his brother, Lord Lovell, having escaped from their sanctuary, at Colchester, levied a force of 3000 to 4000 men, and laid siege to this city; but on the approach of an army sent against them by the king, under the command of the Duke of Bedford, they raised the siege and dispersed. During the prelacy of Archbishop Whitgift, Sir John Russel and Sir Henry Berkeley came to the sessions here, with a large band of armed followers, to decide by force a quarrel which had arisen between them; but by the vigilance and activity of the bishop, who placed strong guards at the city gates, they were arrested and brought to his palace, when he prevailed upon them to deliver up their arms to his servants, and appeased their animosity. During the destructive pestilence that raged here in 1637, the inhabitants again abandoned the city, and shut themselves up in the island of Bevere.

In the PARLIAMENTARY WAR, Worcester was the first city that openly declared in favour of the king, and the inhabitants opened their gates to admit Sir John Byron, at the head of 300 cavaliers, whom they assisted to fortify the city against the parliament. These, being afterwards joined by Lord Coventry with some troops of horse, and expecting further aid from the king, began to act on the defensive; but before the promised succours arrived, Colonel Fiennes, at the head of 1000 dragoons, and accompanied by the train-bands from Oxford, and a detachment of the troops under Lord Say, arrived before the city, and summoned it to surrender. The inhabitants indignantly refusing, he immediately commenced the attack; and a shot having been fired into the city, through a hole made in the gate, the cavaliers sallied out on the parliamentarians, and having killed several of Colonel Fiennes' troops, returned without being pursued. Prince Rupert, with his brother Prince Maurice, arriving soon after with a considerable body of troops, joined Sir John Byron, and the royalists drew out their forces into Pitchcroft meadow, adjoining the town, to give the enemy battle. A spirited encounter took place, and was kept up for some time, but Rupert perceiving a considerable reinforcement, under the Earl of Essex, advancing to the assistance of the parliamentarians, withdrew his forces into the city, where the engagement was continued till night, to the great disadvantage of the Prince, who, with a party of his troops, retreated to Hereford in disorder. On the same evening the Earl of Essex arrived, but, for fear of surprise, did not enter the city till the following morning, when the parliamentarian troops were quartered in the cathedral, which they stripped of its ornaments, destroyed the altar, and committed every kind of depredation: having explored the vaults, they found a large store of provisions and supplies which had been sent from Oxford for the king's use, and a considerable quantity of plate. The mayor and aldermen were taken into custody for having surrendered the city to the cavaliers, and sent under a strong guard to London; and 22,000 pounds' weight of plate was sent off under the same escort. A gallows was erected in the market-place, for the execution of such of the citizens as should be found guilty of having betrayed Colonel Fiennes' soldiers to Prince Rupert; and a commission was appointed by authority of the parliament, under which Sir Robert Harlow and Sergeant Wilde were sent down, to secure the city and try the delinquents; and these officers, as a preliminary step, imposed a fine of £5000 on the inhabitants. After having repaired the fortifications, and obtained from the citizens a loan of £3000 for the parliament, the Earl of Essex divided his army, consisting of 24,000 men, into three brigades; two of them he detached in different directions, to intercept the king's forces on their march towards London; and, leaving a garrison in the city, he advanced at the head of the third brigade to Shrewsbury, in pursuit of that part of the royal army which was headed by the king in person.

The citizens, after the departure of the earl and his army, still maintained their loyalty, and the corporation passed several resolutions in favour of the royal cause: they elected for mayor and sheriff two ardent royalists, provided additional ordnance and ammunition, strengthened the fortifications, and raised levies of money, which they transmitted for the king's use. These measures again drew upon them the vengeance of the parliament; and in March, 1646, Sir William Brereton and Colonels Morgan and Birch appeared before the city, with a force of 2500 foot and horse, and demanded its surrender; this being peremptorily refused, they drew off their forces at night towards Droitwich, and advanced to assist in the siege of Lichfield. The citizens sent messengers for directions to the king, who had escaped from Oxford, and was at that time at Newark; and in the mean time General Fairfax, who was then at Headington, near Oxford, sent a letter to the governor of Worcester, requiring him to deliver up the city to the parliament, and on his refusal despatched Col. Whalley, with 5000 men, to reduce it. The garrison, which consisted of 1500 men, made a resolute defence; but after having sent repeatedly to the king for instructions, and receiving no reply, their ammunition and provisions beginning to fail, and being in hourly expectation of the arrival of Fairfax, with an army of 10,000 foot and 5000 horse, they capitulated on honourable terms, on July 23rd. After a respite of five years, Worcester again became the seat of war; the citizens, still firm in their loyalty to the king, notwithstanding the opposition of the garrison, opened their gates to Charles II., who arrived at the head of a Scottish army of 12,000 men, attended by the Dukes of Hamilton and Buckingham, and other officers of distinction, on the 22nd of August 1651; and, after some slight opposition from the garrison, entered in triumph, preceded by the mayor and corporation, by whom, on the following day, he was solemnly proclaimed. On the 28th, Cromwell, at the head of 17,000 men, arrived at Red Hill, within one mile of the city, where he fixed his head-quarters; and being soon after joined by the forces under Generals Fleetwood, Lambert, and Harrison, his army amounted to 30,000 men. Lambert, having surprised a detachment of the king's forces ordered to guard the pass of the Severn, approached to besiege the city. A general engagement now took place, and the parliamentarians were beginning to give way, when a reinforcement arriving from the other side of the Severn, the royal forces were overwhelmed, and compelled to retire into the city in disorder. A part of the Scottish troops laying down their arms, and the enemy advancing on all sides, every hope of victory was dispelled; Cromwell carried the royal fort by storm, putting all the garrison to the sword, and gained possession of the city: the king, attended only by Lord Wilmot, narrowly escaped by the back entrance of the house in which he was quartered, at the moment Col. Cobbet was entering at the front, to make him prisoner; and mounting a horse which had been prepared for him, rode to Bos-cobel, where he was hospitably entertained, and concealed till he found means of escaping into France. The battle was sustained for some time with desperate valour; the citizens made their last stand at the town-hall, but without success, and the city was eventually given up to plunder. Cromwell describes his success upon this occasion as a "crowning mercy;" and, in token of his joy for the victory, he ordered a sixty-gun ship, which was soon after launched at Woolwich, to be named the "Worcester."

The City is pleasantly situated at the base and on the acclivity of elevated ground rising gently from the east bank of the river Severn, over which is a handsome stone bridge of five elliptical arches, connecting it with the suburb of St. John's, and built in 1780, at an expense of £29,843, towards defraying which H. Crabb Boulton and John Walsh, Esqrs., members for the city, contributed £3000. It consists of several spacious and regular streets, of which the Foregate is a stately and lengthened avenue of well-built houses, terminating with a fine view of St. Nicholas' church. The approaches exhibit rich and beautiful scenery. Bromsgrove-Lickey to the north-east, the Malvern hills to the south-west, and the Shropshire hills and the Welsh mountains in the distance, are strikingly contrasted with the windings of the Severn, and the luxuriant vales, orchards, hop-grounds, and fertile meadows, for which the surrounding country is distinguished. The streets are well paved, lighted with gas, and amply supplied with river water by means of a steam-engine, erected on the eastern bank of the Severn at a place called Little Pitchcroft, in 1810. An act of parliament was obtained in 1823, for more effectually paving, lighting, and watching the city, under the authority of which several improvements have been effected. A public subscription library was established in Angel-street, in 1790, containing upwards of 5000 volumes; and a building was, a few years since, erected for the institution, by subscription, occupying a more eligible situation on the eastern side of the Foregate, near Sansom Fields. Two medical societies have been formed, the first in 1796, and the other, to which an extensive and well-assorted library is attached, in 1815; and there is a society for the encouragement and improvement of native artists, whose first exhibition of paintings took place in the town-hall, in September 1818. The theatre, a neat and appropriate building, erected in 1780, by a tontine subscription in shares of £50 each, and handsomely fitted up, is opened occasionally; and assemblies and concerts are held in the large room at the town-hall. The musical festivals of the choirs of Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester, take place here in the cathedral, every third year, and are attended by fashionable audiences: the surplus amount of receipts is appropriated to the benefit of the widows and orphans of the poorer clergy of the associated dioceses. Races are held in August and November, and at the former time they continue for three days, and are numerous attended: the course is on Pitchcroft meadow, where a grand stand has been erected, near the margin of the Severn.

The MANUFACTURE of broad-cloth prevailed here to a very great extent in the reign of Henry VIII., at which time there were 380 looms, employing 8000 persons; on its decline the carpet manufacture was introduced, which, after flourishing for a short time, was transferred to Kidderminster. The present manufactures are those of porcelain and gloves, for the former of which the city has obtained a degree of reputation unequalled at home, and not surpassed abroad, the Worcester china being alike valued for its fineness and transparency, the elegance of its patterns and the beauty of its embellishments. This branch of manufacture was established in 1751, by Dr. Wall and some other proprietors; its progress has been rapid and successful, and there are at present three factories, which have splendid show-rooms, visited by persons travelling through Worcester with infinite gratification. The glove manufacture is upon a very extensive scale, affording employment to not less than 8000 persons in the city, exclusively of many thousands in the neighbouring villages: the gloves made are in high estimation, not only in the several parts of England, but in the foreign markets, to which they are exported in great quantities. A distillery upon a large scale, a rectifying establishment, and a British-wine manufactory, are successfully conducted; iron-foundries have been erected on the banks of the canal and the Severn, and a considerable trade is carried on in hops, of which there are plantations in the vicinity. The Worcester and Birmingham canal affords great facility of communication between the latter town and the Severn, and for the conveyance of goods from Manchester and the north of England, through Worcester; and the Severn, which is navigable for barges of considerable tonnage, and on the banks of which are commodious quays and warehouses, contributes greatly to promote the trade and commercial prosperity of the city. The market-days are Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday: the fairs are on the Saturday before Palm-Sunday, Saturday in Easter-week, August 15th, and September 19th, which is a great fair for hops; a cattle-fair is held on the first Monday in December, and there are markets free of toll on the second Monday in February, and on the first Mondays in May, June, July, and November. The market-place, nearly opposite the town-hall, in High-street, is spacious, erected in 1804, at an expense of £5050; the entrance is through a handsome arched portal of stone, ornamented with pillars of the Tuscan order, supporting a panelled entablature, on each side of which are smaller entrances. The corn-market is at the east end of Silver-street; the hop-market is held opposite Berkeley Chapel, at the south end of the Foregate.

Corporation Seal.

Worcester was first constituted a city by Wulfhere, sixth king of Mercia, and additional immunities were granted by Offa and Edgar: the inhabitants were incorporated by Henry I., whose charter was confirmed by numerous subsequent sovereigns, who extended the privileges of the city, and made it a county of itself. The present corporation consists of a mayor, 12 aldermen, and 36 councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76; the borough is divided into five wards; a sheriff is appointed by the council, and the number of magistrates is 15. The freedom is inherited by the eldest sons of freemen, and acquired by servitude. The city first exercised the elective franchise in the 23rd of Edward I., since which time it has regularly returned two members to parliament: in 1832, the right of election was extended to the £10 householders of an enlarged district, which comprises 1253 acres; the sheriff is returning officer. The recorder holds quarterly courts of session for all offences within the city and county of the city, not capital; a court of record takes place every Monday, for the recovery of debts to any amount, and a sheriff's court occurs monthly. The town-hall is a handsome building of brick, with quoins, cornices, and ornaments of stone, consisting of a centre and two slightly-projecting wings, surmounted by a close-panelled parapet, decorated with urns and statues; in the centre is a statue of Justice, on each side of which are those of Peace and Plenty. The entrance is ornamented with two engaged columns of the composite order, on one side of which is a niche containing a statue of Charles I., and on the other a statue of Charles II.; the pediment over the entrance bears the city arms. In a niche occupying the central window of the principal story is a fine statue of Queen Anne; above is a circular pediment, in the tympanum of which are the arms of England, supported by angels. The lower room is divided into two parts, by the crown bar on the north, and the nisi prius court on the south, and is adorned with portraits and ancient armour. On the upper story is the grand council-chamber, of the same dimensions as the lower room, with circular terminations, and divided into three compartments by two screens of columns crossing the room near the ends; it is lighted by numerous lustres, and is appropriately decorated for civic entertainments and for assemblies, which occasionally take place in it; opposite the principal entrance is a full-length portrait of George III., presented by that monarch when he visited the city in 1788. The new city gaol and bridewell was built in 1824, at an expense of £12,578; the county gaol and house of correction in 1809, at an expense of £19,000. The assizes and general quarter-sessions are held here.

Worcester was first erected into a SEE in the reign of Ethelred, and, in 679, Bosel was consecrated first bishop. The establishment, which was amply endowed by successive Saxon monarchs, consisted of secular canons till the eighth century, when a convent, dedicated to St. Mary, was founded near the cathedral of St. Peter, of which Ethelburga was abbess; on her death it was converted into a monastery for monks of the Benedictine order. The disputes which subsequently arose between the secular clergy and the monks terminated in 969, by the surrender of the church of St. Peter to the latter, and the church of St. Mary became the cathedral of the diocese. After the Conquest, the establishment continued to increase, and flourished till the Dissolution, at which time its revenue was valued at £1386. 12. 10. It was refounded by Henry VIII., for a bishop, dean, archdeacon, ten prebendaries, ten minor canons, ten lay clerks, ten choristers, two schoolmasters, forty king's scholars, and other members. Prior to the passing of the act of the 6th and 7th of William IV., cap. 77, the jurisdiction of the see, with the exception of fifteen parishes and eight chapelries, extended over the whole of the county of Worcester, nearly one-third of Warwickshire, the parishes of Brome and Clent in the county of Stafford, and the parish of Hales-Owen in Salop; but by that act it is declared that the diocese shall consist of the counties of Worcester and Warwick, comprising 362 benefices. The bishop has the patronage of two archdeaconries, the chancellorship, and 21 benefices, with an income of Arms of the Bishopric.

£6500; the dean and chapter have the patronage of the 8 minor canonries and 36 benefices, with an income of £8479, of which the dean has two-twelfths, and each of the 8 canons one-twelfth. Two of the canonries have been suspended, and the produce applied to the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The ancient cathedral of St. Peter, after its surrender to the monastery of St. Mary, was rebuilt by St. Oswald, in 983, but being destroyed by Hardicanute, in 1041, Bishop Wulstan, in 1084, founded the present CATHEDRAL, which was subsequently enlarged and improved by several of his successors. It is a spacious and venerable pile, in the form of a double cross, with a noble and lofty square tower, rising from the centre to the height of 167 feet; the prevailing style is the early English, intermixed with portions of Norman, decorated, and later English architecture. The tower is a fine composition, enriched with series of canopied niches, in which are statues of kings and bishops, and embellished with sculpture of elegant design. The exterior possesses simplicity of elegance, arising from the loftiness of its elevation and the justness of its proportions; the interior is remarkable for the airiness and lightness of its appearance, and in many parts for the correctness of its details and the appropriate character of its embellishments. Part of the nave contains specimens of the Norman style, and, in some places, portions in the decorated; it is separated from the aisles by lofty ranges of finely clustered columns and pointed arches, and lighted by a range of clerestory windows, the tracery of which is in the later style; the roof is groined, and ornamented with bosses of flowers, antique heads, and other devices. The choir, to which is an ascent of several steps, is of early English character; the groining of the roof and the details are in general of very elegant design, and in high preservation; the altar-screen is of carved stone, and the pulpit, also of stone and of octagonal form, is sculptured with symbols of the Evangelists, and devices illustrative of scripture history. The east window, as well as the great west window of the nave, are modern compositions of later English architecture; the bishop's throne and prebendal stalls are richly embellished with tabernacle-work. The Lady chapel, also early English, consisting of a nave and aisles, is among the earlier portions of the cathedral, being equally remarkable for the symmetry of its parts and the goodness of its preservation. In the south-eastern transept is the monumental chapel of Prince Arthur, son of Henry VII., in the later English style, of which it is an elegant specimen, containing his tomb highly enriched with sculpture, emblematical of the union of the houses of York and Lancaster, and other embellishments; adjoining it is the dean's chapel, and to the north the bishop's chapel, with others in various parts of the building. In the centre of the choir is the tomb of King John; the slab bearing the effigy of that monarch is of a date soon after his decease, but the tomb, which is in the later style, was probably erected at the same time as Prince Arthur's chapel. There are several interesting monuments, among which those of Bishops Hough, Maddox, and Johnson, and of Mrs. Rae, are elegant specimens of sculpture. To the south of the cathedral are the cloisters in the later English style, inclosing a spacious quadrangular area, on the south side of which is the ancient refectory of the monastery, in the decorated style, with some elegant windows, and a doorway highly enriched, now appropriated to the use of the king's school. On the eastern side is the Chapter-house, in which is the library, an ancient building in the form of a decagon, the roof of which, finely groined, is supported on a central column; the windows are of modern insertion; the walls are ornamented with a series of Norman intersecting arches. The Episcopal palace is a modern embattled edifice of brick, decorated with stone, pleasantly situated on the margin of the Severn, and containing several spacious apartments: the drawing-room is ornamented with portraits of George III. and Queen Charlotte, between which is a marble tablet, recording their presentation to the bishop by their Majesties, who, when on a visit to Worcester, took up their abode in the palace.

The city comprises the PARISHES of St. Alban, with 247 inhabitants; All Saints, 2203; St. Andrew, 1677; St. Clement, 2155; St. Helen, 1323; St. Martin, 5083; St. Nicholas, 1919; St. Peter, 4575; and St. Swithin, 891: those of St. Clement, St. Martin, and St. Peter, are partly in the Lower division of the hundred of Oswaldslow. The living of St. Alban's is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £5; net income, £74; patron, the Bishop. The living of All Saints' is a discharged rectory, valued at £13. 12. 4½., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £138. The living of St. Andrew's is a discharged rectory, valued at £10. 5. 10.; net income, £165; patrons, the Dean and Chapter. The church has undergone extensive reparation: the tower, which, in 1814, was cased with freestone, is 90 feet in height, and is surmounted by an octagonal spire, 150 feet high, regularly and symmetrically diminishing from 20 feet at the base to only 7½ inches at the top, the whole terminated by a Corinthian capital, and surmounted by a gilt weather-cock, and forming one of the most striking ornaments of the city; the spire was erected in 1751, by Nathaniel Wilkinson, a stone mason of the city. The parish of St. Clement comprises about 95 acres, chiefly meadow land: the living is a discharged rectory, valued at £5. 5.; patrons, the Dean and Chapter; net income, £150. The church, a small old structure of stone, stood on the eastern bank of the Severn, although the principal part of the parish was on the western side; but being much decayed, and liable to be flooded, a new edifice, on an enlarged scale, was built, which was opened in 1823. It is in the Norman style, situated on the upper road to Henwick, &c., and the expense of its erection was nearly £6000, defrayed by subscription, aided by the appropriation of several small benefactions, and a grant from the Society for Building Churches. The living of St. Helen's is a discharged rectory, valued at £11; net income, £136; patron, the Bishop. The church has been repewed, and 200 free sittings provided, the Incorporated Society having granted £70 in aid of the expense. The parish of St. Martin comprises 1392a. 1r. 35p., of which 383 acres are arable, 725 meadow and pasture, 93 woodland, and 21 homesteads and gardens: the living is a rectory, valued at £15. 3. 4.; net income, £378; patrons, the Dean and Chapter. A gallery has been erected in the church. The parish of St. Nicholas comprises 47 acres, homesteads and garden-ground: The living is a discharged rectory, valued at £16. 10. 7½.; net income, £260; patron, the Bishop. The church is a uniform modern structure, with a handsome steeple, and, from its situation in the more open part of the town, forms a conspicuous and interesting object in the perspective of the Foregate and Broad-street. The living of St. Peter's is a vicarage, valued at £12. 4. 2.; net income, £233; patrons, the Dean and Chapter; appropriators, the Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford. The church has been rebuilt. The living of St. Swithin's is a discharged rectory, valued at £15. 15., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter; net income, £170. A district church was erected in 1834, at Blockhouse, containing 500 sittings, 330 of which are free. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, the Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion, Independents, Wesleyans, and Roman Catholics.

The Royal grammar school connected with the cathedral was founded at the time of that establishment by Henry VIII., for forty boys: there are two exhibitions to Balliol College, Oxford, founded by Dr. Bell, Bishop of Worcester, which are restricted to this diocese. The Free grammar school was instituted by Queen Elizabeth, in 1561, for twelve boys; the school stands the third in claim to six scholarships established by Sir Thomas Cookes, Bart., founder of Worcester College, Oxford, which lead to the six fellowships in that college by the same founder, as vacancies occur. The Rev. John Meek, in 1665, bequeathed to Magdalen Hall, Oxford, estates then producing £100 per annum for ten scholars from this school. Joseph Worfield, in 1642, assigned land for the maintenance and education of fourteen boys to be sent to either of the universities for seven years: the income is about £240 per annum, which is appropriated to the payment of £30 each a year to seven students in the university. The free school, and Trinity almshouses, were founded in 1558, by Mr. Thomas Wilde, who endowed them with land producing, with subsequent donations, an income of nearly £300: the buildings, situated partly in the parish of St. Nicholas, and partly in that of St. Swithin, consist of a schoolroom, with a dwelling-house for the master, and 29 apartments for the almspeople. Schools for sixteen boys and eight girls were established in 1713, by Bishop Lloyd, who endowed them with a small estate, now worth about £80 per annum.

St. Oswald's hospital was established prior to 1268, and originally endowed for a master, chaplain, and four brethren; at the time of the Dissolution it was given to the Dean and Chapter, but had been deprived of a considerable portion of the lands which it possessed. In 1660, Dr. John Fell, Bishop of Oxford, having been appointed to the mastership, successfully exerted himself for the recovery of its alienated property; a new charter of foundation was obtained in the 15th of Charles II., and almshouses for ten men and a chapel were erected. Thomas Haynes, Esq., in 1681, built rooms for six additional brethren, and added £50 per annum to its endowment; and its present revenue is £1681, which is appropriated to the support of sixteen aged men and twelve women. Some almshouses founded by Richard Inglethorpe, for six aged men and a woman to attend upon them, have an endowment of £53 per annum, exclusively of fines on the renewal of leases, which amount to a considerable sum; they have been rebuilt, for nine inmates. John Nash, alderman of the city, in 1661, founded ten almshouses, to which he assigned lands, for eight aged men, and two aged and unmarried women to wait upon them; the endowment produces an income of £367, which is paid to seventeen almspeople. He likewise left an apprenticing fund of £4 per annum to each of the nine parishes. Michael Wyatt, in 1725, left property in trust to the corporation, for the erection and endowment of houses for six freemen; the premises are neatly built of brick, and the annual produce of the endowment is £49. Berkeley's hospital was founded in 1692, by Robert Berkeley, Esq., of Spetchley, in the county of Worcester, who endowed it with £6000 from the rents of his lands, in annual sums of £400, for twelve aged men and one aged woman, and for the payment of £20 per annum to a chaplain for performing service in the chapel. Geary's almshouses, for four aged women, are endowed with about £30 per annum. Shewring's hospital was founded in 1702, by Thomas Shewring, alderman, who assigned to it land producing at present nearly £150 per annum, for six aged women. William Jarvis, in 1772, bequeathed property now worth £122. 13. per annum, for the support of three aged freemen and one widow, and for apprenticing four boys of the parish of St. Andrew annually; and eight almshouses bequeathed in 1567, by John Walsgrove, to the poor of that parish, were rebuilt in 1825. There are numerous charitable bequests and donations, amounting in the aggregate to a very considerable sum per annum; in addition to which, Worcester is one of the cities partaking of Sir Thomas White's charity. The parish of St. Swithin is in possession of lands and houses, the annual value of which is computed at £763, appropriated to the repair of the church and relief of needy parishioners. The City and County infirmary, erected in 1770, occupies an appropriate situation, adjoining Pitchcroft meadow, and was completed at an expense of £6085, raised by subscription; it has two handsome fronts; the internal arrangements are well adapted, and a considerable quantity of garden and pleasure ground is attached to it. The House of industry, an extensive brick building to the east of the town, was erected by act of parliament obtained in 1792, for the accommodation of the incorporated parishes of the city; the buildings were erected at an expense of £7318, and the purchase of the land belonging to it cost £2273. The poor law union comprises the seven parishes within the city, with those of St. Martin, St. Clement, St. Peter the Great, and St. John Bedwardine, and the tything of Whistons in the parish of Claines.

Among the ancient Monastic establishments were, an hospital founded in the south-east part of the city, in honour of St. Wulstan, bishop of the see, in 1088, the revenue of which at the Dissolution was £79. 12. 6., and the remains of which, denominated the Commandery, are considerable; a convent of Grey friars, without St. Martin's gate, instituted about the year 1268, by the family of the Beauchamps, Earls of Warwick, the remains of which were for several years used as the city gaol; a convent of Dominican friars in the west part of the city, the site of which is now covered with buildings; and a convent of White nuns of the Benedictine order, which existed at the time of the Conquest, and at the Dissolution had a revenue of £53. 13. 7. The site of this last still bears the name of the White Ladies; a small portion of the buildings is visible, and a farm, about a mile from the city, called the Nunnery, is probably a part of its ancient demesne. The guild of the Holy Trinity was instituted by Henry IV., and, on its Dissolution, was converted into an hospital by Queen Elizabeth. Among the distinguished prelates of the see have been, the venerable Latimer, and Drs. Prideaux, Stillingfleet, and Hurd: Florence and William of Worcester were brethren in the monastery. Nicholas Facio de Duillier, a native of Switzerland, and author of several mathematical and philosophical works, resided here for thirty-three years, and was buried in St. Nicholas' church, in 1753. Dr. Thomas, son of Bishop Thomas, and author of a survey of the Cathedral of Worcester; and Drs. Mackenzie, Johnstone, and Wall, eminent medical practitioners, were also residents. Among the eminent natives have been, Edward Kelly, noted for his knowledge of chymistry and astrology, born in 1555; John, Lord Somers, a celebrated lawyer; and Mr. Thomas White, a distinguished sculptor and architect. Worcester gives the inferior title of Marquess to the Duke of Beaufort.

WORCESTERSHIRE, an inland county, bounded on the west by Herefordshire, on the south and south-east by Gloucestershire, on the east and north-east by Warwickshire, on the north by Staffordshire and a detached portion of Salop, and on the north-west by Salop. It extends from 52° 0' to 52° 30' (N. Lat.), and from 2° 14' to 3° 0' (W. Lon.), and, including the detached portions, comprises an area of upwards of 780 square miles, or about 500,000 acres. Within its limits are 46,919 inhabited houses, 2902 uninhabited, and 348 in course of erection; and the population amounts to 233,336, of whom 114,664 are males, and 118,672 females. At the period of the Roman invasion of Britain, the district now included within the confines of Worcestershire is supposed to have been partly occupied by the ancient British tribe of the Cornavii, and partly by that of the Dobuni. Under the Roman dominion it was a portion of the division called Flavia Casariensis, but being then for the most part low and woody, it received but little attention. On the complete establishment of the Saxon heptarchy, it was comprised in the kingdom of Mercia; and in the predatory invasions of the Danes it suffered, at a later period, in common with most other parts of the kingdom. This county is in the diocese of Worcester, and province of Canterbury, and forms an archdeaconry, including the deaneries of Blockley, Droitwich, Evesham, Kidderminster, Pershore, Powick, Kington, Warwick, Wich, and Worcester: the number of parishes is 171. For purposes of civil government it is divided into the five hundreds of Blackenhurst, Doddingtree, Halfshire, Oswaldslow, and Pershore, each of which is separated into Upper and Lower, excepting Oswaldslow, which has also a middle division. It contains the city of Worcester; the borough and market towns of Bewdley, Droitwich, Dudley, Kidderminster, and Evesham; and the market-towns of Bromsgrove, Pershore, Shipston, Stourbridge, Stourport, Tenbury, and Upton. By the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, the county was divided into the Eastern and Western divisions, each empowered to send two members to parliament; two citizens are returned for the city of Worcester, two burgesses for Evesham, and one each for Bewdley, Droitwich, Dudley, and Kidderminster. The county is included in the Oxford circuit; and the assizes and quarter-sessions are held at Worcester, where stands the county gaol and house of correction.

The form of the county nearly approaches a parallel-ogram, two-thirds of the area of which lie to the east of the Severn ; but its boundaries are extremely irregular, and its detached portions numerous. The general appearance of the SURFACE, when viewed from the heights bordering it in different parts, is that of a rich plain, the more gentle elevations being hardly discernible. The Vale of the Severn, extending through it from north to south, a distance of about thirty miles, varies in breadth from a quarter of a mile to a mile, and contains about 10,000 acres. The Vale of Evesham is an indefinite tract in the south-eastern part of the county, including the Valley of the Avon, the adjoining uplands to the north of that river, and the whole of the vale land in the southern part of the county and the adjoining parts of Gloucestershire. To the north-east of Bromsgrove is a ridge of hills called the Lickey, which extends to Hagley, and has various branches eastward : some of its highest peaks rise to the height of nearly 900 feet. The Abberley hills, in the north-western part of the county, extend over the parish of Abberley, and are seen to a great distance, rising to about the same height as the last-mentioned : Witley hill is a little to the southward of these. Bredon hill is another remarkable elevation, to the south of Pershore, and on the south-eastern side of the Avon, rising to the height of nearly 900 feet. But by far the loftiest tract is the Malvern hills, a chain extending from north to south, upon a base about six miles in length and from one to two in breadth : a line passing along the summit of this ridge separates Worcestershire from Herefordshire ; the most elevated point attains the height of 1313 feet above the Severn. The views from most of these eminences are remarkable for their beauty and extent, particularly those from the Malvern hills ; and their rocky summits give a picturesque diversity to much of the scenery.

The SOILS are remarkable for their general fertility, and add a peculiarly rich verdure to a district presenting great beauty of outline, and enjoying an eminently fine climate. Those of the valleys traversed by the principal rivers consist of a deep sediment, which has been deposited by floods during a long series of ages : this sediment is in some places a pure clay, adapted to the making of bricks, but is generally a rich mould. Valuable clay and loamy soils occupy nearly half the county in its middle, southern, and western districts, and, besides the ordinary crops of other counties, yield great quantities of hops and fruits. The soil and climate being well adapted to the production of every kind of grain in abundance, the agriculture of the county is less subject to any characteristic system than that of almost any other ; the amount of arable land is estimated at 360,000 acres, and the crops most generally cultivated are, wheat, barley, oats, beans, peas, vetches, turnips, and hops. The sands of Wolverley are remarkable for their produce of carrots and carrot-seed, for the most part sold to persons who carry them to the markets of Birmingham, Stourbridge, or the populous parts of Staffordshire. The county has long been famous for the culture of hops, in all cases upon a deep loam, or a peaty soil, plentifully manured. The extensive vales, particularly that of the Severn, consist of meadows and pastures of a remarkably rich quality, occupying an extent of about 50,000 acres : almost any proportion of this land may be mown at pleasure, and a great quantity of hay is sent to the mining districts of Salop and Staffordshire. There are, besides, nearly 50,000 acres of permanent upland pasture, including parks and pleasure-grounds. The extent of land applied to the raising of vegetables, is estimated at about 5000 acres ; and there are very considerable horticultural tracts near the principal towns, more particularly on the north-eastern side of Worcester, and on the northern side of the town of Evesham. In the vicinity of the latter place are about 300 acres of garden-ground, which, besides producing all the other ordinary vegetables, supplies the cities of Bath and Bristol, and the town of Birmingham, with considerable quantities of early peas and asparagus ; great quantities of cucumbers and onions are exported from the same district, chiefly to the last-mentioned town, and much onion-seed is also produced there. The county has for many centuries been famous for its orchards, which flourish in a degree unknown to most other parts of the kingdom ; they are situated chiefly around the towns, villages, and farm-houses, mostly of the middle, southern, and western parts of the county, where the various kinds of fruit-trees are also frequently dispersed in the hedge-rows, and form an important source of profit. The average quantity of cider and perry made is remarkably great, for, besides supplying the consumption of the county, a large surplus, together with great quantities of raw fruit, is sent to other parts of the kingdom.

Worcestershire is adorned with a plentiful store of timber : in many parts are oak coppices of different degrees of growth, and in some are small tracts of the finest oak and ash timber, particularly in the neighbourhood of the different seats ; the most important produce of the underwoods is, poles for the hop-yards, and charcoal for the iron-works. Some parts possess beech-timber of excellent quality, and many of the precipitous heights bordering on the Severn, and the hills in some other places, are ornamented with large plantations of fir. The hedge-rows, too, throughout a large portion of the most fertile districts, are well stocked with some of the most valuable elm timber in the kingdom, more particularly in the parishes of Hartlebury, Elnley-Lovett, Ombersley, &c., great quantities of which are regularly cut down and sent to Birmingham, or exported by the Severn and the canals. On the borders of the rivers are many poplar and willow plantations, especially along the course of the Teme. The waste lands do not, at most, exceed 20,000 acres, and consist of high hilly tracts, or of small commons and wastes, dispersed in various quarters. Of the hilly wastes, the principal are the upper parts of the Malvern hills, which are very rocky ; of Bredon hill, near Pershore ; and of the Abberley and Witley hills, together with some of the uninclosed parts of Bromsgrove-Lickey. Wyre Forest, to the left of Bewdley, besides its woodlands, comprises also a considerable portion of open land.

The MINERAL PRODUCTIONS are of minor importance. Coal is obtained in the north-western part of the county, particularly at Mamble, which place communicates, by means of an iron railway, with the Leominster canal ; and again at Pensax, where the small refuse is partly converted into coke, highly esteemed for the drying of hops, and is partly used for burning the limestone obtained at Witley hill. Common rock salt and a species of gypsum are found at Droitwich. Limestone of the lias formation forms the substratum of nearly the whole south-eastern portion of the county, and is worked at South Littleton and other places; the kind called by geologists "carboniferous limestone," is found in the hills of the north-western part, and is burned in several places, particularly at Witley and Huddington. The town of Dudley is situated at the southern extremity of a range of limestone hills, of the Wenlock formation, part of the Silurian system of Murchison, which extends northward into Staffordshire; and this, upon which stands the castle and part of the town, is completely undermined by stupendous quarries. Freestone for building is obtained in several places. The Malvern hills are formed chiefly of a kind of decomposed granite, with which, on their northern side, gneiss is connected, and on their eastern, sienite. The lower ridge of Bromsgrove-Lickey is composed chiefly of quartz, a silicious stone, which is found to be a stone of the Caradoc formation altered by heat; the beacon hill, contiguous, is composed of a rock of igneous origin. The parallel and more elevated ridge of the Upper Lickey is composed of a much newer rock of the new red sandstone formation. In the Broadway hills a reddish stone is quarried. In the Vale of Evesham, in the parishes of Badsey, the three Littletons, and Prior's-Cleeve, are quarries of a calcareous flag-stone, about three inches thick, and of a very durable quality, some of it bearing a fine polish; considerable quantities are raised for gravestones, kitchen-floors, barn-floors, &c., and much of it is exported by means of the Avon navigation. Brick-clay, gravel, sand, and marl, exist in numerous places. The most remarkable fossil production is that found in the limestone at Dudley, thence called the "Dudley trilobite," of which several species have been discovered. The Manufactures are various, extensive, and important. Those of gloves and porcelain are carried on at Worcester. Stourbridge has a manufacture of glass, which has long flourished there, as it has also at Dudley; and at both places the iron manufacture is carried on to a very considerable extent. Nails, needles, and fish-hooks, are made at Bromsgrove, and also at Redditch, on the border of Warwickshire. Kidderminster is famous for its carpets; and the manufacture of bombazines is still carried on, but not so extensively as formerly. On the river Stour and its tributary streams, are several very considerable works in which the pig-iron from the foundries of Shropshire, Staffordshire, and other mining districts, is rendered malleable, and worked into bars, rods, sheet-iron, &c. The manufacture of salt, at Droitwich, is known to have been practised so early as the year 816, when the county formed part of the Saxon kingdom of Mercia.

The principal Rivers are the Severn, the Upper Avon, the Teme, and the Stour. The Severn is navigable for vessels of 80 tons' burthen as high as Worcester bridge, and for those of 60 in the higher part of its course through the county; but the navigation, though of great benefit and importance, is frequently impeded in the summer by sands and shoals. By the statute of the 30th of Charles II., cap. 9., the conservancy of the river, within the limits of the county, is granted to the magistrates of Worcestershire. The Upper Avon, so early as the year 1637, was made navigable, with the aid of locks, in the whole of its course through Worcestershire, a distance of about twenty miles. The Teme has too great a declivity, and its waters are too shallow, to admit of its being navigated higher than a small distance above Powick bridge; the scenery on its banks is particularly beautiful. The Stour is navigable for a short distance to some of the iron-works on its banks. The Trent and Severn, or, as it is more commonly called, the Staffordshire and Worcestershire canal, enters the county near Wolverley, and thence proceeds down the valley of the Stour, and by the town of Kidderminster, to the navigable channel of the Severn, at Stourport, into which it opens through a spacious basin: the length of that part of its course included in Worcestershire is about nine miles, in which it has nine locks, and a fall of 90 feet. This canal, one of the works of the celebrated Brindley, is that branch of the Grand Trunk which unites the navigation of the Severn with the water communication between the rivers Trent and Mersey; the act for its formation was obtained in 1766, and it was completed about the year 1770. The Droitwich canal, from that town to the Severn, down the valley of the Salwarpe, was constructed soon after the above, and by the same engineer; it is five miles and a half long, with five locks and a fall of about 60 feet, and the cost of its formation was £25,000. The noble canal from Birmingham to the Severn, immediately below Worcester, called the Birmingham and Worcester canal, for vessels of sixty tons' burthen, commences with a short tunnel in the vicinity of the first-mentioned town, and proceeds nearly southward, across two valleys, by extensive embankments, to a little beyond King's-Norton, where it passes through a tunnel upwards of a mile in length. Then, after completing its summit level of sixteen miles and three-quarters from the wharfs at Birmingham, it descends south-westward from the towns of Bromsgrove and Droitwich, by a lockage of 450 feet fall to the Severn. The act of parliament for its formation was obtained in 1791, and its total length is twenty-nine miles. The Dudley Extension canal branches from it near Selly Oak, and proceeds westward, through a long tunnel, to Hales-Owen, a short distance beyond which it is carried through another tunnel, and, on emerging, pursues a winding northerly course to Dudley, and there passes through a tunnel under the limestone hills, nearly two miles in length, into the county of Stafford, where it forms a junction with the Birmingham canal from that town to Wolverhampton; its total length is thirteen miles. The Stratford-upon-Avon canal branches from the Birmingham and Worcester canal near King's-Norton, and thence proceeds eastward, through a small tunnel, into Warwickshire. The Kington, Leominster, and Stourport canal was projected towards the close of the last century, the first act of parliament for the execution of the design having been obtained in 1791; but the expense was found much to exceed the sum at first computed, and only the part of its course between Leominster and Stourport has been completed. The Birmingham and Gloucester railway enters the county from Birmingham, and passing a little to the east of Bromsgrove, Droitwich, and Worcester, and to the west of Pershore, quits it to the north-east of Tewkesbury.

The Roman roads that crossed the county were, the Ikeneld-street, which ran northward, from Alcester, in Warwickshire, through its north-western extremity, into Staffordshire; another that passed from Worcester into Salop; a third, from Worcester, southward by Upton, to Tewkesbury, where it joined the Ikeneld-street; and the Ridge-way, which bounds the county for several miles, on the east. Numerous vestiges of them are still visible; as also of a Fosse-way, which pursues its course through the detached parish of Blöckley, and an ancient road that intersected Hagley common, now called the King's Headland. Stukeley supposes Upton, on the banks of the Severn, to have been the Ypocessa of the Romans; and Worcester, from the termination of its name and other circumstances, appears to have been either a Roman station, or a fort. The remains of antiquity include few very remarkable objects. Near the Four-shire Stone, at a point where the counties of Worcester, Gloucester, Warwick, and Oxford meet, is a small earthwork, supposed by Gough to be of British construction; and there are traces of other old encampments in the vicinities of Bredon, Kempsey, and Malvern; as also on Witchbury hill, Woodbury hill, and Conderton hill, in the parish of Overbury. Various coins of the Lower Empire have been found in the vicinity of Hagley, particularly near the large camp on Witchbury hill; and on Clent heath, about half a mile from Witchbury, are five barrows, assigned by popular tradition to the Romans, which, on being opened, were found to contain burnt wood, ashes, and bones. The number of Religious houses, including colleges and hospitals, was about twenty-eight; and remains yet exist of the abbeys of Bordesley, Evesham, and Pershore; of the commandery of St. Wulstan at Worcester; of the priories of Dodford and Great Malvern; and of the nunnery of Cokehill, in the parish of Inkberrow. There are also relics of the ancient castles of Dudley; Ham, near Clifton-upon-Teme; Hartlebury; and Holt. Worcestershire contains a considerable number of elegant mansions, among the principal of which are, Croome Park, Hartlebury Castle, Hewell Park, Madresfield, Northwick Park, Ombersley Court, Witley Court, Hagley Park, Hanbury Hall, and Stanford Court. The mineral springs are very numerous; the most noted are the chalybeate waters of Bredon, Bromsgrove (which are also petrifying), Hallow Park near Worcester, Kidderminster, and Worcester; and those of other qualities at Abberton, near Naunton-Beauchamp, and at Church-hill. But the Malvern wells, which possess various properties, are by far the most celebrated, and, in conjunction with the fine climate and scenery of the surrounding country, have rendered the town of Great Malvern a place of fashionable resort. The salt springs of Droitwich have been noticed above.

WORDSLEY, a hamlet, in the parish of KING'S SWINFORD, union of STOURBRIDGE, N. division of the hundred of SEISDON, S. division of the county of STAFFORD, 2 miles (N.) from Stourbridge; containing 3642 inhabitants. This is a large village, situated on the road from Stourbridge to Wolverhampton; the soil around it is of a sandy quality, and the surface is undulated. Glass-works have been established here for some centuries; there is also an iron-foundry, and coal-mines are wrought within a quarter of a mile. The river Stour passes close to the village, and the Dudley and Stourbridge canal runs through it. Petty-sessions are held every Monday. The church at Swinford being too small for the wants of this populous district, a handsome edifice, which, with the parsonage, is picturesquely seated, was erected in 1831, and is now considered as the parish church. There is a place of worship for Methodists; also a national school built in 1836, and an infants' school in 1843, with residences for the master and mistress.

WORDWELL (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of THINGOE, hundred of BLACKBOURN, W. division of SUFFOLK, 6 miles (N. by W.) from Bury St. Edmund's; containing 66 inhabitants, and comprising 2209a. 16p. The living is a discharged rectory, united to that of West Stow, and valued in the king's books at £7. 7. 3½. The tithes have been commuted for £174. 5. 9. The church is a small ancient edifice in the Norman style.

WORFIELD (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union of BRIDGENORTH, Hales-Owen division of the hundred of BRIMSTREE, S. division of SALOP, 3¾ miles (N. E. by E.) from Bridgenorth; containing 1643 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £16. 15., and in the gift of the impropiator, W. Y. Davenport, Esq.: the great tithes have been commuted for £1745, and the vicarial for £239; the glebe comprises about two acres. The church contains 150 free sittings, the Incorporated Society having granted £60 in aid of the expense. William Lloyd and Thomas Parker, in 1613, conveyed estates now producing an income of about £46, for the maintenance of a school.

WORGRET, a tything, in the parish of EAST STOKE, union of WAREHAM and PURBECK, hundred of HUNDREDSBARROW, Wareham division of DORSET, 1 mile (W.) from Wareham.

WORKINGTON (ST. MICHAEL), a market-town, sea-port, and parish, in the union of COCKERMOUTH, ALLERDALE ward above Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND; containing, with the chapelry of Great Clifton, and the townships of Little Clifton, Stainburn, and Winscales, 6994 inhabitants, of whom 6045 are in the town, 34 miles (S. W. by W.) from Carlisle, and 310 (N. W. by N.) from London. The only historical circumstance of interest connected with this place is the landing here, in 1568, of Mary, Queen of Scots, when she sought an asylum in England, after her escape from the field of Langside: she was hospitably entertained at Workington Hall (the apartment she occupied being still called the Queen's chamber), until Elizabeth gave directions for her removal to Carlisle Castle. The town is situated on the southern bank of the Derwent, near its influx into the sea, and, in addition to the older part, which is narrow and irregular, contains some modern streets, in which are many handsome and well-built houses; it is well supplied with water from the Derwent, and in 1840, an act was passed for paving, watching, and otherwise improving the town. There are a small theatre in Christian-street, and an assembly and news room in the Square. The Hall, the ancient seat of the Curwens, occupies an eminence on the south side of the river, commanding beautiful views of the surrounding country, the sea, and Scotland. Upon the Cloffocks, an extra-parochial meadow, or island north-east of the town, on the banks of the Derwent, races are held in August. A handsome stone bridge of three arches crosses the river, at the entrance into the town from Maryport, which was erected in 1763, at the expense of the county.

The TRADE principally arises from the exportation of coal to Ireland, in which more than 100 vessels are employed. The harbour has been secured by the erection of a breakwater within these few years, and is now one of the safest on the coast: the entrance is lighted with gas. Great improvement has been also effected by enlarging the quays, owing to the indefatigable exertions of the late Mr. Curwen; and in 1840, an act was passed for its preservation and regulation. About 500 persons are engaged in the collieries; and there are three ship-builders' yards, in which vessels of from 300 to 400 tons' burthen are constructed, besides two patent-slips: the manufacture of cordage and other articles connected with the shipping is carried on, though not so extensively as formerly; and there is a factory for imitation Leghorn hats, giving employment to upwards of 400 men, women, and children, during the summer months, in the preparation of the straw, which is grown in the neighbourhood. The salmon-fishery, for which Camden mentions this place to have been famous, although not so productive as in his time, is still pursued in the Derwent and along the coast. The markets are on Wednesday and Saturday, of which the former is the principal, a large corn-market, recently removed to Washington-street: there is another market-place, for butter, poultry, &c., which is connected with convenient shambles for butchers' meat. The fairs, on the 18th of May and October, have nearly fallen into disuse. Manor courts occur occasionally, and the county magistrates hold petty-sessions every Wednesday, at the public office in Udale-street.

The LIVING is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £33. 5.; net income, £966; patron, Henry Curwen, Esq.: the tithes were commuted for land in 1809. The church, situated at the west end of the town, and rebuilt in 1770, is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a square tower. A district church dedicated to St. John, has been erected under the auspices of Her Majesty's Commissioners, the first stone of which was laid on April 15th, 1822; it is a fine building of the Tuscan order, with a portico and cupola, and the expense of its erection was upwards of £10,000. There are places of worship for Independents, Primitive Methodists, Wesleyans, Presbyterians, and Roman Catholics. A school in the Square was founded in 1808, by the late Mr. Curwen, when the free grammar school was broken up; there is also a school of industry, established in 1816, for thirty girls, and several benevolent institutions are maintained by voluntary contributions. On an eminence near the sea, at a short distance hence, are the remains of an ancient dilapidated building called the Old Chapel, which, as it commanded an extensive view of Solway Firth and the Scottish coast, was probably used as a watch-tower, to guard against the incursions of the Scots.

WORKSOP (St. Mary and St. Cuthbert), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the Hatfield division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, N division of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 26 miles (N.) from Nottingham, and 146 (N. N. W.) from London; containing, with the chapelry of Shireoaks, and the townships of Gateford, Haggonfield, Osberton, Radford, and Scofton, 6197 inhabitants. This place, which in Domesday book is written Wirchesope, and in other records of that period Wyrksoppe and Wirkensop, appears to have belonged, prior to the Conquest, to Elsi, a Saxon nobleman. It was afterwards granted by the Conqueror to Roger de Busli, and subsequently became the property of William de Lovetot, who, in the reign of Henry I., founded here a priory for Canons Regular of the order of St. Augustine, the prior of which was, in the time of Henry III., summoned to parliament. It passed, after a considerable period, by the marriage of the heiress of the Lovetots, to the family of Furnival; then to that of Nevill; and from that family to the Talbots, afterwards Earls of Shrewsbury, to whom, on the dissolution of monastic establishments, the revenue of the priory, valued at £239, was granted by Henry VIII. From this family the manor descended by marriage to the earls of Arundel, now dukes of Norfolk, who held it as tenants in chief of the crown, by the service of a knight's fee, and of procuring a glove for the king's right hand at his coronation, and supporting that hand while holding the sceptre; it has lately been sold to the Duke of Newcastle. In Dec. 1460, an engagement took place at Worksop between the forces of the Duke of York and those of the Duke of Somerset, when the latter were defeated. Gilbert, first Earl of Shrewsbury, who so much distinguished himself in the French wars under Henry V., built the magnificent mansion-house, afterwards the ducal residence, and the place of confinement of Mary, Queen of Scots, in the sixteenth year of her captivity, she being at that time in the custody of the earl; and her son, James I., on the 20th of April, 1603, rested here, on his way to London to assume the English crown. In 1761, it was accidentally destroyed by fire, but was soon afterwards splendidly rebuilt by his grace the Duke of Norfolk.

The town is situated in a pleasant valley, near the northern extremity of the forest of Sherwood, in the midst of a well-wooded and picturesque country; and the vicinity is ornamented by the magnificent seats of several noblemen, amongst which are, Welbeck Abbey, the seat of the Duke of Portland; Clumber, the mansion of the Duke of Newcastle; and Thoresby, the seat of Earl Manvers: Worksop manor-house has been lately pulled down. The place is neat in its general appearance, and consists, in the higher and principal part of one long street, with a second running into it at right angles; the houses are well built, and the town is paved, lighted by subscription with gas, and well supplied with water. Camden describes it as famous for the production of liquorice, but this has long since ceased to be cultivated. Malt, which is made in considerable quantities, barley being much grown in the surrounding country, is the principal article of trade; and the Chesterfield canal, passing on the northern side of the town, affords every facility for its conveyance to Manchester and the other markets to which it is chiefly sent: on this canal are wharfs communicating with the town, and to the east it crosses the river Ryton by an aqueduct. The market is on Wednesday; there are fairs on March 31st and Oct. 14th, for horses and cattle, and a statute-fair occurs about three weeks after. Constables are chosen at the annual court leet of the lord of the manor.

The parish comprises 17,445*a. 1r. 7p.*, a large portion of which is within the parks of Worksop manor and Clumber, and in wood and plantations; the commons and forest waste lands were inclosed under an act passed in 1803, and are now in a state of high cultivation. The LIVING is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12. 4. 2.; net income, £388; patron, the Duke of Norfolk; impropiator, the Duke of Portland: the tithes were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1803. The church, standing on the eastern side of the town, comprises the western portion of the priory church, and its cathedral-like towers form an interesting object in the view of the town; it is one of the principal remaining specimens of Norman architecture, but in the exterior much of the English style has been mixed with it. The western entrance is under a beautiful receding Norman arch, with zigzag ornaments, and the towers which surmount it have circular and pointed arched windows, in different gradations. The nave is separated from the aisles by eight pillars, alternately cylindrical and octangular, supporting circular arches with quatrefoils, above which are two tiers of windows: the old pulpit and reading-desk have been lately taken down and replaced by new ones. At the south-eastern extremity of the church are the remains of the beautiful chapel of St. Mary, forming an interesting ruin, the ornamental parts of which are most richly executed, and the windows considered some of the most perfect models of the lancet shape in the kingdom. On the northern side, and contiguous to the church, are some fragments of the walls of the priory, and in the meadows below are extensive traces of the foundation. The priory well is still in high estimation, for the purity and softness of the water. The principal gateway to the priory yet exists, forming the entrance towards the church; it is in the later English style, and is 20 yards in front, with a pediment, in the tympanum of which is a niche with much tabernacle-work, and in it a figure in a sitting posture. Above is a window of twelve lights, also two canopied niches of great beauty, which contain figures described by Dodsworth, when they were in a much better state of preservation, as those of armed knights, each bearing a shield, that on the west charged with a lion rampant for Talbot, and that on the east bearing a bend between six mantlets for Furnival. The room over the gateway is used as a national school for boys; the stone staircase leading to it is entered by an elegant porch rising about two-thirds of the height of the whole front, the doors, windows, niches, roofs, &c., of which are of the most beautiful proportions and elaborate workmanship. At Shireoaks is a neat chapel, built and endowed in 1809, by the Rev. John Hewitt, then lord of the manor. At Scofton, close to the hamlet of Osberton, a handsome chapel, capable of accommodating upwards of 200 persons, has been erected and endowed by Geo. Savile Foljambe, Esq., to whom the right of presentation belongs, and was consecrated Dec. 30th, 1834; and a stately church has been erected at Clumber, near the seat, by the Duke of Newcastle, who has liberally endowed it. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans; and near the site of the manor-house is a chapel for Roman Catholics, who are numerous in the neighbourhood. The poor law union of Worksop comprises 26 parishes or places, 11 of which are in the county of Nottingham, 11 in the West riding of York, and 4 in Derbyshire; the whole containing a population of 17,975. On a hill at the western side of the town, the site of the castle of the Lovetots may still be traced; and in the park of the manor are some tumuli, which, from fragments discovered in them, appear to be ancient British. The hamlet of Shireoaks is so named from an oak whose branches are said to have overshadowed a portion of the three counties of Nottingham, Derby, and York. At Osberton, human bones, stone coffins, an antique font, some stained glass, &c., have been found at various times, the supposed remains of a church. The ruins of the old manor-house of Gateford, another hamlet in the parish, with its gables, moats, &c., are still visible; and near them, in 1826, several Roman coins of Nero and Domitian were found.

WORLABY, an extra-parochial liberty, in the union of LOUTH, hundred of HILL, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 7 miles (S.) from Louth; containing 28 inhabitants.

WORLABY (St. CLEMENT), a parish, in the union of GLANDFORD-BRIGG, N. division of the wapentake of YARBOROUGH, parts of LINDSAY, county of LINCOLN, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Glandford-Brigg; containing 426 inhabitants. This place, which is included in the duchy of Lancaster, was once the seat of the family of Belasis, one of whom, John, second son of the first Viscount Fauconberg, was lord of the treasury under James II., and was in 1644 created a baron, of Worlabby, or Worlethy; a title that became extinct on the death of his grandson without issue. The parish is situated on the road from Barton-upon-Humber to Glandford-Brigg, and comprises 2170 acres, in nearly equal portions of arable and grass land, part consisting of some rich marshes extending westward to the navigable river Ancholme, and part lying on the Wold hill, east of the village; the soil is mostly chalky, and the scenery is beautiful, though towards the west the surface is flat. The living, of which the net income is £278, is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 8. 4., and in the gift of John Webb, Esq., who is also impropiator. The church is an ancient structure, with a square tower. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; also an almshouse for 4 widows, founded in 1663 by Lord Belasis, who endowed it with property now producing, with a bequest of £100 by William Cook, in 1810, a yearly sum of £25. 14.

WORLDHAM, EAST, a parish, in the union and hundred of ALTON, Alton and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Alton; containing 254 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 1684 acres, of which 910 are arable, 454 meadow and pasture, 90 wood, and 35 hop-plantations; about two-thirds of the land are on the malm rock, and the remainder a strong cold clay; the surface is undulated, and the scenery pleasingly varied. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 18. $1\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of the impropiators, the President and Fellows of Magdalen College, Oxford: the great tithes have been commuted for £217. 7., and the vicarial for £157. 13.; the glebe comprises 7 acres. The church is an ancient structure in the later English style, On a tumulus called King John's Hill, fragments of Roman pottery have been met with, and the foundations of a building discovered.

WORLDHAM, WEST (St. NICOLAS), a parish, in the union and hundred of ALTON, Alton and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Alton; containing 94 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, of which the net income, formerly £38, has been augmented with £200 from Winchester College, and £200 Queen Anne's Bounty; patrons and improprators, the Warden and Fellows of the College.

WORLE (ST. MARTIN), a parish, in the union of AXBRIDGE, hundred of WINTERSTOKE, E. division of SOMERSET, 8 miles (N. W.) from Axbridge; containing 885 inhabitants. The surface is boldly undulated, and the substratum generally limestone; on a hill to the north of the village are some mines of lead and calamine, but they are not wrought at present. Great numbers of poultry are fed here, and sold to the inhabitants of Weston-super-Mare, which has recently become a favourite watering-place. The Bristol and Exeter railway skirts the parish on the south. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12. 15., and in the patronage of the Crown; improprators, the Trustees of a charity. The great tithes have been commuted for £90, and the vicarial for £310; the glebe comprises 5 acres. The church is a neat structure, with a tower surmounted by a small spire, and contains a pulpit of stone richly sculptured, and part of some shrine-work, and sedilia of stone. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. In the vicinity are vestiges of a Roman camp.

WORLESTON, a township, in the parish of ACTON, union and hundred of NANTWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N.) from Nantwich; containing 391 inhabitants.

WORLINGHAM (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union and hundred of WANGFORD, E. division of SUFFOLK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. E. by S.) from Beccles; containing 208 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1726 acres, of which 114 are in Worlingham Parva, and is bounded on the north-east by the navigable river Waveney, which separates it from the county of Norfolk. The living is a rectory, with that of Worlingham Parva annexed, valued in the king's books at £12, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £303, and the glebe comprises 47 acres. The church is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower, and contains a monument by Chantrey, to General Sparrow and his son. The church of Worlingham Parva, which was dedicated to St. Peter, has been demolished. A part of the rents of the town-estate, producing £30. 10. 6. per annum, is appropriated to teaching children. This place gives the title of Baron to the Earl of Gosford, who has a seat here.

WORLINGTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of MILDENHALL, hundred of LACKFORD, W. division of SUFFOLK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W. S. W.) from Mildenhall; containing 351 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the north by the navigable river Lark, over which is a ferry, and comprises by measurement 1955 acres: the Hall and manor are the property of Sir F. G. Cooper, Bart. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £19. 6. 8.; net income, £197; patrons, the family of Windsor.

WORLINGTON, EAST (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of SOUTH MOLTON, hundred of WITHERIDGE, South Molton, and N. divisions of DEVON, 6 miles (E.) from Chulmleigh; containing 287 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 15. 10.; net income, £208; patron, the Hon. N. Fellowes. In the neighbourhood are the remains of an ancient cross, and Roman coins have been found.

WORLINGTON, WEST, (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union of SOUTH MOLTON, hundred of WITHERIDGE, South Molton and N. divisions of DEVON, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Chulmleigh; containing 218 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2330 acres, of which 1165 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 15. 10.; net income, £155; patron, Lewis Buck, Esq. Within the parish are the ruins of a castellated mansion, the ancient seat of the Affetons.

WORLINGWORTH (ST. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of HOXNE, E. division of SUFFOLK, 16 miles (N.) from Woodbridge; containing 786 inhabitants. This parish, which occupies one of the most elevated sites in the county, comprises 2246a. 2r. 6p. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Southolt annexed, valued in the king's books at £19. 12. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of Lord Henniker: the tithes have been commuted for £680, and the glebe comprises 52 acres. The church is principally in the later English style, with a square embattled tower, and contains some handsome monuments, of which one is to the memory of Elizabeth, Duchess Dowager of Chandos, and another to Sir John and Lady Major; there are considerable remains of stained glass, and the font is highly enriched, and has a lofty and elegant cover. John Baldry, in 1689, bequeathed a house and land; and William Godbold, in 1698, left other land, for teaching children. The town lands produce £200 per annum, for repairing the church, and supplying the poor with coal and bread.

WORMBRIDGE (ST. THOMAS THE APOSTLE), a parish, in the union of DORE, hundred of WEBTREE, county of HEREFORD, 9 miles (S. W.) from Hereford; containing 93 inhabitants, and comprising 707 acres. The living is a donative curacy; net income, £51; patron, E. Bolton Clive, Esq., the improprator, whose tithes have been commuted for £100.

WORMEGAY (HOLY CROSS), a parish, in the union of DOWNHAM, hundred of CLACKCLOSE, W. division of NORFOLK, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Downham-Market; containing 330 inhabitants. This place is of great antiquity, and is said to have acquired considerable importance before the Conquest. In the time of Henry II., the lordship was held by the Bardolphs, who had a castle here, of which the moat may still be traced; and subsequently by the Warrens, who, in the reign of Richard I. or John, founded here a priory of Black canons in honour of the Holy Cross and St. John the Evangelist, which, in 1468, became a cell to the monastery of Pentney. The parish comprises 2788a. 3r. 16p., of which 800 acres are arable, 1670 meadow and pasture, and 30 woodland: the navigable river Nar bounds the parish on the north, and at Setchey-bridge is a large brewery and malting establishment. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £40; patron, the Bishop of Norwich; improprator, W. W. Lee Warner, Esq. The tithes have been commuted for £349, and the glebe comprises 3 acres. The church is in the early and later English styles, with a square embattled tower. On making some excavations at the Priory farm, various relics of the ancient priory were found, consisting of fragments of the building, a passage with a tessellated pavement, and some stone coffins.

WORMHILL, a chapelry, in the parish of TIDESWELL, hundred of HIGH PEAK, N. division of the county of DERBY, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Tideswell; containing 337 inhabitants. The township comprises 4332*a.* 2*r.* 35*p.*, of which about 238 acres are rocky pasture, and the remainder chiefly arable; the soil is a dry brown mould, resting on a substratum of limestone. The neighbourhood abounds with beautiful scenery; the river Wye flows through the township, and the vale of Chee Tor is strikingly romantic. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £270; patrons, certain Trustees. The chapel, dedicated to St. Margaret, is an ancient structure of rough limestone.

WORMINGFORD (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of LEXDEN and WINSTREE, Colechester division of the hundred of LEXDEN, N. division of ESSEX, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Nayland; containing 524 inhabitants. This place is situated on the navigable river Stour, from a ford across which, and a former proprietor of the manor, it derives its name. The parish comprises 2185*a.* 1*r.*, of which 1933 acres are arable, 240 pasture, and 10 woodland; the surface rises gradually from the bank of the river to a considerable elevation; the soil is sandy, with a large intermixture of clay. The living is a vicarage, endowed with a portion of the rectorial tithes, and valued in the king's books at £7. 13. 4.; patron, and impropiator of the remainder of the rectorial tithes, John J. Tufnell, Esq. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £496. 17., and the vicarial for £369, and the glebe comprises 4 acres. The church is a small ancient edifice, with a low square tower. A national school is endowed with £10 per annum.

WORMINGHALL (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of THAME, hundred of ASHENDON, county of BUCKINGHAM, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Thame; containing 314 inhabitants. A market, formerly held on Thursday, was granted to John de Rivers, in 1304, with a fair on the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 18. 10.; net income, £58; patron and impropiator, Viscount Clifden. An almshouse for four women and six men, was founded in 1670, by John King, and endowed by him with property now producing a rental of about £80. There is also a fund of £20 per annum, arising from various bequests, distributed in bread among the poor.

WORMINGTON (Holy Trinity), a parish, in the union of WINCHCOMB, Lower division of the hundred of KIFTSGATE, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 5 miles (N. by E.) from Winchcomb; containing 73 inhabitants, and comprising by measurement 539 acres. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 15. 5.; net income, £143; patron, Josiah Gist, Esq. The tithes were commuted for land in 1812; the glebe comprises 115 acres.

WORMINGTON-GRANGE, a hamlet, in the parish of DIDBROOK, union of WINCHCOMB, Lower division of the hundred of KIFTSGATE, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER; containing 52 inhabitants.

WORMINSTER, a tything, in the parish of St. Cuthbert, without the limits of the city of WELLS, union of WELLS, hundred of WELLS-FORUM, E. division of SOMERSET; containing 78 inhabitants.

WORMLEIGHTON (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of SOUTHAM, Burton-Dassett division of the hundred of KINGTON, S. division of the county of WAR- WICK, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Southam; containing 188 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3157*a.* 3*r.* 26*p.*, the whole of which, with the exception of a few acres, is rich pasture and meadow land. The Oxford canal passes near the village. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 13. 4.; net income, £80; patron and impropiator, Earl Spencer. The church is an ancient structure, partly in the Norman style. There is a school, endowed with £24 per annum by Mrs. Catherine Arnold. The place gives the title of Baron to the Duke of Marlborough.

WORMLEY (St. Lawrence), a parish, in the union of WARE, hundred and county of HERTFORD, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Cheshunt; containing 500 inhabitants. The Northern and Eastern railway, and the New River, pass through the parish; and the river Lea bounds it on the east. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10. 12. 3½., and in the gift of Sir Abraham Hume, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £200. The church has a Norman doorway, and, at the west end, a square wooden tower, and contains several tablets, altar-tombs, and other sepulchral memorials.

WORMSHILL (St. Giles), a parish, in the union of HOLLINGBOURN, hundred of EYHORNE, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, 5 miles (S. S. W.) from Sittingbourne; containing 218 inhabitants. It comprises 1450 acres, of which 700 are arable, 320 woodland, and the remainder meadow and pasture; the surface has an elevation of 530 feet above the sea, and is intersected with deep valleys, and the wells that supply the parish are sunk to the depth of 370 feet. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10, and in the gift of Christ's Hospital, London: the tithes have been commuted for £266, and the glebe comprises 30 acres. The church, a plain building of flint with a low square tower, contains a few fragments of stained glass: the parsonage-house has been lately much improved.

WORMSLEY (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of WEOLEY, hundred of GRIMSWORTH, county of HEREFORD, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Weobley; containing 109 inhabitants, and consisting of 1180 acres. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of Sir W. R. Boughton, Bart., and others. Thomas Andrew Knight, Esq., a celebrated horticulturist, and the father of all the important improvements which have been made in that science during the last twenty years, was a native of this place.

WORPLESDON (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of GUILDFORD, First division of the hundred of WOKEING, W. division of SURREY, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Guildford; containing, with the tythings of Burgham, Perry-Hill, West-End, and Wyke, 1424 inhabitants. The parish comprises 6795*a.* 3*r.* 34*p.*, of which about 300 acres are woodland, and 1367 common or waste: the Wey and Arun navigation passes through it, and a telegraph, which is one on the line to Plymouth, has been erected near the church, at an expense of £2000, and is inhabited by a lieutenant of the royal navy, who has the management of it. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £24. 13. 9., and in the gift of Eton College: the tithes have been commuted for £1068, and the glebe comprises 76 acres. The church, an ancient structure in the early English style, contains some interesting monuments; the east window is embellished with stained glass, collected and arranged at the expense of the Rev. W. Roberts, incumbent, in 1802. The Rev. Dr. Moore, in 1706, bequeathed £200, directing the interest to be applied in teaching children. In 1829, the remains of a Roman tessellated pavement were discovered on Broad-street common; the building of which it formed the floor, was 62 feet long and 23 wide within the walls, and divided into five separate apartments, with a passage on the western side extending through the whole length; the tesserae were of ironstone about one inch square.

WORSALL, HIGH, a chapelry, in the parish of NORTH-ALLERTON, union of STOCKTON, wapentake of ALLERTONSHIRE, N. riding of YORK, 3 miles (S. S. W.) from Yarm; containing 143 inhabitants. This place, which forms a widely-detached portion of the parish, lying at a distance of twelve miles from the church, is pleasantly situated on the south bank of the Tees; the township comprises 1505*a*. 1*r*. 10*p.*, chiefly the property of Thomas Moor Wayne, Esq. The surface is undulated; the soil, which is a strong clay, is fertile, and winding round the river the scenery is picturesque; the lands are in a highly-improved state of cultivation, and are divided into several farms. The chapel is a neat structure, containing 60 sittings: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £60, and in the patronage of the Vicar of North-Allerton.

WORSALL, LOW, a township, in the parish of KIRK-LEAVINGTON, union of STOCKTON, W. division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, N. riding of YORK, 3 miles (S. W.) from Yarm; containing 146 inhabitants. This township, which is in the district of Cleveland, and situated on the southern acclivity of the picturesque valley of Teesdale, comprises 1190 acres, belonging to various proprietors; the lands are divided into several farms, and are in a state of profitable cultivation.

WORSBROUGH, a chapelry, in the parish of DARFIELD, wapentake of STAINCROSS, W. riding of YORK, 3 miles (S. by E.) from Barnsley; containing 3800 inhabitants. The chapelry comprises 3261*a*. 1*r*. 28*p.*, of which 1301 acres are arable, 1481 meadow and pasture, 341 woodland, and 75 water: there are extensive mines of the Ten-foot coal in full operation, and several quarries of stone of good quality for building. The village is beautifully situated on an eminence, surrounded on all sides with richly-diversified scenery, and commanding some fine views, embracing the mansions and grounds of Wortley Hall, the seat of Lord Wharnccliffe, and Wentworth Castle, that of T. F. Vernon Wentworth, Esq. The Dearne and Dove canal passes to Worsbrough Bridge, affording facilities of conveyance for the produce of the various works carried on in the neighbourhood. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £150; patron, the Rector of Darfield. The tithes have been commuted for £500. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, was, with the exception of the tower and spire, rebuilt in 1839, at a cost of £1200; it is a handsome structure in the later English style, and contains 800 sittings, of which 350 are free, in consideration of a grant of £200 from the Incorporated Society for the building and enlarging of churches. A free school is endowed with an annual pension of £4. 15. from the crown, and an annuity of £13. 6. S., bequeathed in 1631, by John Rayney, Esq., who also endowed a lectureship in the chapel with £30 per annum. A school for girls is endowed with £2 per annum; and an infants' school is supported by William Newman, Esq., of Darley-Cliffe Hall. Rockley Hall, now a farm-house, was the seat of the ancient family of Rockley, of whom Sir Simon founded the chapel in 1300.

WORSBROUGH BRIDGE and DALE, a populous district, in the chapelry of WORSBROUGH, parish of DARFIELD, wapentake of STAINCROSS, W. riding of YORK. It abounds with coal and ironstone, both of which are wrought by Messrs. Field, Coopers, and Faulds, and others, whose works afford employment to more than 1000 persons; the coal is sent to all parts of Lincolnshire, the eastern coast, London, &c.; and pig-iron is manufactured in large quantities. There are also glass-works on an extensive scale, works for the making of naphtha and pyroligneous acid, kilns for burning lime, and works for the preparation of charcoal. A branch of the Dearne and Dove canal communicating with the river Don, affords facilities of conveyance to the ports of Goole, Hull, &c., and of shipping the produce of the district to all parts of the world. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. The poor are entitled to a share of Rayney's charity, in the distribution of coal.

WORSLEY, a township, in the parish of ECCLES, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 6 miles (W. by N.) from Manchester; containing 8337 inhabitants. In the 10th of George II., an act was obtained for making navigable the river called Worsley brook, but the design was not carried into effect; and in the 32nd of the same reign, the celebrated Duke of Bridgewater obtained an act, and subsequently other acts, enabling him to construct a series of canals from his extensive collieries here to different places, affording the means of conveying coal, &c., through a populous manufacturing district. The underground canals and tunnels at Worsley are said to be eighteen miles in length, and their construction to have cost £168,960. The Worsley Archers' Society, formed in August 1826, consists of twenty-four members, who hold their meetings every Wednesday at the Grapes' inn, from the first Wednesday in April to the first in October. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WORSTEAD (St. Mary), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the TUNSTEAD and HAPPING incorporation, hundred of TUNSTEAD, E. division of NORFOLK, 2 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. E.) from North Walsham, and 121 (N. E. by N.) from London; containing 834 inhabitants. This place was once celebrated for the invention and manufacture of woollen twists and stuffs, thence called worsted goods; but this branch of trade, soon after its introduction by the Flemings in the reign of Henry I., was, on the petition of the inhabitants of Norwich, removed to that city in the time of Richard II., where it was finally established in the reign of Henry IV. The navigable river Ant, which joins the sea at Yarmouth, passes through the parish. A fair for cattle is held on May 12th; and a court takes place annually, under the lord of the manor, at which constables and other officers are appointed. The parish comprises 2599*a*. 1*r*. 32*p.*, of which 2084 acres are arable, 330 pasture, and 152 woodland; the soil is fertile. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10; net income, £251; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Norwich. The church is a spacious and elegant structure, partly in the decorated and partly in the later English style, with a lofty square embattled tower, strengthened by enriched buttresses, and crowned with pinnacles, forming, both in its combinations and details, a beautiful specimen of the decorated style. The chancel and nave are ornamented with screen-work of carved wood, and there is a screen separating the nave from the tower, adorned with emblematic figures of Faith, Hope, Charity, Justice, Fortitude, and other virtues; the font is peculiarly rich, and its cover is of tabernacle-work elegantly designed. There is a place of worship for Baptists; also an almshouse founded in 1821. The Rev. Henry Wharton, in 1694, bequeathed a rental of £30 to be applied in beautifying the church; and about £12 a year, arising from bequests by Charles Themylthorpe, in 1721, and others, are distributed among the poor in bread and money.

WORSTHORN, a township, in the parish of WHALLEY, union of BURNLEY, Higher division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Burnley; containing, with Hurstwood, 817 inhabitants. A district church was built in 1833, containing 650 sittings, 450 of which are free.

WORSTON, a township, in the parish of WHALLEY, union of CLITHEROE, Higher division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Clitheroe; containing 111 inhabitants.

WORSTON, a township, in the parish of St. MARY and St. CHAD, STAFFORD, S. division of the hundred of PIREHILL, union, and N. division of the county, of STAFFORD; containing 23 inhabitants. There are a large corn and a silk mill.

WORTH, a township, in the parish of PRESTBURY, union and hundred of MACCLESFIELD, N. division of the county of CHESTER, 6 miles (S. S. E.) from Stockport; containing 655 inhabitants, who are chiefly employed in neighbouring collieries. It is situated on the road from Stockport to Macclesfield.

WORTH, or WORD (St. PETER AND St. PAUL), a parish, in the union and hundred of EASTRY, late of St. AUGUSTINE, E. division of KENT, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S.) from Sandwich; containing 452 inhabitants, and comprising 3863 acres. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Eastry.

WORTH, a parish, in the union of EAST GRINSTEAD, hundred of BUTTINGHILL, rape of LEWES, E. division of SUSSEX, 2 miles (E. S. E.) from Crawley; containing 2423 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 12,440 acres, chiefly woodland, forming the forest of Worth; the surface is undulated, and the substratum abounds with sandstone, which is raised for building, and contains various fossils of leaves and plants. The London and Brighton railway passes through the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 13. 4., and in the gift of the family of Bethune: the tithes have been commuted for £1021. 15. 6., and the glebe consists of $1\frac{1}{2}$ acre. The church is an ancient structure in the Norman style, of which it has some highly-enriched details: the tower, which is on the north side, is surmounted by a spire. The building was repaired and new pewed a few years since, by subscription, aided by a grant from the Incorporated Society, and contains some monuments to the Bethune family. There are places of worship for dissenters.

WORTH-MATRAVERS (St. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union of WAREHAM and PURBECK, hundred of ROWBARROW, Wareham division of DORSET, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Swanage; containing 376 inhabitants, and comprising 2646 acres by measurement. The substratum contains Purbeck stone of fine quality; in the hamlet of Woodhide is a quarry of green marble, of which pillars have been erected in many of the cathedrals, and during one year more than a hundred tons were lately sent to London for the decoration of the Temple church. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 8. 4., and in the gift of the impropiator, the Rev. T. O. Bartlett: the great tithes have been commuted for £214, and the vicarial for £152. The church is a very ancient structure in the Norman style, with a tower banded near the summit with a fillet sculptured in grotesque heads. The parish has the English Channel on the south, where is the noted cliff called St. Alban's Head, with a signal-house on its summit; also the remains of a very old chapel dedicated to St. Aldhelm, built and vaulted with stone, and supported by a single massive pillar with four arches, meeting in a point at the crown. Mr. Benjamin Jesty, said to have been the first person who tried with success the practice of vaccination, which he performed on his own children, resided, and lies interred here.

WORTHAM (St. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of HARTISMERE, W. division of SUFFOLK, 2 miles (W. S. W.) from Diss; containing 1116 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the north by the river Waveney, separating the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, and comprises 2694a. 21p., of which 2445 acres are under cultivation. The living is a rectory, once in mediocrities called Everard and Jervis, now consolidated; the former valued in the king's books at £13. 2. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$., and the latter at £13. 1. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$.; patron and incumbent, the Rev. R. Cobbold. The tithes have been commuted for £860, and the glebe comprises 41 acres. The church is an old structure in the decorated English style, with a circular tower of more ancient date, now in ruins. On Wortham Ling are some remains of a Roman camp.

WORTHEN (ALL SAINTS), a parish, partly in the hundred of CAWRSE, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, but chiefly in the hundred of CHIRBURY, S. division of SALOP, 9 miles (N. E.) from Montgomery; containing 3195 inhabitants, of whom 2823 are in Salop. This place had formerly a market on Wednesday, and two fairs, granted by Henry III.; the fairs, for cattle, horses, pigs, and sheep, are held in April and October. In this and the neighbouring parishes is a very singular ridge of stones termed Stiperstones, extending several miles towards Shrewsbury, and said to be the ancient boundary between England and Wales; and there are still the remains of two old castles upon the same line. The parish comprises nearly 20,000 acres, of which the substratum is rich in mineral produce. At Sirail beach is a mine of lead-ore, which has been profitably worked for more than forty years; at Perkins' beach a lead-mine was discovered a short time since, and at Penally a strong vein has also been found; there are likewise grit and gravel mines, worked by a company, and stone is quarried chiefly for the roads. The living is a rectory, with the chapelry of Wolston annexed, valued in the king's books at £28. 14. 7.; net income, £1279; patrons, the Warden and Fellows of New College, Oxford. The church is a plain structure. At Trelystan is a chapel of ease. There is a place of worship for Baptists; and a fund of £42. 7. per annum, arising from the bequests of John Powel, Robert Nicholess, and Martha Scarlet, is distributed among the poor. Sir Thomas Bromley, lord chancellor in the reign of Elizabeth, and successor of Sir Nicholas Bacon, was born at Bromblow, in the parish.

WORTHING (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union of MITFORD and LAUNDITCH, hundred of LAUNDITCH, W. division of NORFOLK, 4 miles (N. by E.) from East Dereham; containing 158 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 788 acres, of which 700 are arable, and the remainder meadow and pasture. The living is a rectory, annexed to that of Swanton-Morley. The church is a small ancient structure, with a round tower, and a rich Norman doorway on the south side.

WORTHING, a market-town, in the parish of BROADWATER, hundred of BRIGHTFORD, rape of BRAMBER, W. division of SUSSEX, 20 miles (E. by S.) from Chichester, and 56 (S. by W.) from London; containing 4702 inhabitants. This fashionable and attractive watering-place, which at the close of the last century was a mere village, is indebted in a great degree for its celebrity to the late Princess Amelia, who was advised by her physicians to reside here during the summer of 1797; and it was subsequently honoured by the visits of the Princess Charlotte, the present King of Hanover, the Duke of Gloucester, and the Princesses Augusta and Sophia. Its situation forms a strong recommendation to visitors, more especially to invalids, as the South Down hills, which approach to within two miles of the town, completely shelter it from the north and east winds, and protect it from the cold to which many other places on this coast are in the winter subject. The town is lighted with gas, paved, and abundantly supplied with water by commissioners appointed for its improvement, who have erected an elegant town-hall, in which the magistrates for the division hold petty-sessions every alternate week. It contains some good streets, handsome terraces, crescents, and detached villas; and in front of the esplanade are several elegant houses and hotels, baths, and every requisite to render it not only a place of fashionable resort during the summer, but also a favourite winter residence. The esplanade is nearly three-quarters of a mile in length, and is twenty feet wide, forming a neat gravelled terrace, the waves flowing up close to its base; the views from it are most extensive, commanding the English Channel, the Isle of Wight, Brighton, and the whole range of coast as far as Beachy Head. The sands, which are level, and extend for several miles, afford excellent carriage-drives, and facilities of equestrian exercise or promenades. The royal baths, erected in 1823, form a costly building, and comprise India, medicated, vapour, champooing, shower, and Douce baths, including reading-rooms; and the Parisian baths, a similar establishment, are also elegantly fitted up. The theatre, a small neat building, is opened in the season; there are libraries and reading-rooms; and a literary society and a mechanics' institution have been lately established. The principal market is on Saturday, and there is a corn-market on alternate Wednesdays, and one for vegetables daily; the market-place is a neat quadrangular erection. A fishery, for mackerel in the spring, and herrings in the autumn, has been established, and great quantities of the former are sent to the London market; soles, also cod, shrimps; and prawns, are caught in abundance. Here is a chapel, a handsome building, erected in 1812, at an expense of £14,000, raised by the inhabitants; it has a portico of mixed Doric and Tuscan character, and a bold though low turret; the interior is neat, and contains 1100 sittings, 150 of which are free. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £150; patron, the Rector of Broadwater. A church, dedicated to Christ, of which the first stone was laid in Oct. 1840, has been erected by subscription, aided by a grant of £500 from the Incorporated Society, and is a neat structure, containing 929 sittings, of which 572 are free. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. Miss Hawes, in 1828, bequeathed £1000 four per cents., one-fourth part of which she appropriated to schools, and the remainder to be distributed in clothes and food among the poor. A savings' bank was commenced in 1817; and a dispensary, and several other charitable institutions, have been formed.

WORTHINGTON, a township, in the parish of STANDISH, union of WIGAN, hundred of LEYLAND, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 3½ miles (N. by W.) from Wigan; containing 133 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £149. 8.

WORTHINGTON, a chapelry, in the parish of BREEDON, union of ASHBY-DE-LA-ZOUCH, hundred of WEST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, 4¼ miles (N. E.) from Ashby; containing, with the liberty of Newbold, 1143 inhabitants. The parish comprises nearly 1500 acres, of which the soil is partly rich and deep, and partly thin clay. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £100; patron, Lord Scarsdale. The chapel is dedicated to St. Matthew.

WORTHY, HEADBOURN (St. MARTIN), a parish, in the union of NEW WINCHESTER, hundred of BARTON-STACEY, Winchester and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 2 miles (N. by E.) from Winchester; containing 207 inhabitants. This parish is bounded on the east by the river Itchen, and comprises about 1793 acres, of which 1230 are arable, 450 downs and pasture, and 56 meadow. The river is navigable from Winchester to Southampton; and the South-Western railway, which has a station at Winchester, passes through the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15. 12. 1., and in the gift of the Trustees of Dr. Radcliffe, for a member of University College, Oxford: the tithes have been commuted for £385, and the glebe comprises 44½ acres. The church is a small ancient structure. Joseph Bingham, the ecclesiastical historian, was rector of the parish, and was interred here in 1723.

WORTHY, KING'S (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of NEW WINCHESTER, partly in the hundred of MITCHELDEVER, but chiefly in that of BARTON-STACEY, Winchester and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 2¼ miles (N. N. E.) from Winchester; containing 349 inhabitants, of whom 173 are in King's-Worthy tything, and 176 in that of Abbot's-Worthy. The parish is situated on the river Itchen, and comprises by measurement 2130 acres, of which 1465 are arable, and 194 pasture: the soil is chalky. The South-Western railway passes through the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £22. 12. 6., and in the gift of Sir Thomas Baring, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £450, and the glebe comprises 10 acres. The church, a very ancient structure in the Norman style, has been enlarged.

WORTHY, MARTYR (St. SWITHIN), a parish, in the union of NEW WINCHESTER, partly in the hundred of BOUNTISBOROUGH, but chiefly in that of FAWLEY, Winchester and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 3 miles (N. E. by N.) from Winchester; containing 257 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15. 10. 2½., and in the gift of the Bishop of Winchester: the tithes have been commuted for £485. 5. 9., and the glebe comprises 11 acres. Twelve boys and ten girls are instructed in a national school, for a rent-charge of £6. 13., the bequest of Agnes Parnell in 1589.

WORTING (St. THOMAS à BECKET), a parish, in the union of BASINGSTOKE, hundred of CHUTELEY, Basingstoke and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 2¼ miles (W.) from Basingstoke; containing 148 inhabitants. It is intersected by the London and South-Western railway, and comprises about 1100 acres, of which the soil is principally chalk, and the surface boldly undulated. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 17. 8½., and in the gift of the Rev. Lovelace Bigg Wither: the tithes have been commuted for £277, and the glebe comprises 5½ acres. Dr. Pelham Warren, an eminent physician, lived and was interred here.

WORTLEY, a tything, in the parish of WOTTON-UNDER-EDGE, union of DURSLEY, Upper division of the hundred of BERKELEY, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER: containing 170 inhabitants.

WORTLEY, a chapelry, in the parish of ST. PETER, liberty of the borough of LEEDS, W. riding of YORK, 2 miles (W. S. W.) from Leeds; containing 7090 inhabitants. This place, in the Domesday survey Wyrtley, formerly belonged to the Farrars, of Halifax, from whom, in 1766, the manor was purchased by the father of the present owner, Mrs. Mason, of Copt Hewick, near Ripon. The chapelry comprises 1036a. 2r. 34p., which, with the exception of a few fields of arable land, and about 4 acres of plantation, is divided in nearly equal portions into meadow and pasture; the soil is fertile, and the commons have been recently inclosed. A stratum of remarkably fine clay is found, of which the best fire-bricks are made, and for which the place has long been eminent. The population has greatly increased, and the village of New Wortley, which has arisen within the last twenty years, now extends to Holbeck; it is neatly built, and contains many handsome houses. The old villages of Upper and Lower Wortley, with some scattered hamlets, form a semicircular range of buildings at the base and on the acclivities of an eminence commanding a fine view of Leeds and the adjacent country; the inhabitants are chiefly employed in the manufacture of woollen-cloths, which is carried on to a great extent. The Leeds and Bradford canal bounds the chapelry on the north. The chapel, originally built in 1787, at the expense of the late John Smith, Esq., lord of the manor, and other contributors, is a neat structure, and contains 650 sittings: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £147; patrons, the Trustees of the founder; impropiators, the Dean and Chapter of Christ-Church, Oxford, under whom the Rev. T. B. Ferris, incumbent of St. Luke's, Leeds, is lessee. There are places of worship for Independents, Primitive Methodists, and Wesleyans. A free school derives an income of £40 per annum from various donations and endowments; and adjacent to the chapelry is a national Sunday school, built by subscription in 1822, and enlarged in 1836, so as to accommodate 200 children. Zion School, at New Wortley, was built at an expense of £1040, towards which £400 were granted by parliament; it is conducted on the plan of the British and Foreign Society, and the building contains two spacious rooms, with houses for the master and mistress. In 1825, a spring of remarkably fine water was discovered on the premises of James Bateman, Esq., by boring to the depth of about sixty yards; it is slightly impregnated with sulphur, and affords relief in cases of ophthalmic inflammation, especially if used in the early stages of the complaint.

WORTLEY, a chapelry, and the head of a union, in the parish of TANKERSLEY, wapentake of STAINCROSS, W. riding of YORK, 8 miles (N.) from Sheffield; containing 990 inhabitants. This place, which had been for many generations the property and residence of the Wortley family, was, on the demise of Sir Francis Wortley, Bart., the last male heir, conveyed, by marriage with his daughter and heiress, to the Hon. Sidney Montagu, second son of the first earl of Sandwich, and ancestor of the present owner, Lord Wharnccliffe. The chapelry is situated on the road from Sheffield to Halifax, and is separated from Bradfield and part of the parish of Penistone by the river Don, which forms its western boundary; it comprises about 6278 acres, of which 2000 are woodland, and of the remainder one-third is arable, and two-thirds meadow and pasture; the soil is a mixture of clay and grit. The surface is boldly undulated, and rises to a considerable elevation from the banks of the Don, commanding extensive prospects over the surrounding country; the hills are finely wooded, and the scenery in many parts beautifully picturesque. Wortley Hall, the seat of Lord Wharnccliffe, is an elegant mansion, situated in grounds tastefully laid out, and enriched with flourishing plantations. Wharnccliffe Lodge, built by Sir Thomas Wortley in 1510, is seated on the brow of a rocky cliff, rising from a precipitous and thickly-wooded acclivity 1800 acres in extent, at the base of which flows the river Don; it was the occasional residence of Lady Mary Wortley Montague, who, in her description of the beauties of foreign countries, takes occasion to celebrate the romantic views of Wharnccliffe, which is also identified as the scene of the ancient ballad of the Dragon of Wantley.

The district abounds with coal and iron-stone, which latter was smelted here from a very early period till after the reign of Charles I., when the furnaces were taken down, and a forge erected on their site, which has been considerably enlarged, and is at present an extensive manufactory for bar, rod, hoop, and sheet iron. There are quarries of excellent building-stone, and a soft grit for grindstones is found. The coal-pits abound with fossils peculiar to the coal formation, and though now only on a small scale, will no doubt be more extensively wrought after the completion of the Manchester and Sheffield railway, which passes through the chapelry. The village is pleasantly situated, and consists of neat cottages, to each of which Lord Wharnccliffe has attached a portion of land, rent-free, for garden-ground, as a stimulus to industry and economy. The chapel is a very neat structure, with a square embattled tower, and was thoroughly repaired in 1815: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £105; patron, Lord Wharncliffe. The tithes have been commuted for £240. A national school, in which are about 80 children, was built, and is principally supported, by his lordship; and there is a farm, now producing £29 per annum, given to the poor in the reign of Charles I., by the widow of Sir Richard Wortley, and second wife of the Earl of Devonshire. The union of Wortley comprises 13 townships, containing a population of 23,214. Wharncliffe gives the title of Baron to the Wortley family.

WORTON, a hamlet, in the parish of CASSINGTON, union of WOODSTOCK, hundred of WOOTTON, county of OXFORD; containing 68 inhabitants.

WORTON, a tything, in the parish of POTTERNE, union of DEVIZES, hundred of POTTERNE and CANNINGS, Devizes and N. divisions of WILTS, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Devizes; containing 311 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WORTON, NETHER (St. James), a parish, in the union of WOODSTOCK, hundred of WOOTTON, county of OXFORD, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Deddington; containing 59 inhabitants. The parish is watered by the river Swere, which adds much to the interesting scenery of the neighbourhood, and on its banks are some rich dairy-farms. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £40; patron, Joseph Wilson, Esq. The east and north sides of the church have been rebuilt by the patron.

WORTON, OVER (Holy Trinity), a parish, in the union of WOODSTOCK, hundred of WOOTTON, county of OXFORD, 4 miles (S. W. by W.) from Deddington; containing 45 inhabitants. It comprises 646a. 2r. 37p., of which 195 acres are arable, 322 meadow and pasture, and 85 woodland; the substratum abounds with building-stone of good quality. The Hall, the rectory-house, and all the houses in the parish, have been rebuilt by the proprietor within the last 25 years. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 2. 8½., and in the gift of the Rev. William Wilson: the tithes have been commuted for £136, and the glebe comprises 42 acres. The church is an ancient structure, romantically situated on a rocky eminence richly wooded, and, being almost covered with ivy, has a very picturesque appearance. In front of the rectory-house is the pedestal of an old cross.

WORTWELL, a hamlet, in the parish of REDDEN-HALL, union of DEPWADE, hundred of EARSHAM, E. division of NORFOLK, 2 miles (N. E. by E.) from Harleston; containing 560 inhabitants. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents.

WOTHERSOME, a township, in the parish of BARDSEY, Lower division of the wapentake of SKYRACK, W. riding of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Wetherby; containing 19 inhabitants. It comprises about 600 acres of land set out in three farms.

WOTTON (St. John the Evangelist), a parish, in the union of DORKING, First division of the hundred of WOTTON, W. division of SURREY, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Dorking; containing, with the chapelry of Oakwood, 763 inhabitants. This parish, which gives name to the hundred, is about nine miles in length and one mile in average breadth, and comprises 4176 acres, of which 563 are common or waste. The soil is various, and the lands are watered by two streams rising in the northern declivity of Leith Hill, which, uniting, fall into the Wey near Shalford: another stream rises under the hill, and runs into the river Arun. There are considerable woods of oak, ash, beech, hazel, and birch. On the summit of Leith Hill, which is the highest in the county, Richard Hall, Esq., in 1766, erected a tower, which is 999 feet above the level of the sea, commanding an extreme view of the Wolds of Surrey and Sussex, with the English Channel in the distance, and northward a fine prospect of Reigate and the valley of the Thames, with the hills of Harrow, Hampstead, and Highgate. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12. 18. 9., and in the patronage of William J. Evelyn, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £525, and there are 140 acres of glebe. The church, a handsome structure with a tower at the west end, contains several monuments to the Evelyn family. There is an ancient chapel, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, at Oakwood, which is endowed, and in the patronage of Mr. Evelyn. Some bequests have been left to the poor. John Evelyn, a great benefactor to the Royal Society, of which he was a member, and the author of Sylva and several other works, was born and buried here; and Sir Samuel Romilly resided many years in the parish.

WOTTON-ABBAS, a liberty, in the parish and hundred of WHITCHURCH-CANONICORUM, union of BRIDPORT, Bridport division of DORSET, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Lyme-Regis; containing 300 inhabitants. The liberty is of great extent, stretching from the river Char to the Axe, which separates the counties of Devon and Dorset. Courts leet and baron are held; and a fair, granted in the 7th of Queen Anne, is kept on the Wednesday before the festival of St. John the Baptist, upon a lofty hill called Lambert's Castle, the summit of which, in the form of the letter D, is fortified with triple trenches and ramparts, inclosing twelve acres, and having several entrances.

WOTTON-UNDER-EDGE (St. Mary), a market-town and parish, in the union of DURSLEY, Upper division of the hundred of BERKELEY, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 19 miles (S. S. W.) from Gloucester, and 108 (W. by N.) from London; containing, with the tythings of Huntingford, Sinwell with Bradley, Simond's-Hall with Combe, and Wortley, 4702 inhabitants. The name of this place, formerly Wotton under Ridge, is descriptive of its situation beneath the western ridge of the Cotswold hills. The old town, which stood in the rear of the present, was destroyed by fire in the reign of John; the site is still termed the Old Town, and a spot there called the Brands is commemorative of the fire. On the restoration of the town, a market and fair, with various municipal privileges, were granted by Henry III. to Maurice, Lord Berkeley, in 1254, which laid the foundation of its subsequent importance. During the civil war of the 17th century, a garrison was maintained here in the interest of the king. The present town is situated on a gentle eminence, and consists of five streets, besides the site of the old town; the houses are in general well built, and of neat appearance. It has long been celebrated for the manufacture of fine broad-cloth, which affords employment to the inhabitants of the town and vicinity; and on a small stream which flows to the west, are several water-mills connected with the manufacture. The market is on Friday: there is a fair for cattle on the Tuesday preceding March 25th has been recently established. A mayor is chosen in October, at the manorial court leet, but has no magisterial authority; and petty-sessions for the division take place once a fortnight, on Friday.

The parish comprises 4390 acres. The LIVING is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 10.; net income, £112; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Canons of Christ-Church, Oxford. The church, which has recently undergone considerable repairs, is a spacious and handsome structure, having a tower with battlements and pinnacles, and containing some curious sepulchral memorials. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyans. The free grammar school was established and endowed by Lady Catherine Berkeley, under letters-patent from Richard II., in 1385; and being supposed to have become forfeited in the reign of Edward I., by the act for the dissolution of chantries, James I., in 1622, on the petition of the inhabitants, confirmed and established it. The annual income is £376. 12., and there are ten boys on the foundation, who are allowed £6 per annum for books and other purposes, and have the privilege of an exhibition at the university, with an allowance of £60 for that purpose. The Blue-coat school is endowed with £60 per annum from the funds of the general hospital trust, and with the produce of sundry bequests; the income is £136. 13.: the school-house was erected about 1714, partly from the funds of Perry's estate, and partly by subscription. An hospital for twelve persons of both sexes, founded in 1630, by Hugh Perry, Esq., alderman of London; another for six aged persons, established by Thomas Dawes, in 1712; and the general hospital, are situated in Church-lane, and form three sides of a square, with an open court in the middle, and a chapel at the north end. Sir Jonathan Dawes, sheriff of London, gave £1000 for the relief of the poor. On Westridge, in the parish, are the remains of a square camp called Becketbury, with double intrenchments, partly covered with wood.

WOUGHTON-ON-THE-GREEN (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of NEWPORT-PAGNELL, hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Fenny-Stratford; containing 354 inhabitants. This parish, which is intersected on the east by the road from Newport-Pagnell to Aylesbury, and on the west by the Grand Junction canal, derives its name from the situation of its village round a pleasant green of an oblong form, at the east end of which is the church. It comprises about 1421 acres, of which the soil is various, in the upper lands generally a stiff clay, and in the lower a heavy marl, alternated with gravel; the surface is varied, in parts hilly, and in others flat, and subject to inundation from a branch of the Ouse which bounds the parish on the east. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 9. 7.; net income, £107; patron and incumbent, the Rev. Francis Rose, who is lord of the manor. The church is in the later English style; in the north wall of the chancel is a full-length statue in memory of one of the Muxon family, who are said to have been formerly owners of a great part of the parish. About £20 per annum, arising from land, &c., are applied to the repair of the church, and the support of the poor.

WOULDHAM (All Saints), a parish, in the union of MALLING, hundred of LARKFIELD, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Rochester; containing 284 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1531a. 3r. 34p., of which 886 acres are arable, 255 pasture, 160 meadow and marsh, 156 woodland, and 16 garden-ground. The village is situated on the eastern bank of the river Medway, across which is an ancient dam supposed to have stood for nearly 1000 years. Star Castle, an old manor in the parish, is tithe-free, and another partly so; both belonged to the abbey of West Malling. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 6. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$.; net income, £198; patron, the Bishop of Rochester. The church is in the early English style, and contains a Norman font: the parsonage-house has been enlarged and improved by the incumbent.

WRABNESS (All Saints), a parish, in the union and hundred of TENDRING, N. division of ESSEX, 6 miles (E.) from Manningtree; containing 252 inhabitants. It is bounded on the north by the navigable river Stour, and comprises by measurement 1075 acres, of which 72 are pasture, 30 woodland, and the remainder arable. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £324, and the glebe comprises 55 acres. The church is a small ancient edifice, and had originally a tower of stone, which has been replaced by a belfry turret of wood. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

WRAGBY (All Saints), a market-town and parish, in the union of HORNCASTLE, W. division of the wapentake of WRAGGEOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Lincoln, and $139\frac{1}{2}$ (N. by W.) from London; containing 610 inhabitants. This place, noticed by Leland as a village giving name to a small beck, or stream, which flowed by it in its course from Panton to Bardney Abbey, is of some antiquity, but is not distinguished by any event of historical importance. From an inconsiderable village it was raised to a market-town by George, Duke of Buckingham, who, in 1671, obtained for it the grant of a market and three annual fairs, two of which are still held. The town is pleasantly situated on the road from Lincoln to Horncastle, at the point where it meets the road to Louth, and consists of neatly-built houses; the environs comprise an extensive tract of fertile land, in the cultivation of which the inhabitants are mostly employed. The market is on Thursday; and fairs take place on Holy-Thursdays and September 29th, for sheep and cattle. The town is within the jurisdiction of a court of requests for the wapentake of Wraggœe, for the recovery of debts under 40s. The living is a vicarage, united in 1735 to the rectory of East Torrington, and valued in the king's books at £8. 4. 2.; impropiator, C. Turnor, Esq. The parochial church is an ancient structure, principally in the later English style, and contains several sepulchral memorials: the first stone of an additional church was laid on the 28th of April, 1837. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. William Hansard, in 1632, bequeathed a rent-charge of £30 for teaching boys; and Sir Edmund Turnor, Knt., founded an almshouse, with a chapel, for six clergymen's widows, and six aged widowers, or widows, of Wragby, which, in 1707, he endowed with a rent-charge of £100, out of which is paid a stipend to the vicar for officiating in the chapel.

WRAGBY (St. MICHAEL), a parish, chiefly in the Upper division of the wapentake of OSGOLDCROSS, but partly in the wapentake of STAINCROSS, W. riding of YORK, 5 miles (S. W.) from Pontefract; containing 855 inhabitants. The parish includes the townships of West Hardwick, Hessle, Hilltop, Huntwick with Foulby and Nostal, Ryhill, and Wintersett; and comprises 4160*a.* 1*r.* 33*p.* of fertile land, whereof 1741 acres are arable, 1858 pasture, 244 woodland, and 134 water. It is intersected by the road between Doncaster and Wakefield, which runs through the village, on the north side of which is the elegant mansion of Nostal Priory, standing on elevated ground in a beautiful park of 250 acres. The living is a donative, in the patronage of Charles Winn, Esq.: the church is a very neat structure in the early English style, and is adorned, particularly the pulpit, with rich wood carvings, and with windows of old painted glass. An annuity of £6. 16. is paid out of the duchy of Lancaster, in support of a school.—See NOSTAL, &c.

WRAGHOLME, a hamlet, in the parish of GRAINTHORPE, union of LOUTH, Marsh division of the hundred of LOUTH-ESKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 9 miles (N. N. E.) from Louth; containing 98 inhabitants.

WRAMPLINGHAM (St. PETER AND St. PAUL), a parish, in the incorporation and hundred of FOREHOE, E. division of NORFOLK, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Wymondham; containing 236 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the north by the river Yare, and comprises 951*a.* 12*p.*, of which 653 acres are arable, 145 meadow and pasture, and 34 woodland and water; the surface is undulated, and the scenery pleasingly diversified. The village is pleasantly situated on the bank of the Yare, and there is an extensive flour-mill worked both by water and steam. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 4. 9½., and in the gift of R. Marsham, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £260, and the glebe comprises 34 acres. The church, which occupies an eminence, is partly in the early and partly in the decorated English style, with a circular tower octangular in the upper stages; the chancel window was formerly embellished with figures of the Twelve Apostles in stained glass, of which some remains exist.

WRANGLE (St. PETER AND St. PAUL), a parish, in the union of BOSTON, wapentake of SKIRBECK, parts of HOLLAND, county of LINCOLN, 9 miles (N. N. E.) from Boston; containing 1132 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 18. 6½.; net income, £868; patron and incumbent, the Rev. Thomas Bailey Wright; impropiators, J. Linton and J. Roper, Esqrs. The church contains a curious monument to Sir John Reade, Knt. The Rev. Thomas Alenson, in 1555, bequeathed land now producing £149. 12. per annum, a moiety of which is applied for teaching children, and the other for the maintenance of five people.

WRANTAGE, a tything, in the parish and hundred of NORTH CURRY, union of TAUNTON, W. division of SOMERSET, 5½ miles (E. by S.) from Taunton; containing 448 inhabitants.

WRATTING, GREAT (St. MARY), a parish, in the union and hundred of RISBRIDGE, W. division of SUFFOLK, 2¾ miles (N. E. by N.) from Haverhill; containing 355 inhabitants, and comprising by measurement 1350 acres. The living is a rectory, with that of Little Wrattling annexed, valued in the king's books at £8; net income, £450; patron and incumbent, the Rev. T. B. Syer. Salmon supposes this place to have been the Roman station Ad Ansam, and numerous remains of Roman antiquity have been dug up.

WRATTING, LITTLE, a parish, in the union and hundred of RISBRIDGE, W. division of SUFFOLK, 5¾ miles (W. by N.) from Clare; containing 239 inhabitants, and comprising 937*a.* 2*r.* 14*p.* The living is a rectory, annexed to that of Great Wrattling, and valued in the king's books at £4. 19. 9½. The Turnor family had formerly a seat in the parish, at Blunt's Hall.

WRATTING, WEST (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of LINTON, hundred of RADFIELD, county of CAMBRIDGE, 5¼ miles (N. E. by N.) from Linton; containing 912 inhabitants. This parish, so called from its position with respect to Great and Little Wrattling, comprises 3508*a.* 6*p.*, of which 3131 acres are arable, 260 pasture, and 50 woodland; it has facility of communication with Newmarket, Cambridge, Safron-Walden, and London, and the air is very salubrious. A pleasure-fair is held on Whit-Monday. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 17. 3½.; net income, £215; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Ely. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1809. The church and vicarage-house were repaired and improved at an expense of £767, by Sir John Jacob, who died in 1740.

WRATTON, or WRAYTON, with MELLING, a township, in the parish of MELLING, union of LANCASTER, hundred of LONSDALE, south of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 5 miles (S.) from Kirkby-Lonsdale; containing 195 inhabitants.

WRAWBY (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of GLANDFORD-BRIGG, S. division of the wapentake of YARBOROUGH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN; containing, with the town of Glandford-Brigg, 2702 inhabitants, of whom 880 are in the township of Wrawby. The parish comprises by measurement 4079 acres: the river Ancholme passes through it, and affords conveyance for coal, corn, and other articles, in which a considerable trade is carried on between Brigg and Hull, and other places in the county of York. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 14. 7.; net income, £220; patrons and appropriators, the Master and Fellows of Clare Hall, Cambridge. The tithes were commuted for land under acts of inclosure of the 39th and 40th of George III.; the glebe comprises about 200 acres. The church is an ancient structure in the early English style.

WRAXALL (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of BEAMINSTER, hundred of EGGERTON, Bridport division of DORSET, 8 miles (E. by S.) from Beaminster; containing 65 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, united in 1758 to that of Rampisham, and valued in the king's books at £5: the tithes have been commuted for £165, and the glebe comprises 33 acres.

WRAXALL (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of BEAMINSTER, hundred of PORTBURY, E. division of SOMERSET, 6½ miles (W. by S.) from Bristol; containing, with the tything of Failand, 986 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3773a. 2r. 20p.; the surface is elevated, and commands a fine view of the Bristol Channel, with the hills of Monmouthshire. The road from Bristol to Clevedon passes through the parish; and the Bristol and Exeter railway, on which is a station within 2 miles, skirts it on the south. A fair is held at the festival of Allhallows, and continues six days. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £49. 11. 8., and in the gift of the Rev. James Vaughan: the tithes have been commuted for £520; the glebe comprises 70 acres. The church is a handsome structure in the later English style. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A school adjoining the churchyard was erected by Richard Vaughan, who endowed it with £300, the interest of which, together with about £6 a year bequeathed by Elizabeth Martindale, is applied for teaching children. On Leigh down, about a mile from Failand's Inn, in the parish, is an irregular intrenchment, and near it another of a circular form, called the Old Fort. On the same down, upon opening a tumulus in 1815, several hundred Roman coins of the Lower Empire were discovered, with fragments of ancient urns; and many other indications of the residence of the Romans have been observed in the neighbourhood.

WRAXALL, NORTH (St. James), a parish, in the union and hundred of CHIPPENHAM, Chippenham and Calne, and N. divisions of WILTS, 7 miles (W. by N.) from Chippenham; containing 481 inhabitants. It comprises about 2300 acres, of which 500 are woodland, and the remainder arable. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £15. 9. 2., and in the gift of W. Heneage, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £375, and the glebe comprises 87 acres. The church is an ancient structure, chiefly in the later English style, with a handsome circular arched doorway and other Norman details.

WRAXALL, SOUTH, a chapelry, in the parish of GREAT BRADFORD, union and hundred of BRADFORD, Westbury and N. divisions, and Trowbridge and Bradford subdivisions, of WILTS, 5 miles (W. by N.) from Melksham; containing 359 inhabitants. The chapel is dedicated to St. James.

WRAXHALL, a hamlet, in the parish of DITCHEAT, union of SHEPTON-MALLET, hundred of WHITESTONE, E. division of the county of SOMERSET; containing 133 inhabitants.

WRAY, a township, in the parish of MELLING, hundred of LONSDALE, south of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 10 miles (N. E. by E.) from Lancaster; containing, with Botton, 718 inhabitants, several of whom are employed in making nails. A district church has been erected and endowed by subscription, the living of which is a district incumbency, vested in trustees. Richard Pooley, in 1685, bequeathed £20 for the erection of a school, and £200 to purchase land for its support; the income is about £35, which sum, with about £4 per annum arising from a bequest by Mary Thompson, in 1803, is applied in aid of a national school.

WREA, a township, in the parish of KIRKHAM, union of the FYLDE, hundred of AMOUDERNES, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 1 $\frac{3}{4}$ mile (W. by S.) from Kirkham; containing, with Ribby, 442 inhabitants.

WREAY, a chapelry, in the parish of St. Mary, union of CARLISLE, CUMBERLAND ward, E. division of CUMBERLAND, 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Carlisle; containing 151 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £86; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of Carlisle. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, was consecrated in 1739. A school, erected by subscription in 1760, was endowed by John Brown, in 1763, with £200, which were laid out in land now producing £15 a year.

WRECKINGTON, a hamlet, in the parish of GATESHEAD-FELL, union of GATESHEAD, N. division of CHESTER ward, N. division of the county of DURHAM, 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Gateshead. This place takes its name from its situation near the Roman road called Wrecken-Dyke, which here crosses the old turnpike-road from Newcastle to Durham. Wreckington Hall, the seat of Robert Davis, Esq., M.D., mayor of Gateshead in 1843; is a handsome mansion of stone. The village forms the southern extremity of the borough of Gateshead, and is chiefly inhabited by persons engaged in the adjoining collieries, of which one, formerly called the King's pit of Sheriff Hill, but now the Stormount Main colliery, has been sunk to a greater depth, and is wrought as a separate work. An extensive flour-mill, which is driven by steam, has been erected; and statute-fairs for hiring servants, established in 1832, are held in April and November.

WRECKLESHAM, with BOURN, a township, in the parish and hundred of FARNHAM, W. division of SURREY, 1 $\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S. W. by S.) from Farnham; containing 991 inhabitants. A district church dedicated to St. Peter, was erected on a site given by W. P. Paine, Esq., and consecrated in July, 1840; it is a neat cruciform structure, and contains 400 sittings, of which 200 are free. The living is a perpetual curacy.

WREIGH-HILL, a township, in the parish and union of ROTHBURY, W. division of COQUETDALE ward, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 5 $\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.) from Rothbury; containing 29 inhabitants. The township is bounded on the south by the river Coquet, and takes its name from the stream of the Wreigh or Wreath; it comprises about 395 acres, of which two-thirds are arable, and the remainder fine pasture land, the property, with the exception of 75 acres, of Christopher Weallans, Esq., of Flotterton House. There are strata of limestone and freestone, and a limestone quarry is in operation. In 1665, almost the entire population was swept off by the plague, since which event great quantities of human bones have been discovered on the spot where the victims were interred. George Coughran, the celebrated youthful mathematician, was born here.

WRELTON, a township, in the parish of MIDDLETON, PICKERING lythe and union, N. riding of YORK, 2 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Pickering; containing 216 inhabitants. It comprises about 1230 acres, mostly the property of resident persons: the village is situated on the road from Pickering to Kirkby-Moorside, and eastward of the river Seven.

WRENBURY (St. Margaret), a parish, in the union and hundred of NANTWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER; containing, with the townships of Broomhall, Chorley, Woodcote, and part of Dodcote cum Wilkesley, 1100 inhabitants, of whom 527 are in the township of Wrenbury with Frith, 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.)

from Nantwich. A branch of the Chester canal passes through the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £138; patron, the Vicar of Acton. The church has a fine carved oak ceiling, and an elegant tower. A school is endowed with the interest of £230.

WRENINGHAM, GREAT and LITTLE (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of HENSTEAD, hundred of HUMBLYARD, E. division of NORFOLK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Wymondham; containing 487 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, annexed to that of Ashwellthorpe, and valued in the king's books at £10: the tithes have been commuted for £400, and the glebe comprises 44 acres. The church is a neat structure in the later English style, with an embattled tower: that of Little Wreningham, which was dedicated to St. Mary, has been long demolished.

WRENTHAM (ST. NICHOLAS), a parish, in the union and hundred of BLYTHING, E. division of SUFFOLK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Southwold; containing 1020 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 2280 acres, and the road from London to Yarmouth intersects the eastern portion of it. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £21. 6. 8., and in the gift of Sir T. S. Gooch, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for £580, and the glebe comprises 23 acres. The church, a handsome structure in the early and later English styles, with a lofty square embattled tower, was repaired in 1832, at an expense of £700, of which £250 were a grant from the Incorporated Society, £200 a contribution from the Rev. S. Clissold, the rector, who also presented an organ, and the remainder was a rate. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. Wrentham Hall, a mansion in the Elizabethan style, for many ages the seat of the Brewster family, was taken down by the late Sir Thomas Gooch. William Wotton, a learned divine, was born here in 1666; and William Ames, another learned divine, was rector of the parish.

WRENTHORP, with STANLEY, a township, in the parish and union of WAKEFIELD, Lower division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, W. riding of YORK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. E.) from Wakefield; containing 6625 inhabitants.—See STANLEY.

WRESSEL (ST. JOHN OF BEVERLEY), a parish, in the union of HOWDEN, Holme-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of YORK; containing, with the hamlets of Brind, Loftsome, and Newsham, 373 inhabitants, of whom 154 are in the hamlet of Wressel with Loftsome, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Howden. The parish comprises by measurement 2908 acres, of which 2502 are arable, and 406 pasture: the village is pleasantly situated, and the Hull and Selby railway passes close by it. Wressel Castle was built by Thomas Percy, Earl of Worcester, who was made prisoner at the battle of Shrewsbury, and afterwards beheaded; this once princely mansion continued to be a seat of the family till the civil war in the reign of Charles I., when it was dismantled by order of the parliament. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 13. 9.; net income, £157; patron and improPRIATOR, Colonel Wyndham. The church is a modern brick building: for many years, divine service was performed in a private chapel at the castle, but the castle was burned down in 1797, when the present church was raised on the site of the old parochial one. There are some remains of the castle.

WRESTLINGWORTH (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union and hundred of BIGGLESWADE, county of BEDFORD, 6 miles (E. N. E.) from Biggleswade; containing 487 inhabitants. This parish, which is intersected by the road from Cambridge to Biggleswade and Bedford, comprises by measurement 1654 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £135. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1801; the glebe comprises 118 acres, with a house. The church is an ancient structure.

WRETHAM, EAST (ST. ETHELBERT), a parish, in the union of THETFORD, hundred of SHROPHAM, W. division of NORFOLK, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Thetford; containing 194 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the east by a Roman road, near which is a large tumulus, and comprises 2777*a. 2r.*, the property of Wyrley Birch, Esq.; the lands are chiefly arable. The living is a rectory, with that of West Wretham annexed, valued in the king's books at £11. 12. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of Mr. Birch: the tithes have been commuted for £536, and the glebe comprises 19 acres, with a house, erected by the patron. The church is an ancient structure, with a square tower surmounted by a low spire, and has a handsome Norman arch at the south entrance.

WRETHAM, WEST (ST. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of THETFORD, hundred of SHROPHAM, W. division of NORFOLK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Thetford; containing 103 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3366 acres, wholly the property of Wyrley Birch, Esq.; the land is chiefly arable, with some wood and plantations, and a considerable extent of heath. Wretham Hall, the seat of Mr. Birch, is an ancient and handsome mansion, and, being thickly clothed with ivy, has a beautifully picturesque appearance. The living is a rectory, annexed to that of East Wretham, and valued in the king's books at £12. 11. 3. In the park is a large sheet of water called Micklemere, near which has been discovered a Roman urn, containing ashes and bones.

WRETTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of DOWNHAM, hundred of CLACKCLOSE, W. division of NORFOLK, 1 mile (W.) from Stoke-Ferry; containing 533 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1197*a. 39p.*, of which 837 acres are arable, and 359 pasture and meadow. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to that of Wretham; improPRIATOR, E. R. Pratt, Esq., whose tithes have been commuted for £255. 10. The church is in the later English style, with a square embattled tower. At the inclosure, 20 acres of land were allotted to the poor, who have also a house and 6 acres, bequeathed by Mrs. Jane Forty, in 1736.

WRIBBENHALL, a hamlet, in the parish and union of KIDDERMINSTER, Lower division of the hundred of HALFSHIRE, Kidderminster and W. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, situated on the left bank of the Severn, immediately opposite Bewdley, and connected with that town by a noble bridge over the river. A chapel for the service of the Church of England, not consecrated, was erected in the year 1701, at the expense of the inhabitants, on a plot of waste land belonging to Lord Foley, and was subsequently claimed by his lordship as owner of the manor.

WRIGHTINGTON, a township, in the parish of ECCLESTON, union of WIGAN, hundred of LEYLAND, N.

division of the county of LANCASTER, 4 miles (N. W.) from Wigan; containing, 1771 inhabitants. The tithes have been commuted for £599. 4.

WRINEHILL, with CHECKLEY, a township, in the parish of WYBUNBURY, union and hundred of NANTWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER, 7 miles (E. S. E.) from Nantwich; containing 213 inhabitants.

WRINGTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union of AXBRIDGE, and in a detached portion of the hundred of BRENT with WRINGTON, E. division of SOMERSET, 7 miles (N. N. E.) from Axbridge; containing, with the tything of Broadfield, 1589 inhabitants. This place is situated near the Mendip hills; the inhabitants are principally employed in agricultural pursuits, and especially in the cultivation of teasel, of which great quantities are produced in the neighbourhood, for the supply of the clothiers in the adjoining districts, and those of Yorkshire, who use it in dressing the cloth. The town consists chiefly of two streets, intersecting obliquely, with other houses irregularly built, in detached situations: the county magistrates hold petty-sessions here. The parish comprises 5786 acres, of which 27 are common or waste. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £39. 9. 4½., and in the gift of the Duke of Cleveland: the tithes have been commuted for £600, and the glebe comprises 54 acres. The church, situated at the south-west extremity of the town, is a spacious and handsome structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower surmounted by angular turrets crowned with pinnacles; a very handsome monument has been erected by public contribution, to the memory of Mrs. Hannah More and her four sisters, who are interred in the churchyard. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. George Legg, in 1704, devised nine acres of land, now producing £20 per annum, for instruction. John Locke, the eminent philosopher, was born in an old thatched house on the north side of the churchyard, in 1632; Dr. John Rogers, a learned divine, held the rectory, and Mrs. More resided for twenty-five years in a cottage built by herself and her sisters, at Barley Wood, in the parish.

WRITHLINGTON (ST. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish, in the union of FROME, hundred of KILMERSDON, E. division of SOMERSET, 7 miles (N. W. by N.) from Frome; containing 301 inhabitants. It comprises about 720 acres, partly arable, and partly meadow and pasture; the soil is chiefly clay; the surface is hilly, and the lower grounds are watered by a stream abounding with trout and eels, and forming the northern boundary of the parish. There are extensive coal-mines, and quarries of white freestone; and fullers'-earth is abundant. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £5. 7. 8½., and in the gift of the Prebendary of Writhlington in the Cathedral of Salisbury: the tithes have been commuted for £138, and the glebe comprises 26 acres.

WRITTLE (ALL SAINTS), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union and hundred of CHELMSFORD, S. division of ESSEX, 2½ miles (W. by S.) from Chelmsford; containing 2521 inhabitants. Morant and other writers have placed here the Cæsaromagus of Antoninus: the remains of a royal palace, built by King John in 1211, and which occupied an acre of ground surrounded by a deep moat, are still visible. The place has been long divested of the greater part of its trade by the rising importance of the town of Chelmsford; but malting and brewing are still carried on, and there is an oil-mill in the vicinity. Courts leet and baron are held, and the inhabitants have the privilege of appointing their own coroner. The parish, which is the most extensive in the county, is about fifty-two miles in circumference, and comprises 8410 acres, of which 163 are common or waste; it abounds with every variety of surface and scenery; the soil is generally fertile, and much of it adapted for wheat, and hops of good quality are grown in several parts. The living is a vicarage, with the donative of Roxwell annexed; net income, £718; patrons and impropiators, the Warden and Fellows of New College, Oxford. The great tithes have been commuted for £2800, and the vicarial for £572. 10. The church is an ancient and spacious structure, with a massive square tower surmounted by a lantern turret, and contains numerous elegant and interesting monuments. There is a place of worship for Independents. Alms-houses for six people, rebuilt in 1820, were endowed with land now producing £55 per annum, by Thomas Hawkins, in 1607; and John Blencowe, in 1774, founded a school with an income of £82 per annum, of which two-thirds are given to the parish of Writtle, and the remainder to that of Roxwell. About four miles north-east of the church, in the middle of a wood called Highwood Quarter, a hermitage was founded in the reign of Stephen, and, in that of Henry II., was attached to St. John's Abbey, Colchester.

WROCKWARDINE (ST. PETER), a parish, in the union of WELLINGTON, Wellington division of the hundred of SOUTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP, 2 miles (W. by N.) from Wellington; containing 2731 inhabitants. This parish, including Wrockwardine-Wood, an isolated township five miles distant from the village, comprises 4627a. 11p. of arable and pasture land in nearly equal portions; the soil is fertile, producing good crops of wheat, barley, and oats. The village is beautifully situated on elevated ground commanding a fine prospect over the surrounding country, including the picturesque vale of Salop, the Breddyn hills in North Wales, and in another direction, the plains of Cheshire, and the Derby hills; the manufacture of glass is carried on to some extent, and there is a corn-mill on the river Tern, which bounds the parish on the north. In the township of Admaston is a mineral spa of considerable celebrity, and a commodious hotel has been built for the reception of visitors. The upper spring contains muriate of soda, and a small portion of muriate of lime, and is also slightly impregnated with iron; the lower spring contains no iron, but a greater proportion of muriate of soda, and is strongly impregnated with hepatic air. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 8. 6., and in the patronage of the Crown: the great tithes have been commuted for £208. 6., and the vicarial for £310. 19., and the glebe comprises one acre; the great tithes of Charlton township have been commuted for £133, and there is a rent-charge of £32. 14. payable to the vicar. The church is a venerable edifice of red stone, substantially built and in good repair. £16 are distributed among the poor at Christmas and on Good-Friday.

WROCKWARDINE-WOOD, an ecclesiastical parish, in the civil parish of WROCKWARDINE, union of WELLINGTON, Wellington division of the hundred of SOUTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP; containing 1698 inhabitants. The township comprises 502a. 17p., of which nearly one-half is arable, and the other meadow and pasture; the substratum abounds with coal and iron-stone, of which there are some mines in operation. A branch of the Shrewsbury canal passes through the township. The church was erected at an expense of £1600, raised by subscription aided by grants from the Incorporated Society, and was consecrated on the 3rd of August, 1833; it is a neat structure in the Grecian style, with a tower, and contains 610 sittings, of which 436 are free. The living is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £81.

WROOT (St. PANCRAS), a parish, in the union of THORNE, W. division of the wapentake of MANLEY, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 8 miles (N. E. by N.) from Bawtry; containing 335 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £3. 7. 8½., and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £260. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Two schools are supported by endowment; and the rents of a small close let out in cottage gardens, amounting to £5. 10., are distributed among the poor.

WROTHAM (St. GEORGE), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union of MALLING, hundred of WROTHAM, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, 11 miles (W. N. W.) from Maidstone, and 24 (S. E. by E.) from London; containing 2949 inhabitants. This place, which is of very remote antiquity, was probably a town of the Britons, various discoveries having been made of British coins, and fragments of brass armour and military weapons; other circumstances lead to the conclusion that it was afterwards a Roman station, and the old military way from Oldborough to Stane-street passed through it. Woodland, or Week, now only a hamlet in the parish, was formerly a parish of itself. The town, situated near the foot of the chalk hills, consists principally of two streets crossing each other, on the road from London to Maidstone; and in the centre is the market-place, where was formerly a public well, now filled up. Wrotham-hill, immediately above the town, affords one of the finest prospects in England. Some paper is manufactured at Basted. The market has been discontinued for many years; but whenever there is a fifth Tuesday in the month, a cattle-market is held, and there is a fair on May 4th. The living comprises a sinecure rectory and a vicarage, in the patronage of the Archbishop: the former, with the vicarage of Stanstead annexed, is valued in the king's books at £50. 8. 1½.; and the latter, with Woodland annexed, at £22. 5. 10.: net income, £2061. The church is an ancient and spacious structure, with a mixture of the various styles from the Norman to the later English, and contains sixteen stalls. A palace of the archbishops of Canterbury formerly stood here, of which the terrace and a few offices alone remain.

WROTTESELEY, a hamlet, in the parish of TETTENHALL, union of SEISDON, S division of the hundred of SEISDON and of the county of STAFFORD; containing 285 inhabitants. Here are vestiges of an ancient city, from three to four miles in circuit, with streets running in different directions; and within its limits, huge square stones have been dug up, with hinges, a dagger, and other relics, supposed to be Roman.

WROUGHTON (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST AND St. HELEN), a parish, in the union of HIGHWORTH and SWINDON, and in a detached portion of the hundred of ELSTUB and EVERLEY, Swindon and N. divisions of WILTS, 3 miles (S. W. by S.) from Swindon; containing, with the tythings of Elcombe, Overtown, Salthrop, and Westcott, 1963 inhabitants, of whom 1445 are in Wroughton tything. The parish comprises 6283 acres, of which the upper portion is principally arable, with some sheep-walks, and the lower lands are chiefly in dairy-farms; the soil varies from loam to clay. Considerable quantities of cheese are produced. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12, and has a net income of £160; the rectory (an impropriation) is valued at £31. 4. 4½.; patron of both, the Bishop of Winchester; impropriator, the Rev. R. Pretyman. The church is an ancient structure, with a handsome Norman arch at the principal entrance. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. Thomas Benit, in 1743, gave land, at present worth more than £20 a year, for the endowment of a school. There are some remains of a British encampment called Barbary Castle.

WROXETER (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of ATCHAM, Wellington division of the hundred of SOUTH BRADFORD, N. division of SALOP, 5¾ miles (S. E. by E.) from Shrewsbury; containing 636 inhabitants. This place, which is noticed by Nennius, in his catalogue of British cities, as Caer Vrauch, is supposed to have obtained that appellation from its situation near the Wrekin mountain; and most probably from the same source also, it was called by the Saxons Wrekin-cestre, from which its modern name is obviously derived. By most antiquaries it is identified with the Uriconium of Antoninus, and the Viriconium of Ptolemy, an important Roman station on the north-east bank of the Severn, in the bed of which, at low water, here may be traced some foundations of an ancient stone building, supposed to have been a bridge. The Roman Watling-street passed through the centre of the station, and crossed the river at Wroxeter Ford, from which point it branched off towards Church-Stretton. The city was inclosed with walls three yards in thickness, extending for three miles in circumference, and surrounded by a rampart and fosse; it flourished for a considerable time as the metropolis of the Cornavii, but suffered greatly during the Saxon wars, and is said to have been destroyed by the Danes. The parish is bounded on the west by the Severn, and comprises by admeasurement 5000 acres, of which the greater portion is arable; the soil is generally a rich loam, alternated with gravel; the surface is undulated, and the substratum contains coal which is partially wrought. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11. 8., and in the gift of the Duke of Cleveland: the impropriate tithes have been commuted for £606. 6., and the vicarial for £260, and the glebe comprises 26 acres. The church is an ancient structure. A free grammar school was established at Donnington, in the parish, in 1627, by Thomas Alcock, who endowed it with 20 marks per annum, which endowment was augmented in 1652, with a bequest of the same amount by Richard Stevinton. It is entitled to two exhibitions to Christ-Church College, Oxford, founded by Mr. Careswell, who instituted others in that college for scholars of Bridgenorth, Newport, Shifnal, Shrewsbury, and Wem; the sums allowed to the exhibitioners are £60 to each under-graduate, and £70 to each under-graduate, being a commoner; £21 to each bachelor of arts, if not resident, and £60 if resident; and £27 to each master of arts. Of the ancient city of Uriconium, from the ruins of which has arisen the present town of Shrewsbury, there are still some portions remaining; and within the area have been found numerous coins and vestiges of Roman antiquity.

WROXHALL (St. LEONARD), a parish, in the union of WARWICK, Snitterfield division of the hundred of BARLICHWAY, S. division of the county of WARWICK, 6 miles (N. W. by N.) from Warwick; containing 176 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1823 acres, of which about 100 are woodland, and the remainder arable, pasture, and meadow; the soil is chiefly a strong clay, and the surface partly flat, and partly undulated. The chapel is a donative peculiar, of which the chaplaincy is in the gift of Chandos Wren Hoskyns, Esq. It forms the north side of the quadrangular edifice called Wroxhall Abbey, founded by Hugh de Hatton, about the close of the reign of Henry I., for Benedictine nuns, whose revenue at the Dissolution was valued at £78. 10. 1. The mansion is occupied by the widow of the late C. R. Wren, Esq., fourth in descent from Sir Christopher, who purchased the estate from the family of Burgoyne, about the year 1713; it received considerable alterations and additions at the hands of the late Mr. Wren.

WROXHAM (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of ST. FAITH, hundred of TAVERHAM, E. division of NORFOLK, 7 miles (N. E. by E.) from Norwich; containing 363 inhabitants. It is on the navigable river Bure, and comprises about 1300 acres, of which the greater portion is arable; the surface is boldly varied, and the village is situated on an acclivity rising from the bank of the river, over which is a neat bridge. There is a sheet of water 80 acres in extent, besides two of smaller dimensions. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Salhouse united, valued in the king's books at £7. 17. 1., and in the gift of S. Trafford, Esq.; the impropriation belongs to Mrs. Burroughes and others. The vicarial tithes of both parishes have been commuted for £323, and the impropriate tithes of Salhouse for £52. 12. 6.; the two glebes comprise 33 acres. The church is in the decorated English style, with a square embattled tower, and has a fine Norman doorway on the north side; in the churchyard is a handsome mausoleum belonging to the Trafford family.

WROXTON (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of BANBURY, hundred of BLOXHAM, county of OXFORD, 3 miles (W. N. W.) from Banbury; containing, with the chapelry of Balscott, 819 inhabitants, of whom 620 are in Wroxton township. This place was principally distinguished for an extensive monastery founded in the reign of Henry III., for a prior and brethren of the Augustine order, and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin about the year 1230, by Michael Belet, who endowed it with the lordships of Wroxton and Balscott; at the Dissolution its revenue was £78. 14. 8½., and it was granted to Sir Thomas Pope, who bestowed it on Trinity College, Oxford. Upon its suppression, part of the building was demolished, and of the remainder, some portions are incorporated with a venerable mansion erected by Sir William Pope, first Earl of Downe, in 1618, which still retains the name of Wroxton Abbey, and is the seat of Colonel and Lady Susan North. The mansion is very beautifully situated; the dining-room has a fine enriched ceiling, and the walls are hung with some family portraits by eminent masters, of which, in various parts of the house, there is an extensive collection; the library, an elegant room in the later English style, contains rare and valuable works, and the chapel is embellished with a handsome window of ancient stained glass. The demesne is highly embellished, and the pleasure-grounds adjoining the house are laid out with great taste. The living is a vicarage not in charge; net income, £137; patrons and impropiators, Colonel and Lady Susan North: the tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1803. The church, situated on elevated ground near the abbey, is in the later English style; the oak roof is still preserved in its original character, and at the west end of the nave is an ancient stone font ornamented with sculpture and figures of six of the Apostles. At the north-east angle of the chancel is a splendid altar-tomb, with the recumbent effigies of Sir William Pope, first Earl of Downe, and Lady Anne, his wife, richly habited in the costume of the seventeenth century. There are also tablets to Francis, Lord Guilford, and Lady Elizabeth, his wife; Francis, Earl of Guilford, and his three wives; Lord North, prime minister; and the lady of Lord Keeper Guilford. In the hamlet of Balscott is a chapel of ease. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans.

WUERDALE, with WARDLE, a township, in the parish and union of ROCHDALE, hundred of SALFORD, S. division of the county of LANCASTER, 2 miles (N. E.) from Rochdale; containing 6875 inhabitants, of whom 4711 are in Wuerdale. A church in the later English style, with a campanile turret, was erected in 1833, at an expense of £3071.

WYASTON, a township, in the parish of EDLSTON, hundred of APPLETREE, S. division of the county of DERBY, 3¼ miles (S. by E.) from Ashbourn; containing 122 inhabitants.

WYBERTON (St. LEODEGAR), a parish, in the union of BOSTON, hundred of KIRTON, parts of HOLLAND, county of LINCOLN, 2¼ miles (S.) from Boston; containing 584 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £33. 6. 8., and in the gift of the incumbent, the Rev. Martin Sheath: the tithes have been commuted for land; the glebe comprises 283 acres, valued at £730, with the house, which commands a fine view of Boston church. £38 per annum, arising from cottages left by William Field, and other bequests, are applied to the charity fund for the Holland fen.

WYBOSTON, a hamlet, in the parish of EATON-SOCON, union of ST. NEOT'S, hundred of BARFORD, county of BEDFORD; containing 269 inhabitants.

WYBUNBURY (St. CHAD), a parish, in the union and hundred of NANTWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER; containing 4674 inhabitants, of whom 529 are in the township, 3½ miles (E. S. E.) from Nantwich. The parish consists of the townships of Basford, Batherton, Blakenhall, Bridgemere, Checkley with Wrinehill, Chorlton, Doddington, Hatherton, Hough, Hunsterson, Lea, Rope, Shavington with Gresty, Sound, Stapeley, Walgherton, Weston, Wybunbury, and part of Willaston. It comprises by measurement 17,808 acres, the greater part whereof is grazing land divided into dairy-farms, of which the chief produce is cheese; a comparatively small portion of the land is arable; the surface is generally level, and the grounds are watered by a rivulet. The Grand Junction railway skirts the parish on the east. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £13. 12. 1.; net income, £295; patron and appropriator, the Bishop of Lichfield. The church was rebuilt in 1595, and again in 1832. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. A school was founded by the late Sir Thomas Delves, Bart., and he also endowed some schools for girls in different parts of the parish. In the churchyard is a school called the Wybunbury Charity, built by subscription about 80 years since, and endowed by several persons for 20 boys. An hospital, dedicated to the Holy Cross and St. George, for a master and brethren, existed before 1464.

WYCLIFFE, a parish, in the township of TEESDALE, wapentake of GILLING-WEST, N. riding of YORK, 2½ miles (E. N. E.) from Greta-Bridge; containing 165 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the north by the river Tees, comprises 2162 acres, of which 931 are arable, 1118 meadow and pasture, 56 woodland and plantations, 27 water, and 30 roads; the surface is agreeably diversified, the soil fertile, and the lands are in good cultivation. A suspension-bridge was erected over the Tees, in 1829, at an expense of £1200. Wycliffe Hall, belonging to Sir Clifford Constable, lord of the manor, and now occupied by George Clifford, Esq., uncle to the baronet, is an elegant mansion, situated in a highly embellished demesne, and surrounded with beautiful pleasure-grounds: attached to the hall is a Roman Catholic chapel. The village is on the bank of the river, and has a pleasingly rural aspect. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 12. 1., and in the patronage of Sir C. Constable: the tithes have been commuted for £427. 17. 6., and the glebe consists of 39 acres. The church, which was rebuilt in the reign of Edward III., is a handsome structure in the decorated English style, with a square embattled tower crowned by pinnacles. In the rectory-house is a well-executed portrait of Wycliffe by Sir Antonio Moore, presented by Dr. Zouch, a late rector of the parish, to be preserved as an heir-loom by his successors: the reformer was born in or near this place.

WYCOMBE, a hamlet, in the parish of ROTHLEY, union of MELTON-MOWBRAY, hundred of EAST GOSCOTE, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, 4½ miles (N. N. E.) from Melton-Mowbray; containing, with the chapelry of Chadwell, 118 inhabitants, of whom 58 are in Wycombe.

Seal and Arms.

is evidently of great antiquity, is by some supposed to have been occupied by the Romans: a tessellated pavement, nine feet square, was discovered in the vicinity, in 1774, and among the numerous Roman coins that have been found were some of Antoninus Pius, Marcus Aurelius, and other Roman emperors. Of its occupation by the Saxons, the prefix to its name, Cheaping, signifying a market, is a proof; and in the immediate neighbourhood of the town are the remains of a strong double intrenchment called Desborough Castle, which was probably thrown up by that people to check the progress of the Danes. The only historical event connected with the place is a successful attack on the parliamentary troops quartered here, by Prince Rupert, after the battle of Reading. The town is pleasantly situated on a fine rivulet called the Wycombe stream, which, after winding through the adjoining meadows, flows into the Thames below Marlow; it consists of one principal street, on the road from London to Oxford, from which some smaller streets branch off in various directions. The houses are in general well built; many of them are spacious and handsome, and the town has a prepossessing appearance of cheerfulness and great respectability. On each side are some hills, richly wooded; from that on the south are seen the park, and part of Wycombe Abbey, the seat of Lord Carrington, with its fine plantations. The environs abound with pleasingly varied scenery, and the surrounding district is luxuriantly fertile, and in the highest state of cultivation. The manufacture of paper is carried on to a very considerable extent, for which there are more than 30 mills on the banks of the stream; besides six flour-mills. The making of lace affords employment to more than 1000 of the inhabitants, and chairs are made in great numbers; there is a trade in malt, and the town derives some traffic from its situation on a public thoroughfare. The market, which is extensively supplied with corn, is on Friday; cattle-fairs are held on the 2nd Wednesday in April, and the 28th of October; a wool fair on the last Wednesday in June, and a statute and pleasure fair on the Monday next before Michaelmas-day.

Wycombe, though governed by a mayor in the reign of Edward III., received its first regular charter of incorporation from Henry VI., which was confirmed and extended in the reigns of Elizabeth, James I., and Charles II.; the controul is now vested in a mayor, 4 aldermen, and 12 councillors, under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76; and the mayor and late mayor are justices of the peace. The borough, which for municipal purposes comprises only 134 acres, first exercised the elective franchise in the 28th of Edward I., since which time it has continued to return two members to parliament; the right of election was extended in 1832 to the £10 householders of the entire parish, which contains 6310 acres; the mayor is returning officer. The corporation hold occasional sessions for all offences not capital. The town-hall, erected in 1757, at the expense of the Earl of Shelburne, is a commodious and neat structure of brick, supported on stone pillars. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £23. 17. 1.; net income, £140; patron, the Marquess of Lansdowne; impropriator, William Terry, Esq. The church is a venerable structure in the early English style, with a square embattled tower, which has been subsequently ornamented and crowned with pinnacles; the chancel is separated from the nave by an ancient oak screen, and the building contains several old and interesting monuments. There are places of worship for Independents, Baptists, Wesleyans, and the Society of Friends. An ancient hospital for lepers, dedicated to St. Margaret and St. Giles, and another dedicated to St. John the Baptist, for a master, brethren, and sisters, were founded here in the reign of Henry III.; the latter was granted by Elizabeth to the corporation, and the endowment, which was augmented by a bequest of £1000 from Mrs. Mary Bowden, in 1790, producing altogether an annual income of £290. 16. per annum, is appropriated to the maintenance of a grammar school, and almshouses for four aged persons. A Sunday school, now on the national system, was established by Miss Hannah Ball, in 1769, fourteen years prior to their introduction by Mr. Raikes, of Gloucester, to whom some attribute their origin. Almshouses in Crendon-lane, occupied by two widows, were founded in 1677, by John Lane, who endowed them with property now producing £23 per annum; and there are several other almshouses, and various benefactions, amounting to a considerable sum annually. Previously to the completion of the Royal Military College at Sandhurst, a department of that institution was established at Wycombe, which was, in 1802, removed to Great Marlow. The poor law union comprises 33 parishes or places, 31 of which are in the county of Buckingham, and 2 in that of Oxford, the whole containing a population of 34,150. The learned Willam Alley, Bishop of Exeter, and one of the translators of the Bible, in the reign of Elizabeth; and Charles Butler, author of a Treatise on Rhetoric, and other works, were natives of the town; and Dr. Gumble, who wrote the Life of General Monk, and is supposed to have assisted him in effecting the restoration of Charles II., was vicar. Wycombe gives the titles of Earl and Baron to the Marquess of Lansdowne.

WYCOMBE, WEST (ST. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of WYCOMBE, hundred of DESBOROUGH, county of BUCKINGHAM, 2½ miles (N. W. by W.) from High Wycombe; containing 2002 inhabitants, many of whom are employed in the making of lace and of chairs. The parish comprises by measurement 6356 acres, of which 4285 are arable, 441 meadow and pasture, 1048 woodland, and 582 common. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11. 9. 7.; net income, £250; patron and impropiator, Sir J. Dashwood King, Bart. The church, which is surrounded by an ancient intrenchment, was erected in 1763, at the expense of Lord le Despenser, and is an elegant structure in the Grecian style, with a profusion of Mosaic ornaments, and containing some handsome monuments. In an adjoining mausoleum is one of considerable beauty to the memory of Sarah, Baroness le Despenser, with many memorials of the Dashwood family and others; and in one of its recesses was deposited, in 1775, an urn inclosing the heart of Paul Whitehead, the poet, which he had bequeathed to Lord le Despenser. The edifice occupies an eminence finely clothed with woods, emerging from which the tower and the mausoleum form objects strikingly picturesque. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyans. In the neighbourhood is an ancient camp, doubly intrenched, called Desborough Castle, which gives name to the hundred; vestiges of buildings, together with window-frames of stone, similar to those of a church, have been discovered on its site.

WYDDIAL (ST. GILES), a parish, in the union of BUNTINGFORD, hundred of EDWINSTREE, county of HERTFORD, 1½ mile (N. E.) from Buntingford; containing 248 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16, and in the patronage of C. Ellis Heaton, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £326, and there is a glebe of 15 acres. The church, which has an embattled tower at the west end, contains several monuments, and on the north side of the chancel is a chapel, in which are some remains of fine stained glass, representing the Crucifixion.

WYE (ST. MARTIN AND ST. GREGORY), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union of EAST ASHFORD, hundred of WYE, Upper division of the lathe of SCRAY, E. division of KENT, 4 miles (N. E.) from Ashford, and 56 (E. S. E.) from London; containing 1648 inhabitants. This place, which is of great antiquity, and was once of considerable importance, was the head of a royal manor having extensive jurisdiction, and formed part of the demesne lands of the Saxon kings prior to the Conquest, when, with all its appendages, liberties, and royal customs, it was granted to the abbey of Battle, in Sussex, with which it continued till the Dissolution. The town, which at present is little more than a considerable village, is pleasantly situated near the right or eastern bank of the river Stour, over which is a stone bridge of five arches, built in 1638. The houses, which are neatly built, are principally ranged round a green, and in two parallel and two cross streets: a little above the bridge is a corn-mill. Fairs are held on May 29th and October 11th. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £101; patron, the Earl of Winchelsea: the tithes have been commuted for £639 payable to the earl, and £680 to the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church was rebuilt by John Kemp, a native of the town, who was first preferred to the bishopric of Rochester, and, having successively presided over several other sees, was lastly translated to the archbishopric of Canterbury and made cardinal. In 1447, he founded a college here for a master, or provost, and Secular canons, dedicated to St. Gregory and St. Martin, the revenue of which, at the Dissolution, was valued at £93. 2. The church was a beautiful cruciform structure, with a central tower surmounted by a spire, and had all the usual parts of a large collegiate church; in 1572, the spire was injured by lightning, and, having been restored, fell, in 1686, and destroyed a portion of the east end of the church, together with all the monuments in the chancels, among which was the tomb of the father and mother of the founder; the east end was partly rebuilt in 1701, but on a much smaller scale. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

The free grammar school, which is endowed with £10 a year, was founded by grant from Charles I. of the rectories of Boughton-Aluph, Beuset and Newington, and other premises, and, having fallen into decay, was revived in 1832: an exhibition, originally of £10 per annum, to Lincoln College, Oxford, was attached to the establishment by Sir George Wheeler, in 1723, which was augmented to £20, in 1759, by his son, the Rev. Granville Wheeler. A free school for children of both sexes was founded in 1708 by Lady Joanna Thornhill, who assigned to it an endowment now worth £193. 10. a year. In 1723, Sir George Wheeler devised the ancient collegiate buildings and lands for the respective residences and schools of the master of the grammar school and the master and mistress under Lady Thornhill's charity; and these establishments, therefore, now occupy the college green, the former the south, and the latter the north, side. An almshouse for six persons was founded by Sir Thomas Kemp. Olantigh, in the parish, was formerly the seat of the families of Kemp and Thornhill, and is supposed to have been the birthplace of Archbishop Kemp, and also of his nephew, Thomas Kemp, Bishop of London; it passed from the Kemps to the Thornhills, and from them to the family of Sawbridge, of whom Alderman Sawbridge, who was buried in the church, and his sister, Mrs. Catherine Macauley Graham, author of a History of England, were born here. Several years since, in making a sunk fence on the grounds of Olantigh, two human skeletons were discovered on the side of a large tumulus, together with several small pieces of iron, two of which appeared to have been spear-heads. Withersdane, a hamlet in the parish, was anciently celebrated on account of a holy well, consecrated by St. Eustace. Dr. Plot, the celebrated antiquary and naturalist, received his early education at Wye College.

WYERSDALE, NETHER, a township, in the parish and union of GARSTANG, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 4 miles (N. N. E.) from Garstang; containing 762 inhabitants. There is a large establishment for spinning and manufacturing cotton. A school is endowed with £6 per annum, and another is partly supported by the proprietor of Scorton works.

WYERSDALE, OVER, a chapelry, in the parish and union of LANCASTER, hundred of LONSDALE, south of the Sands, N. division of LANCASTER, 6 miles (N. N. E.) from Garstang; containing 679 inhabitants. This place is supposed to have been divided into twelve portions, and at the Conquest to have been given to twelve soldiers as a reward for their services. The district comprises about 6000 acres, the greater portion of which is meadow and pasture, and partly fell. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £135; patron, the Vicar of Lancaster. William Cawthorne, in 1683, gave a school-house, with a messuage and land, and a rent-charge of £15, for which 30 boys are instructed; and another school has an allowance of £20 per annum from the Society of Friends. Some monks from the abbey of Furness settled here; but, in 1188, they removed to Ireland, and founded Wythney abbey.

WYESHAM, a hamlet, in the parish of NEWTON-DIXTON, Lower division of the hundred of SKENFRETH, union and county of MONMOUTH; containing 430 inhabitants.

WYFORDBY, or WYVERBY (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of MELTON-MOWBRAY, hundred of FRAMLAND, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, 3 miles (E.) from Melton-Mowbray; containing, with the chapelry of Brentingby, 129 inhabitants, of whom 75 are in the township of Wyfordby. This place, at the Conquest, was granted to Roger de Bussy, Baron of Tickhill, in the county of York, from whom it went to the Mowbray family, and, after passing into other hands, became the property of the Hartopps, whose descendant, Sir Edmund C. Hartopp, Bart., is the present lord. The parish, which is situated on the river Eye, comprises by measurement 800 acres; the soil is clayey, the surface hilly, and the meadows are of a very rich quality. The Oakham and Melton canal passes through the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £6; net income, £137; patron, Sir E. C. Hartopp. The church is a very ancient structure.

WYHAM (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, wapentake of LUDBOROUGH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Louth; containing 115 inhabitants. The parish comprises, with the hamlet of Cadeby, about 1400 acres, of which the surface is elevated, and commands a fine view of the German Ocean and the country adjacent. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8; net income, £195; patron, J. F. Heneage, Esq. The church is an ancient structure, and appears to have been originally of larger dimensions.

WYKE, a tything, in the parish, union, and hundred of AXMINSTER, Honiton and S. divisions of DEVON; containing 103 inhabitants.

WYKE, a tything, in the parish of WORPLESDON, union of GUILDFORD, First division of the hundred of WOKEING, W. division of SURREY; containing 158 inhabitants.

WYKE, a township, in the parish of BIRSTAL, and union of BRADFORD, wapentake of MORLEY, W. riding of YORK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Bradford; containing 2330 inhabitants. The township comprises about 860 acres, of which 200, then a common, were inclosed in 1820; the soil is of inferior quality, but has been improved by cultivation. The substratum, which abounds in coal and iron-stoue, is let on lease to the Low Moor Iron Company, by Miss Curre and T. Carwick, Esq., to whom the lands belong, and of whom the latter is lord of the manor. The village consists of scattered dwellings, irregularly built. The township was formed into a church district in 1844, by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who have assigned an endowment for a minister. There are places of worship for Independents and Moravians, which latter have a small settlement here.

WYKE-CHAMPFLOWER, a chapelry, in the parish and hundred of BRUTON, union of WINCANTON, E. division of SOMERSET, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W.) from Bruton; containing 88 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income £30; patron and impropiator, Sir H. R. Hoare, Bart. The chapel is dedicated to St. Mary.

WYKE-HAMON, formerly a parish, now a hamlet in the parish of WICKEN, union of POTTERS-PURY, hundred of CLELEY, S. division of NORTHAMPTON: The rectory has long since been consolidated with Wicken.

WYKE-REGIS (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of WEYMOUTH, and liberty of WYKE-REGIS and ELWALL, Dorchester division of DORSET, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (W. S. W.) from Weymouth; containing 1911 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with Weymouth annexed, valued in the king's books at £19. 7. 1., and in the gift of the Bishop of Winchester: the tithes have been commuted for £550, and the glebe comprises 27 acres. The church, a large ancient pile, with a lofty embattled tower, is the mother church of Weymouth, and the usual burial-place of its inhabitants. At Smallmouth, in the parish, is a ferry to the Isle of Portland.

WYKEHAM (ALL SAINTS), a parish in the union of SCARBOROUGH, PICKERING lythe, N. riding of YORK, 6½ miles (S. W. by W.) from Scarborough; containing, with the village of Ruston, and the township of Longdale-End, 597 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 7000 acres, of which 4000 are open moorland, and the remainder a fertile tract extending southward to the river Derwent. Wykeham Abbey, the seat of the Hon. Marmaduke Langley, who is lord of the manor and chief owner of the soil, is a neat mansion, standing in a finely wooded park about a mile south of the village, near which is a sheet of water, abounding in fish, and crossed by an iron bridge erected in 1802. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Hon. M. Langley, by whom three schools are partly supported. The church was repaired and beautified at the expense of the late Richard Langley, Esq. A priory of Cistercian nuns, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, was founded here about 1153, by Pain Fitz-Osbert, and at the Dissolution had a revenue of £25. 17. 6.: there are still some remains of the church belonging to it.

WYKEHAM, EAST, a parish, in the union of LOUTH, Wold division of the hundred of LOUTH-ESKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 7 miles (W. by N.) from Louth; containing 32 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £14, and in the patronage of the family of Ferrand: there is no church.

WYKEHAM, WEST, a parish, in the union of LOUTH, E. division of the wapentake of WRAGGOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 7½ miles (W. by N.) from Louth. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £3. 6. s., and in the patronage of the Crown: the church is demolished.

WYKEN, a parish, in the union of FOLESHILL, county of WARWICK, 3 miles (N. E. by E.) from Coventry; containing 115 inhabitants, and comprising 787 acres of a highly productive soil. Some mines are worked here, the rateable annual value of which is returned at £218. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £115; patron and impropiator, the Earl of Craven.

WYKIN, a hamlet, in the parish and union of HINCKLEY, hundred of SPARKENHOE, county of LEICESTER; containing 92 inhabitants.

WYLAM, a township, in the parish of Ovingham, union of HEXHAM, E. division of TINDALE ward, S. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, 9 miles, (W.) from Newcastle; containing 984 inhabitants. The manor was an appurtenance to the monastery of Tynemouth, and was granted by the crown to a branch of the Fenwick family, of Fenwick Tower, from whom it passed to the Blacketts, in the reign of Charles II., and is now the property of Christopher Blackett, Esq., of Wylam House. The river Tyne, over which is a wooden bridge, erected by subscription in 1835, separates it from the Newcastle and Carlisle railway. On both sides of the river are extensive collieries, belonging to Mr. Blackett; and an iron-foundry was established by the Messrs. Thompson, as a rich vein of iron-stone runs through the township, chiefly on the south side of the river; but the establishment has been given up. There are also quarries of excellent stone, applicable for building and other purposes. The village, which is large, contains a place of worship for Wesleyans; and there is a school, chiefly supported by Mr. Blackett. At the west end of the village is Wylam Hall, an ancient building formerly a peel, or strong house.

WYLDECOURT, a tything, in the parish of HAWK-CHURCH, union of AXMINSTER, hundred of CERNE, TOTCOMBE, and MODBURY, Bridport division of DORSET; containing 367 inhabitants.

WYLY, county of WILTS.—See WILY.

WYMERING (St. PETER AND St. PAUL), a parish, in the union of FAREHAM, hundred of PORTSDOWN, Fareham and S. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 4¼ miles (W.) from Havant; containing, with the hamlet of Hilsea, and part of Potwell, 748 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3545 acres, of which 496 are common or waste; it includes the northern end of Portsea Island, across which are strong lines of defence, and which is connected with the main portion by Pos bridge, over the narrow channel between Portsmouth and Langston harbours. Great, and part of Little, Horsea island, at the upper end of the former harbour, are also in the parish. A fair for cattle and cheese is held on the 26th of July and two following days. The living is a vicarage, annexed to the rectory of Wideley: the vicarial tithes have been commuted for £432, and the glebe comprises 14 acres. The church is an ancient structure, chiefly in the Norman style. There is a place of worship for Independents; and a national school is supported by subscription. Four almshouses were founded by Mrs. Honor Wait, in the reign of Elizabeth, for widows, to each of whom £1. 10. is paid in money; and the proceeds of £100 left by Mr. Soaper, and of £100 by the Rev. C. B. Henville, both three and a half per cent. consols., are given to them in clothing and coal.

WYMINGTON (St. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of WELLINGBOROUGH, hundred of WILLEY, county of BEDFORD, 2½ miles (S. by W.) from Higham-Ferrars; containing 270 inhabitants. It comprises 1685 acres, of which 1014 are arable, and the remainder meadow and pasture, with a moderate portion of woodland. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £10; net income, £90; patron the Rev. R. Midgley. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1811; the glebe comprises 160 acres. The church, a handsome structure in the later English style, is said to have been built in the fourteenth century, by John Curteys, lord of the manor, and mayor of the staple at Calais.

WYMONDHAM (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of MELTON-MOWBRAY, hundred of FRAMLAND, N. division of the county of LEICESTER, 6½ miles (E.) from Melton-Mowbray; containing 766 inhabitants. This place, which is of great antiquity, and is still surrounded by its ancient walls, comprises by measurement 2920 acres; the soil is partly clay, and partly a rich red loam; the surface is undulated. The Oakham canal passes through the parish. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £12, and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £391. The church is chiefly in the early English style, with the upper portion of the tower and the spire in the later English. Sir John Sedley, in 1637, endowed a school for boys with 60 acres of land, now producing £127 per annum.

WYMONDHAM, or WINDHAM (St. MARY THE VIRGIN AND St. THOMAS à BECKET), a parish, in the incorporation and hundred of FOREHOE, E. division of NORFOLK, 9 miles (W. S. W.) from Norwich, and 100 (N. E. by N.) from London; comprising the market-town of Wymondham, which forms the in-soken, and the divisions of Downham, Market-street, Silfield, Sutton, Towngreen, and Wattlefield, that constitute the out-socket; and containing 5179 inhabitants. This town, which derives its name from the Saxon Win Munde Ham, signifying "a pleasant village on a mount," is indebted for its importance to the foundation of a priory of Black monks, at first a cell to the abbey of St. Alban's, by William d'Albini, or Daubeney, in 1130. Henry I. endowed the monastery with lands and with the privilege of appropriating all wrecks between Eccles, Happisburgh, and Tunstead, and with an annual rent, in kind, of 2000 eels from the village of Helgay. About 1448, it was elevated to the rank of an abbey, and continued to flourish till the Dissolution, when its revenue was returned at £72. 5. 4., and granted by Henry VIII. to the Earl of Surrey; there are some slight remains of the church and conventual buildings, and a few years since two leaden coffins were found near the site of the chancel of the abbey, one supposed to contain the remains of the founder's lady. The two Ketts, who disturbed the county in the reign of Edward VI., were accustomed to assemble their followers under an oak of which part yet remains in the vicinity of the town; and after their defeat by the Earl of Warwick, the elder was hanged in chains on the castle of Norwich, and the younger upon the lofty steeple of the church of Wymondham, of which town they were both natives. In the reign of Mary, Richard Crashfield and Francis Knight were burnt at the stake in the town, for heresy. In 1615, 300 houses, and property to the amount of £40,000, were destroyed by fire; and in 1631, the plague raged with great fury among the inhabitants.

The town, which is situated on the road from Norwich, through Thetford, to London, is of considerable extent, and consists chiefly of five streets, diverging from the market-place, and containing many ancient and several well-built modern houses; it has been greatly improved within the last few years, and the inhabitants are amply supplied with water from springs. The manufacture of wooden spindles, spoons, and other articles of turnery ware, was formerly carried on to a very great extent, but has gradually declined, and is now almost extinct, being superseded by the weaving of bombazin, crape, and other articles, introduced many years since, and in the manufacture of which 1200 persons are employed; there is also a large brewery and malting establishment. The market, granted by charter of King John in 1203, is on Friday; there are fairs on February 14th, May 17th, and September 7th, principally for cattle, horses, and pedlery, and statute-fairs for hiring servants are held occasionally: when these days happen on the Saturday, the fairs are held on the following Monday, so as not to interfere with the Norwich market. In the market-place is an ancient cross, erected in 1616, and covered with an octagonal roof supported on wooden pillars at the angles. A court leet takes place annually for the appointment of constables; manorial courts occur as occasion requires, and petty-sessions on the third Tuesday in the month: the inhabitants are exempt from serving on juries at assizes and sessions. The house of correction for females contains only three wards, with day-rooms, and two airing-yards.

The parish comprises by measurement 10,559 acres, chiefly arable; the surface is varied, and the scenery in some parts pleasingly picturesque. The LIVING is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £10. 14. 4½., and in the gift of the appropriator, the Bishop of Ely: the great tithes have been commuted for £2192. 12., and the vicarial for £799. The church, which comprises the nave of the abbey church, is a handsome structure in various styles, containing many interesting and elegant details, among which are some richly decorated Norman arches; the roof is elaborately groined, and ornamented with sculptured figures of angels, and various devices. On the south side of the chancel, which has been formed out of the nave, to supply the place of the ancient choir, is a splendid monument to the last abbot of the monastery. A window in the north aisle was embellished in 1840 with paintings of the Nativity, Crucifixion, and Ascension of Our Saviour, and with a figure of the Virgin and Infant, in modern stained glass; the font is richly sculptured, and there are several neat monuments. The Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyans have places of worship. A free grammar school was founded in the reign of Elizabeth, and endowed with a moiety of the property belonging to guilds in the town, producing £100 per annum, which are paid to the master, who has also a house, left by Robert Day, in 1673. A scholarship in Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, was attached to it in 1574, by Archbishop Parker, and another, in 1580, by John Parker, Esq.; and in 1659, a share in an exhibition for scholarships, to the same college, was given by Edward Colman, Esq.: the school is kept in an ancient chapel dedicated to St. Thomas à Becket. The late Rev. William Papillon, in 1834, built schoolrooms for 200 children of both sexes, and gave 20 acres of land for their endowment, and for the support of an evening lectureship; the land yields £60 per annum. The Rev. John Hendry, in 1722, bequeathed £400 to be vested in the purchase of land, and the rental to be given to the vicar for an afternoon sermon in the church every Sunday; also a rent-charge of £3. 10. for a sermon every Friday in Lent: the same benefactor left a small estate for the use of the charity school; and on the inclosure of the parish in 1806, about 40 acres of land were allotted to the poor for fuel.

WYMONDLEY, GREAT, a parish, in the union of HITCHIN, hundred of BROADWATER, county of HERTFORD, 2 miles (E. by S.) from Hitchin; containing 263 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 1400 acres; the soil is a strong clay, alternated with gravel and chalk, with a portion of rich deep loam; the surface is flat, and the lands are watered by a small rivulet called the Pirral. The manor is held by the service of cup-bearer to the kings of England, at their coronation. The living is a vicarage, with which that of Ippolitts was united in 1635; net income, £301; patrons and impropiators, the Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge. The tithes of Great and Little Wymondley were commuted for land and corn-rents in 1811. The church is ancient, having a Norman arch between the nave and chancel, with an embattled tower.

WYMONDLEY, LITTLE (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of HITCHIN, hundred of BROADWATER, county of HERTFORD, 2¼ miles (S. E. by E.) from Hitchin; containing 288 inhabitants. It comprises about 1160 acres; the soil is similar to that of Great Wymondley, and the surface is hilly. In the village is a college for educating Protestant dissenting ministers, founded in 1729, by W. Coward, Esq., with a chapel attached; the establishment originated at Northampton, and the celebrated Dr. Doddridge was its first theological professor. It possesses a valuable library of about 10,000 volumes, with an extensive and complete philosophical apparatus; and there are two professorships, one including the theological, philosophical, and mathematical departments; and the other, every branch of classical literature. The living is a donative curacy; net income, £20; patron and improprator, S. H. U. Heathcote, Esq. The church contains, among other sepulchral memorials, some very ancient gravestones. A priory of Black canons in honour of St. Lawrence, was founded here in the time of Henry III., by Richard Argentein, and at the Dissolution had a revenue of £37. 10. 6. There are no remains of the building; its site is marked by some avenues of stately box-trees, and there is an old well, to the water of which tradition ascribes considerable efficacy.

WYRARDISBURY, or WRAYSBURY (ST. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of ETON, hundred of STROKE, county of BUCKINGHAM, 3 miles (S. W. by S.) from Colnbrook; containing 672 inhabitants. This parish comprises 1522*a.* 1*r.* 38*p.*, of which 873 acres are arable, and 649 meadow and pasture. Within its limits is Magna Charta island, a small islet in the Thames, on which King John, at the instance of the barons, signed that celebrated charter of English liberty; it is the property of G. Simon Harcourt, Esq., of Ankerwycke House. The living is a vicarage, with that of Langley-Marish annexed, valued in the king's books at £14. 10. 5., and in the gift of the appropriators, the Dean and Canons of Windsor: the great tithes have been commuted for £377, and the vicarial for £154; the glebe comprises 18 acres. William Gill, in 1798, bequeathed to the poor £300 four per cent. consols., which were augmented by a bequest of £100 from Thos. Wright; and the interest, amounting to £13. 8., is distributed on Christmas-day. John Lee, in 1807, gave two annuities to the Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy, in trust to pay £26 per annum to a Sunday afternoon lecturer; and the parish is also in possession of property called the Church and the Bridge lands, now let for about £46 per annum. A Benedictine nunnery in honour of St. Mary Magdalene, was founded at Ankerwycke, in the parish, in the time of Henry II., by Sir Gilbert de Montfichet, and at the Dissolution was valued at £45. 14. 4.

WYRE-PIDDLE, a chapelry, in the parish of FLADBURY, union of PERSHORE, Middle division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, Pershore and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 1½ mile (N. E. by E.) from Pershore; containing 188 inhabitants, and comprising 330 acres.

WYRLEY, GREAT, a township, in the parish of CANNOCK, union of PENKRIDGE, E. division of the hundred of CUTTLESTONE, S. division of the county of STAFFORD, 6½ miles (N. N. W.) from Walsall; containing 799 inhabitants, and consisting of 1600 acres. In 1844, this place was formed, with the township of Cheslyn-Hay, into an ecclesiastical district, having a population of 1753. The church, dedicated to St. Mark, and in the early English style, was built in 1845, at a cost of £2430, of which sum £1200 were given by the Rev.

William Gresley, M.A., prebendary of Lichfield; the remainder was raised by subscription, aided by £333 from the Diocesan, and £250 from the Incorporated Society. The living is a perpetual curacy; patron, for the first time, the Incumbent of Cannock, and afterwards the Dean and Chapter of Lichfield. A school, purchased from the Independents, was opened in 1843.—See CANNOCK.

WYRLEY, LITTLE, a township, in the parish of NORTON-UNDER-CANNOCK, union of PENKRIDGE, S. division of the hundred of OFFLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, 7¼ miles (W. S. W.) from Lichfield; containing 61 inhabitants. Several persons are employed in the Brownhill coal-mine, the shaft of which is 90 yards in depth, and the strata three yards thick.

WYSALL (HOLY TRINITY), a parish, in the union of LOUGHBOROUGH, S. division of the wapentake of RUSHCLIFFE and of the county of NOTTINGHAM, 8¾ miles (S. by E.) from Nottingham; containing 379 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 1481 acres, of which two-thirds are arable, and the remainder pasture and meadow; the soil is a cold clay, and the surface is undulated. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £4. 11. 0½; net income, £123; patron and improprator, the Earl of Gosford. The tithes were commuted for land and money payments in 1800: the glebe comprises 80 acres. The church is an ancient structure in the later English style.

WYTHALL, a chapelry, in the parish and union of KING'S-NORTON, Upper division of the hundred of HALFSHIRE, E. division of the county of WORCESTER, 8 miles (N. E. by E.) from Bromsgrove; containing 45 inhabitants. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, and rebuilt in 1778, is a brick edifice, containing 200 sittings: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £80; patrons, the Dean and Chapter of Worcester; appropriator, the Vicar of Bromsgrove. Some schools in connexion with the chapel, of which the Rev. Joseph Amphlett is the incumbent, have been recently rebuilt at the joint expense of the landed proprietors, and the tenants of the neighbourhood, at a cost of more than £200.

WYTHAM, or WHYTHAM (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union of ABINGDON, hundred of HORMER, county of BERKS, 3 miles (N. W.) from Oxford; containing 189 inhabitants. It comprises 1129*a.* 1*r.* 9*p.*, of which 679 acres are meadow and pasture, 144 arable, and 284 woodland. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £7. 5. 2½; net income, £306; patron, the Earl of Abingdon. Here was anciently a nunnery, which was originally founded at Abingdon, by the sister of King Ceadwalla, and afterwards removed hither; but, during the war between Offa and Cynewulf, it was demolished by the nuns, who had suffered great annoyance from a castle having been erected in the neighbourhood.

WYTCHIE, a hamlet, in the parish of WILLOUGHBY, union of SPILSBY, Wold division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN; containing 15 inhabitants.

WYTHBURN, a chapelry, in the parish of CROSTHWAITHE, union of COCKERMOUTH, ALLERDALE ward below Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, 8¼ miles (S. E. by S.) from Keswick; containing, with St. John's Castlerigg, 499 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £82; patron, the Vicar of Cros-thwaite. The boundaries of the counties of Cumberland and Westmorland are here marked by Dunmail-Raise Stones, which are said to commemorate the defeat of the last King of Cumberland, by Edmund, the Saxon monarch, of whom Malcolm, King of Scotland, held Cumberland in fee. Thirlmere lake is within the chapelry.

WYTHOP, a chapelry, in the parish of LORTON, union of COCKERMOUTH, ALLERDALE ward above Derwent, W. division of CUMBERLAND, 5 miles (E. by S.) from Cocker mouth; containing 125 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £51; patrons, the Proprietors. The chapel is situated on an eminence above the western bank of Bassenthwaite lake. The ancient Hall has been converted into a farm-house. The Rev. John Hudson, a learned divine and critic, was born here in 1662.

WYTON, a township, in the parish of SWINE, union of SKIRLAUGH, Middle division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, E. riding of YORK, 5½ miles (N. E. by E.) from Hull; containing 91 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 630 acres: the village is on the road from Hull to Sproatley, and is pleasantly situated and neatly built. The inappropriate tithes have been commuted for £201. 10. 6.

WYVERSTONE (St. George), a parish, in the union and hundred of HARTISMERE, W. division of SUFFOLK, 7 miles (N.) from Stow-Market; containing 348 inhabitants, and consisting of 1552*a. 2r. 21p.* The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 14. 9½., and in the gift of John Moseley, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £350, and the glebe comprises 15 acres, with a house, lately built by the Rev. James Ware, incumbent. The church is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower, and contains some remains of ancient stained glass.

WYVILL, a parish, in the union of GRANTHAM, wapentake of WINNIBRIGGS and THREE, parts of KESTVEN, county of LINCOLN, 6 miles (N. W.) from Colsterworth; containing, with Hungerton, 137 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Hungerton united; net income, £35; patron, the Bishop of Lincoln. The church is in ruins, and the inhabitants attend that at Harlaxton.

YADDLETHORPE, a hamlet, in the parish of BOTTESFORD, union of GLANDFORD-BRIGG, E. division of the wapentake of MANLEY, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 8 miles (W.) from Glandford-Brigg; containing 133 inhabitants. It is situated on an acclivity above Bottesford beck, and comprises 733*a. 3r. 6p.*: the common lands were inclosed in 1794.

YAFFORTH, a chapelry, in the parish of DANBY-WISK, union of NORTH-ALLERTON, wapentake of GILLING-EAST, N. riding of YORK, 1½ mile (W. by N.) from North-Allerton; containing 178 inhabitants. It is in the vale of the Wisk, and comprises by computation 1120 acres of land, belonging to several resident proprietors, some of whom have neat houses here: the common was inclosed about 1832. The chapel is a small structure: the living is a curacy, annexed to the rectory of Danby-Wisk.

YALDING (St. Peter and St. Paul), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union of MAIDSTONE, hundred of TWYFORD, lathe of AYLESFORD, W. division of KENT, 6 miles (S. W.) from Maidstone, containing 2467 inhabitants. The parish is intersected by different branches of the Medway, and upon two of the larger streams stands the village, approached by a long narrow stone bridge, besides which there is another in the parish, called Twyford bridge. The river is navigable to this place for barges, by which a considerable traffic in timber, corn, and coal, is carried on; and a fair for cattle is held on October 15th. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £20. 18. 9.; net income, £1184; patrons and impropriators, Messrs. Warde and Holmes. The church is principally in the decorated English style. William Cleave, Esq., in 1665, founded a free school, and endowed it with a farm now let for £50 a year; and a charity school, founded in 1711, for girls and young children, has been endowed by Mrs. Alchorn and Mrs. Warde, sisters.

YANWATH, with EAMONT-BRIDGE, a township, in the parish of BARTON, WEST ward and union, county of WESTMORLAND, 2 miles (S. by W.) from Penrith; containing 316 inhabitants. In this township is situated the workhouse of the West ward union. The ancient Hall, a quadrangular castellated building, is now occupied as a farm-house, and about a mile from it are vestiges of a circular camp called Castle Steads.

YANWORTH, a chapelry, in the parish of HAZLETON, union of NORTHLEACH, hundred of BRADLEY, E. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 3½ miles (W. by S.) from Northleach; containing 93 inhabitants, and comprising 1087 acres. The tithes have been commuted for £254, and there is a glebe of 10 acres. The chapel, dedicated to St. Michael, is a chapel of ease to Hazleton, where the inhabitants of Yanworth anciently buried their dead; but since the latter part of the last century this has been their usual place of sepulture.

YAPHAM, a chapelry, in the parish and union of POCKLINGTON, Wilton-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of YORK, 2½ miles (N. N. W.) from Pocklington; containing 212 inhabitants, and comprising about 1020 acres. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Pocklington. The chapel, an ancient structure, contains some interesting details, and has a Norman font, but the building has been so mutilated by repairs, that it retains little of its original character. Twelve children are educated for an annuity of £12, paid out of the produce of the chapel lands.

YAPTON, a parish, in the union of WEST HAMPNETT, hundred of AVISFORD, rape of ARUNDEL, W. division of SUSSEX, 4 miles (S. W.) from Arundel; containing 541 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Arundel to Bognor, and intersected by the Arundel and Portsmouth canal, and comprises about 1500 acres, of which 100 are meadow and pasture, 45 woodland, and the remainder arable; the soil is a loam, producing excellent crops of grain. The living is a discharged vicarage, united to that of Walberton, and valued in the king's books at £7. 10. 11½.; impropriators, Inigo Thomas, Esq., and others. The great tithes have been commuted for £617, and the vicarial for £188. 6.; the glebe comprises 12 acres. The church is principally in the early English style, with a tower at the west end, and contains an ancient font of curious design, and several neat monuments. There was formerly an old chapel at Bilsom, now converted into cottages. Stephen Roe, in 1766, bequeathed £1200 three per cent. South Sea annuities, producing £36 a year, of which £20 are applied for teaching twenty children in the national school, and the residue to other charitable purposes.

YARBOROUGH, or YARBURGH (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of LOUTH, Marsh division of the hundred of LOUTH-ESK, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 5 miles (N. E. by N.) from Louth; containing 210 inhabitants. The parish consists of 1279 acres, and its eastern border is crossed by the Louth navigation; the surface is flat, and the soil of a clayey quality. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £9. 13. 6.; net income, £226; patron, Nicholas Edmund Yarburgh, Esq., of Heslington Hall, near York, who is lord of the manor, and owns half of the parish. The glebe contains 235 acres, the tithes having been commuted for land and a money payment in 1807. The church is an ancient edifice, with a square tower. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

YARBOROUGH, a hamlet, in the parish of CROXTON, union of GLANDFORD-BRIGG, E. division of the wapentake of YARBOROUGH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 8 miles (N. E.) from Glandford-Brigg. Here are the remains of a very extensive camp, upon the site of which vast numbers of Roman coins have been discovered.

YARCOMBE (St. JOHN THE BAPTIST), a parish, in the union of CHARD, hundred of AXMINSTER, Honiton and S. divisions of DEVON, 5½ miles (W.) from Chard; containing 826 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the river Yarte, from which its name, in ancient documents Yartecomb, is derived; it comprises about 5000 acres, the property of Sir H. F. T. S. Drake, to whose ancestor Sir Francis, one moiety of the manor was granted by Queen Elizabeth. There are some quarries of blue lias, which are easily wrought. The village is in the well-wooded vale of the Axe, and the surrounding scenery is beautifully picturesque: the road from London to Exeter passes through it. Considerable facilities of conveyance are afforded by a canal recently opened from Taunton to Chard. A pleasure-fair is held on the second Tuesday after Trinity-Sunday. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £28, and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £607; impropiator, Sir H. Drake. The glebe comprises 36 acres, with a house. The church is a handsome cruciform structure in the decorated English style, with a square embattled tower surmounted by a low spire. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

YARDLEY (St. LAWRENCE), a parish, in the union of BUNTINGFORD, hundred of ODSEY, county of HERTFORD, 4½ miles (W. S. W.) from Buntingford; containing 633 inhabitants. It comprises 2405*a. 1r. 12p.*, of which 1650 acres are arable, 472 meadow and pasture, 190 woodland, and 92 common and waste. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £12, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, London; impropiator, J. Murray, Esq. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £180, and the impropriate for £350; there are 21½ acres of impropriate glebe. The church is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower surmounted by a spire; the windows are embellished with stained glass, and the walls painted in fresco, which had been long concealed until some late repairs. Chauncy, the historian of Hertfordshire, was interred here.

YARDLEY (St. EDBURGH), a parish, in the union of SOLIHULL, Upper division of the hundred of HALF-SHIRE, Northfield and E. divisions of the county of WORCESTER, 4½ miles (E.) from Birmingham; containing 2825 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the road from Birmingham to Coventry, and is separated from the county of Warwick by a small rivulet. It comprises 6513*a. 28p.*, of which 1809 acres are arable, 3889 pasture and meadow, 8 woodland, and the remainder canal, roads, and waste; the soil is a stiff loam, under which are extensive beds of clay. Great quantities of excellent red tiles are made, and conveyed to Birmingham, whence they are sent to various parts of the kingdom. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 19. 4½.; net income, £463; patrons and impropiators, the family of Greswolde. The church exhibits various specimens of the early and later English styles; a gallery containing 100 free sittings, was erected in 1823. At Yardley-Wood, in the parish, a church was built in 1844. The inhabitants have, from a very early period, enjoyed the benefit of certain lands and rent-charges granted to trustees for their use by different benefactors; the revenue amounts to £833. 19., appropriated to the maintenance of two schools, in paying house-rent for poor parishioners, repairs of the church and bridges, a distribution of bread and money twice a year, and apprenticing children. Job Marston, in 1703, bequeathed property for building and endowing a chapel at Hall-Green; the rental amounts to £130; and the chapel, which was consecrated by Bishop Lloyd on the 25th of May, 1704, is a free chapel and donative, in the patronage of Trustees; incumbent, the Rev. David Davies, M.A. A gallery was added in 1836. The same testator bequeathed property now producing £111 per annum, which is appropriated to a distribution of clothing, bread, &c., and in apprenticing one or two children annually; and Henry Greswolde Lewis, in 1829, gave £1500, directing the dividends to be expended in clothing, bread, and meat.

YARDLEY-GOBION, a hamlet, in the parish and union of POTTERS-PURY, hundred of CLELEY, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 3½ miles (N. N. W.) from Stony-Stratford; containing 689 inhabitants. The road from Northampton to Stony-Stratford passes through this hamlet, which consists of 1387 acres. There is a place of worship for Independents; and the workhouse of the Potters-Pury union is situated here.

YARDLEY-HASTINGS (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of HARDINGSTONE, hundred of WYMMERSLEY, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 8½ miles (E. S. E.) from Northampton; containing 1134 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the south-east by a portion of the county of Buckingham, and intersected by the road from Northampton to Bedford, comprises 4037 acres. A fair is held on Whit-Monday. The living is a rectory, to which a portion of the rectory of Denton is annexed, valued in the king's books at £13. 16. 0½.; net income, £355; patron, the Marquess of Northampton. The tithes were commuted for land in 1776. There is a place of worship for Independents. North of the church are the ruins of an ancient mansion, once the seat of the family of Hastings, Earls of Pembroke. The Rev. Edward Lye, author of the Anglo-Saxon Dictionary, who died in 1769, was rector of the parish.

YARKHILL (St. John the Baptist), a parish, in the union of LEDBURY, hundred of RADLOW, county of HEREFORD, 7¼ miles (E. by N.) from Hereford; containing 452 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the right bank of the river Froome, and consists of 1644 acres. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £3. 19. 3.; net income, £125; patrons, the Dean and Chapter of Hereford; improprator, the Master of Ledbury Hospital.

YARLESIDE, a division, in the parish of DALTON-IN-FURNESS, union of ULVERSTONE, hundred of LONSDALE, north of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 2 miles (S.) from Dalton; containing 561 inhabitants, and comprising several small villages and hamlets.

YARLETT, an extra-parochial liberty, in the parish of WESTON-UPON-TRENT, S. division of the hundred of PIREHILL, union, and N. division of the county, of STAFFORD; containing 24 inhabitants. The liberty comprises about 400 acres of land, the property of the family of Tunnicliff, who reside at the Hall, a neat mansion situated on a gentle declivity.

YARLEY, a tything, in the parish of WOOKEY, union of WELLS, hundred of WELLS-FORUM, E. division of SOMERSET; containing 384 inhabitants.

YARLINGTON (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of WINCANTON, hundred of BRUTON, E. division of SOMERSET, 3 miles (S. by E.) from Castle-Cary; containing 297 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 1240 acres: there are some quarries of stone, for inferior building, and for repairing the roads, and many of the poorer inhabitants are employed in the making of gloves. A fair is held on the 26th of August, for horses, cattle, and sheep. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £16. 1. 3., and in the gift of the incumbent, the Rev. Robert G. Rogers: the tithes have been commuted for £244, and the glebe comprises 38 acres. The church has an embattled tower on the south side. On the south-west declivity of Godshill, in the parish, is a double-intrenched camp, from which is an extensive prospect; and near the church are the remains of an ancient mansion that belonged to the Berkeley family.

YARM (St. Mary Magdalene), a market-town and parish, in the union of STOCKTON-ON-TEES, W. division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, N. riding of YORK, 44 miles (N. N. W.) from York, and 238 (N. by W.) from London; containing 1511 inhabitants. This place, in many old documents called Yarome, Yarum, and Yareham, formed part of the demesnes of the crown, and at the time of the Conquest was conferred by William, together with numerous others, on Robert de Brus, ancestor of the Scottish kings of that name, and who had no less than 43 lordships in the East and West ridings, and 51 in the North riding of the county. The church of Yareham was granted by Robert de Brus to the monastery of Guisborough, but the lordship continued in possession of his descendants till the reign of Henry III., when, Peter de Brus dying without issue, the lands were divided among his four sisters, and the lordship was conveyed, by marriage with the second, to Marmaduke de Thweng; from the Thwengs it passed to the Hiltons, of Cleveland, and from them to the Meynells, of Whorlton Castle.

The town is situated on a peninsula formed by the river Tees, and, being surrounded on all sides by more elevated lands, has frequently suffered from inundations. On the 17th of February, 1758, after a sudden thaw, the waters from the western hills rushed down with resistless violence, destroying cattle and other property in the immediate vicinity, and rising in the streets of the town to the height of seven feet; and in November, 1771, in an inundation of the Tees, caused by an irruption of the Solway moss, the waters rose in many parts of the town to the height of twenty feet, attended with loss of life and the destruction of much valuable property. The town has since experienced floods, but they have been less formidable in their consequences, and of late years have been very rare, on account of the great improvements in the river below Stockton, the course to the sea having been made straighter, and the distance considerably decreased. A bridge of five pointed arches was erected over the river by Bishop Skirlaw, in 1400, of which, in order to give a freer passage to the stream, the northern arch was many years since rebuilt in a circular form, and of wider span; and, in 1802, an act was obtained for shortening the distance and improving the road to Thirsk, under the provisions of which it was resolved to remove the ancient bridge, and erect an iron one in its place. This object was carried into effect in 1805, and an elegant cast-iron bridge of one arch, 180 feet in span, cast at the foundry of Messrs. Walker and Co., of Rotherham, was erected at an expense of nearly £14,000; but, from some defect in the foundation of the abutments, the arch fell down on January 12th, 1806, during the night previous to the day on which it was intended to be opened to the public, and it has not been restored. Fortunately, the ancient bridge had not been taken down, and it has since been greatly improved.

The decline of the town from its former prosperity may be partly attributed to the vicinity of the rising borough of Stockton; it consists chiefly of one spacious street, in the centre of which is the town-hall, a neat square building erected in 1705, upon arches affording an entrance on each side into the area appropriated to the butter market. The trade principally arises from the exportation of agricultural and mineral produce, and the manufacture of tobacco-pipes, bricks, and tiles, especially draining-tiles. The inhabitants also participate largely with those of Stockton in the salmon-fishery of the Tees, the tide flowing upwards of six miles above the bridge; and in addition to the advantages derived from the navigation of the river, which admits vessels of 60 tons' burthen to the wharfs, the town has the advantage of a branch of the Stockton and Darlington railway, which affords facility for the conveyance of coal and other supplies. The market is on Thursday, and fairs are held annually on the Thursday before the 6th of April, Ascension-day, August 2nd, and on the 18th, 19th, and 20th of October, for horses, cattle, sheep, and cheese, of which last immense quanment in the 23rd of Edward I., but made no other return until the 27th of Elizabeth, from which period it exercised the right without intermission until the 2nd of William IV., when it was disfranchised. The living is a discharged rectory, in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £43. The church, situated in the centre of the town, is a neat structure consisting of a nave and chancel, on the south side of which is a sepulchral chapel, containing a handsome statue of the full size, in Parian marble, of Sir Robert Holmes, formerly Governor of the Isle of Wight; the edifice underwent a complete repair in 1831, when the tower was raised a considerable height, at the expense of T. Alexander, Esq., and a gallery was erected by the corporation. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyans. The sum of £30 per annum was bequeathed by Thomas, Lord Holmes, of which £10 are distributed to the poor, £10 paid towards apprenticing a boy, and the remaining £10 given to the minister. There are some vestiges of a Roman station, on the site of which a house has been built, occupied as a private residence.

YARMOUTH, GREAT (St. Nicholas), a sea-port, borough, market-town, and parish, and union of itself, having separate jurisdiction, locally in the E. division of the hundred of FLEGG, E. division of NORFOLK, 23 miles (E. by S.) from Norwich, and 123 (N. E.) from London; containing 24,086 inhabitants. This place, which, from its extensive and prosperous trade and many other advantages and privileges, may be considered the most flourishing port on this part of the coast, derives its name from its situation at the mouth of the river Yare, which here falls into the ocean. It occupies ground originally covered by the sea, which, on its receding, left a bank of sand whereon a few fishermen settled, the first of whom, denominated Fuller, imparted his name to the higher portion, still called Fullers' Hill. As the bank increased in extent and density, the population augmented; but the channel of the northern branch of the Yare, on which the first settlers fixed their habitations, becoming choked up with sand, they, in 1040, removed to the southern branch. The earliest authentic record of the place is in Domesday book, in which it is described as "the king's demesne, and having seventy burgesses." Its fishery, at an early period, attracting many residents, a charter was granted, at the request of the inhabitants, by Henry III., allowing them to inclose the burgh, on the land side, with a wall and moat, the former of which was 2240 yards in length, and had sixteen towers and ten gates. A castle having four watch towers, and upon which a fire beacon was placed in 1588, was also built about this time, in the centre of the town: in the last-named year, a mound called South Mount, was thrown up and crowned with heavy ordnance, and the place was then considered impregnable. The castle, having been demolished in 1621, and the changes introduced into the system of warfare rendering further defences necessary, strong parapets were constructed in front of the town, and cannon planted on them, facing the sea: the circuit of the fortifications thus completed was nearly two miles and a half. The only military operation in which the inhabitants have been ever actually engaged was their gallantly repulsing Kett, when in his rebellion he attempted, at the head of 20,000 men, to take the town by assault. But though the place has been only slightly visited by the scourge of warfare, it has suffered severely from the plague, to which, in 1348, upwards of 7000 persons fell victims; in 1579, upwards of 2000; and more than 2500 in 1664.

The town occupies an extent of 153 acres, on the western bank of a peninsula formed by the river Yare and the sea, and is connected with South Town, or Little Yarmouth, which is on the opposite bank, by a drawbridge. It is of quadrangular form, about a mile long, and half a mile broad, and consists of four good streets parallel with each other, a handsome new street leading to the quay, on which is a noble range of buildings, and a great number of narrow rows intersecting the principal streets at right angles; it is lighted with gas, and well supplied with fresh water, and the streets are kept remarkably clean. There are several very ancient houses, one of which, built in 1596, was the residence of a grand-daughter of Oliver Cromwell: in the drawing-room, which is elaborately ornamented with rich carved work, and has been restored to its pristine state, a meeting of principal officers of the parliamentary army is said to have been held for the purpose of deciding the fate of Charles I. The theatre, a neat and commodious edifice, erected in 1778, near the market-place, is open during the summer months; and races take place in August, on the Denes, a fine down south of Yarmouth. The bathing-houses on the beach, near the jetty, possess every accommodation for visitors; and adjoining is a public-room, built in 1788, where balls and concerts are occasionally held. There are very pleasant walks on the quay and beach; and the extensive sea view, enlivened by the number of vessels in the roads, is a source of considerable gratification to the frequenters of this sea-port, which is also resorted to as a watering-place. The barracks on the South Denes, near the beach, form a magnificent quadrangular range of buildings, designed by Mr. Pilkington, and erected at a cost of £120,000: the armoury in South Town will contain, exclusively of other military and naval stores, 10,000 stand of arms. Between the barracks and the entrance to the harbour, a grand fluted column, 130 feet high, and surmounted by a statue of Britannia, has been erected to the memory of Admiral Lord Nelson, and, as a landmark, well supplies to seamen the loss of Gorleston steeple, which was blown down in the year 1813. On the quay is the custom-house; within a short distance is a public library, with a good collection, and there are subscription reading-rooms adjoining the library. A handsome suspension chain-bridge, of eighty-six feet span, has been constructed at the northern part of the quay over the river Bure, by Robert Cory, Esq., in whom the property is vested; and a new road, in communication with this bridge, completed under an act of parliament, has shortened the distance between the town and Norwich about $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles.

Yarmouth is not a manufacturing town, though a considerable establishment for winding and throwing silk has been formed in connexion with a larger concern at Norwich, and for which buildings have been erected on the site formerly occupied by the barracks, at the north of the town. There are extensive yards for ship-building, with corresponding rope-walks, and several large breweries; and a good trade is carried on coast-wise in malt, corn, flower, coal, timber, and other articles. A direct intercourse prevails with the Baltic, the Mediterranean, Portugal, and other parts of the continent; and a regular communication by steam-vessels is kept up internally with Norwich, and coast-wise with London and the north of England. But the principal source of TRADE by which the town is supported is the herring-fishery, which is usually productive to a remarkable extent: the fish, when cured, or dried, for both of which processes there are very extensive establishments, are not only sent to every district in the kingdom, but exported in considerable quantities to other parts of the world, particularly to the West Indies; and many vessels from other places on the coast fish here, and some, at a defined distance, from foreign countries, especially France and the Netherlands. The situation of Yarmouth, in a commercial point of view, affords unusual advantages. The Yare is here navigable for vessels of 250 tons' burthen; and to Norwich, a distance of thirty-two miles, for smaller vessels, without the intervention of locks. The Waveney, which falls into the Yare, is navigable by Beccles to Bungay, a distance of twenty miles; and the Bure, which also joins the Yare, by Horstead to Aylsham, thirty miles, and another branch to North Walsham, twenty-five miles hence, thus opening an extensive and valuable channel of inland communication. An act was obtained in 1842 for the formation of a railway from Yarmouth to Norwich, to run along the northern bank of the Yare. Many attempts have been unsuccessfully made to form a safe harbour, at the enormous expense of above £240,000; the present one, which is the seventh that has been constructed, was projected and executed, at an expense of about £4200 only, by Jans Johnson, a native of Holland, and affords secure anchorage at all times. In 1835, an act was passed for improving the haven and the several rivers connected with it; also for repairing or rebuilding the bridge over the haven, and St. Olave's bridge across the Waveney. At the entrance of the Yare are two piers; that on the south, 1230 feet long, forming an agreeable promenade; and that on the north 400 feet in length, erected on wooden piles, and secured by iron railing. The quay, which in length, and beauty of construction, ranks the first in England, is a very great ornament to the town, and its centre is formed into an agreeable walk, planted on each side with trees. A duty of fifteen pence per chaldron, producing about £8000 per annum, is levied on all coal brought to the port, and applied, under the direction of twelve commissioners, to keeping the jetties and piers in repair, and deepening and clearing the river. The number of vessels of above fifty tons, registered at the port, is 315, and the aggregate burthen 34,676 tons. The navigation of the coast is very dangerous; the Roads, in which are two floating light-houses, are frequently resorted to by the North Sea fleet, and merchant vessels are constantly repairing to them for shelter. The market is on Wednesday and Saturday; and fairs are held on the Monday and Tuesday at Shrovetide, and on the Friday and Saturday in Easter-week.

Prior to the reign of King John, the town was governed by a provost appointed by the crown; but a charter of incorporation granted by that monarch in the ninth year of his reign, empowered the burgesses to choose their own magistrates, called bailiffs, of whom four were elected, who were authorized to hold a court of hustings, now called the Burgh court. The privileges were extended by charters bestowed by succeeding sovereigns, of which that of Edward II. granted tronage to the burgesses, and exemption from serving on any assizes, juries, or inquisitions, out of the borough; and that of Elizabeth conferred power to hold an admiralty court weekly, with liberty to try all maritime causes, except piracy. The corporation at present consists of a mayor, high-steward, recorder, twelve aldermen, and thirty-six councillors, assisted by a town-clerk, water-bailiff, gaoler, three sergeants-at-mace, and other officers, appointed under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76; the borough, formerly consisting of eight wards, is now divided into six, and the number of magistrates is twenty-six. Courts of session take place quarterly before the recorder; a court of requests is held for the recovery of debts under 40s., every Monday, and a court leet and court of pie poudre also occur. The freedom is obtained by birth and servitude. The borough, which originally comprised 1460 acres, first sent members to parliament in the reign of Edward I.: the elective franchise was extended, in 1832, to the £10 householders of an enlarged district, which includes 2823 acres; the mayor is returning officer. admiralty jurisdiction was abolished by the Municipal Corporations' act, and the last court of admiralty was held on the 7th of Sept., 1835. The jurisdiction of the corporation, by charter of the 20th of Charles II., extends to South Town, or Little Yarmouth, in the county of Suffolk, and, as conservators of the Yare, Waveney, and Bure, for ten miles upon each of those rivers. The inhabitants are not liable to serve on juries for the county, nor to the payment of county rates, as the corporation supports the gaol, and maintains the prisoners; and writs, unless accompanied with a non omittas, can only be executed under the warrant of the mayor, and by one of his officers. The town-hall, near the centre of the quay, is an elegant building of the Tuscan order, with a handsome portico in front, and is also the mansion-house; the council-chamber, in which public meetings and assemblies are held, is a splendid room, ornamented with a fine portrait of George I., in his robes; and the card-room is spacious, and contains paintings, by Butcher, of the quay, the Roads, and the market-place, and a portrait of Sir Robert Walpole, who was high steward.

The LIVING is a perpetual curacy; net income, £430; patrons, the Dean and Chapter of Norwich. In Domesday book mention is made of a church dedicated to St. Benedict, probably erected by the barons of the cinque-ports, and of which the foundations are still visible, about a mile from the entrance of the town. The present edifice, situated in the north-east part of the town, was founded by Herbert de Lozinga, Bishop of Norwich, about 1101, and appropriated to the prior and monks of the Holy Trinity at Norwich, who had a cell here: he built only the cross, which constitutes the present nave and transepts; the aisles were added in 1250, and in the following year the church was dedicated to St. Nicholas. It is a handsome cruciform structure in the early decorated and later English styles, with a central tower and spire, four turrets at the west end surmounted by pinnacles, and an elegant south porch. Seventeen oratories, each with an image, altar, lights, &c., and supported by a guild, were instituted in it: on the tower was once a wooden spire, which appeared crooked from whatever side viewed, but it was replaced by the present one in 1804. The chapel of ease, dedicated to St. George, a handsome edifice built in 1716, is supported by a duty of one shilling per chaldron on all coal consumed in the parish: two ministers were formerly appointed to serve it by the corporation, but the patronage has been taken from that body, and must be sold; net income, £200. An additional church, dedicated to St. Peter, and in the later English style, with a lofty square tower, was erected near the White Lion Gates, on the north side of the road to the jetty, in 1833, at an expense of £7596, raised by subscription, aided by a grant from the Commissioners for Building and Enlarging Churches: the living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £160; patron, the Incumbent of St. Nicholas'. There are places of worship for Particular Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Primitive Methodists, Wesleyans, Unitarians, and Roman Catholics. The free grammar school, in the market-place, commonly called the children's hospital school, was founded by the corporation, in 1651, and was part of St. Mary's hospital; it is now a free school for reading, writing, and arithmetic only, and thirty boys and twenty girls are maintained, instructed, and apprenticed. The revenue of the charity, independently of fines upon the renewal of leases, is £856. 19., of which £100 per annum, with a septennial fine of £100, are derived from an estate in Ireland, now worth £6000 per annum, but of which a lease for 1000 years at the above rental was granted in 1714. The Rev. Edward Warnes, in 1694, bequeathed an estate now let for £375 per annum, which sum is distributed at Easter and Christmas among orphans and widows, those of clergymen having the preference; and there is a lending fund of £130, left by Catherine Rogers and William Southwell. The Fishermen's hospital, of a quadrangular form, comprising twenty houses of two rooms each, for the accommodation of that number of fishermen and their wives, formerly had an annual income of £160, paid by the treasury, and originally given by the crown as a reduction of the duty then levied upon all beer carried to sea, and £56. 10. derived from various private benefactions; but the allowance from the government is now reduced to 2s. 6d. during the winter, and 2s. in summer, paid weekly to such of the inmates as were there in 1830, and when these die, the grant is to cease. Seventy-eight houses in different parts of the town are occupied rent-free by paupers; and an annual sum of £62. 10. is distributed by the charity trustees in money, bread, and coal, among the inmates. Besides the cell belonging to the Holy Trinity at Norwich, and the hospital of St. Mary, there were also a cell of Austin friars belonging to the priory of Gorleston, two lazaret-houses, and houses of Black, Grey, and White friars, many fragments of which remain, as well as of the ancient walls of the town. Yarmouth gives the inferior title of Earl to the Marquess of Hertford.

YARNFIELD, a hamlet, in the parish of MAIDENBRADLEY, union of MERE, hundred of NORTON-FERRIS, E. division of SOMERSET, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Bruton; containing 91 inhabitants.

YARNSCOMBE (St. ANDREW), a parish, in the union of TORRINGTON, hundred of HARTLAND, Great Torrington and N. divisions of DEVON, 6 miles (N. E. by E.) from Great Torrington; containing 512 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £7. 11. 11., and in the patronage of the Crown; impropiator, Lord Rolle. The great tithes have been commuted for £150, and the vicarial for £135; the glebe comprises 24 acres. The church has in the chancel a very old monument of granite, on which the inscription is illegible.

YARNTON, or YARINGTON, a parish, in the union of WOODSTOCK, hundred of WOOTTON, county of OXFORD, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Oxford; containing 302 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £8. 5. 5., and in the patronage of Sir George Dashwood, Bart., for three turns, and of All Souls' College, Oxford, for one; net income, £217; impropiators, the Rector and Fellows of Exeter College, Oxford. The church is an ancient structure, with a tower built in 1612, by Sir Thomas Spencer, who also erected the aisle in which he is interred, as a sepulchral chapel for his family, who resided in the old manor-house near the church, the remains of which are now occupied as a farm-house. In a recess in the aisle is an altar-tomb, with recumbent effigies of Sir William Spencer and his lady; and the churchyard contains an ancient cross embellished with figures in full length, now much mutilated.

YARPOLE (St. LEONARD), a parish, in the union of LEOMINSTER, hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD, 5 miles (N. N. W.) from Leominster; containing 606 inhabitants, of whom 349 are in the township of Yarpole. The parish consists, with the township of Bircher, of 2523 acres, of which 399 are common or waste land. The living is a vicarage, annexed to the rectory of Croft; impropiators, the Trustees of Lucton school, whose tithes have been commuted for £273, and those of the rector for £27; there are 23 acres of glebe.

YARWELL (St. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish, in the union of OUNDLE, hundred of WILLYBROOK, N. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (S. by W.) from Wansford; containing 389 inhabitants. The parish is situated on the left bank of the river Nene, and consists of 980 acres. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Nassington. There are about 18 acres of land, let for £29. 10. per annum, half of which sum is distributed at Christmas among widows and others.

YATE (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of CHIPPING-SODBURY, Upper division of the hundred of HENBURY, W. division of the county of GLOUCESTER, 1 mile (W.) from Chipping-Sodbury; containing 1057 inhabitants. The parish comprises 4042 acres, of which 656 are common or waste, an act for inclosing which was passed in 1842: the substratum abounds in coal, of which there are some mines in operation. The village has been made a polling-place for the W. division of the county. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £30. 18. $11\frac{1}{2}$., and in the gift of W. S. Goodenough, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £685, and the glebe comprises 154 acres.

YATE, with PICK-UP-BANK, a township, in the parish of WHALLEY, union, and Higher division of the hundred, of BLACKBURN, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 4 miles (S. E.) from Blackburn; containing 1068 inhabitants.

YATE, GREAT, a township, in the parish of CROXDEN, union of UTTOXETER, S. division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, N. division of the county of STAFFORD, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Uttoxeter.

YATEHOUSE, with BYLEY, a township, in the parish of MIDDLEWICH, union and hundred of NORTHWICH, S. division of the county of CHESTER, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. by E.) from Middlewich; containing 149 inhabitants.

YATELY (St. PETER), a parish, in the hundred of CRONDALL, Odiham and N. divisions of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Farnborough; containing, with the tythings of Cove and Minley, 1997 inhabitants, of whom 717 are in Yately tything. A cattle-fair is held on the 8th of November. The London and Southampton road, and the South-Western railway, pass through the parish, and here is a station on the line of the latter. The living is a perpetual curacy; net income, £72; patron and appropriator, the Master of the Hospital of St. Cross. There is a place of worship for Baptists; also a national school endowed with £9. 6. a year, being one-third of the income arising from land bequeathed for charitable purposes by Mary Barker, in 1706.

YATESBURY (ALL SAINTS), a parish, in the union and hundred of CALNE, Marlborough and Ramsbury, and N. divisions of WILTS, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Calne; containing 251 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £17. 3. 4., and in the gift of Colonel James Kyrle Money: the tithes have been commuted for £500, and the glebe comprises 23 acres.

YATTENDON (St. PETER AND St. PAUL), a parish, in the union of BRADFIELD, hundred of FAIRCROSS, county of BERKS, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Newbury; containing 246 inhabitants. It comprises by measurement 1400 acres, of which 1134 are arable, 90 pasture and meadow, and 176 woodland. There was formerly a weekly market, on Tuesday, granted in 1258, with a fair on the festival of St. Nicholas, to Peter de Etyndon, and confirmed in 1319, to John de la Beche, with another fair on the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul; these have long been disused, but a fair is held on the 10th of July. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 6. 8.; net income, £384; patron, the Rev. J. F. Howard. Thomas Carte, the historian, wrote the greater part of his History of England at this place, and, dying in 1754, was buried in the church. A castle said to have been inhabited by King Alfred, once occupied the site of the present manor-house; and a large field in the parish, where Alfred gained a decisive victory over the Danes, is still called England's Field.

YATTON, a township, in the parish of AYMESTREY, union of LEOMINSTER, hundred of WIGMORE, county of HEREFORD; containing 214 inhabitants.

YATTON, a chapelry, in the parish of MUCH MARCLE, union of ROSS, hundred of GREYTREE, county of HEREFORD, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Ross; containing 245 inhabitants, and comprising 1392 acres. It is intersected by the road between Ross and Ledbury. The chapel has been recently enlarged and improved, by subscription, aided by a grant of £100 from the Incorporated Society. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £287. 12. 6., and there is a glebe of 5 acres.

YATTON (St. MARY), a parish, in the union of BEDMINSTER, hundred of WINTERSTOKE, E. division of SOMERSET, 12 miles (S. W.) from Bristol; containing, with the hamlets of Claverham, Cleeve, and Hewish, 1978 inhabitants. The parish comprises 5389a. 2r. 5p.: limestone abounds, and is quarried for building, and for burning into lime. The Bristol and Exeter railway passes through. The living is a vicarage, with that of Kenn annexed, in the patronage of the Prebendary of Yatton in the Cathedral of Wells (the appropriator), valued in the king's books at £30: the tithes have been commuted for £48, payable to the impropiator, £300 to the prebendary, and £445. 10. to the vicar; the prebendal glebe comprises 138 acres. The church is a stately cruciform structure in the decorated and later English styles, with a tower in the centre, formerly surmounted by a spire; the greater portion of the church appears to have been rebuilt in the 15th century, by the Wyck family, to one of whom is a monument bearing his effigy, in the north transept. There is a sepulchral chapel of the Newton family, built by Dame Isabel, widow of Sir John Newton, and containing a handsome monument of alabaster to Sir Richard Caradoc Newton, lord chief justice of the common pleas in the reign of Henry VI., and another to his son Sir John. A district church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, was erected at Cleeve, and consecrated in June, 1840; it is a handsome structure in the Norman style, and contains 300 sittings. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends and Wesleyans. On Cadbury Hill, in the vicinity, are vestiges of an ancient fortification. In 1782, thirteen human bodies, some of them fresh and of unusual size, and a stone coffin, were found in a limestone quarry, about two feet below the surface of the earth.

YATTON-KEYNALL (St. MARGARET), a parish, in the union and hundred of CHIPPENHAM, Chippenham and Calne, and N. divisions of WILTS, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Chippenham; containing 492 inhabitants. The parish comprises about 1637 acres: freestone of good quality abounds, and is quarried for building and paving. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8. 7. 1., and in the gift of the Rev. E. W. Daubeny: the tithes have been commuted for £375, and the glebe comprises 94 acres. The church is a handsome structure. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

Y A V E R L A N D, a parish, in the liberty of EAST MEDINA, Isle of Wight division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 8 miles (E. S. E.) from Newport; containing 80 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 764 acres, of which 423 are arable, 200 meadow, 5 pasture, 84 down, 42 woodland, 6 gardens, and 4 waste. An ancient mansion of the Russells here, subsequently of the Richards family, and now a farm-house, is a good specimen of the Elizabethan style. The surrounding scenery is diversified. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £6. 6. 10½., and in the patronage of Mrs. Atkyns Wright: the tithes have been commuted for £240, and the glebe contains 12 acres. The church, a small edifice near the old mansion, is principally in the later English style, and has a Norman doorway in good preservation.

Y A W T H O R P E, a hamlet, in the parish of CORRINGHAM, union of GAINSBOROUGH, wapentake of CORRINGHAM, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN; containing 35 inhabitants.

Y A X H A M (St. Peter), a parish, in the union of MITFORD and LAUNDITCH, hundred of MITFORD, division of NORFOLK, 2½ miles (S. E. by S.) from East Dereham; containing 450 inhabitants. It comprises 1568*a.* 12*p.*, of which 1398 acres are arable, 150 meadow and pasture, and 20 woodland. The living is a rectory, with that of Welborne annexed, valued in the king's books at £10. 0. 10., and in the gift of the Trustees of the late Rev. Dr. John Johnson: the tithes have been commuted for £500, and the glebe comprises 46½ acres. The church is an ancient structure in the early and later English styles, with a circular tower; the font is elaborately sculptured, and in the chancel is a handsome monument to the Rev. Dr. Johnson.

Y A X L E Y (St. Peter), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union of PETERBOROUGH, hundred of NORMAN-CROSS, county of HUNTINGDON, 1½ mile (N. E.) from Stilton, and 73 (N. by W.) from London; containing 1211 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 4077 acres, chiefly arable; the soil is various, in some parts fenny land, and in others a retentive clay. The village is irregularly, but neatly, built, extending for a considerable distance along the road from Stilton to Farcet, and is amply supplied with water. At a short distance to the east is Whittlesea mere, one of the most extensive sheets of water in the kingdom, six miles in length, and three broad, and abounding with fish. The barracks of Norman-Cross, in the parish, were used during the late war, as a place of confinement for French prisoners, but are now partly dismantled. The neighbourhood is extremely productive of sedges and reeds, the preparation of which affords employment to a considerable portion of the inhabitants. A fair is held on Holy-Thursday, for cattle. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £11, and in the patronage of the Crown; net income, £177; improprator, the Earl of Carysfort. The church, situated on an eminence at the western extremity of the town, is a handsome structure, principally in the later English style, with some portions of earlier date; the tower is surmounted by a finely-proportioned crocketed spire, supported by flying buttresses, and is conspicuous for many miles round. There is a place of worship for Independents. A workhouse and school were established under the wills of Frances and Jane Proby, who, in 1712, bequeathed property for that purpose to the parishes of Yaxley, Elton, and Flitton: the share appropriated to Yaxley amounts to about £70 per annum, out of which a master, who has the free use of the school premises, receives the sum of £50 for instructing twenty boys.

Y A X L E Y (St. Mary), a parish, in the union and hundred of HARTISMERE, W. division of SUFFOLK, 1½ mile (W.) from Eye; containing 507 inhabitants, and comprising by measurement 1300 acres. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £6. 6. 5½., and in the patronage of J. T. Mott, Esq.; improprators, Sir E. Kerrison, Bart., and others, whose tithes have been commuted for £278. 17., and those of the vicar for £135. 8. There are 34 acres of glebe. The church is a handsome structure, chiefly in the later English style, with a square embattled tower; the lower nave is separated from the chancel by a richly-carved screen, and the east window is embellished with stained glass. Yaxley Hall was the seat of a family who took their name from the parish.

Y A Z O R (St. John the Baptist), a parish, in the union of WEOBLEY, hundred of GRIMSWORTH, county of HEREFORD, 4½ miles (S.) from Weobley; containing 195 inhabitants. It comprises 2047*a.* 28*p.*, of which 1000 acres are arable, 500 meadow and pasture, 526 woodland, and the remainder roads and waste; the surface is undulated, and in the hills are quarries of limestone, and of freestone for building. The living is a discharged vicarage, endowed with a portion of the rectorial tithes, annexed to the rectory of Bishopstone, and valued in the king's books at £5. 12. 6.; improprators of the remainder of the rectorial tithes, Sir R. Price, Bart., and T. Arkwright, Esq. The church is ancient and dilapidated, and the erection of a new edifice is contemplated.

Y E A D I N G, a hamlet, in the parish of HAYES, union of UXBRIDGE, hundred of ELTHORNE, county of MIDDLESEX; containing 222 inhabitants.

Y E A D O N, a township, in the parish of GUISELEY, Upper division of the wapentake of SKYRACK, W. riding of YORK, 6 miles (N. W.) from Leeds; containing 3379 inhabitants. This township, which includes Upper and Lower Yeadon, and Henshaw, comprises about 1730 acres, chiefly high moorland, affording tolerable pasture; and the population is mostly employed in the manufacture of woollen-cloth, in three large mills. The village, which is extensive, stands on an eminence on the north side of Airedale, commanding a fine view of the vale and adjacent scenery, which is pleasingly diversified. Lane-Head House and Low Hall are handsome mansions, beautifully situated; the surface of the township is watered by copious springs, and the substratum abounds with good building-stone. A church was erected in 1843, at an expense of £2000, raised by subscription, aided by grants of £300 from the Incorporated Society, a like sum from the Commissioners for Building Churches, and £400 from the Ripon Diocesan Society; it is in the early English style, with a square embattled tower, and stands on a site given by Richard Barwick, Esq. The tithes have been commuted for £111. There are places of worship for Wesleyans and Association Methodists: a school-house was built in 1823, for children of Rawden and Yeadon; and an old Methodist meeting-house, now disused as such, has been converted into a Sunday school.

YEALAND-CONYERS, a township, in the parish of WARTON, union of LANCASTER, hundred of LONSDALE, south of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Burton-in-Kendal; containing 322 inhabitants. This place is beautifully situated in a district abounding with interesting and richly-varied scenery, and the immediate vicinity is enlivened with numerous handsome seats and pleasing villas. A church dedicated to St. John, has been recently erected. There are a place of worship for the Society of Friends, and a Roman Catholic chapel; and a school is supported by endowment.

YEALAND-REDMAYNE, a township, in the parish of WARTON, union of LANCASTER, hundred of LONSDALE, south of the Sands, N. division of the county of LANCASTER, 3 miles (S. W.) from Burton-in-Kendal; containing 228 inhabitants.

YEALMPTON (St. BARTHOLOMEW), a parish, in the union of PLYMPTON ST. MARY, hundred of PLYMPTON, Ermington and Plympton, and S. divisions of DEVON, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Earl's-Plympton; containing 1317 inhabitants. The parish comprises by measurement 3132 acres, of which the substratum is chiefly limestone of good quality, quarried for burning into lime. The navigable river Yealm, which gives name to the place, here flows through much pleasing scenery, and is crossed by a bridge at the village, which was anciently denominated a borough, and though much decayed, is still of respectable appearance. A great cattle-market is held on the fourth Wednesday in every month. At Kitley, the fine mansion of the family of Bastard, is a collection of the most valuable productions of Sir Joshua Reynolds. The living is a vicarage, with that of Revelstoke annexed, valued in the king's books at £35. 19. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$.; patron, the Bishop of Exeter; appropriator, the Prebendary of King's-Teignton in the Cathedral of Salisbury: the vicarial tithes have been commuted for £355. The church is partly in the early and partly in the later English style, with two stone stalls, enriched with trefoil arches. There is a chapel of ease at Revelstoke. Near the church are the ruins of a building, once, probably, the residence of the prebendary: according to tradition, it was a palace of the Saxon kings, having been occupied by Ethelwold, whose lieutenant, Lipsius, was buried here.

YEARDSLEY, with WHALEY, a township, in the parish of TAXALL, union and hundred of MACCLESFIELD, N. division of the county of CHESTER, 10 miles (S. E. by E.) from Stockport; containing 663 inhabitants. This place is situated on the west bank of the river Goyt, on the road from Manchester to Buxton, and comprises 795 Cheshire acres. It appears to have been the property of the Jodrells since the time of Henry VI., and Sir Francis Jodrell, of Henbury, is the present proprietor. Some very productive collieries are extensively worked, and one of the seams of coal is crossed by a vein of lead-ore, which is of very rare occurrence; there are also quarries of flag and building stone. In the village, which is of considerable antiquity, a manufactory of tape is carried on upon a limited scale; and there is a wire-mill, employing about fifty persons. The Peak Forest canal commences here. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

YEARNOR, a tything, in the parish of PORLOCK, union of WILLITON, hundred of CARHAMPTON, W. division of SOMERSET; containing 27 inhabitants.

YEARSLEY, a township, in the parish of COXWOLD, union of EASINGWOLD, wapentake of BIRDFORTH, N. riding of YORK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Easingwold; containing 176 inhabitants. The township comprises 2764a. 2r. 7p., of which 496 acres are arable, 2085 meadow and pasture, and 184 woodland and common. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £403, payable to Trinity College, Cambridge. A school is partly supported by George Womble, Esq.

YEAWELEY, a chapelry, in the parish of SHIRLEY, hundred of APLETREE, S. division of the county of DERBY, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Ashbourn; containing 239 inhabitants. It comprises 1065 acres, of which 50 are common or waste. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for £50. There is a place of worship for Independents. Here was a preceptory of the Knights Hospitallers, dedicated to St. Mary and St. John the Baptist, to which Sir William Meynell was a great benefactor in 1268, and which, at the Dissolution, had a revenue of £107. 3. 8. The chapel, now called Stydd chapel, has fallen to ruins.

YEAVERING, a township, in the parish of KIRKNEWTON, union, and W. division of the ward, of GLENDALE, N. division of NORTHUMBERLAND, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Wooler; containing 68 inhabitants. It comprises by computation 1400 acres, of which about 400 are arable, and the remainder pasture and moorland: the river Glen passes on the north, at a short distance from the village. In this township is Yeaving Bell, a lofty conical mountain rising to the height of more than 2000 feet from the vale. Its summit, which is level, and 1000 yards in circuit, is encompassed by the remains of an ancient wall, eight yards in breadth, built on the very edge of the hill, with an entrance on the south; within this is another wall, defended by a ditch, and in the centre of the area is a large cairn hollowed like a bowl. There are several smaller circles on other parts of the hill, with vestiges of a grove of oaks, strongly indicating that these works were constructed by the Druids; and in the neighbourhood are an immense cairn and a cluster of rocks, respectively called Tom Tallan's grave and crag. Yeaving was the residence of some of the Saxon kings of Northumbria, particularly Edwin, after his conversion; and here Paulinus was employed in baptizing other converts in the river Glen, close by. Near the village is a rude column of stone, commemorating the victory gained in 1415, by the Earl of Westmorland, with an English force of 440 men, over Sir Robert Umfraville, at the head of a Scottish army of 4000.

YEDDINGHAM (BLESSED VIRGIN MARY), a parish, in the union of MALTON, wapentake of BUCKROSE, E. riding of the county of YORK, $8\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Malton; containing 122 inhabitants. In 1163, Roger and Helwysia de Clere founded a small priory here for nine nuns of the Benedictine order, dedicated to the Virgin Mary; the revenue was valued at the Dissolution at £26. 6. 8., and the site was granted to Robert Holgate, afterwards Archbishop of York. The parish, of which a portion is sometimes called Court-Houses, is on the road from York to Scarborough, and comprises about 700 acres, whereof two-thirds are arable, and the remainder pasture. The village is pleasantly situated on the navigable river Derwent, which forms the northern boundary of the parish, and also divides the North and East ridings of the county. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 4. 2.; net income, £205; patron, Earl Fitzwilliam; impropiator, Mark Foulis, Esq. The church, a small ancient structure, with a tiled chancel, and a belfry, was dedicated in 1241, and several indulgences were granted to it by Richard de Breuse, patron of a monastery near Yeddingham. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans; likewise a national school.

YELDERSLEY, a hamlet, in the parish of ASHBOURN, hundred of APPLETREE, S. division of the county of DERBY, 3½ miles (E. S. E.) from Ashbourn; containing 211 inhabitants.

YELDHAM, GREAT (St. Andrew), a parish, in the union of HALSTED, hundred of HINCKFORD, N. division of ESSEX, 7 miles (N. W. by N.) from Halsted; containing 726 inhabitants. The village is pleasantly situated in a retired part of the parish; many women and children are employed in the straw-plat manufacture. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £20, and in the gift of John Martin Cripps, Esq.: the tithes have been commuted for £500, and the glebe comprises 41 acres. The church is a small ancient edifice with a very handsome tower; the burial-ground is planted with avenues of fir-trees. A national school is partly supported by an endowment of John Symonds, in 1691. The gravelly soils are replete with fossils.

YELDHAM, LITTLE, a parish, in the union of HALSTED, hundred of HINCKFORD, N. division of ESSEX, 9 miles (N. N. W.) from Halsted; containing 333 inhabitants. It is situated in a pleasant and healthy district, and comprises 916*a. 3r. 18p.*, of which 793 acres are arable, 81 pasture, and 42 wood; the soil is strong and rather wet, but the lands are generally in profitable cultivation. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £275, and the glebe comprises 2 acres. The church is a spacious and venerable structure, with a handsome square embattled tower: on the south side of the chancel is a small chapel belonging to the family De la Pole; the altar-piece is richly embellished, and has a window of stained glass.

YELFORD-HASTINGS, a parish, in the union of WITNEY, hundred of BAMPTON, county of OXFORD, 3½ miles (S.) from Witney; containing 16 inhabitants. This parish, which originally belonged to the family of Hastings, was purchased by Mr. Speaker Lenthall, whose descendant, K. J. W. Lenthall, Esq., is the lord of the manor; it comprises by measurement 313 acres, of which 100 are arable, 200 meadow and pasture, and 13 woodland. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the king's books at £4. 3. 6½.; net income, £108; patron, Mr. Lenthall. The church is a handsome structure in the later English style.

YELLING (Holy Cross), a parish, in the union of CAXTON and ARRINGTON, hundred of TOSELAND, county of HUNTINGDON, 4 miles (S. E. by S.) from Caxton; containing 333 inhabitants, and comprising by measurement 1800 acres. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £14. 10. 5.; and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £291, and the glebe comprises 38 acres. The church is an ancient structure. There is a place of worship for Baptists. The rent of an allotment of about fourteen acres of land, amounting to £14. 14., is chiefly distributed among the poor.

YELVERTOFT (All Saints), a parish, in the union of RUGBY, hundred of GUILSBOROUGH, S. division of the county of NORTHAMPTON, 4½ miles (S. W. by S.) from Welford; containing 618 inhabitants. It comprises 2150*a. 2r. 15p.*, of which five-sixths are pasture and meadow, and one-sixth arable: the Union canal passes through. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £25. 0. 10., and in the patronage of the Earl of Craven; net income, £487. There is a place of worship for Independents. Thirty children are instructed for £35 a year, arising from land bequeathed by Mrs. Ashby, in 1719.

YELVERTON (St. Mary), a parish, in the union of LONDON and CLAVERING, hundred of HENSTEAD, E. division of NORFOLK, 5¾ miles (S. E. by S.) from Norwich; containing 82 inhabitants. The parish comprises 538*a. 1r. 26p.*, of which 492 acres are arable, 38 pasture and meadow, and 8 roads: the road from Norwich to Beccles passes through the village. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Alphington annexed, valued in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for £400, and the glebe comprises 21 acres. The church is an ancient structure in the decorated and early English styles, with a square embattled tower, and contains several handsome monuments to the families of Rant, Playter, and Day, and a Norman font. The sum of £27 per annum, arising from land purchased with a bequest by Mrs. Anne Rant in 1698, is divided between the rector and the poor, the latter of whom have also 4 acres, allotted at the inclosure.

YEOVIL (St. John the Baptist), a market-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the hundred of STONE, W. division of SOMERSET, 9½ miles (S. S. E.) from Somerton, and 122 (W. S. W.) from London; containing 7043 inhabitants. This place, which, from the discovery of tessellated pavements and other relics of antiquity, is supposed to have been known to the Romans, derives its name from the river Yeo, or Ivel, the Velox of Ravennas, which, having its source in seven springs near Sherborne, separates the counties of Somerset and Dorset, and passes this place at a short distance to the east, beneath a stone bridge of three arches, near which it receives a small stream, turning three mills, that bounds the town on the south. It was anciently called the town, borough, lordship, and hundred of Yeovil, and included a district which soon after the Conquest fell into the possession of the crown, and part of which was assigned by the name of the manor of Yeovil to the rector of the church of St. John the Baptist in this town, by one of the kings of England, who also granted him a weekly market on Friday, view of frankpledge, and several other rights and privileges. The inhabitants were likewise incorporated, under the designation of the Portreeve and Burgesses of Yeovil; and a daily court of pie-poudre was anciently held by the provost on behalf of the rector, but has been long discontinued. The manor was held by the successive rectors till the year 1418, when the then rector resigned the church, together with the town and lordship, to Henry V., who gave the manor, with all its rights and privileges, and the rectory, to the abbot and convent of the Virgin Mary and St. Bridget, which that monarch had founded at Sion, in the county of Middlesex. This grant was confirmed by Edward IV., and after the dissolution of the monasteries the manor was settled by Henry VIII. on his queen, Catherine, who held it till her death. In 1449, an accidental fire consumed 117 houses in the town, of which 45 belonged to different chantries, and on this occasion an indulgence of 40 days was granted to all who contributed to repair the loss.

The town consists of numerous streets, many of them spacious; and the houses, of which several are of stone, are in general well built. It is supplied with water from springs that rise at a short distance, and is sheltered on the north by a range of hills which, as well as the adjacent country, are in a high state of cultivation; the metropolis is chiefly supplied with what is called Dorset butter from the dairy-farms in the vicinity. On the south-east are three remarkable hills, from the summit of one of which, Newton Hill, the English and Bristol Channels can be discerned. The inhabitants were formerly engaged in the woollen manufacture to a great extent; but this has been superseded by that of leather gloves, which are made here to the extent of 4000 dozen per week, affording employment to many hundred persons in the parish and neighbouring villages. The market is on Friday, and every alternate Friday is the great market: corn, cattle, pigs, bacon, butter, cheese, hemp, and flax, are sold in considerable quantities; and in the purchase and sale of the two last articles upwards of £1000 are frequently returned in one day. Fairs are held on June 28th and November 17th, for horses, cattle, and pedlery, and continue for two days each. The market-house is supported on stone pillars. The government of the town, which is a corporation by prescription, is vested in a portreeve and eleven burgesses; a mace-bearer and two constables are chosen for the town, and two constables for the parish, which has a distinct jurisdiction; the portreeve exercises magisterial authority while in office. A court of record formerly took place every three weeks; and a court-leet for the borough is still held annually, by the lord of the manor.

The parish comprises 4038*a.* 3*r.* 31*p.*, of which about 900 acres are arable, 30 woodland and plantations, and the remainder meadow and pasture; the soil varies from a light sand to a strong clay, alternated with portions of rich loam. The LIVING is a vicarage, with that of Preston annexed, valued in the king's books at £18; net income, £391; patron, William Phelps, Esq.; impropriators, Henry William R. W. Halsey, Esq., for one portion, and John Newman, Esq., for the residue. The church is a fine old cruciform structure, near the centre of the town, in the ancient English style, with a tower surmounted by a balustrade, and, according to Leland, contained the chantries of St. John the Baptist, the Holy Cross, the Holy Trinity, and the Virgin Mary; a gallery has been erected, containing 200 free sittings. At its western end stands an old building, now used as a schoolroom, of much older date than the church itself. The foundation-stone of a district church was laid on June 23rd, 1843. There are places of worship for Particular Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Wesleyans, and Unitarians. A free school, originally founded in 1707, by subscription, has been endowed with sundry bequests, especially that of John Noyes, who, in 1718, left estates producing about £150 per annum, partly extended to Romsey and Fisherton-Anger. An almshouse for a custos, two wardens, and twelve persons, was founded in 1476, by John Woburne, minor canon of St. Paul's Cathedral, and endowed to a considerable extent with landed property; a chapel is annexed to the institution. The portreeve's almshouses, in Back-street, are for four women, each of whom receives a small allowance. The poor law union of Yeovil comprises 35 parishes or places, containing a population of 27,894. In the hamlets of Kingston, Marsh, and Hensford were ancient chapels, formerly used as oratories, but afterwards for public worship, dependent on the mother church, in which the inhabitants of those villages had a right of sepulture; the places appropriated for that purpose are still pointed out in the church.

YEOVILTON (St. BARTHOLOMEW), a parish, in the union of YEOVIL, hundred of SOMERTON, W. division of SOMERSET, 1½ mile (E.) from Ilchester; containing, with the tything of Bridghampton, and the hamlets of Hainbury and Speckington, 294 inhabitants, of whom 163 are in Yeovilton township. The parish is bounded on the north by the river Yeo, and comprises by measurement 1753 acres, of which one-half are arable, and the remainder meadow, pasture, and orchard; the soil is generally a strong clay. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £26. 9. 2., and in the gift of the Bishop of Bath and Wells: the tithes have been commuted for £410, and the glebe comprises 65 acres. The church is a handsome structure in the later English style.

YETLINGTON, with CALLALEY, a township, in the parish of WHITTINGHAM, union of ROTHBURY, N. division of COQUETDALE ward and of NORTHUMBERLAND, 12 miles (W. S. W.) from Aluwick; containing 306 inhabitants. The village is three miles and a half west-south-west from Whittingham.

YETMINSTER (St. ANDREW), a parish, and formerly a market-town, in the union of SHERBORNE, hundred of YETMINSTER, Sherborne division of DORSET, 5¼ miles (S. W.) from Sherborne; containing, with the chapelries of Chetnole and Leigh, 1246 inhabitants, of whom 628 are in Yetminster township. This parish, which lies on the western border of the county, and gives name to the hundred, comprises by measurement 1575 acres: there are quarries of good limestone, and of a very hard freestone for building. The village, situated near the river Ivel, consists of a long well-built street, having still the appearance of a town. In the year 1300, the Bishop of Sarum obtained a grant from Edward I. for a market and fair, which was confirmed by Richard II., but the market has long been disused, and fairs are now held on April 23rd and October 1st. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the patronage of the Prebendary of Yetminster in the Cathedral of Salisbury (the appropriator), valued in the king's books at £20. 14. 7. : the great tithes have been commuted for £160, and the vicarial for £250; the glebe consists of garden and orchard ground attached to the glebe-house. The church is a large ancient structure, with a lofty square embattled tower crowned by pinnacles. There are chapels of ease at Leigh and Chetnole. The Hon. Robert Boyle, in 1699, bequeathed an estate now producing more than £70 per annum, for teaching 26 boys; the master has a house, with a garden and orchard.

YETTINGTON, a hamlet, in the parish of BICTON, union of ST. THOMAS, hundred of EAST BUDLEIGH, Woodbury and S. divisions of DEVON; containing 137 inhabitants.

YIELDING, or YELDEN (St. Mary), a parish, in the hundred of STODDEN, union and county of BEDFORD, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E.) from Higham-Ferrers; containing 320 inhabitants. This parish, in the Domesday survey Ewelden, comprises 1912 acres, of which 836 are arable, 800 meadow and pasture, 10 woodland, and 177 common, roads, and waste: many of the women and children are employed in lace-making. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £13. 13. 4.; net income, £317; patron and incumbent, the Rev. E. S. Bunting. The church is an ancient structure, and contains an interesting monument, but without inscription. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans. The moated site of an old baronial castle is still preserved.

YOCKLETON, a township, in the parish of WESTBURY, union of ATCHAM, hundred of FORD, S. division of SALOP, 6 miles (W. by S.) from Shrewsbury. The tithes have been commuted for £175. 9. 6., of which £36. 8. 6. are payable to the impropriators.

YOKEFLEET, county of YORK.—See YORKFLEET.

Arms.

YORK, a city and county of itself, having exclusive jurisdiction, and the head of a union, locally in the E. riding of YORK, of which it is the capital, 198 miles (N. N. W.) from London; containing 28,842 inhabitants. The origin of this ancient city, in Nennius' catalogue called Caer Ebrauc, is involved in obscurity. According to Llwyd, the learned Welsh of the northern hordes. In the reign of Commodus, the Caledonians having made a successful irruption into Britain, attacked and routed the Roman army, and laid waste the open country as far as the city of York; but Marcellus Ulpianus, who had been sent over from Rome, aided by the ninth legion, at that time stationed in the city, quickly routed them with great slaughter, and drove them back within their own territory. The Emperor Severus, in the fourteenth year of his reign, finding that the city of York was besieged by the northern Britons, came over into Britain, with his sons Caracalla and Geta, and a numerous army, and attended by his whole court; the besiegers, on his approach, retired towards the north, and intrenched themselves behind the ramparts which his predecessor Adrian had constructed, to defend the inhabitants from their assaults. The emperor, leaving his son Geta in the city, to administer justice during his absence, advanced with Caracalla to give the Britons battle, and, though from age and infirmity obliged to be carried in a litter, routed them with great slaughter; and leaving Caracalla to complete his victory, and, as is commonly supposed, to superintend the erection of a strong wall of stone nearly 80 miles in length, which he ordered to be built near the rampart of earth raised by Adrian, as a more effectual barrier against their future incursions, returned to York, where he spent the remainder of his days. The Caledonians again taking up arms, Severus sent out his legions with positive instructions to give no quarter, but to put men, women, and children indiscriminately to the sword.

During this period the city was in its highest degree of splendour; the residence of the court, and the resort of numerous tributary kings and foreign ambassadors, conferred upon it a distinction almost unsurpassed among the cities of the world, and obtained for it the appellation of Altera Roma, to which city, in these respects more than in any fancied resemblance of design, it might not unaptly have been compared. Severus died in his palace here in 212, and his funeral obsequies were performed with great solemnity on the west side of the city, near Ackham; in the immediate vicinity of the spot are three natural sand-hills, called Severus' Hills, upon which the ceremony is supposed to have been performed: his remains were deposited in a costly urn, and sent to Rome, where they were placed in the sepulchre of his ancestors. Constantius Chlorus, another of the Roman emperors, who resided for some time in Britain, died also in this city, in 307. His son, Constantine the Great, who at the time of his father's death was at York, was proclaimed emperor by the army. Of the grandeur of the city during its occupation by the Romans, numerous vestiges have been discovered, and various remains of Roman architecture have been found. Of these, the principal are, a polygonal tower, with the south wall of the Mint yard; an inscription to the tutelary genius of the place; an altar dedicated to the household and other gods by Ælius Marcianus; a cemetery without Micklegate Bar, in which many urns, containing ashes and burnt bones, have been recently dug up; also a small coffin of red clay, and a leaden coffin, of large dimensions, inclosed with oak; besides numerous coins and various other relics.

After the departure of the Romans from Britain, the antiquary, it is identified with the city termed by the Britons Caer Effic, and, among the towns of the Brigantes mentioned by Ptolemy, with the Eboracum of the Romans. The latter name is probably a modification of the former, on its becoming the station of the sixth legion, sent into Britain by Adrian. The early importance of the city must unquestionably be attributed to the Romans, who had a colony here, and made this the metropolis of their empire in Britain. The Emperor Adrian fixed his principal station in the city, in 124, while engaged in restraining the incursions city suffered greatly from the depredations of the Scots and Picts, by whom it was frequently assailed; and upon the arrival of the SAXONS it experienced considerable devastation in the wars which arose between the Britons and their new allies, in the many contests for empire during the establishment of the various kingdoms of the heptarchy; and in the mutual wars of their several monarchs for the extension of their territories. By the Saxons the city was called Eurowic, Euorewic, or Eoforwic, all descriptive of its situation on the river Ouse, which, according to Leland, was at that time termed the Eure; and from these Saxon appellations its present name is most probably contracted. Edwin, King of Northumbria, made this place the metropolis of his kingdom, and upon his conversion to Christianity, soon after his marriage with Ethelburga, daughter of Ethelbert, King of Kent, in 624, erected it into an archiepiscopal see, of which he appointed Paulinus, Ethelburga's confessor, primate. This monarch founded a church, which he dedicated to St. Peter, and his example in embracing the Christian faith was followed by vast numbers of his subjects, who, under the influence of Paulinus's ministry, were converted to Christianity. On the death of Edwin, who was killed in battle in 633, while resisting an attack of the Britons under Cadwallo, assisted by Penda, King of Mercia, the city suffered severely from the ravages of the confederated armies, who devastated it with fire and sword, and massacred the inhabitants. Ethelburga fled into Kent, accompanied by Paulinus; and the newly-erected church, which was scarcely finished, lay neglected for some time, till it was restored by Oswald, Edwin's successor, who, collecting a small army, after a sanguinary conflict, slew Cadwallo and the chief of his officers, and regained possession of his territories.

Upon the union of the several kingdoms of the heptarchy, York again became a place of importance, and in the ninth century was the seat of commerce and of literature, as far as they then prevailed in the country. During the DANISH incursions it was reduced to ashes, and having been rebuilt, it finally became one of the principal settlements of those rapacious invaders, who kept possession of it till Athelstan attacked and expelled them from the city, and demolished the castle which they had erected for their defence. In the peaceful times that followed, the city gradually recovered, and continued to flourish till the Conquest, at which time, according to the Norman survey, it contained six shires, exclusively of the archbishop's; one of these lay waste in consequence of the demolition of the castles; in the other five were 1428 houses, and in the archbishop's 200 houses. William the Conqueror placed strong garrisons in the two castles which remained, both to overawe the inhabitants, and to protect the city from the attempts of the Saxon nobility, who, refusing to submit to his government, had gone over into Denmark, to incite Sweyn, king of that country, to invade Britain for the recovery of a throne which had descended to him from his ancestors. In 1069, Sweyn sent his two sons, Harold and Canute, with 240 ships and a numerous army, who, having arrived in the Humber, disembarked their forces and advanced to York, laying waste the country through which they marched: on their arrival before the city they were joined by Edgar Atheling, who, with a large number of the English exiles, had arrived from Scotland for the same purpose. The garrison, to prevent them from fortifying themselves in the suburbs, set fire to the houses; but the wind being high, the flames communicated to the city, and, during the consternation of the inhabitants, the enemy entered and made themselves masters of it. The successful Danes then proceeded northward, and, after subduing the greater part of Northumberland, finding their further progress arrested by the severity of the winter, returned to York, where they took up their quarters. William was unable, from the inclemency of the weather, to bring an army against them till the spring, when he advanced with his forces and encamped near the confluence of the rivers Humber and Trent, and, after a severe and obstinate battle, obtained a triumphant victory; Harold and Canute escaped, with a few of their principal officers, to their ships, and Edgar Atheling, with great difficulty, effected his retreat into Scotland. William, attributing the first success of the Danes to the treachery of the citizens, took signal vengeance on them, burnt the city, and laid waste the neighbouring country, which, from the Humber to the Tyne, remained for several years in a state of desolation. From this signal calamity, however, York gradually recovered in the two succeeding reigns. Archbishop Thomas repaired the cathedral, for temporary use, by covering the remaining walls with a roof, and afterwards, finding that they had been essentially injured by the fire, he pulled them down and rebuilt the church. Though continually exposed to the assaults of the Scots, it continued progressively to advance in importance; and, in 1088, a splendid monastery for monks of the Benedictine order was erected, and dedicated to St. Mary, of which William Rufus laid the first stone. In the reign of Stephen, the city was almost entirely consumed by an accidental fire, which is stated to have destroyed the cathedral, the monastery, with some other religious houses, and 39 parish churches.

In 1138, David, King of Scotland, whom Matilda had engaged in her interest, by a promise of ceding to him the county of Northumberland, laid siege to York; but Archbishop Thurstan, though at that time confined to his bed by illness, assembled the nobility and gentry, who, under the conduct of Ralph, Bishop of Durham, his deputy, advanced against him, and put him to flight with considerable loss. In the reign of Henry II., one of the first meetings distinguished in history by the name of Parliament was held here in 1169, at which William, King of Scotland, accompanied by all his barons, abbots, and prelates, attended, and did homage to Henry in the cathedral, acknowledging him and his successors his superior lords. In the reign of Richard I., a general massacre of the resident Jews took place, under circumstances of peculiar atrocity; the fury of the populace had first been excited against them for mingling with the crowd at the king's coronation in London; and, in spite of a proclamation in their favour by the king, the same spirit of persecution manifested itself in many of the large towns, especially in York, where numerous victims, having taken refuge in the castle, after defending it for some time against their assailants, perished by their own hands, putting their wives and children to death. In 1221, Alexander, King of Scotland, who the year before had met Henry III. at York, had another interview with that monarch here, when he espoused the Lady Joan, sister of the king; and at the same time Hubert de Berg married the Lady Margaret, sister of Alexander; these marriages were both solemnised in the city, in presence of the king. In 1237, Cardinal Otto, the pope's legate, negotiated a peace between the kings of England and Scotland, who met here for that purpose; and in 1252, Alexander III., King of Scotland, came to York, attended by a large retinue of his nobility, and celebrated his marriage with Margaret, daughter of Henry III. Upon this occasion considerable festivities took place; the Scottish king, with his retinue, was lodged in a separate part of the city, appropriated to their use, and he and twenty of his principal attendants received the honour of knighthood. In the reign of Edward I., a parliament was held here, which was attended by most of the barons and principal nobility; the great charter, with the charter of forests, was renewed with great solemnity, and the Bishop of Carlisle pronounced a curse upon all who should attempt to violate it. The Scottish lords, who were summoned to attend this parliament, not making their appearance, the English lords decreed that an army should be sent, under the command of the Earl of Surrey, to relieve Roxburgh, which the Scots were at that time besieging. After the battle of Bannockburn, in 1315, Edward II. came to York, and held a council, in which it was decreed to send a force for the defence of Berwick, then threatened with siege by Robert Bruce; and, in 1322, the Earl of Hereford, who, with the Earl of Lancaster, had rebelled against the king, having been killed at Boroughbridge by Adam de Hercla, who had been sent against him, his body was conveyed hither, where also many of his partisans were hanged, drawn, and quartered. On the suppression of this rebellion, which had been excited to free the kingdom from the influence of the De Spencers, the king held a parliament in this city, in which the decree made in the preceding year at London, for alienating their estates was reversed, and the elder Spencer created Earl of Winchester. At this parliament the several ordinances made at different times were examined, and such of them as were confirmed were, by the king's order, directed to be called statutes; the clergy of the province of York granted the king a subsidy of fourpence in each mark, and Edward, the king's son, was created Prince of Wales and Duke of Aquitaine. After the breaking up of the parliament, Aymer de Valence was arrested, on his return, by order of the king, and brought back into this city, on a charge of having secretly abetted the barons in their rebellion, and of having contributed to excite the late disturbances; but, upon the intercession of several noblemen, he was released, on payment of a fine, and taking an oath of fidelity and allegiance to the king. This monarch, having collected an army to oppose Robert Bruce, who was then desolating the English border, was surprised by the enemy, and with difficulty escaped into the city.

In the beginning of the reign of Edward III., the Scots having sent three armies to lay waste the English border, and take possession of the adjoining counties, the king collected an army, with which he marched to York, where he was soon after joined by Lord John Beaumont, of Hainault, with a considerable body of forces. The Scots, being informed of these preparations, sent ambassadors to York, to negotiate a treaty of peace; upon the failure of which, Edward advanced against them with his army, and, inclosing them in Stanhope Park, had nearly made them prisoners; but by the treachery of Roger Mortimer, who opened a road for their escape, they withdrew their forces, and Sir William Douglas assaulting Edward's camp by night, nearly succeeded in killing the king: on the failure of his attempt, the Scots, after doing what mischief they could, retreated within their own territories. Beaumont, upon receiving an ample reward for his services, returned to his own dominions, and a marriage was soon after negotiated between his niece and the king, which was solemnized at York, in 1327. After the battle of Hallidown Hill, in 1333, Edward retired to York, where he held a parliament, in which Edward Balliol, whose cause he had embraced, in opposition to David Bruce, was summoned to attend him; but Balliol, having sent messengers to excuse his attendance, afterwards met the king at Newcastle. In 1335, Edward took up his residence in the monastery of the Holy Trinity in this city, and held a council, in which the Bishop of Durham, then chancellor, resigned the great seal into his hands, and he immediately delivered it to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who took the usual oaths of office in the presence of the council, and on the same day proceeded to the church of the Blessed Mary, where he affixed it to several deeds. Richard II., while on his expedition against the Scots, in 1385, passed some time in this city, which he also visited in 1389, in order to adjust some differences that had arisen between the ecclesiastical and civil authorities. On this occasion the monarch took his own sword from his side, and presented it to William de Selby, the mayor, to be borne in all public processions before him and his successors, whom he dignified with the title of Lord Mayor, which honour has been ever since retained, and is possessed by no other city, except those of London and Dublin. This monarch, in the nineteenth year of his reign, erected the city into a county of itself, and appointed two sheriffs, in lieu of the three bailiffs that previously formed a part of the corporation, and presented the first mace to the city, and a cap of maintenance to the sword-bearer: during this reign, Edmund Langley, fifth son of Edward III., was created the first Duke of York. In the time of Henry IV., the Earl of Northumberland and Lord Bardolph, who after the defeat of an insurrection against that monarch, headed by the Earl of Nottingham and the Archbishop of York, had retired into Scotland, raised some forces in that country, and made an irruption into the northern part of the kingdom; but Sir Thomas Rokesby, sheriff of Yorkshire, having levied some forces, defeated them in a battle in which both these noblemen were slain; and the king, marching into York, found several of the earl's adherents in the city, of whom some were ransomed and others punished; the earl's head was severed from his body, and being sent to London, was fixed upon the bridge.

During the war between the houses of York and Lancaster, this city was occasionally connected with the contending parties, and though not actually the seat of war, several of the battles took place in the neighbourhood. In the reign of Henry VI., Edward, Duke of York, who had raised an army in support of his claim to the crown, was killed in the battle of Wakefield, and his body being afterwards found among the slain, the head was struck off by order of Queen Margaret, and fixed upon the gate of York, with a paper crown upon it, in derision of his pretended title. In 1461, soon after the assumption of the crown by Edward IV., Queen Margaret having levied an army of 60,000 men, made another effort to regain the throne, and advancing towards York, was met by Edward and the Earl of Warwick with 40,000 men, at Towton, when a sanguinary battle ensued, in which 36,776 men are said to have been slain. During the engagement, Henry and Margaret remained in the city of York; but on hearing of the total defeat of their army, fled with great precipitation into Scotland. After the restoration of Henry VI., Edward IV. landed at Ravenspur, in Yorkshire, in 1471, and advanced to York without opposition. On his arrival he hesitated to enter the gates, for fear of treachery; but being informed by the mayor and citizens that, provided he sought only to recover his dukedom of York, and not to lay his hand upon the crown, he might enter with safety, he took up his abode there, after swearing to a priest, who met him on his entrance, to treat the citizens with courtesy, and to be faithful and obedient to the king. Having remained at York for some time, he left a garrison in the city and marched towards London; and meeting with the army of the Earl of Warwick, near Barnet, a sanguinary battle took place, in which the earl, his brother, and several of his principal officers, were slain, and Edward, after this victory, was peaceably established on the throne. Richard III. arrived at York in the year 1483, and, it is said, was crowned with great solemnity and pomp in the cathedral, by Archbishop Rotherham. In the year 1503, Margaret daughter of Henry VII., visited the city, in which she remained for some days.

In the time of Henry VIII., the art of printing was first established in York, by Hugo Goes, the son of an ingenious printer at Antwerp. At the period of the dissolution of monasteries, during this reign, there were in the city of York, besides the cathedral, forty-one parochial churches, seventeen chapels, sixteen hospitals, and nine religious houses, including the monastery of St. Mary: with the suppression of the monasteries, ten parochial churches were demolished, and their revenues and materials appropriated to secular uses. In consequence of these proceedings, the insurrection called the Pilgrimage of Grace, originated in Yorkshire, and in a short time 40,000 men, headed by Robert Aske, and attended by priests with sacred banners, took possession of this city and of Hull. The Duke of Norfolk being sent against them, they were ultimately dispersed; their principal leaders were taken and executed, and Aske was brought to York, where he was hanged upon Clifford's Tower. After the suppression of this insurrection, Henry made a tour through the county, on the border of which he was met by 200 of the principal gentry, with 4000 of the yeomanry on horseback, who made their submission to the king, by Sir Matthew Bowes, their speaker, and presented him with £900: on his advance towards the city from Barnsdale, the abbot of York, attended by 300 priests, went out to meet him, and presented him with £600; and on his entering it, the lord mayor, with the mayors of Newcastle and Hull, who had repaired to York to meet him, received him with great pomp and ceremony, and in token of their submission presented him with £100 each. Henry remained at York for twelve days, and established there a president and council, under the great seal of oyer and terminer, and after making several other arrangements, departed for Hull, where he threw up some additional fortifications. During the reign of Elizabeth, an insurrection to restore the Roman Catholic religion was headed by Thomas Percy, Earl of Northumberland, and Charles Neville, Earl of Westmorland, on the failure of which, Simon Digby, of Askew, and John Fulthorpe, of Iselbeck, Esqrs., who had been made prisoners, were taken from York Castle to Knavesmire, where they were executed. The Earl of Westmorland escaped out of the country, but the Earl of Northumberland, being taken prisoner, and attainted by parliament, was beheaded at York, and his head placed on the Micklegate Bar. James I. resided for some time at the manor palace in this city; and, in 1633, Charles I. visited York, where, in 1639, he held a council at the palace, and made the city the chief rendezvous of the troops destined to march against the Scottish rebels. During his visit, the king, who was then 39 years of age, ordered the Bishops of Ely and Winchester to wash the feet of 39 beggars, first in warm water, and afterwards with wine, which ceremony was performed in the south aisle of the cathedral: the king afterwards gave to each of them a purse containing 39 silver pence, several articles of wearing apparel, and a quantity of wine and provisions. Before leaving the city, he dined with the lord mayor and corporation, and expressed his satisfaction at the hospitality with which he had been entertained, by conferring the honour of knighthood on the mayor and recorder. While Charles remained here, the Scots demanded an audience to express their grievances, and ultimately succeeded in obtaining a treaty of peace, after which the king disbanded his army, and returned to London.

Previously to the commencement of the Parliamentary war, the king, to avoid the importunity of the parliament, who petitioned for the exclusive controul of the militia, and for other privileges subversive of the royal authority, removed to this city, and was received by the inhabitants with every demonstration of loyalty and affection. The parliament soon after appointed a commission to reside in the city, to strengthen their party, and to watch the movements of the king; and on their passing an ordinance for embodying the militia, the king ordered his friends to meet him in the city, whither he directed the several courts to be in future adjourned. The Lord-Keeper Littleton, being ordered by the parliament not to issue the writs, apparently obeyed; but on the first opportunity made his escape to York, and bringing with him the seal, joined the royal party, for which he was afterwards proclaimed by the parliament a traitor and a felon. On May 27th, 1642, the king issued a proclamation, dated from his court at York, appointing a public meeting of the nobility and gentry of the neighbourhood to be held at Heworth Moor, on the 3rd of June. This meeting was attended by more than 70,000 persons, who on his Majesty's approach, accompanied by his son, Prince Charles, and 150 knights in complete armour, and attended with a guard of 800 infantry, greeted him with the loudest acclamations of loyalty and respect. The king, in a short address, explained the particulars of the situation in which he was placed, and thanking them for their assurances of loyalty and attachment returned to the city, where, after keeping his court for more than five months, during which time every attempt at negotiation had failed, he advanced to Nottingham, and there erected his standard. In 1644, the parliamentary army, under Sir Thomas Fairfax, the Earl of Leven, and the Earl of Manchester, besieged the city, which was defended by the Marquess of Newcastle, and in a state of great distress; but hearing that Prince Rupert was approaching with an army to its relief, they raised the siege, and encamped on Marston Moor, about six miles from York, where they awaited the arrival of the royalists. The armies, which were nearly equal in number, each consisting of about 25,000 men, met on July 2nd, when, after a long and sanguinary engagement, the royalists were defeated: the parliamentarians, after this signal victory, returned to the siege of York, which, having held out nearly four months, surrendered upon honourable terms. On Jan. 1st, 1645, the great convoy, under the conduct of Gen. Skippon, arrived at York with the sum of £200,000, which, according to treaty, was paid to the Scots for surrendering to the parliament the person of the unfortunate monarch, who relying on their fidelity, had entrusted himself to their protection. After the Restoration, Charles II. was proclaimed here with triumphant rejoicings.

York was connected with several of the proceedings which led to the Revolution of 1688: James II. had attempted to introduce the Roman Catholic religion into the city, and for this purpose had converted one of the large rooms in the manor palace into a chapel, in which the service was performed according to the Romish ritual. This attempt, together with some arbitrary proceedings on the part of the court, gave great offence to the citizens; and in a general meeting appointed to vote a loyal address to the king, on the rumoured landing of the Prince of Orange, they resolved to add to their address a petition for a free parliament and redress of grievances. On November 19th, the Duke of Newcastle lord-lieutenant of the county, arrived in the city to preside at a county meeting for the same purpose; but finding that several of the deputy-lieutenants had joined with the citizens in their petition, retired the next day in disgust. The meeting took place in the guildhall, where a petition was framed in addition to the address; but during the proceedings, a rumour being raised of an insurrection of the papists, the party rushed from the hall, and, headed by some gentlemen on horseback, advanced towards the troops of militia, at that time on parade, crying out "A free parliament, the Protestant religion, and No Popery." The militia immediately joined them, and having secured the governor and the few regular troops then in the city, they placed guards at the several entrances leading into the town. On the following day they summoned a public meeting, passed resolutions, and issued a declaration explanatory of their proceedings. On the 24th they attacked, plundered, and destroyed the houses belonging to the principal Roman Catholics in the city, together with their chapels; and on December 14th, a congratulatory address was voted by the lord mayor and corporation to the Prince of Orange, who, and also his consort, were proclaimed on February 17th, by the title of King William and Queen Mary, amidst general acclamation. During the rebellion in 1745, the inhabitants raised four companies of infantry, called the York Blues, for the protection of the city against the attempts of the insurgents. In 1789, their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Duke of York visited the races, on the conclusion of which they entered Earl Fitzwilliam's carriage, and were drawn into the city by the populace, who took the horses from the carriage, amidst loud congratulations. On February 2nd, 1829, the inhabitants were greatly alarmed by the appearance of a smoke issuing from the roof of the cathedral, and, on inspection, had the mortification to find that the choir of that splendid structure was in flames. Every possible assistance was immediately obtained; but the beautiful tabernacle-work, the roof, and every thing combustible in that part of the church were destroyed, and several of the piers and the finer masonry materially injured. This lamentable event, which was regarded as a national calamity, was the work of a lunatic, who had secreted himself for that purpose in the cathedral, after the performance of the evening service, and, under the influence of a fanatical delusion, set fire to the pile. Within a very short time, however, a sum of £50,000 was subscribed, principally within the county, and a large quantity of well-seasoned timber, of the value of £5000, was contributed by government from the royal dock-yards, for the restoration of the building. Another, but accidental fire, broke out on the 20th of May, 1840, which, within an hour, reduced the belfry to a mere shell, destroyed the roof of the nave, and caused other damage to the edifice; but all these injuries were soon afterwards repaired.

The CITY is pleasantly situated on the bank of the river Ouse, near its confluence with the Foss, and is nearly three miles in circumference; it is almost surrounded with walls, generally supposed to have been raised by the Romans, and restored in the reign of Edward I., but which were much damaged during the parliamentary war, and remained in a very dilapidated state till 1831, when the walls on the south side of the river were repaired by subscription, and the walk round the top restored, forming at present a beautiful promenade. They are defended by four ancient gates, constituting the principal entrances, namely, Micklegate Bar, to the south-east; Bootham Bar, to the north-west; Monk Bar, to the north-east; and Walmgate Bar, to the south-east. Terminating that part of the wall which extends from Walmgate Bar, on the north-west, to the edge of the marsh formed by the waters of the Foss and other smaller streams, is the Red Tower, built of brick; the inner face of this part of the wall presents a series of arches, and the same is seen in other parts. In 1840, Walmgate Bar and Barbican were restored, at the expense of the corporation; and in 1842, the restoration of the walls between Walmgate and Fishergate, was completed by a public subscription, to which the corporation liberally contributed. Besides these chief gates, there were five posterns, or smaller entrances, which took their names from the streets and parts of the city to which they led, and were severally called North-street, Skeldergate, Castlegate, Fishergate, and Layerthorpe posterns; but, with the exception of Fishergate postern, these have been removed. There are six bridges, of which the principal, over the Ouse, was begun in 1810, and completed in 1820, at an expense of £80,000; it is a handsome and substantial structure of three arches of freestone, forming a communication between the parts of the city which are on opposite sides of the river. A stone bridge has been erected across the Foss, of which the first stone was laid in 1811; and over the same river are four other bridges, affording communication with the suburbs. The city has of late years undergone considerable improvement under a body of local commissioners; it is well paved, and lighted with gas by a company whose extensive works were erected in 1824, and by another company called the York Union Gas Company, established in 1837: an ample supply of water is furnished by the York Company's works. It is progressively increasing in size: in the adjacent township of Fulford, a row of new and very superior buildings, called New Walk Terrace, has been erected, separated by a drain only from the city liberty, and in all probability it will ere long extend itself at many points into this township. On the north-west, the continuous buildings stretch out of the borough a considerable distance into the township of Clifton, and on the north-east they nearly extend into the township of Heworth. Heworth Moor was inclosed in 1817, since which period a great number of substantial and excellent houses have been built in that neighbourhood, extending along the side of the Malton road; and many market-gardens are cultivated in this thriving and populous district. Interspersed throughout the vicinity generally are numerous mansions of persons in affluent circumstances, which, with their gardens and pleasure-grounds, contribute materially to enrich the scenery. Of the castle, erected by William the Conqueror, there remains only the mount, thrown up with prodigious labour, on which is an old circular building called Clifford's Tower, appearing to have been the keep, which was reduced to its present ruinous condition by an accidental fire in the year 1685. The ancient fortress, after it was dismantled by Cromwell, remained in a dilapidated state for several years; its site is now occupied by the county prison.

The Subscription library was established in 1794, and contains a well-assorted collection in every department of literature, at present exceeding 16,000 volumes: a handsome building was erected for the purpose in 1811, but this is now occupied by the Yorkshire Insurance Office and a subscription newsroom, the library having been removed to another building belonging to the corporation in St. Leonard's-place. There are three other subscription newsrooms, all of which are well supported. The Philosophical Society was instituted in 1822, and in 1826 obtained from the crown a grant of three acres of land, part of the site of the venerable abbey of St. Mary, for the erection of a suitable building and the establishment of a botanic garden; among other subjects it embraces the geology, natural history, and antiquities of the county. Its meetings are held, and the museum deposited, in a commodious building erected by voluntary subscription of the members, assisted by the noblemen and gentlemen of the county; the edifice is in the Grecian style, of the Doric order, and the garden is ornamented with shrubberies, pleasure-grounds, and plantations. The Yorkshire Central Agricultural Association was formed in 1832, under the auspices of the Earl of Harewood. The Theatre was erected in 1769, and in 1822 was considerably enlarged, greatly improved, and elegantly fitted up; it is brilliantly lighted with gas, and is opened by the York company of comedians, in the first week in March, and continues open till the first week in May; the company also perform during the assizes and the race week. Concerts and assemblies are held periodically during the winter season, in a suite of rooms in Blake-street, erected after a design by Lord Burlington, in 1730, upon a scale of sumptuous magnificence, unparalleled in any town in the kingdom. The entrance is by an elegant vestibule into the principal room, which is 112 feet in length, 40 feet wide, and 40 feet in height, ornamented in the lower part with a range of Corinthian columns and an enriched cornice, from which rises a series of the Composite order, surmounted by an appropriate cornice, and decorated with wreaths of fruit and foliage: this room is lighted by thirteen brilliant chandeliers suspended from the ceiling, each of which consists of eighteen branches. On the right hand of the large room is a smaller, for the subscription assemblies, of which there are generally six or seven, and the subscription concerts, of which there are generally four, during the season, exclusively of benefit concerts, and the assize and race balls, that are held in the larger room: the smaller room, which is elegantly fitted up, is 66 feet in length, and 22 feet wide, and the ceiling is richly ornamented; there are also other apartments and ante-rooms, forming altogether a splendid suite. The new concert-rooms, adjoining the old assembly-rooms, were erected in 1824, at an expense of £9400, raised from the profits of the musical festivals, and were opened to the public in 1828; the principal room is 92 feet long, 60 feet wide, and 45 feet high, and will afford accommodation for 1800 persons.

The York musical festivals, held in 1823, 1825, 1828, and 1835, have been liberally patronised, not only by the nobility and gentry resident in the county, but also by families of the highest distinction in every portion of the kingdom. The nave of the spacious cathedral is fitted up on these occasions for the performance of sacred music; the orchestra combines the talents of the metropolis with the professional skill of every other part of the country, and the performances rank among the most profitable and attractive of these periodical festivals. Miscellaneous concerts also are held in the large concert-rooms during the period of the festival; and the proceeds, after deducting the expenses, are appropriated to the York County hospital, and the general infirmaries of Hull, Leeds, and Sheffield. The Races take place in May and August, and the course, on Knavesmire, about a mile from the town, on the road to Tadcaster, is well adapted to the purpose: the grand stand, erected by subscription in 1754, is nearly 300 feet in length, with a balustrade projecting in front, supported on a rustic arcade. At Lendal tower, adjoining the water-works, is an establishment of hot, cold, tepid, and vapour baths. The Cavalry barracks, about a mile to the south-west of the city, were erected in 1796, at an expense of £30,000, including the purchase of twelve acres of ground, which are attached to them, for parade, and for performing the different evolutions: the buildings are handsome and commodious, and include arrangements for three field-officers, five captains, nine subalterns, and 240 non-commissioned officers and privates, with stabling for the requisite number of horses.

The city is not much distinguished either for its commerce or manufactures; the TRADE principally arises from the supply of the inhabitants and the numerous opulent families in the neighbourhood. Several linen factories have been recently established, but are not carried on to any great extent; the manufacture of glass was introduced in 1797, and is conducted upon a moderate scale. Carpets, worsted-lace for liveries, gloves, and combs, are made; and there are some chemical laboratories and iron-foundries. The river Ouse is navigable as far as the bridge, for vessels of 80 tons' burthen; and ships of 150 tons trade with London. The trustees for the Ouse have expended large sums in improving the navigation, and steamers now ply between this place and Hull at any time of the tide. Great quantities of coal are brought hither in barges of 30 and 40 tons' burthen; and from the junction of the Foss with the Ouse is a navigable communication to the parish of Sheriff-Hutton, in the north riding. The York and North-Midland railway, proceeding southward, crosses the Leeds and Selby line, and unites it with the city. The Great North of England railway also commences at York, running northward, and is carried over the Ouse at Poppleton by a viaduct 300 feet long; it extends to Darlington, a distance of 45 miles, and was completed at an expense of £1,000,000, and opened to the public in 1841; the line is remarkably straight and level. These lines have their principal station within the walls, and form a complete railway communication with the west of Yorkshire and the north and south of England, and will probably add greatly to the commerce of the city. The market-days are Thursday and Saturday; the latter, which is the principal, is for corn. Fairs for cattle and horses, at which very large quantities of live stock are disposed of, are held every fortnight, and on Whit-Monday, St. Peter's-day, Lamm-day, and some other festivals, during the year, in a spacious market-place without the city walls, near Walmgate Bar, in the construction of which, and in the erection of a handsome inn contiguous to it, the corporation have expended upwards of £10,000. A fair for leather takes place every month; a fair for wool occurs on Peaseholm Green every Thursday, from Lady-day to Michaelmas, which is well attended; a fair for flax on the Saturdays before Michaelmas, Martinmas, Christmas, Lady-day, St. Peter's day, Lamm-day, and Whit-Monday; and a large horse fair, without Micklegate Bar, in the week next before Christmas. In the session of parliament of 1833, an act was obtained for improving and enlarging the market-places in the city, and rendering the approaches thereto more commodious; and for regulating and maintaining the several markets and fairs held within the city and its suburbs.

The earliest charter bestowed upon the inhabitants was by Henry II., confirming to them all the liberties they held in the time of Henry I. Richard I., in the 1st of his reign, granted them an exemption from toll and all customs in England and Normandy; and John, in the first of his reign, gave them a charter ratifying all former privileges, and conferring the city on the inhabitants, subject to a fee-farm rent of £160, payable half-yearly into the treasury. Confirmatory charters were also granted by Henry III., Edward II. and III., and Richard II., which last monarch, by a second charter, erected the city, with the district adjoining it, into a county of itself, dignified the mayor with the title of Lord, and in lieu of the three bailiffs, appointed two sheriffs. Charters were subsequently obtained from Henry VI., Edward IV., Henry VII., Elizabeth, and Charles I. and II.

The present corporation, however, consists of a lord mayor, 12 aldermen, and 36 councillors, appointed under the act of the 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 76; the city, formerly including only four, is now divided into six wards, and the number of magistrates is fifteen. The freedom is inherited by all the sons of freemen on their coming of age, and acquired by apprenticeship to a resident freeman. The city, which comprises 1938 acres, first exercised the elective franchise in the 49th of Henry III., since which time it has regularly returned two members to parliament: the right of election was extended in 1832, to the £10 householders of an enlarged district, which contains 2805 acres; the sheriff is the returning officer. Courts of assize for the city and county of the city are opened by the judges on the northern circuit, under a separate commission, on the same day as the assizes for the county; at these courts, which are held in the guildhall, the lord mayor takes the chair in presence of the judge, who sits on his right hand. Courts of quarter-session are held before the recorder, for all offences not capital; the lord mayor and one of the justices hold a petty-session twice in the week; and a court of record, that occurs weekly by prescription, for the recovery of debts to any amount, is held before the recorder. To the corporation belongs the conservancy of the rivers Aire, Derwent, Don, Ouse, Wharfe, and some parts of the Humber. The mansion-house, erected in the year 1726, for the residence of the chief magistrate, is a stately edifice, containing a splendid suite of apartments, and a large collection of well-painted portraits, among which are those of William III.; George II.; George IV., when Prince of Wales, presented by His Royal Highness to the corporation, in 1811; Lord Dundas, painted by Jackson, in 1822; Lord Bingley; Sir William Mordaunt Milner, Bart.; Sir John Lister Kaye, Bart.; and other eminent persons. The guildhall is a handsome structure in the later English style, erected in 1446: the hall is appropriated to the use of the courts, and for the transaction of corporate affairs and the election of members and officers of the corporation. The council-chamber, adjoining the guildhall, was erected in 1819, when the buildings anciently used for that purpose, and situated on the old bridge over the Ouse, were taken down; the upper room is assigned to the meetings of the mayor, aldermen, and councillors, and the lower apartment is appropriated to various public purposes. The Merchants' Hall is in Fossgate, and the Merchant Tailors' Hall in Aldwark; these are almost the only remains of the numerous ancient guilds formerly incorporated for the regulation of the trade of York. A common gaol for the city and county of the city was erected in 1807, at the joint expense of the city and the ainsty, towards which the former contributed three-fifths, and the latter two-fifths; it is a substantial stone building, consisting of three stories, surmounted by a cupola and vane, and is now considered the house of correction for the city, the county gaol in the castle being used as the common gaol. The house of correction for the city and county of the city, erected in 1814, at the expense of the city and ainsty, has been taken down, having been sold to the York and North-Midland Railway Company.

The general assizes for the county, and the election of knights of the shire for the North Riding, take place at York. The site of the ancient castle, which, on its being dismantled after the parliamentary war, was converted into a prison, is at present occupied by the county hall and common gaol, erected in 1701, and forming three sides of a quadrangle, near the confluence of the Ouse and the Foss, now approached by a gateway and porter's-lodge in the new wall, fronting Tower-street, and near the north-western side of Clifford's Tower. The county hall, which occupies the western range, is a handsome structure in the Grecian style, erected in 1777, with a noble portico of six lofty columns of the Ionic order, above which are the queen's arms, a figure of Justice, and other emblematical ornaments: the hall is 150 feet long, and 45 feet wide; at one end is the crown bar, and at the other the court of nisi prius, each lighted by an elegant dome, supported on twelve pillars of the Corinthian order. On the east side of the quadrangle are the apartments of the clerks of assize, the office of the court of record, the indictment office, hospital rooms, and cells for female prisoners: this range, which is 150 feet in length, is fronted with a handsome colonnade of the Ionic order. The old county gaol occupies the south side of the quadrangle; and in 1836 a very large addition, called the New Works, was completed, at an expense of £203,530, including a massive boundary wall, 32 feet high, with pierced battlements, recessed gateway, and projecting towers: the new prison, which stands on the north-east side of Clifford's Tower, comprises four radiating double wings, with eight airing-yards, and in the centre is the governor's house, which commands inspection over the whole; the buildings are fire-proof, being constructed entirely of stone and wrought-iron.

The city was constituted an ARCHBISHOPAL SEE by Edwin, King of Northumbria, who, after his conversion to Christianity, in 627, erected a church here, which he dedicated to St. Peter, and made Paulinus, the confessor of his queen Ethelburga, first archbishop. After the death of Edwin, who was killed in battle, Paulinus was compelled to abandon the province to the fury of the Britons, who, under Cadwallo, assisted by the King of Mercia, took possession of the city, and, accompanied by Ethelburga, found an asylum in the kingdom of Kent. During his absence the newly-founded establishment fell into decay, but was restored by Oswald, the successor of Edwin, who, after a successful battle with the Britons, expelled them from the city, and recovered possession of his capital. Paulinus, dying in Kent, was succeeded in the government of the see and province by Cedda, who held it till the return of Wilfrid from France, whither he had been sent for consecration, and where he remained for three years. The establishment, under Wilfrid and his successors, remained upon its original foundation till after the Conquest, when Thomas, chaplain to William the Conqueror, being made archbishop, constituted the several dignitaries and prebendaries, and established the first regular chapter. After frequent disputes for precedence with the Archbishop of Canterbury, which were carried on for many years with the greatest animosity, it was ultimately decided in favour of Canterbury, the archbishop of that see being styled Primate of all England, as a superior designation to that of the archbishop of York, who has the title of Primate of England. The Archbishop of York, who is also lord high almoner to the queen, takes precedence of all dukes who are not of the blood royal, and of all the chief officers of state, with the exception of the lord high chancellor; he places the crown on the head of the queen at coronations; and, in the county of Northumberland, has the power and privileges of a prince palatine: he was formerly styled Metropolitan of Scotland. The province of York comprises the sees of York, Carlisle, Chester, Durham, Sodor and Man, and Ripon: the diocese of York extends over the county of York, except such parts as have been included in the new diocese of Ripon. The ecclesiastical establishment consists of an archbishop, dean, chancellor, precentor, sub-dean, succentor, three archdeacons, four canons residentiary, twenty-four prebendaries, a chancellor of the diocese, a subchanter and four vicars choral, seven lay clerks, six choristers, organist, and other officers. The Archbishop has the patronage of the archdeaconries, the chancellorships, precentorship, the non-residentiary canonries, and fifty-three benefices, with a revenue of £10,000; the dean has the patronage of eleven benefices, and a revenue of £1250. The Dean and Chapter have the patronage of the residentiary and minor canonries, with twenty-four benefices, and possess a revenue of £1650, divided into six shares, of which one is reserved for minor salaries; the subchanter and four minor canons form a corporate body, with a revenue of £569, which is equally divided among them. The treasurer's office, erected in the year 1090, was dissolved and made a lay fee by King Edward VI., as were also the prebends of Wilton and Newthorpe, annexed thereto.

The CATHEDRAL, originally founded by Edwin, after having been frequently demolished and restored, was destroyed by an accidental fire in 1137. It remained in a desolate state for some time, till Archbishop Roger, in 1171, rebuilt the choir, and in the reign of Henry III., Walter de Gray built the south transept. In the beginning of the reign of Edward I., John le Romaine, treasurer of the church, built the north transept and a central tower; and, in 1291, his son of the same name, who was made archbishop, laid the foundation of the nave, which was, forty years afterwards, completed by Archbishop William de Melton, who also built the west front and the two western towers. Archbishop Thoresby, in 1361, rebuilt the choir in a style better adapted to the character of the nave, to which it was before greatly inferior; and, in 1370, the central tower was taken down, and in the course of eight years completely rebuilt. The whole edifice at present displays a regular series of the richest and purest specimens of the various styles of English architecture, with some remains of the Norman, of which the only portion now entire is the crypt, under the eastern part of the church. The distant view of this extensive and magnificent pile, towering above the churches and other buildings of the city, and equally unrivalled in the magnitude of its dimensions and the richness of its embellishment, is strikingly impressive. The cathedral is a cruciform structure, with the addition of two lateral projections between the central tower and the east end, which are called the light transepts, and is 524½ feet in length from east to west, and 222 in breadth along the principal transepts.

Arms of the Bishopric.

The West front, which is divided into three compartments by richly-panelled buttresses of four stages, terminating with boldly crocketed finials, is almost covered with a profusion of the most varied sculpture, comprising numerous canopied niches, in which are statues. The central compartment contains the principal entrance, a beautiful pointed and richly moulded arch, supported on a series of slender clustered columns, surmounted by a straight angular canopy with crocketed pinnacles, and ornamented with canopied niches, in which are statues of the Archbishops Melton, Percy, and Vavasour. The chief arch is divided, by a slender clustered pillar in the centre, into two smaller cinquefoiled arches, forming a double doorway, and having the spandril decorated with a circular window of elegant tracery. On each side of the principal entrance are two series of trefoiled arches, with feathered canopies, terminating in crocketed finials; and above it is the beautiful west window of eight lights, enriched with elegant tracery, and surmounted by an acutely angular canopy and parapet, behind which is seen the gable of the roof of the nave. The entrances to the aisles are through plainer arches, above which are elegant windows of three lights, with tracery surmounted by canopies similar to that over the west window. The western towers, which are uniform and of graceful elevation, are strengthened with double buttresses at the angles, highly enriched with canopies and pinnacles at the offsets, and which, after diminishing in four successive stages, die away under the cornice which is carried round the upper part of the towers. The North and South sides of the cathedral have buttresses terminating in pinnacles, and a delicately pierced parapet is continued round the walls of the nave: the transepts, which are in the early English style, are nearly similar in design, though differing in the minuter details. The central tower, which rises to the height of 213 feet, is a massive square structure, relieved on each of its faces by two large windows of three lights, separated and bounded at each side by enriched buttresses, terminating in crocketed finials; the crown of the arch of the windows is surmounted by a canopy, and the summit of the tower is wreathed with a pierced and embattled parapet. The East front, which is one of the finest compositions extant, is divided into three compartments by four octangular buttresses, terminating in crocketed pinnacles, and profusely ornamented with canopied niches, in which are, a figure of an archbishop seated, holding in his left hand the model of a church, and having the right hand raised; a statue of Vavasour, in tolerable preservation; and one, much mutilated, said to be that of Lord Percy. The magnificent window, of nine lights, filled with intricate tracery, occupies the whole of the central compartment, and is surmounted by an enriched ogee canopy, above which is some highly elaborate and beautiful tabernacle-work, and in the centre, a square turret, with a crocketed finial.

On entering the cathedral from the west end, the vastness of its dimensions, the justness of its proportions, and the simplicity and beauty of the arrangement, produce an intense impression of grandeur and magnificence. The Nave is separated from the aisles by long ranges of finely clustered columns, of which the central shafts rise to the roof, which is plainly groined, and the others support a series of gracefully pointed arches, in the decorated style, chastely and appropriately enriched. The triforium consists of openings of five lofty narrow trefoiled arches, with acute angular canopies. The clerestory is a noble range of windows, divided by slender mullions into five lights, having in the crown of the arch a circular light, with geometrical tracery of beautiful design: the aisles are lighted by an elegant range of windows of three lights, with quatrefoiled circles and tracery; and the walls below them are decorated with panels and tracery, and with canopied niches having crocketed pinnacles. At the eastern extremity of the nave is the Lantern Tower, supported on four lofty clustered columns and finely pointed arches, the windows of which diffuse a pleasing light over the transepts and eastern portion of the nave, which when viewed from this point, derives increased effect from the great west window, which is filled with flowing tracery of the most delicate and beautiful character. The Transepts, in the early English style, are dissimilar only in the minuter details and the arrangement of the ends. The central part is separated from the aisles by clustered columns and sharply-pointed arches; the triforium consists of four arches separated by small pillars resembling the Norman, and included in a large circular arch, having in the spandril a cinquefoiled, and on each side of it a quatrefoiled, circle; the clerestory consists of ranges of five sharp-pointed arches, of which the three central only admit light; the roof, which is of wood, is groined like that of the nave. The aisles of the transepts are lighted with double lancet-shaped windows, beneath which is a series of blank trefoiled arches. The choir is separated from the nave by a splendid stone Screen sustaining the organ, and divided into fifteen compartments containing a series of richly canopied niches, in which are placed, on elegant pedestals, the statues of the kings of England, from William the Conqueror to Henry VI.: nearly in the centre is the doorway leading into the choir, an obtuse arch supported on slender clustered columns, with an ogee canopy, terminated with a crocketed finial. Above the niches in which are the statues of the kings are narrow shrines, richly canopied, and containing smaller statues, and above them a series of angels; the whole surmounted with bands of delicate tracery, and adorned with the most elaborate sculpture.

The Choir, of which the roof is loftier and more intricately groined than that of the nave, is a beautiful specimen of the later style of English architecture. The piers and arches are similar to those of the nave, and the intervals between the arches are embellished with shields of armorial-bearings: the openings in the triforium consist of a series of five cinquefoiled arches with canopies and crocketed finials, divided in the centre by horizontal transoms; and the clerestory is a beautiful range of windows of five lights, with cinquefoiled heads, having the crown of the arch enriched with elegant tracery. The walls of the aisles of the choir are panelled and enriched with tracery corresponding with the character of the windows, which, as well as the groining of the roof, is similar to those of the nave. The magnificent east window, of nine lights, occupies almost the whole of the east end, and is embellished with nearly 200 subjects from sacred history, painted in glass; the upper section of the window is occupied with intricate tracery, elaborately wrought into a series of canopies, running up to the crown of the arch, and containing projecting busts, and the outer border is enriched with small tabernacles, containing half-length figures. The window is divided, nearly in the centre, by an embattled transom, in which a light gallery is wrought, affording an unobstructed view of the whole cathedral. Behind the altar, to which is an ascent of fifteen steps, and separating it from the Lady chapel, is a beautiful stone screen, divided into compartments by slender panelled buttresses terminating with crocketed pinnacles; each compartment contains, in the lower division, a triple shrine of niches, and in the upper, an open arch, separated by slender mullions into three divisions, surmounted by a square head, of which the spandrils are pierced in quatrefoil circles; above these is a delicate open embattled parapet. The intervals of this exquisitely wrought screen have been filled with plate-glass, affording a view of the eastern portion of the choir and of the magnificent east window. On each side of the choir, and on each side of the entrance under the organ, are the prebendal stalls, of oak richly carved, and surmounted with canopies of tabernacle-work: at the east end are the bishop's throne and pulpit, opposite to each other, both elaborately ornamented; and in the centre is the desk for the vicars choral, inclosed with tabernacle-work, on the north side of which is an eagle of brass on a pedestal. The pavement of the choir and nave has been beautifully relaid in mosaic. The Lady chapel is perfectly similar to the choir, of which it is only a continuation, and contains some beautiful monuments. Beneath the altar is an ancient crypt of Norman architecture, with low massive circular columns with varied capitals, supporting a plainly groined roof; it was built with the materials of Archbishop Thomas' church, by Archbishop Thoresby. On the south side of the choir are three chapels, or rather vestries, in which are several ancient chests. In the Inner vestry, or council-chamber, is a large press, containing many of the ancient records of the church, and a large horn of ivory, presented by Ulphus, Prince of West Deira, with all his revenues, to the cathedral, and which, after having been lost and stripped of its gold ornaments, was restored to the church by Henry, Lord Fairfax. The lands which are held by this horn are situated a little to the eastward of the city, and are of great value. Here is also preserved a large and elegant bowl, edged with silver doubly gilt, and standing upon three silver feet, originally presented by Archbishop Scroope, in 1398, to the company of cordwainers of this city. Among the other curiosities are, a state canopy of gold tissue, given by the citizens in honour of James I., on his first visit to York; a superb pastoral staff of silver, about seven feet long, with the figure of the Virgin and the Infant placed under the crook, given by Catherine of Portugal, Queen Dowager of England, to her confessor, on his being appointed to the archbishopric by James II., in the year 1689, and said to have been wrested from him by the Earl of Darnley, when he went in procession to the minster, and deposited in the care of the Dean and Chapter, in whose possession it has remained ever since; and an antique chair, thought to be coeval with the cathedral, in which several of the kings of England have been crowned, and which is placed within the rails of the altar when the archbishop officiates.

The monument of Archbishop Walter de Grey, the tomb of Archbishop Godfrey, the monument of Archbishop Henry Bowett, and of Archbishop Thomas Savage are highly worthy of notice: there are also several large stone coffins, some recumbent figures of knights, and numerous tombs of other archbishops, of which that of Archbishop Roger is the most ancient. In the north aisle of the choir is a recumbent statue in alabaster, commonly, but erroneously, said to be that of Prince William de Hatfield, second son of Edward III., under a rich and beautiful canopy; and in the north transept is the tomb of John Haxby, treasurer of the church, on which, according to ancient usage, payments of money for the church estate are still occasionally made. There are numerous other monuments and tombs in various parts of the church; among which are those of Sir William Ingram, Knt., commissary of the prerogative court; Charles Howard, Earl of Carlisle; Frances Cecil, Countess of Cumberland; a statue of William Wentworth, Earl of Strafford, son of the minister of Charles I.; and a monumental figure of Faith, finely sculptured by Westmacott. From the north transept a passage leads to the Chapter-house, a highly enriched octagonal structure in the decorated English style, with a lofty and elaborately groined roof of wood, without a central pier, profusely ornamented with sculpture in various devices. Seven sides of the octagon are occupied by large windows of elegant tracery, embellished with shields of armorial-bearings painted on glass; below the windows are forty-four stalls of rich tabernacle-work of Petworth marble. The eighth side is solid, and has tracery corresponding with the windows; and the arch forming the doorway is divided into two trefoiled arches by a clustered column in the centre, above which is a statue of the Virgin with the Infant in her arms, enshrined in a canopied niche. The vestibule is also of beautiful design. The building now used for the Library, once a chapel belonging to the archiepiscopal palace, is situated a short distance to the north-west of the cathedral, and having undergone complete repair, exhibits a good specimen of early Anglo-Norman architecture; it contains a valuable collection of works on theology and general literature. The recent removal of ancient buildings to the north of the cathedral has disclosed a series of very beautiful Norman arches, which formed part of the palace, and which, though greatly mutilated, are peculiarly fine in their details.

The CHURCHES are in general in the later English style, but several of them contain portions in the Norman and early English styles. The church of All Saints on the Pavement is said to have been built on the site and with the ruins of the Roman Eboracum; it has an octagonal lantern tower with large windows of elegant tracery, in which was formerly a lamp to guide travellers across the forest of Galtres. The chancel was taken down, in 1782, for the enlargement of the market-place, but since the removal of the market the site has been added to the cemetery. The church of All Saints in North-Street has some old stained glass in the windows, and in the south wall the mutilated remains of a Roman sepulchral monument. The church of St. Crux has a neat square tower of brick, surmounted by a dome, and declining considerably from a perpendicular line. The church of St. Cuthbert is a neat edifice in the later style, with some ancient portions: the windows were formerly embellished with stained glass, of which some portions are remaining. Near the site many Roman antiquities have been found, consisting of urns, pateræ, and part of the foundation of an apparently Roman building. The church of St. Denis in Walmgate, originally a spacious structure, has been much reduced by taking down the western part, which, from the insecurity of the foundation, was giving way; the spire, also, which was perforated by a ball during the parliamentary war, has been replaced with a square tower of indifferent character. Little now remains of the original architecture, except the entrance door, which belonged to an ancient porch that has been removed. In the interior are, a mural tablet with a female figure in the attitude of prayer, erected to Mrs. Dorothy Hughes; and an elegant marble monument to Robert Welbourn Hotham, Esq., sheriff of York in 1801: in the north aisle is a sepulchral chapel of the earls of Northumberland, in which Earl Henry, who fell at the battle of Townton Field, was interred. The church of St. Helen, supposed to have been originally a temple of Diana, was rebuilt in the reign of Mary, and the ground of the churchyard, which had risen to an enormous height, was levelled and marked out as the site of St. Helen's square: the present structure, which has an elegant octagonal tower, has been much modernised, and most of the painted glass has been removed. Near the entrance is a Norman font lined with lead, and ornamented with antique sculpture. There are several monuments, and two mural tablets to the memory of Barbara and Elizabeth Davyes, two maiden sisters, who died in 1765 and 1767, each 98 years of age. The steeple of the church of St. John was blown down in 1551, and has not been rebuilt; the interior of the edifice contains a monument to Sir Richard York, Knt., lord mayor of the city in 1469: the churchyard has been much curtailed by the improvement near Ouse bridge. The church of St. Lawrence was nearly destroyed during the siege of York, by the parliamentary forces, and lay in ruins till 1669, when it was repaired; it consists only of a nave, with a square embattled tower. Over the altar is a large handsome window, with some remains of stained glass; and there are some neat marble tablets to members of the family of Yarburgh. The porch has been removed, but at the entrance is a fine Norman arch, with three mouldings ornamented with flowers; in the north wall of the church is a large grit-stone, supposed to have been a Roman altar, and in the churchyard wall are two antique statues. The church of St. Margaret in Walmgate is an old building of brick, with a steeple of the same material: the only interesting feature is a Norman porch, removed from the dissolved hospital of St. Nicholas: at the entrance is a semicircular arch, resting on single columns, and having four mouldings ornamented alternately with the signs of the zodiac, emblematical representations of the seasons, and grotesque figures. This edifice has been repaired, and a gallery erected. The church of St. Martin in Micklegate is a neat ancient structure, with a more modern steeple, built in 1677; the windows contain some portions of beautiful stained glass, and in the exterior of the walls of the church, and in the walls of the churchyard, are some remains of mutilated Roman sculpture. The church of St. Martin the Bishop, in Coney-street, is an elegant structure in the later English style, with a square embattled tower; the interior is spacious and appropriately arranged. Among the monuments are, one to Sir William Sheffield and his lady, with busts and the family arms; and a plain marble tablet to Elizabeth, wife of Robert Porteus, and another of Beilby Porteus, Bishop of London. The church of St. Mary Bishopshill Senior has portions in the early and decorated English styles, of which the details are very good: that of St. Mary Bishopshill Junior has a Norman tower, and some piers and arches in the early English style, with portions of a later date. The church of St. Mary in Castlegate has a very handsome and lofty spire, and contains several old monumental inscriptions. In digging a grave in this church a copper plate was found, which had been fastened on the inside of the coffin of a priest who was executed for the plot of 1680. The church of St. Maurice is a very ancient structure; the interior has been recently repaired and modernised. The church of St. Michael le Belfry is a spacious and elegant edifice in the later English style, erected on the site of a more ancient church, which was taken down in 1535; the interior is handsomely arranged, with the exception of the altar, which is of the Corinthian order, and consequently inappropriate to the general character of the building. St. Michael's in Spurrier-gate is a very old structure, of which the west end is built of gritstone, in large masses. The church of St. Olave, adjoining the ruins of St. Mary's abbey, and a very ancient edifice, was destroyed during the siege of York, by the parliamentary forces, who used the roof as a platform for their cannon; it was rebuilt in 1722, with stone taken from the ruins of the abbey. The interior is neatly arranged; the east window contains excellent stained glass, and there are some mural tablets. The church of St. Sampson is in the later English style, with a square embattled tower, on the west side of which is a sculptured figure of the tutelary saint, and on which may be perceived its perforation by a cannon ball during the siege of the city: there were formerly three chantry chapels in this church. Most of the painted glass has been removed from the windows, and the monumental inscriptions have been greatly defaced. The church of St. Saviour is an ancient structure, with a handsome tower surmounted by a wooden cross; the interior is very neatly arranged; the windows contain considerable portions of stained glass, and there are several old monuments. The church of Holy Trinity in Micklegate is principally in the Norman style, with portions of a later date; the tower preserves its original Norman character, but the church has been greatly mutilated. It formerly belonged to the priory of the Holy Trinity, of which some ruined arches may be traced, and a gateway is still remaining in good preservation. The church of Holy Trinity in Goodramgate had once three chantry chapels; over the altar is a fine window, containing beautiful specimens of stained glass; there are also some very old monumental inscriptions. The church of Holy Trinity in King's-court, usually called Christ-church, is an ancient edifice, to which there is a descent of several steps; it was considerably reduced at the east end in 1830, in order to widen Collier-gate, and was then repewed. The Roman palace was situated near this church, on the side of which is a ditch still called King's ditch, which is supposed to have bounded the demesne. In addition to the several churchyards, a public cemetery has been established, on the Fulford road, comprising $8\frac{1}{2}$ acres, beautifully laid out and inclosed at a cost of about £6000. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, Primitive, and Association Methodists, Wesleyans, and English Presbyterians; also two Roman Catholic chapels.

The Free Grammar school in the Cathedral Close was erected in 1546, and endowed with £12 per annum by Robert Holgate, Archbishop of York. Another free grammar school was founded by charter of Philip and Mary, and endowed by the Dean and Chapter with the lands of the hospital of St. Mary, in the Horsefair, which was originally established in 1330, by Robert de Pykering, Dean of York, and the site and revenue of which, on its suppression, were granted to that body.

Schools were erected in Walmgate, Friar Walls, and Bishopshill, by John Dodsworth, ironmonger, who endowed them with £10 per annum each. The Blue-coat school for boys, held in an ancient building on Peaseholm Green, called St. Anthony's Hall; and the Grey-coat school for girls, for which an appropriate building was erected near Monkgate Bar, were established by the mayor and corporation, in 1705; they are supported by subscription, and with the interest of donations vested in the funds, among which was a legacy of £4000 by Thomas Wilkinson, Esq., alderman, in 1820. A school was instituted in 1773, by William Haughton, who bequeathed £1300 for its erection and endowment, and £290 more, after the demise of certain annuitants, for the instruction of children of the parish of St. Crux, near the church of which a commodious school-house has been erected; the income is about £180 per annum. The same benefactor left £500, directing the interest to be appropriated to the payment of the rents of widows of that parish; and £1000 to be lent without interest to 40 tradesmen; but this sum has been reduced to £232 by litigation, to establish the will of the testator. The Collegiate School, opened in February 1838, is a spacious and handsome building, in a healthy situation, without the walls of the city, and comprises a central hall, classrooms, library, and boarding-house; it provides a systematic course of education for pupils, the sons of gentlemen, designed for the universities and for the learned professions, and is under the direction of a board of proprietors, and of masters, of whom the Rev. William Hey, M.A., is principal. There is a Diocesan Normal school; also a school established in 1782, by Mrs. Cappe and Mrs. Gray. A school for the Blind was instituted in 1836, in memory of the late William Wilberforce, Esq., by subscription and donations, and is held in the manor-house. Two national schools were formed in 1812; a Lancasterian school for girls originally established in 1813, was removed in 1816 to Aldwark; and a Roman Catholic school is partly supported by endowment.

An hospital was founded by Alderman Agar, who settled upon it lands forming part of the estate of Lord Middleton, for six aged widows. The hospital of St. Catherine, formerly a house for the reception of poor pilgrims, has been converted into an almshouse for four aged widows. An hospital was established in 1717, by Dr. Colton and his wife, who endowed it with land, for eight aged women. An hospital was founded at Bootham, in 1640, by Sir Arthur Ingram, alderman, who assigned to it £5 per annum each for ten aged women, and twenty nobles to a chaplain; the buildings consist of ten neat cottages, containing two rooms each, with a chapel in the centre. Mason's hospital was instituted in 1732, by Mrs. Mason, who endowed it for six aged widows. Mrs. Anne Middleton, in 1655, bequeathed £2000 for the erection and endowment of an hospital for twenty widows of freemen, which bequest was augmented by a legacy of £200 from Thomas Norfolk, in 1780, and a donation of £100 from Jonathan Gray, in 1830: this hospital is situated in Skeldergate, and was entirely rebuilt by the corporation, in 1829, at an expense of nearly £2000. Near Marygate is the Old Maids' hospital, founded in 1725, by Miss Mary Wandesford, who assigned to it an estate at Brompton-upon-Swale, near Richmond, a mortgage of £1200, and £1200 South Sea stock, for ten maiden gentlewomen, members of the Church of England, and a reader. St. Thomas' hospital, without Micklegate Bar was originally founded for the fraternity of Corpus Christi: after its dissolution it was repaired, in 1787, and endowed with a portion of £2137. 8. 2. stock, by William Luntley, glover; with £25 per annum by Lady Conyngham; and with £100 by John Hartley. Trinity hospital was established in 1373, by John de Rawcliffe, for a priest, five brethren, and five sisters: the Merchants' Company, upon its dissolution, in the reign of Edward VI., having obtained possession of the building, re-endowed it for ten aged persons of both sexes. The hospital founded by Sir Thomas Walter in 1612, and endowed by him with £3 per annum for a reader, and £2 per annum each to ten aged persons, has been reduced, and there are at present only seven inmates. An almshouse in St. Denislane, instituted by the Company of Cordwainers, having fallen into a state of dilapidation and decay, was rebuilt by Mr. Hornby at his own cost, for four decayed members of that fraternity. An hospital was founded early in the last century, by Percival Winterskelf, who endowed it for six aged persons. Lady Hewley's hospital, at St. Saviour's gate, founded in 1708, comprises ten houses, for aged women; the same person also bequeathed large sums of money for other charitable uses. An hospital near Foss Bridge was founded by Mrs. Dorothy Wilson, who, in 1717, endowed it with land, for ten aged women; it is a neat brick building, rebuilt a second time in 1812: a salary of £20 per annum is paid to a schoolmaster for teaching twenty boys. The hospital in Castlegate was founded in 1692, by Sir Henry Thomson, for the support of six poor men: this endowment, which produces an annual rental of £81, has been augmented by bequests from Thomas Norfolk and John Girdler.

The County Hospital originated in 1740, by the benevolence of Lady Hastings, who bequeathed £500 for the relief of the diseased poor of the county; other donations and subscriptions being subsequently obtained, the present edifice, in Monkgate, was soon afterwards erected. The City Dispensary, in New-street, for which a commodious building was erected in 1828, administers extensive relief, and is liberally supported by subscription. The Lunatic Asylum, without Bootham Bar, was established in 1774, and has received great additions; it is a commodious edifice, surrounded with gardens and pleasure-grounds. About a mile from York, near the village of Heslington, is a similar institution, called The Retreat, opened for patients in 1796, and which owes its foundation to the exertions of William Tuke, who, impressed with the belief that the then general treatment of persons of unsound mind was ill-adapted to the two great objects of cure and alleviation, induced the Society of Friends, of which he was a member, to engage in his experiment of pursuing a mild and persuasive system. The grounds attached are extensive, and appropriately laid out; the building, erected at an expense of £12,000, has been materially enlarged, and now forms a handsome quadrangular range. There are numerous institutions for relieving the distress and alleviating the sufferings of the poor, among which are, the Charitable Society, for the relief of distressed objects resident in the city; the Benevolent Society, for the casual relief of strangers; the Lying-in Society, the Clothing Society, and a Society for the encouragement of female servants. The corporation have at their disposal for distributing coal, bread, and other relief among the poor, and for apprenticing children, a fund of nearly £200 per annum, arising from the bequests of various individuals; also a lending fund, a portion of which is derived from the charity of Sir Thomas White. Among the most munificent benefactors to the poor have been, the Countess Dowager of Conyngham, who bequeathed £20,000 for charitable purposes; and Mr. John Allen, who, with several other sums, bequeathed £140 per annum for the erection and endowment of an hospital for twelve aged men, who receive each £12 per annum. The union of York comprises 79 parishes or places, of which 31 are in the city, 14 in the East, 19 in the North, and 15 in the West, riding, altogether containing a population of 37,779. Near the city are the beautiful ruins of the venerable abbey of St. Mary, founded in 1088, by William Rufus, who laid the first stone of the building, and amply endowed it for monks of the Benedictine order; it flourished till the Dissolution, at which time its revenue was £2085. 1. 5. Among other ancient remains is the crypt of the hospital of St. Leonard, originally founded in the reign of William the Conqueror, and dedicated to St. Peter previously to the erection of a church in it by King Stephen, dedicated to St. Leonard, by which name it was afterwards distinguished; at the Dissolution its revenue was estimated at £500. 11. 1. Among the eminent natives have been, Constantine the Great, the first Roman emperor that embraced Christianity; Flaccus Albinus Alcuinus, the pupil of Bede; Waltheof, Earl of Northumberland, son of the gallant Chester; and Thomas Morton, successively Bishop of Chester, Lichfield and Coventry, and Durham; and among those of more recent date may be noticed, Gent, an eminent printer and historian; Swinburn, a distinguished lawyer and civilian; and Flaxman, the celebrated sculptor. York gave the title of Duke to Prince Frederick, second son of King George III., and who died January 5th, 1827; it now gives the title to the second son of Her present Majesty.

YORKFLEET, a township, in the parish and union of HOWDEN, wapentake of HOWDENSHERE, E. riding of YORK, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Howden; containing 206 inhabitants. It comprises about 1000 acres, including an allotment of Bishopsoil and Walling fen. The village is pleasantly seated on the north bank of the river Ouse, immediately opposite to the village of Ousefleet. There is a place of worship for Wesleyans.

YORKSHIRE, a maritime county, and by far the largest in England, bounded on the south by the Humber and the counties of Lincoln, Nottingham, and Derby; on the south-west, for a short distance, by that of Chester; on the west by Lancashire; on the north-west by Westmorland; on the north by Durham; and on the north-east and east by the North Sea. It extends from $53^{\circ} 19'$ to $54^{\circ} 40'$ (N. Lat.), and from $10'$ (E. Lon.) to $2^{\circ} 40'$ (W. Lon.), and includes an area of 3,815,040 acres, or nearly 5961 square miles. The whole county contains 316,096 inhabited houses, 23,522 uninhabited, and 3079 in course of erection; and the population amounts to 1,591,480, of whom 788,793 are males, and 802,687 females. Of these persons, there are in the East riding, 96,018 males and 98,918 females; in the North riding, 100,482 males and 103,640 females; and in the West riding, 574,120 males and 579,981 females.

The ancient British inhabitants of this part were the Brigantes, the most numerous and powerful of all the tribes that shared in the possession of Britain before its conquest by the Romans. The latter succeeded in subjugating them about the year 71, after defeating them in several sanguinary battles, and ravaging the whole of their territory. The Caledonians having overrun a great part of the country to the north of the Humber, the Emperor Adrian arrived in Britain, in the year 120, to oppose them in person, and fixed his residence at Eboracum; on his approach the invaders retired, and the emperor, having made provisions for the future security of the province, soon returned to Rome. But no sooner had he departed than the Caledonians renewed their predatory inroads, which became more frequent and extensive, until, in the reign of Antoninus Pius, the Brigantes having at the same time attempted to throw off the Roman yoke, that emperor sent Lollius Urbicus with strong reinforcements to suppress these commotions: this commander, having first reduced the revolted Brigantes, drove the Caledonians northward into the highlands of Scotland, and thus restored tranquillity. This people, however, having renewed their irruptions, in the year 207, the Emperor Severus came over with a numerous army, and immediately advanced to York, whence, having rejected all overtures for peace, he marched northward and expelled them, leaving to his son Caracalla the command of the army, and the care of repairing Adrian's rampart. The barbarians again renewed their incursions, about the year 364, but were at length repelled by the Roman General Theodosius, in 368. In the latter period of the Roman empire in Britain, the territory at present contained in Yorkshire was included in the division called Maxima Cæsariensis. After the accession of Honorius, one of the sons of Theodosius, to the empire of the West, in 393, the invasions of the Picts and Scots became incessant, and their progress was everywhere marked with desolation; and when the Romans, about the year 410, abandoned Britain, in order to defend their continental dominions, the Romanized Britons fell into a state of anarchy, amidst which it is only known of Yorkshire, that it formed the greater part of a British kingdom, named Diefyr, or Deira, the conquest of which by the Saxon chieftains was not achieved until after a lapse of 111 years from the first arrival of Hengist in Kent. Bernicia, situated to the north of the Roman wall, having been subjugated by Ida, about the year 547, Ella, another Saxon leader, about 560, penetrated southward from that territory, and effected the conquest of Deira: these two kingdoms, at different times forming one sovereignty, derived, from their situation to the north of the Humber, the name of Northumberland, or Northumbria. In the beginning of the 9th century, the victorious Egbert made it a tributary kingdom, shortly after which it was seized upon by the Danes, who were the principal occupants of it until its final subjugation by Edred in 951, after which event it was governed by a succession of earls or viceroys, who, like the ancient kings, had their residence at York.

The county is in the dioceses of York and Ripon, in the province of York, and forms the archdeaconries of York, the East Riding, Cleveland, Craven, and part of Richmond: the number of parishes is 604. The grand civil and military division of Yorkshire is into three ridings, West, North, and East, the term riding being corrupted from trithing, a third part. The West Riding is subdivided into the wapentakes of Agbrigg (Upper and Lower), Barkstone-Ash (Upper and Lower), Claro (Upper and Lower), Morley, Osgoldcross (Upper and Lower), Skyrack (Upper and Lower), Staincliffe and Ewecross (East and West), Staincross, and Strafforth and Tickhill (North and South), with the liberty of Ripon and soke of Doncaster; and by the act of the 5th and 6th of Wm. IV., cap. 76, the ainsty of York has been annexed, as a wapentake, to the West Riding. The North Riding is divided into the wapentakes of Allertonshire, Birdforth, Bulmer, Gilling-East, Gilling-West, Hallikeld, Hang-East, Hang-West, and Ryedale, also Pickering Lythe, and the liberties of Langbaourgh and Whitby-Strand; and the East Riding into the wapentakes of Buckrose, Dickering, Harthill (Bainton-Beacon, Holme-Beacon, Hunsley-Beacon, and Wilton-Beacon, divisions), Holderness (Middle, North, and South), Howdenshire, and Ouse and Derwent, besides which it comprehends within its limits the borough and liberties of Beverley, and the county of the town of Hull, which comprises a few parishes in the neighbourhood of that place. Yorkshire contains the city of York; the borough, market, and sea-port towns of Hull, Scarborough, and Whitby; the borough and market towns of Beverley, Bradford, Doncaster, Halifax, Huddersfield, Knaresborough, Leeds, Malton, North-Allerton, Pontefract, Richmond, Ripon, Sheffield, Thirsk, and Wakefield; the market and sea-port town of Bridlington; and the market-towns of Askrigg, Barnsley, Bawtry, Bedale, Bingley, Boroughbridge, Dewsbury, Guisborough, Hawes, Hedon, Helmsley, Howden, Keighley, Kirkby-Moorside, Leyburn, Market-Weighton, Masham, Otley, Patrington, Penistone, Pickering, Pocklington, Reeth, Rotherham, Sedburgh, Selby, Settle, Sherburn, Skipton, South Cave, Stokesley, Tadcaster, Thorne, Wetherby, and Yarm. On the disfranchisement of the Cornish borough of Grampound, the privilege of returning to parliament two additional members was granted to this large and populous county, which accordingly then sent four; and under the act passed to amend the representation in the 2nd of William IV., two more were added, making two for each Riding. Two citizens are returned for the city of York; and two burgesses for each of the boroughs, except North-Allerton and Thirsk, which, under the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 45, were deprived of one; and except also Huddersfield, Wakefield, and Whitby, which are empowered to send only one each. The shire is included in the Northern circuit; the assizes are held at York, where is the county gaol. The quarter-sessions for the West Riding are held as follows: the Easter sessions at Pontefract; the Midsummer quarter-sessions at Skipton, whence they are adjourned to Bradford, and thence to Rotherham; the Michaelmas quarter-sessions at Knaresborough, whence they are adjourned to Leeds, and thence to Sheffield; and the Christmas quarter-sessions at Wetherby, Wakefield, and Doncaster: on the termination of each session there is an adjournment to Wakefield for the purpose of inspecting the prison, which generally takes place within a month or six weeks after that time. In pursuance of an act passed in the year 1704, the office for the registration of deeds, conveyances, and wills, relating to property within the West Riding, was esta-lished at Wakefield, where also are kept the records of the sessions. The quarter-sessions for the North and East Ridings are held respectively at North-Allerton and Beverley, in each of which towns are also offices for the registration of all deeds relating to landed property within those ridings.

The WEST RIDING, which, whether considered with regard to its extent and population, or to its trade and manufactures, is by far the most important, is bounded on the north by the North Riding; on the east by the river Ouse, to its junction with the Trent; and on the south and west, by the arbitrary limits of the county. Its greatest length, from east to west, is 95 miles; its extreme breadth, from north to south, 48 miles; and its circumference, about 320 miles, including an area of 2450 square miles, or 1,568,000 acres. The surface of this portion of Yorkshire is much diversified, but may be divided into three large districts, gradually varying from a level and marshy to a rocky and mountainous region. The flat and marshy district, forming part of the extensive Vale of York, lies along the borders of the Ouse, and in most places extends westward as far as within three or four miles of an imaginary line drawn from Doncaster to Sherburn: the general level is broken only by low sandy hills, which occur in the vicinities of Snaith, Thorne, and Doncaster, and the altitude of which is seldom more than 50 feet above the level of the sea; so that the great rivers Ouse, Aire, and Don, which traverse this extensive tract, have often changed their channels. The middle parts of the Riding, as far westward as Sheffield, Bradford, and Otley, contain a variety of beautiful scenery, formed chiefly by noble hills of gentle ascent; but further westward the county becomes rugged and mountainous, scarcely anything being seen beyond Sheffield, in that direction, but high black moors, which, running north-westward, join the lofty hills of Blackstone Edge, on the border of Lancashire. The north-western portion of the Riding, forming the western part of the district of Craven, presents a confused heap of rocks and mountains, among which Pennygant, Wharnside, and Ingleborough are particularly conspicuous, the last, which is nearly in the centre of the wapentake of Ewecross, being one of the most majestic mountains in the country, rising to an elevation of 2360 feet from a base of nearly 10 miles in diameter; the general appearance of the country in this part is rugged, and the scenery barren, with little wood. The deanery of Craven, comprising the wapentakes of East and West Staincliffe, part of Ewecross, and the upper division of Skyrack, contains little arable land, the whole being one wide expanse of luxuriant verdure, interspersed with tracts of wood, in which the prevailing timber is ash of spontaneous and stately growth, and abounding with beautifully diversified scenery in the picturesque vales of the Wharfe, the Aire, and the Ribble, of which the sources are within its limits.

The NORTH RIDING, the next most extensive division, is bounded on the north by the river Tees; on the north-east and east by the ocean; on the south-east by the rivers Hertford and Derwent, which separate it from the East Riding; on the south by the river Ouse and the West Riding; and on the west by the county of Westmorland. Its greatest length is 83 miles, from east to west; its extreme breadth 47 miles, from north to south; and it comprises an area of 1,311,187 acres, or about 2048 square miles. The face of the country along the coast, from Scarborough nearly to the mouth of the Tees, is hilly and bold, the cliffs overhanging the beach being generally from 60 or 70 to 150 feet high; while Stoupe Brow, vulgarly "Stow Brow," about seven miles to the south of Whitby, rises to the stupendous height of 893 feet. From the ordinary elevation of the cliff the ground rises, in most places very rapidly, to the height of 300 or 400 feet; and the maritime tract thus formed, comprising about 64,920 acres, is tolerably productive. A little further inland, successive hills, rising one above another, form the elevated tract of the Eastern Moorlands: this wild and mountainous district, which occupies a space of about 30 miles in length from east to west, and 15 in breadth from north to south, is intersected by numerous beautiful and fertile dales, some of which are rather extensive; but, rising to the height of upwards of 1000 feet, the general aspect of the tract is bleak and dreary, and the whole is destitute of wood, excepting only a few dwarfish trees among the scattered habitations in the valleys. On the roads leading from Whitby to Guisborough, Stokesley, and Pickering, at the distance of a few miles, commence dreary and extensive wastes, bounded only by the horizon. Some of the hills, however, near the edges of this rugged and mountainous region, command picturesque and magnificent prospects. But the most remarkable object in the topography of these wilds is the singular peaked mountain called Rosebury-Topping, situated near the village of Newton, about a mile to the eastward of the road from Guisborough to Stokesley, and which rises to the height of 1488 feet above the level of the sea, and is a noted landmark: the view from its summit is celebrated for its great variety. The total extent of the Eastern Moorland district is 298,625 acres. The Vale of Cleveland, situated to the north-west of these mountains, is the fruitful tract bordering on the river Tees, in the lower part of its course; in this county it comprises an area of 70,444 acres, the whole under cultivation, and is lightly marked with gentle eminences. The extensive Vale of York is considered by Mr. Tuke, author of the General View of the Agriculture of the North Riding, drawn up for the consideration of the Board of Agriculture, to reach from the border of the Tees to the southern confines of the county, the northern portion of it only being included in this riding: this part, bounded on each side by the Eastern and the Western Moorlands, has a gentle slope, from the border of the river Tees, southward as far as York, where it sinks into a perfect flat; between the Tees and York, however, its ordinarily level surface is broken by several bold swells; and on the east it is separated from Ryedale by a range of hills called by Mr. Marshall, in his Rural Economy of Yorkshire, the Howardian Hills. This part of the vale, together with these hills, comprises an extent of 456,386 acres, of which about 15,000 are uncultivated. Ryedale (so called from its being traversed by the river Rye) and the East and West Marshes, form an extensive level, situated between the Eastern Moorlands and the river Derwent, and contain 103,872 acres, of which about 3000 are waste: the surface of its lower parts is flat, but towards the north it rises with a gentle ascent for three or four miles towards the foot of the moors; its lower levels are also broken by several isolated swells of considerable extent and elevation: the Marshes are separated from Ryedale by the Pickering beck. The Western Moorlands, occupying the rest of the North Riding, to the west of the Vale of York, and of far greater elevation than the Eastern Moorlands, resemble in general character the mountainous parts of Craven, and are, like them, intersected by numerous fertile dales: their total extent is 316,940 acres.

The EAST RIDING is bounded on the north and north-west by the little river Hertford, and the Derwent as far down as Stamford-Bridge, a mile above which place an irregular boundary line commences, which joins the Ouse, about a mile below York: from this point it is bounded, on the west and south-west, by the Ouse, on the south by the Humber, and on the east by the North Sea. Its greatest length is 52 miles, from south-east to north-west; its extreme breadth is 42 miles, from south-west to north-east; and it includes an area of 819,193 acres, or nearly 1280 square miles. This division is far less conspicuously marked with the bolder features of nature than the other parts of the county. It may be distinguished into three districts, viz., the Wolds, and the two level tracts, one of which lies to the east, the other to the west and north of that elevated region. The Wolds are a magnificent assemblage of lofty chalk hills, extending from the banks of the Humber in the vicinity of Hessle, in a northerly direction, to the neighbourhood of Malton on the Derwent, whence they range eastward, within a few miles of the course of that river, to the coast, where they form the lofty promontory of Flamborough Head, and, in the vicinities of the villages of Flamborough, Bampton, and Specton, rise in cliffs to the height of 100, and in some places of 150 feet. Their surface is for the most part divided into numerous extensive swells, by deep, narrow, and winding valleys, and occupies an extent of about 400,000 acres. Their eastern side, at Bridlington, sinks into a perfect flat, which continues for eight or nine miles southward. At the distance of about seven miles southward of Bridlington, however, the wapentake of Holderness begins, the eastern part of which, towards the sea-coast, is a finely varied country, in which is situated Hornsea Mere, the largest lake in the county, being about a mile and three-quarters long, and three-quarters of a mile across in the broadest part; but the western edge of the wapentake is a fenny tract of about four miles in breadth, and extending nearly 20 miles in length, southward to the banks of the Humber: these fenny lands are provincially called "Cars." The southern part of Holderness also falls into marshes, bordering on the Humber, and the county terminates south-eastward in the long low promontory of Spurnhead, the Ocellum Promontorium of Ptolemy. The Humber is known to have made, in former ages, considerable encroachments on the shores of Holderness; but in later times it has gradually receded from very extensive tracts. About the commencement of the reign of Charles I., an island, since called Sunk Island, began to appear in the Humber, nearly opposite Patrington; at first a few acres only were left dry at low water; but, as it increased in extent every year, it was at last embanked, and converted into pasture-ground: successive embankments were made, large tracts being at each time secured, until at the present period it comprises about 4700 acres of fertile land, and towards the west end is separated from the Holderness marshes only by a ditch a few feet broad: it is held on lease from the crown. The Holderness marshes have also been increased by the retiring of the waters of the Humber; and a large tract of land, called "Cherry-cob Sands," which was left dry, and embanked in the same manner as Sunk Island, is more particularly worthy of notice. The third natural division of the East Riding, which extends from the western foot of the Wolds to the boundary of the West Riding, is commonly called The Levels, and, though generally fertile, and interspersed with villages and hamlets, is every where flat and uninteresting. One of the most important agricultural improvements in the county is the drainage of the cars and marshes of this division of it, together with those in the North Riding, bordering on the course of the Derwent.

The Holderness Drainage lies chiefly adjoining to and on the eastern side of the river Hull, extends from north to south about eleven miles, and contains 11,211 acres: in 1762, an act of parliament was obtained for draining this level, much of which before that period was of small value, being usually covered with water for above half the year. The Beverley and Barmston Drainage, executed under the provisions of an act passed about the year 1792, lies parallel to the last, but on the opposite side of the river Hull, and extends from the sea-shore at Barmston, a few miles south of Bridlington, along the course of that river nearly to Kingston-upon-Hull, a distance of about twenty-four miles: its northern part contains more than 2000 acres, and has an outfall into the sea at Barmston; whilst the southern division, extending southward from Foston, contains upwards of 10,000 acres, and has its outlet into the river Hull at a place called Wincolmlée. The Keyingham Drainage, lying between Sunk Island and the main land, was originally completed under an act passed in the year 1722; a new act was obtained in 1802, under which the course of the drainage in some parts was altered, and an additional quantity of land included, making a total of 5500 acres: the execution of this was vested in three commissioners, and on a vacancy occurring by death or resignation, another commissioner is elected by the proprietors. The Hertford and Derwent Drainage contains upwards of 10,500 acres, of which 4500 are in the East, and the remainder in the North Riding: the act for this was obtained in the year 1800, and its execution was vested in three directors and three commissioners: the directors have a power to levy an annual assessment, not exceeding an average of three shillings per acre, for the purpose of maintaining and repairing the existing works and drains, and also of further making such new works as may, from time to time, become necessary. Spalding Moor and Walling Fen, lying to the westward of the southern part of the Wolds, were drained, allotted, and inclosed, about fifty years since, under the provisions of the same act of parliament.

Every kind of AGRICULTURAL CROP is cultivated in the county; and the systems of tillage, on account of the great diversity of soils and situations, are extremely various. Wheat is grown to a great extent on all the lower and more fertile lands; and no other district in the north of England, in proportion to its size, is considered to produce so much of it, or of so good a quality, as Cleveland, whence large quantities are shipped to the southern coast of England, and much is conveyed to Thirsk and Leyburn, where it is bought up for the manufacturing districts. Rye is sometimes sown on the lighter soils, more particularly of the North Riding, where wheat is not unfrequently mixed with it: of this mixture, provincially called "meslin," the common household bread of that portion of the county is chiefly made. The quantity of land annually sown with barley is no where remarkably great, except on the Wolds, the soil of which is peculiarly adapted to its culture: in the North Riding, in Ryedale and the dales of the Eastern Moorlands, are occasionally seen plots of the species provincially called big, which is six-rowed barley; and of bear, four-rowed. Besides being occasionally grown in other places, oats are very much cultivated in all the arable parts of the North Riding, more particularly in Ryedale, which district is as remarkable for the quantity and excellent quality of its oats, as Cleveland is for those of its wheat: two crops are here always taken in succession, and frequently three: in the western parts of the West Riding, too, this corn is the prevailing crop, and oaten bread is in common use in the manufacturing districts. Considerable quantities of flax are grown in the West Riding, in the neighbourhood of Selby; in the East Riding, about Howden and on the eastern bank of the Derwent; and in the North Riding, a small quantity in Ryedale, and a few other situations. Woad, for dyeing, is cultivated in the neighbourhood of Selby, among red clover. In the vicinity of York mustard is a valuable article of cultivation, and fields of it are occasionally seen in different places in the northern and eastern parts of the county: that which is grown near York is prepared for use in mills at that city, and is afterwards sold as Durham mustard. The wapentake of Barkstone-Ash, in the eastern part of the West Riding, is distinguished for an extensive growth of teasel, which is also occasionally cultivated to a small extent in different other places having a strong soil: it is purchased by the cloth-dressers, for the purpose of raising the nap on cloth, before it undergoes the operation of shearing. Sainfoin is grown in different situations.

The GRASS LANDS are very extensive, for, besides the tracts included with the arable districts in the large proportion above stated, the productive parts of the western side of the county are kept almost exclusively in grass, and from Ripley to its western extremity the whole country is employed in grazing; while corn, and that almost entirely oats, is raised only in very small quantities on the inferior moorish soils. The old pasture lands, forming by far the greater portion of the grass lands, have remained in that state from time immemorial, and in the West Riding are frequently mown, producing hay held in great esteem. Some of them are, nevertheless, of a very mean quality, and, especially in the North Riding, are often covered with thistles, ant-hills, and occasionally furze: in the dales of the Western Moorlands, however, remarkable attention is paid to the meadows. The extent of natural meadow, namely, such as derives the whole, or the greater part, of its fertility from the overflow of rivers, is not very great: many of the old fields of this kind in the Vale of York and Ryedale have been constantly mown for ages, and are still highly productive. The East Riding contains the smallest quantity of grass land; its sheep pastures on the Wolds, for which it was formerly so distinguished having been mostly brought under various courses of tillage; but it contains, on the banks of the Derwent, above Malton, and again at Cottingwith, low tracts of marshy meadows, occasionally overflowed by that river, which produce abundant crops of coarse flaggy hay, of which that obtained from the last-mentioned district is of a peculiarly nutritive quality. The whole of the West Riding is an eminent grazing district, where cattle and sheep of all kinds are fattened to great perfection, chiefly to supply the manufacturing parts of Yorkshire and Lancashire: for this purpose, great numbers of lean cattle and sheep are annually brought from Scotland and the northern counties contiguous to Yorkshire. It has also numerous small dairies, for the supply of its own manufacturing towns and those of Lancashire with butter; and some large ones in the vicinity of the large towns, to which the milk is principally sold. In the North Riding, the pastures are for the most part appropriated to the dairy; though grazing is also practised in some parts of it, more particularly in the Vale of York: the butter produced in this riding is chiefly packed in firkins, and sold to factors, who ship it for the London and other markets. In the East Riding, grazing and fattening, also stall-feeding, are practised to a very considerable extent.

A great deal of oak and ash TIMBER is produced in the West Riding, and great attention is paid to the management of the woods by their proprietors; the timber meets with a ready sale to the ship-building and manufacturing towns, and much is also used in the mines and collieries. The extent of the woodlands in the North Riding is estimated at about 25,000 acres, dispersed in all quarters, the Moorland and Cleveland having the smallest proportion: exclusively of the above, this division yields a considerable quantity of timber in its hedge-rows, more particularly in the Vale of York, on the Howardian hills, and in Ryedale. The spontaneous produce of the best woodlands, is oak, ash, and broad-leaved, or wych 'elm; of those in mountainous situations, chiefly birch and alder; and of the hedge-rows, various kinds of trees, for the most part of artificial plantation. In this riding it is the custom to sell the falls of wood to professed wood-buyers, who cut up the trees on the spot, according to the purposes for which the different parts of them are best calculated: the ports of Scarborough and Whitby consume most of the ship timber, excepting only such as grows towards its western extremity: the oak-timber grown in the greater part of this Riding, though not large, is extremely hard and durable: the only peculiar application of the ash-timber, which grows abundantly and in great perfection, is in the manufacture of butter-firkins, in which it is chiefly consumed. Plantations have been made on the sides and summits of several of the Moorland and other barren hills, chiefly of Scotch fir, larch, and spruce, a few oaks, &c. The East Riding is little remarkable for its timber; the natural woods are confined chiefly to the levels lying between the rivers Ouse and Derwent and the Wolds, where there are also abundance of timber-trees in the hedge-rows of old inclosures: the only woods to the east of the Wolds are those of Rise and Burton-Constable. The fine elevations of the Wolds have been ornamented in different parts by plantations of Scotch and spruce firs, larch, beech, ash, &c., to the amount of several thousand acres; and various other plantations have been made in the low country to the west of them.

The WASTES are very extensive, and about the end of the last century were calculated in the whole at 849,272 acres, but the amount has, since that period, been considerably lessened by numerous inclosure acts, obtained both for the detached wastes and for parts of the Moorlands. The surface of some of the higher hills of the Eastern Moorlands is entirely covered with large freestones; while upon others are beds of peat bog, in many places very deep, frequently not passable, and never without danger: these are invariably overgrown with ling, in some places mixed with bent and rushes. Near the old inclosures are some considerable tracts of loamy and sandy soils, producing furze, fern (here called "brackens"), thistles, and coarse grass, with but little ling; but wherever ling is the chief produce, the soil is invariably black moor or peat. The subsoils of these extensive wastes are various: in some places a yellowish, in others a reddish, clay occurs; a loose freestone rubble, resting either upon a freestone rock or upon clay, is also very common; and in different other places is found a rotten earth of peaty quality (which produces very luxuriant ling, bent, and rushes), a hard cemented reddish sand, or a grey sand; the basis of the whole is freestone. The Hamilton hills, forming the western end of these wastes, are, however, very different, having generally a fine loamy soil on a limestone rock, which produces great quantities of coarse grass and bent, in some places intermixed with ling, more particularly towards the south-western parts of them. The mountains of the western side of the county differ materially in their produce from the Eastern Moorlands: some, instead of black ling, are covered with a fine sweet grass; others with extensive tracts of bent; and though the higher parts produce ling, it is generally mixed with a large proportion of grass, bent, or rushes; the soil on the lower parts is a fine loam, in many places rather stiff, resting upon a hard blue limestone: the bent generally covers a strong soil lying upon a gritstone or freestone rock; the black ling, a reddish peat upon a red subsoil, or, in many places, a loose grit rubble, beneath which is a gritstone rock. Some of the lower tracts of the eastern moors, the lower parts of the western moors in general, and in certain instances the higher parts of the latter, are stinted pastures during the summer; and those who have that limited right in summer have a right in winter of turning upon them whatever quantity of stock they choose; these pastures are chiefly stocked with young cattle, horses, and such sheep as are intended to be sold off the same year. The remainder of the moors is common without stint, and is stocked for the most part with sheep, though a small, hardy, and very strong kind of horses is also bred and reared upon the Western Moorlands, and chiefly sold to the manufacturing parts of the West Riding and of Lancashire. The Moorland sheep are remarkable for their wretched appearance and great activity; they are wholly supported on these mountain wastes, and their mutton is of a particularly fine quality. The wastes of the East Riding consist chiefly of low, sandy, barren, and moory tracts lying between the Wolds and the rivers Ouse and Derwent, and the principal natural produce of which is short heath.

To the GEOLOGIST Yorkshire affords interesting fields of study : all its strata, with slight variations, dip eastward, those which appear at its western extremities being of the oldest formation. The mineral productions are various and important, and have given rise, and afford support, to some of its principal manufactures ; they consist chiefly of coal, iron, lead, stone of various qualities, and alum. The best coal is obtained in the WEST RIDING, which comprises one of the most valuable and extensive coal-fields in the kingdom. This coal district is bounded on the east by a narrow range of magnesian limestone, extending from Tickhill northward by Doncaster, Ferrybridge, Wetherby, Knaresborough, and Ripon, and consists of a great number of alternations of sand-stone, clay, shale, coal, and iron-stone, which form the substrata of the most populous parts of the riding. Its surface is characterized by successive parallel ranges of high ground, extending in length from north to south : the ascent to these hills on their western sides is abrupt, while on the east they decline more gradually, each one to the foot of the next range, under which its strata dip. Next to the magnesian limestone, and its subjacent sand, proceeding westward, appear, first, the blue shale and thin coal of the Vale of Went, and then the grit-freestone of Ackworth and Kirby, beneath which is found the swift-burning coal of Wragby, Shafton, Crofton, and other places in the great clay district of the Dearne below Barnsley, and of the Calder below Wakefield. These various measures rest upon the grit-freestone of Rotherham, Barnsley, Newmiller Dam, and East Ardsley, through which pits are sunk near Barnsley to several thick seams of hard furnace coal, one of them as much as ten feet thick. The next great sandstone stratum forms high grounds, and frequently projects beyond the general range into detached hills : it occurs near Sheffield, Wentworth Park, and Bretton Park, and forms the high ground of Horbury and Dewsbury, and of Middleton, near Leeds ; beneath it are found valuable beds of iron-stone, which are worked at Rotherham, Haigh-bridge, Low Moor, and several other places, where an abundance of muscle shells is found in contact with them : contiguous to this iron-stone are several strata of excellent coal. Next in the series lies the sandstone of Wortley-Chapel, Silkstone, Elmley, and Whitley-hall, with the valuable bituminous coal of Silkstone and Flockton, the best seams of the whole formation : this rock, entering the West riding from Derbyshire, and passing by Sheffield, Penistone, Huddersfield, Elland Edge, and the Clayton heights, afterwards takes its course parallel with the river Aire, by Idle and Chapel-Allerton, towards the magnesian limestone : in this part of the coal district, near Sheffield, Bradford, and Leeds, is dug the galliard stone, so much in request for making and mending the roads. The coal-mines are most numerous in the tract between Leeds and Wakefield, and in the neighbourhoods of Bradford, Barnsley, and Sheffield. Characterised by its irregular texture, its numerous quartz pebbles, and its frequently craggy surface, the millstone-grit, with soft alternations both above and below it, occupies the wide and barren moors to the west of Sheffield, Penistone, Huddersfield, Bradford, Otley, Harrogate, Ripley, and Masham : in the numerous alternations of this stone, thin seams of coal frequently occur, and in certain situations are worked with advantage. Of the millstone-grit, an excellent and almost imperishable building-stone, great quantities are annually sent down the rivers Don and Aire. The summits of Wharfedale, Ingleborough, Pennygant, and other lofty mountains on the western boundary of the county, are crowned with coal-measures, but their base consists wholly of limestone. The principal lead-mines in the West Riding are at Grassington, about ten miles west of Pateley-Bridge, and are found in a limestone tract which occupies also a great part of Craven ; but here the ores are far less abundant than in the vales of the Nid and the Wharfe. Hongill Fells, on the western boundary of the county, consist of the kind of slate called by geologists greywacké.

In the NORTH RIDING seams of an inferior kind of coal, which is heavy, sulphureous, and burns entirely away to white ashes, are wrought in different parts of both the Eastern and Western Moorlands, at Gilling Moor on the Howardian hills, and in the Vale of York, between Easingwold and Thirsk. Cleveland and the coast of this riding abound in all their hills with inexhaustible beds of aluminous strata ; and extensive works for the manufacture of alum have been established in the vicinity of Whitby, where the art is stated to have been first introduced from Italy, in the year 1595. Alum is also found, but not worked, in the Eastern Moorlands and in the vicinity of Bradford. In the Western Moorlands are many lead mines, some of which have been, and others still are, very valuable : these are situated in Swaledale, Arkendale, and the neighbouring valleys : their annual produce is estimated at 6000 tons, of which one-half is yielded by the mines of Swaledale. Veins of copper have been discovered at Richmond and at Middleton-Tyas, at which latter place that metal was worked about the middle of the last century ; copper pyrites is also procured in considerable quantities in all the alum-mines, and copperas was formerly extracted from it. Great quantities of iron-stone are found in Bilsdale, Bransdale, and Rosedale, in the Eastern Moorlands, where iron seems to have been extensively manufactured in ancient times ; but Ayton is the only place where forges have been erected at a modern period, and these are now abandoned. The iron-ore found in the northern parts of the Eastern Moorlands is sometimes in detached pieces, but more frequently in regular strata, of from six to fourteen inches thick, dipping towards the south : in the neighbourhood of Whitby, some of these beds are wrought, and their produce carried to the works in the north, where this ore is of great use in fluxing the more obdurate ores there obtained. Free-stone, or gritstone, of an excellent quality for building, is found in many parts of this riding, particularly on Gatherly Moor, near Richmond, at Renton, near Boroughbridge, in the neighbourhood of Whitby, in all parts of the Eastern Moorlands, of which it forms the chief basis, and in many parts of the Western. Nor is limestone less abundant : the Western Moorlands in a great measure consist of it ; the Hamilton and Howardian hills, almost entirely ; and a narrow ridge, producing lime of a peculiarly excellent quality for agricultural purposes, extends for at least thirty miles along the southern edge of the Eastern Moorlands : various isolated masses are also found in different situations. In Coverdale, one of the smaller valleys of the Western Moorlands, and at Pen-hill, between this and Wensleydale, a kind of flag-stone, used for covering roofs, is dug ; and in Swaledale a kind of purple slate, resembling that of Westmorland, but thicker and coarser, the use of which extends little beyond the spot where it is produced. Marble of various kinds, some much resembling that worked in Derbyshire, and some, in closeness of texture and distinctness of colours, superior to it, is found in many parts of the calcareous hills of the Western Moorlands, but is only used for burning into lime, or mending the roads: some of the limestone on the northern margin of Ryedale also greatly resembles the marble of Derbyshire, and is susceptible of nearly an equal polish. In the vicinity of the small river Greta, and in other places in the north-western extremity of the county, large blocks of a light red granite are found scattered over the surface, and in some places a light grey kind of the same stone. Gypsum, or alabaster, is found in the Vale of York, in the North Riding, and in some parts of the levels of the East and West Ridings: near Thornton-bridge, on the Swale, where it is worked for the use of the plasterers of the neighbourhood, it lies in strata several feet thick, and in some places not more than four feet from the surface.

The principal mineral productions of the EAST RIDING are, the chalk of the Wolds, which is occasionally used in building, and frequently for burning into lime; and the coarse hard limestone of the vale of the Derwent, which is of little value either for building or burning: the springs in the chalk are remarkably powerful, and many of them breaking out through the gravel at the eastern foot of the Wolds, combine to form the river Hull. In the gravel beds resting on the chalk, to the east of where this substance appears next the surface, very perfect remains of large animals are found: vertebrae, eighteen feet in length, and from eight to ten inches in diameter, have here been exhumed, as are frequently teeth, measuring from eight to ten inches in circumference. The strata of the West Riding contain few fossil remains except at Bradford, where, in a stratum of sandstone, are found beautiful impressions of euphorbium, bamboo cane, and other tropical productions; at a little distance from Knaresborough a bed of strontian earth exists, which is very rare in this kingdom. Various remarkable petrifications of animals have been discovered in the alum rocks in the vicinity of Whitby, as also cornua ammonis, or snake stones: some of the strata in the same neighbourhood also contain petrified cockle, oyster, and scallop shells, jet, and petrified wood; and trochitæ, or "thunderbolts," as they are vulgarly called, which are singular conical stones of from half an inch to an inch and a half in diameter at the base, and from two to five or six inches long. Great quantities of remarkable crystals of gypsum selenites and prismaticum are discovered in a bed of clay at Knapton, in the East Riding.

The MANUFACTURES, the most valuable and extensive of which are confined to the West Riding, are of the highest degree of importance to the kingdom, as well as to the multitudes to whom they afford subsistence, and, in numerous instances, wealth. The two distinguishing manufactures are those of woollen goods and cutlery; the seat of the former is the district including the towns of Leeds, Halifax, Huddersfield, Bradford, and Wakefield; and that of the latter, Sheffield and its vicinity. The principal inducement for the establishment of these great works in the situations which they now occupy, was the plentiful supply of water and fuel for giving motion to machinery, and for the various other purposes of their several departments. The river Aire is the eastern boundary of the clothing district, which extends over the county thence to the mountain ridge separating this county from that of Lancaster. The great bulk of the woollen manufactures consisted formerly of the coarser kinds of cloth; but at present "Yorkshire cloth" no longer conveys the exclusive idea of inferiority, as the manufacturers now produce also great quantities of black and blue superfine cloths of distinguished merit. Until of late years, when numerous extensive factories have been erected (in which the whole process of making cloth, from the first breaking of the wool to the finishing of the piece ready for the consumer is completed), the first stages of the manufacture were carried on in villages and hamlets, where the wool underwent the respective operations of spinning, weaving and fulling: this, however, is now only partially the case; the cloth from these scattered establishments is sent in its unfinished state to the cloth halls in the respective towns, where it is sold to the merchants, who have it dressed under their own direction. Besides broad and narrow cloths of various qualities, serges, and kerseymeres, the woollen manufactures of the West Riding include also great quantities of ladies' cloths, such as pelisse-cloths and shawls; stuff goods of various kinds; camblets, shalloons, tammys, duroys, everlastings, calimancoes, moreens, shags, serges, baize, &c. Carpets much resembling those of Scotland are manufactured on a very extensive scale at Dewsbury, where is one of the largest factories for this article, and for woollen cloths and blankets, in the kingdom. Several factories have been established for spinning flax for canvass, linen, sacking-thread, &c.; an extensive branch of the Manchester cotton trade is also carried on, and at Barnsley the manufacture of linen prevails. There is a considerable trade in the spinning of worsted-yarn, and in the manufacture of wool cards and combs. The Leeds pottery enjoys a very considerable reputation both in the British dominions and in foreign countries: the wholesale tobacco trade is likewise pursued to a great extent in that town, where there are mills for preparing the raw material.

Sheffield has, from a very remote period, been famous for its manufacture of cutlery, which, however, was of very small extent until the early part of the 17th century, when it began gradually to increase. There are also several foundries for iron, brass, and Britannia metal, and extensive works for the refining of steel: the iron-works at Rotherham are particularly celebrated, and produce all kinds of articles in cast-iron, and much wrought-iron, in bars, sheets, and rods, together with tinned plates and steel. At Sheffield is also a minor manufacture of hair-seating, besides a more considerable one of carpets. In the dales of the Eastern Moorlands and in Cleveland some coarse linens are manufactured by the small farmers; and at Crathorne, in Cleveland, and various places near the Hamilton hills, are bleaching establishments. The dales of the Western Moorlands have long been famous for their manufacture of knit worsted and yarn stockings; but this has been, in a great measure, superseded by the spinning of worsted for the manufactures of the West Riding. Cotton-mills have been erected in Wensleydale, at Easingwold, and at Masham, at which last place is also a worsted-mill; and in its vicinity shallons and shags are manufactured to a small extent. York and the East Riding have various isolated manufactures, the whole of which are mentioned under the heads of the places where they are respectively carried on. In the vicinities of York and Hull a kind of coarse earthenware is made, as well as bricks and tiles; and on Walling Fen, near Howden, great quantities of white bricks are made from a blue clay found there, which are exported in different directions, being in great demand for superior buildings, on account of their beauty of colour, accuracy of form, and durability. Almost every town in the North Riding, and many in the other parts of the county, have tanners and tawers, who manufacture the hides and skins produced in their respective neighbourhoods. To this enumeration of manufactures may be added the building and rigging of ships, which is carried on to a considerable extent at Hull and Whitby, and in a minor degree at Scarborough and Thorne: at the three first-mentioned places are manufactures of sail-cloth and cordage. The chief port of the county is Hull, which may be deemed the fourth in England: besides this, it possesses, of a smaller class, those of York, Selby, Goole, Thorne, Bridlington, Scarborough, and Whitby. The commerce is of a very extensive and diversified character: the foreign and coasting trade is wholly centred in the above-mentioned ports, more particularly in that of Hull, through which is poured an immense quantity of manufactured goods, coal, stone, &c., from the West Riding, and of cotton-twist and manufactured cottons from Lancashire, the latter of which articles are chiefly forwarded to Hamburg. Hull and Whitby share in the Greenland fishery; and their imports of timber, deals, hemp, flax, &c., from the Baltic are very considerable. The internal commerce of the West Riding is extensive, and is greatly facilitated by an excellent system of artificial navigation. Corn is exported from Hull, Bridlington, and Scarborough to London, and the collieries of the north; and from the various principal markets of the East and North Ridings great quantities of grain are sent by water carriage into the western division of the county, from which the first-mentioned division receives in return coal, lime, flagstones, bricks and tiles, and sundry other articles. A large quantity of hams and bacon is annually sent from the eastern parts of Yorkshire to the metropolis and other populous districts of the kingdom.

The principal RIVERS are, the Northern Ouse (so called to distinguish it from the Ouse of Buckinghamshire), the Swale, the Ure, the Wharfe, the Derwent, the Aire, the Calder, the Don, the Hull, the Tees, and the Esk, all of which, except the two last, pour their waters through the great estuary of the Humber. The Humber is navigable up to Hull for ships of the largest burthen; the Ouse up to the newly-formed port of Goole, for vessels drawing not more than sixteen feet of water, and to York, for those of 140 tons burthen. Above that city the Ouse is navigable for barges of 30 tons, as also is the Ure past Boroughbridge to Ripon, and the Swale, only for a very few miles: the spring tides would turn the current of the Ouse to a little above York, were it not that they are obstructed by locks about four miles below that city. The Wharfe is navigable as far as Tadcaster; the Derwent is navigable for vessels of 25 tons' burthen to Malton, above which town the navigation has been continued to Yeddingham Bridge, a further distance of about nine miles. The Aire becomes navigable at Leeds, and a few miles lower, near Castleford, is joined by the Calder, which is navigable to Salter-Hebble, near Halifax. The Don having been joined by the powerful stream of the Rother, unites with the Ouse at Goole; the lower part of its channel, from the vicinity of Snaith, being artificial, and usually called the Dutch river: in 1751, this river was made navigable to Tinsley, three miles below Sheffield, and, under the provisions of an act of parliament passed in 1815, this navigation has been continued by a cut, called the Tinsley canal, to Sheffield. The Hull falls into the Humber at Kingston-upon-Hull, where its mouth forms a secure but narrow haven: this river is navigable to Frodingham Bridge, several miles above Beverley (with which town it communicates by means of a short cut), whence the navigation is continued by a canal to Great Driffield. Another canal extends eastward from the river Hull to Leven, a length of about three miles. The Tees is navigable for vessels of 60 tons to a short distance above Yarm, where the spring tides rise about seven feet: below Stockton it spreads into the fine estuary of Redcar, three miles broad.

The CANALS are nearly all within the limits of the West Riding. Under this head, however, may be classed the small navigable river Foss, the channel of which is believed to have been originally formed by the Romans, to effect the drainage of an extensive level tract lying between the Ouse and the Howardian hills, near the western extremity of which it rises, and thence takes first a south-easterly, and then a southerly, course to the Ouse, at York. At the end of the last century, the navigation was made perfect from York to Sheriff-Hutton, a distance of about fourteen miles, under the provisions of an act of parliament passed in the year 1793. Market-Weighton and Hedon, which are both situated in the East Riding, and are considerable markets for corn, have each the advantage of a navigable canal to the Humber. The canals of the West Riding, in alphabetical order, are as follow. The Barnsley canal commences in the navigable channel of the river Calder, a little below Wakefield, and, taking a southerly direction, unites with the Dearne and Dove canal near Barnsley; its length is only fifteen miles, but it is of great importance, as forming part of the line of navigation from Sheffield to Barnsley, Wakefield, Leeds, Huddersfield, Manchester, and Liverpool. The Bradford canal, which is three miles in length, commences in the Leeds and Liverpool canal at Windhill, in the parish of Idle, and terminates at Bradford, where extensive railways connect it with the collieries and iron-works of Low Moor and Bowling. The Dearne and Dove canal commences in a side cut from the river Don, between Swinton and Mexborough, and, passing north-westward, terminates in the Barnsley canal, at Eyming's Wood, after a course of nine miles: together with the Barnsley canal it forms a line connecting the navigable channel of the Don with that of the Calder. From the newly-formed commercial docks at Goole a canal passes westward to the river Aire, at Ferrybridge, and thus completes the water communication between that rising port and the manufacturing districts of the West Riding, together with the counties of Lancaster, Chester, and Stafford. The Huddersfield canal, nineteen miles and a half long, commences in Sir John Ramsden's canal, on the southern side of that town, and, proceeding westward, passes near Saddleworth, through the range of mountains on the borders of Yorkshire and Lancashire, by one of the largest tunnels in the kingdom, being nearly three miles and a half in length, and terminates in the latter county in the Manchester, Ashton, and Oldham canal. The Leeds and Liverpool canal enters this county from Colne in Lancashire, whence it proceeds by Skipton, Keighley, and Bingley, and across the river Aire, near Shipley, to Leeds, where it terminates in the Aire navigation: this extensive and important canal connects, by a direct water communication, the ports of Liverpool and Hull with the large manufacturing town of Leeds. The Ramsden canal, four miles in length, commences in the Calder and Hebble navigation at Cooper's Bridge, and terminates in the Huddersfield canal at the King's Mills, near Huddersfield; thus completing, in conjunction with the Huddersfield canal, the important line of water communication between Manchester and the great manufacturing towns of Yorkshire. The Rochdale canal, entering from Rochdale in Lancashire, terminates in the Calder and Hebble navigation at Sowerby-Bridge, two miles from Halifax. The Stainforth and Keadby canal, partly in this county and partly in the Isle of Axholme, in Lincolnshire, branches from the navigation of the Don at Fishlake, near Stainforth, and, passing by Thorne, terminates in the Trent, at Keadby, after a course of fifteen miles.

Of RAILWAYS, the Leeds and Selby line was one of the first commenced; it is continued from Selby to Hull by the Hull and Selby railway. The line of the Manchester and Leeds railway enters the county at Langfield, and passing near Halifax, Dewsbury, and Wakefield, joins the North-Midland and the York and North-Midland railways near Normanton, and then proceeds to Leeds. A short railway has been formed between Sheffield and Rotherham, which is connected with the North-Midland railway close to the latter town. The North-Midland enters the county to the south of Rotherham, and runs northward, to the east of Barnsley, as far as Normanton. The York and North-Midland railway commences at the city, and proceeds to the river Wharfe, over which it is carried by a bridge 274 feet in length, and, after passing through a tunnel, crosses the river Aire by a bridge of three arches, and joins the North-Midland line near Normanton. The Manchester and Sheffield railway enters the county between two branches of the river Don, to the west of Penistone, and passing close to the north of that town, proceeds to Sheffield. The Whitby and Pickering railway connects these towns, thus establishing a communication for the transport of the produce of the latter to the sea. The last great undertaking in this branch of communication is the formation of the Great North of England railway, which proceeds nearly in a straight line north-west-by-west from York to the vicinity of Darlington, in Durham, and in its course passes close to the towns of Thirsk and North-Allerton.

Besides the great station of Eboracum, at York, the chief seat of the ROMAN power in Britain, this county contained also, in the West Riding, the stations of Isurium, at Aldborough; Legiolum, a little below the junction of the rivers Aire and Calder; Danum, at Doncaster; Olicana, at Ilkley; Cambodunum, at Slack, near Halifax; and Calcaria, at Tadcaster. In the North Riding were those of Cataractonium, at Catterick; and Derwentio, at Stamford-Bridge, or at Alby, a mile further northward; and in the East Riding, Delgovitia, at Londesborough; and Prætorium, at Patrington. The most durable of the works of this people were the roads they constructed in order to facilitate the communication between their military stations; several traversed Yorkshire in different directions, and remains of some of them may yet be traced in various parts of it. The common centre from which they diverged was Eboracum. The line of the great road, since called the Watling-street, which ran the whole length of England, from the coast of Kent to the wall of Severus, enters from Nottinghamshire in the vicinity of Bawtry, and passes through Doncaster, Barnsdale, Pontefract Park, Castleford, Tadcaster, York, Aldborough, and Catterick, into the county of Durham at Pierce-Bridge. Another military road entered from Manchester, and passed through the vicinity of Halifax, and by Wakefield, to the Watling-street. Another similar road, from Chesterfield, on the north-western confines of Derbyshire, passed by Sheffield, Barnsley, Hemsworth, and Ackworth, to the Watling-street, at or near Pontefract: a vicinal way also appears to have passed through Pontefract, in a southerly direction, to the villages of Darrington, Wentbridge, Smeaton, Campsall, and Hatfield. From York a Roman road ran to Malton, and seems to have there divided into two branches, one, now commonly called Wade's Causeway, leading to Dunsley bay, in the neighbourhood of Whitby; the other to Scarborough and Filey: another road passed from York, by Stamford-Bridge, Fridaythorpe, and Sledmere, and across the Wolds, to Bridlington bay, called by Ptolemy Gabrantovicoum Sinus Portuosus, or Salutaris. Further to the south was a Roman road from York, by Stamford-Bridge and Londesborough, to Patrington; from Londesborough, a branch of this, formerly styled Humber-street, passed in a straight line southward to the village of Brough on the Humber. The most remarkable antiquities exist in the remains of ancient castles and religious edifices; but there are also several specimens of military and other works of a more remote period. The three gigantic obelisks of single stones, vulgarly called the Devil's Arrows, situated near Boroughbridge, are by some thought to be Druidical, and by others of Roman origin. Traces of Roman encampments are found in several places, and the remains of their roads are more particularly conspicuous on the Eastern Moorlands, where the ancient road from Malton to Dunsley bay, now called Wade's Causeway, is in excellent preservation, being twelve feet broad, in some places raised more than three feet above the surface, and paved with flint pebbles; and on the Wolds, where the Roman road from York to Bridlington bay may be traced for many miles. The only remains of Roman structures now to be seen in York, the site of the ancient Eboracum, are the polygonal tower and the south wall of the Mint yard. A vast variety of Roman antiquities has at different times been found in York and its vicinity, in digging the cellars, drains, and foundations of houses, such as altars, sepulchral and other urns, sarcophagi, coins, signets (both cameos and intaglios), fibulæ, &c.; and Roman urns, coins, &c., have been discovered in several other situations near the stations and roads of that people. Many ancient tumuli are discernible in various parts of the county, particularly on the Wolds; and besides the Roman encampments, others of the Saxons and the Danes may be traced in several places in the North and West Ridings. The remarkable assemblage of rocks called Bramham Crags, about nine miles north-west of Ripon, are supposed, from the peculiar marks of rude sculpture which some of them exhibit, to have been a celebrated Druidical temple.

The number of Religious houses was about 106, including seven alien priories: the ruins of several of them are amongst the most beautiful and picturesque in the kingdom. The principal ruins of abbeys are those of St. Mary's at York; Fountains, Kirkstall, Roche, and Selby, in the West Riding; and Byland, Rivaulx, Easby, Eggleston, and Whitby, in the North Riding; and of priories, those of Bolton and Knaresborough, in the West Riding; Guisborough, Mountgrace, and Wykeham, in the North Riding; and Bridlington, Kirkham, and Watton, in the East Riding. The most distinguished remains of ancient fortresses, besides Clifford's Tower at York, are those of the castles of Cawood, Conisbrough, Harewood, Knaresborough, Pontefract, Great Sandall, Skipton, and Tickhill, in the West Riding; of Helmsley, Malton, Mulgrave, Pickering, Richmond, Scarborough, Sheriff-Hutton, and Skelton, in the North Riding; and of Wressell, in the East Riding. The most remarkable ancient mansions are, Temple-Newsom, near Leeds; and Gilling Castle, near Helmsley, formerly the seat of the ancient family of Fairfax; besides which, several in different parts of the county are now occupied as farm-houses. Yorkshire contains a great number of elegant seats of more modern erection, belonging to the nobility and gentry who possess estates within its limits: some of those particularly worthy of mention in the West Riding are, Wentworth House, Wentworth Castle or Stambrough Hall, Methley Park, Thundercliffe Grange, Sandbeck Park, Newby Hall, Harewood House, Scarthingwell Hall, Allerton-Mauleverer, and Bishopthorpe, near York, the archiepiscopal palace; in the North Riding, Hornby Castle, Stanwick, Castle-Howard, and Mulgrave Castle; and in the East Riding, Londesborough.

The chalybeate and sulphureous springs of Harrogate, discovered in 1571, are of great celebrity, and have rendered that once obscure hamlet one of the principal watering-places in the north of England. Askerne, about eight miles north of Doncaster, has of late years become much noted for its medicinal waters, which much resemble those of Harrogate, both in smell and taste, but differ from them in their operation. The chalybeate and saline springs of Scarborough, discovered early in the 17th century, have long been celebrated. In May, 1822, a mineral spring was discovered a mile to the south-east of Guisborough, which is greatly resorted to by persons labouring under different complaints; the waters are diuretic. There are, besides, mineral springs of various qualities at Aldfield, Boston, Gilthwaite, Horley Green, Ilkley, and Knaresborough, in the West Riding; and a chalybeate spring at Bridlington Quay, on the coast of the East Riding. At Knaresborough is the celebrated dropping and petrifying well; and at the bottom of Giggleswick Scar, near the village of Giggleswick, is a spring which ebbs and flows at irregular periods. On the Wolds, and near Cottingham on their eastern side, are periodical springs, which sometimes emit very powerful streams of water for a few months successively, and then become dry for years. Some of the most remarkable waterfalls are, Thornton Force, formed by a small stream which is driven down a precipice of about 30 yards in height, and situated near the village of Ingleton, in the West Riding, and in the vicinity of Thornton Scar, a tremendous cliff of about 300 feet in height; the cataract of Malham Cove, which is 300 feet high; Aysgarth Force; Hardrow Fall; High Force, or Fall, on the Tees; Mallin Spout; Egton; and Mossdale Fall, all in the North Riding. Among the natural curiosities of the county must also be enumerated its caves, the principal of which, situated among the Craven mountains, are Yordas Cave, in a mountain called Greg-roof, and Weathercote Cave, both of them in the vicinity of Ingleton, and in the latter of which is a stupendous cataract of twenty yards fall; Hurtlepot and Ginglepot, near the head of the subterranean river Wease, or Greta; and Donk Cave, near the foot of Ingleborough. At the foot of the mountain Pennigant, in the same neighbourhood, are two frightful orifices, called Hulpit and Huntpit Holes, through each of which runs a subterraneous brook, passing underground for about a mile, and then emerging, one at Dowgill Scar, and the other at Bransil-head.

YOULGRAVE (ALL SAINTS), a parish, partly in the hundred of WIRKSWORTH, and partly in that of HIGH PEAK, N. division of the county of DERBY; containing, with the chapelries of Birchover, Elton, Stanton, and Winster, and the township of Middleton with Smerril, 3727 inhabitants, of whom 1060 are in Youlgrave township, 3 miles (S. by W.) from Bakewell. There are numerous lead-mines, which, though formerly more productive than at present, are still in active operation, and stone of good quality for building and for walls for fencing is extensively quarried; various fossils are found in the quarries. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £9. 4. 7.; net income, £220; patron and impropiator, the Duke of Devonshire. The tithes were commuted for land and a money payment in 1815; the glebe comprises 100 acres, with a house. The church is a very handsome structure, partly Norman, and partly in the later English style, and contains several ancient monuments. There are chapels of ease at Winster, Elton, and Stanton; also places of worship for Calvinists, Primitive Methodists, and Wesleyans.

YOULTHORPE, with GOWTHORPE, a township, in the parish of BISHOP-WILTON, union of POCKLINGTON, Wilton-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, E. riding of YORK, 5¼ miles (N. W. by N.) from Pocklington; containing 102 inhabitants. The township is the property of various owners, of whom Sir Francis Lindley Wood, Bart., is lord of the manor: its small village is situated on a bold eminence, and chiefly occupied by farmers. The tithes were commuted for land in 1769.

YOULTON, a township, in the parish of ALNE, union of EASINGWOULD, wapentake of BULMER, N. riding of YORK, 6½ miles (S. S. W.) from Easingwold; containing 74 inhabitants. The township comprises by computation 1000 acres, of which the manorial rights belong to University College, Oxford: the hamlet is much scattered; and at a house here, James I. halted on his route from Scotland.

YOXFORD (St. PETER), a parish, in the union and hundred of BLYTHING, E. division of SUFFOLK, $23\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Ipswich; containing 1251 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2681 acres: the village is situated in a remarkably pleasant and genteel neighbourhood, on the road from Ipswich to Yarmouth, and consists principally of one well-built street of modern houses, with two commodious inns. Cockfield Hall, the seat of Sir Charles Blois, Bart. is a handsome mansion of the time of James I. The living is a vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 14. 2.; patron and incumbent, the Rev. Dr. Roberts; impropiators, the Earl of Stradbroke and Sir C. Blois. The great tithes have been commuted for £284, and the vicarial for £194, and the glebe contains 5 acres. The church has been lately enlarged by subscription, aided by a grant of £140 from the Incorporated Society; it contains some handsome monuments.

YOXHALL (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of LICHFIELD, N. division of the hundred of OFFLOW and of the county of STAFFORD, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Lichfield; containing, with part of the hamlet of Hoar-cross, 1535 inhabitants, and comprising by measurement 4795 acres. The parish includes within its limits the hamlets of Hadley-End, one mile south-west; Long-croft, three-quarters of a mile east; Morry, one mile west; Olive-Green, one mile and a half west; and Woodhouses, about half a mile east, from the village of Yoxhall. The village is pleasantly situated on the road from Buxton to Bath, about a mile from the river Trent: the weaving of tape affords employment to 150 persons, of whom many are children. Fairs are held for cattle on the 12th of February and the 19th of October. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £17. 6. 8., and in the gift of Lord Leigh: the tithes have been commuted for £290, and the glebe comprises 193 acres. The church exhibits various styles, from the Norman to the later English. There are a place of worship for Primitive Methodists, and a Roman Catholic chapel; also a school, founded in 1695, by Thomas Taylor, and endowed with various bequests producing about £20 per annum. The parish possesses town-lands consisting of about twenty-four acres, let for upwards of £50 a year, and which have been applied by the parochial authorities, for the benefit of Yoxhall, for more than two centuries: there are likewise church lands comprising 10a. 3r. 2p. In levelling a piece of ground, about forty vessels containing ashes and human bones, were taken up some years since.

ZEAL-MONACHORUM (St. PETER), a parish, in the union of CREDITON, hundred of NORTH TAWTON, South Molton and N. divisions of DEVON, 8 miles (W. by N.) from Crediton; containing 649 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the river Yeo, comprises 2946 acres, of which 589 are common or waste; the soil in the southern part is a red fertile loam, and in the northern good corn land; the surface is hilly, and sandstone of good quality for building is quarried, and also for repairing the roads. The living is a rectory, valued in the king's books at £17. 8. 9., and in the gift of the incumbent, the Rev. John Comyns: the tithes have been commuted for £419, and the glebe comprises 46 acres. The poor have some small bequests.

ZEAL, SOUTH, a chapelry, in the parish of SOUTH TAWTON, union of OAKHAMPTON, hundred of WONFORD, Crockernwell and S. divisions of DEVON, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Oakhampton. This is a decayed borough and market-town: the market has been long disused, but there is a fair for cattle on the Tuesday following the martyrdom of Thomas à Becket. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, is now a school-house.

ZEALS, a tything, in the parish, union, and hundred of MERE, Hindon and S. divisions of WILTS, 2 miles (W. by S.) from Mere; containing 588 inhabitants.

ZENNOR (St. SENNAR), a parish, in the union of PENZANCE, W. division of the hundred of PENWITH and of the county of CORNWALL, 5 miles (W. S. W.) from St. Ives; containing 1025 inhabitants. This place is situated near the western extremity of the Bristol Channel, by which it is bounded on the north; the line of the coast is in some parts alternated with small bays and with projecting headlands, one of which is named Gurnard's Head. The parish comprises 3184 acres, of which 2106 are common or waste; it has quarries of granite, which is used for building, and there are some tin-mines, but the substratum of the greater part of the soil is a species of moorstone. The living is a discharged vicarage, valued in the king's books at £5. 5. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$.; patron, the Bishop of Exeter; impropiator, George John, Esq. The vicarial tithes have been commuted for £200, and the glebe contains 13 acres, with a house, built by the incumbent, the Rev. Henry Stoneman. The church is an ancient structure. There are places of worship for Bryanites and Wesleyans; and at Kerrow was formerly a chapel, of which there are still portions.
